BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO PRIVATE BILLS—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) moved:

That, for the remainder of the session, all private bills from the senate when received from that house, shall be deemed to have been read the first time and ordered for second reading, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of bills be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

WORLD WHEAT SITUATION

EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA—RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to table herewith copies in English and French of a note of May 28 from the United States minister, and our reply of the same date.

This exchange of notes, which is self-explanatory, has arisen out of the fact that the President of the United States has been obligated, under the United States Agricultural Adjustment Act, to impose a quota restriction on the importation of Canadian wheat. The president's proclamation, issued last night, limits total imports of wheat into the United States during the next twelve months to 800,000 bushels. Of this total, the allocation to Canada is 795,000 bushels. The United States note makes it clear that this import restriction will not affect the movement of Canadian wheat into the United States for miling in bond and export, or Canadian wheat moving through the United States for export.

In its note the United States government intimates that it is proposed to invite the interested governments to resume discussions in Washington, in the near future, on the whole wheat surplus problem. In addition to looking toward the resumption of discussions of the world wheat situation between the wheat producing countries, the United States government propose, in particular, closer collaboration between the Canadian and United States governments with a view to preventing divergencies in our respective wheat programmes and policies, a development which would be in accord with the purposes of the Hyde Park declaration. The Canadian note recognizes the domestic difficulties with which the United States has had to contend, acknowledges its assurance that Canadian export and transit trade will not be affected by the restrictions, and welcomes the United States initiative in proposing joint examination of the world wheat problem and closer cooperation between Canada and the United States in working out their respective wheat programmes and policies.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I had a question which I was going to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), but the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rather beat me to it when he announced the international conference which is to be held in Washington. I am sure we were all glad to learn that Canada is to be permitted to supply almost the entire import quota of the United States. There was one sentence in the press release, however, to which the Prime Minister did not refer, in which it was stated that the disclosure of the proposed conference was made in the release of an exchange of notes between the United States and Canada in connection with quota action. Would the minister table the notes which have passed between the two governments in this connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just tabled them.

Mr. PERLEY: I did not understand that the Prime Minister tabled the actual notes which passed between the two governments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; that was my purpose in rising. I tabled the notes and made a short statement in explanation.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIER OF ONTARIO RESPECTING INCREASED TAX ON NON-RESIDENTS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister at the same time table the correspondence between himself and the Premier of Ontario to which reference was made in this morning's press, having to do with the increased tax imposed on non-residents by the proposed amendment to the Income War Tax Act?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think that correspondence will take a little time to copy. When it is copied I shall be pleased to see that it is tabled.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 80, for the relief of Elizabeth (Elspeth) Brown Rattray Selkirk Morphy.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 81, for the relief of Stanley Jackson.—Mr. Whitman.

Bill No. 82, for the relief of Vera Black Slatkin.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 83, for the relief of Stella Cohen Baboushkin.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 84, for the relief of Kate Abramovitch Reinblatt.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 85, for the relief of Dora Catherine Sullivan Evans.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 86, for the relief of Ilona Klein, otherwise known as Eleanor Klein.—Mr. Boucher.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THIRTY-DAY TRAINING—VOLUNTEERS FOR ACTIVE SERVICE

Mr. ESLING:

1. How many men were given thirty days training under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act?

2. How many of these have volunteered and been accepted for service in the Canadian army (active force)?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. 81,086 recruits completed training.

2. Records at national defence headquarters regarding enlistments of N.R.M.A. recruits only show the figures previous to March 25th, 1941, and as of that date the number reported by the districts aggregated 2,039 in the navy, army and air force. A breakdown of enlistments into each service is not available.

*QUEBEC PROVINCE PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. PARENT:

1. What is the name of each of the companies distributing electricity, wholesale and retail, in the province of Quebec, and who pay taxes to the dominion government?

2. Where is the head office of each of these companies?

3. What amount of taxes was paid by each of such companies to the dominion government during the years, 1938, 1939 and 1940?

4. What is the total amount paid by these companies for the years, 1938, 1939 and 1940?

Mr. GIBSON: Mr. Speaker, it would be contrary to established practice to give information as to the amount of taxes paid by any individual taxpayer. Under the circumstances I would ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN ARMY—WASSERMANN TEST

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Are the members and officers of the three branches of the army obliged to take the Wassermann test?

2. If so, since when?

3. If not, why?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What total amount has the dominion government contributed each fiscal year since 1935 towards unemployment relief in the province of New Brunswick?

2. During each such fiscal year: (a) what total amount was contributed toward direct relief; (b) what amount was contributed to be used in the paying of the cost of public works projects; (c) what amount was contributed to be used by the province to pay the costs of various youth training projects; (d) what amount, if any, was contributed to be used in paying the costs of other educational projects; (e) what amounts were contributed towards the promotion of colonization; (f) what additional projects for the relief of unemployment were assisted by contribution from the dominion to the province of New Brunswick?

3. What was the total contribution of the dominion towards each such project?

4. Who, in each case, represented the dominion government as supervisor or inspector on each of these projects, to see to it that moneys contributed by the dominion were expended solely and entirely for the purpose for which each contribution was made?

BACON BOARD

ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO LIMITATION OF DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION OF PORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn).

Some short time ago I announced to the house that the British ministry of food had requested certain additional quantities of bacon. Subsequent to this a further request was received that shipments should be accelerated so that shipments under the present contract would be completed by September 15 rather than October 31 as provided for in the agreement. To comply with this request will require the shipment of 425,000,000 pounds during a period of forty-six weeks rather than fifty-two weeks as originally provided for, and it will be necessary substantially to increase shipments during the present month and during the remainder of the period up to September 15, during a period when hog marketings are normally at their lowest level. Accordingly, it was deemed desirable to take certain steps to secure additional quantities of bacon for export.

The method adopted to accomplish this purpose is that each exporting packer is being allowed for domestic distribution the average number of hogs distributed weekly in the domestic market in 1940, and is required to deliver to the board the export product of every hog slaughtered over and above the domestic allowance. At the same time all slaughterers of hogs, excepting farmers, are being required to obtain licences for the purpose of limiting the quantity of pork being distributed by domestic slaughterers to the level of 1940, similar to the action taken with respect to exporting packers.

The domestic consumption of pork has been gradually increasing and is exceedingly high, and the amount distributed during 1940 is considered a liberal allowance, since, from all information available, the per capita consumption of pork during that year was the highest on record.

THE MINISTRY

AGRICULTURE AND NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—QUESTION OF ANNOUNCING CHANGES IN THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With regard to the question asked me yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), I am not at the moment in a position to announce any change in the personnel of the ministry. Before the present session is adjourned I hope to be in a position to inform the house of a change under which the Minister of Agriculture will be able to give his undivided time to the work of that department, and whereby the work of the Department of National War Services will be expanded.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): What I had in mind was the announcement being made at a calf auction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose that would depend on what my hon. friend regards as a calf auction.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

RESULT OF FORMAL INVESTIGATIONS OF DISASTERS IN NOVEMBER, 1940

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport): On November 15, 1940, I told the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) that an investigation would be held in respect to the loss of the steamers Novadoc and Anna C. Minch in lake Michigan, United States, on or about November 12, 1940. I am now in a position to say that formal investigations have been completed. The investigation in both cases was conducted by the Hon. F. H. Barlow, district judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada for the Ontario admiralty district.

In regard to the Novadoc the court found no default on the part of the master or any other person or persons. The vessel was in good seaworthy condition. The court found "that the loss of the vessel and the loss of life can be attributed only to the violence of the storm". Two members of the crew were lost. The court expressed appreciation of the action of Mr. Clyde Cross and the other two men operating the fishing boat Three Brothers who at very considerable risk proceeded to the stranded Novadoc in a heavy sea and rescued the seventeen survivors. The gallant conduct of these three men will be officially recognized by the government through the marine services of the Department of Transport.

The court recommended that a barometer be conveniently placed in the pilot house of vessels, that fitting of radiotelephone be made compulsory, and that telephone communication should be fitted between bridge and engine room. The Department of Transport had already approached the Dominion Marine association, which represents the majority of owners of lake ships, with a view to having this recommendation acted upon. This recommendation applied only to some vessels, because in most cases the ship barometer was so placed as to be readily accessible to the officer on duty on the bridge.

In regard to the Anna C. Minch, the vessel disappeared on or about November 12, 1940, with the loss of all hands. The wreck of the vessel was located and inspected by a diver who found a large hole in her port side, twenty feet wide and extending from bilge to deck, caused obviously by collision with some other vessel, probably the William B. Davock which disappeared about the same time. The William B. Davock is of United States registry.

The court found that the loss of the vessel can be attributed only to the severe storm and the probability that she came in collision with another vessel, thought to be the William B. Davock. No blame was attached to the owners or managers of the vessel. The court recommended that all lake vessels be required to carry wireless telephone equipment. Vessels of this type and size are not required to carry wireless.

Under the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, only cargo vessels of 5,000 tons gross tonnage and upward, going on any voyage of two hundred, or over, nautical miles from one place to another place, are required to carry radio transmitting apparatus. These two vessels were less than 5,000 tons. The question of enlarging the scope of the act was under consideration. During the past season of navigation on the great lakes, 129 ships were equipped with radio, of which 108 had radiotelephone equipment.

The question of developing suitable radiotelephone communication facilities on the great lakes has been under investigation by the radio division of the Department of Transport in collaboration with officers of the United States administration for some time. The Canada Shipping Act would require to be amended in order to make radio equipment compulsory.

These recommendations are at present receiving due consideration.

[Mr. Cardin.]

SCRAP IRON

REPORTED MOVING OF DOMINION BRIDGE FURNACES AND ROLLING MILLS FROM CALGARY PLANT TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply to a question I asked on May 22 with respect to the intention of the Dominion Bridge company to move its plant from Calgary to Vancouver. Could the minister give the house an explanation with regard to that unfortunate situation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Permission to move the plant of the Dominion Bridge company from Calgary to Vancouver was recommended some two or three weeks ago by the steel controller. I believe the plant in Calgary has not been operating for eleven years. It seems to be of no value to the war effort in its present location, and it was recommended to me that the plant be moved to Vancouver. Government assistance in the moving of the plant was not asked, other than the usual declaration that it is being moved for war purposes, thereby allowing the company to present its case for consideration of the war contracts depreciation board. That declaration was granted, and the government has no further part in the transaction.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Will depreciation on that plant be allowed?

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter for the war contracts depreciation board to consider. The board will have to decide as to what if any depreciation is permissible. The Department of Munitions and Supply is not assisting the company financially.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Could not use be made of that plant in Calgary?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that, but I could point out that it has been there eleven years without being used.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We have been trying to get it in operation for the last six months, and have not made any progress.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

LABOUR SERVICE IN LIEU OF MILITARY TRAINING—APPLICATION TO MENNONITES AND DOUKHOBORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of National War Services):—Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on a matter having to do with national war services.

When the regulations for compulsory military training for service within Canada were enacted, provision was made therein for the possible postponement of such military training for conscientious objectors, Mennonites and Doukhobors. Provision for postponement of training for the last two classes was granted pursuant to terms of orders in council enacted at the time these people were admitted into Canada.

The regulations provided that, notwithstanding postponement from military training of persons within these three groups, such persons might be required to render some type of alternative service.

The twenty-one year old class is now being called out for military training. Members of that age class whose military training is postponed as either conscientious objectors, Mennonites or Doukhobors will now be required to render either three or four months' labour service in lieu of military training and be subject to such further labour service as may be decided in the future.

In the case of Mennonites and conscientious objectors, an arrangement has been made with the federal Department of Mines and Resources to open camps in national parks and a camp in Ontario where Mennonites and conscientious objectors will be sent for their period of labour service. They will be called upon to do certain work in these parks which would not otherwise be done. The men will be supplied with board and lodging and will be paid fifty cents per day, but will be called upon to supply their own clothing.

In the case of Doukhobors, who are all in western Canada, negotiations are being conducted with provincial governments concerned under which certain road projects will be carried on under provincial control, and these men will be required to work on these projects under the conditions I have outlined.

Those who fail to report at these camps for work on these projects, when directed will be dealt with in the ordinary way as defaulters.

It is hoped to have these camps in operation on June 15, and, as the type of work to be done must of necessity be seasonal, the camps, with one or two exceptions, will be summer camps.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR COOPERATION AS TO MEDICAL CARE OR COMPENSATION —BILL WITHDRAWN

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, with your consent and with the consent of the house I would ask that Bill No. 21, order No. 17, standing in my name under public bills and orders, be withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 79, to authorize the levying of duties in respect of successions—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Initial duty dependent on aggregate net value.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister give a brief explanation of this section? I understand that in the first place there shall be paid an initial duty based on the aggregate net value. I do not quite understand the necessity for the proviso. What is intended by the initial duty? What will be the scope of the operation, if that is a fair way to put it?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): That is the duty payable in respect of the estate. That is clear, is it not? There is no estate duty up to $25,000. If the hon. gentleman will look at the schedule on page 25 he will see that the initial rates start at $25,000. For estates of between $5,000 and $25,000 the additional rates apply, but not the initial rates. What this proviso says is just that there shall not be any initial rates for estates between $5,000 and $25,000.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Additional duty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I notice there is a definition of child in clause (b), and child is also defined in the interpretation section. In clause (b) reference is made to a child of the deceased eighteen years of age or over. No reference is made to an adopted child.

Mr. ILSLEY: The interpretation section defines "child" as being a child under eighteen years of age, or a child who was dependent upon the deceased for support on account of mental or physical infirmity. In clause (a) of subsection 1 of section 11 the only reference to child is to one who would come within the terms of that definition. But when we come to clause (b) we find that we are talking about a child in the ordinary sense, that is a son or daughter of the deceased or a lineal descendant over eighteen years of age and not dependent upon the deceased. The child referred to in clause (b) is not a minor child.

Mr. HAZEN: There seems to be a defect in the draftsmanship; it is not very good.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose the point is that if you apply the definition of child as found in the interpretation section to the word

"child" in line 33 you get a child under eighteen years of age, whereas the words that follow are "eighteen years of age or over," hence a contradiction. It seems to me that this would be a strained interpretation, I do not think the provision could possibly give rise to any difficulty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister give further consideration to including in clause (a) husbands as well as widows?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot see that argument at all. If it were a dependent husband—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It might be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that we put in the words "dependent husband"?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not suggest that, but I do suggest that in eight of the nine provinces a husband is treated exactly the same as a widow.

Mr. ILSLEY: In nearly all provinces classes A and B are combined. If A and B were combined, the husband would be in the same class as the widow, but we have separated them; we have taken out the people who are naturally dependent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just an arbitrary division. In many families the husband and wife make a joint or mutual will, especially when there are no children. The one leaves the other what little patrimony there may be. What has been saved has probably been saved by the joint effort, but the title has been divided during their lifetime. The husband leaves his to the wife, and the wife leaves hers to the husband. I do not see that there is anything wrong or improper in asking for that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): While the rates in the aggregate as provided by this section and in the schedule are on the whole reasonable, the rates which apply to the different classes seem to be out of line. I suggest that this is particularly so in the case of small estates of from $5,000 to $25,000. The additional rate dependent on dutiable value in the case of an estate of from $5,000 to $6,000 is 2 per cent for classes A and B, which cover the widow and children of the deceased. But the rate for class D is 3 per cent, which class covers successors who may be no blood relation to the deceased, but complete strangers. Let us take another case, an estate of from $22,000 to $25,000. There the additional rate dependent on dutiable value in the case of class A is 2·45 per cent; for class B, which includes children over the age of eighteen years, the rate is 2·9 per cent; for class C, which includes brothers and sisters, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, the rate is 3·4 per cent, and for class D, which covers complete strangers, the rate is only 3·9 per cent. I suggest that the difference is too small as between children and close relatives of the deceased and those who are complete strangers and may have absolutely no reason to look forward to any benefit through the death of the testator.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason is that in the provinces there is a much wider divergence in the rates applying to classes A and B and class D. If we had the same divergence in the dominion we would have a great total divergence between the rates.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why?

Mr. ILSLEY: We would be doubling the divergence. I think it should be an arithmetical rather than a geometrical divergence. That is the theory of the act, at any rate. These rates on the whole are lower for strangers than the rates in the provinces, but when added to the provincial rates there is a substantial difference between the stranger rates in the total and the rates for children closely related in the total.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is admitting that if we adopted the same progressive rate for class D as the provinces have adopted, it would be confiscation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be very high.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he will allow me to say so, I do not understand the attitude adopted by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald). Last evening he enunciated a principle which I was surprised to hear. He contended that a man had no inherent right to pass along his patrimony to his children.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is not married.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was just about to say that possibly his outlook on this question is dictated by his position in life. I hope he will rectify that position very shortly.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Persons liable.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I would draw the attention of the committee to the words "shall" and "may" in the eighteenth line. It says that the duty in respect of any gift or disposition "shall also be payable by and may be recovered from" the executor. Is there discretion as to whether or not it shall be recoverable from the executor?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An alternative, is it not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Or is it an alternative?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is payable by the donee, by the successor—I think that is the proper term. It also may be recovered from the executor in his capacity as executor, and up to the amount of the property he has in his hands.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): If I may anticipate and go to section 13, it provides that if the executor is forced to pay duty in respect of property not in his hands he can recover from the successor liable therefor. My question with respect to section 12 is this: Is he liable in his capacity as executor only for the assets of the estate which come into his hands? How can that accord with section 13?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I can help the minister. I do not see the hon. member's difficulty. In the first place the successor is liable for the duty. It comes out of him eventually. Section 12(1) gives the taxing authority the right to recover from the successor, or the duty may be recovered from the executor if the money is still in his hands. It is a permissive right of the crown to look to either place for the duty, and I think that is all right. You have to protect the treasury to that extent, and give the crown that alternative right. Section 13 is a protection to the executor who has to pay under section 12. I am going to ask the minister to consider, under 13 or 12 or at some other appropriate point, that where there is a liability imposed on the executor, a liability that may be exercised, he be given more than a possessory lien on the assets; that he be given a statutory lien. I think he ought to have that. He has only a possessory lien at the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why is that not good enough?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may not be. I would give him full protection.

Mr. ILSLEY: The executor is given pretty full protection under this act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is one provision which I think is lacking.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think this compares pretty favourably with other acts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in agreement there.

Mr. ILSLEY: I speak subject to correction, but under some acts I believe the executor is liable for the amount of these gifts in any event.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall any that go so far as to compel him to pay it out of his own pocket unless he has violated his duty as executor and paid the gift out before the tax was paid. But no executor would think of doing that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I may be wrong about that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have followed the argument of the leader of the opposition but if according to section 12 the executor is liable only in his capacity as executor, how can he by section 13 be required to pay duty upon assets which do not come into his possession or control? The first line of section 13 uses the words "is required".

Mr. ILSLEY: The executor is required to pay duty on the value of a donation even though the gift is not in his hands. He is required to pay the duty, provided that he has property up to that amount. Section 13 gives him the right to recover against the successor the amount of duty which he had to pay. The gift is not being administered by the executor. The property upon which succession duty is payable does not come into his hands. He is not administering it. Nevertheless he is obliged to pay the duty on it if he has other property in his hands, and section 13 provides that he can recover the amount of the duty from the successor, who in this case would be the donee.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I see. Thank you very much.

Mr. WHITE: If the executor of the estate is liable for the duty on gifts which have been made by the testator in his lifetime, the executor will have to pay that duty out of the assets of the estate under his administration. If he is unable to collect the amount of the duty so paid from the person who received the gift, he will have to pay the duty, and it will have to come out of some of the other heirs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a possibility.

Mr. WHITE: It is quite a probability.

Mr. ILSLEY: The concluding words of section 12(1) do away with that difficulty. It says that the executor is liable "for an amount not exceeding the value of the interest of the successor in the property administered by the executor." Therefore he would not be dipping into the interests of others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there was no interest of the successor in his hands, the duty could not be recovered from him. That would be a good plea in answer to an action.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: If the testator during his lifetime had made a gift to someone of $5,000, and that person had no interest in the estate when the donor died, who would be liable for the duty?

Mr. ILSLEY: The successor.

Mr. WHITE: Then the executor in administering the estate would not have to pay the duty on that $5,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they could go after the donee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. WHITE: It looks very profitable for litigation.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Duty deductible from succession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that this fully protects the executor.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister think that section 14 goes far enough? I am thinking of my suggestion of a lien. He has a possessory lien; give him a statutory lien, and that will be a protection.

Mr. SLAGHT: Better than a lien, he could take it out for himself, out of money in his hands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be the possessory lien, would it not?

Mr. SLAGHT: This is a statutory right. Take it away from the estate; that is better than any lien.

Mr. ILSLEY: In answer to a question of the hon. member for Brantford City. I spoke as though section 13 applied to gifts. Section 13 applies to such a case as insurance payable, not to the executor but to some beneficiary, which does not come into the hands of the executor for administration. That is what No. 13 is designed to cover, not the case of gifts inter vivos, as I said before. Was there any question about section 14?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was just raising the question of security. If the minister does not think well of it I will not press it any further.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems to me the executor is adequately protected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. Maybe he is.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Filing statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsection 1 provides for the filing of a statement, including an inventory, name of successors, and so forth, within six months after the death of the deceased. Also certain other things have to be done. By subsection 2, every executor shall within six months after the death of the deceased deliver to the minister in such form as he may prescribe, a statement similar to that required by subsection 1. Subsection 3 provides a measure of relief where one of the persons mentioned in the two next preceding subsections has made and delivered the statement. I am assuming that in practice one statement only will be made, unless required by the commissioner.

Mr. ILSLEY: By the minister, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes—well, it will be a commissioner, I suppose, or other officer authorized. I am wondering whether six months is quite long enough. I know it is the standard period of time, but it has been difficult at times to do the work within that period.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): There is the power of extension.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but upon what principle would the department allow an extension of time, and would it be without penalty? In connection with income tax severe penalties may be imposed. Of course I realize with gratitude that in respect of income tax a man can file a pro forma statement, and make a payment on account, and so escape penalty. I commend that because it is a reasonable concession to the oppressed taxpayer. But I should like to see a longer time given than six months. These things are going to be onerous enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: Six months is the usual time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, I said that.

Mr. ILSLEY: And that, with the power of extension, should be enough.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On what principle will the extension be made?

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not grasp what circumstances the hon. gentleman has in mind which would make it even difficult to file the statement within six months. It is a statement which includes gifts only for three years back. The person filing the statement knows the situation, and if he cannot make the statement in six months he cannot make it in six years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no; it is a full itemized inventory of all the assets and all the debts of the deceased and everything of the kind. It is the ordinary statement which has to be made. I suggest that six months is not quite long enough, although I know it is the standard period. Suppose some of the property is in another country, and the matter arises in war time. I admit at once that that is an extreme case, and a condition not likely to continue for ever, but my colleague suggested it to me as a possible contingency, and so it is. The government could well concede a longer period of time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to extend it. I do not think it will give rise to much difficulty.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I made a suggestion in the discussion on the resolution, which I might illustrate in this way. When, about 1929 or 1930, the crash came, a succession duty which had to be paid on a British Columbia estate amounted to a great deal more than the then value of that estate. In other words, nothing was left. I know of other instances in which the same thing has occurred. While I am not a solicitor, it seems to me that a fairer way of dealing with this matter would be to determine tentatively the value of the estate at the time of death, so that all the preliminaries could be gone on with, and then have the succession duty paid on the value of the estate six months after the death of the testator; that is, have a revaluation made at that time and payment fixed accordingly. This would obviate the unfairness, indeed the real hardship, which has occurred in the past. If in the meantime the value of the estate increased, the government would get more money; if the value diminished, the government would not receive as much, but unfairness would be avoided.

Another thing which happens in certain cases where it is necessary to liquidate assets—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The remarks of the hon. member are directed to section 8, with regard to determining the aggregate net value, which has been allowed to stand. The section under consideration has to do only with the filing of the statement.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, I see "inventory" here. May I finish my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, but this is only with reference to the statement of the value of the property in an inventory to be filed with the minister within a certain period, by certain persons indicated. The fixing of the value is determined under section 8.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Subclause (a) of subsection 1 of section 15 refers to "fair market value as of the date of death". I do not think what I suggest would entail any great hardship on the government; and where it is necessary to liquidate assets, where there is a large holding in one company, immediately the value of that stock is depressed. If people know that it does not have to be done quickly there is a chance that the estate will not be depressed to the same extent, and the government may get more money. I do not think the government would lose anything, and it would be much fairer.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Property not disclosed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to offer an amendment to this section. It does not vitally affect the provision. The amendment is:

That section 16, subsection 1, be amended by deleting the words at the end thereof reading—"the executor shall only be liable to such penalty if he knowingly omits to make such disclosure," and substituting therefor the following:

"in any proceedings to recover such penalty the executor shall not be liable thereto if he establishes to the satisfaction of the court that his omission to disclose the property was not intentional."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principle is an important one. The onus is put entirely on the executor. I should think the fair thing to do would be to say that if any person required to file a statement pursuant to section 15 knowingly or with intent to defraud omits to disclose, he shall be liable to penalty.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the burden should be on the executor.

Mr. SLAGHT: I agree with the leader of the opposition, that the present wording is all that in fairness we ought to ask. It will be noted that the provision does not deal with any loss that might accrue to the estate because of non-disclosure; that might be the subject of severer penalty or treatment. But this provision deals with the case of the obligation of an executor under the act to pay a penalty of one hundred per cent of the non-disclosed property. Now, that is an arbitrary penalty to begin with, unless it could be shown—and this section does not make it a condition—that the department lost some revenue because of the non-disclosure. Under this amendment, by merely showing non-disclosure of an amount you could impose the one hundred per cent penalty. If it was half a million dollars it would ruin an individual executor. The department may say to him: "We are not prepared to show to a court"—or they impose the penalty without going to a court—"we are not prepared to show that you knowingly left this out, but we are going to put upon you the burden of proof that you did not knowingly leave it out." Sometimes, as we all know, the fact as to where the burden of proof rests makes all the difference between success or failure on the part of a person who is sued. Where there has been no loss, it seems to me you ought to be able to show, before you impose a penalty upon a man, that he knowingly omitted to disclose something. I suggest that the amendment ought to be withdrawn, that the draftsman who prepared the section in its present form had a better sense of proportion than the proposed amendment discloses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in entire agreement with the hon. member for Parry Sound. He has stated the position much better than I could. This rather shocks one's sense of propriety and justice. It is on a par with the principles that underlie the liquor acts in this country; a man is guilty until he proves his innocence. I cannot see that in the ordinary course of business a man acting in a representative capacity would profit by non-disclosure. His duty is clear. He does it to the best of his ability. If he omits anything, the onus should be on the crown to prove intent. As the hon. member for Parry Sound has said, where a penalty is imposed, clearly it is the duty of the crown to assume the onus of proof.

I do not like this type of legislation; it is not British justice. Of course it is making it easier for the officers of the crown to administer the law.

Mr. ILSLEY: I disagree with the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Parry Sound. I can hardly conceive of a case where the crown would be in a position to prove knowing omission. There might possibly be some cases in which the crown could prove a state of mind. If the crown is in a position to prove that the existence of property was brought to the attention of the executor and nevertheless was not disclosed, it would be possible for the crown to prove that state of mind. My hon. friend talks about British justice, and shock to our feelings, and that sort of thing, but we must recognize the fact that in a great many statutes where the means of knowledge are with the accused, not with the crown—

Mr. JACKMAN: All criminal law is that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. SLAGHT: This is not criminal law.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where the means of knowledge are with the accused, the crown establishes the facts that point to an offence, and then the accused comes forward and says "Yes, it is true that property is left out, but I did not know anything about it". If he shows that, he is free. But the section will be almost meaningless so far as executors are concerned. I do not think there would ever be a prosecution against an executor if the burden is cast on the crown of proving that there was an intentional omission. There is complete protection to the executor. All he needs to do is to say, and to swear in such a way that he is believed, that he did not know about it, and submit himself to cross-examination. In most criminal law the situation is entirely different. There you have to prove the offence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mens rea.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, mens rea is apparent in most crime. If someone walks off with your property and has it, you show that you missed it and found it in his possession; mens rea is shown by that. Here mens rea would not be assumed from omission to make disclosure. All the crown can do to protect itself is to say that property was left out, that the return shows $50,000 worth of property while there is actually a million dollars' worth. If there is no explanation, the individual is prosecuted, and if he gives a satisfactory explanation in court he may be acquitted. I think it is a case where the burden should be on him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not agree. A man making a statement of that kind will have to swear to it, will he not, under the forms that are proposed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do in the provinces.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes; the executor's oath.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all under oath as far as the executor is concerned, and under provincial legislation he is the only one who has to file a statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think any oath is required under this act. There is no oath in the income tax returns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unfortunately there is an oath in some of the municipal income tax legislation with which we have to deal in our part of the country, and sometimes it gives me great anxiety. But this is an absolute reversal of the common law principle, and I do not think the minister has yet adduced an argument in favour of that reversal, except that it will be easier for the crown if it is left in this form. Changing the burden of proof is nearly always a dangerous thing. The crown has to establish a prima facie case; then the onus shifts and the executor may have to meet it, by the ordinary rules of evidence; and I think those ordinary rules ought to obtain. I am not going to fight this thing out, although it is a matter of principle. I would not hope to convince the minister, though I do not say that in any derogatory sense at all, because I find that on occasion the minister is amenable to suggestion, argument and reason. I do ask him to reconsider this provision, and I will put my request as respectfully and pleasantly as I can. I do not like the insertion of the principle proposed in the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: My difficulty with it as it stands is that there is no mens rea to be inferred from the mere proof of the fact that certain property was not disclosed in the statement. In the ordinary crime mens rea is to be inferred from certain facts. Let us say A hits B. You may assume that he intended to hit him; that is pretty clear. Suppose A kills B. Then you assume that it was negligent, intentional or accidental, depending upon the circumstances, and from those circumstances you may discover what was the state of mind. But there is nothing to be inferred from the mere non-disclosure. All this amendment says is that intention not to disclose is to be inferred from non-disclosure; that is all. Then the executor can come along and say, "I did not intend non-disclosure. It was a mistake. I did not know anything about the property." Once he establishes that he is free.

Mr. SLAGHT: I want to direct the minister's attention to another aspect of section 16 which I had not noticed when I addressed the Chair a moment ago, and suggest that it should be amended. The penalty for non-disclosure is described in line 31 as—

> . . . as a penalty an amount equal to one hundred per centum of the amount of the duty levied. . . .

I suggest that this should read "an amount not exceeding one hundred per centum." There is no leeway, no latitude at all; the penalty is statutory and, if this provision remains, must be the full one hundred per cent payable by an executor. That payment might bankrupt him; it might take all he had in the world if he had to pay the full one hundred per cent. Under those circumstances any tribunal dealing with the matter would feel that something less than one hundred per cent was a proper punishment. Why not make it human by leaving some discretion? If the minister should agree with me it could be amended quite simply by striking out the words "equal to" and substituting therefor the words "not exceeding." The provision then would read "as a penalty an amount not exceeding one hundred per centum of the amount of the duty levied."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that this suggestion can be accepted; I do not know at the moment. The difficulty is that we are dealing with an executor and a successor. I recall that under the succession duty act of Nova Scotia I always thought that if the successor left out property, just did not disclose it or kept it to himself—and there is a tremendous temptation to do that, especially in the case of gifts; it is a real evil, and is not anything that we can compromise with if we are to administer the law thoroughly—then the penalty was one hundred per cent. I think that provision runs through all these acts.

Mr. SLAGHT: No. If I remember rightly the Ontario act leaves a discretion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, let us see. I have the act here:

> Every person in Ontario mentioned in subsections 1 and 2 of section 12 who fails to disclose to the treasurer any property passing on the death of the deceased or any disposition, which such person is required to disclose in accordance with the provisions of section 12, shall pay to the treasurer as a penalty an amount equal to one hundred per centum of the amount of the duty levied on such property or with respect to the transmission of such property or with respect to such disposition.

I am not so clear as to the necessity of being so severe with the executor; but in connection with the successor I feel sure that we must maintain this heavy penalty in order to get full disclosure. The temptation is so terrific not to disclose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This deals only with an executor, does it? There may be some distinction in regard to the successor.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the section deals with both.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister explained to the committee his reasons for proposing this considerable stiffening which is contained in the amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; I have been explaining it. My reason for proposing the amendment is that the means of knowledge is in the executor, not in the crown; that the mere fact of the executor filing a statement leaving out certain property does not give ground for the inference that he did so knowingly, and therefore if he is only punishable for doing so knowingly the crown must not only prove that he left it out but must prove a further fact which is very difficult to establish. It must prove some conversation, or some inspection.

Mr. STIRLING: It must prove that he did know?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, prove that somebody told him about it or that he saw it. He might have seen it late at night; he might have been told about it secretly, and the crown never would be able to prove that knowledge.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why should he be held liable if it cannot be established that it did come to his attention?

Mr. ILSLEY: He is the person who can do the showing. There should be the inference that if the property is left out, that would be prima facie evidence that it was left out knowingly. Then there is provision under which if it is shown that it was not known, penalty is escaped. With this stiff penalty in the statute there would be a disposition in the courts to be very fair to executors. I should think an executor's statement under oath that he did not know about it would in every case be sufficient, because executors as a class are of high integrity. I should think there would be no prosecutions except in cases where the department was completely satisfied that an executor was guilty of some rascality, that a return had been filed in which there were omissions, and in connection with which property had afterward been found. If the executor says that he did not know about the property, that might be the end of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister indicates by his statement that there is a difference between a successor and an executor. With that we all agree. The last point made by the hon. member for Parry Sound is sound, if I may say so, because they are in a different position. Why should an executor be subject to as high a penalty as a successor? I am trying to think of an estate where an executor might be, we will say, a stranger. In good faith he gets all the information he can get, but something may not be brought to his attention—possibly a gift made some years earlier. It may have been forgotten. When the matter is stirred up and comes to the knowledge of the crown, information is demanded from him under the next succeeding section. It may then develop that he knew about it. I can see the distinction between the successor and the executor, but I do not think the executor should be subject to as stiff a penalty as a successor.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the Ontario act apparently the executor and the successor are treated alike, and there is no provision requiring proof of knowledge. Further, there is no provision such as we are putting in our measure whereby he can escape. It may be that the courts themselves will say that if there is no mens rea there should be no penalty; I do not know. But apparently the draftsman of the Ontario act did not feel there was anything wrong about imposing a penalty for non-disclosure.

Mr. SLAGHT: Harsh provisions are found in many of the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly a harsh provision for non-disclosure by a successor is required, because he would know what property existed. And very often he does not intend to tell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall not discuss the matter at greater length. I will say, however, that if we keep on with this kind of legislation we are going to drive people to dishonesty—people who do not want to be dishonest, but who are not going to be robbed, as they say, by taxing authorities. They are going to hide and to secrete. Some people will do that; of course all will not. But it is the tendency in connection with this kind of legislation; it will make people dishonest.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Reputable executors would not do it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Trust companies will protect their own reputations, of course. But I deprecate this type of legislation, especially as it applies against the representatives of a testator. If a successor is a blood successor he has more knowledge, of course. But I am not going to defend his position. In any case the minister might consider the possibility of giving the court some leeway so that it need not exact the full penalty.

Mr. ILSLEY: The word "or" in line 31 should be "to." It is only a clerical error, and I would ask that the change be made.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the amount of diligence required by an executor tracing the assets of an estate? There may be cases where executors are appointed because they do not know a great deal about the history of the affairs of the deceased. This section would seem to leave in the air just the degree of diligence required by an executor. If an asset is found after the estate has been closed, it may be that a court would say, "You did not inquire as fully as you should into the affairs of the estate." In that case he would be liable to penalty.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, in such circumstances he would not necessarily be liable. He is not liable to penalty unless his omission to disclose was intentional. If it was due merely to negligence, he is not liable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have in mind a case in which I was an executor. In that estate I found a stock certificate for so many shares in a certain company. To my horror, within a month I discovered another certificate for shares in the same company, and this happened after I had settled the duties with the Quebec government. I assure hon. members that I was diligent in bringing the matter to the attention of the authorities and filing a supplementary return, because I was afraid of what might happen.

It would seem, therefore, that an executor has to be alert. That, I believe, is the answer to my colleague's question.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Demand for information.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It seems to me the provision of this section is quite arbitrary, as indeed are the provisions of some other sections. It provides for the mailing of notice by registered mail, and for taking proceedings on affidavit of the commissioner that the notice was mailed. If I may again anticipate, the last line of section 19 provides for the mailing of the demand by registered letter. In no case is it necessary to show receipt of the notice by the person against whom action should be taken. It seems to me that no action should be taken against anyone under this measure unless the commissioner can establish not only that the notice was sent by registered letter but also that it was received by the person against whom action was taken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is arguing for actual notice as opposed to constructive notice?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: This provision is taken from the Income War Tax Act. There has never been any difficulty in connection with it. Theoretically a commissioner or some other officer of the Department of National Revenue might make an affidavit that it was sent by registered mail, and he might not verify its receipt. But practically that would never happen. The reason it is sent by registered mail is that the person to whom it is sent may sign for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not necessarily; it might be a clerk.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think there is a provision in the post office regulations under which when a fee of fifteen or twenty cents is paid the letter is delivered and a receipt obtained, signed by the person who receives the letter.

Mr. CASSELMAN: But you still do not get the signature.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The post office obtains it when this fee is paid. Once I had a case in court which my client lost because he could not prove that a letter had been received. The post office is authorized to issue such special receipts.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps the words "with an official receipt" could be added after the words "registered letter" in line 44.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the practice followed by the income tax division. Perhaps the minister could tell us if any injustices have occurred by the use of this method of notification. The experience of that division would be the answer. There is no doubt that this is only constructive notice; before any penalty could be incurred a man would have to receive an actual notice.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the section that has been in use since 1917 in the income tax legislation. The commissioner tells me that when he goes into court he produces the signature of the person to whom the notice is sent. I do not know whether it is necessary or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it is of great importance.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Production of documents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this the first section in which provision is made for production on oath?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The statements may be required to be given under oath?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is a much better practice than obtains in the provinces. I ask hon. members to take a succession duty affidavit of value and note what executors must swear to; they must swear not only to facts, but to legal statements. I always thought that some of the forms were quite improper, that they went too far. Here if a man makes a wrong statement, he does so at his peril, but he is not committing perjury.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Is there an affidavit on the original statement filed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Inquiry as to property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This section has given me some cause for thought. It reads:

> Any officer of the Department of National Revenue or any other person authorized thereto by the minister may make such inquiry as such officer or person may deem necessary for ascertaining the property included in a succession, and for the purposes of such inquiry such officer or person shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

I do not know enough about the other taxing statutes of the crown to say whether this is the universal practice. I would direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to sections 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act, which is chapter 99 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. These sections provide for wide powers to be given to anyone in the department. To take an extreme case, it might be an office boy, but I do not think for one minute the commissioner or the minister would do that. However, I think this section is too wide open. Someone ought to be designated; the section should be limited to senior officials of the department or to some judicial officer. The Inquiries Act provides that a commissioner acting thereunder shall have the power of summoning before him any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence under oath, or on solemn affirmation, and orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as may be deemed requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which he is appointed to examine. Then in addition to that the officer of the department would be in the position of a prosecutor and, it may be, of a judge. I should like to see this section more limited in scope as to those who may be appointed. I admit that the minister must have some power of investigation under oath, but I do not think it should be left as wide open as this.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister must take some responsibility. I have signed appointments of lawyers and others under the Income War Tax Act, and I always looked into their qualifications carefully because I wanted them to have sufficient ability and standing in the community to command respect in carrying out the investigations. Those are the considerations that guide the ministers. They sign the appointments of the persons whom they want to make the investigations, and very often they want a barrister or a solicitor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Somebody with experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: These investigations are sometimes difficult to conduct. This is the income tax provision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with what the minister has said as to the practice in the past, with one exception. When you appoint a man because of his political partisanship you appoint the type of man who will get his man.

An hon. MEMBER: Not this government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not saying this government—all governments.

Mr. MARTIN: Not this government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I could tell of some raw deals which have been perpetrated by this government.

Mr. SLAGHT: The practice in Ontario is generally to appoint an accountant, sometimes an employee of the succession duty branch, although at times outside accountants are engaged.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Do they not usually work in pairs?

Mr. SLAGHT: The Ontario act contains a similar provision, to which the minister referred just a moment ago while we were discussing another section. While it does not offer a real guide, it hedges it around by providing that where the treasurer for any reason is not satisfied that he is in possession of all the facts necessary, he may appoint a commissioner to make an examination, investigation or inquiry and give directions for the purpose of obtaining information. Under that provision, frequently or at times, accountants and officials are sent into offices of bond dealers, for instance, who have nothing to do with the inquiry other than that they may have in past years transacted business for the deceased. I am not just sure who are the officers of this department. If they are confined to a limited number of gentlemen at the top, I do not see any danger in the provision as it stands. But if "officer of the department" is a broad term, one would think there should be the safeguard of the minister's authority in writing for appointing such an officer, who, after he is appointed, has very wide powers of going into a complete stranger's office and demanding to see every note in his books extending back over the years. There should be the safeguard of the sanctity of appointment by the minister, just as an officer executing a search warrant under the code must have his appointment over the signature of a justice of the peace or a magistrate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have had sent down from my office a copy of the Income War Tax Act consolidation of September, 1940, and this section is comparable with section 45 of the Income War Tax Act as it now stands, which provides not that any officer of the Department of National Revenue or other person authorized by the minister shall make such inquiry, but "any officer authorized thereto by the minister." That is limited to a direct authorization by the minister in a given case, but section 20 of this bill is a blanket provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not intended. It is intended that the minister's authorization shall apply in both cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not what the section says. Section 20 says distinctly: "Any officer of the Department of National Revenue"—and it gives an alternative—"or any other person authorized thereto by the minister may make such inquiry." Leave the alternative out. The provision in the Income War Tax Act is much better. It reads: "any officer authorized thereto by the minister." In each case the minister is to designate the officer, but the way section 20 is drafted that is not the situation. I submit that with confidence to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is intended to be the way the hon. gentleman wants it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then let us make it that way. It will be an improvement. It will then read:

> Any officer of the Department of National Revenue authorized thereto by the minister or any other person authorized thereto by the minister. . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: It is suggested that we strike out the words "officer of the Department of National Revenue."

Mr. SLAGHT: I think it is better to leave that in, if it is hedged around with written authority to the officer from the minister. The department has accountants, and in practice they would be the best men to do this work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In every case there should be authorization by the minister. Perhaps the section had better stand and be redrafted by the officials.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we can fix it now. The changes required are very simple. I would ask my colleague to move:

> That section 20 be amended by striking out in line 26 the words "officer of the Department of National Revenue or any other," and inserting the words "in writing" after the word "minister" in line 27, deleting the words "officer or" in line 28 and again in lines 30 and 31.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The section as proposed to be amended will then read:

> Any person authorized thereto by the minister in writing may make such inquiry as such person may deem necessary for ascertaining the property included in a succession, and for the purposes of such inquiry such person shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the practice of the income tax office?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

On section 23—Continuation of liability to duty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There does not seem to be any suggestion of finality in connection with any assessment. I do not like to go into what we all know about the history of these matters in certain of the provinces—

Mr. SLAGHT: Pretty healthy, some of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They seem to be quite active to-day and yesterday. Apparently this section proceeds on the theory that the principle of estoppel does not operate against the crown. There ought to be some finality about these matters. It is false doctrine that the principle of estoppel does not operate against the crown. That doctrine goes back to the days of the divine right of kings and the theory that the king can do no wrong. We know now that the king, the crown, the government, operate through individuals, and the crown should be bound by the acts of its individual servants. I should like to see some limitation put on this section. As it stands now, it is capable of great abuse, not at the hands of the present minister or the commissioner—I make that plural—but without just saying it in so many words this is a terrible power to give to officialdom, bureaucracy, if they want to use it. Surely there should be some limitation of time. That is the only suggestion I make with regard to this section, that an estate shall not be opened after a certain period of time, that the doctrine of estoppel should apply against the crown. That, in brief, is my submission on this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think this is a question of estoppel. The reason why the crown want the power to reassess is that they may get more information, information that was kept from them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that they should have that, but this is unlimited. It says, "may at any time."

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are the income tax sections. That point has, I know, been raised by taxpayers; it has annoyed income tax payers very much that the crown got wind, a good many years afterwards, of some income, which they had not said anything about, and went back at them for it. I myself, however, do not have very much sympathy with them. I think they should have said something about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a case of fraud.

Mr. GIBSON: Or accident.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that fraud vitiates everything.

Mr. GIBSON: It might be accident.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; but that is not fraud. If it occurs through inadvertence, that is another matter. I agree with the minister that in cases of fraud the matter should be reopened. Fraud should vitiate everything; it does, in law; and I would not ask protection for anybody in cases of that kind. If, however, as the Minister of National Revenue suggests, the matter is one of inadvertence, arising after a period of years, when all the estate has been distributed, and perhaps redistributed—such things have happened—a grave case of hardship is created. My suggestion is that the minister put in a limitation of time, except for fraud. To my mind that is fair as between the crown and the taxpayer. Make the time ten years, if you want to, or five years; I do not know which should be adopted. But I do not like this wide open provision, because I understand it has been subject to great abuse.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Suppose that some years later property turns up about which the executor or administrator knew nothing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He should report it, of course, and he will, in the case of a trust company.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Not if the estate is closed.

Mr. ILSLEY: But a limitation would prevent it from being dutiable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, say six years. We bar common law debts after six years. It is not a violation of any principle to bar a debt. We have had statutes of limitation for years and years. Men of honourable character do not take advantage of the statute of limitations. I recall, however, that in defending a case against the crown in the exchequer court, I raised the statute of limitations—twenty years in the case of real property—and when counsel for the plaintiff attacked me for doing so, the judge on the bench upheld me and said that the crown did it regularly. I did not know that at the time, but it was a defence open to me, and I took it. I do not see why the same provision should not apply here. I am not, however, going to labour the point.

Mr. SLAGHT: My suggestion is along similar lines, that beyond ten years there should be discharge in full of an estate except for fraud. I suggest that the minister might consider inserting at line 8, on page 13 of the bill, after the words "may at any time", the words, "within ten years, if in his opinion any fraud has previously prevailed", assess, re-assess, and so forth. That would give a ten-year limitation and would confine opening up to a case of fraud. It would not, of course, cover cases of accident which, one could conceive, might happen.

Mr. WHITE: Later in the bill, section 35 provides for a certificate of discharge; it states that if the certificate is given, the person named therein is not liable for any further duty. Under section 23, are we to understand that, after such certificate has been given, the dominion succession duty department will still have power to re-assess and levy further duty?

Mr. SLAGHT: That is the way it worked out in Ontario.

Mr. WHITE: That is exactly the point I was going to bring up next.

Mr. SLAGHT: The section meant nothing, and a similar provision for opening up was invoked.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what section 35 does. It states that there is no discharge if there is fraud, but I do not think there is any discharge anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there no finality?

Mr. MARTIN: To what section is the hon. member referring?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 35. That refers to the certificate of discharge.

Mr. WHITE: The executor must be released in some way, because he would not be able to distribute the estate until he was satisfied that he had made final settlement with the succession duty office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This provides that there shall be no discharge if there has been fraud.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think sections 35 and 23 need some adjustment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So do I.

Mr. ILSLEY: In my opinion the meaning of section 35 is this, that the certificate of discharge acts as a discharge except in the case of fraud or failure to disclose material facts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, does the minister suggest that section 35 would override section 23, as being a subsequent section? That is quite a nice point of interpretation.

Mr. SLAGHT: That difficulty would be removed by the insertion, at the beginning of section 23, of the words, "subject to the provisions of section 35."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. These are very nice questions, and they should be settled.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, "subject to the provisions of section 35" could be inserted at the beginning of section 23.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I move accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that cover the point we raised about finality?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not relieve in cases of failure to disclose, or fraud; the estate can be reopened at any time before or after a ten-year period, and I think that is the way it ought to be. I do not agree that one can fix a definite period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only thing that might reopen it would be a question of valuations of disclosed assets. Assume, for instance, that the value of the stock of a company not listed, owned by an estate, was fixed and agreed upon between the department and the representatives of the estate, and that, after duty had been paid, somebody came along and said, "Oh, that stock is worth a great deal more than that". Such things have happened. Let us say that some enemy of the testator wrote making the allegation that the shares were worth, not the stated valuation but a much higher valuation; then the department starts an investigation, and, upon a preconceived theory that there has been an undervaluation, it says, "We want thus much money from you."

That is what is happening in Ontario. That has happened here in Ottawa, without any real justification. Shares in what is commonly known as a family company—not technically a family company—have in many respects no market value; there is no market for them. They have intrinsic value, but no market value. Who wants to buy in a minority interest in a family company of which he has no control, no say in the management, no possibility of electing a director? Yet the intrinsic value of the shares might be high. There is a marked distinction between market value and intrinsic value in respect of that kind of property. I have seen it happen that a man bought a minority interest in a company in the expectation that, having put his money in, he would get employment in the company and eventually succeed to the ownership, but subsequently he was squeezed out by the majority holder and just could not sell his shares at all. I remember a case in my own practice. The intrinsic value was there, but he could not sell to anyone except the majority holder, who gave him what he pleased for it. That is what may happen here. I do not know how the minister is going to deal with it; I hope he will view it with decent leniency, that is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are fairly liberal provisions for appeal on the question of value.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, but appeal is always costly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 24—When duties payable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The period of time is the same as for the filing of a statement. In other words, the duty is to be paid at the same time as the statement is filed; is that the procedure?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would suggest that it should be payable within thirty days after the assessment. That would be fair. Then a person has six months to get ready to file his assessment. The assessment should be made with reasonable promptness; within thirty days after that the bill would be payable, and if it is not paid within thirty days, interest accrues. That would be a decent thing for the taxpayer, especially if he has to liquidate. The minister should give consideration to that suggestion. It is a little change, a little concession to the taxpayer, and not much loss to the government.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): He gets six months without interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It takes six months to get liquidated.

Mr. ILSLEY: In most provinces, if the duty is not paid within six months I think it bears interest from the date of decease.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, thanks for that much.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we made it payable after assessment, there might be cases in which delay in assessment would be inevitable for a year or two.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the assessment cannot be arrived at, the debt is not adjusted. It is not a liquidated amount. Why should it begin to bear interest? If I have an open account with someone, in common law it does not bear interest unless and until there has been a settlement and account stated. Then, in some jurisdictions it begins to bear interest. This is a departure from the ordinary common-law principle. It is a taxation measure and is all in favour of the crown. I suggest that there would be no harm to the treasury if a little more consideration were given to the taxpayer. I have not heard any hon. member opposite speaking in favour of the taxpayer, except the hon. member for Parry Sound, and now he has deserted.

Mr. ILSLEY: My complaint about the opposition is that I never hear anyone speaking for the taxpayer.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then indeed I have failed in my function.

Mr. ILSLEY: I mean the taxpayers generally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not apprehend.

Mr. ILSLEY: I refer to the crown. We are talking as if the crown here were some enemy of mankind. The crown is the taxpayers, the people of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the theory.

Mr. McCUAIG: The practice in Ontario usually is that the executor makes a deposit with the succession duty department, and I presume the same practice will be carried out with respect to this legislation. If the assessment is not completed until after six months, no interest would be chargeable because the department would have the deposit of the executor.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): In fact, the province of Ontario go further; they allow interest on the money deposited up to the time the duty is payable.

Mr. CASSELMAN: In many instances it will be found that an estate is not in possession of liquid funds with which to pay the money; it may have no bonds that it can dispose of. One difficulty under this section is that if the taxing authority delays the settlement for a period of six months and if the money has not been paid in but a bond given to secure it, then the taxpayer is forced to pay interest because of the action of the government. Therefore, if there could be in this section something to the effect, "within six months or within a period of one or two months after the settlement has been arrived at by the government," I do not think there would be any hardship one way or the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would never do. Take income tax. I keep thinking about that because I have had experience with it. If we had a provision that interest did not run until the tax was assessed by the department, why should anyone pay any income tax by April 30? They have to make a stab at it themselves, estimate their tax and pay it; otherwise we could not get money in, could not carry on the services of the country. We count on a very large sum of money coming in around April 30.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The two cases are not quite analogous.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is the same principle exactly. There is no hardship on the taxpayer; he knows pretty nearly what the succession duty is, and he can pay within six months and stop interest. Then, if he is assessed for more, and that assessment comes along a year later, he pays interest, I assume, on the balance, and if it is less, he gets a return. I am sure that is the only way the matter could be administered. It would not do to make the interest run only from the date of assessment, which might in cases of difficulty be long delayed.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister does not quite appreciate the difference between the two positions. In the case of income tax the department has no knowledge on which to estimate what the tax would be. In the case of an estate, however, there is a penalty if the information is not given to the department. They have the information; they may delay a considerable length of time before they actually assess and, after they assess, there may be considerable delay on the part of those who have to pay, in getting the available funds. The department could delay for two or three or five or six months in assessing the tax chargeable and then turn round and charge interest, which is really a penalty on the taxpayer for the department's own fault. That is the case exactly.

Mr. GIBSON: If the succession duty is not paid at the end of six months, the person who should have paid the duty at that time may be presumed to be receiving interest on that amount of money, and therefore the income he receives from it offsets the interest he would be paying to the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That might be so in a given case, but the two positions are not analogous. Income tax is paid annually. This is one payment, once and for all; you do not get any more out of that estate. There will be delay in the initial stages in getting any revenue from this source; there will be delay at the start until the revenue begins to accrue. If you give a little more leeway with regard to payment after the first six months, when that period is exhausted the thing begins to roll automatically. The minister's distinction does not carry any conviction with me, except for a limited period of time in the initial stages of the development and collection of this tax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I suggest that if the crown has to wait for payment of the succession duty until an estate is settled, in many cases that duty will never be paid. I know that in my own province an executor may close an estate within six months, but he is not compelled to do so. The result is that many estates, and particularly small estates, are never formally closed in the probate court. We might say six months or even eight or nine months, but there must be some definite time fixed, and in the circumstances six months seems quite a reasonable time. I do not see any particular objection to this provision.

Section 25 agreed to.

On section 26—Security.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this going to be limited to security provided by a guarantee company or a bank, or will personal security be accepted? Let us have a declaration as to that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The practice in some provinces is to deposit with the department such security as bonds and so forth.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be any security satisfactory to the minister. I cannot make it any more definite than that.

Section agreed to.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Interests in expectancy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this the standard system of computing these interests? Is this the British practice, the Ontario practice, or what is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the standard system followed in all the provinces.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29, 30 and 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Composition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This gives the minister the right of composition?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 33 and 34 agreed to.

On section 35—Certificate of discharge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What will be the practice with respect to waivers? When an executor takes charge of an estate he looks to the most liquid assets with which to discharge the immediate obligations, which in the first place are the funeral and testamentary expenses and thereafter provision for the maintenance of the widow, if that is pressing. But one of the most important things about which he has to think is the succession duty. In some jurisdictions the executor is entitled to access to the safety deposit vault of a testator, to be opened under the eye of the manager of the bank or trust company, usually; and in some jurisdictions this is done in the presence of a representative of the treasury. The executor is not allowed to take out anything, as I understand the practice, except the will and, in some instances, the life insurance policies. I think it is absolutely necessary that he should have the right to do that.

What I am coming to is this. Before he can liquidate sufficient assets to take care of these pressing charges, he must have a waiver from the department. In many instances this must be obtained even before the insurance companies will pay the life insurance. What provision is there in the statute—I do not know where else I could ask for it—to take care of that situation; and what process will an executor have to go through in order to expedite the business that I have attempted to indicate will be necessary to be transacted in order to get in this money? In practice, will provision be made for the delivery to executors, before duties are paid or security is given, of waivers in respect of particular rights intended to be liquidated? That is important in actual practice, as any solicitor will advise the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: Sections 49 and 50 provide for consent in writing by the minister or his representative.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the situation I have attempted to visualize will be taken care of in succeeding sections?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: In reference to section 34, just how is the minister going to determine what rate of interest should be allowed in the calculation of the present value of the annuities, incomes and so forth? It makes a great difference what will be the base rate, or what will be the principles determining the amount to be taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I assume the commissioner would take the advice of the superintendent of insurance, and apply the prevailing rate.

Section agreed to.

Section 36 agreed to.

On section 37—Decision of minister to affirm or amend.

Mr. MARTIN: Is there any provision in the bill for overpayments or mistaken payments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; subsection 4 of section 35.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister give us some assurance that these appeals will be considered personally, or will it be a matter of departmental routine as under the identical section of the income tax act? I understand the commissioner, under authority delegated to him by the minister, determines the appeal. I may be quite wrong in that. But does the minister have anything personally to do with it? When a power of this kind is specifically delegated to the minister, I suggest that he is under obligation to exercise it himself. What is the custom in the department in respect of the income tax act, and what would be the practice under this measure? Will the minister himself review the assessments, or will he leave it to the officials who have already made the assessments to review their own assessments? In these last few words I have indicated the weakness of the present position, if, indeed, that is the position.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is about the position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is no review at all, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it may be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is like it used to be when we went to a judge under the old practice obtaining in the county courts of New Brunswick. In those days a trial would be held before a judge, and then one might have to move for a new trial on a point of misdirection. He would have to go to the same judge, sitting as a judge in banco on his own direction to the jury. We used to have that condition in New Brunswick. I remember only once in my experience when I persuaded a judge to agree that his charge was bad.

Mr. CASSELMAN: He must have forgotten it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had such a case, and the judge directed a new trial. I agree that possibly the commissioner—and I say this with great respect, applying it not only to the present minister but to his predecessors—knows possibly more about the matter than does the minister. He will not be offended by that statement, because there is nothing personal about it. We are, however, now discussing a provision in the measure which the minister admits is null and void. It might as well be cut out first as last. Is there any merit in it, if it is not carried into effect?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): In the income tax act there is an express provision that matters referred to the minister such as those to which the leader of the opposition has been referring, shall be dealt with by the commissioner. Is there a similar provision in this measure?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 58 (d) states that the minister may make regulations,—

(d) authorizing the commissioner to exercise such of the powers conferred by this act as may in the opinion of the minister be conveniently exercised by the commissioner.

I suppose that covers it.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Probably it does.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is physically impossible for the minister to consider personally the appeals which come to the income tax branch.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because it is getting so big?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I might say that I signed them. I insisted upon having them sent to me, and I signed them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister look at them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I tried to, but if I was extremely busy I saved them up, and kept in touch with them. That is about the best I could do. I left it pretty largely to the commissioner and his officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Maybe it works out all right.

Mr. GIBSON: It is not a case of a man reviewing his own findings, in view of the fact that we have various officers throughout the country. These assessors will make the local findings. If an appeal is lodged, it will come to the head office, and be reviewed by the commissioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the modus operandi under the income tax act? You make up three copies of your report, and send in two. One of them, as I understand it, is retained by the local office, and the other comes to Ottawa. Is the assessment made up in the local office or in Ottawa? Or is it made up in the local office, and then checked and confirmed in Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is made up in the local office and approved in Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under this provision, then, the assessment will be made up in the local office and approved at head office by the commissioner of income tax, or one of his officers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then this review will come before head office?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is illuminating at all events. The system is better than I thought it was.

Section agreed to.

Section 38 agreed to.

On section 39—Security.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 39 (1) is surely open to objection. Many of us quarrel with the preferred position given to the crown in litigation. Here is a position where an appeal is launched, and instead of the court determining the amount of security for costs, that is left theoretically to one of the interested parties, namely, the crown in the name of the minister. I say that is wrong. The section reads:

The party appealing shall thereupon give security for the costs of the appeal to the satisfaction of the minister in a sum of not less than $400.

I say that it should be a sum which, in the event of a dispute, is determined by a judge in chambers. But to leave the determination to one of the contestants in the litigation—because, after all, that is what the minister is—is, to say the least, carrying this principle too far.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member has a point.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is as to the amount.

Mr. MARTIN: No; it is as to whether the minister should have anything to say about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a minimum amount fixed.

Mr. MARTIN: My objection is not so much as to the amount. I say that the minister should have no right whatsoever to determine in litigation against the crown the security for costs which an appellant should put up. I say, further, that the minister is an interested party, and that the matter should be left to the court, and not to the minister at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt about the soundness of that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Except that it would be easier for a litigant to go to the minister than to the court. The section could provide that $400 in cash be provided as security. But to ask anyone appealing from an assessment to make application to a judge of the exchequer court is putting him to about five times as much trouble and expense as would be involved in writing a letter to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A principle is involved here, and the hon. member for Essex East has stated it clearly. There is no answer to his point. This is wrong, and it will not be found in any other jurisdiction. We do not find another instance where the opponent fixes the amount of security. Surely that is not proper, and the point is certainly unanswerable.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree that in the whole of the provisions of this revenue-producing legislation there is embodied the principle of which complaint has been made. I believe, however, it has been recognized that in relation to the provisions of this particular type of measure, as they are found in other acts, we are arguing about only a single point in a great number. As a lawyer I should like to see reasonable access to the courts which can best discharge the judicial functions cast upon them, but I long since have given up any hope of that being a feature of a revenue-producing measure. I think we cannot complain of this one instance, if it carries out the principle recognized in the measure.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sorry the hon. member has taken that position, because with the greatest respect to him I say it is a weak position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a defeatist position.

Mr. MARTIN: Any lawyer who has had anything to do with the Department of National Revenue—I am not speaking now of any particular minister—knows that he constantly runs up against situations which are so repugnant to our conception of the rule of law that he realizes it is about time someone spoke out openly on this subject. I have in mind a situation which I do not think can be defended upon moral or any other grounds. The Chairman may call me to order, but I should like to mention it because it is brought to my mind by this section. This case involved hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the amount which it was alleged should be paid was paid under protest with the assurance from the then minister that if it should be regarded subsequently as not having been legally due, it would be refunded. Litigation ensued later between other parties, and the privy council held on the very same point that the tax was not due. The crown did not restore that money; the minister's undertaking was never carried out because the court held that the minister speaking for himself could not bind the crown in the absence of an order in council. I know of no principle of justice by which that contention can be supported in any way. Our hon. friends in the corner opposite are for this legislation, and I should like to see them take part in a discussion on these important sections. They are strong for the rule of law; they are strong for the due process of law and all that sort of thing, but here is an opportunity to defend a real principle.

[Mr. W. C. MacDonald.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I think we can very well leave that to hon. friends opposite. It is about time that they defended something, but it is peculiar that they should be defending capitalistic interests, as always.

Mr. MARTIN: I was not defending any capitalistic interest.

Section agreed to.

Sections 40 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On section 44—Exclusive jurisdiction of exchequer court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it quite clear that there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the exchequer court as a matter of right? What is the legal position? Let us have it on the record that there is a right of appeal.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Does the Supreme Court of Canada Act not cover that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like the minister to say whether there is or is not a right of appeal. My own view is that there is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I always understood that there was. It is just a question of law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been asked to find out about it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 45 to 48 inclusive agreed to.

On section 49—Transfer of property without consent of minister prohibited.

Mr. McCUAIG: The leader of the opposition referred to the rule which governs in his province, that nothing shall be taken out of a safety deposit box except the will. I can find nothing in this bill which would permit an executor to take a will from a safety deposit box. In many instances the heirs are leaving for other parts immediately after the funeral, and they are anxious to know what provisions are contained in the will. If there is no provision to permit the safety deposit box to be opened and the will produced, there is likely to be some delay. It may even be that the executor or the executors are at the funeral, and they might have to return afterward.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it should be provided for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A will is not property; it is not money.

Mr. McCUAIG: Subsection 2 of section 50 states that the box must not be opened until notice is given to the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be an impossible provision.

Section agreed to.

On section 50—Safety deposit box not to be opened or removed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This creates a most difficult position. How can this section be operated in conjunction with the provisions of the provincial acts? I suggest to the minister that there will be a real difficulty about this. A man may be complying with the provisions of this law and contravening the provincial law. I am not familiar with the operations in Ontario, but I can see trouble ahead. There would not be any trouble in my own province because it is smaller and everything works quite harmoniously; they are all honest people there.

Mr. McCUAIG: My question has not been answered yet.

Mr. ILSLEY: I intimated that the hon. gentleman had made a reasonable suggestion, that it ought to be provided for if it was not. I have been looking at section 50 ever since to see if the executor could not obtain the will from the safety deposit box without giving this ten days' notice. I am afraid he cannot, and we shall have to have an amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think he should be able to get the will immediately.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the intention of the section was to provide for a ten days' notice in connection with procuring valuables. I have an amendment to propose to section 50 and then I will propose an amendment to cover the point raised by my hon. friend. It is proposed to amend section 50, subsections 1 and 2 by inserting before the word "safety" in line 37 the following words "safe, compartment of a safe, vault, or" and by deleting the words "such safety deposit box" where they occur in the 38th line and the words "a safety deposit box" where they occur in the 43rd and 44th lines and inserting the words "such depository" and by deleting the words "safety deposit box" where they occur in the 2nd line of subsection 2 and inserting the word "depository".

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The effect is to extend the class of depositories from safety deposit box to include safe, compartment of a safe and vault.

The CHAIRMAN: I will read the section as proposed to be amended:

50. (1) Unless the consent thereto in writing of the minister or his representative is obtained, no person shall,—

(a) permit the opening of any safe, compartment of a safe, vault or safety deposit box or the removal thereof where such depository contains any negotiable instrument, certificates representing indebtedness under bond or otherwise or representing any holdings of stock, muniment of title, insurance policy or any other property belonging to a deceased person, or permit the withdrawal from such depository of any thing mentioned in this clause; or

(b) deliver up or part with the possession of any property belonging to a deceased person which is at the time of the death of that person held by him for safe keeping.

(2) Notice in writing of the intention to open up any such depository or to withdraw anything therefrom or to deliver up or part with the possession of any property held for safe keeping as aforesaid shall be served on the minister or his representative at least ten days, or other period to which the minister may agree, before such opening, withdrawal, delivery or parting with possession is to take place, and the minister or his representative may attend at the time and place aforesaid and there give a consent in writing thereto, and he may examine the contents thereof, or the minister may give such consent without so attending and examining as herein provided.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask the meaning of the words "in writing thereto," referring to the minister or his representative?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is intended to mean the employees of the income tax division who will be in charge of the administration of succession duties. It is really intended to mean the inspector of income tax, but it is not quite limited to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: Duly authorized.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not find it in the definition clause. Could the commissioner not be anybody nominated as such?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, anybody authorized.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The state would have the right to be present at the opening of the box. It would be opened at their instance, and they would have the key.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is another amendment which I will ask my colleague to move, that subsection 3 of section 50 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

but such penalty shall not apply when the minister is satisfied that the contravention of this section was not wilful and occurred through ignorance of such death.

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does all that mean? It must be a conjunction of the two, lack of wilfulness and lack of knowledge of the death?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. This is the same wording as used at the end of section 49; this makes the wording uniform.

The CHAIRMAN: The subsection as proposed to be amended will read:

Every person who fails to comply with this section shall be guilty of an offence and shall, for each offence, be liable to a penalty of one thousand dollars, and an amount not exceeding the amount of duty levied on or with respect to the properties contained in the safe, compartment of a safe or vault, or safety deposit box, opened or removed in contravention of this section, but such penalty shall not apply when the minister is satisfied that the contravention of this section was not wilful and occurred through ignorance of such death.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not had time to study this subsection, but it appears that every person who fails to comply with this section shall be liable to a straight "penalty of one thousand dollars, and an amount not exceeding the amount of duty levied on or with respect to the properties contained in the safe." Why not say "a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars"?

Mr. POTTIER: That is what it means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not mean that. If any penalty is imposed, it must be one thousand dollars.

Mr. POTTIER: I do not think that is the right interpretation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then let us make it clear that that is not the meaning. Let us say "a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all right with me. I think it means that anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved to strike out the words "of one" in line 15 and to substitute therefor the words "not exceeding."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: To meet the point raised by the hon. gentleman who spoke about a will, perhaps it would be well to add another subsection, although I am not satisfied that it is necessary because the ten days' notice may be shortened. If the hon. gentleman will look at subsection 2, he will see that it provides for a notice of at least ten days or other period to which the minister may agree. That enables the period to be shortened, but to make it clear I propose to amend the section by adding a subsection 4 as follows:

(4) Notwithstanding the provisions of this section the will of the deceased may at any time with the consent of the minister or his representative be removed from such depository.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Probably insurance policies should be removable too.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they will be dealt with along with the other valuables.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): That may be a couple of weeks later, and the policies may expire in the meantime.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should the will not be delivered automatically without the intervention of the minister at all?

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister must exercise control over the safety deposit box.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It should be opened only under supervision. I agree with this principle of safeguarding the taking out of bearer securities and the like of that. The will, however, should automatically come into the possession of the executor, and he should not have to go through too much red tape before he gets it. He may not know who the executor is until the will is opened. Usually these wills are sealed up.

Mr. STIRLING: They have to get the will to find out who the executor is.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with the leader of the opposition, because we shall find, under these circumstances, the habit growing up of never putting the will in a safety deposit box, and it is a dangerous practice to keep wills at home or in places where death and the destruction of the will might occur together. The practice in my own province is that the safety deposit box may be opened in the presence of the executor, the solicitor and the bank representative, and the will taken therefrom, and it seems to me that unless that provision is made, the invariable practice will be not to put wills in safety deposit boxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will give the hon. member the remedy. Let him advise all his clients to execute their wills in duplicate and leave one with the solicitor and file the other in the bank. It is good practice.

Mr. STIRLING: In the case of the death of an individual when no one is aware who the executor is, who can take action, under this proposed wording? This does happen. I know of a specific case where it caused a great deal of concern.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You cannot even get at the box.

Mr. ILSLEY: It should be the person who has the key to the box, not the executor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The will should be delivered only to the executor, not to some person who might not be interested under the will and might do away with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: This does not say anything about the executor. It says that the will may, with the consent of the minister, be removed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And leaves the matter open.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to get interim supply through before six o'clock.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

1. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $18,862,603.83, being one twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942.

2. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $595,102.58, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several following items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, in addition to the sum mentioned in resolution No. 1, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, namely:—

Votes Nos. 13, 112, 129, 130, 318, 319.

3. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $252,010.83, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several following items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, in addition to the sums mentioned in resolutions Nos. 1 and 2, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, namely:—

Votes Nos. 103, 143, 177, 178.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of course it is quite impossible for hon. members to follow the numbers which have been read so rapidly, but I take it that the passing of these items will not preclude discussion of any topic which one wishes to raise.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. No item is fully passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that the motion provides for one-twelfth.

Mr. ILSLEY: And one-sixth, in some instances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why are there any instances where one-twelfth will not be sufficient? Is this a request of the treasury board, or just what is the position?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot tell the hon. gentleman that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister know what the explanation is?

Mr. ILSLEY: I looked at six items, and all of them seemed to be items where large expenditures would be necessary in the spring.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That must be the answer. This is passed without prejudice to any discussion which may take place at a later stage.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, the sum of $19,709,717.24 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 90, for granting to his majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1942.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 79, to authorize the levying of duties in respect of successions—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 51—Penalty for failure to deliver statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not very familiar with the provisions of the other statutes in this respect. Are these penalties in line with those in other acts? I notice that under subsection 1 the penalty is $10 for each day of default, with a maximum of $1,000, while in subsection 2 the penalty for failure to complete the forms is $10 where the value of the property does not exceed $50,000, and $100 where the value is greater than $50,000. Ten dollars a day seems quite stiff. Is that the usual penalty?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe so.

Section agreed to.

Section 52 agreed to.

On section 53—False statements.

Mr. NEILL: This seems to be a very severe penalty for what might be a most innocent mistake. These statements have to do with the property left, and so forth, under section 15; a full, itemized inventory of all the property is required, together with the fair market value thereof. How easily one might make a statement not in strict accordance with the truth. How is the market value determined? One man may take the market value from the Financial Post; another may get his value somewhere else, and it would be very easy to make what might be technically a false statement. If that happens, the person is liable to a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for six months, or to both. Within the last two years I had occasion to deal with a matter of this kind, and I know that with the very best intentions I made a statement in reference to the inventory which was not in accordance with the facts. I would suggest that the word "wilfully" be inserted.

Mr. ILSLEY: This would not extend to matters of opinion; this would have reference to the making of a false statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A statement of fact.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, a false statement of fact; and it should be made a serious thing to do that in these succession duty statements. The penalty is a fine not to exceed $10,000, or six months' imprisonment, or both. It is discretionary with the court, but this permits a very heavy penalty which might be imposed in an estate in which hundreds of thousands of dollars were in question and an attempt was made to defraud the crown out of many thousands of dollars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then it would be done wilfully.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should think it would mean wilfully, anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would suggest that the word "wilfully" ought to be inserted. As this section now reads, a false statement, even made innocently, would render a man liable to conviction, and I do not think it is the intention of the crown to legislate to that extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree to the word "wilfully"; that is what is intended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. Would the minister also accept this suggestion, namely, to insert the words "of fact" after the word "statement," to meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni? Line 39 on page 21 of the bill would then read, "any person wilfully making a false statement of fact," and so forth.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the insertion of the word "wilfully" is as far as I can go.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a substantial concession, much more than I had expected to get.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I move:

That section 53 be amended by adding in the first line thereof after the words "any person" the word "wilfully", so that the section would read, "any person wilfully making a false statement".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 54.—Secrecy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How is it intended to maintain secrecy; just by the penalty clause? Is any oath exacted from anybody?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the income tax division the oath of secrecy is administered to every employee every four months.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good; but that is not provided for in this bill, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be the income tax staff that will administer this measure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unless the oath is so general as to cover this class of information, I should not think their oath would be binding. If it is necessary to have an oath in connection with the income tax act, it would seem to me absolutely necessary to have one in connection with this measure. I am not so sure that an oath is any more binding on an official than putting him on his honour, but it may be necessary. I am glad to know that the principle of secrecy is observed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same practice will be followed in connection with this measure as is followed in the income tax act.

On section 55—Information to be laid by minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the section might read "authorized thereunto in writing by the minister."

Mr. ILSLEY: All that is affected is an information or a complaint, and in my opinion it is going pretty far to provide that it is to be authorized by the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would be satisfied if it were authorized by the commissioner.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is just as well to leave the section as it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot imagine its being done in any other way.

Mr. ILSLEY: It might be by telegram or telephone conversation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall not press the matter further.

Section agreed to.

Sections 56 and 57 agreed to.

On section 58—Administration by minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question of legislating by regulation is always important. If the wording were changed a little bit so as to take away the wide area to be covered by regulation, I would not have great objection. Under subsection 2 the minister may make any regulations deemed necessary for carrying the measure into effect. That, of course, is intended to assist in administration. Then it goes on to say that in particular the minister may make regulations regarding paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d). If it were drafted so that the regulations would refer only to such matters as are indicated in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), there could not be much objection. With respect, however, to paragraph (d), I am wondering if it will include the right by regulation to determine appeals on assessments? The minister has told us that in practice assessments will be reviewed by the commissioner, not by the minister. Under this section may the minister authorize the commissioner by regulation to exercise such of the powers conferred by the legislation as the minister may think may be conveniently exercised by the commissioner? That is a pretty wide power.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the regulations be approved by order in council?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was going to ask that. Are they so approved in the income tax act?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This section gives very wide powers to the minister to set up a class of regulations that could be known to no one. How is the public to know about them? I hope the department in establishing the new tax will issue a booklet giving full information, after the regulations are drafted. If the public get proper notice, they will govern themselves accordingly. But these regulations may never see the light of day. Nobody may ever know about them. Surely this is a wide power. I suggest that it might be reviewed.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no danger of the regulations being kept secret. The income tax division issued brochures and booklets of one kind and another all the time, and sends them round to inspectors of income tax for the use of people who may be interested. There is one having to do with the Excess Profits Tax Act, and people who are interested write in asking for copies. Considerable time has been spent in making public the regulations relating to these various measures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all to the good.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the question as to whether the minister will by regulation authorize the commissioner to consider notices of appeal—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Determine appeals.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe "consider" is the word. Section 37 states:

> 37. Upon receipt of the said notice of appeal, the minister shall duly consider the same and shall affirm or amend the assessment appealed against and shall notify the appellant of his decision by registered post.

I do not think there is any regulation by which the minister delegates that power to the commissioner. When I was in the Department of National Revenue the practice was for the minister to make those decisions, in form. That is, he signed them. The reason why he did not spend a lot of time on them was that he did not have the time to spend. It was a decision by the minister on the advice of his officials; that is really what it was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here is an attempt to delegate authority.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the reason why I say I do not think a regulation would be made under section 58 (2) (d), by which the minister would delegate to the commissioner authority which is vested in the minister by section 37. I believe he would get what help and advice he could in disposing of an appeal. In practice that would mean that the officials would do practically the whole thing, and the minister would sign it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what the legislation attempts to do, namely, what the minister says is not done. Here is the authority to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be the authority; I am not sure about that, in view of the express terms of section 37. This would cover other matters which would come within the minister's general power. In section 58 (1) the minister has a general power of administration, and instead of exercising those powers himself he has authority under section 58 (2) (d) to authorize the commissioner to exercise those powers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is reserved to the minister by section 37. Would the minister exclude 37?

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the minister if under paragraph (d)—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a minute.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the leader of the opposition would rise in his place when he is speaking, the committee would know who has the floor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I apologize to the Chair and to the committee for having carried on a conversation from my seat. I know it is not quite proper. If this were limited by excluding the provisions which might be applied on section 37, I would not have so much objection. But section 37 makes a special reservation to the minister. Under section 58, power is given to delegate authority to the commissioner. I must point out that the power of determining a question of appeal is a wide power. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the minister why under paragraph (d) he is setting up a separate organization for duplicate death duties and for the administration of the same class of property for which provision is made by the British North America Act? Under section 92, death duties relate to property and civil rights in the provinces and are exclusively provincial. The minister has been inconsistent ever since he has held office. Two years ago, when it was urged in the house that the minister should let Ontario collect its own income tax, when both federal power and provincial power had taken all this away which was formerly exclusively municipal, he said "Oh, no; we will save a whole lot of money by collecting the two income taxes ourselves for the provinces as well." Instead of the provinces collecting their own income tax, in this bill we set up two administrative offices, for death duties. If the minister would wield the big stick and bring about a little economy in all the departments, it would be far better. Instead of that, he is setting up a new administrative death duties staff to deal with property rights which, since confederation, belonged to the provinces exclusively.

Why should he have accepted the work of the province of Ontario to collect their income tax for them and then turn round and set up another duplicate branch, with a staff of inspectors and clerks, federal and provincial, two separate staffs, collecting on one and the same property? Where is this going to wind up? It is nothing but state socialism. I am only giving my own opinion on it all. The minister has made a vast excursion into this field. Paragraph (d) reads:

> (d) authorizing the commissioner to exercise such of the powers conferred by this act, as may, in the opinion of the minister, be conveniently exercised by the commissioner.

That might be all right under the drastic Kingsley Wood principle of collecting death duties, but all people may not own property when it comes to these rival taxing powers on the same class of property. They are likely to lose what small property they have in real and personal estate and, in the end, die in the poorhouse, with two vast organizations taxing them and putting federal burdens on real estate. It is expected that $10,000,000 will be collected this year and in a full year, $20,000,000 from this measure. Is it any wonder the people are asking why the head of the province is objecting to federal authority invading provincial and municipal institutions and taking their revenues in this way?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not know whether or not the hon. member is familiar with the set-up proposed to collect these duties, but when he talks about extravagance in any department I must tell him that it costs under 2 per cent to make the collections in the income tax branch. The succession duties will be collected by that branch, which has auditors and accountants already employed. Only a small staff will have to be added to make these collections.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will have to be an additional staff.

Mr. GIBSON: A small staff will have to be added.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think it is generally accepted that matters of this kind cannot be dealt with except by a delegation of power. As to whether such delegation of power is a good thing or a bad thing apparently depends upon which side of the house one happens to sit. I was here between 1930 and 1935, and in the latter year the leader of the opposition was a member of the government. At that time there was brought before the house a marketing act which not only delegated powers of administration but also empowered commissions to enforce penalties. The Minister of Finance was in the house then and was opposed to that, while the leader of the opposition, who then sat on the other side, was in favour. These two hon. gentlemen have now changed their positions in the house; the one who was opposed to this in 1935 is in favour of it in 1941, and the one who was in favour of it in 1935, is now opposed. I imagine the method is all right, after all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can speak for himself.

Mr. CHURCH: The Minister of National Revenue says that it will cost 2 per cent to collect this, but will he kindly tell the committee how much will be paid to lawyers? One firm, according to a return filed, got $87,000 for various legal work, and one member of this firm was a candidate for election to this house in High Park constituency. This firm of lawyers did work for the department which any solicitor could have done. Talk about 2 per cent! I can tell the young gentleman who represents the department that in the city of Hamilton the Ontario government had some trouble in collecting this type of revenue from estates, more, probably, than elsewhere in the province of Ontario. Talk about 2 per cent! Wait until you see the bills coming in. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Gibson) tells us that it will cost only 2 per cent to collect the death duties separately when they will have a duplicate system. If these duties are going to be what they are going to be and all other bills of a kindred kind, then the quicker we abolish provincial institutions and set up this government as a dictatorship over the provinces, the better it will be. That is where it will end some day. That is all we have to-day under the Pooh-Bah powers and big stick of the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. GIBSON: The dominion government had no part in the collection of succession duties for the Ontario government, and whatever expenses were incurred in collecting them in Hamilton or anywhere else is no concern of the dominion government.

Mr. SLAGHT: I would suggest to the minister that the provision covering the making of regulations should be altered to provide that they shall be made by the governor in council. I may be wrong, but I know of no act which enables the minister to make regulations on everything incidental to the enforcement of the act and which does not require them to be promulgated or published in the Canada Gazette. This provision does not require them to have the approval of an order in council. I suggest with all deference that this is a departure, and I feel sure that the department and the responsible minister would feel better satisfied if the regulations were required to be published in the Canada Gazette or approved by order in council. It seems to me that this is a new kind of authority for parliament to hand to a minister, the unfettered right to make regulations without the obligation to publish them. I have no doubt that they will be published in brochure form, but it seems to me that this is a radical departure and is setting an example which may lead us down paths which will be dangerous indeed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any analogous provision in the Income War Tax Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 75, subsection 2, reads:

> The minister may make any regulations deemed necessary for carrying this act into effect, and may thereby authorize the commissioner of income tax to exercise such of the powers conferred by this act upon the minister, as may, in the opinion of the minister, be conveniently exercised by the commissioner of income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the same section.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very much the same.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then it ought to be altered.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the other acts administered by the Department of National Revenue grant power to the minister to make regulations; I think that is so in the customs division and in the excise division. In this department it is necessary to make a huge number of rulings or directions which are called regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The other method might prove to be unwieldy and slow and cumbersome.

Mr. ILSLEY: I presume that is the reason. The Department of National Revenue is filled with detail; there is a large personnel, and an enormous number of departmental decisions of one kind and another must be made. These are done largely in the name of the minister, who has the power to make regulations by statute. It would be a nuisance to take them to council all the time, a nuisance to council and a nuisance to the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Still, the principle for which the hon. member for Parry Sound contends is absolutely sound.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that if any of these regulations are such that it will probably be necessary to produce them in court, they are published in the Gazette.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is for the purposes of the Canada Evidence Act, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. SLAGHT: Making for easy proof. In Ontario, where for twenty years succession duty has been collected, and recently quite promptly and efficiently, we have a similar provision as to the regulations, section 43 of the act, whereby the lieutenant-governor in council may make regulations with respect to (a), (b), (c) and so forth, and it was not found too cumbersome to have them approved in that province by order in council.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not make any difference in practice because I could not imagine the cabinet spending any time on that kind of regulations. They come in and just go right through if council have confidence in the minister, which they would have or he would not be there. That is all it amounts to in practice.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then cannot we have them published in the Gazette?

Mr. ILSLEY: The important ones?

Mr. SLAGHT: All of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be such a number of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There would be a great many under customs, but I do not anticipate there would be many under this.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The power here is to make regulations prescribing forms and providing for the use thereof; prescribing what rule, method and standard of mortality and of value, and what rate of interest shall be used in determining the value of annuities, terms of years, life estates, income, and interests in expectancy. It may be that these will be very long and detailed; I can imagine cases where it would not be desirable to publish them, and certainly it would take a great deal of paper and printer's ink to publish them in the Canada Gazette. I do not know that very much would be gained by doing so. I have never heard any complaint that the public could not find out from the income tax division what the regulations were.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course, it is in the interest of the collection of the tax to let the public know what the regulations are. What the hon. member for Parry Sound is contending for is a matter of principle, and he is right. The minister countered by saying that it is not convenient, that it would hold up the coming into effect of such regulations, and I think there is a good deal of sound, horse sense in that. But with respect to paragraph (a) there cannot be the slightest objection, because the department must prescribe the forms and provide for the use thereof.

I wonder whether the department intends to collect fees for providing these forms. In New Brunswick they have undertaken to charge you for the forms for inventories, affidavits, and so forth. They tax you for them when they supply them. I have repudiated that suggestion on principle in my own practice; I provide the forms myself, typewritten, and they look very much better that way when they are completed. Why in the world should a government department charge the taxpayer for providing him with the forms upon which he is to submit the information? I hope that nothing like that will occur in connection with this measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member for Parry Sound would like to have something in this section to the effect that said regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette, I am willing to have that inserted. I have consulted with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and he thinks the number under this measure will not be so great that they could not be published.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not want to waste printer's ink, of course, but a stability would be given which the department would recognize and under which it would feel safer in proceeding.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then I shall have my colleague move an amendment that such regulations be published in the Canada Gazette. That would be subsection 3 of section 58. It would not be necessary with respect to paragraph (a), and then there is the question of tables of mortality under paragraph (c).

Mr. JACKMAN: I presume the standard table of mortality will be used.

Mr. ILSLEY: Publication would be partly in the Canada Gazette and partly in some book. I would be inclined to drop the proposed amendment. The commissioner tells me that they publish the regulations now in all important cases.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does paragraph (c) of section 2 correspond with the same provision in the British act, or is the provision in the British act more specific, particularly with reference to the rate of interest which shall be used in determining the value? Does this section correspond with the British section, or is the British section much more specific in its terms?

Mr. POULIOT: Just before the minister answers, let me say that I have often protested against Canada copying and aping what is done by any other country. We should make our own legislation. Why should we copy the British act? Why should we copy the act of Ontario or the act of the province of Quebec? Let us make our own legislation and digest it and have no half-baked legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: This provision has not been copied from the British act. I am informed that it is in use. It is a section very much like sections found in several provincial acts.

Mr. JACKMAN: The rate of interest is vital. It means all the difference between whether a particular annuity or one of these interests might be $1,000 or $2,000. It depends upon the rate of interest being used. It is so important that I think we should be as specific as possible. If other countries, in their legislation, have seen fit to specify a certain rate, I think we should do so. Does the minister intend to prescribe a general rate from time to time, or is there to be a particular rate as to particular forms of securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I could not say what the practice will be. The matter will be worked out in cooperation with the superintendent of insurance, which is the department that is expert in actuarial matters. Some fair rule will be arrived at.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The measure will be in the experimental stage for a while. I think the rule of reason will prevail. I have no fears on that score at the moment, but of course I do not know what the future will bring. If the measure does not work out right, we shall come back and ask the minister to amend it.

Mr. SLAGHT: Rates of interest shift, of course.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): There have been gibes from a number of hon. members regarding the fees which lawyers will receive for preparing these forms, and so forth. Has the minister had forms prepared, and do they correspond with those now in use in the provinces? It occurred to me that it would simplify matters considerably if the forms which are now used in the various provinces were used also by the dominion department, so that, instead of making the forms in duplicate, as is now done for the use of the provinces, we could make four copies and send two to the province and two to the dominion. This would save considerable expense and facilitate the work of submitting the necessary information.

Mr. HOMUTH: All the laws are different.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nearly all the forms are now ready. They are not printed, but so far as preparation is concerned they are substantially complete.

The other point was, should we have a different form for each province to accord with the form in that province? I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so either.

Mr. ILSLEY: My opinion is that we should have but one form.

Mr. HAZEN: How many employees have been added to the Department of Finance and to the Department of National Revenue for the purpose of administering this measure, and how many more is it expected to add?

Mr. CHURCH: A small standing army.

Mr. GIBSON: We have not made any additions to the staff to take care of this, and we estimate at the present time that under a hundred will have to be added to the income tax staff to look after this work.

Section agreed to.

On section 59—Office of commissioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This section raises an old discussion on the question of appointments. Personally I am in favour, generally speaking, of the civil service system of merit in the appointment of public officers, but I am broad-minded enough to admit that it is not invariably the best way. In certain jurisdictions and categories probably it is the better way, and the general principle I subscribe to and intend to support.

This question of appointments to the staff of the income tax branch has been settled, it seems, by the decision of the government to adhere to the principle of appointments by order in council. Does this mean that these appointments will be political? Are employees to be nominated by the minister, or by the commissioner? Is the department to be filled with friends of the party in power, or is the commissioner to have a free hand to get competent men of his choosing, nominated to his minister before confirmation? This raises a rather large question. The minister is administering three branches of the public service in the collection of national revenue; he has the customs, the excise, and the income tax branch, with which this will be coordinated. In the first two which I have mentioned the appointments are made by the civil service commission. In the income tax branch, however, the minister is continuing the system which he found when he came into office, and which has been in existence, I believe, from the very beginning.

I am aware that there are arguments on both sides. But I should like to be reassured that, if we continue the system outlined in subsection 2, efficiency and competency will be the guiding principles, and that vacancies and new positions will not be staffed by means of what we commonly term political appointments. My recollection in connection with this matter goes back a long way. I understand that the gentleman who was appointed the first commissioner demanded, as one of the conditions of undertaking the duties of the office, that he should have something to say about the selection of his staff. I rather think there was some merit in that. I do not know that there has been much, if any, abuse in respect of appointments. But I notice that the Minister of Finance has brought into the department a number of young lawyers, some from his own province.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not from his own riding, I hope.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that they are from his own riding; nor am I suggesting that they have not great merit; perhaps they have; but I cannot conceive that they had any experience in income tax matters before they entered the department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Not many people have.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that. There are not many tax experts in this country. There is in the United States a class of professional men who are income tax experts. But I am a little uneasy, and I trust we shall get some assurance that this matter will be handled on a high plane, because we know what the practice is with respect to appointments by the governor in council. They are, as a rule, political appointments.

Mr. MacINNIS: Patronage can never be on a high plane.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is true. But we are trying to speak without bitterness, and, if we can, to elucidate the truth. I do not like the patronage system. I have never thought that it helped me in any degree. I have found that where I had to make a nomination for an appointment—which, I am glad to say, was not often—when I satisfied one man I made nine enemies.

Mr. STIRLING: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the history of patronage in days gone by, when times were difficult, when a member of parliament was little better than a labour agent. One of the most strenuous periods of my life was between 1930 and 1935. One could hardly go home without having his outside office filled with people who wanted him to get a job for them.

Mr. POULIOT: That is because the hon. member promised too many.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never promised anybody anything. I was perfectly honest; I told them I had not any jobs to give them, and I could not give them. I told some people that a recommendation from a member of parliament would be, perhaps, a deterrent rather than a help to get a job.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. member did not convince anybody with that statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; you cannot convince them. That is the strange part of it. They will not believe you. That is an embarrassment, because they are inclined at once to charge you with the desire not to help them, when actually you are simply telling them the truth. They apparently do not recognize the truth, do not want to recognize it. That is the truth.

Will the Minister of National Revenue make a statement of policy in regard to what it is proposed to do in building up this staff, and will he see that the declaration of principles which I am suggesting he should make will be lived up to?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Before the minister answers, may I say that from my experience I have found all the appointees in connection with the collection of income tax are just as efficient as any appointees under the civil service commission. I know that the civil service commission is very thorough in looking into the qualifications of all applicants and makes some very good appointments—

An hon. MEMBER: Occasionally.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): On the other hand, those responsible for the collection of the income tax also make careful inquiry as to the qualifications of applicants, and in the district from which I come I can say that the employees in the income tax division are just as efficient as those who are appointed under the civil service commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not suggested anything else.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the minister answers, since it is impossible for me to take the sanctimonious tone of the leader of the opposition in speaking of patronage, and since I know that if I did, there would be an uproar of laughter in the committee, I shall dispense with it. But I remember quite distinctly that the one who was the leader of the opposition during the election of 1930 said: "You who are hungry, come to me and I will satisfy your hunger. You who are thirsty, come to me and I will quench your thirst." "You who are without work, come to me and I will give you work. I am the one who will cure unemployment." He said that. The hon. leader of the opposition was credulous enough not only to believe it but to preach that doctrine himself. This is why he was elected in 1930, and this is why he was defeated in 1935.

Of course when he was a minister he had to do his share. He followed an illustrious predecessor, the Hon. H. H. Stevens, who also had made promises. It was not only R. B. who had made promises but H. H. was a good promiser. Then the hon. leader of the opposition came after those two, following in their footsteps, trying to satisfy all the people who had been dissatisfied since R. B. came into power. It was a very hard job for him, and I can understand how he found the times hard. Now he says that if he satisfied one man he made nine enemies. I shall not say that he has one single enemy, but I shall say that when he was a minister of the Bennett government he dissatisfied everybody.

The leader of the opposition is the hon. gentleman who now says we shall not have patronage, that we shall have appointments by the civil service commission. Of course he remembers the dark ages when he was a minister in the Bennett government and suffered from seeing so many people coming to him to whom he could give no jobs. It was pretty hard on him, something that he remembers quite distinctly even now when he is far away from patronage. Now he is signing his name and making life very pleasant for himself. But that is not enough to convince me that he has a clear judgment on the question of appointments.

Is there any complaint about the income tax division? No. At the present time the minister has before him in this chamber two officers, civil servants, who are respected and esteemed, who know their business and to whom the appellation of "cranks" that I have applied in many instances does not apply. They have grown up in the service. One of them is a barrister of wide experience; the other is an elderly civil servant who has grown up in the service and knows his business. They are not university fools, and this is the kind of civil servants that I want in this government, as there was a majority until 1930. I refer to them as an example for the others. I am satisfied with them, and neither of them was appointed by the civil service commission. I will not insist on a certain nomination, because the appointee was meritorious if the procedure was wrong. I praise both of these gentlemen personally, and I praise the staff of the income tax branch. People know them so well that they would not think of trying to get inside information from them; the work is well done and we have no complaints.

With regard to the question of patronage, those who are against what they call patronage are those who are afraid to assume their own responsibility, or those who have a sour mouth on account of difficulties that they have themselves created. They were the artisans of their own troubles, like the leader of the opposition for instance. He can blame only himself and his colleagues in the Bennett government.

I find that the system of appointments at present in force in the income tax branch is the best we could have. The reason is very simple. It is that when an appointment is made on the recommendation of a member of parliament, the minister knows who has recommended that man, and if he is unsatisfactory the member will have to answer for any complaints made in this house by any Conservative, Social Crediter or member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party against that employee. If an hon. member makes any recommendation that is wrong, that will be an excellent reason for the minister to refuse any further recommendations from that member. Therefore the public interest is better protected under that system than under any other. On the other hand, if an appointment is made by the civil service commission, everyone knows that there are no accountants among the examiners of that commission. The civil service commission will select someone from either the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance, a selection which may be made on grounds entirely different from those of merit, and the commission will not be in a position to give a sound judgment on the competence of a candidate. There will be no recourse if something goes wrong; no one will receive any complaint. It will be an anonymous appointment, made by the commission and no one responsible. The commission will say it is the merit system.

Especially in branches like this it is essential that all employees should understand that the minister is the boss of the department and should respect him. It is essential that they should feel that they are under his jurisdiction, to stand by the orders they receive and to respect the tradition of secrecy that binds them. I think this is the best system, and I believe it should be continued. Let us be good sports. When the Tories were in power, what Liberal was ever recommended for appointment? When the Liberals are in power, however, the Tories are always recommending some of their friends for appointment. Let them be good sports. The people rejected them at the last election, and the one before that. Let them take their pill and wait until they have regained the confidence of the people for their almost defunct party. That will be a case of resurrection, which seldom happens; but when that time comes, they can make all the appointments they wish. These appointments should be made by the members of the government on the recommendation of Liberal members of parliament, and those members should be ready to take the responsibility. I am sure there will be nothing wrong. There will be something wrong only if the minister accepts any recommendations that may come from the Tory gang.

Mr. GIBSON: The leader of the opposition has asked me how we shall fill the positions that will be created to administer this succession duty act. I would say that we shall adopt the same measures that have been adopted in filling positions in the income tax branch. During the year that I have been in charge of this department I have not been in the unfortunate position suggested by my hon. friend, of having to make one friend and nine enemies. The difficulty has been to get people with the high qualifications which are necessary in connection with the work of the income tax branch, and which will be necessary in connection with the work of the succession duty branch. For the senior positions, such as assessors, we have advertised in the press and have made every effort to secure men who have the necessary qualifications. We require men with the degree of chartered accountant, or a similar degree; and the difficulty we have found has been, not in connection with selecting the men but in obtaining them.

When it was necessary to create some new positions when the national defence tax came into effect, we made promotions in our own staff and filled the positions at the bottom, but there again we had difficulty in getting qualified stenographers and clerks. Therefore I say it is not a matter of selecting the right applicant; it is really a question of going out and trying to find the necessary people to fill the positions. If my hon. friend can recommend anyone suitable, I can assure him we shall be only too glad to accept that person. There is a great shortage of qualified stenographers and clerks for these positions.

Mr. CHURCH: Does the minister not follow the practice that has been followed by his predecessors? I do not blame him for having done so, because I believe all parties have done the same thing. As a matter of fact, the person receiving the recommendation of the defeated candidate or the sitting member is usually the choice of the officials, is he not? When a new minister comes into a department he asks the senior officials, "What did my predecessor do?" Then he does the very same thing, because the minister generally does not follow the swing of the pendulum, but pursues the line of least resistance. I am not criticizing the young minister; so far as I know, he has been efficient. But I should like to ask him, and his learned colleague sitting beside him who has been working so hard for the last month or so, whether this government has not followed the practice of the previous government, and the one before that, in accepting recommendations made by sitting members and defeated candidates.

Mr. GIBSON: I do not know whether or not I am following the practice of the previous administration, but I will say that I require every applicant for a position in my department to file an application in writing. When these applications are received they are forwarded to the various districts in order that the applicants may be examined by the local inspectors, who rate them; and the appointments are made in accordance with the ratings made by the district inspectors.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not wish to speak at any great length on this matter; but in view of the fact that from time to time a discussion arises in this house with regard to appointments, and the hon. member for Témiscouata invariably gives us a dissertation on the advantages of the patronage system, perhaps in order to keep the balance some of us who feel very strongly against the patronage system should express our view.

I know that some of the ministers, including the Minister of Finance, have endeavoured to keep as far away as possible from the patronage system. I know that at the present time there may be difficulties in securing efficient help, even by advertising; but I believe that the further away we keep from the system of political patronage, the better it will be for the government of Canada. To me it has always seemed ridiculous that anyone should hold the view that when a Liberal government is in power the employees should be Liberal, and when a Conservative party is in power the employees should be Conservative. I hope the day may come when in our own country we shall develop the same sense of respect for our public service, the same efficiency in it, and the same freedom from political patronage, that have long existed in Great Britain. I believe the efficiency of the administration in that country is due to the elimination of political patronage; and those of us who know something of British history, particularly from the days of Walpole down to comparatively modern times, know that until political patronage was driven from the public service, that service was not efficient. I sincerely hope that the system which has been followed in Canada now for more than twenty years will be continued and expanded until the time comes when we shall have a civil service based wholly on examination and on merit; when every civil servant, irrespective of his position, will have the right to express himself in accordance with his rights of citizenship so that he may not be obliged, because his private views conflict with those of the government in power, to risk, by expressing them, a position for which he may be very well qualified.

Mr. SLAGHT: Was not Walpole the author of that dangerous doctrine, "To the victor belong the spoils"?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am hoping the time will come when the victor will be big enough not to look for any spoils of office. Feeling that way, and holding that belief, I think perhaps once in a while it is well to express that view, particularly when the contrary opinion is so forcibly expressed by the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has spoken of the efficiency of the civil service in Great Britain. I wonder whether he has read "The New Despotism" by no less a person than Lord Hewart, lord chief justice of England, in which the faults of bureaucracy are described. Of course I know very well why the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group are so strong for the merit system. It is for the reason that most of the school principals, who are asked by the civil service commission to conduct examinations, are their own men, belonging to their brain trust. Therefore, instead of receiving patronage from the minister, they receive patronage from the school principals who are Cooperative Commonwealth Federation men. It is in order to maintain that patronage that they are so strong for the so-called merit system which exists only in their imaginations, and not on their tongues.

That having been said, I hope that any illusion created by the word "merit" will be dissipated. I see I have almost convinced hon. members in the far corner of the house, and if I have not I am sure that excellent book by Lord Hewart will finish the job. At first it was an expensive book, costing a little over a pound. After the first edition was sold there was a reprint selling for 5 shillings. I do not know if it is available now, but if it is I strongly recommend it to any hon. member. It will be surprising to hon. members to find that other countries, like this one, can march on, in spite of the fact that they are carrying with them such a heavy weight of bureaucracy.

Section agreed to.

On section 60—Agreement with provinces as to values, etcetera.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does the minster expect to accomplish from this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. We may get the provinces to do some work for us. We do work for five of the provinces in connection with income tax collections.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a pious hope.

Mr. CHURCH: Section 60 enables the government to enter into an agreement with the provinces respecting valuation and other matters affecting administration. Ontario is one of the provinces which has contributed such a large share of income tax to the federal treasury. Has the minister had any conference or agreement with the Ontario government regarding these duplicate death duties and rival methods of collection? Has he had any conversations with them or their ministers or officials? Has the minister consulted the Department of Justice as to the power of this parliament to enter into an agreement regarding death duties, which come within the definition of property and civil rights in the provinces, real and personal estate, which, in turn, are under the control of the provinces? Has the government considered whether the crown in the name of the dominion can collect the same death duties from the same property as the crown in the right of the province? The crown is indivisible. What has been the reply of Ontario? We were told this morning that they are taking the 15 per cent tax to the law courts. Has the government conferred with the government of Ontario about an agreement in connection with the administration of this measure? With whom did they confer, and when; and what is the agreement? Will all the papers be tabled, for the information of the committee?

I contend that when we are dealing with a bill like this we should follow the practice adopted in Washington, and have it considered by a committee of ways and means. There are some able men on the government benches, and it is a pity that men of their ability, men with their learning, experience and understanding—and I know them all pretty well—do not have an opportunity to look into this matter in such a committee. It is too bad we have not a municipal system, like the one they have in Washington, where the committee of ways and means would be given the work of considering a measure of this kind, and not just passing what our officials bring down.

I do not believe it is in the interests of patriotism to remain silent while all this is going on. I am supporting the government generally in its war effort. No hon. member would want to have the responsibilities of those two hon. gentlemen on the front benches. I know they have a tiresome, wearisome and thankless job. But in the name of a few of the old guard of the Conservative party I protest against the policy which has been employed here. It is a policy which is leading toward general confiscation of the wealth of the provinces, and of private property—two separate death duties, with overgovernment and overtaxation.

What has been the reply of the Ontario government? Whom did the federal authorities meet? Did they meet ministers or deputy ministers? Has an agreement been proposed, and what has been the reply?

Mr. GIBSON: No meeting has been held with Ontario with regard to entering into an agreement under this section, because this measure has not yet been passed, and there is no authorization to enter into such an agreement with any province until it is passed.

Section agreed to.

On schedule 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two clerical errors in this schedule as printed. On page 25 of the bill the figures "55,900" in the first column should be "55,000." Then, on page 27 at the bottom of the third column the figure should be "10." At present there is a blank. I would ask that those clerical changes be made.

Schedule 1 as amended agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I was out of the chamber when section 15 was discussed, and I should like to discuss it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. MacNicol moves that we revert to section 15. Is it the pleasure of the committee that we revert to section 15?

Motion agreed to, and the committee reverted to section 15.

On section 15—Filing statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister about a case which came to my attention some years ago. The family I have in mind lived up-country, in a small community. It consisted of three persons, whom we shall call A, B and C. The parents were dead. A died without a will about fifteen years ago. Ten years later, or about five years ago, B died. Two years ago a legal friend of the remaining member of the family C, asked C if the affairs of the two deceased members of the family had been settled. The reply was that they had not. "Well," he said, "I think you ought to have it settled up." He did so, being the only remaining heir. The court appointed him administrator, and everything came his way.

If such a condition arose after the passage of this measure, under section 15 would C be subject to a fine or penalty?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is a successor, and he certainly would be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Did C take the property on the deaths of B and A, and do nothing about it? That is, did he file no statements?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. First, A died, and no statement was filed after his death. Then, no statement was filed until a couple of years after B's death.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; he would be subject to penalty. He would have to file a statement in those circumstances.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Surely the measure is not retroactive?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; the hon. member was stating a hypothetical case.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would be subject to penalty?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: It was the understanding that we would return to a discussion of some sections which had not been passed, the first of which was section 7.

On section 7—Exemptions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) suggested that some provision should be made for merchant seamen, and there was also some discussion in the committee about making provision for those who are in the forces.

Mr. SLAGHT: Paragraph (d) deals with charitable gifts, and it is stated that the exemption shall apply:

(d) where the successor is a charitable organization in Canada operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit, gain or profit of any person, member or shareholder thereof.

If a man left a million dollars to an organization of that kind, that amount would be exempt from taxation. The minister has indicated that he construes "charitable organization" to mean religious, charitable and educational institutions. I suggest that there should be added to this paragraph a restrictive provision which would exempt a charitable, religious or educational institution only if it carried on its work wholly within Canada, or only to the extent to which it carried on its work in Canada.

For example, a man might leave a large bequest to the foreign mission society of his church. This society might make all its expenditures in India, China or Timbuctoo in an endeavour to proselytize the disciples of Confucius or the followers of other religions in order to bring them within the fold of the religion which the testator thought was the only sure road to the place beyond. Why should a million dollars spent in China, even for a good purpose, be exempt from duty, when money left by a Canadian farmer to his relatives must pay full duty?

I think we should follow the Ontario act which makes provision for such institutions and add the words "and which carries on its work solely in Canada," or adopt the further refinement of the Ontario act and say, "only with respect to such proportion of the bequest as the proportion of money spent for carrying on work in Canada equals." I can see no reason why we should let escape from the payment of duty any large sum of money, or even a small sum, sent out of Canada for purposes with which at least the majority of the people of Canada are not in accord, and still tax the bequests of smaller estates.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate this definition of "charitable organization" as being one:

(d) where the successor is a charitable organization in Canada operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit, gain or profit of any person, member or shareholder thereof.

That is my understanding of a charitable organization, but I hope it includes orphanages and hospitals.

Mr. ILSLEY: It includes hospitals which are not operated for profit, and orphanages.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): With all due respect to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), I am of opinion that we should not limit these exemptions in the way he has suggested. We all believe in home missions, but I think we must have consideration for those beyond the boundaries of our country who have not heard the gospel. If I remember correctly, we are exhorted to preach the gospel to all nations, and I do not think we should discourage foreign missions. The world is a great deal smaller to-day than it was two thousand years ago, and it is all the more necessary that the faith in which we believe should be preached to those parts beyond the seas. The foreign missions of our churches are administered from the home country, and I feel that the wording of this paragraph should stand as it is.

Mr. SLAGHT: My suggestion was not intended to discourage gentlemen who wish to indulge in the spending of money in foreign countries for missionary purposes. I only ask that they contemplate helping to pay part of the taxation of this country and not be specially favoured when they leave money to such institutions which spend it entirely outside Canada by having the bequest exempted from taxation when the ordinary citizen has to pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some consideration was given to these various points. The Ontario act has four or five subsections which define with great particularity the amounts which are exempted. Provision is made for making a division of the amount proportionate to the work of the religious, charitable or educational institution done within Ontario as distinguished from that done outside the province.

This is the provision found in the Income War Tax Act. It may be that that was not the correct guide to follow because the sums involved here are so much larger. We thought, however, that the acts should be kept uniform. Under present conditions people are giving money, not by will but by way of gifts, to sufferers from bombing, to Spitfire funds and so forth.

Mr. JACKMAN: Floods in China and lots of other things.

Mr. ILSLEY: The principle followed by the income tax division is that if the gift is given to an organization in Canada recognized by the Department of National War Services, it will be regarded as a charitable gift. That relates to war charities even though some of their expenditures are beyond the confines of Canada. Take a church that is integrated in its activities, which is a church rather than a set of churches, because in some religious denominations it is churches, not a church. A gift to such a church would be a gift to a religious organization which did not by any means do all of its work in Canada but rather did it all over the world. I suppose a division of the amount of the gift could be made and exemption be allowed only on that portion which bears the same ratio to the whole gift as the expenditures of the church in Canada bear to the total expenditures of the church. But I do not think we should go into it that far. We put in the provision that the exemption would not exceed fifty per cent of the person's property, and that provision is also found in the Ontario act. If, however, the committee considers that the principle should be changed, I would not be disposed to resist it because it is a protection to the revenue to allow exemptions to these charities only, but we thought we should not draw the line too fine.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister has taken the right stand on charities, and I congratulate him. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). It is a fine thing that a man will rise in his place in this house and advocate the performance of our duty in carrying the gospel to nations which have not been blessed as we are, and I think this is the first time since I came into this house that I have heard a man venture to do that before his fellow members. I wish to assure him once more that I appreciate it. Let me repeat that I completely support the minister in his stand regarding charities. While he may lose a little revenue, we shall gain greatly by recognizing the value of the great spiritual things in life.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to congratulate the minister and also the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). Both have given lofty expression to the great work of the church. Whatever our faith, we all realize that church work means the civilizing and betterment of mankind, and that it is all to the good of any country.

Mr. SLAGHT: Just one word more. I do not desire to be put in the category of opposing charitable or religious bequests, but the plain fact is that the way this section as it now stands would work out as against an amendment such as I suggest, which would mean merely the insertion of the words "and which carries on its work solely in Canada," would be this: On a bequest of $1,000,000 to a society for foreign missions which operated in China, you would be taxing fifty per cent of that bequest as you would do if it were a bequest to a Canadian mission, and you would exempt the bequest from a tax of $80,000 for the public treasury. You would be contravening, by encouraging that sort of bequest, so much of the good principle we have heard of the conservation of foreign exchange, because to enable such a bequest to be carried out you have to let $1,000,000 go to China and buy Chinese exchange with it at the expense of our exchange. You are going to do all that apparently, let that money go out of the country and exempt it from a succession duty in Canada. I still suggest that that principle is wrong and that any man who is anxious to aid foreign missions in China, and is quite sincere in his desire, should also possess a loyalty to this country that would be willing to have a succession duty tax applied to such a bequest.

Mr. POULIOT: An amount of $1,000,000 went out of Canada through excess profits on sugar. That is much worse than money given for church work.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The riding from which I come has churches in it, and I suppose there is scarcely a member of the house who is not in the same position. When I look back at the history of this country I realize how much Ontario and, I am sure, the other provinces owe to the missionaries who came here in the early days. They were financed by foreign funds. Positively millions of dollars have come into Canada from charitably inclined people, particularly in Great Britain, and those missionaries brought a message. They did social services which were of great value to the intellectual and spiritual life of this country; and it seems to me that, while we might need the money, this is a poor place to get it if, in so doing, we make harder the lot of the foreign missionary societies, which are always struggling up hill.

Why choose an amount of one million dollars? Has anybody in mind a grant of one million dollars to a foreign missionary society? Most of the money for that purpose is given in very small amounts. Most of it is gathered up in small donations, some of it inter vivos and some by will. I think this chamber would exhibit a very poor spirit indeed if we attempted to enrich the treasury of Canada by taking a portion of these small funds granted for the purpose of intellectual and spiritual purposes abroad.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly I should say one word on the principle of the suggestion from the hon. member for Parry Sound. I think it would be a great mistake if we were to adopt what seems to me to be a very narrow provision of the Ontario act. I am not unmindful of the divine injunction given to all of us. Perhaps I do not practise it as much as I should, and I certainly admit at once that I have never felt the call myself. Yet I should not like to do anything that would derogate from the provisions of that injunction. I suggest that the minister's scheme as laid down in this section should be allowed to pass. Just think of the money that has been sent into Canada by the English church, a society for the propagation of the gospel. Is it known to members of this house that until the restrictions were placed on the export of sterling, much if not all of the salaries of the bishops of the English church in Canada was sent out from England, and especially money for western missions? My friend the Bishop of Calgary is now engaged in a campaign among the brotherhood of his church to raise money to take the place of that which was provided prior to the war by the church in England for Canada and Canadian missions. This matter is international.

Under the terms of the proposal of the hon. member for Parry Sound, funds given to one of our churches for carrying the gospel to the blacks in the West Indies, where perhaps they do not have as much missionary effort as in some other parts of the world, would be taxed. I know that one of the evangelical churches in this country maintains a mission in British Guiana. And just think of the work of the early Jesuits in Canada. There is no romance more stirring than the story of their missions. For example, there is the tale of Father Jogues. If one reads Professor Wrong's book on the "Rise and Fall of New France in Canada," and the chapters which he devotes to the efforts and the sacrifices of the Jesuits in their attempts to Christianize the Indians, one is filled with admiration.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Read the story of Father Breboeuf.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; and I can call to mind other works of a similar nature. All the funds which supported these men came from across the water. I do not think that in this twentieth century we can revert to a restriction such as has been suggested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a question about soldier pensions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I have an amendment about that, which I hope will be accepted by the committee. It is as follows:

That subsection 3 of section 7 of the said bill be struck out and replaced by the following:—

(3) (a) Where the deceased dies from wounds inflicted, accident occurring, or disease contracted while Canada is or was at war, while on service with Canadian or any other of his majesty's naval, military or air forces, or with allied or associated naval, military or air forces, and where the Canadian pension commission finds that the circumstances are such that the widow or children of the deceased are entitled or would, if such service had been with the Canadian naval, military or air forces, have been entitled to receive a pension under the Pension Act in respect of such death, or where the Canadian pension commission finds that the deceased died from wounds inflicted, accident occurring, or disease contracted, as a result of enemy action within twelve months before death;

(i) the exemptions allowed in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subsection one of this section shall be increased by fifty per centum; and

(ii) the amount of the duty payable in respect of a succession by any successor coming within Class A or Class B in the first schedule to this act shall be reduced to such sum as would, if accumulated at compound interest at the rate of three per centum per annum from the date of death with half-yearly rests, at the expiration of the period of the normal expectation of life of a person of the age of the deceased at the time of death (calculated in accordance with mortality tables approved by the minister) amount to the duty otherwise payable.

(b) The Canadian pension commisison shall on the request of the commissioner investigate the circumstances and report its findings in respect of any case arising under paragraph (a) of this subsection.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe that that reasonably meets the wishes of the committee, although not all of them, as expressed last evening.

It may be argued that this should be broadened so that it will apply to times of peace as well as to times of war. But if it is desired later to do that, it can be done by amendment. I am, however, perfectly satisfied that if we do that now, we could not amend it the other way if ever we wanted to. This meets the situation in so far as death follows as a result of the last war or as a result of this war, for all members of the forces.

Mr. GREEN: Whether they are serving in Canada or overseas?

Mr. ILSLEY: Whether they are serving in Canada or overseas; and, as the committee will have noted, it includes not only the members of the Canadian forces but the members of other of his majesty's naval, military and air forces, and those with allied or associated naval, military and air forces.

The latter part of the section provides for cases other than members of the forces:

where the Canadian pension commission finds that the deceased died from wounds inflicted, accident occurring, or disease contracted, as a result of enemy action within twelve months before death.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would apply to civilians?

Mr. ILSLEY: That would apply to civilians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, of course, quite a wide provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It applies to merchant seamen, who are civilians.

Mr. GREEN: Why is there a restriction of twelve months? A man may be seriously wounded and not die for, say, eighteen months or two or three years.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am of opinion that there should be some limitation in the case of civilians. It must be remembered that we have powers by order in council which are not displaced by this section; and in the case of persons who are not members of the forces, and whose records are not possessed by the government, to allow the possibility five or ten years after the war, when death occurs, of claims that these deaths were the result of enemy action at the time of the war, would, in my opinion, open the door too wide.

Mr. GREEN: Of course, the onus would be on the dependent of the deceased person; it would not be on the pensions commission. Does the minister not think it would be a severe enough restriction to provide that the pensions commission must decide that the death was caused by enemy action?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. When we are talking about merchant seamen, we must regard the normal case as that of the seaman who is drowned in time of war as a result of enemy attack. That is the usual case, and the twelve months' provision extends the time and would cover, I suppose, the case of the man who is wounded. But twelve months is long enough. As I have said, there is a power to deal with special cases by order in council, under the consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. But I do not think we should throw the door too widely open. For the time being the situation is met as well as it can be, and if it is desired to broaden these provisions, it can be done by amendment, or cases can be dealt with by order in council.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am sorry that the minister has not acted on my suggestion of last evening, when I requested that some consideration be given to a higher rate of interest on the amount of tax. Certainly three per cent is the lowest the minister possibly could have taken, and I think the government should treat cases of this kind in the most generous manner. It is an involved actuarial problem; but if a man thirty years of age is killed overseas, the tax against his estate is assessed at, say, $3,000; then the sum which accrued at three per cent with half-yearly rests—to use the approved term—is ascertained. That might be only $2,000, and that amount, then, is the tax. If the rate were four per cent instead of three per cent, the amount needed to be set up, with half-yearly rests, at the present time might be only $1,200; and at five per cent, it might be something less than $1,000. It seems to me that when a man has given his life, and his estate falls to the crown for succession duty at a very early period, the government should be willing to give his heirs every possible consideration. A soldier who is killed will probably not have had as much time to accumulate an estate as the ordinary citizen. Most of these men who die will die between the ages of say twenty-five and forty, and the government should give their dependents every possible consideration. I would, therefore, urge that the rate be higher than three per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have discussed this matter with the officers of the department, and we are of opinion that three per cent is the proper rate. It is substantially the market rate at the present time.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a controlled rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there are not many people who can continuously have their money earning more than three per cent compound interest over a substantial period of time. Far more earn much less than that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know of money earning much less than that over a long period of time. The government has chosen the lowest possible rate. For instance, the new loan will bear that rate or better. If the soldier had his money in a first mortgage, he would get at least five per cent. I think the minister is working a hardship on the man who gives his life.

Mr. ILSLEY: This says three per cent at half yearly rests.

Mr. JACKMAN: This is three per cent on a coupon. I do not think the minister can point to any security running over any length of years that yields less than three per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On most of the provincial bonds the rates are higher.

Mr. JACKMAN: The attitude of the crown seems rather niggardly considering the circumstances. The event arises entirely out of the defence of the nation, and every consideration and, in fact, generosity should be shown to the soldiers' dependents. It arouses the antagonism of hon. members when the government refuses to deal considerately with these people. It is not going to involve much money, and surely the people of Canada are willing that a higher rate should be given. Under the annuities—as a matter of fact the rate of interest has not changed—four per cent is being given; and while three per cent is the prevailing rate, everyone knows that present money rates are to an extent artificial. We have a central bank in control as other countries have, and I doubt whether the minister would say that three per cent is a natural rate to-day. There are plenty of very good securities which yield considerably more, and I do not know why we should compel soldiers' dependents to receive such an extremely low rate. It is not as if they were getting the security of the crown behind it. It is something being taken away from them at a very early date, arising only because of the man's sacrifice. It is not as if the crown were giving something. The crown is getting a windfall, and in order not to get too much it says, "We will take only the present value of the tax and allow the man to have his normal expectation of life before calculating it." Certainly the government is not adopting a generous attitude. I strongly urge that the rate be made higher.

Mr. ILSLEY: I point out that the main respect in which this section is extended is in the exemption. There will probably not be one in a thousand who will be affected by this valuation. There is an exemption of $30,000 for the widow and $7,500 for each child; that will take care of all cases where there is any necessity at all. Then, when we move into estates going to brothers, grown sons and so forth, I would consider that this provision is adequate. I do not know why hon. members should be so terribly concerned about those cases, because they will be extremely rare. It will be a matter of very substantial estates; and, as I say, the main respect in which this section is extended is in respect of the exemption.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has every soldier's widow who is entitled to a pension the same exemption? That is, the pension is the consideration?

Mr. ILSLEY: The question in that form cannot be answered. To begin with, what does the hon. gentleman mean by a soldier?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Every enlisted man if you like, who is entitled to a pension under the Pension Act. Does his widow receive the exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well, she should. The point is that the pension should be the consideration. There has been a great deal of discussion in the pensions committee as to the entitlement of the widow of an enlisted man to pension. Surely, if the widow is entitled to pension, she is entitled to exemption under this bill, regardless of limitation. If the minister will put that in the bill he will get rid of a great deal of trouble, because it will follow the intent of the Pension Act. He is going to have all kinds of difficulty trying to make exceptions; the pension should be the consideration for the exemption.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say after he had read the proposed amendment that the effect of it was that if the widow could qualify for pension as a result of any disability arising out of the last war or this war—

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. GREEN: —then she would also qualify for the exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct, but that is different from what the hon. member for St. Paul's was saying. This excludes the peace cases, cases of pension arising from peace-time disability. That is the very point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Except by enemy action.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; but there would be no enemy in peace time.

Mr. GREEN: The minister spoke a few minutes ago as though he found it hard to understand why anyone should ask that estates over a certain amount should be entitled to exemption. I raised the point a few days ago when the resolution preceding the bill was up for discussion, and the reason why I raised it was that I believe it is not right in principle that the estates of men who give their lives for their country should be subject to succession duty tax imposed by the dominion which sent these men overseas. It was on that principle that I raised the objection.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Allowances in computing aggregate net value and dutiable value.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a small amendment to that. It reads:

That section 8, subsection 1, be amended by inserting after the word "surrogate" in the thirteenth line the words "probate or other like".

So that the opening of the said subsection shall read:

(1) In determining the aggregate net value and dutiable value respectively, an allowance shall be made for debts and encumbrances (including reasonable funeral expenses and surrogate, probate or other like court fees, but not including the charges of solicitors).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good enough.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I say to the minister that, on the whole, if we have to have legislation of this kind I think this is a pretty good bill. It contains certain features that I do not like. I know it is in the experimental stage so far as this jurisdiction is concerned, but I hope the administrators of the measure will keep an open mind and note any deficiencies that may become evident as time goes on. Do not be afraid to come back to parliament to rectify evils and omissions that may become apparent. Let us try to improve this measure as we go along. I do not think the rates in themselves are oppressive, although, of course, when coupled with the provincial rates, in certain instances they are heavy. I hope this bill may accomplish the result that I think is in the back of the minister's mind, of ultimately invading and capturing the field for the central authority. That would be very unpopular in some places, but on the whole I think it would be a good thing for those who have to pay the taxes. Then we would have a uniform act and uniformity of administration, and I think we would have it in a jurisdiction in which, in some instances at least, the public will have a little more confidence.

Mr. POULIOT: I give credit to the leader of the opposition for the study he has given this legislation; but, although we are now on the title, I wish to direct attention to subsection 4 of section 35, which reads:

The minister, upon proof to his satisfaction that an overpayment of duty has been made, may refund the amount of such overpayment, provided no such refund shall be made after the expiration of one year from the receipt by the minister of an amount purporting to be in full settlement of the duty.

I find that pretty hard, and I hope the minister may see his way clear to give it a wide interpretation.

I will not insist further on that point, but I wish to say one thing to the leader of the opposition and his supporters. Ever since the special session of 1939 they have been asking this government to do more and more. They have wanted this country to practise total war. Now we have total taxation because of that total war; and if there is anyone who should not complain about this taxation, it is precisely the leader of the opposition and his satellites. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. I am against this legislation, for reasons I have already stated; but those who have been advocating a greater war effort than was at first contemplated, cannot object to it. They were never satisfied with the policy of the government, which they said was never doing enough. They wanted more and more; and every time the leader of the opposition said, "do more", I rose and asked what he meant, but he never replied. Now we have the reply, in this taxation. I regret it for the sake of some of my fellow citizens, but I am very glad that the Tories will have to taste their own medicine; it will be a good lesson to them. Although I regret it because of some Tories, I do not regret it for those who have said we were never doing enough.

There is one further point I should like to mention. When a certain piece of legislation is brought before us, it is stated to be essential and indispensable, and we are told that we cannot get along without it. Well, according to what was said yesterday, the revenue under this contentious legislation will be from twenty to twenty-five million dollars. If it is twenty million dollars, that will be fifteen million dollars less than what has been given the west; if it is twenty-five million dollars, it will be ten million dollars less than what we are giving the west. Therefore, if the prairie provinces had not been given $35,000,000 this year, we would not need contentious legislation like this. I have wanted to say this for a long time.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that we are now discussing succession duties, and that the general matters of expenditure and taxation which he is now discussing are hardly linked up with the title of this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: If you will allow me one further word—

The CHAIRMAN: Let us confine ourselves to the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: We passed section 8 so quickly that I did not have an opportunity to refer to one other matter. I do not know whether an opinion was expressed in this connection yesterday, but what happens in a case where a man accommodates another on a promissory note, for no consideration, and the note becomes a charge against the man's estate? Will that be considered a liability of the estate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is covered by section 8 (2) (b), which reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the last preceding subsection allowance shall not be made—
> (b) for any debt in respect whereof there is a right to reimbursement from any other person unless such reimbursement cannot be obtained.

Mr. JACKMAN: Take the case of a father who has educated his sons. He says, "I have no more money for you, but if you want to start up in business I will endorse a note for $5,000." The father dies; the son cannot meet the note, and therefore there is a claim against the father's estate. Will that claim be allowed as a deduction from the assets?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is precisely covered by the subsection I read. If reimbursement could not be obtained, it would be allowed.

Mr. JACKMAN: Even though full consideration had not been received for it?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a right to reimbursement from the son.

Mr. JACKMAN: He may or may not be on the note, which might be given directly to the bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I can only direct the hon. gentleman's attention to that section. That sort of thing is carefully covered there, and it would just be a question of applying that principle.

Mr. JACKMAN: That section is meant, as I understand it, only to prevent fraudulent evasion. Anything that is a real debt of the estate, even though full consideration were not given, would be satisfactory? In other words, unless there was a real attempt at evasion—

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand the illustration given by the hon. gentleman. This is a case where a parent goes on a note for his son, is it? They borrow the money from somebody else, say, from a bank? In that event the father would owe the bank at the time of his death.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would be a guarantor.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but he would be liable to the bank. If he paid the bank he would have a right to be reimbursed by his son.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and if the son was worthless this is what would happen. The executor would list the note among the assets, but then he would value it at nil.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would have to demonstrate that it was not worth anything. I see no trouble, because I think those cases in practice arise quite frequently.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I endorse a note for a man and he is not worth it, I have to take it up. Then, if I die, my estate would be the holder of the note. My executor would list it among the assets. But if the maker of the note was worthless, it would be valued at nothing. He would have to satisfy the department that it was worth nothing, but I believe in a reasonable case that could be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am thinking about a case where it is paid after the death by the executor. In that event it would be a debt of the estate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If reimbursement were not possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could be deducted as a debt?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if reimbursement were not possible.

Mr. JACKMAN: What troubled me was paragraph (a). It says that an allowance shall not be made for a debt incurred where no consideration passed. Then the consideration is outlined rather specifically. If you endorse a note for a friend, you can hardly say you get "money's worth," which is the expression used in the paragraph. Neither would that be true if you endorsed a note for a son.

Mr. ILSLEY: Money's worth was obtained from the bank.

Mr. JACKMAN: But not by the deceased.

Mr. ILSLEY: That does not matter. That would be between the guarantor and the bank. The guarantor would owe the bank the money.

Mr. JACKMAN: But the paragraph specifically states "money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit."

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Before the title carries, I should like to make one observation. I am rather in accord with this type of taxation, first because we need the money. We must go where the money is, and we must get it. Any move the government makes toward getting money to help prosecute the war effort will receive the support of a good many of us from all sides of the chamber. I could not sit still and take the little lecture from the hon. member for Temiscouata with regard to those of us who sit on this side of the house, without saying something.

This particular item of taxation is one which worries those of us here perhaps less than many other forms of taxation in other bills which will come before us.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I believe I represent, on the question of overgovernment and overtaxation, a large body of public opinion in this country. I am not trying to speak for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), or the opposition, but I can speak for myself. I believe that in connection with this bill it is not patriotic to remain silent, and particularly at a time like this. Everybody wants to help win the war; nothing else matters in Canada but the winning of the war.

I deeply sympathize with the two ministers in charge of this bill, and the officials associated with them. They have a tiresome, wearisome and thankless job. There is, however, a large body of public opinion in Canada, a body of honest workers and toilers who have toiled all their lives to amass only a little property. We have in Canada been overgoverned by dominion, provincial and municipal governments with many taxes on the same property. We have not noticed how the right to possess property has been taken away from people in Canada by measures of taxation such as the one before the house.

In the early days of this country, in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the rest of them, everybody owned a little property. A man would own a store, a small garden, a mill, a horse and rig or a little farm, and he tried to be thrifty. In those days a man was encouraged to be thrifty. The people who came to Canada from England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales and many other countries in the early days were thrifty. The minister urged in his budget speech, and he is again urging in connection with the loan about to be made, that people should collect savings to help in the war. We have been slow to see how the right to possess private property, and the ownership of property have been taken away in Canada to-day. So much is that true that people have become proletarian. The direct result has been that very few people possess property to-day. It is the desire of all good citizens that the government shall prosecute the war to the end; that is all that counts. The government must collect large sums of money by taxation or borrowing. They need it. I am sorry, however, that in the budget, they have not tried to collect it on a fifty-fifty basis—fifty per cent from income and fifty per cent from capital. The manner in which it is being collected, with duplicate taxes of all kinds, is imposing a heavy burden on the thrifty people of Canada.

As I see it, these phantom excursions into the revenues of the provinces and the municipalities cannot continue much longer. We have our own business and our own way of doing things. I am only one of a party, and I do not always follow parties. I follow principles. If a party leaves its principles, then I support principles just the same in this House of Commons, and not individuals in any political party.

Under our present procedure, in a time of heavy taxation, one form of government seizes the revenue from another form of government, and that form of government seizes revenue from the next. This bill I consider the worst of them all. In my view, any man who makes money in the future will spend it, in order to avoid these heavy death duties. Here we have rival organizations in the provinces and in the dominion collecting money from the very same real estate and personal property.

The government has copied sections 6 and 7 of Bill No. 79 from provincial legislation of some years ago as to death duties on real and personal estate. What is the result? In the early days of succession duties legislation in Ontario many people who owned property left the province and went to Nassau and other places to live. It is difficult to control that part of an estate which is movable. With all the trust company laws, loan company laws, banking laws, and that kind of thing, it is very easy to remove movable personal property out of a jurisdiction.

In conclusion, may I point out that if a man makes some money he will spend it; he will certainly not invest it in houses or other things to be taken away from him. He will not build houses, because his money will be taken away from him by bills like this. This measure, as I see it, is the first step toward a condition where two bodies will be taking money from the same estate and through death duties there will be in time, a general confiscation of wealth by such measures.

In adopting these duties we shall be following some form of socialism. By this overgovernment and overtaxation on certain types of property we are seeking to destroy the present status and basis of society which we have had in this country since confederation in connection with the holding of property, real estate and personal estate. If the government is to follow the imposition of these death duties and other measures to the logical conclusion, in time it will be the sole owner of all property and wealth, and in the end the government will be the only distributors of goods.

So far as I am concerned, I wish the government every success. I believe the money will be forthcoming, but I should like to see something done for the small investor. Before the war started, this type of man had pledged in real estate and insurance policies all the money which he might have invested in the victory loan. Those two items take up about 70 per cent of what he makes and he cannot finance extra taxes and help the war loan. I should like to see the government pass a national moratorium in connection with insurance premiums, whereby a toiler who had paid for four or five years his premiums could pay it after the war at the same rate as the victory loan, and so allow these honest workers a share in the victory loan, and also pass a moratorium on mortgages by a national act suspending payment of principal till after the war as a war measure, like the provinces did in the depression.

I wish the government every success. I know the people of Canada would rejoice if under the voluntary system Canada had a million men to go over to that glorious land of France, when the air force is ready and we have ships to help clean those barbarous Germans out of the glorious land of France where so many of our brave Canadians sleep their last sleep. The privations suffered by the people of France are terrible, and their human misery and sacrifices will live forever as a great example of sublime patriotism. I do hope the government will try to do something to readjust this awful burden of overgovernment and overtaxation which bears on the small wage earners and real estate. The people are willing to pay for the war so long as they know it is for the war and a supreme effort, but they object to vast expenditures being made on matters not having to do with the war or its prosecution to victory.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as I said last night, I was not present when second reading was given to this bill because I was attending to other duties in connection with one of the committees. We of this group are pleased that the government has at last placed a measure of this sort upon the dominion statute books. For a number of years we have advocated death duties in the house, not as a war measure but as a measure of taxation which would readjust to some extent the wealth of this country where it has accumulated rather quickly in recent years. Before the war we were of opinion that a death duty should be put into effect in order that we might build up something in the nature of a sinking fund to retire our national obligations, at least in part. The war has, however, made it necessary that every dollar that we can raise shall be used for its prosecution. Therefore we welcome this legislation.

There has been a great deal of criticism because this measure enters a field which is occupied to some extent by the provinces. That is unfortunate, but an opportunity was given to the provincial premiers, who are now objecting, to come to some agreement regarding the occupation or the vacancy of this particular field. I do not think that argument carries any weight.

In looking over Hansard of the last few days, I find that some members of the house, particularly the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), have referred to those who are inclined to support measures of this sort as the "have-nots." I am proud to represent a good many people who might be classified as "have-nots," but I am glad to say that there are associated with me many people who belong to the "have" class, but who, from motives of humanity, believe that something should be done to improve the unequal social conditions which face our generation. I believe that, when this war is over, we shall see many measures taken to prevent the accumulation of wealth and to redistribute wealth. Surely that is necessary at the present time.

The leader of the opposition stated a little while ago that one of the great communions in this country, the Anglican communion, had in the past received considerable support from the old land in establishing its institution in this country and in fostering it throughout the years. That is true. I have often wished that, in days gone by, the leaders of that great church might have given a better lead in the implementing of social legislation, and I am pleased to be able to state that, in recent days, this old and stately church has given a lead which I think we might follow when we quote it in other respects in this chamber and elsewhere. I have read with a good deal of interest the report of the Malvern conference held last January. When I hear gibes thrown at those in this house who seek to bring about a better social order, my mind goes back to the mediaeval teachers who taught what the use of property ought to be. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald) state something last night which is in line with both history and philosophy:

> I submit that no one has an inalienable right to transmit property to his descendants. The natural law is that a man should part with his property at the time of his death. The fact that dependents or relatives are entitled to come into possession of his estate is wholly dependent upon the laws of the country and the facilities that are provided for the administration of estates.

That is in line with the historic teachings of all great Christian religions. The resolution adopted at the Malvern conference, to which I am going to refer, began as follows:

> Christian doctrine must insist that production exists for consumption . . . to a large extent production is carried on not to supply the consumer with goods but to bring profits to the producer.

An amendment was moved by a member of one of the oldest and most respected families in a county of England where I was born, the county of Devon. Sir Richard Acland, who happens to be a Liberal member of the British house of commons, moved the following amendment:

> In the present situation we believe the church should declare that the maintenance of that part of the structure of our society by which the ownership of the great resources of our community can be vested in private individuals is a stumbling block, making it harder for the generality of men to live christian lives.

Yet in this debate we have heard it hinted that those who stand for those principles in this house represent something of subversive elements in our midst. Let me say that at that great Malvern conference of a large number of the bishops and principal clergy of the Church of England, Sir Richard Acland's amendment was adopted with few dissenting votes. We have to face up to problems such as we have heard discussed in this house to-night and in the past day or two, because, if we do not, we are going to have said to us what Sir Richard Acland said in support of his resolution:

> For over 150 years—

He said:

> —you have neglected your duty through sheer funk. The whole structure of society is, from the Christian point of view, rotten. It has given Hitler the opportunity to say, "To hell with the whole order." In order to save humanity from the horror of nazism, we must find a way of living superior not merely to nazism but to that which we ourselves knew before. You must be prepared to offend people who are determined to reserve the existing order.

That, I think, is true, and legislation such as this before us to-night, although many may regard it as a war measure, will undoubtedly remain on the statute books of this country now it is there. Although there are some criticisms which one might have made of this bill, those criticisms were not made because we believe that this is a step in the right direction and that as experience in the administration of the measure develops, we shall be able to change it, alter it, amend it, so that it may be a better one still.

I have heard in the last few days and read in the debates statements that persons have the right to continue to transmit property from generation to generation. Let me quote—

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. gentleman give the source from which he is quoting?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is the Malvern Conference, England, 1941.

Mr. DUPUIS: What is the date of the publication?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am taking this from June 7 issue of Liberty. I have, however, the original copy of the proceedings of the conference in my office, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that this is exactly the same. The Archbishop of York, who placed the crown on the queen's head, wrote this:

> It is perfectly ludicrous that because someone lent money for the building of, say, the Great Western Railway, he should be possessed of a salable right to levy a private tax upon that railway for ever.
> The contribution of labour, whether managerial, administrative, or manual, must equally with the contribution of capital, and with still further right, carry a title to representation on the board of directors. The investor gets his interest; the workman gets his wages. There is no reason why the former should get control and the latter should not. It is on the whole more reasonable that labour should hire capital than that capital should hire labour, because capital can exist without capitalists, but labour cannot exist without labourers.

There is a fundamental truth which in legislation of this kind we have begun to recognize.

One more thing I should like to say. The leader of the opposition yesterday made the statement that:

> One of the objects of the dictator of Germany under the national-socialism system, and one of the objects of the dictator of Italy under fascism in effect is to destroy the capitalistic system. What do they offer us in its place?

Anyone who knows the story of the rise of either Mussolini in Italy or of Hitler in Germany knows that the reverse is true, that these men were both financed and promoted in order that they might destroy the social democratic movements in their respective lands.

Mr. MacINNIS: Financed by the capitalists.

Mr. COLDWELL: By the capitalists of those countries and, incidentally, of other countries. We know that every person who stood for social and economic reform, for social democracy, beginning with Matteotti, the great social-democratic leader of Italy, down to the social democratic leaders of democratic Germany, were murdered by the dictators, or placed in concentration camps, or compelled to flee into exile. What we are witnessing to-day is the fruit of the greed of those who thought to stifle social reform, and who set up a Frankenstein which to-day is threatening to destroy us all.

Therefore I wish to commend this legislation and to express the hope that it will be extended as the years go by. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), whom I respect very highly as a member of this house, said just now that he objected to this legislation because it brought hardship on the thrifty and on the poor. But only look at the returns—look at the advertisements of our insurance companies, for instance, which tell us that of a hundred young men now twenty-five years of age, only four will be wealthy when they reach sixty, only a few more will be able to maintain themselves, and the vast majority will be dead or mainly dependent upon relatives and friends.

An hon. MEMBER: Or upon the government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite true. Because, if you will look at the applications for old age pensions in this wealthy country, you will see that they bear out the statement that if we did not care for them in the very modest way in which we are doing to-day, they would be suffering great hardships in the eventide of life. Therefore again I commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for this legislation, and I have been disappointed at the long barrage of criticism put up against it by the Conservative leader in this house. That, of course, is the traditional Conservative attitude. That is the traditional attitude which, years ago, drove many a young man out of the ranks of the Conservative party. To-day that is not the attitude of either humane or thinking people, and as a member of an opposition group in this house I commend the government for bringing in this measure. My main criticism is that it does not go far enough.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) on repeated occasions during the course of this debate has commended the government for bringing in this legislation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can pick out all kinds of places in Hansard where the legislation was not commended. In his budget speech the leader of the opposition regretted very much that this bill had been brought into parliament at all at this time.

member says, "a capital levy". Well, let me say that when this war is over, there will probably be a capital levy, perhaps not in the form in which it was suggested after the last war, but a levy on accumulated wealth in order that we may retire some of the debt which we are accumulating for two purposes: to defend our institutions; and, as parts of those institutions, the people who are managing to control the property of this country at the present time. I have no doubt that just as, seven or eight years ago, succession duties and death duties were proposed in this house and were more or less scorned, so, when this war is over, we shall have to find ways and means of meeting war obligations, and one of those ways and means, I predict, will be a levy on accumulated wealth.

With those few words I wish to conclude what I have to say. I am glad to see that we have taken this step, at least, in the right direction.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as my professor of modern history. He should know that, after the Prussian war, France had to pay five billions of francs—cinq milliards—and it was paid in a very short time, on account of the reserve which the French peasant had in his woollen sock. On that account the war was not so hard on France as it would have been had France been living on government proposals such as those advocated by the hon. gentlemen upon your extreme left.

Furthermore, in these times, the cause of the defeat of France is to be found in the devaluation of the franc. This measure decreased so much the values of the currency possessed by Frenchmen who had annuities from the state that they became communists; they had not the same interest in defending their country as when they were owners and proprietors.

The right of ownership is something which has existed since the beginning of time, but of recent years it has been gradually replaced by theories which are most dangerous to the welfare of any country. I am in favour of the old order of things. It seems to me that our mistake is to go always ahead and forget that the best is in the past. Instead of trying always to go forward into uncharted seas, we should return to the old principles which have assured during scores of years the prosperity of this country.

For the past twenty years the teachings of economists and social scientists in all the universities of the world have been responsible for the misinformed young men who, though having no experience of life, have been accepted as experts and who now find themselves in the role of Moses—and I insist on Moses—the Moses' who are supposed to bring the people of Israel into the promised land. In saying that, I do not make a pun on the Goldenbergs, the Rasminskys, the Cohens and the Heapses who infest the civil service of Ottawa. I refer only to the example of the old times. Moses never entered the promised land; he saw it only from a distance, and afterwards his people got in.

I wonder whether it is not better to reflect a little upon the emptiness of modern theories of social science and economics, and go back to the experience of ages for the drafting of policies to be applied in this country.

There was, of course, the experiment of President Roosevelt in the United States. He had a brain trust, but he dispensed with it. Now we have one, and I wonder whether it is not time to get rid of it and to revert to policies which have proved so satisfactory in times past.

I shall not pursue this topic at length, because I understand that there is to be a government statement, but I protest against all new policies until there is some justification for them, and the views of so-called experts do not constitute any justification, because they are not experts; they have not the least experience of ordinary business; they have no contact with the people, and they are the most dangerous citizens that we can find in this country.

Some people are surprised at the way things are going. The government is not to blame. I have every sympathy with the ministers. The only reproach I might make against them is their proneness to accept with closed eyes and open mouths the theories which are offered to them by these young freshmen or sophomores.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): For one moment I wish to detain the house for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that, in the absence of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) has given expression to opinions which it is perfectly proper for him to have and to give expression to. The only thing I regret is that he should have done so in the absence of the one whom he was criticizing. The leader of the opposition will have his own opportunities of replying to that criticism if he sees fit; but I think it is right to make this observation, that the leader of the opposition and his colleagues of this party have not expressed themselves as being opposed to the principle of the legislation brought forward, but have carried out those duties which we of the opposition consider lie upon us, to examine the matters which arise in such resolutions and to offer such criticisms of them as they think are warranted. To that extent, in my opinion the leader of the opposition carried out his obligations in this house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I feel that under the circumstances I should take perhaps a minute of the time of the house. We have had well and vividly placed before us to-night a struggle between the old way of doing and a new way. Something has gone wrong with our way of life. As a result of it, we are becoming subjected to taxation which is ruinous. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has properly voiced his objection to the onrushing tide of devastating taxation. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members of the opposition to this fact, that if they were in the position of the government to-day, and if the Minister of Finance were a good Conservative of the finest Conservative type, he would be forcing upon this country a burden of taxation quite as onerous as that which the present Minister of Finance feels himself obliged to force upon the country.

I have listened with great care to the objections of the Conservatives, and not once have I heard any Conservative member state what he would do to raise the money without this taxation.

That is very serious. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) has told us, as is characteristic of one with his ideas, that this kind of taxation is quite all right; that it is along the right lines. I draw the attention of the house to the fact that hon. members in my movement maintain that this system of taxation is all wrong, and that there is a way of managing a country like Canada, so as to have all the revenue you need to fight the war just as vigorously as the material resources you have will enable you to do, and still maintain in this country such a set of prices, such a condition of freedom from taxation as will enable people to possess their own homes, as the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) longs to see them do, as the leader of the opposition wishes to see them do, but as the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party very aptly and wisely says they now do not. In other words, the very things that both the Liberals and the Conservatives and all the rest of us are longing for, namely, individual ownership and freedom to produce and own and direct our affairs, rugged individualism and all those fine things which made our fathers great, are passing away because we will not adopt a system of public management which can preserve us from the conditions of debt which are coming upon us.

I am not going into any details except just to assert once again that it is not necessary to have all this centralization, all this socialization, all this tendency toward government ownership, all this crushing taxation, all this bewildering regimentation which is coming upon us; it is not necessary to have this fear, this anxiety, this frustration and bewilderment, this unemployment, when we have a country as rich as Canada. I just wish to draw that to the attention of hon. members. There is every reason for the people of Canada even to-day to have hope, to look up and to rejoice. But we are not going to have hope and rejoicing by the further development of the policies which are being forced upon us by the administration at the present time.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): In reference to some of the remarks made by the leader of the Social Credit party—

Mr. CRERAR: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt for a moment? It is almost eleven o'clock and at the request of the Prime Minister, when this third reading is passed I wish to revert to motions to table a statement in order that it may be printed in Votes and Proceedings for tomorrow. Unless my hon. friend has something very pertinent—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I will take only a minute. I just wish to say with regard to the hon. member's remarks concerning the opposition to the budget and so forth, that I, as one member of the opposition, in any criticism that I offered on the budget or any exemption for which I asked, offered a substitute in every case. That is all I desire to say.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ADDITIONAL DIVERSIONS OF WATER AT NIAGARA FALLS—TABLING OF NOTES EXCHANGED

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): With the consent of the house I should like to revert to motions, in order to lay on the table at the request of the Prime Minister the exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America relating to additional diversions at Niagara falls, to which reference was made some days ago. They embody communications from the Secretary of State of the United States, Washington, to the Canadian Minister to the United States,

Washington, and from the Canadian Minister to the United States, Washington, to the Secretary of State of the United States, Washington. They are tabled in English and French with the request that they be printed in to-morrow's Votes and Proceedings.

Along with them I desire to make the following statement:

1. The house is familiar with the provisions of the St. Lawrence agreement which was signed in March of this year, and with the exchange of notes which took place in October last.

2. Without embarking upon an explanation of the agreement, it may be observed that article VIII enables either country to divert water into the St. Lawrence watershed and to utilize the water so diverted for power purposes, so long as it remains a part of international waters.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is permanent then.

Mr. CRERAR: Article IX provides for the preservation of the scenic beauty of the Niagara falls and river, for the construction of remedial works, and for the efficient utilization and equitable apportionment of the waters of the Niagara to the extent that is consistent with the paramount need to preserve their scenic beauty.

3. Last October, to ensure continued acceleration of the supply of essential war materials, an agreement was made by exchange of notes, copies of which are to be found at pages 34 to 36 in the white paper tabled in the House of Commons on March 21. These notes provided for the bringing into force, in advance of a St. Lawrence agreement, of the provisions enabling Ontario to proceed with the Ogoki and Long Lake diversions and to utilize immediately 5,000 cubic feet per second of additional water at Niagara. This made it possible to develop immediately, using idle equipment, 70,000 horse-power.

4. The demand for power grows from day to day and from month to month. It is not a problem of static industry, it is one of constantly expanding production. Continuous expansion of production can only take place if there is corresponding expansion of hydro-electric power.

5. To meet this situation, a proposal has been made by the government of the United States of America, leading to the immediate further utilization of the water at Niagara. It involves the immediate diversion of 5,000 cubic feet per second on the United States side, which will produce 70,000 horse-power; and the immediate diversion of 3,000 cubic feet per second on the Canadian side, which will produce 35,000 horse-power, mostly in the form of additional energy.

6. This proposal has been embodied in an exchange of notes which took place on May 20. It might be of service to hon. members if copies, in English and in French, were included in Votes and Proceedings of to-day. I am tabling them for that purpose.

7. This exchange is being submitted to the senate of the United States for approval to-day, and it is expected that its provisions will be put into effect to-day or to-morrow.

8. It provides for the immediate diversion of 5,000 cubic feet per second on the United States side and 3,000 cubic feet per second on the Canadian side. There is at present an idle plant on the United States side which can use 12,500 cubic feet per second. The maximum amount of additional water that can be effectively used in Canada, with existing equipment and under existing market conditions, is 3,000 cubic feet per second. That is the reason for the apparent discrepancy in this apportionment.

9. In substance, the exchange accelerates the provisions of the St. Lawrence agreement, whereunder additional power would be made available at Niagara, and it takes advantage of relatively high water conditions in the lakes to give effect to these provisions before the construction of the remedial works.

10. The agreement is subject to certain conditions. In the first place, it cannot extend beyond the duration of the present emergency; in the second place, it is subject to reconsideration by both governments on October 1, 1942; in the third place, it will be subject to the provisions of article IX of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin development.

11. It will also be observed that the agreement enables the engineers of the two countries to proceed at once with the programme for remedial works.

12. When this proposal was first made to the Canadian government, the temporary Canadian Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin committee was asked to report upon the question as to whether immediate increases in diversions of 5,000 cubic feet per second to the United States and 3,000 cubic feet per second to Canada would be detrimental or harmful to Canadian interests.

This committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. Guy A. Lindsay of the Department of Transport, and including in its membership the chairman and chief engineer of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, the vice-chairman of the Quebec Streams Commission and the legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs, has advised the government that such diversions would not be detrimental or harmful to Canadian interests. The committee studied, amongst other things, the possible effect of proposed diversions (including a total of 15,500 cubic feet per second) upon the Niagara falls and river, and have submitted the following statement:

Although it is assumed that the construction of these remedial works will be proceeded with immediately, if the diversions are authorized there will be a period during which the flow over the falls is depleted before the effect of the remedial works is felt. The committee does not think this is a serious matter however, because with flow conditions in the Niagara river approximately those of 1940, the diversions of an additional 15,500 cubic feet per second for power purposes would still leave a more satisfactory scenic spectacle at the falls than that which existed in the recent low water years of 1934, 1935 and 1936. In reaching this conclusion no account has been taken of any betterment of conditions which may have been brought about at the Canadian flank of the Horseshoe falls due to the recent construction of the gathering weir of the Canadian Niagara Power Company.

The government, therefore, reached the conclusion that the proposals submitted by the United States government, having regard for lake levels and for the paramount need for preserving the scenic beauty of the Niagara falls and river, would not be detrimental to this country. I do not suggest that if the diversions had been likely to affect the scenic beauty the government would have refused to go on with the agreement. The urgent need for power for vital war production is a paramount consideration. It is, however, satisfactory to know that this additional power can be developed without prejudice to the beauty of the falls.

It being nine minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 30, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AUTHORITY TO UNDERTAKE PROJECTS INVOLVING ANNUAL EXPENDITURE OF LESS THAN $5,000

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act by empowering the minister, subject to the advice and representations of the advisory committees, to undertake certain minor rehabilitation projects and schemes and enter into agreements with respect thereto, provided that if the total amount to be expended under any such single project or scheme exceeds five thousand dollars in any fiscal year the approval of the governor in council shall be required; also to authorize the minister to pay administrative expenses and travelling and living expenses of officials and employees.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments which are to be contained in the bill which will be based upon this resolution give the minister authority in respect of schemes and projects involving expenditures of less than $5,000; and beyond that amount the authority of the governor in council is required. This procedure is similar to that already provided in section 12 (1) of the act, with respect to the purchase or rental of equipment. Similarly the minister is given authority to pay administrative and travelling expenses, which were not hitherto provided for. Those travelling expenses and administrative costs have been paid, but it is contended by the auditor general that the act does not contain specific authority for such payments, and this amendment is designed to place that specific authority in the act.

Further, at present the act requires the approval of council for all agreements. In order that council may not be burdened with a multitude of minor agreements, such as those entered into with pasture patrons, illustration station operators, and tenants on irrigation projects, the amendment provides that the authority of council shall not be required unless the expenditure under an agreement is to exceed $5,000 in any one fiscal year. The procedure made possible under these amendments is similar to the practice now followed in respect to all ordinary departmental activities.

His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ARMY

RECRUITING CAMPAIGN—ACTION IN THE EVENT OF FAILURE TO SECURE QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. My question is in two parts: (1) Will the minister give the house a report on the recruiting campaign to date? (2) If the required number of 32,000 men for active service is not secured in this campaign, what does the minister propose to do in regard to this quota and future quotas?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): As to the first question, I think it is too early as yet to give a report on the recruiting campaign. My hon. friend will understand that the organization is just being completed, the adjutant-general having just returned from a trip to the west.

The second point involves a matter of policy which would be decided in due course.

DARTMOUTH, N.S., AIRPORT

EASTERN PASSAGE AERODROME CONTRACTS—TILLEY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of National Defence for Air in a position to give the house a report respecting the eastern passage aerodrome at Dartmouth? It is now more than two weeks since the minister informed the house that he expected the report would be placed before the house within the next few days. The matter has been before the department now for about seven months.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I said I expected to receive a report within a few days. As a matter of fact I had a telephone message sent to Mr. Tilley the day before yesterday, and I have been promised that report either Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister lay on the table of the house a copy of the correspondence between his department and Mr. Tilley, who is carrying on this investigation or inquiry?

Mr. POWER: I shall consider that.

NATIONAL PARKS

BILL TO WITHDRAW CERTAIN AREAS FROM PRINCE ALBERT PARK AND ESTABLISH NEW BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. I have received a communication from the secretary of the board of trade of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, pointing out to me that he had received a letter from the Minister of Mines and Resources, in which it was indicated that the bill to amend the National Parks Act, having particular reference to Prince Albert National Park, would not be proceeded with. Would the minister advise the house as to the accuracy of that report, and whether or not the bill will be proceeded with at this session?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The expectation is that the bill will not be proceeded with.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 77, to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Duties of customs, schedule two.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In the resolution stage Bill No. 77 received scant attention and consideration, although it is a most important measure. Under the circumstances I think an explanation is due the committee from the minister. Perhaps he would give a more exhaustive statement than was given on the resolution. The probability is that since the resolution was introduced on May 23, the day preceding Victoria day, he has received representations. If there are to be changes from what appeared in the resolution, the committee would like to know about them.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said before. The measure was discussed in resolution stage.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It was only a short discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: It speaks for itself. I explained when the resolution was before the committee what was being done under the measure. For the most part this bill consists in a reduction of duties on goods coming from the United Kingdom. That is its main feature. I explained the reductions proposed, and I do not know how I could go much further.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Since the situation has not been enlarged upon by the minister, I should like to make some further observations, the first of which is that all hon. members are very anxious to do everything possible to bring in from Great Britain anything she can export in order that she in turn may be supplied with more Canadian dollars. That, Mr. Chairman, is the foundation for the remarks I purpose making.

At the same time, as we all know, the United Kingdom has suffered considerably from air raids and other conditions arising out of the war. Plant after plant, factory after factory, has received direct hits. The operation of plants has been greatly disturbed. In the main, the machinery in bombed factories is still there, although a good deal of it has not been put back into service.

My point in mentioning these facts on the present bill is that many of the plants operating in England would like to remove to Canada the remaining machinery and other manufacturing equipment and establish branch factories here.

Speaking in reply to a question of the leader of the opposition the minister stated that this legislation is only for the duration of the war. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation observed yesterday that once these changes are made they will remain. I hope the minister did not pay too much attention to that point raised by the hon. member, and I am hopeful that with the close of hostilities the war exchange conservation measure will be dispensed with.

This is a tariff which the minister has described as a tariff for revenue, but it is one which we all know has protective features as well. The minister himself knows that very well. He will recall that in 1932 there was passed in this house a certain British empire trade agreement which contained protective features. In fact, I rather believe he had the privilege or the honour of voting for that trade agreement. The features which were embodied in that, perhaps the greatest of all agreements between the United Kingdom and Canada, are pretty well nullified by this measure in respect of groups 1, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 of the Customs tariff. Those are really the main items in matters of trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. Taking that large group and giving them a duty discount of 50 per cent will not tend to encourage industry in the United Kingdom to establish branch plants in Canada if the minister and the government and all sections of the house do not adhere to the view that this legislation will be done away with at the cessation of hostilities.

I have in mind a large group of commodities in which the labour content is at least fifty per cent, such as non-metallic minerals. We imported about $9,500,000 worth of these from the United Kingdom in 1939, the duty being in the neighbourhood of $500,000. There is an abundance of raw material in Canada, such as aluminum, copper, lead, and so on. All through my remarks I want to convey the idea that our fellow Britishers in the United Kingdom will be anxious now, as they were several generations ago, to move out to a new country. In the old country are many artisans, technicians and men trained in these arts and trades. If we can stimulate this movement by encouraging the establishment of branch factories, we shall be doing a great deal to take care of the difficult situation which will face us when hostilities cease.

In connection with the other group, iron and its products, I do not suppose there are any better mechanics in the handling of iron than those who come from Scotland and the old country. Normally we import about $20,000,000 worth of these products each year. Many of the goods in this group have a large labour content, in some cases as high as sixty per cent. These goods are in universal use both here and in the United Kingdom, and their manufacture fits in with the establishment of branch plants in Canada. What obtains in that regard, obtains in respect of chemicals and chemical products. I am thinking of the salt deposits in the lakes of western Canada and the other basic chemicals which are available in Canada. I am thinking of the possibilities of using the coal to be found in the west and establishing manufacturing plants in Alberta where coal is plentiful. The manufacture of these articles requires a good deal of heat treatment, of fuel, and so on.

What applies here, applies also to the miscellaneous products which come in from the United Kingdom to the extent of $10,000,000 a year. All in all, the value of the manufactures coming in from Great Britain is well over $150,000,000. The United Kingdom is grateful and thankful for what Canada has done in this regard of its own free will. They have realized that we want to help them in every possible way. At the same time I hope that all those who have studied this situation will realize that we are anxious for them to locate here after the war. One thing that will bring them here is the hard, commonsense view that the Englishman takes of a problem of this kind, the pounds, shillings and pence view. If he knows that he is to be given some protection as between the mother country and this country in the days to come, he will feel more disposed to establish his branch plant in Canada.

I have a criticism in regard to something that happened in connection with this legislation. I have under my hand a cable which I received two weeks before the budget was brought down, before we knew that there was to be any change in the discount rate which would be allowed on goods coming from the United Kingdom, making a general rise in the British price of commodities equal to the concessions being given by this legislation.

I am not making any charge and I do not know whether our United Kingdom friends had an inkling that this was going to happen. I hope it was because they felt that their costs were going to be a little higher and they should raise their prices from ten to twenty per cent. I had hoped when the cables came in that that was the condition obtaining in the United Kingdom, that their costs were higher and they had to have more money. But the rise in the level of costs represented in the main by this $100,000,000 odd coming from Great Britain is given back by this legislation, and the delivered price in Canada is much the same.

The minister and the leader of the opposition have both said that they did not receive many representations from the trade opposing or criticizing this particular legislation, and I think in part that that is the answer. I am happy that the United Kingdom is getting an extra ten or fifteen per cent during this critical time. Our Canadian people are happy to pay this extra amount and I suppose they are grateful to the administration for increasing the discount rate and thus reducing the cost of the commodities so that the general situation in the price levels with regard to exports to this country is as the United Kingdom dictates, the United Kingdom getting the extra dollars from the increase they have made in their prices. But at the same time I want the administration to know that there is a possibility of something happening which enables the United Kingdom producer of commodities ordinarily exported to Canada almost to equalize the benefits which we have passed on under this legislation.

A moment ago I referred to the fact that this is another breaking down, as it were, of the British empire trade agreements of 1932 and the Canada-United Kingdom agreements of 1937. So much so that Australia and New Zealand, which have been shipping goods to Canada in conformity with United Kingdom shipments to Canada, more or less in agreement, by quota or otherwise, now find it difficult to make shipments to Canada by reason of this particular concession to the United Kingdom. I do not complain of that. Australia will have to take it, and New Zealand likewise. I just make the observation so that it will be realized that this bill is of great importance, far-reaching in character, and will have to be given very serious consideration when hostilities cease. I suggest to the minister that if those engaged in industry in Canada have no idea that something is going to happen, how do our friends over there seem to know that something is going to happen?

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member give us the name of the commodity mentioned in the cable to which he refers?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I shall be glad to cable England and get permission to release the information if my hon. friend so desires.

The other question I wished to raise was why there should be such a difference between the discount rates on different commodities. Just why was one group singled out for 25 per cent while the main body was given 50 per cent, and why were boots and shoes favoured? It seems to indicate that some of the trade had an idea as to what was going on. I am sorry that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is not in his seat. Years ago, whenever boots and shoes were touched in any way whatsoever or there was even a suggestion of it in the house, we used to get the undivided attention of the hon. member then representing one of the Quebec city seats, now the Minister of Justice. If that little item of boots and shoes from the United Kingdom does not amount to anything, why were our producers of boots and shoes not put in the 50 per cent discount class along with the other manufacturers? I do not ask that that be done. I am just wondering why some seemed to be favoured. Looking over the explanation when the bill was introduced, I see no particular mention made of boots and shoes other than that the trade was small.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is just one point I should like to discuss briefly, and that is the suggestion that British exporters in some way had foreknowledge of these changes. That was impossible because the changes were not decided upon until a very short time before the budget was introduced—a day or two, I think, or two or three days.

The fact that some commodity prices quoted to importers here advanced about two weeks before the budget was introduced by the amount of duty reduction which came with the budget is easily explained. Prices have been advancing in Great Britain. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he said that there was not much difference in prices there.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): No—if I may interrupt. There is not much difference now in the general level of prices because the amount by which they have raised prices is taken care of by the discount.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is so. I have figures here showing price rises in some United Kingdom goods since September, 1939. Prices on these goods have advanced on an average 70 per cent between August 1, 1939, and February 28, 1941. Following are indices for some of the more important materials, taking August, 1939, as 100:

(August, 1939 = 100)

Cotton	156
Motor spirit	135
Copper	124
Spelter	177
Coal	134
Wool	167
Rubber	148
Lead	156
Tin	148
Farm crops	166

These figures are taken from the Economist of March 29, 1941. So there is nothing to give ground for any suspicion of a price rise two weeks before the budget.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): While that is quite true, at the same time there has been a price rise in Canada, but not to quite the same extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing like it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister suggest that the two events have no relation to each other, and that it was just intelligent anticipation over there of what was going to happen?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should think it was extremely improbable that those exporting the goods had anything in mind relating to our budget. Costs were going up and they were putting the prices up. This has been happening ever since August, 1939. This is what I said in committee of ways and means on May 20:

> It is believed that a discount of 25 per cent from the British preferential tariff should be adequate to enable British woollens and boots and shoes to remain competitive. These products are not handicapped to the same extent as most with respect to either raw materials or labour, and due to their relatively high value in relation to weight they are affected less by increased transportation costs. Moreover, there has not been apparent any tendency for imports from foreign countries to replace British woollens and boots and shoes in the Canadian market.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As I understand it, any change whatsoever in the United Kingdom-Canada trade agreement affecting either the remnant that is still in the empire trade treaty of 1932 or the main portion of the Canada-United States trade agreement must, by clause 17, be made by consultation. The minister says that he decided on this only one or two days before the budget was brought down, but I should imagine there was consultation between Canada and the United Kingdom before this change was made.

Mr. ILSLEY: You do not have to consult if you are reducing duties against the United Kingdom. Consultation is in cases where you would be depriving the other party of something by reducing his preference. Consultation would take place if you were increasing the duties against the other party or reducing the duties on goods from other countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that specifically mentioned in the covenant?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just look at the reason of the thing. There never was a clause in any agreement by which one country said: We will consult with you before we lower the duties on your goods coming into our country. There would be no point in a clause of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The intention was that the status quo under the agreement should be preserved and that no change should be made without consultation. It was not limited to an upward revision; it contemplates any revision, if I understand the section.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the minister can answer in one word: Did he consult the United Kingdom?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. There were representations made some months before by their trade representative here in Canada to the Department of Finance that certain concessions on certain commodities would be appreciated. That is a common thing.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There really were some representations made some two months before the bringing down of the budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some months before; I would not say two.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): No doubt the President of the Board of Trade in Great Britain, who enjoys cabinet rank, knew of these changes two months in advance, or knew that the trade representative here whom the minister mentioned had some suggestions that would be very welcome.

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably he knew that representations had been made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister anything to say with respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Danforth that we should do what we can to bring out branch factories? It seems to me that that would be wholly desirable if we could do it. I should like to have a reaffirmation that these proposed changes, like those made a year ago or in the last budget, are for the duration, and not beyond.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is covered by statute. Section 10 of the War Exchange Conservation Act provides that the act shall expire on the date of the issue of a proclamation under the War Measures Act declaring that a state of war no longer exists, or on such earlier date as may be fixed in a proclamation of the governor in council.

With regard to the moving of factories to Canada, I understand that the export of capital is not permitted by the foreign exchange control board; and I doubt whether we should attempt to take advantage of the situation in England by seeking the transfer of these industries permanently from Britain to Canada.

Mr. SLAGHT: How could they spare their key men?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have not very much to say on this section. Indeed, I have not very much to say with regard to any part of the bill. I wish, however, to state that this group is very much in favour of the principle of giving favoured treatment to exports from the United Kingdom at this time. For the life of me I cannot understand our friends to the right. At one moment one would think they had a monopoly of all loyalty and all patriotism, and the next moment they are haggling as to whether small concessions of this kind are going to continue after the war is over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member had better take that view of the government. They advanced it first.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. But I wonder whether they realize how much restriction on trade has had to do with the bringing on of the present war. If we are to have lasting peace in the future we shall have to concern ourselves with freedom of trade as well as with military matters. But this seems to be the philosophy of my hon. friends: we are to assist the British empire—in this instance, Great Britain—with all our might to win a military victory over Germany, and as soon as that victory is achieved we are to go back to the old system of trade wars, even as between the various parts of the British empire. Now, if, as is on everybody's tongue, we are to play a constructive part in the building of a "new world", we shall have to give up these old-fashioned ideas and be prepared to look much farther ahead than was evidenced, say, in the trade agreements of 1932.

I have before me a quotation from the London Times. No one can accuse that journal of radicalism, but I fear that in its progressiveness it is considerably ahead of my hon. friends on the right. In a recent editorial it says:

> It has become a truism to say that we cannot put the European house in order unless we put our own house in order, too. . . . Not all the demands of war economy, which have already revolutionized many of our ways of life and thought, will come to an end at the moment when the cease-fire is sounded.

Mr. SLAGHT: What is the date of that?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have not the date, but it is quite recent. The book is entitled, "Dynamics of Democracy", by Philip Child and John W. Holmes, with a foreword by Sir Robert Falconer.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) suggested to the Minister of Finance that he should not take much notice of representations made to him by members of this group. I do not know whether or not the minister has done so; that, however, is not important. We have approved as much of his policy as we found ourselves in accord with, and we have made certain suggestions and have hopes for the continuance of some of this legislation. The Minister of Finance may not have taken any notice of suggestions made by members of this group, but the minister will take notice of economic developments, and this house will take notice of economic developments; and if my hon. friends are not prepared to do the same, some other party will sit in the seats of the mighty in this country for many, many years to come.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is wishful thinking all right.

Mr. MacINNIS: Changes will come about, whether we like them or not, and if we allow our little vested interests to interfere with world progress, it is we who will suffer.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is quite true that I made the observation referred to by my hon. friend, with reference to the following statement of the minister as reported in Hansard, page 2980.

> Mr. Ilsley: I readily give the undertaking that the matter is only for the lifetime of the War Exchange Conservation Act. It is an amendment to that act; it is not a change in the tariff itself. That act expires automatically upon the issue of a proclamation that a state of war has ceased to exist.

In discussing another observation of a like nature, the leader of the party supported by the hon. member for Vancouver East expressed the hope and belief that, once these changes were made, they would remain on the statute book. I refute that. I have confidence in the assurance given by the Minister of Finance that these measures, which are put into effect now to help Britain for the duration of the war, will be subject to change when the war is over.

May I also take this opportunity to correct a misapprehension of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) as evidenced in his remarks a few moments ago. I have no intention of suggesting that any men, any equipment or any machinery should be moved from Great Britain during this war, or that anything else should necessarily be transferred here from the United Kingdom while the war continues. But when the war is over, if this legislation is not removed from the statute book, the hardheaded business man in England will think twice before he moves his plant to, or establishes a branch in, any country with which there is practically free trade with the United Kingdom—whether it be Canada, Australia, or anywhere else. Having that in mind, my view was that the removal of this legislation from the statute book at the close of the war would be a great encouragement to our friends from the United Kingdom to establish branch plants in this country—much as, during the last two or three decades, many branches of United States industries have been established in Canada, due to no other fact than that we do not permit free trade between the United States and Canada in the commodities which those industries supply.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member suggested that he was construing what I was thinking, but let me assure him that I had no thought that any suggestion of his was intended in any way to indicate that there would be the slightest endeavour to have British industry harmed at all. I assumed his intense loyalty and desire to help, and only that. It occurs to me that when hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps some of us on this side, attempt to evoke from the ministry assurances that bill after bill, measure after measure brought down during this emergency shall operate only during the war and not thereafter, we are indicating a sensitiveness in that regard which is not being shown even by the people throughout the country. Surely by this time all hon. members have realized that most of the measures with which we have occupied ourselves this session are strictly war measures, and that no administration should be asked to say that they will become inoperative on the termination of the war. Surely we should not be so supersensitive as to require a declaration of the kind. Sufficient unto the day is the legislation thereof, when we are in a dilemma of this kind. I am sure the hon. member who spoke a moment ago, with his studious mind, will at once recognize the analogy. I do not think we can assume that from now on most of the legislation brought down will be the result of present conditions; and leave it to the future, be it distant or near—we all hope it will be near—when all these measures may be reviewed by the parliament then entrusted with that task.

Mr. LEADER: I am prompted by the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to offer a word at this juncture. I hesitate to venture upon a discussion of anything so complex as fiscal matters. As a rule such things are difficult for farmers to understand, and even when they do understand them they find difficulty in discussing them as experts would. But speaking as a Liberal I want to say that I believe the vast majority of Liberals in this country will agree with members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party that this is a step in the right direction. I believe in Liberal policies and Liberal traditions, and I believe the statement I have just made will meet with the approval of most Liberals in this house. Certainly it is the opinion of those whom I represent that these policies not only should be adopted for the period of the war, but should be continued after the war as well. Two or three weeks ago I had occasion to chide some of my Conservative friends who had said that some restriction ought to be placed on United States goods entering this country. At that time I said statesmen were not talking that way now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the government is acting that way.

Mr. LEADER: The tendency is entirely in the other direction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not according to the legislation.

Mr. LEADER: I heard over the radio the speech delivered by Mr. Anthony Eden yesterday afternoon, and if the leader of the opposition did not hear it I suggest that he read it. Mr. Eden agreed with the view that has been expressed by Mr. Bevin, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Hull and Mr. Roosevelt, that the time has arrived when we must remove the restrictions on foreign trade. I can always understand the viewpoint of the Conservative party. I remember that in this house, in 1924, I said we could easily appreciate the Conservative policy because in season and out of season, in office and out of office, they have advocated high protection. At that time I went on to chide the Liberals because when they were out of office they talked of lower customs duties, but invariably when they assumed office they kept the tariff at about the same level as the Conservatives had it when they were in power. Now that the party with which I am affiliated is willing to step out and reduce these duties, I want to encourage it in its action, and I think that should be done by every Liberal member of this house. Back up this administration. We want the trade barriers removed; we want justice in this country. This very war we are fighting to-day was caused by restrictions on international trade. Perhaps now we are learning what we should have learned twenty years ago, that these trade restrictions have caused unrest, distrust and misery among the people of the world. I have heard it stated that this war was caused by the interests of capital and the interests of the people coming into conflict. We must remove the causes of war, and one of the very best things we can do is to accept the advice of the great statesmen of England and the United States; and I believe we have some in Canada as well.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will not call me to order I should like to say something that I may not have an opportunity to say again, and it will not take me more than two minutes. I want to compare the Canadian manufacturer with the British manufacturer. Why can the Canadian manufacturer not compete with the British manufacturer, even without a customs duty?

Mr. MacNICOL: Because he pays the men in his factory 50 per cent more than the British manufacturer pays.

Mr. LEADER: If they cannot compete they should go out of business.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. LEADER: I do not speak in the house very often, and I am sure hon. members do not begrudge me these few minutes. Perhaps I am out of order in these remarks, but as a farmer and live stock producer I think at this time the government should undertake to bring out from Great Britain as much as possible of the thoroughbred live stock at present in that country. Britain is the nursery for many of our best breeds of live stock, and the government should give consideration to this suggestion if they have not done so already, because it may be that millions of those grand animals will be slaughtered. We have plenty of room for them here in Canada; and as a live stock producer and breeder I am not afraid of competition from the old country.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether or not any disposition or desire has been shown by the British manufacturers to establish branch plants in Canada? Has there been any evidence of that?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Undoubtedly a great deal of thought has been given in the old country to the establishment of branch plants in Canada, though war conditions and difficulties in connection with foreign exchange have practically put a stop to anything of the sort for the time being.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Items deleted from schedule 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps this is the stage at which I should move an amendment I wish to propose, as follows:

1. That the said bill be amended by inserting the following as clause 2 and by renumbering the present clauses 2 to 6 inclusive, 3 to 7 inclusive:

2. Subsection one of section eight of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

8. (1) The governor in council in order to increase or conserve Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place or that the exports of any such individual, partnership or corporation may be maintained at levels higher than would otherwise obtain, or, in the case of any individual, partnership or corporation operating an oil well or oil wells, if, in the opinion of the governor in council such assistance is necessary in order that sufficient drilling of new wells may take place to maintain or extend the production of oil in Canada and if the Minister of Mines and Resources certifies that such drilling is in oil-bearing areas which give reasonable prospect of yielding producing wells. The provisions of any such agreements granting special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion shall be effective notwithstanding anything contained in the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act.

2. That clause 7 of the said bill be amended by substituting the word "four" for the word "three" in the third line thereof, and substituting the word "five" for the word "four" in the fourth line thereof.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of that last paragraph?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has to do with the renumbering of the other sections.

I will explain this amendment to the committee. Under section 8 of the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, the governor in council may enter into agreements for increasing Canada's supply of foreign exchange by expanding exports. That does not permit agreements for the conservation of foreign exchange by developing production here which would take the place of imports. It is not desired to take that power in a broad way, because it is a dangerous power and on the whole, I think, undesirable. I would not want to take it for the whole field, because probably it would be expected that the government would be entering into agreements with manufacturing industries and others to give them tax advantages in order to eliminate the competition of foreign imports, which would be protective legislation of a very extreme character.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In a word, it would be the bonus system.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is not desired to do that. But there is an acute situation in regard to oil, and we have adopted the principle of treating gold and oil on a separate basis under the Excess Profits Tax Act. After much consideration I decided to suggest that we ask parliament for power to make agreements with those who may be drilling for oil, which would enable us to make the same sort of concessions that we can make under the act as it is at present, with a view to getting a greater production of oil in Canada. Gold, of course, is subject to this act now, because gold is an export commodity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister was good enough to hand me a copy of this proposed amendment some days ago, and I have endeavoured to give it some study. The difference between the present section and the new section, as the minister has stated very succinctly, is that the present section gives the governor in council authority to enter into agreements for the purpose of increasing our supplies of foreign exchange. The additional power contained in the amendment is sought for the purpose of conserving our foreign exchange by an attempt to stimulate the production of a certain commodity, namely oil, to take the place of oil which otherwise would have to be imported. Of course I understand that the oil situation is acute at the moment, not because an ample quantity of crude oil is not available, but simply because transportation facilities are becoming increasingly difficult to secure. It may be said that this is entirely in the experimental stage; but can the minister tell us whether oil prospectors or producers have asked for it, or whether the suggestion emanated from the oil controller or from the governor in council. What was the genesis of the idea, and just what does the minister expect will result from it?

Mr. ILSLEY: It came to me from the oil controller, through the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I understand also that one or more of the companies made representations to the same effect. I do not know; I did not see anyone acting on behalf of those companies, but the representations were to the effect that under the present taxation laws, with wildcatting for oil so uncertain in its character, it was practically impossible for the companies to undertake it, but that much more of this drilling would be undertaken if some power was given to make concessions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I understand the theory, having had the benefit of a recent conversation with the oil controller. In effect it would appear that this is an indictment of the policy of excess taxation, in one limited field. The minister must know, I think, that the policy adopted with respect to gold mining has had the effect of freezing the business of prospecting. I am informed that this is so, that none of the promoters are willing to put out a dollar in prospecting for further gold ore, in view of what they consider to be the excessive taxation on gold mines. Personally I do not know whether or not that taxation is excessive. I am quite willing to see this go through as an experiment, to see what will result, but I hope the minister will be very careful in the exercise of the authority here given. With his native caution I have no doubt he will be careful, and it may be that no undesirable result will follow.

While we are dealing with this project, has the minister anything to report with respect to the powers that were conferred on the governor in council by the legislation now being enlarged, with respect to obtaining more foreign exchange by means of exports? What has been the result of that legislation? How many agreements have been entered into? Has there been any fruit in the way of increased foreign exchange, or is the legislation still in the experimental stage?

Mr. ILSLEY: Six draft agreements have been approved by order in council. I think that is all. There may have been one or two more about which I have forgotten, but I do know of six. So far as I am aware none of these agreements has been signed. I am under the impression that some steps have been taken in the faith that the agreements will be signed, but the actual result to date in the production of foreign exchange would be very small, if any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister care to indicate the type of business? If that is not desirable I shall not press it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did that before, in a general way, in answer to a question of the leader of the opposition. I believe the field in which we have the most negotiation is the export of pulp and paper. But the applications are by no means confined to these products. They extend to some manufactured goods, depending on the United States market and on some other factories as well. There is a large number—I do not know exactly how many—of applications pending at the present time. As has been pointed out, it requires considerable caution on the part of the department, because the power is great, and the improper exercise of it would not be charitably viewed. It would look as if it were a private deal between the government and a private company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On general principles this legislation, viewed from other aspects, is wholly undesirable, because there is a chance to play favourites. I am not suggesting that the minister will do anything of the sort. But in view of the rather critical situation as I understand it with respect to foreign exchange, and having regard to all our commitments, I believe the minister is justified in taking what I might call a flier in this field. I hope it will not be too detrimental to the treasury, and that it will be productive of some fruits for the foreign exchange position. We shall wait until another session to see what has happened. Was there not some provision, arrangement or undertaking whereby when these agreements are completed and become operative they will be made public?

Mr. ILSLEY: They must be tabled within fifteen days after the next session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They cannot be obtained until parliament is in session?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Let us suppose a company has drilled a well in each of the four years 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939. Each of the wells produces at the rate of one hundred barrels a day. On what basis would the standard of taxation be fixed?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is talking about the Excess Profits Tax Act?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes, I am coming to that. I assume these agreements would deal with that act. I want to know the basis for the excess profits tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: The standard profits are the average of four years. But there is a special formula relating to oil wells and gold mines. The principle of the special formula is that the excess that is taxed is not the excess earnings per dollar invested, but the excess earnings per unit produced. That rule is far more favourable to the producer than is the other rule. It would mean that if there is a large production in the taxation year, a production much larger than the average four base years, there is an assumed production of that increased amount in the standard period. I realize that this is a complicated matter, and I do not believe I shall be able to make it clear without spending considerable time on it. I should like to have the act before me when I am making the explanation. If the hon. member would like to see me about it later I should be pleased to go into it with him.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes, that would be better.

Amendment agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Following this amendment section 2 becomes section 3.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 (formerly section 3) agreed to.

On section 5—Schedule I further amended.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): We are now dealing with the old section 4, having to do with part II of schedule I. The idea most of us have in our minds when we are considering war exchange conservation is to do everything possible to get hold of United States dollars, to save our Canadian dollars going to the United States for United States products, and to assist the United Kingdom by providing her with Canadian or United States dollars, as the case may be. This item is an attempt, and in view of all that has taken place in the last ten years, I would say it is a very feeble attempt, to exercise some control over a situation which has developed more particularly since the war started. The condition goes even deeper than that. Even before the war we had our friends in the United States initiating legislation of a kind which affected very seriously Canada's position with regard to the items enumerated in section 5 of the bill.

The situation in the last five or six years is that our friends in the United States saw fit to impose on the commodities mentioned in this section, and all other commodities in that group, whether they were of the vegetable or animal kingdoms, when entering the United States, an excise duty of three cents per pound. Before the war the producing countries of the commodities recited in the section were north Africa, Nigeria, Straits Settlements and, in respect of coconut products particularly, Ceylon and the Gold Coast. Those products found their way in the crude state to the United Kingdom, where they were processed and whence they were exported to Canada. Brazil became an extensive producer of these commodities, and we know that China was perhaps one of the first producers in large quantities. Large quantities were obtained from the Dutch East Indies, British Guiana and the West Indies. These commodities were part and parcel of the empire trade agreement, and no change with respect to them could be made unless by special agreement. Later the United Kingdom-United States-Canada agreement carried a clause under which after consultation a change could be made and, as the minister mentioned, consultation was necessary only if the change was a revision upward.

In this northern Canadian zone the production of fats cannot be carried out as cheaply as in countries which produce fats from the palm and coconut trees and from pea or ground nuts, as they are called in India and China. In Canada fats are produced by raising hogs or cattle, whereas in these other countries they are produced from the palm tree, from ground nuts and copra, without the necessity of having to provide shelter or feed as in the case of fat from hogs and cattle. The result is that production costs are very low on vegetable oils.

In August, 1936, the United States imposed an excise duty of three cents per pound upon commodities of this type which had not been covered previously by processing taxes. The result was that there was backed up upon the world's markets a billion pounds of these commodities. Canada had free trade with the United Kingdom and other parts of the British empire and the market conditions in those countries were quite depressed. The result was that this depressed condition was passed on to Canada, and we found ourselves without any market for our animal fat production. Evidence was produced to show that we must take similar steps to those taken by the United States in 1936 to protect our primary producers. It was shown that if this were done the average return per animal would be from $1 to $2 in the case of cattle production, and about the same return per head to the producers of some 8,000,000 hogs.

After a lengthy investigation, a recommendation was made to this house on April 13, 1939, showing that the revenues of the country would be enhanced by $4,700,000 if these measures were put into effect. The tariff board recommended a tax of three cents per pound on fats used for shortening and two cents per pound on inedible fats. This estimated revenue was based upon a consumption of 125,000,000 pounds of edible fats and 65,000,000 pounds of inedible fats. The second point is the fact that there would be an increased return to those producing cattle and hogs.

Another important consideration was the fact that there would be conservation of waste. Because there was practically no market for animal fats, the tendency to waste had grown up. The market used to be in Chicago, but we could not get into that market because of the imposition of the three cents excise tax.

This legislation is being introduced in an effort to conserve foreign exchange. Prior to the war these commodities were purchased largely from the United Kingdom and British empire countries. That practice had some merit because from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000 of Canadian funds went into the British market. When the war started we were all anxious that as many Canadian dollars as possible should go to the United Kingdom, and the adoption of the recommendation of the tariff board was not particularly pressed. Great Britain, however, soon required all the fats she could get and exports were stopped. In 1939 38 per cent of our imports came from the United Kingdom; in 1940 these had dropped to 14 per cent; in 1941 they had dropped to 2 per cent, and the minister has told us that they are now negligible. What obtains with regard to the United Kingdom, obtains also with regard to empire countries. The difficulty is that these products are still coming in to the tune of 208,000,000 pounds from Brazil, China and the Dutch East Indies. United States dollars must be found to pay for these commodities. Whereas $1,000,000 in United States funds was sufficient to provide for our imports in 1936 and 1937, I think I am safe in saying that to-day United States dollars are required for 95 per cent of the imports of these commodities.

The minister has said that he has not the figures for 1941, but we have the figures for 1940 which show that $7,000,000 in United States funds were used to pay for the imports of this commodity out of a total import value of some $8,000,000. To-day we are forced to provide United States dollars to pay for a commodity previously purchased from the United Kingdom and British empire countries.

The next point is the loss of a revenue of $5,000,000. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking in the house last night he said that our party had no alternative to offer. A definite alternative with regard to the raising of revenue is the putting into effect of the recommendation of the tariff board on reference No. 99, which was tabled in April, 1939. This would provide a revenue of at least $5,000,000 per year, and there would be an indirect benefit through the conservation of waste.

Why should we bring in 65,000,000 pounds of inedible fats from Brazil and China to provide for our soap production when the fat production of this country is not being fully utilized? I was not at Petawawa this week when hon. members visited that camp, but one hon. member told me that he saw evidence of waste. He saw a bucket of fat going into the garbage can, from which no return could be had. The proper conservation of waste in this country would replace at least 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 pounds of this particular commodity. When this legislation is passed I hope that those charged with the responsibility of issuing permits will see to it that everything is done to conserve and use our own supply rather than to permit these commodities to come in without restriction.

The only excuse we have for not adopting this recommendation is that it would affect the United Kingdom agreements. At a previous session my hon. friend said that our friends in the United Kingdom did not desire such legislation. There is no import from any of the British possessions, and we are in the embarrassing position of having to supply seven to eight millions of United States dollars, and also of sitting here as a parliament and, one time out of a hundred, not adopting a recommendation which came from a body which is a creature of this parliament, namely, the tariff board, which made its recommendation respecting the application in reference No. 99. I do hope that those charged with issuing the permits will give very serious thought to the permits they issue.

When it was asked in this house how many United States dollars were supplied to take care of the imports of these commodities the reply, in effect, was that the bureau of statistics kept the figures and the foreign exchange control board did not keep a duplicate set of figures on these different commodities. A little generosity on the part of the government, or a little consideration for the member who asked the question, would have resulted in the information being readily supplied. Only about five importers of any consequence import these commodities, and they import ninety per cent of the total imports. In fifteen minutes a clerk in the foreign exchange control board could run over the imports of these five large organizations, whose names are all on Hansard—I remember putting them on myself some years ago—and the government could have obliged the house by giving an answer without our having to criticize in these strenuous times and demand that the information be brought down. The answer given to that particular question was not fair to the house, Mr. Chairman. It might have been the truth that the bureau of statistics compiled the records, but the government could have obliged us by giving the main items. The minister knows them, because he referred to them the other night when he introduced his resolution. Here is a good opportunity to save some foreign exchange and at the same time help our general economic position.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is one statement to which I should like to take exception, and that is that there are no imports of vegetable oils now from the British empire.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Four-tenths of one per cent from the British empire.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is about 18 per cent of the total imports of 1940.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I said 1941.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are in 1941 now.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Three months.

Mr. ILSLEY: I see—the calendar year 1940.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I gave these figures: 38 per cent, 14 per cent, and this year 2 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Last year it was 18 per cent, and the value of imports from the British empire was $1,519,897 and from foreign countries $7,374,907. We were satisfied it would be useless to take up this question with the United Kingdom government, and it might have been undesirable to do so even if it had not been useless. It was useless because the United Kingdom government prizes exports from other parts of the sterling area practically as much, if not just as much, as it prizes exports from the United Kingdom itself.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I quite agree that the United Kingdom or the colonial office in London prizes trade on behalf of the colonies. With regard to the minister's observation about 18 per cent coming in, that was for the calendar year 1940?

Mr. ILSLEY: That related to the calendar year 1940.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The imports are practically nil now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is nothing in our relationship with the United Kingdom, or the British empire for that matter, which would preclude us from taking advantage of the ideas which the tariff board have with regard to imports from foreign countries. There is at present a tariff of 10 per cent against goods coming in from foreign countries, but there is nothing, as I see it, to preclude us from carrying out the board's recommendation and imposing this duty on goods coming in from foreign countries. It would indirectly help the general economic situation by bringing into the dominion treasury from four to five million dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: The tariff board's recommendations were for an excise tax or processing tax on the oil content of soap and edibles. The foreign ones could not be segregated. If a tax like that were imposed it would mean the whole oil content, wherever the oil came from. It would be impossible to apply the board's recommendations to imported oil only, because no one could tell what proportion of the oil in shortening was imported from foreign countries and what was from the British empire. Therefore the recommendation in that form could not be applied to foreign oils only.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There are practically no imports from the United Kingdom now.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The imports for the three months ending March of this year are practically negligible. I do not know why we cannot get the figures. What were the imports for January, February and March of this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not got them.

Section 5 (formerly section 4) agreed to.

On section 6—Schedule II amended.

Mr. HAZEN: I was going to ask a question about section 5. A number of the items in schedule II are being deleted. Do they then have to pay a higher rate of duty? For example, there is item 228 in schedule II, soap powders, and so on. Under schedule II they paid a duty of 10 per cent. What duty will they pay now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Schedule II is a schedule of items which come in from the United Kingdom free or at reduced rates.

Mr. HAZEN: What will they pay now? Formerly the duty was 10 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are covered by a previous section of the act. I have here a column of schedule II rates and a column of the rates resulting from section 1. Section 1 is very comprehensive. It covers most of the goods which are imported from the United Kingdom, so that when we take a number of items out of schedule II, they are covered by section 1. I may state the results, if the hon. gentleman is interested. They are as follow:

Item No.	Schedule Two Rate Per cent	Rate resulting from section one Per cent
220a	10	8¾
220b	10	10
228	10	10
X284	15	10
288	10	10
429b	10	7½
429e	10	7½
439	15	10
439a	10	7½
445f	10	7½
445g	10	7½
445k	10	7½
451b	10	8¾
572	25	15
573	10	7½

Mr. HAZEN: In every case there is either a reduction or it remains the same? In no case is there an increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Section 6 (formerly section 5) agreed to.

On section 7—Coming into force.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): This section is numbered 6 in the bill; it now becomes section 7.

Mr. ILSLEY: You will note, Mr. Chairman, that two words are changed; "three" becomes "four" and "four" becomes "five" in that section.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): That is the second part of the amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 88, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The intention of this paragraph is to allocate the betting tax to the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Tax on horse-race bets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection to the proposed tax. But as to section 6 of the new part II, to whom are the returns to be made, and to whom is the tax to be paid? On the face of it the answer is not clear. Section 6 of part II says:

> Every person liable for taxes under this part shall file each day a true return of the total bets made on that day and the amount of tax due by him.

Is the return to be made to the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of National Revenue has charge of the administration of the measure, and the return will be made to whomsoever the minister designates.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the assumption, but where does it say that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it is necessary to specify it, where the minister has the administration of the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is by implication?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is provided in the national revenue act that the minister shall have the administration of the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Should it not be stated in the statute to whom the return and the payments should be made?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. Perhaps it should be the local collector, the nearest collector. I think it would be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister is of the opinion that the machinery is there, I am satisfied.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—"British company."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this affect Lloyds? I understand from the inspector of insurance that it does not.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. It does not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to get into a discussion on a question of jurisdiction or anything of the kind. The conflict between the dominion and at least one of the provinces has been an old stand-by for almost as long as I can remember. What is the attitude of the Ontario government with respect to this?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not favourable, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That seems to be the position we are drifting into, does it not? However, let us not get into that discussion to-day. It is a wide subject to open up in any event, and I am certainly not taking any part in this family quarrel. But it is quite clear that this does not apply to Lloyds and that the deletion of the last section in the present law, that is to say, British companies, will not include in the definition Lloyds or any similar organization, and policies issued by them will not be taxable under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. When I said "not favourable" I had no reference to any attitude towards Lloyds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not so construe it.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Insurance tax, British or foreign company or exchanges.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The elimination of the words "or of any province thereof" is consonant with the preceding section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the intention?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the two go together.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Tax on long distance telephone calls.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much increased revenue is expected from this additional tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is estimated that the increased rates will produce $600,000 additional revenue in the full year, $550,000 in the rest of the present fiscal year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is understood that this is just an additional tax on business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not altogether.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The major part of it is. Let there be no misunderstanding about it, this is a tax on business. I suppose the government itself will pay something, but it is essentially an additional tax on business for revenue purposes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—New part V—definitions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad the minister has made this applicable to officers, clerks and servants of the government. It goes on to say, "or the government of any province." Does the minister anticipate any difficulty with the provinces over that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not anticipate any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here the government is putting its own officers on exactly the same level as those of the provinces. It is not dealing in quite the same way in some other jurisdictions and in the taxing of some other sources of revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: These sections are in the act now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The underlined parts are new, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to buses, in many places buses in the city have taken the place of street cars. Is the tax paid in that case?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an exemption on tickets up to fifty cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has not thought of taxing taxicabs?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under paragraph (b), the word "vessel" includes any ship or boat of any kind whatsoever whether propelled by steam or otherwise. Does that include a motor boat that might be carrying only one passenger or perhaps at the most five? I am referring to small boats that operate on the lakes or as small ferries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: If "yes" is the answer in connection with (b), I notice that (c) eliminates the tax on any bus carrying less than ten passengers. "Bus" includes any automotive vehicle of any kind whatsoever adapted or adaptable for passenger use with seating capacity of more than ten persons. I am not suggesting that there should be a tax on passengers on small buses or taxicabs, but why exempt motor vehicles that may carry as many as ten passengers? There is no tax there, but there is a tax on any small boat that may be operating on the Muskoka lakes or elsewhere, carrying one, two, three or four passengers, and always less than ten.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason for the bus definition is to exclude passenger cars. I did not realize that there was a similar necessity in the other case. I do not think there would be much taxi work by small boats.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is quite a lot of it on the small lakes around Muskoka and Parry Sound, and elsewhere. For instance, there is a good deal of it from Port Carling to some other small port, perhaps, where a motor boat would carry three or four passengers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have some information in regard to commuters who travel on weekly or monthly tickets to and from the city from outside points. The single ticket would be less than fifty cents, but if the passenger bought a book of weekly or monthly tickets I presume he would have to pay the tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, is that clear?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the way you intend to administer it?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the way it is administered. The question arose as soon as the resolution was introduced and we straightened it out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The department is collecting the tax now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it is not charging on tickets that cover more than one fare, where one fare would be less than the exempted amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that clear in the statute?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: In reference to paragraph (b) do I understand that a motor boat carrying on a passenger service, taking one or more passengers, is liable to the tax? Will those who purchase tickets to travel in such small boats be taxed?

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct. Where the motor boat charge is more than fifty cents, the tax will be collected. In a great many of the smaller transportation companies, transportation on inland lakes is carried on by small motor boats, taking a small number of people considerable distances sometimes, and quite often they have not the capacity of even ten.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have already planned a trip to the Northwest Territories, and it will require me at Waterways to engage a motor boat. For instance, I shall have to go down the Athabaska river twenty-five or thirty miles to make a survey of tar sands. I am quite willing to pay the tax, and I am not inquiring on behalf of myself; I am referring to myself simply by way of illustration.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member would be purchasing a right to travel; it is the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my province there is one method of transportation which has not been drawn to the attention of the department. On the lower stretches of the Saint John river the provincial government operates, for the benefit of those communities, a ferry service in which round-trip tickets are sold, which will aggregate more than fifty cents for passenger and vehicle. Take the Gagetown ferry in Queens county. You buy a round-trip ticket, and it will cost you more than fifty cents. Will there be a tax on that?

Mr. GIBSON: If it is more than fifty cents, the tax applies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In any event the tax will apply?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be very popular in that part of the country!

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean that—where a book of tickets covers more than a score of round trips?

Mr. GIBSON: No; but where one round-trip ticket is more than fifty cents.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Suppose you go to Timagami, going twenty miles down the lake, and you hire a motor boat from a transportation company. The minister knows what I am talking about. Do you pay a tax on that? I did not hear the minister say whether tickets bought by the month would be taxable, where the one-way fare would be less than fifty cents.

Mr. GIBSON: I was in Timagami last week and I was assessed the tax. It was put into effect and was working there. As regards a book of tickets, the tax does not apply where one ticket is less than fifty cents.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much did the minister pay? I ask so that I may be prepared.

Mr. JACKMAN: With regard to people who commute from twenty-five miles outside the city, where the charge, even with a book of tickets, is in excess of fifty, sixty or seventy cents, these people, a number of whom work in Toronto, will be under a hardship. Many of the people who ride in these buses are girls working in offices or young men who hold junior positions. If they are subject to the tax it will be quite a hardship on them, because already transportation is one of the big items in their budgets. I wonder whether there is a strong reason for fixing the amount at fifty cents, because fifty cents would take one only about fifteen miles on the ordinary bus, whereas if the limit were a dollar, and there would be no serious loss to the department, it would be a great help to a good many people who work in the larger cities, coming from points twenty-five or thirty miles distant. The fifty-cent limit will catch a good many people who have to travel of absolute necessity to their places of business, and some people cannot afford the additional burden. Could the limit not be raised?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am surprised to learn that there are people with small means who are paying more than fifty cents or a dollar a day to get to their work. That must be a mistake.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am thinking particularly of Woodbridge, which is just nineteen miles outside the city. Sometimes I go six miles further and the single fare is seventy cents. I am sure the fare for many of these people must be more than fifty cents. There are people who go ten miles north of that point, commuting every day, and this tax will strike them hard. There are people who come from Aurora, and there are a number of small towns round Toronto that are twenty-five miles away.

Mr. GILLIS: We have heard a great deal of controversy with regard to the application of the tax to members of the armed forces travelling on railways. Are all members of the forces exempted from this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member will find a proviso on page four of the bill, at line eight, to the effect that the tax shall not apply to members of the forces proceeding on leave.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister may not be aware of it, but this question of commuters is one that affects a great many people. The hon. member for St. John-Albert knows more about it than I do, but there are many people in Hampton, New Brunswick, working in Saint John, coming in every day on round-trip tickets costing more than fifty cents. Under this provision they will have to pay the tax. This is a direct tax on employees. Could the fifty-cent limit not be raised?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that there has been no complaint.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have heard about it. But even if there is no complaint, that is no reason why we should impose onerous taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The complaints must be extremely limited. At the outset there was a complaint because people were under the impression that the tax applied to books of tickets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that has been clarified?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and since then there has been no complaint.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—When taxes not payable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under section 6 a great many sections are dealt with. Does the minister think an annual licence will give more control?

Mr. REID: Must everyone in a ticket office procure a licence?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Any person selling tickets may be required to take out a licence.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is one licence for the Canadian Pacific and one for the Canadian National.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I revert to section 6 for a moment? Paragraph (c) gives the definition of a bus as follows:

(c) "bus" includes any automotive vehicle of any kind whatsoever adapted or adaptable for passenger use with seating capacity for more than ten persons.

The Banff national park is in my constituency, and we are confronted with the situation that thousands of booking agencies are selling all-expense tours which include not only transportation by railroad but also sightseeing tours incidental to the stop-off at Banff, Lake Louise, Jasper or any other of those world famous resorts. It is the practice of those people to travel by bus from point to point within the parks.

The effect of this definition is an unfair differentiation in that a person who travels in a ten-passenger bus would be required to pay a tax, whereas a person who travels exclusively in a private car would pay no tax for that right. There is some unfairness there which should be cleared up. The tax ought to have general application, rather than single out only the ten-passenger bus. In other words, the poor person who travels in the ten-passenger bus must pay a tax, whereas the person travelling from Banff to Lake Louise in a private car pays no tax.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): The hon. member seems to assume that a man travelling in a private car does not pay any transportation charges at all. I understand it requires about thirty fares to have a private car—unless one is a cabinet minister.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have sent the minister a memorandum on the point, and I should like to have it cleared up. I appreciate the fact that these booking agencies have already booked thousands of dollars worth of transportation by tourists, a traffic which we are so anxious to encourage. What will happen? Are we going to insist that companies and individuals who live by this means of conducting tourists through national parks, and who gain a most precarious livelihood, must assume the tax? Or, perforce, shall we go back to the United States tourists, for the encouragement of whom we are spending thousands of dollars, and say to them, "You must now come through with an additional ten per cent on your ticket"? We are spending large sums of money to encourage those people to see the beauties of this country, and to see it at its best. What will be the result on the very trade we are so anxious to encourage in every way possible?

Mr. STIRLING: Is it not a fact that in connection with those very sight-seeing tours to which the hon. member has referred there are numbers of vehicles which do exactly the same service and do not carry ten passengers?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Therefore a distinction is made between the large and the small vehicles?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, quite. Probably there are more of the smaller than of the larger ones.

Mr. GIBSON: When tourists originate in the United States, tickets would be sold in the United States. No tax is charged on tickets sold outside Canada. In the same way, tickets sold in Canada for tours commencing in Canada but going outside the country are taxed here.

Mr. EDWARDS: That answers the difficulty so far as foreign tourists are concerned. But how are those people going to be identified? As I understand it, all they carry is a certificate from a booking agent. That is presented to the bus operator in the national park by the tourist, indicating that he has bought and is entitled to free transportation by bus.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do they not give a transportation check which is collected, and then collect his money?

Mr. EDWARDS: No. I believe it is only a notification or advice that a person is entitled to such transportation. For instance, I have in mind the Rocky Mountain tour conducted by the Brewster company. A booking agency in New York will send advice after this fashion: "Mr. and Mrs. So-and-so will arrive at Banff at such-and-such a time. They will be entitled to transportation from Banff to Lake Louise"—or Banff to Radium—"and they have paid the amount required, in accordance with your tariff." Those people may not have more than an advice slip. They have not a ticket, so-called.

Mr. GIBSON: In that event, if the tourist had an advice slip which at one point or another he would have to exchange for a ticket, the tax would be collected when the exchange was made, the exchange being made in Canada. If he has to exchange his ticket, or right, or whatever it is called, for a ticket in Canada, then at that point the tax would be collected.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The same would apply to tourists visiting the inland lakes in Ontario. The tourist motoring to Timagami and then wanting to go down the lake would have to pay a tax. He would be in the same boat as the tourist travelling through the national parks of the west.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the minister suggest that if there is passage of a coupon or warrant from a booking agent in New York, from the tourist to the bus operator in the park—and remember, there is no exchange of money; it is an exchange of a right in the form of an advice slip or coupon—a tax must be paid?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes; it would have to be paid there, the reason being that the company which issues the ticket has to account for the tax on each ticket sold. If a company in Canada is issuing that ticket, it has to account to the government for the tax, no matter how payment for the ticket has been arranged.

Mr. EDWARDS: But the ticket was sold in the United States to a tourist in New York city, and he paid the money to the booking agency at that point. Then that booking agency in New York—or Chicago, as the case may be—gives the railroad ticket to the tourist who has purchased it. The agent may say, "That entitles you to a ride on a bus operated by one of the bus companies"—Brewsters, probably—"in our national park. You may ride from Jasper to Lake Louise, over the celebrated icefields highway."

There might be a possible evasion of the tax. It is inconsistent, because when a person rides in a two-passenger private car no tax is paid. If, however, ten or fifteen persons get into a vehicle on a certain day, and if Brewsters say, "You will travel in this sightseeing bus", a tax will have to be collected from the passengers. It is manifestly unjust, unfair and discriminatory, and I am afraid it will be prejudicial. I am reliably informed that hundreds of thousands of all-expense tours have been bought and paid for, and booked through our national parks. I am afraid this legislation will have a detrimental effect on the very trade we are so anxious to encourage. Therefore I recommend most strongly to the minister the advisability of either doing away with it altogether, so far as United States tickets are concerned, or—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should they not pay it, if we pay it?

Mr. EDWARDS: Many of them have paid already.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the United States they have a tax which is to some extent analogous to this. If you buy a ticket in Miami for Havana, they charge you a landing tax at Miami and at Havana, which must be paid in advance. Apparently you get no service in return for this tax. I paid it under protest, but my protest was of no avail.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish to leave the hon. gentleman unsatisfied as he obviously is, but I am afraid a complete answer cannot be given. It would be out of the question from the point of view of administration to start collecting a transportation tax from taxicabs or taxi-drivers. It is simply a matter of starting at the place where it can be done, and the line is drawn at ten-passenger vehicles. The same line is drawn in other legislation to make a distinction between passenger cars and buses. While there may be some inconvenience and irritation where tourists are using both types of vehicles, I do not see how this can be overcome. The amount would not be very great, and it is possible that it could be adjusted by the agency making some advance arrangement. It is a comparatively minor matter.

Mr. EDWARDS: I appreciate the difficulty. Our national parks are offered as an attraction for tourists, and I was wondering whether this tax could not be eliminated for this year when the vehicles are used within the parks. I am thinking of the possibility of building up irritation in the minds of the public of the United States.

Mr. GIBSON: The bureaux can adjust that by issuing a ticket instead of something to be exchanged for a ticket. They can simply go ahead and issue a ticket to wherever the purchaser desires to travel and by whichever route he desires to use.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are you not going to get into a great deal of difficulty in connection with motor boats? You define a bus as a vehicle which carries more than ten passengers, but I think you are going to have a good deal of trouble in this connection. You may have a man with a boat with an outboard motor, and I suppose he will be subject to this tax if he takes a passenger for a ride?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes. Anyone who uses a motor boat for hire is subject to certain definite regulations as to the equipment he must have and so forth. He must buy a licence and carry out the regulations, and I do not think there will be any difficulty in collecting this tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have travelled a good deal in the north country, by both motor boat and canoe. I have hired a motor boat with two Indians to go away for two or three weeks, for which I paid $25 a day which included tents, food, gasoline and everything. All I had to do was to walk across the portages. Would a motor boat used under such circumstances be taxable?

Mr. GIBSON: I would not say that it is a motor boat used for hire; I would say that you have rented the boat and are operating it yourself.

On section 13—Interpretation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall preface what I have to say by advising the minister that I know his problem. On the other hand, I have a duty to perform. I have in my hand a sheaf of telegrams which I have received, all protesting against this tax on amusements. I shall present them to the committee, and it will be for the minister to deal with them. The first, which is from Mr. McColgan of Toronto, reads:

> I protest against proposed twenty per cent amusement tax on hockey. This game is a source of entertainment to millions of radio fans throughout Canada and the tax may force the closing of rinks and deprive the people of pleasure and also employment.

I have another one from Frank Ayerst of Toronto, and also one from Sylvanus Apps, who is, I believe, the manager of the Maple Leaf hockey team. The latter reads:

> Although realizing the urgent need of increased taxation I feel that the twenty per cent tax proposed by the government on Canadian sport entertainment is too severe and would ask your cooperation with Mr. Conny Smythe in his efforts to have this prohibitive measure reduced.
> Respectfully yours,
> Sylvanus Apps.

I have one from Mr. Jack Gavin, one from the Toronto and associated skating clubs, one from W. A. Hewitt, one from Walter I. Earle, and one from W. C. Moore. I am sure that my colleagues have all received similar telegrams.

Mr. ILSLEY: All of us.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is one particular case I have in mind, the circus which is put on each year by Rameses Temple in Toronto for the benefit of crippled children. This runs for a week or ten days, and the proceeds are handed over, I believe, to the Sick Children's hospital, for the benefit of crippled children. Would a circus of that kind be taxed?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is for my colleague to rule on individual cases. We must be careful about these advance rulings. The matter is pretty fully covered by the exemptions to be found on page 9 of the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I also received telegrams from people associated with horse racing. Not being a patron of this sport, I cannot say much about it, but I do know that considerable good is done by way of breeding high class horses, especially for military work, although this may not be so important in recent years.

I should like to say one more word about the tax on picture shows. I have received numerous letters and telegrams about this, but perhaps I had better leave the discussion of this matter to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) who is more familiar with it.

We all know that hockey, in winter, is a great source of revenue, of United States dollars, which are brought back by Canadians playing in big-league hockey in the United States. Those who have written to me about this tax say that it will undoubtedly have some bad effect on our great national sport of hockey, which has done so much not only to promote the health of our young Canadians but to bring into Canada United States dollars. However, the problem is the minister's. I do not know enough about any of these sports to be able to speak with authority about any one of them except to say that all sport tends to develop health, strength and sportsmanship in our young Canadians, and also in Canadians who are not young.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to say a word particularly from the point of view of how this tax will affect amateur sport in this country. I do so because I am strongly of opinion that this tax, if it should apply to the case of amateur sport, will have a detrimental effect so far as character building, health building and morale building of the young people of Canada are concerned. I notice that in the exemptions provided for on page 9 of the bill, according to subsection 2 of section 122, the tax shall not apply to any performance held by a club for recreation provided that it is operated exclusively for non-profitable purposes and that no part of the revenue inures to the benefit or private gain of any person as proprietor or member thereof et cetera. There is a great deal of confusion with regard to this tax, in the minds of those public-spirited people who are sponsoring amateur sport in this country, football, baseball, and particularly so far as I am concerned, coming from the western provinces, amateur hockey. If this tax is not intended to apply to amateur hockey and other amateur sports, I think that should be stated clearly at this time.

I have particularly in mind the case in my own city, where the citizens banded together and by dint of very great effort managed to erect a rink. It is purely a community enterprise. That rink provides hockey for the various types of leagues in the city all the way from hockey for the very young boys, ten years of age, up to the seniors. We have our pee-wee league, our juvenile, junior and senior teams, and some commercial leagues. In addition, there is public skating, and fancy skating carnivals are put on from time to time. The junior and juvenile hockey, the general public skating and fancy skating could not possibly carry on if the rink did not raise revenue from senior hockey, and senior hockey has to be built up to the point where it will bring in enough revenue to carry the cost of operating the rink, so that it in turn can take care of these other activities for the benefit of the younger people and the general public, and these exhibitions which do not bring in much revenue. The senior hockey games draw fairly large attendances and the money is used, first, to provide for the general upkeep of the rink; second, to provide for expenses of the hockey team; third, to pay something on account of the capital indebtedness which was incurred as a result of the erection of that building. A great deal of the money was raised by public subscription in small and large amounts and we still have considerable capital expenditure to take care of.

Like the hon. member for Davenport, I have received quite a number of telegrams in connection with this matter, and I should like the privilege of reading one which was addressed to me by the president of Saskatoon Arena Limited, which succinctly puts the situation. He says:

Relative to 20 per cent tax on amateur hockey, this undoubtedly is going to cripple activities of the Saskatoon Arena Rink Company which you know is a community enterprise and is entirely backed by public subscription. We have a capital investment of over hundred fifty thousand and finding it difficult to make rink carry its overhead. Source of profit is that derived from hockey, and with this tax our receipts will undoubtedly be reduced. The other activities such as public skating et cetera are so small compared with receipts from hockey that if our hockey gates are impaired we will have to close the rink up, and if this restriction is on for a number of years your guess is as good as mine as to what would happen to the rink company.

If that rink has to close, it will stop all these other activities that have to do with skating and hockey in the city of Saskatoon, and I presume the same thing will happen in other parts of the country. Hockey is undoubtedly one of our greatest national pastimes; and when we consider how it has built up the character and health of our young people until they are the fine type of Canadian that Canada is calling for to-day to fight our battles, I think we should consider the matter seriously before we impose a tax that will cripple these activities and hinder the development of that type of young Canadian.

Mr. TUSTIN: I agree with what the hon. member for Saskatoon City has said, and if the minister would reconsider this tax I feel sure that he would change his mind about imposing this tax on all forms of entertainment and sport. There is no reason why he should not be able to reduce this impossible tax. Within the last number of days I have received a number of communications, particularly from small theatres in country towns, and in almost every instance I am advised that the attendance since the 19th of May has decreased by approximately 50 per cent. I drew this to the attention of the minister immediately after he made his budget speech, and again a week or so ago, and I draw it to his attention again now to urge him to reconsider the matter and impose this tax on a sliding scale. I can see no reason why it could not be put on a sliding scale; there would be no inconvenience in the collection.

In my opinion, 20 per cent of the gross is an impossible tax. Has the minister ever calculated what that means in dollars and cents? A small theatre, taking in $400 a week, must pay to the federal government $80 a week, or over $4,000 a year, besides paying taxes to the municipality, to the province, and to the owners of copyright for the music used.

I do not know that much is to be gained by occupying more of the time of the committee, but I again urge as strongly as I can that the minister give further consideration to this proposal before the bill is passed, and do something to relieve the plight in which many of the smaller sporting organizations and theatres will find themselves as a consequence of this tax. I do not believe there is any person in this country who is unwilling to be taxed, but it is impossible for a great many to carry on if 20 per cent of their gross receipts is absorbed in taxation. I wonder whether, upon further deliberation, the minister will not realize that he is going to kill the goose which lays the golden eggs.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to say a few words on this matter, and at the same time request a little information. To my mind the tax is pretty severe, and I believe that the minister, if he insists upon it, will come up against the law of diminishing returns, and reap less from this high rate than if he had imposed a lower tax.

While I have been sitting here I have jotted down a few figures. Let us take the case of the Maple Leaf hockey club in Toronto. At the present rate of taxation, supposing there are thirty-two games a year and the average attendance is 10,000, the additional revenue will amount to $64,000. But if the minister reduced the rate of taxation by half and made it 10 per cent, he would get $32,000. By taxing all these amusements, more revenue will be obtained, but certainly some of the consequences will be unfortunate. I suppose that my constituency, located in the centre of the city of Toronto contains as many theatres as any riding in the dominion. I have received telegrams from a number of them, and they are apprehensive of a serious falling-off in attendance if the proposed rate of tax is adopted.

I notice that certain provisions are made for exemption. Let us say that a contest is staged by a club for the purposes of recreation, that no part of the returns inures to the benefit or profit of any person as proprietor or member thereof or shareholder therein or to the person or persons organizing, promoting, or managing such contest. I am reminded of the Argonaut rowing club. People hold shares in the club, and various sports are engaged in, but football is what they depend upon to pay their debts. As a matter of fact, just now they are in the red. On the other hand, there is no doubt that financial benefits inure to a limited number of people. I have in mind particularly the trainers. Then there are the holders of shares. I do not know whether there is any bond issue. I know that the rowing activities of the club are supported by the proceeds of the club's football. What will be the position of the club under these circumstances?

Or take the Toronto skating club. No member derives any personal profit from the skating operations, yet the club is a corporation which has issued a certain number of shares, and there are people, such as the professionals who train persons to skate, who obtain some benefit. The club puts on a carnival each year, part of the proceeds of which, I assume, go to pay off the bonds, and part is contributed to charity.

Mr. BENCE: Some has to go to the rink.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A great deal goes to the rink. So-called amateur hockey to-day is amateur professional hockey, and under these circumstances the players benefit to a certain extent. But there is no manager receiving any benefit, and in many instances the citizens put up money to have these clubs carry on for the good of the sport. Under the clause as I read it, however, some sports are going to benefit.

While I am on my feet, let me say a word in respect of the legitimate theatre. Very few such theatres are now left in this country, and they have a hard enough time in carrying on, as they do, for the sake of art. Are they to be taxed or not? I do not suppose that they make any money.

A great many people are apprehensive about the effects of this measure. I have in mind the hockey situation in Toronto. It starts with the junior Midgets and goes right up the line to senior hockey. I do not know how many dozens of leagues have been organized. In some instances there are people, such as the men who train these boys, who derive benefit from the proceeds of the "gate." But nobody else makes any profit. This tax will be a great detriment to organizations of this kind. I do not believe it should apply to them.

The minister should give us some idea of what will happen. Just what people will be taxed? After all, in his budget speech he said that he was going to increase the revenues of the country by $8,000,000. By cutting down the tax on theatres and, perhaps, levying a reasonable tax on such things as professional hockey, which will bring in quite a considerable amount, as well as such other things as it is proposed to tax in this bill, he will not be so far short of his $8,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to add my voice to those who are opposing this tax. I have spent a considerable number of years of my life—over thirty—in close connection with athletic work of all kinds, and I believe I can say, quite conservatively, that athletic sport is one of the most valuable things a community can have. The development of the body, the mind and the spirit of the young people who participate in athletics—basketball, wrestling, boxing, hockey and so forth—is of such great importance that we can very well afford to deprive ourselves of a little revenue in order to encourage that form of culture.

The general morale of the people who enjoy athletic contests will be adversely affected if we do anything to discourage or to eliminate these activities. In the last war one of the reasons why our boys surpassed their opponents was that, through athletics, there had been developed in them an aggressive and a confident spirit. If this is to be a long war, we should be doing those things which tend to build up character and aggressiveness in our youth; but so far as I can see, this tax will have the opposite effect. It will make it impossible for athletic contests to be carried on.

I have spent a great deal of time in a basketball town, and I know that boys begin training when they are little fellows, around six or seven, and continue training all through the years in the hope of making the main team. If, however, the main team cannot play, that incentive is lost. It has always been a matter of great concern to me, as a community worker, to have boys placed in a good, wholesome environment so that they will not be loitering round dives and poolrooms. I am afraid the dive and the poolroom are the places they will go to if there is no means of directing their energies into the channels of athletics.

The athletic organization has to pay travelling expenses, heating, lighting; it has to buy uniforms and other equipment; the management are at their wits' ends to raise money for all these purposes. I know what it is. I am sure if there is any greater burden on high-school organizations, at least, they will go out of activity. That should not happen; but if it does, I am not sure that the minister will, in the end, have gained financially. The hon. member who spoke of killing the goose that laid the golden egg hit the nail on the head. The minister now gets a good deal of income from the sales tax on such equipment as uniforms, balls and so forth, which he is running the risk of losing.

I do not know what it will mean to this phase of our national life if the tax has the effect which I fear it will have. It may be said that it will not do much harm, but I believe there are many people engaged in such industries as the manufacture of baseballs, basketballs and equipment of that sort who will not be able to find employment in any war activity; they will be out of work. I do not think it is wise to make the tax as high as it is. Except for a small tax on strictly professional sport, the minister would be well advised to take the taxes off all sorts of sports, such as wrestling, boxing, basketball, hockey and so forth. That is my earnest advice.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the minister brought down the original tax on motion pictures I felt it was a gross discrimination, and I predicted in my own mind that the government would not carry through the policy they had adopted. Time has proved the correctness of that surmise. Motion pictures were undoubtedly singled out by the minister for taxation on the theory that this had become big business and that there was a field of taxation open to be exploited. The minister made a great mistake when he did not distinguish between big motion-picture business and little motion-picture business, and I am still of opinion that a flat rate of 20 per cent will work a great hardship to the industry, if you wish to call it that, in the smaller communities. This is the poor man's entertainment—I am not going to dwell on that aspect of it. There is no doubt that the great majority of the patrons of the motion-picture industry in the smaller towns, and even in some of the villages where they have pictures once or twice or three times a week, are people of the working class. How many times in the run of the year do I go to the motion pictures? I can scarcely recall how many times, and I am sure the minister does not go very often. In the first place, we have not the time, and perhaps our tastes do not lie in that direction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I like them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I like to go to the motion pictures occasionally, but I never look at the advertisements. Sometimes, when I am attracted by a particularly good picture, I go, but I never think of going when I am at home in the summer. This tax, therefore, makes no difference to me. I am not speaking from any personal point of view. But the smaller picture houses in a city like Fredericton, or in the smaller towns of New Brunswick, do draw a substantial clientele. The gross takings of the smaller houses are, however, relatively small; when you take into account municipal taxation, operating expenses, rental of films, which I suppose are obtained on a graduated basis—I do not know much about it, but I assume that more is paid for certain pictures than for others—royalties, corporation taxes, if they are incorporated companies, the net revenue is exceedingly small; and to impose a tax of 20 per cent without any discrimination between the larger and the smaller houses, between the greater and the lesser volume of business, is in my opinion a grave mistake. I do not think it will work out to put them on the same basis. It will not be equitable, and there will be no equality of sacrifice if that is the theory upon which this war taxation is to be based.

PRIVATE BILLS

ONTARIO AND MINNESOTA POWER COMPANY LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 26a, respecting The Ontario and Minnesota Power Company Limited—Mr. McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River)—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the Chair.

On Section 1—1905, chapter 139 to apply to corporation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that this section contains the meat of the bill. It provides:

> Chapter one hundred and thirty-nine of the statutes of 1905 shall extend to and its provisions shall apply to, and the rights, powers and privileges and obligations thereunder conferred or imposed on the said company shall inure to the benefit of and be binding upon the corporation formed by the amalgamation of the said company with Kenora Paper Mills, Limited, the Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Company, Limited, the Keewatin Lumber Company, Limited, and the Keewatin Power Company, Limited, and the successors and assigns of such corporation.

In chapter 139 of the statutes of 1905 this company was given power to construct, develop, acquire, own, use and operate the water power which then or thereafter existed on the Rainy river at or near the town of Fort Frances, and also full rights in regard to the development of the water power in that district. Other sections of that act provided for the use of the water power, and that all electrical development which took place at that point had to be developed equally on both sides of the river. Then it was provided that in the event of any dispute as to the price of power or electrical energy in use or to be provided on the Canadian side of the international boundary, or the conditions upon which the same should be furnished, such dispute should be settled by the board of railway commissioners, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Railway Act. Then there were certain regulations with regard to the diversion of any of this power for use in the United States.

So far as I can understand the position, all these privileges were given to a company in 1905, and in tracing the history of that company I find that apparently it was closely linked up with another company known as the Minnesota and Ontario Paper company. The company dealt with under this bill is the Ontario and Minnesota Power company. I should like to know the relationship between these two companies; whether they are linked in any way, and what has happened with reference to the rights of the shareholders.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was all brought out the other day. They all belong to the one company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What happened to the shareholders of the original company? Can the sponsor of the bill give us that information?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): This was all gone into in the committee the other day, and I thought all these questions were satisfactorily answered. It is, however, only because the Ontario companies act possibly does not affect rights granted by the dominion statute of 1905 that this application to parliament is necessary. As I understand it, this bill does not confer on this company any more rights than were conferred on the previous companies. All these companies heretofore were controlled and operated by the parent company, the Minnesota and Ontario Paper company. That is a Minnesota corporation which was formed after the reorganization of the main corporation of the same name, which went into receivership in 1931. The reorganization was carried out under the bankruptcy laws of the United States of America and, after receiving the approval of the interested groups of security holders of the predecessor United States corporation, and after submission to the securities and exchange commission at Washington, was confirmed by the federal courts of the United States.

The new United States corporation has outstanding, $12,200,000 of bonds and 1,344,544 shares of common stock. These bonds and shares were issued to secure the successor creditors of the predecessor corporation and its subsidiaries, it being estimated that such creditors number about 12,000. The bonds and shares of the new United States corporation are accordingly widely held, and the new United States corporation is not controlled by any individual corporation or group. The new United States corporation and the new Canadian company are not affiliated with any outside paper or power interests, and they certainly do not possess any monopoly position in the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Was it the Ontario and Minnesota Power company, which obtained these rights in 1905, that went into bankruptcy in 1931?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): That was the company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why did it go into bankruptcy in the United States courts?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): That was where the parent company was. It was in Minneapolis.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What happened? As I understand it, the shareholders lost everything in that case. What happened to the shareholders in that company?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): There was a substantial Canadian investment in the predecessor United States corporation, it being estimated that 40 per cent to 50 per cent of the bonds of the predecessor corporation were owned by residents of Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The bonds?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Yes. It is at present estimated that about 40 per cent of the bonds and 40 per cent of the shares of the new United States corporation are held in Canada, these securities being largely held by individuals and insurance companies. The new United States corporation has a board of nine directors, the composition of which has been approved and comfirmed by the federal courts of the United States. At the present time two of those directors are Canadians. The plan of reorganization of the predecessor United States corporation recommended that the five Canadian subsidiary companies mentioned be amalgamated. As indicated, this amalgamation has been effected, and the new Canadian company is a wholly owned subsidiary of the new United States corporation. The amalgamation has resulted in a much simpler financial structure for the Canadian undertaking.

The new Canadian company has outstanding 50,000 shares of a par value of $100 each and, subject to the passing of this measure, thereby completing amalgamation, will have outstanding bonds in the reduced amount of $12,200,000. All the bonds and all shares, except the directors' qualifying shares, of the new Canadian company are held by the new United States corporation. The amalgamation also is expected to produce increased operating efficiency in the Canadian undertaking. The amalgamation has not the effect of decreasing production or closing down plants. The undertaking in Canada is being conducted on exactly the same scale as previously, but by one company instead of by five companies.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the name of the new United States company which has been formed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minnesota and Ontario Paper company.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): I believe the new United States company holds the same name as the previous company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member has not yet answered my question. What happened to the equity which the original shareholders held in the Canadian company which was granted these rights in 1905? I understand, from what the hon. member has said, that the bondholders received about 50 cents on the dollar in the formation of the new company, what happened to the shareholders?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): The shareholders lost out. But none of the shares of the Canadian company were sold to the public.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: None of the shares?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are the directors and the officers of the new company the same in any respect as they were in the old company? A Mr. R. H. M. Robinson of New York has been mentioned.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He was a trustee of the old company, was he not?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is his status in the new company?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Robinson is president of the new company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: From the Financial Post's review of corporate securities I find that the same companies mentioned here are also wholly owned subsidiaries of the Minnesota and Ontario Paper company, which became defunct in 1931. It seems to me that there is every sign that there has been a bankruptcy action here which has squeezed out many of the original shareholders. Then a reorganization has been effected under a new set-up. It seems to me that the rights and privileges of the original shareholders should still be taken care of in the new company. It has just reorganized. Now this company comes back, and it has the same rights, privileges and power, and almost a free gift from this country for the operation of the power on that river.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Chairman, I should not like to express an opinion on what the United States courts have done. Apparently the arrangement arrived at was quite satisfactory to those courts. None of the stock has been sold to Canadian people. I think we might very nicely accept their decision as the appropriate one in the circumstances.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the company intend to pay anything to the Canadian government for the water-power rights on this river granted by the bill before the committee?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): I should imagine that they will most certainly carry on under the original agreement, because this legislation does not confer upon the new company any more rights and privileges than were enjoyed individually or collectively by the old company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that. But they have not paid anything for this water power which they have taken from the river.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member did not say that.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Surely they have.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the power developed there?

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Approximately 30,000 horse-power.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill one or two questions. I am concerned with the ramifications of the bill only from one or two angles. It is proposed under this merger that the Ontario and Minnesota Power company shall absorb four or five other companies. The reasons given are that it is more economical to have one administration take care of the whole organization, instead of having five do so. I am concerned about the lives of the people employed in the companies which are being taken over.

We have had a great deal of experience in Canada with mergers of this kind. We know that smaller companies may be operating in small communities. Certain wage rates apply. Local management is in control. When the merger goes through, power is vested in the parent company, and local management no longer has jurisdiction. Wage rates are subject to fixation by the parent company. Concentration of production automatically follows. Certain smaller companies must fold up—we hear that that is good economics. As a result, we find that sometimes whole communities are wiped out.

This has happened, and it can be repeated in a set-up similar to this one. I should like assurance from the sponsor of the bill that the wage rates in effect in smaller companies will remain, that local management will continue to have the same jurisdiction, and that under this set-up there is no danger of forming a monopoly which would concentrate production in one company and wipe out communities which had been engaged in similar operations.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): The two towns directly affected by the bill are Fort Frances and Kenora. The mayors of both of these towns have telegraphed me approving this procedure. The province of Ontario has also agreed that it is a proper thing to do. The wage rates in the paper mills operating in these two towns are, I believe, the highest in Canada. There is not a chance in the world, so far as it is possible to see, for anything the hon. member has visualized taking place. The management makes its agreements with the various mills, and it has done so right along. I know of no reason why it should change. So far as I can see, or so far as anybody else can see at the present time, there is no possible chance of any of these communities being adversely affected by what is about to take place.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am opposed to the granting of what I consider to be the natural resources of the country, and handing them over without fee or payment to a company to develop, to be sold back to the people for whatever they can get. In my opinion, the natural resources of a country are the birthright of the people, I do not care whether they are mines, water power, forests, asbestos deposits, the Alberta oil fields or lumber. All these natural resources belong to the people, and when they are handed over to a company in this way the people get practically nothing in return. Therefore I must voice my opposition. This sort of thing results in the common man having nothing which he can call his own. The oil of Alberta has been developed almost exclusively by the large oil companies; the lumber of British Columbia is controlled by a great combine, and the same applies to many other natural resources. Water power is even better than a gold mine because it is inexhaustible. The company get complete control of this water power; they may develop it and sell it for whatever they can get. The people of Canada should be getting a subsidy of some kind from all these companies. We should follow the example of Sweden, which is gradually becoming a 51 per cent shareholder in all its natural resources. Any profits obtained go back into the coffers of the nation to reduce taxation and raise the standard of living. I am opposed to this bill.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 27, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company—Mr. McGeer—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the Chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Wireless services.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I notice that one objectionable feature has been removed from this section, namely, that empowering the company to engage in the transmission of anything which may be invented in the future, but I still object to that part of the section which empowers the company to provide service facilities for the transmission of sound, pictures, writing or signals. That is going too far into the realm of the future, and granting these rights may seriously interfere with the powers of a central or national broadcasting corporation. It would be well to delete that portion which has to do with the transmission of messages or pictures which are not at present transmitted.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I inform the hon. member that this is just legalizing what they are doing now. We could not operate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to-day or any day, if it were not for the use of these wires.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they transmitting pictures to-day?

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: So far, in British Columbia there has been no demand for live pictures, but they are transmitting the other things, and this is merely to legalize what they are doing.

On the preamble:

Mr. NEILL: I should like to mention so that it will be on record, that an undertaking has been given—it is not printed in the bill—that none of this $1,000,000 issue shall be put on the market before the 1st of September, so as not to interfere with the issue of the government's war loan.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 88, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 13—Interpretation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When we took recess at the dinner hour I was making some observations with respect to the tax on amusements. I think I had proceeded to the point where I had endeavoured to convince the minister that a tax of 20 per cent on the gross takings of the small picture houses would constitute a very onerous burden indeed and, having regard to the other imposts on such small enterprises, would, in my view, perhaps drive them out of business. I am convinced of the truth of the observations which I have made. I do not think I should labour the point any further.

When the announcement was made in the budget speech that this form of amusement or entertainment was singled out for taxation, even as a war measure, it produced a strong protest in the country, not only from the proprietors and those immediately interested, but from the patrons of the business as well. The minister was well advised to change the base of the tax, although it is not usual for a Minister of Finance to do so. In peace time the proprietors of this class of business would have protested vigorously against the tax; but because we are at war and the money is needed, they have decided, as good citizens of Canada, to acquiesce in the principle of the tax provided that other commercial amusements are treated in the same way; and I believe the minister did well to adopt that point of view.

That, of course, opens up a very large field. I assume that the minister has received a number of protests with respect to commercialized sport—if I may properly use that term. If motion pictures are to be taxed, so should commercialized sport also. I see no reason why amusements such as professional hockey and professional baseball should be exempted if the common people of this country are to be taxed on such amusements as motion pictures. When I visualize one of my friends and fellow citizens travelling from Fredericton to Toronto to see a hockey match at the Maple Leaf gardens, I conclude that it must be a great spectacle and that the patrons of that form of amusement can well pay a tax, especially if, as I understand is the situation, the proprietors have the option of absorbing the tax or of passing it on to their patrons.

There is, however, a clear line of demarcation between commercialized sport and amateur sport as such; and unless the minister is of opinion that the exemptions contained in section 122, subsection 2 are sufficiently wide to cover the cases I have in mind, I believe that this tax is not well imposed. I believe that the draftsmen of this section had in mind what I also have in mind, that ordinary amateur athletic contests, when not operated for the benefit by way of personal gain of any private person or proprietor, should not be taxed; and I am wondering whether the reservation contained in the subsection on page 9 of the bill is sufficiently wide to cover everything I had in mind.

The most pronouncedly amateur contest in the world cannot be run without money. In ordinary times, at all events in small communities, one will always find public-spirited men who put their hands in their pockets to support contests of this kind. But this is war time, and people's generous impulses to give money are diverted to the support of war-time activities, as, of course, it is proper they should be. While this is in a degree a war measure, we have no undertaking from the minister that this tax will not continue for ever. If it proves very profitable it will probably remain for, at least, a considerable time. I am not going to suggest or propose an amendment; but I hope that, in the administration of the measure, under the discretionary powers conferred upon the minister, the commissioner or whoever exercises these powers will look with great favour on anything which will help to conserve amateur athletics and all that is implied in that term.

One of the reasons why England has not been decadent in this war, as some predicted she would be, is that the Englishman still plays games, and while he is, of course, a follower of professional sport, the amateur instinct is well to the fore. Waterloo, it is said, was won on the playing fields of Eton. Well, this war may be won as the result of the athletic activities of the people of England. I trust that the minister and those who are charged with the responsibility of administering this measure will exercise with great leniency their discretion in connection with amateur sports such as those to which I have referred. There may be occasions where money must be paid from the proceeds of these amateur fixtures to, we shall say, someone who owns the athletic field or the rink. This point was touched upon by the hon. member for Saskatoon City. My view is that the minister in exercising his discretion, ought to take into account such conditions as were stated here by that hon. member. You cannot have these facilities unless somebody provides them, and not many municipalities as such will provide expensive places for amateur sport. This is usually done by athletic associations, such as the one with which the minister is no doubt familiar, the Halifax Wanderers' grounds. The Wanderers Athletic association has been in existence for more than half a century. Some communities do not have these facilities, and I would ask on behalf of the youth of the country, that no tax be imposed on enterprises which are primarily amateur and for the benefit of the rising Canadian generation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I concur in all that was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, not only with regard to amateur hockey but with regard to amateur sports of all kinds. As the previous speaker pointed out, the well-being and health of the nation depend upon the development that comes from such sports, and therefore amateur sports should be fostered and developed among the younger people. I trust the minister will be able to exempt such sports. I do not see any particular harm in taxing professional sport. It is a commercial enterprise with many people, and they should make their contribution at this time. But it is most essential to the future welfare of the nation that we should at some cost develop amateur sport in Canada.

Let me also mention the moving pictures. As I have already pointed out, in Manitoba it will cost the people, in the majority of cases, an added 40 per cent on the admission fee, if we take the provincial tax into account. These people have not benefited by war industries and I submit that they should be given some consideration, even if they were taxed ten per cent. I do not see why horse racing, which is not essential at this time, should pay a tax of only 5 per cent, while these other people are asked to pay 20 per cent. It must also be remembered that sports of all kinds are essential not only from a recreational but from an educational point of view. I hope the minister will consider these two points.

Mr. GILLIS: Like others who have spoken, I have received telegrams from theatre owners protesting against the amusement tax. They pointed out, however, that they were not averse to the tax provided other forms of amusement were treated similarly. In taxing everything in the way of amusement, I think the minister has offset the contention of the theatre managers.

I look at these taxes in this way. Money must be raised if we are to go through with the job in which we are engaged, of prosecuting the war; and when we compare any of these taxes with the income tax imposed on low-income groups, those receiving as little as $660 a year, and the national defence tax—and remember that the sports are purely voluntary, things that we can do without—I suggest that this is the wrong time to quibble about such matters if we are serious in our prosecution of the war and in our effort to make some sacrifices. That is how I look at the amusement tax. I know it will hit the low income groups, the theatre tax particularly. It will hit them hard. But it will not hit them nearly so hard as if the people on the other side of the water who are trying to impose upon us their way of life succeeded. As I said a few nights ago, the minister finds himself in the position of having to conform to certain rules with regard to the raising of money, and this is the way the rules compel him to raise this money.

What I am more concerned about is the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, not as regards the promotion of amateur sport alone, because in my opinion this is the wrong time to talk about these things; there are other matters that are more serious. The hon. member, however, did point out that in certain communities—and this applies across the country—people have organized community projects such as rinks. In my own section there are two large rinks which were erected a couple of years ago. For one of these the necessary funds were raised among the miners. They subscribed ten dollars a share, and there is no profit in it for them; they expect nothing. They sponsored the project in order to have a community enterprise whereby people could be gathered together and they could promote sports of all kinds, build up the younger generation and keep them off the road. That was the main object. As regards the promotion of amateur sports, I am not so sure that it is altogether amateur, but they do run hockey games and so forth, and they depend upon the income from that source to liquidate the cost of buildings. No one expects any return from the undertaking. The proviso on page 9 of the bill reads:

> Provided that the minister may, in his discretion, exempt any person from payment of the tax where the sole or chief purpose of the performance . . . is in his opinion charitable.

The minister in that proviso has certain discretionary powers, and after the bill is passed, the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon City—these community rinks that are absolutely community undertakings from which there are no profits to shareholders—can be dealt with as the minister sees fit. He has the power to exempt these people from taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The proviso pretty well speaks for itself. Something will depend upon administration, but perhaps I should say it is the intention that a fairly liberal interpretation shall be given exemptions. There are two parts to the exemption section. One is the part that does not depend upon the discretion of the minister but exempts outright certain amusements, and the second part is that which authorizes the minister in his discretion to exempt others.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Only charitable ones.

Mr. ILSLEY: If in his discretion the performance, exhibition or contest is charitable rather than one of gain or profit to the person or persons organizing, promoting managing or sponsoring the same. "Charitable" has a rather wide meaning in English law, and there is considerable discretion in the minister.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister's discretion under this section really extends only to the interpretation of the word "charitable". Like the hon. member for Davenport, I am having volume 1 of my telegrams bound, and I started on volume 2 this afternoon, although of course we cannot pay attention to all of them.

I am not entirely in agreement with the suggestion that consideration should be given only to amateur sport. Look at the history of the Maple Leaf gardens, the Maple Leaf hockey team and the Maple Leaf baseball team. When the new Maple Leaf garden was to be constructed I was one of those asked to subscribe to the stock of the company. It was not suggested that I should do so in order to make a profit; the idea was that I should help in this effort which it was thought would be beneficial to sport throughout the country. All the prominent men who have stock in that company are now to be left holding the bag. They have never made any money out of the business; they have been motivated more by the idea of helping sport than by the idea of making money. It would be silly to put money into a proposition like that on any other basis.

There is one other point to be mentioned in connection with the Maple Leaf hockey team, and I imagine the same thing applies to the Montreal team. These are the people who are supporting amateur hockey to a very large extent. If it were not for these professional teams we would not have the class of amateur hockey that we see all over the country. I quite agree with the minister that we must get the money somehow; but as I suggested before the dinner recess, if we impose a tax as high as 20 per cent we are going to run into the law of diminishing returns. On the other hand, in a city like Toronto, if these concerns make more money, the government will be able to take more money from them under the excess profits tax. I do not think a tax of 10 per cent would make very much difference so far as professional hockey is concerned, but 20 per cent is altogether too much. We certainly should not take a chance on putting out of business the Maple Leaf hockey team or the Canadiens of Montreal, and I will tell the committee why. Teams like these are perhaps the best good-will ambassadors we have. They go to the United States and mix with the people there; there is keen rivalry between Canadian and United States teams, and that does a great deal to keep the two countries together. In addition, a great many people come here from the United States to see our hockey games, which brings more foreign exchange into the country, and it must be remembered that these two professional teams have developed many of the players on the other teams in the league. Therefore, I believe that a 20 per cent tax on all tickets will be so severe that it may defeat the very purpose the government has in mind, and it may interfere definitely with the game itself.

I do not think we wish to interfere with amateur sport, but before we discuss this at greater length I think the Minister of National Revenue should tell us just what this may mean as it will affect these various clubs. Just who will be taxed and who will not be taxed? What are the ramifications of the whole thing? Subsection 2 does not tell us very much, and I think it should be clarified. It has been said that there should be some difference between the tax on admissions to large theatres, and that on admissions to small theatres. As I pointed out before the dinner recess, already there has been a falling off in the attendance at the large theatres in my own riding. Therefore I suggest that if the tax were reduced to perhaps 10 per cent the government would benefit in two ways. In the first place they would collect more under the excess profits tax, and in the second place the theatres would be filled and the revenue under this tax would not suffer. Do not empty the theatres; fill them up. Let the theatres make their profits; impose a reasonable tax on each admission, and then apply the excess profits tax to the theatres. To me that seems the logical thing to do.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps, when the minister is replying to the hon. member for St. Paul's, he will give a specific reply to the telegram I had a page take to him across the floor some two or three days ago.

While I am on my feet I should like to suggest that in many instances a tax of 20 per cent on the gross is liable to close up the industry almost entirely. No doubt the minister has given thought to the possibility of taxing the net, and perhaps he might say a word about that. Then I would direct his attention to the fact that this tax may work a hardship as between different classes of amusements. In the case of a theatrical performance the costs are far greater than in the case of a hockey match, let us say. From that I draw the conclusion that in the one case the net return in relation to the gross would not be in anything like the same proportion as in the other. The general idea is that we want to get some of the revenue which the owners and producers of these amusements are receiving, but in doing so we must not discriminate against that amusement which finds that its net is in nothing like the same proportion to its gross as is the situation with another enterprise.

I hope I have made my point clear to the minister. To follow that thought a little further, this will work a hardship on many people and will probably put some of them out of business. As the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox said this afternoon, the government may kill the goose that laid the golden egg. I am satisfied that these organizations would feel disposed to operate their amusements and turn over 100 per cent of their profits for the duration of the war, rather than lose the investments that they have at the present time, through finding it necessary to shut down. I have in mind the small community in which a moving-picture theatre is operated. It may be that theatre finds that it is just able to balance its budget, and perhaps give the proprietor a fair living. He takes his gross of $400 a week, and finds that he is subject to a tax of $80. He adds that tax to the cost of the ticket, and finds that his returns are diminishing. I believe it has been found in Campbellford that since this tax was instituted the numbers of those attending moving-picture theatres have dropped by one-half. I am sure there are many places where the theatres will have to close up.

If there were some way of taxing the entire profits of not only the moving-picture theatres but also of skating-rinks and other enterprises of that kind for the duration of the war, I believe it would be found that the people operating those enterprises would be sporting enough and interested enough in our cause to give over all their profits, if they were permitted to operate in a way which would permit them to balance their budgets. I should like to see some discretionary power in this measure whereby the minister could permit a skating-rink, an athletic field or a theatre in a small community to carry on, they in turn agreeing to turn over their profits for the duration of the war. In that way the industry would be kept alive; our people would be following their usual pursuits and resuming their usual small measure of amusement and small measure of athletic interest to which they have been accustomed in the past.

We must have money. I admit at once it would be very difficult to administer a taxation system on net income. I quite appreciate it is very simple when it is done on the gross. It will, however, work hardship in certain places, and the minister should have even more discretionary powers and, as the hon. member for Rosedale has said, take a charitable view of charitable enterprises, and a charitable reading of the measure when he comes to a decision as to what is or is not a charitable organization.

Mr. JACKMAN: I find that subsection 2 contains these words:

> . . . no part of the revenue of which inures to the benefit or private gain of any person as proprietor or member thereof or shareholder therein—

And so forth. There are many organizations which I believe would qualify under the first part of subsection 2, but because of the nature of their corporate organizations, and because of the legal form they take, they would not qualify under the latter part of the subsection.

I have in mind the ordinary club which has no hope of making a profit for its members. Nevertheless, in order to qualify, the members may have to buy a share, and thereby they become shareholders. Therefore I should like to know if, because of the nature of that holding, and the legal possibility of a profit—of course actually no such thing is contemplated—such a club is excluded from subsection 2, and must rely on the following proviso under which the minister must give consent.

Mr. GIBSON: It is difficult to give a ruling without having a specific case in mind. I may, however, assure the hon. member that a sympathetic view will be taken of cases such as that. We are not endeavouring to enforce taxation against organizations, societies and clubs which are obviously carrying on for the purposes set out in this section.

Mr. JACKMAN: Possibly I might give a concrete example. The Toronto skating club and the Minto skating club hold carnivals annually. They pay out substantial sums for star performers, but the majority of the talent is contributed voluntarily. I would assume that such organizations would not be taxable.

Mr. GIBSON: I would not tie myself down to a ruling offhand, without having all the particulars before me. I could not possibly do that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I tried to place the particulars before the minister, without going into great detail. Certainly, as the minister knows, no one would make a profit out of the operations of those clubs.

Another example would be that of the Argonaut rowing club. During the football season a football team operates under the name of that club, and admission prices are charged. The profits from the football games go to pay expenses for the rowing season. That sport is, I believe, fairly expensive, and not self-supporting. I take it that the members of the club are all shareholders, but I have never heard of a dividend being paid. I believe those are the cogent facts of the case, and I suggest that the minister should be able to let us know whether or not this section would cover a case like that. If not, must permission always be obtained from the minister before a game is held, or before people are permitted to enter without paying a tax? In respect of the Argonaut club one could hardly say that it is operated for charity, because it is operated for the benefit of the members of the club, and for the general advancement of amateur sports.

Mr. GIBSON: Almost every sporting organization in Toronto has been mentioned. We have heard mention of the Maple Leaf hockey team, the Toronto skating club, the Toronto baseball club, the Argonaut football club, and so on. I could not possibly give a decision offhand on the floor of the house as to whether they will be taxable or exempt, without inquiring into the set-up of each of those organizations, and without finding out whether they comply with the provisions of the legislation. If they do, they will be exempt.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps the minister will revert to the original position that it may have been unwise to have included them under the tax. That brings me to a further point. I have no doubt that when the moving-picture industry pointed out that it was being singled out for a 20 per cent tax, while the other forms of entertainment were being left scot-free, there was the hope in their minds that the heavy imposition of a 20 per cent tax would be reduced to something more reasonable. Certainly, while misery does love company, I do not think that was the attitude of the moving-picture industry.

Perhaps I might impress upon the minister the fact that we have heard in the committee to-day, and particularly from the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, that certain moving-picture houses in small towns have been finding that their patronage has been reduced to half. I might point out that while in the larger cities the incomes of people generally, and particularly the working class, have increased, as a result of war expenditures, and while they can absorb the 20 per cent tax, nevertheless the tax is a substantial one. The other night I went to the Capitol theatre here in Ottawa, and on two 40-cent tickets I paid sixteen cents. That is a heavy tax. I believe the minister will bear with me that in the ordinary course of business, had it been possible to advance the prices of moving-picture tickets to the extent of 20 per cent, and get away with it, without losing patronage, the proprietors would probably have done so long ago, before the tax came into force.

I think the minister must realize that he cannot boost by 20 per cent the prices of an industry like the moving-picture industry, and think it will just go on in the same way. Certainly businessmen and farmers, if I have heard correctly in this chamber, want to obtain as high prices as the traffic will bear for their products. The same applies to the proprietors of the small moving-picture theatres. They have been charging about as much as the traffic will bear. If a 20 per cent tax is imposed, it will then be found that there is a good deal in what has been said this afternoon and evening about the patronage dropping off. In that event, as the hon. member for Danforth stated a moment ago, you kill the goose that lays the golden eggs and create a certain amount of distress among those who operate theatres, particularly in the smaller communities. The minister did not expect to levy a tax upon amusements other than motion pictures. Now that he has included these other amusements, his budget is thrown out of gear, although on the right side, and perhaps he will consider reducing this tax. If at the end of the year it is found that the people are accustomed to paying it; if the increase in the national income has made everybody a little more prosperous, then the tax could be increased to 20 per cent. Any business which must raise the price of its product 20 per cent at one fell swoop is likely to face a disastrous condition.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The only discretion the minister has is in deciding whether an amusement is being held for charitable purposes. Take the case of a boy who belongs to an amateur hockey league; under the rules he may be paid. But when the club plays a game and a gate is being collected, of necessity that club must pay this tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member want every hockey organization that charges an admission exempted? Hon. gentlemen have been talking about exempting this and that sport. I think it was only a week ago when the unanimous sentiment of hon. members on the other side was to tax all other amusements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Commercial amusements.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) referred to the fact that motion pictures were the poor man's amusement; that we should tax these large hockey games which attracted the big attendances. Hon. members were deluged with telegrams urging that while no exception was taken to the tax, pressure should be exerted to have the tax extended to other forms of amusement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Commercial amusements, for gain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have the telegrams here; it was "other forms of amusement." If the views expressed by the hon. member for St. Paul's are accepted, as well as those expressed by other hon. members, there would be hardly any tax imposed. I have been listening for some hint as to what sport it would be proper to tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Commercial amusements.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not object to the taxing of professional hockey. I stated that it would cut down the attendance, and I was trying to show the minister the advisability of keeping up the attendance by lowering the tax and obtaining the revenue by way of the excess profits tax. I was pointing out that if one boy on the team was paid anything, I suppose even if he were given an outfit, it would be necessary to tax the gate. Then there is the legitimate theatre which should receive some consideration. I think there is only one theatre of this kind in Toronto and they are having a hard time. In my opinion they should be exempted. Then there is the Hart House in Toronto, the Little Theatre here in Ottawa and one theatre in Montreal. Those are about all the legitimate theatres in the country. I know the problem is difficult, but I am objecting to the minister having discretion only with respect to charitable organizations. The section has not been made clear enough. If the minister can be given discretion in these matters, I would be ready to accept his decision. I am peculiar that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: A draft bill was submitted to me which gave the minister unlimited powers of exemption, and I would not sponsor it. I knew what I would get from the opposition if I brought in a bill giving the minister unlimited powers of exemption.

Mr. BENCE: The minister said it could be given a wide interpretation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that.

Mr. BENCE: Would he go as far as to say that it would include the promotion of amateur athletics?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not going to attempt to distinguish as between amateur and professional, because I am advised that there is no possibility of arriving at a line of demarcation. The hon. member for St. Paul's has been talking about paid amateurs and distinguishing them from professionals.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the purpose of this bill to raise money or to prevent people from spending money upon what might be regarded as luxuries?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say that the first object is to raise money. But there is a secondary object. If the money is not spent for this purpose it will prove advantageous in that it will not encourage people to build theatres. Something over sixty applications have been made for permits to build new moving-picture theatres. Plans were being completed to build a chain of theatres across Canada. I thought it would be most undesirable for this country to go on a theatre-building spree at the very crux of a most serious war. For that reason, among others, power was taken to prevent the building of these theatres. This throws the rapidly increasing theatre business into the hands of the existing theatres. These theatres sent in many telegrams protesting against permission being given to build new theatres.

I think it is commonly known to many of us that theatres in a great many parts of Canada are being crowded. Last Saturday I passed one theatre in the afternoon and another one in the evening, and in both instances a long queue of people were standing on the sidewalk waiting to buy tickets. They were all paying the tax. I do not know about the afternoon admission price, but in the case of the evening admission price they were paying a five cent tax; the price was thirty cents instead of twenty-five cents. I thought it was quite a proper tax to impose under those conditions. It places some brake on the expansion of the theatre industry; there is no doubt about that, although I would hope it would not be a serious brake. It is a heavy tax and one which, in some instances, will be harsh perhaps in its effects, but this is not the only case in which our taxation measures and our other measures have been harsh. I think of some of the things which have been done under the War Exchange Conservation Act, a measure which received wide commendation from the public and still does. But many importers, if not put completely out of business, have been very nearly put out of business. We cannot run the country having in mind only the prosperity and material well-being of everybody in the country. That is not the first consideration. It is away down in the list of considerations. Therefore this heavy tax was imposed.

Mr. JACKMAN: But the fewer you hurt, the better. The object is not to put businesses out of commission because the war is on. You should not allow a business to go out of business, if it is not detracting from the war effort, if you can possibly save it. The minister must not take such a sadistic attitude toward some of these things.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the word?

Mr. JACKMAN: Sadistic.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, that adjective was used in a newspaper reference to me on one occasion, and I was very much amused by it. There is nothing sadistic about my attitude.

Mr. JACKMAN: You came close to it a minute ago.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all. I wish my hon. friend would give me suggestions how to raise money instead of continually pleading the case of special taxpayers against the case of the general taxpayers of the country.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is quite unfair. I gave the minister suggestions in my budget address. I suggested a measure of taxation which was fundamentally sound and which I thought might well be given consideration as an alternative method of raising money. Certainly the proposal which is now before the committee, with the exception of the movie end of it, is one which virtually came from this side of the house. There is no reason, as the leader of the opposition said a minute ago, why the movie industry should be singled out for taxation. The suggestion I made was that from the evidence we have had from the little centres, the movie industry has been seriously crippled. It is true that the attendance may not remain at 50 per cent of the attendance before this tax; it may go back to 75 per cent. Nevertheless it is a serious falling-off, and if a 10 per cent tax would not cripple the business too much I suggest that, if that rate of tax were imposed, then next year when the people have become more accustomed to the higher price, the tax could be raised to 20 per cent. All I am interested in is in not killing the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not wish to prolong this discussion; in fact, I should like to see it shortened if at all possible. I was looking through Hansard, which is always an interesting document, and I saw that we have already taken longer in discussing this sports and theatre tax than we took in discussing that very important tax, the national defence tax, which strikes hardest at the great masses of the lower paid workers in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member has not heard us on the bill yet. That was only on the resolution.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have taken a greater time on this than we took on the resolution for the national defence tax, which bears so hardly on the poorer paid people of this country.

There are some things I do not like about this tax on sports. I do not like the idea of taxing amateur sport at all, but most of us realize that we must accept some taxation which we do not like. In this particular instance it seems to me that if the minister uses the discretionary power which is already in the measure and gives the word "charitable" the interpretation of which it is capable, in all probability many of the objections that have been raised can be met. I have been interested in sport all my life. I have trained many youngsters in football and other sports, and I am of opinion that we should get back to really amateur sport.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no sympathy with the team that puts a player on and pays him, and still calls itself amateur. I believe that practice is undermining our Canadian sports, and consequently I would not make any special plea for those who are doing it.

I did not quite like this tax when it was confined to movie theatres because, after all, that is the poor man's pleasure in many instances, and I think the extension of the tax, although it may work a hardship in cases such as that mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon City this afternoon, makes it much better than it was originally. I should like to see the committee adopt this measure because I am quite sure of this. Judging from the minister's stubbornness—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: —in connection with the gasoline tax, in which I was very much interested, and the national defence tax, in which I was greatly interested, we can talk to him all night on this tax, and we shall end up in exactly the same position we are in now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that a sadistic attitude? I should like to give the Minister of Finance what a friend of mine wrote to me regarding this matter. He writes:

> Why only the family entertainment of moving pictures? This includes the poorer classes, children and old folks. What about high-priced hockey, baseball, horse racing? Then again opera, "evening-dress" dramatics, festivals? Community bridge affairs, bingo games, circuses, etc.?

Finally, and I hope this is reached by the minister's taxation proposals:

> The pernicious small travelling tent shows, with gambling?

Such as you get at the ordinary fairs in this country. Every year in the maritime provinces there comes a troupe or troupes of people from New England who spend nothing here and who take away immense sums, relatively, from our people. I would clamp the tax right on them.

Mr. ESLING: Would the minister give thought in this tax to an amusement centre which is wholly municipally owned? Let me cite the case of a city in my district which has issued bonds to the amount of $250,000 for the purpose of establishing a municipal centre. When times were better, it got by. Unfortunately, to-day the city is having to make up the interest. That is a case in which the taxpayers as a whole are taxed further. Unfortunately, conditions there were not so bright as they are in the picture business in this community of Ottawa. In fact, there were two picture houses in that city, and one of them had to close for lack of business. I must emphasize that it is a community with more than ordinary patriotic and ambitious spirit because, while it has only about 7,000 people, it has contributed more than a million dollars towards the war loans and war services, and it has given of its men in perhaps a larger percentage than any other community. To place a further burden of taxation, not on excess profits, but on a deficit for each year, makes their burden extremely difficult.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Shall section 13 carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are a large number of sections included in section 13. I wish to take just a moment to talk about the operations under the new sections 127 and 129. Under the former, a person authorized by the minister may examine records, books, accounts and vouchers which shall be open to the inspection of officers authorized by the minister, and if it appears to such person that there has been a violation of the provisions, he may without any warrant or legal authority "seize, take away and retain and hold the said records, books, accounts and vouchers until they are produced in any court proceedings." That is a drastic power to give to anybody who is only an auditor. I suggest that at least there should be some written authority from the minister to the man acting under those circumstances. I do not know what the practice is with regard to excise, but this looks to me like a Hitler method in connection with taxes.

Then, under section 129:

> If any person liable to maintain records and books of account for the purposes of this part, has, in the opinion of the minister, failed to maintain adequate records and books of account, the minister may assess the tax payable by such person under this part, and the taxes so assessed shall be deemed to be due and payable forthwith.

Who is to judge whether the records are adequate? That is a drastic power to give to the minister without any right of appeal, or even a hearing. If the man comes along and says that my records are not adequate, he is to be constituted to be the judge, I suppose, under this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the minister, without hearing the other side, may assess the tax; the tax shall be forthwith due and payable, and the other fellow is not permitted to say a word about it. The tax is assessed without a hearing and with no right of appeal. I object to it on principle. I am not going to labour the point.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Is section 13 carried? Carried.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, there is no defence? The minister is just going to have the section carried.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Automobiles.

Mr. GREEN: A portion of this section deals with automobiles. What is the present position with regard to the control of manufacture and importation of automobiles? I raise that question because there seems to be some doubt whether the restrictions as they stand are exactly fair and equitable.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is, I think, asking about the War Exchange Conservation Act.

Mr. GREEN: There is also involved the control of Canadian-produced cars by the controller of motor vehicles.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it is relevant. I am doubtful. The only ground for arguing that the matter can be brought up here is that these taxes are imposed as part of the control of automobiles. In the War Exchange Conservation Act, which was passed, if I remember correctly, on December 2, the import of automobiles was prohibited and heavy taxes were placed on domestic automobiles. It was found, of course, that dealers of imported automobiles would be out of business so far as the sale of imported automobiles was concerned, although in most instances they had garages and businesses connected with the actual selling of automobiles, which enabled them to go on. Therefore the matter was reconsidered, and it was decided to allow a small importation, upon a quota basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Twenty per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: For the first three months of 1941, 20 per cent of the number of automobiles imported during the first three months of 1940 were permitted. At the same time a motor vehicle controller was appointed; and since it was not desired that manufacturers of automobiles in this country should be enabled to take advantage of this prohibition of importations to increase their sales, merely taking up the slack created by the prohibition, statistics were obtained and conferences held, and the Canadian manufacturers were placed on quotas. What those quotas are I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: Eighty per cent, I think.

Mr. ILSLEY: Roughly, it is 80 per cent of the previous year. There are many refinements of those figures.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include 80 per cent of the cars they were producing for export in 1940?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. That was for domestic consumption, if I remember correctly.

I believe that is the story in its main outlines. There is one question about the cars which might be assembled in Canada if assembly were permitted, if it was decided to put the assembly of cars on the same basis as imported cars.

Mr. GREEN: It is impossible for these firms to set up plants in Canada now, is it not? Was there not some prohibition?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is so. Either that, or they get no advantage by doing so; if they do, they are deemed to be importers so far as the quota is concerned. It is either one or the other.

Mr. GREEN: For all practical purposes it is prevented. I suggest to the minister that the size of the quota be reconsidered to determine whether it is fair in all respects. There are many people in this country who are suffering as a result of it. They are, I think, mostly retail dealers, and some of them are in a very, very difficult position.

Mr. ILSLEY: I realize that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister hold out hope of any relief for them, because what has been said is too true? Firms with substantial investments in the shape of warehouses, showrooms and service garages are finding the going very difficult; some of them will have to go under. The minister knows of one case which he was good enough to hear at my request. I do not suggest that that gentleman will go under, but he is going behind. It is a great hardship, and I do not know what the answer is.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the one hand, we must conserve the exchange position; yet, if we do, we shall work grave injustice upon some of our best citizens. It is a problem with which the minister has to deal. I have not any solution.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the hon. gentleman is very fair about it. Hon. members have no idea of the number of representations which have been made to the government, and made to myself as Minister of Finance, since the passing of that War Exchange Conservation Act. There were representations from young and middle-aged men who had gone into the newsstand business and were relying on United States periodicals for a good part of their income. It is all right for members to rise in their places and say that we should shut out the "pulps," and it is probably the right thing to do. As a matter of fact, it is what we are doing with many of the "pulps." But it infringes upon the security and the welfare of people who are engaged in importing and vending these things.

The same applies to dealers in imported automobiles. It might perhaps be said that they knew, when the war came on, it might be necessary for them to adjust themselves and they should have done so. They should have adjusted themselves to the change that was coming, and some did. Some had it in mind and got adjusted and others did not.

Numerous industries, small for the most part, underwent the same experience. The Canadian Importers' association have been making representations continually. I do not know how vigorous or strict the house or the country would like the response to be, but I have taken the view that this was a desperately serious situation and that we had to take such action as we proposed. Undoubtedly, if we wanted to do the popular and easy thing, we would let these dealers bring in their cars, the young men in the newsstand business bring in their "pulps" and the members of the Canadian Importers' association bring in their imports. There are hundreds of articles the importation of which is prohibited, and that has broken right into the living of a great many importers. If we could coast along in a humane and merciful way for the time being we could relax these restrictions and get back to normal, but I do not think we can do that. We have to go along the course we are following.

There may be some adjustments from time to time as in the case of motor cars. The purpose of that quota was not to enable dealers to continue in business on a profitable basis as dealers in motor cars. The quota was not high enough. The purpose was to prevent their cars from disappearing, the names of their cars from being lost to the public, so that they might maintain a connection, keep the names of their cars, and sell the odd one during this temporary period. That is not enough to make a living on except where they have garages and other means of income.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a possible solution, but I do not know whether we should discuss it. The effect of the restrictions has been practically to give to the big three the whole Canadian market. It is true enough, the quota came on afterwards and to a degree cut in on that. But the big three have their agents in particular communities. If an arrangement could be made by the motor vehicle controller with any reputable dealer who had credit or cash, he could go to one of the big three and purchase on terms similar to or equally advantageous with those of recognized agents; he would have a chance to sell through the domestic production, and in that way these people might be kept in business. That, I admit, is something of state socialism, but it is the only solution that has entered my head with regard to this problem. But they will not look at the man who has been frozen out. Take General Motors or any of these big corporations. They have good dealers in their communities and can pick and choose because they have the cars the public want; yet here is another man who may have equally good credit facilities, who has been selling the Packard or the Studebaker. He is put out of business. If some arrangement could be made by the motor vehicle controller so as to have this business spread round, that might be a solution. I do not urge it; I merely suggest it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The average soft drink is five cents a bottle. How can 25 per cent be applied to a five-cent bottle and the retail price be suitably arranged?

Mr. ILSLEY: The tax is on the manufacturer, and if he has to raise the retail price as a result of the tax, I suppose he does so.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Sugar.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have something to say on this section. After what I heard in this house in 1933 from certain hon. gentlemen opposite, many of whom are absent, I never thought I would live to see the day when the Liberal party would impose an additional tax on sugar. The tax on sugar in 1933 was put on by the Bennett administration not because they wanted to put it on; it was put on to raise and support the revenues of the country at a time of dire economic necessity when, as a result of the stress of a world-wide economic depression, our revenues were visibly falling. Sugar was singled out because it was an article of universal consumption which the common people and the rich people alike use, and it was thought it would bring in an estimated revenue of $20,000,000. There was a war on then.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Isn't there now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. What was the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite? That was a world-wide economic war. I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence was through it? He was not in the house at the time, but we went through it. How much assistance did we get from hon. gentlemen opposite?

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend means the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, the Minister of National Revenue. How much assistance did we get?

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing but abuse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely nothing but abuse. I have here excerpts of some remarks made, perhaps from this very seat, by certain hon. gentlemen opposite. They condemned us in no uncertain terms for putting a tax on the poor, common people of the country, about whom they were so much concerned, and in the election of 1935 they pledged their party to the repeal of the sugar tax. But they never did it. We reduced the tax to a cent a pound before 1935, but these gentlemen went up and down the country to the housewives and condemned the Bennett government for the sugar tax, which was imposed at a time of great national distress. But they did not keep their word; the tax of one cent a pound on sugar remained.

An hon. MEMBER: They never do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will not say they never do; but they seldom do. They do not when it does not suit their convenience. Among the most vociferous at that time was the present Minister of National Defence who was then financial critic of the opposition. What did he say? He was as bitter and as picayune as I ever heard him in my life, and he could be picayune when he wanted to. As reported at page 3372 of Hansard for March 24, 1933, he said:

> Let us consider for a moment the other taxes. There is to be a tax of two cents per pound on sugar, and I understand that molasses is taken from the exempted list under the sales tax. We are told that $20,000,000 is expected to be raised from the tax on sugar.

This is the appeal against the tax.

> That amounts to $2 per head for every man, woman and child in this dominion and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this tax, bearing as it does upon a necessity of life that always has been regarded as an essential, coupled with the removal of molasses from the list of exempted goods under the sales tax, imposes a very great hardship on the poorer people of this dominion.

I pause there. That was the text for the whole band—I was going to say of outlaws—who traduced this party from one end of Canada to the other. My opponent in 1935, a millionaire, made the sugar tax the basis of his attack on me, and I have no doubt that it helped defeat me.

An hon. MEMBER: Was he a sugar millionaire?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he was a man who all his life had farmed the farmers of this country. He is still living; he is still farming. I venture to say that this statement of the present Minister of National Defence was the basis of the most violent attacks ever made on any government; and the present Minister of Finance himself voted against that tax. I know the answer will be that we are at war, and that is true; but I say to hon. members that in 1933 we were also at war, an economic war, which had dire consequences on this country. The statement I have read was made by the financial critic of the Liberal party, and it was the text for the whole gang of wolves who were on our trail all over this country. At that time the Liberal party was not quite so close to the sugar industry as it is to-day; it did not have the backing of certain people that it has to-day. The present Minister of National Defence went on to say:

> So far as the sugar industry is concerned, I have no fault to find with my hon. friend. That industry is well protected; in fact it is too well protected—

Well, it is still well protected; that is the only observation I have to make.

> —but this tax is not going to be paid by the sugar industry. This tax of two cents a pound will be paid by the individual householder who, with sugar at the present price, will have to pay a fifty per cent tax on all the sugar going into his house.

Do you see the insidiousness of that appeal: a fifty per cent tax, and this was at a time when sugar was probably at the lowest point in its history.

Mr. WOOD: And everything else, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I regret to say that is true; and things were even lower in the United States than in Canada. I remember that after we entered into the Ottawa agreements I motored from Winnipeg to Toronto, passing through the United States. Just outside Hillsboro, North Dakota, we had two punctures, and the farmer came down to see us. He told us that he was a hog raiser, and what do you suppose he was getting for his hogs on the Chicago market in the spring of 1934? He was getting two and a quarter cents a pound, as opposed to eight and a half cents a pound here.

Mr. ROWE: What did the hon. member for Brant get that year?

Mr. WOOD: I got three and a quarter cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then you had better go back to your dealer, because you have something more coming to you. Those two statements by the present Minister of National Defence formed the basis for the attack that was made upon us in this house. Then Mr. Howard, who at that time was the member for Sherbrooke and who now has gone to his reward in another place, proclaimed himself a great friend of the common people and said:

I want to protest in the strongest words I can use against this tax of two cents per pound on granulated white sugar, a commodity which perhaps is in greater demand than most any other product in Canada. At least, it has a wider distribution than any other product I know of. The tax is an enormous one. . . .

Then there was a gentleman here representing the consituency of Lisgar, Mr. Brown by name. Do hon. gentlemen remember him? I am not going to say anything about him or what he said, because I understand that now he has gone to his reward.

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No? All right; he is gone out of this house. I thought he was dead, but apparently he is only politically dead. He still has a chance for repentance, because he will never come back. As reported at page 4478 of Hansard he said in that budget debate:

The fact is that the tax is a very heavy burden on the people of Canada, and the magnitude of that burden can be to some extent appreciated when I recall the fact I mentioned in the budget debate that about fifty million bushels is the amount of wheat that is consumed by the people of Canada. At fifty cents a bushel that would mean $25,000,000, and I believe the estimated revenue from the sugar tax is $20,000,000, or only $5,000,000 short of the total value of the wheat consumed by the people of Canada. That comparison shows the magnitude of the burden that is imposed upon the consumer by this sugar tax.

I could quote many more statements by that same gentleman. Then there was a member from Hamilton East, Mr. Mitchell, who is not now in this house, but who has received his reward elsewhere. He had this to say:

. . . it represents a taxation upon every man, woman and child in Canada, and places a further burden upon the 1,300,000 people drawing relief.

Then there was the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), who I am sorry is not in his seat to-night. He had a great deal to say about that tax. I could go on right through this long list of extracts, but I really have not the heart to detain the committee for that length of time. There was the member for Melville, Mr. Motherwell. What gems he used to get off in this house! I understand that after 1935 his shafts were not always aimed at this party, but were sometimes directed towards his own friends. That may have been a case of sour grapes, I do not know; at all events I must confess to always having had a very warm spot in my heart for the former member for Melville. He certainly was a picturesque figure in this house, and he certainly knew something about agriculture. Of course, I could not expect that he should know as much as the present hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner), his successor in office.

Mr. GARDINER: More.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I certainly had not, and have not to-day, any antagonistic feeling toward the then member for Melville. He said, as regards the sugar tax:

I do not see how I can allow this to go by without protesting. After hearing—

Just listen to this.

—some of the letters read yesterday on behalf of the women and children of the country—

The poor women and children!—when sugar was down, we shall say, to two cents or four cents a pound, and a tax of two cents was being put on.

—and listening to the protests that came from every quarter on this side of the house, yes, and the silent protest of the rear-guard supporting the government—because I know they entertain such protests—I am wondering whether the minister is not considering the advisability of abandoning this tax. Before I go any further I would ask him whether he has seriously considered this matter.

Then there was the member who then represented the constituency of Prince, Prince Edward Island. I shall not say anything about that gentleman, because he has gone to his reward. And I shall skip over the former member for Middlesex West.

Mr. MacNICOL: He has also gone to his reward.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he has. I valued his friendship, too, while I was in the house with him, and I am not going to say anything more about him. Then there was Mr. Euler—and he has gone to his reward, too!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is what Mr. Euler had to say, as it appears at page 4517 of Hansard for May 2, 1933:

This tax of two cents on sugar amounts to practically 50 per cent of the value of the article, a very heavy tax indeed—

He took his cue from his colleagues.

—it strikes at everybody, and this is an article of food. I think it is very regrettable, though perhaps in some degree necessary, that we should have taxation on food.

Then, as reported at page 4520 of Hansard of May 2, 1933, the present Minister of National Defence said:

> While I am on my feet let me say that this is not the only tax that strikes at the masses of the people, because when we come to the sales tax the food of the people, which is now exempt from the sales tax, has to bear a six per cent tax which the masses of the people have never paid before.

What does he now think of the 8 per cent tax?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Two per cent higher.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then there was the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), a picturesque figure in this house. He was against it, too.

Then there is only one further extract I shall read, that from the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). He is the only one of these hon. gentlemen I now see in the house, in front of me. He felt it his bounden duty—and I can just see him now, standing up straight and throwing out his chest, the great champion of the common people!—to say:

> I feel it my duty to lodge a complaint against the tax of two cents a pound on sugar. . . . People cannot even buy sugar at present prices, let alone at the increased prices as a result of this tax.

What a demagogic appeal for a responsible citizen of this country!

Mr. MacNICOL: He got his reward, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he has his reward.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe all of us, in this corner of the house at least, are opposed to the increase in this tax. It does work a hardship on people who cannot afford to bear that hardship. I feel particularly opposed to this tax, and I agree with everything hon. members opposite said when the tax was first introduced by a Conservative government. I feel that a tax of this description is a tax on a luxury of the children of the nation. After all, sugar is not only something that children enjoy; it is something necessary for their health and welfare.

Having said that, I think we should probably have some information as to the entire sugar business of this country. I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his seat, and I can tell him that there is a good deal of misgiving about the sugar industry. The minister should make a statement regarding it to the committee. To-day we are importing sugar, and yet on the other hand we have a possibility of increasing our own production of sugar, through a development of the sugar beet industry. I should like to see the whole matter thoroughly discussed in this chamber, but this is not the time or the place to do it.

I wish to register on behalf of this group an emphatic protest against the increase in the sugar tax, and the imposition of taxes on other sweetening materials. In my opinion, this is one tax which might very well have been left out of the budget.

As I have said on several occasions in the last few days, I have a great deal of sympathy with the minister in his job of having to raise this huge sum of money for purposes of war. I believe, however, that a tax of this description, like the sales tax—and we would have opposed any suggestions for an increased sales tax; we much prefer the succession duty tax—is one which does work a hardship on the poorest home in the land, and the sugar tax ought not to have been increased at this time.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am opposed to the increase in the sugar tax. The minister made an accusation against me which I think was most unfair, and I should like to speak on behalf of some of these "special interests" for which he says I sometimes try to have taxes reduced.

In the constituency of Rosedale, which I have the honour to represent, there were just one year ago no fewer than 10,000 people who were forced to accept relief in order to live. Those people obviously did not have adequate incomes. In that constituency there are returned soldiers living on the so-called "burnt-out soldier's" pension of $40 a month, and yet the minister believes that this tax on sugar is not going to be a substantial burden to those people. It will amount to $5 or $6 a family. When a man's work is very uncertain; when he is unable to do a real piece of work because of his physical condition; when he has to pay an extra $6 or $7 throughout the year, and when he receives only $40 a month, a tax of this kind is a substantial hardship.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he says that this tax might easily have been left off, and the money raised elsewhere. I should also like to point out to the minister some of the other "special interests" whose taxes I endeavoured to have reduced. In the last few days I have endeavoured to have reduced the succession duties on the estates of soldiers who might die overseas. I felt that the amount was severe, and that something should be done to lessen it.

Another of the "special interests" I have been representing has been the soldiers who were taxed 10 per cent on transportation fares, a tax which was subsequently eliminated. If at times I speak about subjects about which I know, and with which I come in contact in my daily life, I believe it is only right that I should do so. I know about those subjects—and I am not like the Minister of Finance who put a tax on Canadian bonds payable in United States exchange, and subsequently withdrew the tax. Then, when an hon. member asked why he had put on the tax and then subsequently withdrew it, he said, "I must admit that it was due to my inexperience."

Mr. QUELCH: I have said very little up to this time on the whole question of taxation, and mainly for this reason, that I believe in the pay-as-you-go policy. If we are going to have a pay-as-you-go policy, we must have heavy taxation. Up to the present time I have voiced very little criticism of the heavy taxes which have been imposed upon the people. When we compare the tremendous sacrifices being made by the people overseas with conditions in Canada, we cannot say that the people of this country are having to make any very great sacrifice.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in the past he has laid down a definite policy with regard to war finance and taxation. I must admit frankly that I find it hard to follow that policy in connection with some of the taxes being imposed to-day. I should like to quote what he said last year:

> 3. That the task of finance is not only to provide the funds which are used to pay for the war services but more fundamentally is, by taxing and borrowing, to restrict the civilian demand for economic resources in order that they will be available to the defence or supply departments when required.

And again:

> 6. That taxation should be imposed upon a basis of equality of sacrifice, having regard to ability to pay.

I find it hard to understand how the tax on sugar, how the tax on gasoline used by farmers, how the national defence tax on people in the $660 income bracket, come within that definition. It certainly is not according to ability to pay, and we should not desire to restrict the consumption of these lines. I voiced no protest in connection with the higher taxes on income. As a matter of fact, I believe we could go still further. I voiced no protest regarding the excess profits tax. I should like to see it made one hundred per cent. I voiced no protest regarding the succession duties. I believe that these are all just taxes at a time like this, but I cannot see any justification for increasing the taxation of people who have not the ability to pay. This is not in line with the principle laid down by the minister, and it certainly is not necessary to restrict consumption in these lines. Speaking the other day in connection with the gasoline tax, the minister suggested that apparently some hon. members were more interested in getting votes than in supporting a necessary war policy at this time. The minister's words were:

> I do not blame him altogether, but he places a loyalty to the financial dollar and cent interests of his constituents above practically every other earthly consideration.

I thought that statement was addressed only to the hon. member for Rosthern; but according to the newspapers, the minister was referring to me and to other hon. members. I did not understand that then, or I would have replied. Apparently he was referring to all hon. members who were defending the tax on gasoline. I should like to have the minister justify at this time an increase in taxation which is not based upon ability to pay and which is not necessary for the purpose of restricting consumption of a particular article. Those are the two principles which he laid down and stressed in his speech on November 21. First of all, the main purpose of taxation was to restrict spending, restrict the purchasing of commodities, and, second, it was to be based upon ability to pay. I should like the minister to explain how these taxes meet those requirements.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is always a pleasure to engage in a discussion of fundamental principles with the hon. member for Acadia. I do not think this is a particularly good tax. It is an easy way of getting quite a lot of money. I would not say that that is the only virtue it has, but that is a great virtue under present conditions. There is this further thing to be said about it. For the most part, the sugar used in this country must be brought in in ships and shipping is exceedingly scarce. To an extent this tax on sugar will discourage consumption and place that much less strain upon shipping. However, I would not say that that was the major consideration in the imposition of this tax.

I think I stated in my budget address that this was the only tax which was purely a consumer's tax based upon the financial needs of the administration. The budget is remarkably free from these consumer taxes. Sugar is a necessity, but it is not purely a household necessity. It is used in connection with many things which are a little beyond the description of necessity. I am not prepared to stand here and say that this is an ideal tax; it certainly is not. I am not prepared to say that it will always be possible to impose ideal taxes. In fact, I think every one of these taxes has been opposed by some hon. member. The necessity for taxation is admitted, but the undesirability of each tax has been stressed. There may have been a few exceptions to that, but an argument has been made against nearly every tax.

We must have taxes, at least according to our views. I think I said, in the speech to which the hon. gentleman referred, that he would have us print money, to which he took some exception. I think, however, that is what he advocates, and all I can do is disagree.

Mr. QUELCH: I was wondering why we have not taken steps to increase the production of sugar within Canada, especially in view of the difficulty in connection with shipping to which the minister has referred. The production of sugar in the west could be expanded tremendously, and this would help solve the problem of wheat production. It would be possible for many farmers to go into the production of sugar beets, and instead of producing a commodity which is now a surplus, we would be producing a commodity which is scarce at the present time.

The last time I spoke I suggested that we could very well place a tax on advertising, and I cannot understand why the minister has not done this. This would be a profitable form of taxation. I consider it a detriment that we should have these large advertisements in our periodicals and papers. What are they doing? They are trying to get people to spend more money, and the minister is trying to get people to spend less money. They are working against the minister; their efforts are subversive. This would be a good place for a really heavy tax.

As I said before, with the exception of one or two items I have not opposed any of these taxes. The minister himself admits that this is not a good tax. Even yet, I think we could safely increase the income tax and the succession duties tax, yes and even the liquor tax and the excess profits tax up to 100 per cent. I should like to see all these taxes increased during the war. On the other hand, I am opposed to floating at this time a bond issue of $600,000,000. If the purpose of that is to restrict spending, then I contend that the proper way to do that is by taxation and not by the issue of bonds. If the purpose of these bonds is to raise revenue, then I contend that the proper way to do that is through the Bank of Canada.

The minister referred to the printing of bills, but I do not think that is a fair statement. Last year, when we borrowed $490,000,000 from the Bank of Canada from May 1 to June, did we print $490,000,000 worth of bills? I do not think we did. When we borrowed $250,000,000 later on in the year, did we print another $250,000,000 worth of bills? I do not think we did. It is nonsense for the minister to suggest that, when I urge that we use the Bank of Canada, that means printing money to that extent. All it means is increasing the cash reserves of the chartered banks and the amount of money they have on deposit with the Bank of Canada. We can very well prevent, by the means I have suggested in the past, the chartered banks from taking advantage from this increased cash reserve to expand their loans. Therefore I do not think the minister's talk about printing bills is based upon fact. He knows it is just common talk to scare the people. I challenge the minister to prove that the $490,000,000 which we borrowed last year brought about an issue of $490,000,000 of new bills, or that the $250,000,000 borrowed last January meant the printing of $250,000,000 of new bills. It did not. We can use the Bank of Canada without printing a single dollar bill, unless those bills are required in circulation.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to draw to the minister's attention a subject I have mentioned before, namely, giving some encouragement to the beet sugar industry in this country. There are large irrigation districts which are having a hard time getting along and other areas which could easily be irrigated if there was the prospect of expansion of the beet sugar industry. At the present time we are using only about 12·4 per cent of sugar from our own home-grown raw materials. If we could increase this amount by, say, reducing the tax on sugar produced from home-grown raw material, it would help to expand these districts, help to give employment, help the live stock industry, and be a real effort towards getting away from relief and providing employment for a class who have had a very hard time in the past.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is an important matter, too: that every sugar factory which would be established would be a source of revenue from a dozen different points of view. There would be the revenue from the gasoline tax, from the sales tax, from customs duties, from excise, and from many other sources; there would be revenue directly and indirectly.

There is one thing I aim never to do in my life, and that is to say, "I told you so," but I am going to come close to it to-night. Ever since I came here, I have on many occasions risen in my place and told the government that the time would come when we would need sugar and that, therefore, we ought to expand our own sugar industry. But never a thing done about it! The only thing ever done was the attempt last spring to destroy it.

Let us do some realistic thinking here. There is in this country, as the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Medicine Hat have said, almost an unlimited capacity to expand our sugar production. If we are having trouble now over shortage of ships, what do hon. members imagine our condition will be a year from now and perhaps a year from that? There is going to come a time, as I hinted the other night, when we may have to send three pounds of sugar from Canada to get one pound to Britain. What condition shall we be in then in order to measure up to our responsibility of delivering the goods? I do not believe there is on the face of this earth a group of people more absolutely foolish in their mismanagement of their country than the Canadian people at the present time, and I am going to take occasion to say a little more about that by and by. We are neglecting, for instance, the development of our sugar industry. We could produce every year right here in this dominion twice as much sugar as we could consume in a year. Every man who will take the trouble to face the facts would be more comfortable in his mind if he knew there was a full year's sugar supply in Canada for Canada, and if in the next two or three years he would know where Britain might get her sugar in case of need.

Who would have imagined a year ago that the Germans would be where they are now? Who would have imagined two years ago that they could possibly get where they are now? Who can begin to surmise where they will be a year from now? I do not think I shall say any more on the expansion of the sugar industry just now.

I feel personally that we are making in this tax a bad mistake. I have just come into the chamber from an errand on which I had to go, and I think the minister was holding forth that this was not a sound tax. I agree with him. I compliment the minister, too, upon the fact that he has built a budget in which there are very few consumer taxes. I recognize that, and it is a good point.

I should like to turn for a minute to the question of the creation of money. I do not wish to go into this too far. I have been wondering whether the minister was bound by some considerations external to the country in this matter of creating money, but the remark he made just now indicates that he is bound by considerations within his own mind and in the minds of the people who advise him. He may not agree with this, but let me tell him and the members of this administration that if, in this crisis, they neglect the capacity of this dominion to supply funds by the application of their power, authority and responsibility given under items 14 and 15 of section 91 of the British North America Act they will be responsible for Canada's deficiency in the war effort such as it may be. They are taking for granted that expansion of money is impossible and would cause inflation. That is a serious thing to take for granted. I do not think I will say anything more on that except to point out that if it is possible to create money without causing inflation—and beyond a shadow of a doubt it is up to a certain point—and since we have price control in Canada without which prices would go up out of sight in a very few years, we can hold prices down with an expansion of money just as well as we are holding prices down now. If the principle were adopted that a good deal of money can be created—I am not saying a great deal, but two or three hundred million dollars—we could remove a lot of these nuisance taxes from the people. That is where I hold the minister and the administration responsible for a great deal of unnecessary taxes.

When I was talking to the Conservatives last night and suggested to them that they did not have any alternative proposal, some of them misunderstood. Let me make it explicit. The only proposal I have heard them make is some other kind of tax. They do not want this ox gored but some other ox. It is the same thing; it is the goring of another ox. If they can suggest a means whereby money can be obtained in this country without additional taxation and without borrowing, they will be doing something that is worth doing in this country at this particular time. I maintain that just so long as the government imagines that Canada's capacity to exert herself financially is governed by her ability to tax and her ability to borrow, she is making a grave blunder and we shall, as surely as we sit here, be held responsible by generations yet to come. If disaster should come to our cause to-day, the administration that sits here will have their names written in black in history if they neglect to use the financial and economic capacities of this country which are right in their hands to-day through the British North America Act.

As to printing bills, there is no need to print bills. The minister has the idea, as have several Liberals who have spoken with me within the last few days, that the social credit proposals involve having huge rolls of bills with printing presses running all over this country, but they have no excuse for thinking that, because there are men here in this house who know just what the social credit proposals are, and any man in the Liberal party can get information from these men if he does not want to carry away a lot of nonsense in his head. To the extent that the Liberals are neglecting to inform themselves and use the sources of information right here at their disposal, they are going to be held accountable by future generations. Social credit does not envisage the printing of a great number of bills.

To illustrate: Suppose for a minute or two, that we wished to construct a sugar factory. Social credit would cause the banking institutions of this country to advance credit to an organization to build a sugar factory. There might not be a dollar bill involved; it would merely be a call on the credit of Canada, and it could be done through the institutions we have. Similar action could be taken all over the country to promote industries in every direction, greatly increasing the actual goods-producing power of the nation. I do not wish to go into detail; it is not in order to do it.

It is to me one of the strangest things that, with people here who are so sincere, so well informed on the matter of money, and so confident they know the way, as the group with which I am associated, not a single member of the administration has approached at any time any one of us asking to be given any idea as to what the possibilities are with respect to social credit. The assumption is that we just do not know. That is the most fatuous assumption that any group of governing men could possibly make. There is always a chance that any movement such as the social credit movement might be right. I will at this time delay the committee no further.

Mr. POULIOT: I always listen with the deepest attention and the greatest interest to the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit group. This is not the first time that he has expounded those theories in this chamber. But he has his own way of expressing them, and they seem always new. When I listen to him, it is as though I had not heard these theories before, because he has the gift of making each time a new presentation. I know he speaks with great sincerity about the problem of money. It seems to me, however, that he overlooks one fact, namely, that money is not the principal; it is only an accessory, and it must be considered accordingly.

Mr. KUHL: Can you get along without it?

Mr. POULIOT: Very often I do.

Mr. MacNICOL: But your credit is good.

Mr. POULIOT: But here we are discussing taxation, and I have already told my hon. friends of the Social Credit group that the best way to get information about currency and monetary business is to read quietly the reports of the various chartered banks and trust companies, the Canada Gazette, and other publications of the same kind. What I find most interesting are the tabulations which appear from month to month in the Canada Gazette. They are the monthly reports of our chartered banks. To my mind, it is impossible to discuss currency without having that kind of information in mind.

Of course there are learned doctors of philosophy—Ph.Ds—learned economists, and learned So-and-so's who have written on the same topic; but, strange as it seems, I have enjoyed the reading of official papers much more than those lucubrations, because with a little patience we can understand something of the contents of official publications, when we cannot understand a word of what is written by economists, sociologists, and others of the same kind.

Therefore, sir, I speak to you not as a learned man—I confess I am not—but just as an ordinary man, a layman. On these questions I will agree with the leader of the Social Credit group only when he is able to satisfy my mind by giving me a clear explanation of his system. I have the greatest regard for him, but until now I have not had that pleasure.

Mr. KUHL: None so blind as those who do not wish to see.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that I am a little hard of hearing.

Mr. KUHL: There are none so blind as those who do not wish to see.

Mr. POULIOT: Of course, you see, I am not blind, but I am a little hard of hearing, and that is why I do not catch what has been said. I may be also a little hard of understanding—I say that in all humility—and I do not pretend to teach anything to anyone, I just try to explain when I understand something, and when I do not understand anything I do not try to teach others, because I know very well that the result of my teachings would be an awful mess.

Now, sir, to come to the point; there is something in high finance which I do not understand any better than I understand the theories of my hon. friends of the Social Credit group. On this point, at all events, I assume that we shall be in accord. In the first place, I have never believed in the Bank of Canada. I find it the fifth wheel of the coach. I shall not now enlarge upon the reasons why I am not enthusiastic about that expensive organization; I shall merely indicate why I am not satisfied with it.

In the first place, it is a mystery, and in my humble view there should be no monetary secrets from the members of the House of Commons. I have said this under other circumstances. What help would it be to Hitler to know what is the extent of any expenditure which is made here in Canada? When I am told that it would be a bad thing for the prosecution of the war to give us some information about the Bank of Canada or the foreign exchange control board, I am not satisfied with that answer. It is quite a long time ago that an ex-Minister of Finance told me that it was impossible to give the members of the House of Commons definite information about the doings of the Bank of Canada. In my humble view, the responsibility of finance should be now, as it was in the past, in the hands of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: It was with the utmost regret that I saw that our securities, which were in the east block under the guard of the Minister of Finance, were being transferred to the Bank of Canada; and it was with still deeper regret that I learned from the press that these securities were transferred from the Bank of Canada to the foreign exchange control board, which does not issue our bank notes. What guarantee, therefore, is there for the bank notes? Our securities, which are the pledge for these bank notes, are in the hands of a body other than that which issues the bank notes. We have inflation, of course. If the issuance of bank notes is made by a body that is distinct from the one that holds our national securities, the bank notes are not covered when they are issued. Of course, it is the suggestion of the intelligentsia, and it was done before the time when the present Minister of Finance took charge of that department. I have, however, sufficient confidence in him to expect that he will put things in order in his department and that he will be strong enough to correct abuses.

Is it not my definite right as a member of parliament to ask for information with regard to this matter, which is of national importance? There is a question which has been on the order paper since May 23 and is now the first of the questions on the order paper today. The question has been there for some time, and I want some definite information in answer to it. I have been refused information about the gold held by other countries and now in the vaults of the Bank of Canada but not in the possession of the Bank of Canada. I may tell the minister I have information that the transfer from the Bank of Canada to the foreign exchange control board was not authorized by the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. I shall say more, that when the Bank of Canada was instituted it was set up as a privately owned corporation, but now it is publicly owned, since the Dominion of Canada has purchased all the stock of that bank. As it is a publicly owned organization, how is it that we members of parliament are denied information with regard to it? We should be the first to know about it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that the Chairman says I am not in order. I always respect the Chair and I will not insist. I know, sir, that what I am asking is essential to an understanding of finance, and finance is not a complicated matter. It is most simple, and the explanation given must satisfy the mind. When we think of this as Canadian citizens, who expect that the future of this country will be bright after the sombre days through which we are passing, and that the sun of dawn will shine again after a very dark night, then, if we want that to happen, if we want the future days to be happier than those in which we are now living, we must be very careful about the financial structure of the country. Of course, the comparison about structure can be applied to many matters. It must be applied to the financial system. The basis or foundation of the financial system must be strong if we wish to build upon it. I shall have other remarks to make later on, but I would point out that we cannot give too deep study to this matter. I appreciate the fact that hon. members feel as I do, that this matter is serious and that we cannot give it too much thought and foresight—foresight for the future, so that the future shall be better than the present.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to ask the minister a question which he can answer on some other item. On the war appropriation bill I asked the minister how the lag between total expenditures and total revenue would be made up. In the budget speech he said that there was a lag of one billion dollars. It is proposed to make up $600,000,000 of that by the sale of bonds. How does he propose to make up the balance? Will it be by means of bond issues or through borrowing from the chartered banks? That is, by monetary expansion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I can give such a statement before the session ends. One cannot tell.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister also, on some other item, say why he considered it undesirable to raise money by taxing advertising? I do not think he has answered that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not relevant here. It is not in order to discuss alternative taxes at a stage like this.

Mr. QUELCH: But the minister himself has accused us of attempting to do away with certain taxes without suggesting some other source of revenue.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. I allowed the leader of the Social Credit group to discuss questions not relevant to the section, and he was followed by the hon. member for Témiscouata, who also was out of order. Now the hon. gentleman is continuing a discussion which is not relevant to section 15.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely I am in order in asking whether there should not be an alternative way of raising revenue by placing a tax on advertising instead of on sugar. If the minister does not wish to answer that question now, he can do so on some other item. The committee is entitled to know why the government refuses to tax advertising.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I should like to give that undertaking. Perhaps it would be relevant on some item of my estimates, or something of that kind—

Mr. QUELCH: Name the item. You choose the item.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether there is an item or not.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister mean to say that in a budget debate it is not relevant to ask such a question? That is nonsense.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are talking about sugar. If I were to undertake to go into the merits and demerits of alternative taxes I do not know where we would end. I have been giving some consideration to the question of advertising, perhaps not as extensively as I should have done, and I can see great difficulties. But is there anything to be gained at this stage of the session, or this stage of the debate, by entering into a discussion of the pros and cons of some alternative tax, selected at random? I will take the hon. gentleman's suggestion into consideration; it may be that we shall have to impose taxes on many things before this war is over; but why enter into an academic debate on some item that is not before the committee?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask one relevant question. What would be the expected revenue from (a) and (b)?

Mr. ILSLEY: For both of them—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like them separately, if possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not have them separately for the coming year, but we have the figures for last year. For 1940-41, the revenue from sugar was $11,637,094, and from glucose, $257,333.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is expected under the increased rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: In a full year there will be about $12,000,000 additional.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) presented the third report of the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY—OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are life assurance companies, under the Canadian and British Companies Act, allowed to own and operate public utility companies in Canada?

2. Does the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada own, operate or control the Stormont Electric Light and Power Company, Cornwall, Ontario?

3. Did the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada obtain control of, own or operate any other public utilities in Canada? If so, when were such properties acquired?

4. What office does, or did, Mr. Lawrence Jack, of Montreal, occupy in the Sun Life Assurance Company?

5. What regulations have been imposed on these public utilities of the Sun Life by the superintendent of insurance?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Canadian life insurance companies have been restricted by The Insurance Act, 1910, and successor statutes including The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, from acquiring more than 30 per cent of the common stock, or of the total stocks, of any corporation. Control of any corporation acquired before 1911 may continue to be exercised thereafter.

2. Yes.

3. Yes, two others, both before 1911.

4. Mr. Jack is an employee in the investment department of the company.

5. There is no provision in the insurance laws of the dominion for the regulation by the superintendent of insurance of corporations controlled or operated by insurance companies.

CANNED LOBSTER CONTROL—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. Who is the assistant controller or manager for Prince Edward Island under the canned lobster control scheme?

2. Is his appointment seasonal, full-time or otherwise?

3. What salary does he receive?

4. What sums have been paid him as salary?

5. What sums have been paid him as expenses?

6. What has been the total cost to date of operations in Prince Edward Island under this scheme?

7. What have been the departmental or general cost for advertising and other expenditures and the proportion of same chargeable to Prince Edward Island?

8. What have been the total number of cases handled, (a) from Prince Edward Island; (b) from New Brunswick; (c) from Nova Scotia; (d) all sources?

9. What have been the total expenses?

10. What have been the total receipts from the lobsters handled under the scheme?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. There is no assistant controller or manager for Prince Edward Island.

2. and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. and 5. W. H. Tidmarsh of Charlottetown was employed as depot manager there from May 28 to October 31, 1940, and during that period received,—salary, $1,025.81; expenses, $44.20.

6. $1,774.63.

[Mr. Church.]

7. General cost of advertising based on total production of 58,898 cases—$50,000; proportion to P.E.I. based on 17,284 cases produced, $14,748.70; expenses other than shown in No. 6—chargeable to P.E.I., $1,405.47.

8. (a) Prince Edward Island, 2,556 cases; (b) New Brunswick, 2,370 cases; (c) Nova Scotia, 5,196 cases; all sources, 10,122 cases.

9. Exclusive of advertising, $123,727.57.

10. Sales of canned lobster in Canadian and United States dollars, $96,977.02; United States exchange, $6,901.51; sale empty containers, $256.75; inventories other than canned lobster, $7,121.07; total, $111,256.35; net cost of operations, $12,471.22.

PRESS CENSORSHIP—"THE TREND"

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was a pamphlet or newspaper, dated March 20, 1941, called The Trend, censored at Montreal by press censor?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. Who was the censor?

4. How many copies of The Trend, in excess of two hundred, were allowed to be published and circulated?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Yes.

2. Because in the opinion of the press censor, certain material in it, consisting of an inaccurate report of a speech, contravened the defence of Canada regulations, 39A.

3. Mr. E. McMahon, assistant press censor in charge at the Montreal office.

4. None in excess of 200.

ADDRESS OF FRENCH CONSUL-GENERAL IN MONTREAL ON TUNISIA

Mr. CHURCH:

Has the attention of the government been called to an address delivered at Montreal in March, 1941, by the consul-general of the French government, on Tunisia, and containing comments reflecting on the United Kingdom and her allies, and the conduct of the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

CANADIAN MINISTER TO FRANCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has Canada now an envoy or minister or ambassador to the Vichy government of France?

2. If so, who is he, where is he located and what functions does he perform?

3. Will he be recalled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. The Canadian minister to France is Lt.-Col. G. P. Vanier, D.S.O., M.C., who is now in Montreal. He is serving as a member of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence established by the governments of Canada and the United States. The Canadian legation to France is now established in London in charge of Mr. Pierre Dupuy, first secretary of the legation who is also in charge of the Canadian legations to the Netherlands and Belgium.

3. This is a matter of government policy which will depend on circumstances.

VICHY GOVERNMENT AND THE WAR—CANADIAN SEAMEN FROM SS. "PORTADOC"

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government ask the French government, under Marshal Petain, what its present war aims are towards the British empire and Canada?

2. What replies have been received from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, or from the French government, through its local legation, to information asked for by the government, as announced in the House of Commons on May 19, 22, and 27, last?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. This too is a matter of government policy with respect to which it is considered inadvisable to make any statement at present.

2. The information requested of the French government regarding the position of Canadian seamen from the SS. Portadoc who were landed in French Guinea has not yet been received. In view of the known difficulties in communication, the delay in receiving this information is not unreasonable.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—H. H. BELL

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What position does H. H. Bell hold in the Department of Munitions and Supply?

2. Did he enter government service through the civil service commission, and, if so, at what grade and what salary?

3. What are his educational qualifications?

4. What experience did he have prior to his entry into government service?

5. What is his present salary?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Departmental purchasing agent, grade 2.

2. Appointed through the civil service commission as clerk, grade 3, at $1,380.

3. One year high school and one year commercial.

4. 1930-32, investigation officer, customs excise preventive service, Department of National Revenue, Niagara Falls, Ontario; 1934-39, salesman, Waverley Motors Limited, Ottawa; 1939-40, salesman, Pinks Limited, Ottawa.

5. $2,220 per annum.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

INTERNATIONAL WATER SUPPLY LIMITED—WAR CONTRACTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many contracts have been awarded since the outbreak of war to International Water Supply Company, Ltd., of London, Ontario?

2. What are the particulars of the nature and amount of such contracts?

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT—GIN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 303 (a) of this session and to attached circulars until August 4, 1939, was it permitted under the regulations of any department to call "gin" anything else than "potable spirit sweetened or unsweetened prepared from grain spirit specially rectified and redistilled with juniper berries and flavouring herbs, etc." as described by section 11 of the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act?

2. Why were the collectors of customs and excise and excise officers in charge of distilleries "required to ensure that no spirit other than spirit distilled from grain is used in the manufacture of gin, etc."?

3. When did it become permitted for the first time to label as "compound gin" a "beverage made by adding neutral spirits to a distillate obtained from a mixture of alcohol, juniper berries and other flavouring herbs, without subsequent redistillation of the whole, etc.", as described by section 11 (a) of the said regulations?

4. What was the reason of such a change in the said regulations?

5. At whose request and through what counsel, solicitor, agent or lobbyist was it made?

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 303 of this session, during the last six years, did any department analyse the beverage labelled "genuine Hollands-Geneva-John de Kuyper & Sons, etc."?

2. If so, how many times?

3. Each time, was it, (a) "prepared from grain spirits specially rectified and redistilled with juniper berries, etc.", or (b) "made by cold mixing molasses alcohol with malt wine, without being redistilled, etc.", or (c) "by first using spirits not made from grain mashes and secondly not redistilling such mixture with juniper berries, etc."?

4. Was the beverage referred to in No. 1 permitted to be labelled as "gin"?

5. If so, when for the first time?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend part 5 of question 16 by adding after the word "time" the words "during the last six years".

Amendment agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—CORRESPONDENCE WITH ASSOCIATION OF TECHNICAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any department of government; or any official thereof, and the association of technical employees, and also copy of the ruling made by the Department of Justice with regard to the ability or inability of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to do business with the trades union.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

DOMINION BRIDGE COMPANY—CALGARY ROLLING MILLS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other correspondence exchanged between the dominion government and the Dominion Bridge Company, and/or other interested parties, since the beginning of the present war to date, in connection with the Calgary Rolling Mills.

LORETTEVILLE, QUE., INDIAN RESERVE WATERWORKS SYSTEM

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all reports, contracts, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the ministry of health of the province of Quebec and the Department of Mines and Resources (Indian affairs branch), and between the latter and Mr. Ludger Bastien of Loretteville, Quebec, relative to the purchase of a waterworks system on the Loretteville reserve.

REGULATIONS UNDER SECTIONS 11 AND 11(a) OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, briefs, telegrams, and reports in relation to the enactment of sections 11 and 11 (a) of the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this is carried, I should like to amend it by adding the words "and application" after the word "enactment" in the second line.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $29,414,206 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1941; to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company or of any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways system and for the issue of substituted securities for such purposes; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for the purposes aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $29,414,206 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system; to authorize the company to pay supplementary contributions to certain railway employees' provident funds; and to authorize the making of further temporary loans to the said company for interim deficits, said loans to be reimbursed from the annual revenues.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Tuesday, June 3, 1941, until adjournment on completion of current business, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EFFECT UPON EXISTING WAR CONTRACTS OF INCREASES IN MINIMUM WAGE RATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to an order in council reported to have been passed on May 31 providing for increases in minimum wage rates for the manufacture of supplies for the government, and providing that government contractors must now pay not less than the rates set up under the law of the province where the work is performed and never less than 35 cents per hour for adult male employees and 25 cents per hour for adult female employees. This is said to be retroactive in effect.

Having regard to the steady rise in the cost of living I am in accord with the principle underlying this announcement. I understand it is felt that the minimum wage paid in certain cities in the province of Quebec is too low. The question arises: Does this order in council apply to all contracts let by the government on a competitive basis, and if it is to be retroactive in effect, is it the intention of the government that the difference in cost occasioned thereby in respect of competitive contracts let prior to the passing of the order in council will be made good by the government, or will the contractor be obliged to make good the difference?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. I think the use of the word "retroactive" has proven to be a little misleading, and if I read section 2 of the order in council it might answer his question: It reads:

The terms of all existing contracts of the type to which the said "B" conditions apply, shall be revised by the insertion therein of the foregoing schedule of minimum wages, such revision to become effective ten days after written notice thereof has been communicated to the contractor.

I think it would be a fair interpretation to say that this applies to all new contracts and to other contracts in connection with which notice has been given pursuant to the terms of the order in council. I shall table the order in council. I think any adjustments will have to be considered not by the Department of Labour but rather by my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). It would be unfair for me to undertake to say what will be done in connection with existing contracts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question whether the contractor or the government will have to absorb the additional cost has not really been settled.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The adjustment of contracts is a matter that arises from time to time in connection with the interpretation of the fair wages act. All I can say is that this depends upon the contractual obligations. I cannot say offhand that in every case the contractor will be reimbursed; it will depend upon the nature of his contract.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING

USE BY THE UNITED KINGDOM OF CERTAIN CIVIL FLYING TRAINING FACILITIES IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to put a question to the government based upon a news item which appeared in most of the Canadian newspapers during the last week-end. This news item is dated at Washington and indicates that the United Kingdom government proposes to train a large number of British air crew in the United States. Will the government inform the house, first, whether it was consulted with respect to this proposal, and, second, as to the effect, if any, of such a proposal upon the British commonwealth air training plan?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have been expecting for some days that a question like this would be raised, and I have had in my portfolio a letter which I received from the high commissioner of the United Kingdom in reference to the matter to which my hon. friend has just referred. The letter is dated May 13, 1941, addressed to myself as Secretary of State for External Affairs, and reads:

My dear Prime Minister,

I am writing about the proposal that the United Kingdom government should avail themselves of certain facilities for civil flying training in the United States of America, which Sir Archibald Sinclair discussed with Colonel Ralston at the time of the latter's visit to London.

The United Kingdom government are grateful for the Canadian government's cooperation in the consultations on the subject which have proceeded between the two governments since, and are glad that there is agreement that the proposal offers advantages that we should unhesitatingly accept. The United Kingdom government wish me to repeat at the same time that these plans will in no way reduce the scope of the joint air training plan in Canada, which, together with those other measures of assistance in the field of air training so generously afforded by the Canadian government, are being developed much beyond the maximum degree originally planned and at a pace which is far ahead of the original schedule. This constitutes a remarkable achievement by the Canadian authorities who are mainly responsible for this scheme, which will, we believe, be one of the most weighty and decisive factors in gaining victory for our arms.

Yours sincerely,

Malcolm MacDonald.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): There is no question of Canada's sovereignty involved in this proposal, is there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a question of Canada's sovereignty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the question three years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Three years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is far afield.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The United States were not concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not understand the significance of my hon. friend's remarks. Perhaps he will explain them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will speak for themselves.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

CHEESE FOR SHIPMENT TO BRITAIN—CANADA TO SUPPLEMENT BASIC PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement on behalf of the dairy products board.

The agreement between the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom completed on the 31st October, 1940, provides that Canada will supply the United Kingdom Ministry of Food with 112,000,000 pounds of cheese manufactured during the year ending March, 1942. The United Kingdom Ministry of Food has agreed to accept such additional quantities as may be available for export. The price to be paid by the United Kingdom Ministry of Food is 14·4 cents per pound on board ship eastern Canadian ports. The government of Canada has supplemented this to the extent of ·6 cents per pound, making a basic price of 15 cents per pound for first grade cheese on board ship.

The dairy products board on the 20th May, 1941, issued an order requiring that during an indefinite period commencing 26th May, 1941, all cheese manufactured in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are to be large white cheese and to be exported.

The dominion government is supplementing the price of cheese for export to the extent of another cent per pound, making a basic price on board ship of 16 cents for first grade cheese. This extra price will be applicable to cheese manufactured on and after the 26th day of May and exported. The dominion government is, therefore, supplementing the amount paid by the United Kingdom to the extent of 1·6 cents per pound.

On a basis of the minimum quantity to be exported, namely, 112,000,000 pounds, Canada's contribution at 1·6 cents per pound amounts to $1,792,000, but if the quantity actually exported exceeds 112,000,000 pounds this amount will be increased by 1·6 cents per pound on each pound over 112,000,000 which is exported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed from Friday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 88, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Gasoline.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably absent when this question was previously before the house, and for that reason I should like to speak on this item at this time.

I have received a large number of protests against the imposition of the gasoline tax so far as agriculture is concerned, in that it means an increase in the cost of production for the western farmer at a time when the government is doing nothing to assure him of a fair return for the products which he sells. Every other industry but agriculture is in the position of receiving a fair return. I was surprised to read all the arguments advanced by the Minister of Agriculture for supporting this tax. At page 3052 of Hansard he said:

> It is a tax which, even as now proposed, is levied on a very small percentage of the farmers of Canada.

So that his justification was that only a few were affected thereby. At page 3054 he set out the reasons why he was supporting this tax. I quote:

> Coming to the question whether this tax should be imposed on farmers, or whether there should be any tax on farmers, I think we shall all agree that the farmer does pay his share of taxation, whether this three-cent tax is imposed or not. I am not arguing the question from that point of view at all. A three-cent tax on gasoline does mean something to many farmers. It does not mean as much as some of us would seem to have convinced ourselves that it does with regard to many farmers of certain types.

A little further down he says:

> But I think I am in agreement with at least sixty per cent, and probably seventy-five per cent, of the membership of this house when I say there never has been introduced in this house a budget which was so completely a farmers' budget as the budget introduced by the present Minister of Finance. That is recognized by farmers all across Canada.

He refers to the budget as a farmer's budget. No doubt he has some reasons for making that statement. If I understand it correctly it means this, that it is a farmer's budget because of the fact that in the main it imposes increased income taxes; and by reason of the operation of the policies of this government and its failure to assure the farmer an income, there being therefore no income, it is a farmer's budget for which the government should be commended.

No one is arguing against any of the taxes in this budget on the basis that the people of Canada are not willing to pay them. I realize the difficulty which confronts the Minister of Finance in raising taxes; I appreciate the necessity of securing revenue. But the best way for the minister to make a success of the campaign for the loan which is now before the people of Canada would be to go on the radio and assure the people that their sacrifices and their willingness to make them are appreciated, and that this government is going to cut out unnecessary expenditure for non-war purposes and pare down necessary ones to the limit.

A return has been made to the house this very day in connection with which I wish to protest in that it shows that the governmenat is continuing to increase non-war expenditures at a time when ever-increasing taxation is being imposed upon the people. Referring to the Minister of Agriculture's new policy for reducing wheat acreage by summer-fallowing, according to this return, which was brought down in reply to my question whether he had any men out in western Canada explaining the scheme, the Minister of Agriculture has thirty-seven men going about the country, each at a salary of $150 a month, plus living expenses when away from headquarters and mileage for use of cars, explaining to the western farmer the need of this legislation. Is there any justification for it at a time like this, I ask the Minister of Finance? Instead of reducing non-essential, non-war expenditures, one department alone proceeds with an expenditure of about $6,000 a month in order to explain to the farmer what he already knows through advertisements which have appeared in the press.

I suggest this—and I have not spoken before in reference to these various measures introduced by the Minister of Finance that when you expect people to make sacrifices so as to be able to contribute to the war loan, and when you impose taxation such as this upon the farmer, non-war expenditures should be reduced to the greatest possible extent, and it is difficult to see that this is being done.

In looking over the list of these expenditures I find that for the years 1938 to 1941 the estimated amounts of expenditure were approximately as follows, the year in each case ending on March 31: 1938, $425 millions; 1939, $411 millions; 1940, $455 millions; 1941, $434 millions, and the estimated expenditure for the year ending March 31, 1942, is $431 millions.

Mr. ILSLEY: In two of those years we had two sets of estimates, the main estimates and the special supplementary estimates, and then a third set, the ordinary supplementaries. I believe the hon. gentleman has compared the main estimates only in those two years with the main estimates of the last two years. We had only two sets of estimates in the last two years, as distinguished from three previously. I think the hon. gentleman has fallen into an error in his comparisons.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I am taking the same set of figures all the way through, and I am asking the Minister of Finance what is being done to reduce non-war expenditures. Apparently they have not been reduced more than a few millions. I find instances such as this which came to hand to-day, of thousands of dollars being expended in order to create jobs for friends in western Canada. There is no justification for this sort of thing.

I appreciate the industry which the minister applies to his position, and I assure him that if he would tell the people of Canada that the estimates before the committee, and those to be brought down during the next few days, will be very considerably reduced, it would make a great deal of difference to the success of the loan campaign. As one example, take the Montreal terminal. The expenditure on that project in the coming year, in order to carry into effect a political promise, will amount to $4,466,596. I plead with the minister that political promises be not honoured in these times. I plead with him, so far as political promissory notes are concerned, either to extend the time for maturity or cancel them altogether.

Here we are in the last few days of the session, asking people to submit to ever-increasing taxation, which they are prepared to do for war purposes but not for controllable non-war expenditures. We as members of this committee have the right to protest against the government's having held back most of the non-war estimates until a time when, with termination of the session pretty well set for the end of the week, it will be impossible for us to deal with each one individually and give it the attention it should receive. The people are asking us to give these matters attention. They are willing to make sacrifices, but they expect us to see to it that the slogan "business as usual" is not to be applied to, or made an excuse for, continuing non-war expenditures at the amounts at which they now stand.

All over western Canada the farmers are asking that they be exempted from the gasoline tax. I have not at any time, in the committee or in the house, spoken in protest against any other tax. I recognize that taxation is necessary, but this particular tax is, in my opinion, most unfair. The Minister of Finance, in his argument, admitted it. He conceded its unfairness by saying that he had considered various avenues of escape, but that, because it would be difficult to arrange for exemptions, no course was open to him other than to put it into effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that if we had had exemptions we would have had a considerably higher tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, but the minister also said that the reason the farmers and fishermen were not exempt was that he, his colleagues and those associated with him, could not find any effective means of preventing evasions. He pointed to the situation in one province—he must have referred to Saskatchewan—and the difficulty of enforcing the provincial legislation as to refunds of gasoline tax.

I am registering my protest. I realize that our protests do not mean much, but I protest against the tax, and in doing so, I couple with it the suggestion that the minister immediately see to it that non-war expenditures be reduced, so that there may be no question of the performance of political promises at a time like this.

Now that we are trying to get tourists from the United States, the effect of this tax will be particularly undesirable. All over the United States, although I speak particularly of the west, the people are being warned by nazi propagandists not to come to Canada. All kinds of reasons are given, such as alleged difficulties at the boundary and interference with free ingress and egress. A recent article in the Financial Post shows that one of the chief arguments used against tourists coming to Canada, thereby providing us with United States dollars, is the fact that the Minister of Finance, on the occasion of the conference on the Sirois report, warned the Canadian people that rationing gasoline might be necessary. By increasing the tax you keep out more tourists. Within the last week I have had letters from people in the United States who regularly visit Canada, stating that in view of this tax they do not intend to do so any more.

In connection with the acquiring of United States dollars, here is an advertisement on behalf of the Canadian government which to my mind is the most unusual and peculiar which has ever been put out on behalf of Canada. It is issued by the Canadian government travel bureau in the United States and appears in the April issue of National Geographic magazine. What a description of Canada's war effort! I quote:

> Canada at war is still the greatest playground in the world.

The word "still" is underlined. This is an advertisement that is to bring tourists into Canada! I ask for exemption, first, for farmers and, second, for tourists in order that United States dollars which we need shall not be diminished in their flow into Canada through reduction in tourist traffic consequent on the imposition of this tax.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think I should let this opportunity pass without once more protesting against this tax on gasoline as it applies to farmers and fishermen. I have already referred to the good times which have been enjoyed by industry. Labour is now enjoying the level of remuneration that prevailed between 1926 and 1929. If the farmers were receiving to-day the price for their wheat that they received at that time, they would be in a better position to face this tax. If we were getting the price paid between 1926 and 1929 we should be receiving $1.35 a bushel for No. 1 northern at Fort William, but instead of that we are getting 70 cents. Why are farmers singled out for unjust taxation when the prices they receive for their products are so unfair? One-third of Canada's population is on the land, and a large proportion of the people are directly dependent upon the farmers for their living. Why, then, are we discriminated against?

In the last analysis, farmers are the ones who have to bear the brunt of Canada's taxation. They are asked to send their sons to fight the battle overseas, and we want to know why we are discriminated against not only in the matter of prices but also in the matter of taxation. I am not speaking for the farmers of my constituency alone but for farmers across Canada, because it appears that a number of farmer representatives do not think it worth while protesting. My voice may not have any effect on the government's programme, but I think as a farmer representative I should at least protest against a tax which I regard as unjust.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the estimated revenue from the farmers through this gasoline tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no estimate.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can the minister give no estimate?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Even on the basis of the number of tractor farmers there are in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister given further thought to the representations which I and others have made, that farmers and fishermen be exempt from the gasoline tax? If the minister has not been able to do so as a federal measure, has he communicated with the provincial government to see whether a further rebate can be allowed to farmers and fishermen in Nova Scotia so that they will not have to pay more for their gasoline? They will be subject to the highest gasoline tax in all Canada, and they are the people who are least able to pay it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The farmers and fishermen in their work will pay the three cents in Nova Scotia just as others anywhere else will. It is the same, because there is an exemption of farmers and fishermen from the gasoline tax in Nova Scotia, apart from this impost.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was asking whether any representations had been made to the effect that as a contribution to the war and a special concession to the farmers and fishermen in Nova Scotia in carrying on their vocations, there be an allowance by the province so that these classes of users would be relieved of the new tax on a commodity which is so essential in their occupations.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member mean that we should suggest to the government of Nova Scotia that they should make a rebate of part or all of the gasoline tax on gasoline used by farmers and fishermen for pleasure purposes?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I did not say that. I said, in their occupations as farmers and fishermen.

Mr. ILSLEY: In that respect they are now exempt.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does the minister suggest that this three-cent tax does not apply to the farmers and fishermen in that province?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but the hon. gentleman has asked whether I would make representations to the government of Nova Scotia for a refund or some exemption from the tax on farmers and fishermen. They have no tax except a tax on gasoline used for pleasure purposes. That is why I asked the hon. member whether he wanted me to make representations for a remission of part of that tax.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I suggest that representations might be made by the minister to the government of Nova Scotia whereby the classes of users of gasoline in that province to whom I have referred might be compensated for this tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not made any such representations. I am not sure I understand what they are, but I have not made them.

Mr. WRIGHT: I protested against this tax when we were discussing the resolution and I do not intend to go over the arguments again. Since then, however, the minister has made the statement that this tax will affect only a small percentage of farmers. I do not agree with him. It will certainly affect 90 per cent of the farmers of Canada, because there is not a farmer to-day who is not using gasoline for some purpose. He uses it in his threshing and other work as well. In western Canada last fall the cost of operations increased and the farmer absorbed that additional expense. With this added cost on gasoline, and with the wage increase that will come again this fall, the extra burden will be passed on to the farmers. This gasoline tax will be passed on to every farmer both in the west and in the east.

We have a shortage of agricultural products in practically every line except wheat. The Minister of Agriculture has announced that the price of cheese has been raised a cent a pound, the object being to promote greater production. We shall be faced this winter with a shortage of other dairy products, and in this tax we are putting an additional cost on the farmer which will tend to diminish his production of these things. I protest against this addition to the cost of agricultural production in Canada, when not only we but the people of Great Britain as well need the things that we can produce.

Mr. GARDINER: I might direct attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and make what I am sure he will agree is a necessary correction. The questions asked were these: How many persons are employed by the federal Department of Agriculture in explaining the summer-fallow bonus system in the three western provinces? What are their names? What remuneration and expenses does each receive? The answer is as follows: At the present time, thirty-seven persons are employed in field work in connection with the wheat acreage reduction programme in the western provinces. That work does not consist of just what my hon. friend referred to a few moments ago, explaining the summer-fallow bonus system. I have before me a list of those persons. I am not familiar with all the names, but I would say that with the exception of possibly half a dozen all these men were already in the employ of the federal government or of one or other of the provincial governments. That is, they were either in the employ of this government under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act or the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, or they have been in the employ of the government of one of the provinces in connection with relief matters, or in similar work among the farmers of that province. Those who have come from other governments have been given leave of absence for the time they will be working for this government, which may be only a few weeks. The others, who have been employed in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, will carry on some of their previous activities in conjunction with the work they do in reference to the wheat acreage reduction. In other words, as I explained to the house earlier this session, the prairie farm assistance organization is being used for the purpose of administering the wheat acreage reduction plan; and many of the persons whose names appear in this list were employed in connection with our other activities, but are being paid for the time being under this appropriation.

Mr. MAYBANK: What is the total number of completely new employees, and what is the total expense in respect of them?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not entirely familiar with these names, so that I am not in a position to say exactly how many of the thirty-seven are new, but my estimate would be that probably not more than half a dozen new men are on the list. The others are men who have been employed in these other activities. The total expense while they are doing this work will be at the rate of $150 per month per man. We do not know yet how long they will be on this work, but it will be for some weeks during the summer while seeding and summer-fallow operations are being carried on.

Mr. MAYBANK: Would $2,000 or $3,000 cover it?

Mr. GARDINER: I would judge so. I should think that my hon. friend, in giving his figures a few moments ago, probably multiplied twelve by $150 and then by thirty-seven, but of course the total will not be anything like that amount.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says there are six new employees.

Mr. GARDINER: Do not make it too specific; I am not absolutely sure, but it is about that number.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that include those who were formerly in the employ of the provincial governments?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there are about six in addition to those formerly in the service of the dominion or provincial governments. I think only about five or six of these men were with the provincial governments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then we have about six men who are new employees and another six who were formerly with the provincial governments, and who therefore would not be on the dominion payroll.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then how many more were formerly employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to check the list to say. I am not sure of the number, but the remainder would be employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and in similar activities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would those formerly connected with the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be in the service of the dominion government at the present time, as Prairie Farm Assistance Act employees?

Mr. GARDINER: Those who are employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are only called up for a few weeks during the summer. They are not what you might call permanent employees. They are called up just as hail inspectors are called up under hail insurance, to carry on their duties for perhaps three or four weeks, or two or three months. Those are the men who have been employed in this case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that these men who are designated as employees under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act have not been in the employ of the dominion government in recent months?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, the first man on the list has been in the employ of the dominion government for the last twelve months. I do not know how many more are in the same position; I would have to check the whole list.

Mr. PERLEY: Then there is an expense account, as I understand it?

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not want this converted into a discussion of agriculture estimates. Certainly it is out of order to discuss in detail the question which has been raised. I try not to raise points of order, but we are on the gasoline tax, and apparently we are in for an afternoon of discussion on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, or wheat reduction, or something of the kind.

Mr. COLDWELL: I concur in what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said with regard to criticisms. We have appealed to the minister to remit this tax as it applies to farmers and fishermen. The other evening I said the minister was stubborn. Perhaps that was not the word to use; possibly I should have said he is determined. In any case it would appear that while this is a tax which the farmer and the fisherman should not be called upon to bear, the government is determined to impose it. Hon. members should realize that when our farmers are being asked to reduce their income by reducing their production, this additional burden will become almost a tragedy for a large number of those who are trying to carry on their operations. I just want to make this one further protest, because I am well aware of the fact that at this stage at least, it is useless to make an appeal.

Mr. QUELCH: When we were discussing this matter in the resolution stage I protested against the imposition of this tax. Already a good deal of time has been taken up in a discussion of the matter. It was considered on May 20, 21 and 22; and up to the evening of May 21 practically every hon. member who had taken part in the discussion had spoken against the imposition of this tax on farmers and fishermen. On May 22 the Liberals had a caucus, and apparently the members were whipped into line, because after that we had no further protests from that party.

One cannot help feeling that it is futile to oppose anything brought into the house by this government, even though the majority of hon. members may be against it. It is not a very nice criticism to have to offer against a so-called democratic institution, but apparently members are compelled to vote against their conscience or against the wishes of their constituents. During the whole debate the minister has not given one sound reason why exemption should not be granted in respect of coloured gasoline for agricultural purposes. There would be no possibility of abuse, and there would be no trouble about refunds. The Minister of Agriculture used a peculiar argument when he said there would not be more than 57,000 tractors in western Canada burning gasoline, and that therefore the problem would not be of very great importance. I suggest to him that 57,000 farmers have a right to expect from this house just and equitable treatment. On the other hand if his figures are correct it is an argument in the opposite direction, because if only 57,000 farmers are to be affected, the amount of revenue lost by the exemption would not be very great.

The hon. member for Portneuf said that the average amount of gasoline used by a farmer would not be more than 300 gallons a year. Of course that statement is incorrect. It may be true for Ontario, but in my own case, for instance, on a farm of not more than average size, I use anywhere from 1,500 to 1,600 gallons a season. That is very different from 300 gallons; it means an additional tax of about $45 or $50 each season. Multiply that by 57,000 and it will be found that these farmers will be compelled to contribute over $2,000,000 each year. It is a contribution they should not be called upon to make.

I say again to the minister that if it is a question of raising revenue, and if he feels that the government cannot do without the revenue, let him tap other sources which can be taxed with far greater justice. Again I suggest that one of those sources is advertising.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Building materials excluded.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): When the resolution was before the committee I brought to its attention the serious shortage of housing in Brantford. Since that time I have returned to Brantford, and have had further interviews with his worship the mayor and members of the city council. I am informed that the housing situation in Brantford is indeed acute. I understand that the mayor is almost besieged by residents of Brantford who are about to be evicted or who have received notices advising them that they must move on or before a certain day. Unfortunately many of these people are wives of soldiers who are not now in Brantford. The situation is most distressing. To-day there are not enough houses in Brantford to accommodate the working people of that great industrial centre. Most of those people are engaged in essential war industries. I assume it is agreed that those employed in such industries should be housed under proper conditions.

Yesterday I read in the New York Times the following notation from Washington:

> The United States Housing authority approved to-day a $2,896,000 contract to M. S. Kelliher Company of Boston for construction of 744 homes in Orchard Park, Boston. It also approved a $2,620,000 contract to Psaty & Fuhrman, Inc., of New York, for 744 homes in the Roger Williams Homes Project at Providence.

This shows that in the United States, as in Canada, in many centres there are not enough houses to accommodate the working population.

When the resolution was before the committee I suggested there might be two ways of assisting the building trades in connection with low-cost housing. I asked whether it would be possible to remit the tax on building materials put into low-cost houses. I understand that here an administrative problem might arise, but I should like to know whether it can be done. Further, the National Housing Act might be widened so as to allow a maximum loan on a house costing $3,000. The act provides that a maximum loan up to ninety per cent may be allowed on housing which costs $2,500 or less, including the price of the land. My information is that it is impossible to build a house to-day for $2,500. An additional sales tax has been imposed, and there have been some further increases in costs. I am informed that if the figure of $2,500 were stepped up to $3,000, the number of houses built would be increased. I leave these two suggestions with the minister. I cannot impress upon him too strongly the very great shortage of houses which prevails in Brantford, as I understand, it does also in other parts of Canada.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to join with the hon. member for Brantford City in expressing my regret that the government has felt it wise to place this tax on the building industries. I have expressed my disappointment with regard to the tax on children's theatre tickets and the tax on gasoline used by farmers and fishermen. This, however, I regard as the most regrettable and unfortunate tax imposed by the minister, and I hope it is not yet too late for him to reconsider it.

In recent years this government, and I believe most of the provincial governments, have encouraged the ownership of property and the building of small houses. Over a period of years many millions of dollars of government money have been spent to encourage the ownership of property by citizens of Canada. All will agree that the ownership of property by citizens is the very basis of contentment in any country. It has been the established policy of governments in Canada to encourage the people to build their own homes. In recent years in many parts of Canada, including Nova Scotia, it has not been practicable from the point of view of investment to build the workman type of house, or to invest in farm properties. It is very desirable that people should live in their own homes and have ownership of the property in their own right. This tax will make it impossible for many people to do that.

The hon. member for Brantford City has pointed out the scarcity of low-cost houses in that city. The same condition applies to many places in Nova Scotia. There is a great scarcity of workmen's houses in Halifax, New Glasgow, Sydney, Yarmouth, Amherst, Springhill and other centres. The minister stated—I believe these are his figures—that he expected this tax would bring in a revenue of $15,000,000. This will mean taxation of almost $200,000,000 worth of building construction. Some building will not be affected because it is financed by the government. The tax will be payable by the government, increasing the cost of the properties. To that extent it is unsound and at the cessation of hostilities the government will have high cost property and suffer a substantial loss because this eight per cent tax has been imposed.

In the old days people who had money invested it in land and buildings and farms. That is not done to-day because the ownership of such property is a liability rather than an asset, except for those who occupy it. To-day they invest in bonds. Those who desire to own their own homes or farms should not have to pay this 8 per cent tax on building materials to provide or improve their houses or barns or farm buildings. In Nova Scotia there is still unemployment, and many people who might otherwise be able to obtain employment in the construction of new residences will not be able to do so because of this tax. Employment of that kind will be discouraged. From the point of view of the municipalities, it is essential that there should be as much building as possible by present and prospective home owners. It increases the assessments and makes for a contented people.

The encouragement of building is most important from the point of view of the lumber producers. In eastern Canada the lumber industry is in a difficult condition because of inability to ship overseas due to the scarcity of tonnage. A large quantity of lumber is available for construction, but the heavy tax of 8 per cent will discourage such work or make it impossible for people to proceed with the building of new homes and making improvements that they have had in mind. I join with the hon. member for Brantford City and other hon. members in expressing regret at the imposition of this tax and I ask the minister to reconsider the matter. He is obtaining some additional revenue from the increased tax on amusements, and he should cancel this tax or place it elsewhere. As the hon. member for Acadia has just suggested, he should listen to the appeal made by hon. members of this house, by the working men of Canada and by the municipalities; he should cancel this tax upon building materials, a tax which is most unjustifiable under existing conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, it was with great regret that I noted the removal of the exemption of building materials from sales tax. I do not intend to traverse the ground covered by the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Cumberland. I reaffirm the principle enunciated by the hon. member for Cumberland, that a country of home owners is the ideal thing. I am glad to be able to tell the committee that this principle prevails in my county, where the majority of houses are owned by the people living therein. Last year there was a substantial increase in the number of houses built in Fredericton. When I returned from the Easter vacation after the budget had been brought down and this exemption had been removed, my information was that a substantial number of people who had contemplated building had cancelled their arrangements. When I was home a week ago Saturday I was informed that for the first time in a number of years not a single house was being built in the city.

If the minister cannot go the whole way with respect to this, I suggest that he can at least go part way. In 1929 and all through the depression years there was a considerable amount of what I would call deferred maintenance. This condition continued through 1937, 1938 and 1939, and it is only in the last two years that people have begun to repair their buildings. I think the minister could have made an exception in the case of building materials used in the repair of homes or of properties rented as homes. These exemptions could have been limited to fairly small invoices, which would have the effect of allowing repairs long overdue to be made. I realize that there might be some difficulty in administration.

We know that such items as sashes and doors and so on are made in wood-working factories to-day, and not on the job as was the case a few years ago. I suppose these factories will have to take out licences under the sales tax provisions, and it would be easy to arrange for exemptions on comparatively small invoices covering materials for repairs to houses. In many parts of Canada buildings have been allowed to become dilapidated because their owners have been out of work and could not afford to carry out repairs. It is a sad commentary to go through the countryside and see how dilapidated many farm buildings are. I think the minister could have made some accommodation such as I have indicated.

The minister has wiped out all the exemptions. We all know the difficult times faced by the construction industry during the depression. Nothing gave the former government more concern than the fact that a large number of competent mechanics, such as carpenters and bricklayers, found it impossible to make a livelihood. One of the reasons why the former prime minister and the former minister of finance established a government building scheme and started a housing scheme even in a small way was to give an impetus to the building trades of Canada. I believe that had a good effect. But that forward step is now to be wiped out. For the first time in many years people have steady employment and are contemplating making repairs upon their buildings, but they think twice now before carrying out their plans in that regard.

In one instance a group of men owned a vacant property in a certain community. A chain store company wished to establish itself in that community, and arrangements had been made and a loan from an insurance company actually negotiated to build the property that was to be rented to this company. This tax came on and added $8,000 to the cost of construction, and the whole deal fell through. I can give the minister the particulars if he so desires. There is one building that will not go on. This is regressive taxation of a very serious kind. The instance I have related was in connection with a property that was to cost $100,000. I am not pleading for that class of property to-day because I do not think we should embark on large or fairly large enterprises of that kind now, but I am pleading for the small home owner who for the first time has had a steady job in years and now has a little surplus money with which to put a new roof on his house, or to make necessary repairs. This tax is penalizing him. I ask the minister to reconsider it, if it is not too late.

Mr. COLDWELL: I too ask the minister to reconsider this tax. I realize that there are administrative difficulties in exempting material for repairs or to be used in building modest houses for working people and people in the lower income groups. But I suggest to the minister that probably the time has arrived when in this matter, as in the manufacture of automobiles and some other things, the government should say that construction of houses of the luxurious type will not be permitted, and that the labour and material, if it is to be used at all for civilian purposes, shall be used for those who need housing and homes.

As the hon. member for Brantford City, the hon. member for Cumberland, and the leader of the opposition have said, housing conditions across this country are deplorable. I recollect that in my own city of Regina in 1931, when the census was taken, we were told that the average number of persons per room was two, and I am told by those who live there now that the crowded condition in Regina, owing to concentration because of the war, is even worse than it was then.

I brought upon myself a little criticism the other day because I referred to conditions which I saw in the city of Halifax, Nova Scotia. I said that years ago I had visited the slums of the great metropolis of London, England, and spent several days in going through them, but that I had never seen anything worse there than I saw in the city of Halifax, Nova Scotia. There were crowded thousands and thousands of our people. One of the newspapers in Halifax said that I did not know Halifax, that my knowledge of the city was so limited as to preclude any authoritative statement, and that of course is true; but I did happen to be piloted around the city by someone who is an authority and I did see its slums.

Mr. ISNOR: Where were they?

Mr. COLDWELL: On Maynard street, Market street, Argyle street, Grafton street and a number of other streets I visited.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): You know your Halifax.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I have been there before. I would tell the hon. member for Halifax this, that in one place on Maynard street I saw something so shocking that I have never seen anything worse in my life—six or seven houses opening on a very small yard not nearly in length the width of this chamber, and in that yard, upon which there were dilapidated and filthy houses crowded with people, there was one small shed and under the same roof a common toilet and common water supply for all the people inhabiting those six or seven houses.

Mr. ISNOR: What would be the total number of places such as the hon. member describes in the city of Halifax?

Mr. COLDWELL: I could not say. I hope at least that that kind of thing is found only infrequently. But the very fact that people have been living in Halifax under those conditions and that the municipal authorities have allowed them to exist in the middle of the city is a blot on the administration of Halifax.

I have a report here of the Nova Scotia Housing Commission for the year ended November 30, 1939. I am going to read just one paragraph from page thirteen. The report says:

> The survey showed that of the number of places inspected—

[Mr. Coldwell.]

> This was in the city of Halifax alone.

—122 were unfit for habitation, in addition to 12 basements; while the number which did not conform to proper housing conditions was 129. The number of places considered unsuitable for human occupancy unless improved was 50. A total of 18 places which had been repaired were still not regarded as satisfactory. Only 4 places were recommended as suitable for habitation. Close to 3,000 people are living under conditions which are not satisfactory, the largest percentage of whom are existing under shocking conditions—the housing situation in Halifax is far more serious than perhaps it has ever been.

That was before the war was under way and before the city became crowded. The government is making the gravest error at this time in placing an additional burden on the building of low-cost homes. The health of our people in the final analysis is our greatest asset, and no people living under conditions of this sort can be healthy. What is the use of building tuberculosis sanatoria, hospitals, and so on, if we allow housing conditions to exist in our cities such as I have described and such as this report indicates?

I am urging the minister to reconsider this proposal. If he must impose a tax—and he must, of course, somewhere else if exemptions are granted—then, if administrative difficulties are in the way, let the government prohibit the building of luxurious and extravagant houses. I cannot say that a $2,500 house ought to be the limit that should be permitted to be built at this time, because building costs vary in different parts of Canada. In some western cities it would cost from $4,500 to $5,000 to build a house that could be built for at least two-thirds of that amount in Ontario. But I believe a plan could be worked out of at least introducing some system of priorities in order to see to it that the health of our people is not impaired by a lack of housing, and this applies particularly to housing in places such as I have mentioned. I know that the government has been considering a plan for housing in Halifax and some other places, but I have not seen any definite announcement as to whether building has actually been authorized in that city.

There are other places besides Halifax it is true; I have mentioned Halifax because I saw the conditions there and was criticized for having expressed my opinion as a result of what I saw. I know it to be the truth, and incidentally this report bears it out. The government should not discourage the building of modest houses, because poor housing interferes not only with the health but with the morals of the community. I certainly concur in what the hon. member for Brantford City, the hon. member for Cumberland and the leader of the opposition have said in regard to this matter.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to add my voice to that of hon. members who have just spoken in regard to the unwisdom of removing this exemption. I approve of everything which has been said by the hon. member for Brantford City. I have had some experience in the problem of housing, having spent some months in 1934 in a study of housing conditions in the city of Toronto. I do not intend to go into this question at length, but I can say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the conditions he found in Halifax can be duplicated in the fair city of Toronto. I regret to have to say that. I was charged with having cast an unnecessary slur upon Toronto in respect of its housing conditions. But after an investigation of many months we found that the slums there, although limited to small areas, were as bad as any I have seen in the city of London, where, some few years ago, I passed several weeks in investigating housing and slum conditions.

I strongly approve of the housing act which this government put into force in 1935. The act facilitated the building of a great many houses. The chief drawback, in my opinion, was that it did not go far enough; it failed to make provision for the low income group, those who could not afford houses costing more than, say, $1,500. The difference between that amount and the actual cost of the house will have to be taken care of by somebody. In my opinion it is the combined responsibility of the municipality, the provincial and the dominion governments.

A few years ago Mr. Purvis made a report on this subject. I commend particularly to the attention of all hon. members the appendix to that report dealing with low-cost housing, and I hope the time will come when those recommendations will be implemented.

In his own department the Minister of Finance has an excellent branch, headed by Mr. Nicolls, who have done splendid work. As I said a few months ago in this chamber, the work of this group should be extended and more money provided to enable them to prepare plans to deal with the situation after the war. When our soldiers come home from overseas it will be too bad if they have to settle down amid the slum conditions which, I am afraid, some of them left to serve their country. If we intend to take care of this very important post-war work we should begin now. It will require several years of careful planning to be ready to go ahead with it when it is most needed.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of the health conditions associated with poor housing. I can confirm what he said. We found such cases as that of one person with tuberculosis sleeping in a room with children who were susceptible to the disease and who would, I have no doubt, in the course of a few months, contract the disease. Another serious aspect of the housing problem is overcrowding. It was not an unusual experience to find three or four different families occupying the same house, with one family to a room. One can understand that this has a bad moral effect. Such slum districts are frequently centres where crime is bred; for children are forced to spend their time in the streets where they soon learn to gang up with other children and thus often become centres of criminal activity.

I shall not dwell further on this subject. I merely suggest to the minister that he should find some means of maintaining this exemption for the cheaper houses, say those which cost in our province $3,000 to construct, as suggested by the hon. member for Brantford City. It may be necessary in the west to raise the exemption to a higher figure. The leader of the opposition made a very good suggestion when he pressed for the exemption from the tax on lumber and materials for repairs. I hope that the minister will give this matter his very careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is not my intention to protest to-day against this tax, because, as the minister knows, I did so on May 5 and May 22. Rather I am going to plead with him to reconsider the changing of the tax so that it be not applicable to houses of the value of $4,000 and less which come under the provisions of the national housing act. Because this country does need houses for its working men. I know that the national war-time housing organization is erecting houses all over the country, but they are for the use of those engaged in national defence work, and they will be taken down after the war is over. Speaking on May 22 I urged the minister to consider this proposal from the point of view of giving the working man something to work for, so that he would have a home of his own. I do not know whether the minister has built a house for himself, but if he has he will know there is great pleasure in doing it. These workmen get much pleasure out of it, and it makes them better citizens. On May 22 the minister said:

> Now it is desirable for them to make the old house do, as far as they possibly can, so as to leave the steel for the radiators free—if it is steel.

Commenting on that the other day, a man remarked to me that he did not think the minister should have said that, when this government is having carload after carload of steel go into that "hole in the ground" in Montreal. One beam used in that construction would more than provide all the radiators in one of those small houses.

I have previously asked whether this tax could not be removed in view of the fact that it adds from $150 to $240 to the cost of each house. This extra cost falls upon men who are in receipt of only small wages and simply cannot afford it.

I suggest that in connection with national housing the government should permit the allowance to be increased from 80 per cent to 90 per cent. The amount is 90 per cent on the small homes, costing $2,500; but, as the hon. member for Brantford City has said, a house cannot now be built for that amount, because the cost of building materials has increased in the last year over 12½ per cent. The cost of the average house under the national housing scheme in 1940 was something over $2,900. With a sales tax added to the increased cost of materials, it is going to be over $3,000. I plead with the minister; please take that tax off.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have just a word or two to say. I have been a director for fifteen to twenty years of the Toronto housing company. That company is a semi-philanthropic institution: 15 per cent of the stock was paid in, and the bonds were guaranteed by the city of Toronto up to 85 per cent of their value. In Toronto we have a large property comprising about 350 apartments ranging from one room to apartments of six rooms. They serve a definite purpose and rent at from about $20 a month up to $45. What worries me is the cost of keeping up the repairs on such properties. The majority of them were built in 1913, so that they are getting fairly old. We have kept them in good shape, but repairs on that property will probably cost from $20,000 to $30,000 a year. The result is that the tax on material going into those repairs will run from $1,600 to $2,400 a year, and that means that we shall have to raise the rents. Not only that, but the city of Toronto had to come to the assistance of the housing company, and they urge that we keep the rents down. I mention the Toronto housing company as an illustration to show that many houses in Toronto which are of the same age must be kept up, and this tax will affect them. Whether the tax goes on or not, material will have to be bought for repairs so as to enable people to live in these houses.

I doubt whether it is the intention of the minister to tax repairs to properties in this way. There is an increasing demand for houses, and in the centres of these cities there are houses that can very well be made over. The home improvement plan was something that gave impetus to the making over of old houses so as to render them habitable. Although the money for the home improvement plan is out, there is an opportunity for people to do the same work without the assistance of the government, but it seems to me to be quite a burden to ask them to pay eight per cent on the cost of the work. It is all to the advantage of cities that are growing, if people try to retain the population within the city instead of having it spread to the outskirts. It saves overhead. But people will not pay an added eight per cent tax on repairs to old houses. I do not believe it is the minister's intention that they should. Without the assistance of the national housing act, workmen and others can put up small houses because their incomes are greater. I think it would be better if the tax were limited to houses not exceeding $3,000. There should not be a tax on material going into such houses, nor should the tax apply to repairs to apartment buildings. Repairs must be kept up. In Toronto there is a by-law that authorizes the city to compel the repairing of any house. It is a hardship to be obliged to repair a house and to pay the extra tax on it. I wish the minister would reconsider the eight per cent sales tax on repairs of this kind.

Mr. BENCE: Hon. members have discussed this problem from various angles, particularly the scarcity of houses and the question of encouraging people to own their own homes. The question has also been discussed of improving what in some cases are deplorable living conditions. In these sentiments I must express complete concurrence. I would emphasize one thing that has not been discussed extensively so far and that is the position of those who are employed in and expect to continue in the construction industry. I would also consider the subject from the point of view of the unemployment problem on the western prairies. Out there we have not yet received any appreciable amount of work through the efforts of this administration, although a number of us from the prairies have urged upon the government from time to time the advisability of taking advantage of the resources of man-power and material in that section of the country. In addition to that, under the present policy introduced in connection with wheat, the income of the prairie provinces has been considerably reduced. In fact, this year it will be less than fifty per cent of what it was last year. Generally speaking, the living standard of the western prairies has been greatly reduced and is going down rapidly from what is already an extremely low level.

Many people in western Canada and particularly in the prairies have been depending on the increased activity in construction to bring them employment. I would point out to the minister what I interpret as two objects of the legislation which in my opinion do not apply to the prairies. In the first place, I presume that one reason for a tax like this would be that man-power is required in other industries, particularly war industries, but so far as the west is concerned, the government has not seen fit to take advantage of our man-power there, and therefore that object for the legislation is not applicable. The second object, as I see it, is revenue; and again, so far as the prairies are concerned, this tax, according to what I am informed by those who know the building industry better than I do, will almost completely retard any progress in construction out there. Consequently revenue does not enter into the consideration from our point of view. The minister should consider that in all likelihood the increased activity in those sections of the country which are not already employing all their man-power in the construction of buildings, houses and so on might bring him in another way more revenue than he will obtain under this provision. Men employed in construction work, labourers, artisans and so on would have their income increased as a result of the encouragement of construction, particularly on the prairies, and I suggest that in that way the minister would get more money from that particular section of the country if he encouraged the people instead of discouraging them as is being done under this provision.

Mr. ISNOR: I should be remiss in my duty if I did not take exception to some statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in his reference to the constituency and particularly the city of Halifax, which I endeavour to represent. I may not be on my feet as frequently as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar; neither am I in the habit of making the extravagant statements which he appears to delight in making from time to time—

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the report of the Nova Scotia commission an extravagant statement?

Mr. ISNOR: —not only to members of this house but to the people of all Canada, with regard to certain sections of the country. Apparently, from the criticism which has been offered with reference to his remarks on previous occasions, this view is held by many; and the statement he has made with regard to Halifax, which I know to be extravagant, would appear to be on a par with the statement he made last session with reference to the health situation in Halifax.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we are dealing with section 19, concerning building materials. Standing order 58, subsection 2, reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I hope the hon. gentleman will bear that in mind in making his remarks, so that we may expedite the business of the house.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I always try to keep my remarks within the limits of the particular matter we are discussing. At present I am dealing with the question of housing, in connection with which building materials figure so largely.

I shall come back to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in a moment, but I should like to pay my respects to the hon. member for Brantford City and to congratulate him upon the constructive suggestion he offered the Minister of Finance with regard to raising the loan limit in connection with the construction of low-priced houses. If I remember correctly, the leader of the opposition gave credit to a former Conservative administration for introducing the home improvement plan. I think that was a mistake; I believe the home improvement plan was inaugurated under the present government, when Mr. Dunning was Minister of Finance, and the same remark applies to the exemption of building materials from the sales tax. It is only because of the present emergency, and the need for revenue, that the minister is again applying the sales tax to building materials. Therefore I commend the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Brantford City, because I believe the construction of medium and low-priced houses should be encouraged on account of the beneficial effect it would have on all our citizens, particularly those who would like to own their own homes. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to that suggestion, and if nothing can be done under this measure, perhaps the provisions of the housing act might be enlarged to meet the situation.

I disagree to some extent with what was said by the hon. member for Cumberland with regard to the construction of homes being carried on in Nova Scotia, and particularly in the city of Halifax. I do not know how well versed the hon. member is with reference to the situation in Halifax. I give him credit for being sincere in his efforts on behalf of certain interests throughout Nova Scotia. He is particularly concerned with an important branch of industry in that province, namely lumbering, and I was glad to hear him present that side of the picture. During the past few years that industry has enjoyed increased activity. Naturally I should like to see that continue, and therefore I join with him in his efforts in that regard. But when he refers to the construction of homes on farms, I do not think the government has need to worry very much.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was referring to repairs to farm houses and farm property. I had in mind the desirability of people owning their own farms and their own homes.

Mr. ISNOR: I quite agree with what was said by the hon. member for Cumberland with regard to improvements on farms. I like to travel throughout the province as much as possible and look at the beautiful farms, and I have been happy to note that during the last two or three years many farmers have been improving their buildings in many ways. I would suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that instead of sticking to such streets as Grafton and Market, he should get out and see the beauty spots in and around Halifax. Then I think he would come back with an altogether different idea.

Mr. COLDWELL: I saw them.

Mr. ISNOR: I agree with the hon. member for Cumberland when he suggests that the home improvement plan might be carried out to a greater extent, but I am happy to say that the farmers have improved their properties to a marked degree, so that I believe anyone travelling through Nova Scotia will find the farms and farm buildings in very good condition indeed.

I now come back to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I think it is a great mistake, and certainly does not help our war effort, to have such statements made on the floor of this house, on the public platform, or over the air. When people hear such things said about one part of the country they immediately wonder whether they are true. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar occupies an important place in this house as leader of a group that has a goodly representation. To judge from his tactics of recent date, he is quite hopeful of leading, in the not too far distant future, not a minor group but the official opposition. I do not think he has ever aspired to leadership of a government; I suppose he realizes that this would be impossible until he acquired wider, broader and fairer views concerning the different parts of Canada; but there is no question in my mind and in the minds of a great many members of this house that he does hope to take over the position of leader of the opposition.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): I presume this is a special type of building material?

Mr. ISNOR: I am dealing with building material.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wonder whether I am to judge the hon. member's intelligence by his last remark.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member who has the floor has always been able to take care of himself pretty well; and most of those with whom he associates agree that he has a fair amount of intelligence, perhaps not equal to that of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar but still enough to enable him to get along fairly well. My hon. friend referred to an item which appeared in the press. I am going to read that item in full:

M. J. Coldwell, acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the Commons, was appalled by housing conditions in Halifax, he told a C.C.F. gathering in a public address on Saturday night.

That address was, if I remember aright, made in Toronto.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it was not a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation audience.

Mr. ISNOR: The article continues:

Mr. Coldwell was a recent visitor to Halifax. His stay here was brief. Yet, though he was in the city only a few brief hours, he became so full of knowledge on housing affairs here that he was able to broadcast with the voice of authority to all Canada, for all Canadian newspapers carried an account of his address.

We hesitate to suggest that he spoke with a hidden motive—

Mr. COLDWELL: No; the words are, "an ulterior motive". I have the article here.

Mr. ISNOR: Then why did the hon. member not read it all?

—yet the gentleman leaves himself open to suspicion. If he said what he did because of lack of knowledge of the facts, then he stamps himself as a very undependable person and one not to be taken seriously in anything he says.

If he spoke as he did for the sake of political effect, then he is a dangerous person. In either case his action was unwise.

The C.C.F. leader does not know Halifax.

Mr. COLDWELL: Pretty well.

Mr. ISNOR:

His knowledge of this city is so limited as to preclude any authoritative statement. With their customary charity, Haligonians will probably decide that he spoke too hastily but they are forced to conclude, at best, that he was most foolish to make the absurd statements credited to him.

Dealing now with the housing situation—

Mr. COLDWELL: From what was the hon. member reading?

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member has just stated he has a copy of it. However, it is from a Halifax newspaper.

Mr. COLDWELL: Which one?

Mr. ISNOR: On the Monday following the date the hon. member gave his address. It is from the Halifax Star.

Mr. GILLIS: The official organ of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, not now; it used to be. I am glad, however, to tell the committee that now it is against this government, so far as I can see. It is very critical of this government.

Mr. ISNOR: I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Brantford City respecting this section. In closing, I would say that I sincerely hope the Minister of Finance will take into consideration the constructive suggestions of the hon. member.

Mr. GILLIS: All hon. members who have voiced their opinions as to why this tax should not be imposed have spoken from different angles. I suppose if every hon. member spoke we would have reasons from all parts of Canada as to why the tax should be modified in some instances and exempted in others.

I believe the hon. member for Brantford City has made a proper suggestion. We realize, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that it is necessary to raise money at this time. It is not sufficient or proper simply to rise in one's place and oppose the tax. I have one or two definite reasons why arrangements such as those suggested by the hon. member for Brantford City should be made effective in my section of the country.

Before, however, going into that matter at length, I would say that for many years I viewed Nova Scotia as part of confederation. We were a member of a Canadian family, entitled to take our share of the good and obligated to accept our share of the bad. Many times I wondered why the problems of that province were not better known by the federal government. I wondered why 80 per cent of Canada's wealth was centred in one province, and I believe that this afternoon I have got the answer. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), in his restricted city view of a national problem, has given me the answer. If in the constituency which he represents only a dozen families would be affected, yet I would point out to him that they are still Canadians and are entitled to a Canadian standard of living in respect of housing and other matters.

The hon. member used bad judgment when he rose in his place in this chamber and ridiculed and belittled someone who does not live in his section of the country, but who has tried to bring a condition to the attention of the government, and has done that, not for political purposes, but to expose conditions which breed Hitlers, and people of that kind. That was the object of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I wish to add that in the time I have been associated with him I have no hesitation in saying I consider him one of the most conservative and fair-minded—

Mr. BRUCE: Come over here.

Mr. McIVOR: And Liberal.

Mr. GILLIS: —men it has ever been my privilege to meet. I believe that, if anything, he understated the case this afternoon, and in my opinion the attack made upon him was uncalled for.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order. The hon. member is entirely out of order.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand that.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Very well; if the hon. member understands, I wish he would pay attention to the rule which states that members must confine their observations to the section under discussion.

Mr. GILLIS: I am endeavouring to do that. When, however, the Chair allows sufficient latitude to one member to precipitate an attack, then I suggest it must expect another hon. member to be out of order in trying to answer that attack. I was surprised to hear an hon. member from Nova Scotia attacking another hon. member who was endeavouring to improve conditions in that province.

Mr. ISNOR: Defending Nova Scotia.

Mr. GILLIS: I know the city of Halifax almost as well as does the hon. member from that city, and I am sure that the housing condition has been understated. That general condition cannot be viewed from the driveway here in Ottawa; it must be analysed as a whole.

I wish to bring to the minister's attention a problem in my section of the country with which I am familiar. When, about thirty years ago, coal mining developed in Nova Scotia, a community was built up round the mines with housing accommodation sufficient to accommodate about 50 per cent of the men employed in and around the mine. Houses in these mining sections are absolutely deplorable. In the eastern end of Nova Scotia the only improvements in housing have been made by individuals who have endeavoured to secure pieces of land, to erect houses on them, and thus to maintain their families. A good deal of that has been done in the last two years.

In addition to that, the housing problem has been dealt with by cooperative organizations in that part of the country. The provincial government has cooperated to the extent of inaugurating a housing programme whereby groups are formed. These groups, each of which consists of twelve men, secure pieces of land. Through the medium of their credit union, sufficient money is raised to make down payments on the land. Eighty per cent of the total cost of the building is lent by the provincial government.

Five groups have been organized which have completed their homes. The amount allowed for each home is $1,800. Each man must build his own home; that is, he must draw the plans and build the house. I know of many groups which are prepared to go ahead this summer with buildings of that kind, thereby solving for themselves the housing problem existing in mining communities. Whole villages are being created in this way. They can put up such a building for $1,800; but if a contractor were hired, the cost would be $3,500. This additional tax of 8 per cent upon the lumber will cost them $144. The only cost entering into the house is that of material, the labour being all done by themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: The eight per cent tax is reckoned on the wholesale price. Therefore it would be at least 20 per cent less.

Mr. GILLIS: That is some help. This tax will discourage many of these groups. I think they are carrying on one of the most practical plans for the solution of the housing problem, and this is being followed in nearly every district where there are coal mines. I think the leader of the opposition will tell us that the same applies to Minto. With the help of the provincial government these cooperative housing groups are formed. A credit union is first formed, and then they tackle the housing problem. Many of these men earn only $15 to $20 a week and are now occupying two or three rooms for which they must pay $20 a month. They are trying to get themselves out of that atmosphere, and we should not do anything at this time to discourage them. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) is followed, this type of house would not be taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has said that if the house were built by a contractor, it would cost about $3,500.

Mr. GILLIS: But there is no contractor. Each group does its own work. A man digs his foundation and puts in his concrete. He may spend four or five months in studying things out before undertaking construction. Everything is installed by the men—the furnace, radiation and so forth. I understand that the labour cost on any building is about one-third.

Mr. ILSLEY: That type of house would not come within the class mentioned by the hon. member for Brantford City, who referred to a house costing about $3,000. The material cost ordinarily is about 50 per cent of the value of the house.

Mr. GILLIS: If a contractor were to erect this house, I would say that it would cost about that. The house has a six-foot basement and is completely equipped with modern conveniences; yet, because of this cooperative effort, the total cost is only $1,800.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On Saturday I was speaking to a gentleman who said that he was putting up eight houses in Toronto and was figuring on a profit of $220 on each house. These houses will sell at about $3,500, but this profit covers his time and everything else.

Mr. ILSLEY: We were talking about the proportion that the cost of materials bears to the cost of the house, and I am informed it is about 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister said that the tax would be 20 per cent less on account of its being imposed upon wholesale prices. When a man buys materials he will receive 20 per cent less for his money because the retailer will have to take his profit on the eight per cent tax; when a man buys from him he pays eight per cent, not only on the material but on the labour.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not intend to get into an argument over prices, because that has nothing to do with the principle. Hon. members have been talking about houses costing $2,500 and $3,000 and have been saying that this tax will amount to so much. If a house costs $3,000, and 40 per cent is the material cost, that would amount to $1,200.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Sixty per cent would be material.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that 50 per cent is about right, which would be $1,500 based upon the retail price. Twenty per cent off that would make it $1,200, and the tax at eight per cent would work out to $96. It should not be said that the tax would be $200 or thereabouts when it is not anything like that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) expressed regret that some hon. members of this house were forced by some compulsion to vote against their conscience. If that be so, I have not noticed it. I realize that I have not been as long in the house as some have, but as yet I have not noticed any compulsion of that kind. The hon. member for Acadia was a little severe upon those who may vote for this measure notwithstanding the arguments which have been advanced against it. There is a compulsion upon hon. members on this side of the house which is greater than that imposed upon hon. members on the other side. Hon. members on this side are responsible, through the committee of council which they support, for the carrying on of the war effort. It is true that members of the opposition also have responsibilities in that regard, but not in the same intimate way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new theory; we all have equal responsibility.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am glad the hon. gentleman feels that he has a responsibility. I wondered sometimes whether that responsibility was realized. Perhaps it should be there, and to that extent I withdraw my remark. There rests, however, upon the shoulders of hon. members on this side of the house who support the administration, a responsibility which others may claim if they so desire. What is the compulsion? It is the compulsion resting upon the Minister of Finance to provide the funds with which to carry on this war effort. It is the belief of members on both sides of the house, with some few exceptions, that this money should be raised by the orthodox and traditional methods of taxation which have been in vogue in this country for a number of years. Some hon. members do not always realize their evil effects. I hold a certain view in connection with these methods of taxation, which increase the cost of living, check production and tend towards poverty among our people. I am not alone in holding that view, but perhaps I have expressed it more frequently than some others. One of the most objectionable taxes we have is the sales tax. I think it is perhaps a little less objectionable than tariff taxes, but it is a destructive tax on business, one which checks building, checks buying, increases the cost of living and tends towards poverty. Therefore, if this house and the Minister of Finance could see their way to raising the revenue in some other way, I would be happy.

An hon. MEMBER: How would the hon. member raise it?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I was going to ask that question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He says that he wishes the burden placed somewhere else, and I think he should have proceeded to tell us where.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have done so a number of times.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Then perhaps the hon. member and I will agree that less destructive forms of taxation might be adopted. I do not, however, think we are in a position at this moment to adopt those methods, and therefore we are faced with the necessity, if we are going to get the money, of adopting some taxation of this kind which, in my judgment, is objectionable.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) took exception to the statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar with reference to the deplorable conditions existing in the city of Halifax. I say "deplorable"; he did not. I do not know the conditions; but I do know this, that the hon. member for Halifax was perhaps unduly sensitive about the conditions which were revealed. It is true that if you pass through the better part of Halifax or any other city you would not see the deplorable conditions, and unfortunately that is what we have been doing for many a day—we have been passing by on the other side. If the hon. member for Halifax wishes to object to the statements made with regard to slum conditions in his city by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I think he desires to place his city in a category alone by itself because all the cities that I know have conditions of that kind existing. Perhaps the best thing that the hon. member for Parkdale ever did—I will not say the best thing he ever will do, because he is a young man yet—

Mr. BRUCE: Thank you.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It was a splendid thing he did when he headed the housing committee which inquired into conditions in Toronto. I was in office at that time, and I think the hon. member for Parkdale will credit me with having given all the assistance I could to the examination into building and housing conditions in our city.

Mr. BRUCE: You did.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I shall read just one paragraph from that committee's report:

> Our survey of Toronto housing conditions reveals that there are thousands of families living in houses which are insanitary, verminous, and grossly over-crowded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thousands.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, thousands, and thousands is correct. There are somewhere about 150,000 housing units in Toronto.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I beg pardon; I thought the hon. member was referring to Halifax.

Mr. ROEBUCK: And thousands is not wrong in the light of that sentence I have quoted. I know from personal knowledge of my city. The report continues:

> The committee confidently estimates that the number of dwellings which for these and other reasons constitute a definite menace to the health and decency of the occupants is certainly not less than 2,000 and may be more than 3,000. In addition there are probably half as many houses again which, while not in the same sense menacing, nevertheless lack the elementary amenities of life.
> Bad houses are not only a menace; they are active agents of destruction. The committee is satisfied from its investigations and inquiries that they destroy happiness, health and life. They destroy morality and family ties. They destroy the basis of society itself by their destruction of self-respect and their promotion of delinquency and crime.

That committee examined as many as 1,332 dwellings, and their summary shows that 96 per cent, not of all dwellings but of those 1,332 dwellings, fell below the minimum standard of amenities; 75 per cent of those dwellings fell below the minimum health standard, and 55 per cent of them were verminous. There is nothing that can be said on the floor of this house in criticism of the housing conditions of our cities which would be extravagant or overstated. And, Mr. Chairman, the finest excuse for this tax which I have yet heard voiced from the floor of this house is that it was designed for the purpose of stopping building. That was the expressed purpose of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Large building.

Mr. ROEBUCK: No; I do not think so. I think the minister went all the way because the tax goes all the way—8 per cent. I congratulate him upon not increasing the sales tax. I cannot congratulate him upon the extension of the sales tax, for it has for its purpose the stopping of building as well as getting the money. The minister, as I gathered from reading his speech, seems to have realized that taxes of this kind do destroy enterprises of this kind. I take it that the tax is temporary, and that it will be removed as soon as the drastic need for money is passed or some other and better and less destructive form of taxation can be adopted by virtue of public opinion at large and by public opinion in this house. Therefore I am hoping that this tax will disappear just as soon as the need for the money has gone by. I am not going to vote against this tax, much as I dislike it, because I realize—not that I am compelled at all—that it is necessary to support the administration in the measure which they have adopted, no doubt after considerable consideration, to raise the necessary money to carry on the war.

I want also to congratulate my fellow-member, the hon. member for Brantford City. If it were within the range of possibility, in view of the problems that he faces, for the Minister of Finance to ameliorate this tax, even in its temporary form, on the lower housing units, I am sure that it would be accepted by all members of this house with pleasure and satisfaction. I realize, however, the difficulty in so doing. It is a sales tax. It is not a specific tax, and you cannot make fish of one and flesh of the other without practical administrative difficulties.

There is this further point I wish to make in connection with the tax. A tariff tax obstructs the business of the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Why, of course it does.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have seen a business grow, under a tariff, from thirty-seven employees to 925.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes. You can grow bananas in this country under those conditions. I am not going to debate —

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot do any such thing. You cannot grow bananas in this country.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have been delighted with the type of argument addressed to a taxation measure which I have heard from the opposition, and I hope that if they ever take office they will remember the things they have said, which are contrary to the kind of debate that went on in years gone by.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about sugar?

Mr. ROEBUCK: The tax on sugar?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, of course, I do not like that type of taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the hon. member will vote for it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am going to vote for it because I cannot help it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go back to 1933 and see what your leader said about it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: He did not like it. Of course he did not like it. We, no doubt, will abolish it as soon as the Minister of Finance can get money other ways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes! They did not abolish it in 1935. There was no war on then.

Mr. ROEBUCK: No; but there was a Tory opposition which no doubt supports that kind of taxation, not in its particular items, but in the main.

Let me finish the point so far as housing is concerned. A tariff tax, as I said, destroys the business of the country. Hon. members will find that that is so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Your temporary deskmate, the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), does not agree with you.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, that is all right. My hon. friend can make a tariff speech some day, and I will answer him with a free trade speech, or a freer trade speech. But we are not discussing that now.

What will be the result of this tax? In the first instance it will increase the cost of materials which go into a house; how much, I leave others to debate; but there will be an increase, and to that extent it will make the building of houses more difficult and costly.

There are two items which enter into costs of houses. First, there is the cost of the land, and, second, there is the cost of the building. The building costs are determined by such items as these.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is deep stuff!

Mr. ROEBUCK: Taxes and so forth are all added to the cost of the house. The cost of the land is what the owner can get. Is that not true?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; this is deep stuff!

Mr. ROEBUCK: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has made many speeches to which I could refer with sarcasm, but I have never yet interrupted him, and I do not think a statement of that kind by him in this chamber is becoming.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry.

Mr. ROEBUCK: All right. Then I withdraw what I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Carried.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Unanimously. The two costs are, first, the cost of the house and, then, the cost of the land. The cost of the land is what the owner can get for it. The increased cost of the buildings will for a while check building, but the final effect will be that the land-owner will take less for his land, and building will go on.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He is not getting much for his land now.

Mr. ROEBUCK: In my opinion he is getting too much.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know of lots which are sold for $25.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The hon. member for Parkdale got nowhere with his building project. Why? I do not know whether he will agree with me in this statement, but practically every building project we ever had was ruined by the rapacity of the landlords.

Mr. BRUCE: My view is that municipal taxation had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, perhaps.

Mr. BRUCE: Very high municipal taxation.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes. There was too little on land values. What will happen is that, if this tax continues until adjustment takes place, there will be a decrease in the price which the owner of the lot can hold out for, and probably building will continue. That will apply, partly, if not wholly,—check for a while, a readjustment, and I hope building will continue. I also hope that in due season the Minister of Finance will report that this tax has been removed, is out of the way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to say a word about this item before it passes. I believe it is necessary for the committee and the minister to bear in mind that we are concerned not only with raising money but with maintaining morale. There are at least three things which are necessary to the maintenance of morale. One of these, which already has been referred to several times, is health. Another is the cost of living. Yet another is the cost of production. This tax will affect disadvantageously our Canadian economy in all three of these respects.

I believe that it will be quite in order, and it may interest the committee, if I read a letter which I have received from the International Union of the United Automobile Workers of America, district council No. 26 of Ontario, dated May 20, sent from Wyandotte street, Windsor, Ontario. Long before we finish this war we shall have to take carefully into account the effect of our acts upon our labour unions and upon our working people generally. I shall leave out the address:

Dear Sir:

Attached is a copy of a resolution which was passed by District Council 26, UAWA-CIO, on March 30 and since adopted by all UAWA-CIO locals in Canada.

We respectfully ask that you give your utmost support to this resolution.

Yours truly,

John A. Taylor,
Secretary pro tem.

To me that has an ominous significance. Here is the resolution:

Whereas: the rapid expansion of industry and the resultant demand for labour in the various industrial centres has caused an acute shortage in housing, and

Whereas: this shortage in housing is causing an overcrowded and unhealthy condition which will result in the development of disease and general epidemics, and

Whereas: this problem is an immediate one and if neglected may seriously hinder the war effort, and

Whereas: the dominion government is contemplating the spending of huge sums of money on projects such as the St. Lawrence, whose benefits will not be felt for years to come, and which government spending at this time will cause dissatisfaction among the people,

Be it therefore resolved:

That we, this District Council 26, of the United Automobile Workers of America, demand that the government immediately launch an ample and effective housing programme in order to adequately meet this serious crisis that is developing in housing.

May I, quite calmly, draw the minister's attention to the fact that the letter states that that resolution has been passed by every local throughout Canada? May I also draw his attention, very sympathetically and firmly, to the fact that, not only is the government apparently taking no steps to institute a housing programme, but the minister is proposing a tax which will have the very opposite effect on housing conditions?

Mr. ILSLEY: As the hon. member knows, there is a housing programme. There is the war-time housing programme.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister say that this programme would offset the deleterious effects of this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not admit that the tax will have deleterious effects.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister has established a reputation in this chamber for several characteristics during this debate, and now the characteristic of optimism comes out. I am afraid the minister is unduly optimistic about the tax. No further comment is necessary on the evil effects which this tax will have on people generally throughout the country, the poor people, those in the lower-income brackets, the sort of people who will save for two years in order to put on a front-door protection. I wonder how many members have been in that class, the class to whom it is a thrill just to put a verandah on a little shack. There are too many people in that class in Canada, and they are not looking with any degree of optimism upon the minister's proposal to impose this sales tax.

I wish to deal briefly now with the effect which the tax will have on the farming population. While I represent an urban population, I also represent, in the main, farmers. This year, I fancy, a great many bins will be necessary all over western Canada. Many people will grow wheat notwithstanding the desperate efforts of the government to reduce acreage. They will grow barley and oats, and they will require bins. The amount which will be added to the cost of farmers' bins by the discontinuance of this exemption is a matter that deserves careful consideration. The hon. member for Cumberland referred to the need for the reconstruction and repairing of barns. There is a great need for repairing barns throughout the west, wherever I have been. If farmers have not been able to do anything in the way of repairing buildings all through these wearisome and desolating depression years, now when they might be able to recoup their losses and make good the depreciation they are forbidden by taxation like this. How long will the farmers continue to have buildings on their farms? I do not wish to labour this matter, but I do not want to point out that this little item will add to the costs of production for the farmer.

Before closing, I would refer to another matter which should affect the minister, and I believe it does. I have great respect for his application, intelligence, understanding, and all these fine qualities, but I wish to point out to him a fact which I have mentioned in debates at which he might not have been present, that the cost of living of the western farmer has increased since 1913, according to the Searle report, in these proportions. In 147 items which the western farmers buy, the cost has risen from 100 to 145; it was 100 in 1913-14, and it is 145 now. In so far as our farmers are carrying on and trying to live, they must buy these commodities and contrive to pay for them, and they must contrive to pay that 145 as against 100 which they paid in 1913-14. While they are endeavouring to do that, a gasoline tax is added; the sales tax is applied to lumber; they are discouraged from producing the quantity of wheat they ordinarily do, and they are unable to sell wheat for the cost of production. Hon. members need only put themselves in imagination in the position of the farmer and ask themselves whether it is wise, even for revenue, to apply this measure to the lumber which farmers buy. I protest against it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Will the minister say whether the National Housing Act will be amended so as to raise the $2,500 to $3,000 and allow the 90 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not reply to the hon. member's suggestion because I did not realize from the manner in which he spoke that he expected an answer now. It was not because I did not appreciate the tone and spirit of the suggestion. I hesitate about making a speech on the whole situation for fear I shall start another round of speeches which might take all evening. I hesitate, but not because the government considers that it has no good reasons. It has good reasons. It is of opinion that most of the building which will be discouraged by the tax, if any volume of business is discouraged—and probably some will be—could far better take place in the immediate post-war period than now, when our object should be to devote our resources, material and human, more directly to the prosecution of the war than we should be doing by building homes and improving those that we have.

There may be instances where improvements are urgently needed, instances where the building of some homes is urgently required. With regard to the latter, the programme of the war-time housing corporation takes care of the situation so far as the housing of workers for war-time industries is concerned. I am of opinion, however, that to permit this exemption to continue at a time like this would do more harm than good. The object of our governmental activities is not now primarily to improve the conditions under which our people live. Our peace-time thinking is likely to carry over into the period of war. Members of parliament would naturally like to see their constituents as comfortable and prosperous as possible, but I say again—and it may sound odd; it may sound as if we have not an adequate sense of responsibility—that the prosperity of our people, their material well-being, their comfort and convenience—perhaps I should leave our the word "convenience"—and so forth, is not the primary consideration at the present time. There should be no want or unemployment, but there should be none of that comfortable type of prosperity which is associated with a boom. I wish to make it perfectly clear that this is the policy of the government, whether or not that policy is attacked; I do not wish to make any bones about standing on that.

It was for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, we considered that this exemption should not be continued. It must be remembered that if building materials had not been removed from the list of taxable items, as they were in the spring of 1938, we never would have had this debate at all; it never would have occurred to any hon. member that they should have been removed at this time. Building materials were always taxable, even during the depression years of 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935 and 1936. It was not until 1938 that we took building materials out of that list, in order to meet the unemployment situation; and the reason for removing building materials from the list of taxable items has now disappeared. The hon. member for Saskatoon City says that there is some unemployment on the prairies, but generally speaking there is no unemployment situation in Canada to-day. As a matter of fact, Ontario members from rural constituencies have risen in their places one after another and asked if we realized how hard it is for farmers to get help on their farms. There are wide areas in Canada where the problem is not one of unemployment; the trouble is to get people to do the work. Under those circumstances we are not in favour of policies which will promote building that may very well run into excess building, which could far better be done in the period immediately after the war.

Those are the reasons for this policy. There will be some instances where somebody may desist from building when that building would be a good thing, everything considered, but those instances will be only a very small percentage of the total number affected. It is impossible to frame taxes that will apply with precise equity in 100 per cent of the cases, but I am satisfied that this tax will substantially meet the requirements of the situation.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Brantford City, unless the government is prepared to introduce an important amendment to the housing act this session—which I must say is not on the sessional programme—the limit will have to remain at $2,500, because that is statutory. It is a matter for consideration as to whether that limit should be increased, but I am afraid my answer to the hon. gentleman will have to be that it will not be increased this session.

With regard to the other suggestion—and I am sorry he has put me in the position of having to turn down his suggestions—that we exempt building materials from the tax in so far as they go into low-cost houses, I am advised that it would be impossible to trace the materials. The administrative difficulties would be so great that the suggestion could not be favourable considered.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister say just a word about repairs? I suggest that the tax on repairs was rather unfair, and might cause rents to be increased in some instances.

Mr. ILSLEY: You could not follow the materials into the repair jobs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, it could be done.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is no doubt that the margin of rentals in certain places is so close at the present time that this tax may have some effect. At least it will provide an excuse for raising rents. When I was speaking about the Toronto Housing company I neglected to mention that for many years the shareholders of that company received no dividends at all. As a matter of fact, they have had hardly any return on their money.

On section 20—Nicotine.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain this change?

Mr. ILSLEY: Sections 20, 21 and 22 are consequential upon tariff changes. They are simply to bring sales tax items into conformity with certain customs tariff items which have been amended, either this session or, in one instance, last session.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. POULIOT: No, Mr. Speaker. When this bill was in committee I was called to order by the chairman when I attempted to discuss the Bank of Canada and other matters. I do not wish to obstruct this bill, but I should like to know if there will be any opportunity to discuss the Bank of Canada in general and the foreign exchange control board in particular. Up to now it has been impossible to touch these people. When the matter is brought up in committee the chairman says we must adhere strictly to the rules. It is only under the shadow of the Chair—I mean the big one—that there is the real freedom of speech that I expect in this house. I do not wish to oppose the third reading of this bill, provided I have an opportunity some time to discuss these other matters.

Mr. ILSLEY: On one of the finance estimates the hon. gentleman will be given an opportunity to discuss the operations of the foreign exchange control board, if that will be sufficient for his purposes.

Mr. POULIOT: And the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Bank of Canada is not a government department; it is a separate organization, whose directors are nominated by the government. I should not like to give any undertaking about the Bank of Canada, except as far as the hon. gentleman can relate anything he would like to say about its operations to the discussion of the foreign exchange control board, which is an agency of the Department of Finance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the administration item under finance would there not be an opportunity to discuss any corporation or board controlled by the government? Surely there must be that opportunity somewhere.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will go as far as I can on the matter of the Bank of Canada, but I do not think I would agree to a discussion of the policies or internal administration of the Bank of Canada, because it is a separate organization.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do I understand the minister to say that the Bank of Canada is not directly under the control of the Department of Finance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That it is independent of the finance department, and therefore independent of this house?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Independent of the administration, too?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what stage we are at, but the Bank of Canada is a separate organization, just like the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. These separate corporations are owned by the government; in the case of the Bank of Canada the stock is owned by the government and the directors are nominated by the government, but once the directors are appointed, I have no right, nor has the government any right, to dictate to the Bank of Canada as to what its policies shall be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I distinctly dissent from that proposal, that in all these government-owned organizations parliament has lost control. That is distinctly not true in connection with the Canadian National Railways; and it must never be the accepted principle in this House of Commons or in this Canada of ours that any of these boards set up by the government as public agencies shall never be referred to in this house. I wish to register a protest against that statement of the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a good time to remind hon. members of certain views which have been expressed about taxation. There is across the boundary line a gentleman most favourably known over there; I am referring to the under-secretary of the treasury, Mr. Hanes of Washington.

I have in my hand the magazine section of the New York Times for April 9, 1939—over two years ago—and I find contained therein some of the views expressed by Mr. Hanes, a gentleman who had had practical experience before he attempted to apply his theories to the business of the country. This is what I find in the New York Times magazine:

There emanated from the treasury a series of suggestions, all with the Hanes stamp on them, to reduce the number of tax levies upon corporations in the interest of getting money to work; to lay out a "five-year plan" of taxation so that business could know, for a time at least, what to expect;—

That is very important.

—and to eliminate all tax exemptions on future securities and salaries of federal, state and local governments.

Then it continues:

All the while Mr. Hanes continued to preach cooperation—between government and business, between industry and labour, even between labour and labour. "Our country is highly interrelated," he told this interviewer, "and we must all go up or down together. We must respect each other's ideas; even those we like least may sometimes give us a valuable idea if we grant the right to speak freely."

Note the words "if we grant the right to speak freely." It continues:

"We don't want any suppressed or persecuted group in this country. For my own part one of the things I work at hardest is my trusteeship in the Hampton institute for improving the lot of the negro,—"

I may point out that the Hanes family came from the south, and secured the help of negroes to establish their fortune. It continues:

"—and I realize that no matter how hard I work I can never repay more than a fraction of what the negroes' labour did in building up the Hanese in the south."

Then Mr. Hanes is quoted as follows:

"Material, economic recovery," he said, "is the first problem in this democracy. In those parts of the world where democracy has been forced to give way to one-man government, it has come about when the economic condition of the people was unbearable."

Let us not forget that.

"One of the most important economic movements to-day is remedial federal taxation that will make for recovery."

Then the article continues:

What of Mr. Hanes's philosophy of taxation? Would he say that he was against using taxes to effect reforms, and for regarding taxes solely as a means of getting money to run the government? The question, he found, was hard to answer in that form.

"The matter of ability to pay is fundamental to our tax system," he said. "We have to start with that. Then we have to admit that all taxes, of any sort, have social repercussions upon our economy and on individuals. But I do not believe in setting out to write a tax bill to do by indirection what you dare not do by direction."

That is very aptly put.

"The motive for any tax, whether for reform or anything else, should be made clear to congress, which will then be in a position to accept or reject. In a democracy the people are trusting their public servants and should not be deceived."

That is another very good thing.

"I believe," he said, "that the treasury will collect a larger total of tax dollars with a tax bill that takes into broad consideration the effect of the dollars it will leave the taxpayer for expansion and development than it will by concentrating on the highest possible dollar it can extract from the business, profession or occupation of the taxpayer."

Mark you, sir.

"In other words, what is left to the taxpayer is as important to the country's economy as what is taken from him.

"The point is that, in my judgment, harsh or deterrent tax laws do not produce the maximum flow of revenue. I firmly believe that the one way to lighten the load of to-morrow is to adjust in fairness the load of to-day."

That is one of the wisest presentations on taxation I have seen. Of course someone will tell me that that was written a few months before the war.

All right; let me now quote from a Canadian publication known as Canadian Business. In the April, 1940, issue of this publication I find a worth-while article written by no less a person than Mr. C. Fraser Elliott, K.C., income tax commissioner for Canada. The article has been summarized in a frame in the middle of the page. This summary is contained in a few brief sentences, and is headed "Highlights". I assume every hon. member has seen the article, because the magazine has been sent to us free of charge, and it is worth reading. The boxed-in portion of the article is as follows:

Highlights

Tax Administrator and taxpayer have a common interest in:

1. The minimizing of taxation's detrimental effects.
2. A simplicity in tax laws.
3. The encouragement of profits.
4. An absence of wilful evasion.
5. The minimizing of administrative difficulties.
6. An avoidance of tax discrimination.
7. A cooperative effort to finance the war efficiently.

That is concise and also sensible. The difference is mainly in phraseology; the meaning of what Mr. Hanes and Mr. Elliott said on two different occasions is about the same. As I say, about the only difference is in the expression. One was written before the war; the other, several months after the war had started. It is written by a Canadian who is more familiar with our problems than the average citizen. In February last, no less a man than Mr. P. D. Houston, president of the American bankers' association and chairman of the American National bank of Nashville, Tennessee, made an important statement at a convention which took place in Chicago on February 12. I have the reports of the New York Herald-Tribune and the New York Times of February 13. Of course his remarks apply to the United States, but I should like to quote this report as follows:

Banking aid urged in defence orders.
Government credit now will lead to dependence later, P. D. Houston declares.
Business challenge seen.
Any failures will be blamed on trade by "alibi boys" head of the A.B.A. says.

We have a lot of alibi boards. I wonder what is the responsibility of these men in the United States? Here they are irresponsible. It is impossible to say anything about them. May I read a letter which I wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in connection with the matter of free speech in the house. It is to be found on page 4599 of Hansard of May 26, 1939, and I am asking that it be placed again on Hansard. I think it should be placed on Hansard at every session in order that we may have free speech in this house. It reads:

My dear Chief:

Referring to your remarks at page 1862 of Hansard of March 14, you stated that you did feel that, as leader of the House of Commons, it was part of your duty to see that members of the public service "who are not in a position to speak for themselves during the course of debates which take place in this house, should be protected against any remarks in the nature of a reflection upon themselves".

The suggestion that the wrongdoings of public servants cannot be discussed in the house was at first an invention of the Ottawa papers which cater to the public service and it was brought to the house in the first place by the members of the C.C.F. party to prevent any exposure of their own friends in the service.

I submit respectfully that according to British parliamentary practice, every civil servant is represented in the house by the head of his department. Therefore, as you stated that you were the last person in the house who would wish to curtail in any way my freedom of discussion, I have the unquestionable right of expressing my opinion about any civil servant who cannot sit in the house and be present there because he receives an emolument from the crown. The minister is there to take cognizance of and answer any complaint made by any member of parliament. If the minister is familiar with the matter, he may answer at once; if not, he shall take note of what has been said and give an answer in due course.

Some ministers assume that they always have to take the side of all civil servants in their departments, even when some things have been done against their own instructions or outside of their own knowledge. It seems all wrong because it is an incitement to civil servants to do worse, as they can rely upon their minister's continuous defence to consider themselves unimpeachable, except perhaps when they have been found guilty of a criminal offence.

You went further in objecting to the "references to their personal history such as the hon. member I gather was about to make".

It is pretty hard on a member to object on a guess on what he is going to say. For your information, I must tell you that what I intended to show was the record of experience of the deputy minister of finance, to which your predecessor had vaguely referred but which he, himself, had conspicuously hidden. I agree with you that "members of the public service have to look to the administration for protection in the discharge of their duties", but on the other hand, it is the duty of members of parliament to inform the government on everything they find wrong in the civil service, in order to secure a possible improvement.

For the above-mentioned reasons, I regret to have to disagree with your statement that "if deputy ministers or leading public officials or any members of the public service are to be attacked here, in justice to them they should have the right to make reply on their own behalf from wherever they may happen to be".

They are entitled to no right of reply to what is said by members of parliament, but it is the duty of the minister concerned to reply, in his capacity as head of the department.

Again for the above-mentioned reasons, if the method which you have suggested "were to be adopted with regard to the conduct of our public affairs I am afraid the public service of the country could not be carried on in the manner in which the country has a right to expect it will be carried on". I want you to understand clearly that I did not intend to bring "personal matters" in the debate; my intention was solely to tell the house about the record of experience of a man who is mainly responsible for the blind and bold dictatorship of the finance department in dominion government.

Standing order No. 41, speaks for itself:

"No member shall speak disrespectfully of his majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof."

It makes no mention of anyone in the civil service.

My intention was not at all to attack you nor your colleague of the finance department, but to inform both of you on matters of public interest which are purposely kept in the dark by those concerned.

The first duty of a member of parliament is to inform the government on what he considers of public importance, and it is only after he has done so that he may be justified in attacking the ministers concerned, in case no action is taken to redress the wrong which was complained of.

I would not feel myself "justified" of "attacking" any cabinet minister for anything done outside of his knowledge by anyone in his department, unless such minister were previously informed about the facts and where is it to be done elsewhere than in the house?

Then you said I was "quite within (my) his rights in bringing to the house anything at all in connection with the attitude of individual civil servants", etc.

The competence and qualification of any civil servant are even more important than his attitude and how can they be rated if their record of experience is to be left outside the picture?

I am just reading the wonderful biography of your illustrious grandfather who was a champion of free speech and I hope that all the sacrifices that he made during his lifetime for the freedom of speech in the legislative assembly were not made in vain and that we have not regressed a century backwards, to the time of the "family compact". Otherwise, it would be just as well to suppress parliament.

Faithfully yours,

Jean François Pouliot.

What I find strange is that instead of giving us the information about Canadian affairs for which we have been asking so long, the Bank of Canada gave us information about German finance, described the way in which Germany was financing the war and pictured Hitler as a great financial hero. It seems to me that, as this war proceeds, our main business is to know how much the Canadian citizen can pay in the prosecution of the war, what taxes are being collected from him and what taxes can be collected with a view to creating the least possible disturbance in finance. Those are my humble views about taxation, and I hope, sir, that I shall not be considered too hard when I say that I find Mr. Towers' dissertation on German finance in the annual report of the Bank of Canada both uncalled for and ridiculous at this time. I am not going to read it here; I have no time to waste. I will just draw the attention of my hon. colleagues in this house to the fact that it can be found in the Canada Gazette of February 13, 1941.

Exactly two years after the interview with Mr. Hanes, published in the New York Times, an interesting article appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of April 9, 1941. The heading on the article reads, "Pictures Canada as richer after war—Poorer too, greater resources, skill, fewer material things, Professor predicts--Saddled with debt." The article reads:

In the aggregate Canada will be richer after the war than she ever has been before, Professor J. McCurdy of the department of philosophy at the university of Toronto told members of the So-Ed club of the Central Y.M.C.A. last night.

"Canada will have greater resources and vastly more still both among trained workers and leaders in statesmen, in administering a bigger business in social ownership," he declared, "but distributively Canada will be poorer. There will be more cash in the pockets of the workers and less in those of the middle class and salaried workers. We will be poorer in material things—fewer new roofs on houses, fewer replaced cars and clothing that we wear longer."

It is precisely the middle class which is contributing its money in taxation to finance the war. Everybody is ready to contribute his share of taxes, provided that the money is well spent and provided that accounts are furnished to the people. It is to my great surprise that the accounts are incomplete. There are, of course, no regular estimates for the war departments; as was pointed out earlier in the session, the reports of the auditor general are incomplete, and therefore it is impossible to get information on where the money goes. "It is a war secret", and so on. These fellows are there, and it is impossible for members of parliament to check them and to give fruitful advice to the minister although we are always willing to do so. They make it impossible for us to cooperate with the minister, and what are they? They are pictured as angels; they are pictured as saints; they are pictured as experts, and they are pictured as the only saints and the only experts in this country. We have to listen to them. We are willing to help, but we cannot help because of that.

Yesterday I took the trouble to go home, covering a distance of 800 miles, just to speak in favour of the victory loan and to encourage my people to subscribe to it. On the other hand, I said to them, "I am suggesting that you subscribe to the victory loan, but when I get back to Ottawa I assure you that I will scrutinize all expenditures even more closely than I ever did before. I will scrutinize them with a magnifying glass. I have urged you to subscribe to the victory loan, and you are entitled to full information as to how the money is being spent." There is no possible reason why this information should be refused to members of parliament, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was absolutely right in what he said just before the recess. There is no possible reason why anybody who is employed and paid by the government should hide any kind of expenditure, and there is not a single Canadian citizen outside this house who would ever submit the contrary. The suggestion would be absurd.

On the very same day, April 9, 1941, the Toronto Daily Star had another article headed, "Supply Department soon to spend $5,000,000 daily. Has placed total of $1,500,000,000 in war orders in year's operations. Birthday review." But again no information.

I told my electors at home yesterday that I was in favour of the victory loan but, on the other hand, that the best way to get large subscriptions to the loan was to give members of parliament the information for which they asked. Hide nothing. Put all the cards on the table. That is what I am asking on behalf of my people, and I am sure that that can be said for every constituency. I have the utmost respect for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I have told him repeatedly that I have confidence in him, but I have lost confidence in the experts placed round him because they have been placed there by a man who was supposed to have converted John Strachey and Trebistch Lincoln. The former was considered so crazy that he was deported from the United States. Even with a letter of recommendation from R. B., the latter was again deported from England. It is that man who has shown such good judgment in the selection of his good friends, Trebistch Lincoln and Strachey, who infested the civil service with cranks who are still there and who are a curse to the country. I may be considered sacrilegious for saying this. It is time for us to wake up. It is time for us to do what William Lyon Mackenzie did, and fight for responsible government. I sometimes hear some ministers say "We have assumed a great responsibility." It is no ministerial responsibility at all. It is done as a matter of course. They are there in those posts, and they have to take action. That is not ministerial responsibility. Ministerial responsibility is the rendering of accounts for every cent that comes from the taxpayers' pockets. Everyone knows that is ministerial responsibility.

One other thing. It is even suggested that in time of war we should not discuss in the House of Commons or in committee matters of sentiment, that we should have the kind of speech that Isaac delivered when he was going to be burned as a sacrifice. Isaac was there ready to be cremated, offering himself as a sacrifice. It should not be that at all here. In the House of Commons we must have the spirit of fighters, the same spirit as the soldiers have on the battlefield, not that of prisoners of war in a concentration camp. That is my humble view. Moreover, instead of considering matters from the point of view of sentimentalism, we should be able to reason about them. To do that, we must have information, and no one can deny us information which is due to us. Of course, sometimes hairs are split very fine. What is said to us is not a lie; it is not a distortion of the truth; it is not even a fib; it is a kind of juggling with the facts. Information given to us must be plain, complete and accurate, and the accounts given us must be such as we can understand. That has not always been the position here. I have had to teach some of the officials of the service how to do their work; it was much the same as teaching a professor how to spell. I say again that there are numbers of people who think they can read and write and who do not know even their alphabet, but so long as they wear a mortarboard they are experts and geniuses.

Here is another clipping from the same paper, the Toronto Star of April 9, 1941:

> Credit account may be set up to aid Canada. Forecast King, Roosevelt, to plan closer cooperation between nations. Lease munitions?

This is interesting. We are on good terms with the neighbouring republic, and that fact may mean a great deal to us. The committee may remember that the member for Témiscouata was one of the first to advocate an alliance with the United States. The Prime Minister told him that it was not the time to speak of that; that it was dangerous; that he was hurting the whole show by suggesting that he was in favour of an alliance. Then, I remember, my friend the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) also spoke of it the same day in August of last year. We did that because we consider that, when we have a powerful neighbour next to us, we must be on good terms with him. Occasionally we need his help, and we must have it. But that does not mean that we must copy from him all that is bad; we must copy from him only what is good.

My last remark is that we should not consider taxation as though the war were being lost. We are all determined to win the war, but taxation must be related to our needs. At the present time taxation is just the same as though the deluge were coming to-morrow —"after us, the deluge." Taxation should be clear, progressive, and in accordance with the means of the people.

Not only that; the policy which has been preached by Messrs. Towers et al., the policy of restriction and curtailment, is a policy of misery. Everyone knows that the prosperity of a nation is not shown only by the bank accounts; they are only part of the picture. National prosperity is indicated in the clearings of the banks, meaning that the nation is richer because there are more sales, and then it is easier to collect from savings. This is the reason why so many important data are collected by the bureau of statistics with regard to bank clearings. They show the course of the dollar which goes from pocket to pocket, enriching everyone and permitting everyone to pay more taxes. That is opposed to the policy of curtailment and of restriction, which has been preached by the Towers' group. He is the highest paid civil servant in Canada and one of the highest paid in America; he receives $30,000 a year, and his advice is, "Don't spend. Tighten your belts." Where shall we be headed for if that policy is adopted? What will happen is that the government will have a great deal of difficulty in collecting enough taxes to meet its requirements.

Therefore I am always ready to cooperate with the minister, provided that I am not regarded as a country cousin. I represent a rural seat; but I contend that any member of parliament, even the humblest, he who represents the district farthest from Ottawa, is better qualified to offer suggestions to the Minister of Finance than any one of these men. I have not mentioned them all; I have not time to do so. But if a man comes here with a Ph.D. honoris causa, he is deemed qualified to give advice to the Minister of Finance, and his erratic views become government policy. Have I to subscribe to it and support it as the government's programme? Well, well!

I want the war to be conducted upon an effective basis. I want my people to suffer the least possible during the war, and I want this government to keep power, but I want also to get rid at once of all the asses that have been put in high places by R. B. Bennett.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish for just four or five minutes to discuss the third reading of the bill. I am sorry that, since, I had to leave at four o'clock on Friday, I was not here when it came up in the committee stage.

I believe that it is a mistake for the government to adopt the principle set out in part XV of the bill, namely, that the governor in council shall have power to make rules and regulations regarding amusements, leaving the whole problem in mystery and doubt, and in politics. So far as this problem is concerned, the third day after the war broke out I urged upon the house and upon the government that the government should declare a national policy for amusements and sports in Canada, that they should have a survey made of all amusements, amateur sports and professional sports in the country and in relation to the war, lay down a principle or a coherent policy with respect to sports and amusements and whether everything should be as usual in Canada. Like the British, we are a sport-loving people.

Sports are of two kinds, professional and amateur. The Canadian intercollegiate union suspended all their schedules, not only of football but as regards hockey, track, soccer, boxing, basketball and other sports, for the whole period of the war. In so doing they followed the principle which the college union adopted in the great war. Also the Big Four in rugby suspended operations in the great war, not in this. I am not here to say anything on that matter. What I am suggesting is that the government would be well-advised to have a survey for next year made showing what sports are being carried on, the number of those participating who have undertaken the thirty-day and four-month programmes of training, the number who have enlisted, and the contribution of each branch to our war effort. Sports' funds have done a great deal in this war for the cause.

As regards amateur sports, and particularly regarding the Big Four of rugby, I have here a letter from the president of the Argonaut rowing club, a splendid soldier, citizen and amateur sportsman, Major T. H. C. Alison. He was president of Royal Henley and the Big Four in rugby.

As you know, being a past president of the Argonaut club, we depend solely on football to keep the club going. We never make a profit, and always have a deficit. In fact our overdraft at the bank right now is close to $2,000.

Next year the club celebrates its seventieth anniversary and we may be closed up if we cannot keep football going.

I think you will agree that we have done a lot for amateur sport in Canada.

Lord Strathcona once said that an Argonaut crew in England did more for Canada than all the immigration agents there.

We had a crew in England in 1939 when they celebrated their hundredth anniversary at Henley.

That is just one amateur club. Other rowing clubs in Toronto district have been closed up, the Dons, Varsity and others; they cannot make things go, owing to the depression, the war and one thing or another. The canoe clubs are in the same position. The harbour commissioners had a program of rebuilding the port; one half was a beautification and amusement schemes, and the other half an industrial scheme.

In the early days of our city the late Edward Hanlan went all over the world and did a great deal to advertise the city, while champion oarsman of the world. The winning of the war is Canada's first, last and only business; nothing else counts. Consider that in this question.

In my opinion a national survey should be made along that line so that the government might be able to gather information for submission to parliament at the next session. So far as baseball and a number of other sports are concerned, they have been in the red for many years. The Toronto baseball club did a lot for the city and that sport, and many public-spirited men—the late Lawrence Solman, for instance—who have been associated with these sports and have done a good deal to promote them in the interests of the Canadian people, have never made anything out of them. This is true of amateur hockey and other sports. I suggest that the government has gone too far in imposing a tax of 20 per cent to start with. True, some amendments are in the act. They might have reduced it to 10 per cent or even to 5 per cent for amateur contests and smaller amusements, and made it applicable to all theatres and professional sports without discrimination, but I do not think it is at all fair as it stands. The amateurs should not pay. I might mention, incidentally, with reference to the interest taken in amateur sports, the Canadian secondary schools' splendid regatta in Toronto in which several high schools and six collegiate institutes participated. No gates were taken. It was all free and a wonderful sight. These high school young people are doing their part in the war, both in connection with munitions and in the work they do on the farms to secure a matriculation, and they should have some recognition. Take the Argonauts in Toronto. They have to supply oars, boats, and everything else to teach these high school youths, and they make nothing. There are no gates in aquatic sports like canoeing and rowing. There are no paid managers in these clubs. There is a paid trainer and sometimes a coach in football, but there are no paid managers.

I agree with leader of the opposition in what he has said with regard to amateur sports, but so far as professional hockey is concerned, I think the government has gone, in the rate in the bill, much too far. A large number of public-spirited business men in Toronto built the magnificent Maple Leaf Gardens in that city, where meetings can be held three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. They did a great work for Toronto, and never got a nickel out of it. It is unquestionably a great asset not only to the city of Toronto but to the country generally, and those associated with this patriotic sporting enterprise have done a great deal to promote the welfare of various classes in connection with sports and community work as has their manager of the arena. I suggest that the government would be well advised to study the whole question more closely, by a national survey, and bring down a workable amendment next year with a study of the enlistments from each sport.

I am surprised that the bill did not contain a clause for the taxing of grain pools. There is a legal question involved in that connection, and in my opinion the day is not far distant when we shall have to follow the British example and tax all cooperative grain agencies and middlemen who handle grain. We shall have to do this as a means of raising revenue for the country in view of the large amount of money which the government spends in administering the grain act.

There should be give and take so far as amusements are concerned. I know some of the professional hockey men who went to the thirty-day camp, and they have said that they are willing to be called up if, as and when required, for further military service, but they have not yet been called. Again, I suggest it would be well to have a survey of this whole question with a view to adopting a national policy from coast to coast, so that everyone would do his part, and that we would cease to have everything as usual in Canada. The trouble in this country is, everything as usual so far, and our war effort is lagging. We do not know what is going on. We do not know who is going to own the country by the end of the year. The government should lay down a national policy as the Canadian universities have done. Amateur sports, with one or two exceptions, have not made any money. The various boards of education contests for various sports should continue for the war period. I hope the minister next year will bring down a measure which will be more equitable, fair and just to all concerned and be a safeguard for sports for sport's sake.

I object to this legislation being made a political football, giving the governor in council power to discriminate between one part of Canada and another, and so make rules. The governor in council may exempt one sport in the west, say in Winnipeg, and another down east. This simply drags the whole thing into politics. There should be a clear-cut definition so that we could know those who would be exempt and those who would not, and identify each sport. Leaving it to the governor in council is another matter of politics. So far as my experience goes, to leave such matters to rules and regulations of the governor in council is to open the door to politics, undesirable influence and sectional treatment, and that should not be allowed in sport.

Motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 87, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

He said: There are a few remarks I should like to make on the second reading of the bill. There are two sections, 16 and 17, which I propose to ask to have stand until to-morrow. They are the sections relating to the non-resident tax, the proposal being to raise that tax from five to fifteen per cent. I do that because this matter is the subject of some correspondence by telegram between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Ontario, which I believe is not completed. There is one point about this correspondence which I should like to make clear but which apparently is not clear to the public and probably to the house. At least, some of the newspapers seem to have entirely misapprehended it. The telegrams were placed on the table. They included, dated May 28, one from the Premier of Ontario to the Prime Minister. It has been assumed by some persons that this government attempted to link two matters together, namely, the acceptance of the dominion-provincial offer and the non-resident tax, and I believe this government has been attacked for so doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By whom?

Mr. ILSLEY: By certain sections of the press. In order to make the matter clear, I wish to read to the house two paragraphs from a long telegram from the Premier of Ontario to the Prime Minister. It is the telegram to which I have referred, that of May 28. After objecting very strongly to the proposal to raise the non-resident tax on interest on provincial bonds from 5 to 15 per cent, Mr. Hepburn went on to say:

> Now that you have made it abundantly clear to Ontario that you are determined not to remove the injustice against which Ontario and others have lodged emphatic protests, but that you propose to persevere in an action which is clearly designed to degrade the credit of the Canadian provinces, I deem it my duty to inform you that this your latest irritating act against the good relations which should exist between the dominion and provincial governments leaves the Ontario government no alternative but to advise you that it has decided to keep in its own hands the means whereby the services necessary to the well being of the citizens may be maintained at the highest state of efficiency. In no other way does the government of Ontario believe that its revenues and credit may be kept on the present levels, and you have given this province the very best reasons in the world for retaining full control and management of its own fiscal machinery.

In that paragraph the Premier of Ontario used the dominion proposal to increase the non-resident tax from 5 to 15 per cent as the reason why the government of Ontario felt that it could not accept the offer which the dominion government made to the provinces. That was a serious decision for the government of Ontario to make, and the ground upon which it made it, as stated in this telegram, seemed in many respects disproportionate to the seriousness of the decision; at least that was the view taken by this government.

Mr. Hepburn then went on to say:

> You are hereby assured that this government, which has and is giving fullest cooperation in all matters pertaining to the prosecution of the war, will continue to cooperate with a view to bringing about what is most urgently required, namely, a full-out war effort to save Christian civilization.

Upon consideration of that position taken by the Ontario government, the reason given by the Ontario government for not accepting the dominion-provincial offer, which of course would have a most serious effect upon taxpayers, both corporate and individual, in this province, this government felt that it should avail itself of Mr. Hepburn's offer in the second paragraph to which I have referred, namely, to cooperate, and therefore the Prime Minister sent Mr. Hepburn this telegram, dated May 30.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it tabled?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this telegram has not yet been tabled. I wish to read it to the house:

Honourable Mitchell F. Hepburn,
Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

Referring to your telegram of May twenty-eighth my colleagues and I learn with keen regret of the attitude which you continue to take in regard to the increase of the tax on certain interest going to non-resident bondholders and that as a result of the imposition of this increased tax the government of Ontario has no alternative but to reject the offer made by the dominion to the provinces in the dominion budget of April twenty-ninth. I shall refrain from making any comments on your personal references or your observations with regard to other provincial governments and I shall not repeat the arguments advanced in my last telegram in regard to the proposed increase of the tax on non-residents. It is sufficient perhaps to say that after again reviewing the whole matter we are as strongly as ever of the opinion that this tax measure is a fair and reasonable one; that it involves only an increase in a tax which has been in effect since nineteen thirty-three without protest from the province of Ontario; that the proposed rate of tax is low as compared not only with taxes imposed on other income earned in Canada but also with similar taxes on income going to non-residents imposed by countries of which our foreign bondholders are citizens; that it constitutes no threat to the credit of Ontario or of any other province, and that the tax is validly imposed and can be enforced. While we strongly hold this view nevertheless we are equally convinced that it would be most unfortunate were there to be any serious controversy between the dominion and the largest and wealthiest province of Canada at a time when the major consideration of all Canadians should be the most effective and most united prosecution of the war. Furthermore it is a matter of particular regret to us that under such conditions the government of Ontario should feel it necessary to regard the increase in this tax on foreign bondholders as a reason for refusing to accept the offer made to the provinces in the dominion budget. Were the matter to be left in this position, the citizens of Ontario would be prevented by prospective double taxation of their incomes from making as large subscriptions to the victory loan, to be offered on Monday next, as otherwise they would be able and willing to make. In view of these considerations and in order as quickly as possible to clarify the situation we would be willing to restore to its previous level the tax on provincial obligations held by foreign bondholders provided the government of Ontario on its part would be prepared to give the dominion prompt assurance of its willingness to accept the offer made to the provinces in the dominion budget.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there an answer to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no answer to that telegram.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was something in the press about the cat being out of the bag.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the Premier of Ontario, on receipt of that telegram, is reported to have made some observation about the cat being out of the bag or something of that sort, and saying that he would lay the whole question before his government. If he has done so, no word of his decision has been received, and it is for that reason that if we reach those two sections, 16 and 17, to-night, I am going to ask the house to let them stand.

The main purpose I had in speaking as I am doing on the second reading of this bill was to make it perfectly clear that the two subjects were not linked together, not connected by us in the first instance with what the Premier of Ontario gave as his reason for not being able to accept the offer which the dominion made to all the provinces, namely, the raising of this non-resident tax from 5 to 15 per cent. While, as the Prime Minister said in the telegram, the government is of the opinion that the increase was quite justified, it did not feel that it should allow that matter, not as important in magnitude as the other, to stand in the way of the acceptance of that offer, so we telegraphed the Premier of Ontario, stating that if the withdrawal of that provision, putting the tax back to 5 per cent, would enable them to accept that offer, we would take that stand. It was not an attempt by us to use this as a way of forcing or hammering the province of Ontario into doing something we wanted them to do, but it was an endeavour on our part in that conciliatory way of accepting the offer of cooperation which is contained in the telegram of the Premier of Ontario, to meet him on his own ground and do what he said in order to remove the ground advanced by him for the province of Ontario not accepting this offer.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the matter immediately under review by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). To do so would not in my view serve a useful purpose at this time when the nation is appealing for the largest sum of money in its history. I have read the correspondence with a great deal of interest, all except the last telegram which the minister has now placed upon the record and which was not available in the return that was brought down in the house a few days ago. I am of opinion that—and I say this after a great deal of consideration and after having tried to think the matter through in all its implications—if I were to-night, at this opportunity presented by the the Minister of Finance to take either side—to make an attack upon the Premier of Ontario for the attitude which he has taken, or, conversely, to make an attack upon the government of Canada for the attitude which it has taken—I should, I think, be justly accused of playing politics as between these two branches of the Liberal party, and of doing a distinct disservice to my country at a time when, of all times in the immediate period of our history, we should have the best exhibition of national unity that it is possible for us to have.

I have a view on this question with respect to the 15 per cent tax, but it is irrespective of the views attributed to the Minister of Finance or the Premier of Ontario. In my view it would be better if the government did not proceed with this provision. I do not, however, advance that view because of anything that has been said in this correspondence. I think I can safely leave this question, occupying the position which I do at this moment at all events, on the ground that I have mentioned, namely, that to stir up a controversy or to provide an issue of, shall I say, provincial rights, at a time when our war situation is growing more critical from day to day and when the need of success for this great national loan is so great, or to throw in a spark of dissension that might kindle a flame, which, as between Ontario and the dominion, would sever this country, and would split public opinion wide open, would, in my opinion, be absolutely wrong, and I do not intend to do so.

I would rather suggest to the minister and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the view expressed by the leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature was a most constructive one. It was suggested that the Prime Minister of Canada should ask the premiers of the provinces to come together to see if, by round-table conference, an accommodation could not be arranged among the provinces with respect to, first, the whole question of the vacation of the field of income and corporation tax, and, second, the question of the taxation of provincial bond issues. That was a constructive suggestion, and I commend it to the Minister of Finance and to the Prime Minister, believing that it is not yet too late for them to take action. Perhaps I should treat this whole matter as a family row between members of the Liberal party, and drop it at that. It is not fitting to have this squabble going on at the present time, and I suggest that the only way to end it is by a conference round a table. That position I commend to all interested parties.

Having said that, I intend to proceed to another phase of the matter immediately under discussion. When the bill was in the committee stage, I adverted to a matter which I considered of considerable importance. It will be recalled that in his budget speech, on April 29, the minister, as reported at page 2345 of Hansard, made a statement and an announcement concerning proposals with respect to the vacation by the provinces of the income and corporation tax fields. At the risk of wearying hon. members for a few moments—and only for a few moments—I intend to cover that ground, and ask the minister for a declaration as to the position of the government with respect to only two aspects of the matter. I quote from the minister's speech:

> After the most careful consideration of all the questions involved we have reached the conclusion that the rates of personal and corporation incomes taxes should be raised by the dominion to the maximum levels which would be reasonable at this time, if the provinces were not in those fields. Our plans are drawn, therefore, on that basis, and in due course I shall outline proposals to increase the minimum rates of corporation income tax to 40 per cent; to increase the rates of personal income taxes very considerably and to increase the national defence tax.
> But these increases if taken together with the existing provincial rates would result in too heavy a burden and it is proposed, therefore, as a temporary expedient for the duration of the war only, to ask the provinces to vacate these two tax fields.
> I am writing to the provincial premiers informing them that the dominion will offer to pay each year for the duration of the war, to any province which, together with its municipalities, will temporarily vacate the personal income tax and corporation tax fields either.
> (a) The revenues which the province and its municipalities actually obtained from these sources during the fiscal year ending nearest to December 31, 1940, or
> (b) The cost of the net debt service actually paid by the province during the fiscal year ending nearest to December 31, 1940 (not including contributions to sinking funds), less the revenue obtained from succession duties during that period.
> Such payments will be augmented by appropriate fiscal-need subsidies where it can be shown that these are necessary. At the same time, it is proposed to discontinue the present special grants which are voted annually by parliament.

I pause at this juncture to point out that in making that statement the Minister of Finance realized, as we all do, that if an accommodation is not reached between the provinces on the one hand and the dominion on the other, those citizens of the provinces which are in the income tax field, and those corporations which are paying corporation taxes, will be compelled to bear a considerably increased and very heavy taxation. That is not a desirable thing.

Let me point out that there are at least two provinces which have no income tax. The citizens of Ontario will be obliged to bear an additional burden and an additional load over and above what the citizens of Nova Scotia will bear. For that reason I urge the minister to come to some arrangement with the Premier of Ontario, if it is humanly possible to do so, in order that this discrimination against the citizens of this great province may not occur.

The Minister of Finance then went on to say:

> The plan which I have outlined for alleviating the present difficulties is by no means perfect and is not intended to be more than a temporary war-time expedient. However, it has the merits of simplicity. It will permit the dominion government to levy the necessary taxes without injustice to residents of different sections of the country or to different income groups.

That is exactly the position to which I have just referred. The minister continued:

> As far as the provinces are concerned, it will ensure them a fixed revenue for each year during which the war continues, based upon the level of such revenues during the past year. In other words, the dominion guarantees the provinces an annual payment equivalent in all probability to the maximum amount which they have ever received from the two tax fields under discussion. It is true that if incomes continue to rise the provinces might receive even larger revenues from these two sources in the future than they did in the year 1940, but this would depend in part upon the course and nature of the war, in part upon the level and nature of dominion taxation and upon many other questions which cannot be foreseen or assessed at this time.

Then, this further brief extract from the same speech:

> The alternative offer of the dominion to pay the cost of a province's debt service is intended for those provinces which have not developed to the same extent, the personal income tax and corporation tax fields and for those provinces which represent that they must be given some measure of relief pending a final solution of their present difficulties.

In the remarks I made on the budget I referred to these two proposals. It was my view then and it is my view now that the proposals were generous to the provinces, whichever alternative they desired to accept. I still am of that view, and I am still hopeful that the provinces, one and all, will accept. I understand that the smaller provinces are exploring the position, and that they are making their calculations. I had hoped that arrangements would have been concluded before this.

With respect, however, to certain provinces there is apt to be difficulty. I shall not refer again to the correspondence with the Premier of Ontario except to say that apparently at one stage he closed the door. In the case of another province, Alberta, the premier has intimated, if one is to believe press reports, that he has adopted an attitude of watchful waiting, that he intends to see what the other provinces will do. I reaffirm and reiterate the opinion which I hold, that with respect to the great province of Ontario, no stone should be left unturned to get an accommodation, even though this government has to retrace its steps with respect to the 15 per cent tax. I think I should leave that position right there. I am expressing the hope that an arrangeement will be made. I do hope that an accommodation can be reached by meeting and discussing round the conference table the position that each jurisdiction has assumed. It can be done if there is the will to do. Knowing the Prime Minister as I do, I appeal to him to take the initiative in starting these discussions; otherwise the taxpayers of Ontario will suffer; an issue will be created, and there will be disunity in this country.

An entirely different situation exists with respect to Alberta. As I appreciate the situation, Alberta is not one of those provinces which have developed the personal income and corporation tax to a great degree. I may be wrong in that assumption, but that is the hypothesis upon which my remarks will be based. It is probable that in normal circumstances that province, assuming that it comes into the scheme, would accept alternative B, although it is only fair to say that so far as is known that province has not committed itself to the principle of either proposal. As I stated a moment ago, if newspaper reports are to be considered as accurately representing the position, Alberta has adopted a policy of watchful waiting to see what other provinces will do. Be that as it may, however, if it adopts alternative B, then I put this question to the government: What is to be the attitude of this government with regard to that province, having regard to the fact that for several years the government of Alberta has repudiated its solemn obligation to pay in full the interest upon its bonds, much to the loss of its credit and also potentially affecting the credit of other provinces? Is this government, in dealing with Alberta, to pay only to that province the actual amount of bond interest paid by that province and thus recognize its default and thereby in effect condone its action? Or will it insist upon an arrangement being made by that province whereby the Alberta government will respect its responsibilities? If I can get the attention of the minister I should like to pursue this a little further.

Let us examine it in a little more detail. The offer under alternative B is such that there can be hardly any question but that Alberta will take alternative A. But if the application of B to Alberta were on the same basis as to the other provinces, namely, full payment of bond interest, there would be a much greater likelihood of Alberta taking B.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very little then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly it is a matter of balance and calculation.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we paid the province on condition that they paid the bondholders, they would be worse off financially than if they accepted proposal A.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of calculation. What I want this ministry to do is to declare whether they are going to condone the action of the Alberta government in withholding bond interest by paying it in full on the basis of their debt and not having the province of Alberta pay it over to the bondholders. That is what I want to know. What is going to happen? Surely, if Alberta chooses A because of the fact that B may be construed as being only an offer of reduced interest payments, the dominion by its action is in effect pushing the Premier of Alberta into alternative A and in that way is condoning Alberta's action.

Another approach to this problem may be stated thus: The government of Canada is imposing certain taxes upon the citizens of Alberta. I wish to speak to the people of Alberta to-night. In the case of the other provinces, the federal government is offering, as alternative B, to pay the whole of the province's interest bill, less any amount collected for succession duties and, I believe, deductions for sinking fund. In the case of Alberta it is thus offering to pay only half this interest bill, unless provision is made for the payment of the full bill. It is quite true, I think, that even if the whole interest were offered to Alberta under alternative B, the Alberta government might still choose alternative A. But if it did so, it would then be reasonably clear that it had not been sincere in saying that it was not paying interest in full because it could not do so, inasmuch as the means of doing so would be available to it. I think the house and the country should have an explicit statement from the Minister of Finance as to the policy of the government and as to what it proposes to do. I press the minister to give us this statement, either now or at a later stage in the proceedings.

I come now to another aspect of this matter which has to do with the municipalities in the provinces which may adopt this grant in lieu of income and corporation taxes. In those provinces in which there is, and has been for many years, a municipal income tax, the whole question is presently being explored. In New Brunswick the provincial government has called a meeting, to be held on Tuesday, June 3, with the representatives of all municipalities. From the minister's statement it is not quite clear that the municipalities, either by vacating voluntarily or by being obliged to vacate the income tax field as a result of legislation to be passed by the provincial government giving effect to the proposal, are to be protected from loss of revenue. This is most important to those municipalities which have depended heretofore to a considerable degree upon this source of revenue, and most particularly to the cities and larger towns in New Brunswick. While I am instructed that other smaller municipalities have had this power of assessing and levying income tax, it is true that until very recently most of them had not fully carried out the law, and only in recent years have they been looking to this field as a source of revenue.

I am instructed that a summary of the dominion tax proposals has been submitted to New Brunswick and other provinces in a similar position. This is a summary of the dominion's proposals to the provinces, such as I have indicated.

(1) The provinces will collect the personal and corporation income taxes on incomes of the year 1940 and any arrears of taxes applicable to prior years.

(2) The provinces will cancel their personal and corporation income taxes on incomes of the year 1941.

(3) In the case of corporations whose fiscal year-ends do not coincide with the calendar year, the provinces will collect a tax on the proportionate amount of the income of the corporation which is applicable to the calendar year 1940. For example, if a corporation ended its year on January 31, 1941, the provinces would collect the provincial corporation income tax on eleven-twelfths of the corporation's profits for the year ending January 31, 1941. This agreement will synchronize with the increase of 10 per cent in the minimum rate of tax under the dominion Excess Profits Tax Act which will apply from January 1, 1941.

(4) The provinces will refund to taxpayers the amount of any taxes which may have been collected already on 1941 incomes.

(5) The provinces will collect any flat rate or specific taxes on corporations which became a liability of the taxpayer as at or prior to December 31, 1940, irrespective of the date when payment is due. If they are not a liability of the taxpayer as at or prior to December 31, 1940, they will be cancelled by the provinces and not collected; if collected already, they will be refunded.

(6) The general principles outlined under items 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 will apply upon the termination of the agreements with the provinces and the reintroduction of the provincial income and corporation taxes.

(7) The annual payments by the dominion to the provinces will be paid on a quarterly basis. There will be deducted from the amount of the annual payments that would otherwise be made to the provinces, the total collections by the provinces upon incomes of 1940 and prior years and collection of flat rate taxes applicable to 1940 and prior years. The total amount of all such deductions will be paid to the provinces on the termination of the agreement.

I know the minister's answer will be that he deals only with the provinces, but he certainly can make it a condition precedent to any agreement being reached that the benefits accruing to the provinces in lieu of the sums that the municipalities will be asked or may be compelled to give up shall definitely be passed on to the municipalities. He will say to me, I am sure, that he has no other thought in his mind. I say to him that that is not good enough, that we must have a definite statement that the municipalities will be absolutely protected under any agreement made with the provinces.

The municipalities are the creation of the provinces. Their jurisdiction to impose income tax is derived from the province. The province has the power and authority by legislation to take this jurisdiction away; and if it does so without making arrangements for proper compensation, the municipalities, in order to carry on their services and, with regard to the larger cities and towns, many of their social services, will be obliged to have recourse to an increased impost on real estate. I protest as vigorously as I know how against any such suggestion. Real estate to-day, and for many years, has been bearing an undue proportion of municipal taxation.

I invite the minister here and now to state definitely what his proposals are in respect of the municipalities and especially what he proposes to do to protect the municipalities to which I have referred.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to intervene in any quarrel between the federal government and the Premier of Ontario, but I wish to express some regret that such a situation has arisen and that it was not possible when the dominion-provincial conference met in January to continue its proceedings and arrive at certain conclusions. I believe that the Rowell-Sirois inquiry, as it was called, has given us probably more information regarding our dominion-provincial relationships than we could possibly have gleaned by the reading of many volumes. Out of that report there could have arisen a discussion, if the participants in the conference had wished, of any and every phase of our economic and social life. I thought it was regrettable that the conference did not proceed. I am not going to attempt to place the blame, but I say that had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) taken a more definite stand, the conference might have proceeded in spite of the fact that some of the provincial premiers were antagonistic to it.

I am also of opinion that it was unfortunate that public opinion had not been prepared for that conference by fuller information being given as to what was in the Rowell-Sirois report. Had public opinion been better informed as to the purpose and need of the inquiry, I believe that the division which arose subsequently would not have been so acute.

One of the matters which is under discussion under this bill and which was dealt with by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is, I think, a natural outcome of our federal system of government. That federal system was established in 1867 when problems such as marketing, unemployment relief and all the rest were virtually unknown as national problems. At that time they were problems largely for the individual communities themselves, and the communities pretty well took care of them. But the world has moved since 1867, and the experience that we are having in the Dominion of Canada is the experience of all federal states and federal governments in the last several decades. The United States has experienced much the same conflict between the powers of the various states and the federal government. Even Australia, the newest of the federal states, has been subjected to a good many strains in the past few years, and we are now experiencing something of that sort. It is regrettable that this difference between the province of Ontario and the dominion government has arisen on the clause contained in the bill before us. I can see no reason why the government of Canada should not tax non-resident holders of Canadian securities. After all, this war is being fought to save Canada from domination by those who would destroy every interest which these people have in the country in which we live. Consequently, it seems to me, if we are taxing our own people owning our own securities, we should tax also the securities held by others who are not resident in this dominion but who are benefiting from the defence of our institutions by the people of Canada at the present time. Therefore I am hoping that this difficulty which has arisen will be straightened out and that the tax will remain.

I should like to add my view to that of those who are suggesting that a conference should be held, not necessarily on the basis of the Sirois report, but founded upon the comprehensive inquiry and a wide consideration of problems which are arising now and will inevitably rise when the war ends. I fear for the post-war period unless some government—and it must be the federal government—has power to deal with the domestic issues which will emerge from the present war. Therefore I would add my support to those who suggest that a conference be called on the widest possible basis; and might I suggest that when such a conference is called, participation should not be limited to persons representing various governments, but should include some representatives of the opposition groups in our legislatures, in order that any agreements arrived at will have some continuity and consistency of purpose, because, as I remarked a few moments ago, we as a dominion must have power to deal with dominion-wide problems—a power which in many respects does not lie at the moment with the dominion. I hope that some way will be found of ironing out the present difficulties between the province of Ontario and the federal government.

This bill contains a number of clauses. I am glad that the income tax schedules are on a graduated scale and that they rise in their imposition as they go upward in the scale. That is a good principle. We may have to take more later on from incomes in the higher brackets. I wish that more were being taken now, because, as I have often said, what counts is not the amount which the taxpayer pays, but the amount which he has left.

I do not wish to delay the house, because I believe these proposals received a pretty thorough discussion when they were before us in resolution form. I wish to protest again, however, although I suppose there is not much use in asking the minister to make a change at this stage, against the low exemptions in the national defence tax. The bill states that the exemption for a single man shall be on an income of $660 a year; that upon an amount over that, 5 per cent will be taken, and that 5 per cent will be exacted from the income of a married man over $1,200 a year. Those exemptions are much too low. With the increase in the cost of living, and with all the calls which are being made upon everyone, including the low-paid workers, to contribute to various funds, the amount left is not sufficient to maintain anything approaching the standard of life which our own bureau of statistics has, on a number of occasions, laid down as a minimum. I should like to have seen the exemptions raised to $750 and $1,500 respectively; even then they would have been quite low.

With regard to the other parts of the bill, I have not very much to say, because the resolutions upon which the bill is based received consideration at various times when they were before the house, and at this late stage of the session it is useless to put up any long argument against portions of this measure. I hope that if the minister sticks to these exemptions, he will see his way clear, when the next budget is introduced, to raise them to some extent. I believe he will be almost compelled to do so because, with the tremendous loans which we are raising and the enormous expenditures that are to be made this year, it seems inevitable that there will be some increase of prices, particularly if goods of various kinds become scarcer as a result of the necessities of the war situation. That is to say, the cost of living may rise, and the amount left over after paying these taxes will not be sufficient to maintain either single or married people.

With these few words I am going to leave the matter, because I do not think much is to be gained by bringing pressure to bear upon the minister after the resolutions have been adopted and the bill has been introduced in its present form.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Coming from a city which is paying very nearly one-third of the national income tax, I wish to occupy about five minutes, on behalf of trade and commerce, small wage-earners and those with fixed incomes, in a discussion of this particular bill.

The first part of this bill sets the rates of income tax on individuals, and I may say that the whole principle of the bill is involved on the second reading. Is the amount of money which this bill proposes to levy for the purposes of the war necessary? Is it not too much? Will it be well spent? Is it in the public interest, or of the war—Canada's only business that now counts—and will the effect of it be a restraint on those who are doing something for the country, the business community, trade and commerce? I say that the total amount of money which this bill is intended to raise is not needed for war purposes, and that half should be charged to capital instead of only one-third, and half raised from revenues.

The government proposes in the first schedule of the bill a tax on individuals. The original schedule has been repealed, and a new one subsituted, marking up everything from away down as low as $150, up to the top. It is the man with the fixed income, the white-collar worker and the industrial worker, who will have to pay a large part of these increases, as well as the more well to do who are also heavily taxed.

The exemptions are also reduced. Then there is the question of dependency. Many people would be on relief, and either this government or some other government would have to maintain them, were it not for the fact that some of their friends are taking care of them, and consequently are taxed for it and their allowance therefor reduced to practically nothing in this bill. In my opinion, instead of collecting all this money, for the war and civil government, out of income and revenue, the government should make 50 per cent of it a charge on capital. In the last great war the United States charged the cost of the war and of civil government to income and capital in the ratio of one-third to income and two-thirds to capital. There is a great amount of money in the banks and insurance companies; in fact, so much money that they cannot get more than a fraction of one per cent, or none at all, for it. I contend that Bill No. 87 takes altogether too much in one year out of income from the taxpayers of the country, when one considers other taxes, dominion, provincial and municipal, a burden which they cannot carry to-day.

No doubt the minister needs the money. He has to get it somehow, and the Canadian people will support him if they know that the money is for the war and is necessary. He has to get that money either from income or by borrowing, but in my opinion this bill is asking for too much from income, and the huge jump in schedules is far too great. It seems that we can afford the luxury of the party system, the league, and a duplicate railway system without any effort at coordination, and many other wasteful expenditures, and now the minister adds to the burden of the taxpayers this further imposition which he has brought down in Bill No. 87. For many years I have been urging reform in this direction. In fact, when the late Hon. J. A. Robb was Minister of Finance I urged, in a motion discussed for a day, a reform in connection with income tax, to restore it to the municipalities. Prior to 1918 the income tax was the exclusive field of the municipalities, but in the great war it was taken away from them by the federal power. The higher federal power at that time promised that after the war this right would be restored to the municipalities, but the promise was never fulfilled.

From 1927 on, I have been urging reform in taxation. We are overgoverned and overtaxed, and reform in these respects, together with parliamentary, cabinet, constitution, law and taxation reform, should be made the subject matter of careful study on the part of the government. The income tax burden bears heavily on those with fixed income, both in private and in public office, and I do not know how long this will continue. I suggest that so far the minister has been using too many big-stick methods.

There is one feature that I commend, namely, with regard to rentals. The taxation on real estate is now on the net amount earned. The Victorian era built up assets for the future, and we are squandering them in various ways. In the early days of the Victorian era the people kept the state; now we are heading for an era where the state is keeping the majority of the people. The city of Toronto was the first to apply for the right to impose death duties, gasoline tax and other duties, and then it asked that income tax be restored to it. But the moment the municipalities discover a tax, the province appropriates it, and then the dominion comes along and takes away from the municipalities and the provinces this source of revenue and puts it into its own exchequer. This is what is being done in Bill No. 87. I am afraid this bill is a step in the wrong direction. It is placing too great a burden on those people who have very small holdings in property and wealth, and they will probably lose more than the country will gain.

In the early days when this was a young country every government encouraged saving and thrift among the people, with the result that the small wage-earner was able to buy a home or a small farm or a market garden. These savings became the small man's investment—small personal estate or real estate. It was all the capital that the small man had, savings that came from thrift, encouraged by all governments. But by successive inroads from taxation the right to hold and possess property has been taken away from the common man—the farmer and the industrial worker. I am and always have been a supporter of income tax and death duties, but there is a wrong and a right principle involved, and I suggest that you can go too far in what you charge to income, instead of utilizing money that is lying idle in the banks and elsewhere—money which, as I said before, is not earning a fraction of one per cent. A large part of that money could be utilized for this fiscal year. Prior to the present year all governments in Canada have encouraged people in thrift, to accumulate small amounts of wealth and property, and this has been a means of building up the country. It developed men of character, stability and business ability who by their small savings and thrift could take care of their children and the thrifty man's children could inherit his savings instead of getting nothing. But what can people do when so much of our debt is charged to income instead of being fifty-fifty—50 per cent to income and 50 per cent to capital?

I have already referred to schedule A. I suggest that the rate therein on the low brackets to $9,000 is altogether too high for the small man when one considers the other taxes he has to pay. The minister is carrying on an expensive publicity campaign at the present time in connection with the victory loan. He is asking everyone to invest. But how can people invest when a bill like this, and other measures, impose such burdens upon them. Before the war, the small business man and the artisan had made commitments on mortgages, on their homes and on life insurance policies; but what with income tax and other levies that have been added, nearly everything the small man earned has been invested and committed, so that to-day he has not a copper left to invest in this victory loan, as he would like to do. All the high pressure publicity to get him in will not amount to a snap of the finger as an inducement to people to invest, because their money has been spent and allotted, although these honest people are eager and anxious to help.

I have urged the minister to consider a national moratorium with regard to mortgages, insurance and so forth. I have paid, like many others, by way of insurance more than I shall get out of the policy, and I shall continue paying as long as I live, without any remedies in a straight life policy. The government might very well look into this question. The minister wishes to make a success of the victory loan. Well, the loan is linked up with this bill. There ought to be some principle by which a small wage-earner with a policy, if he has kept up his insurance for five or six years, might be allowed to postpone the payment of premiums until after the war at the rate of interest paid on the victory loan so that he may have some small share of that loan.

So far as exemptions are concerned, I cannot see any reason for reducing them. It costs more now for a man to live than before the war. Some of these exemptions should be retained in the lower class of income. Dependency is another matter. The last one is double taxation. Where is all this going to end? There was a debate on the question the other night.

Another tax is on page 6 of the bill, sections 16 to 18, the tax on non-residents. I was talking to a business man from Cleveland the other day. The American people have put a good deal of money into buildings on Bay street in Toronto and other cities in Canada and around lake Erie and lake Ontario, and into large and small buildings in our cities. This tax on non-residents of fifteen per cent will, I believe, be a restraint on investments coming into the country, and so have a very serious effect for the remainder of the war and after the war on building construction, public and private bonds, if these investments are to be dried up. They saved the day in many of the cities along the lake Erie shore and western Ontario to the head of the lakes by these cities being able to get real money from across the border.

Real estate rentals will be taxed on a gross income basis; the net income would be the wiser basis. I ask the government not to go too far. I believe they went too far in this for the first year. I believe half the schedule for those under $8,000 or $9,000 would have been right. If the government had made any real effort to take advantage of the lease-lend bill for the large amount of money to be provided by Canada under this budget for the war to protect the shores of the United States and our own neutrality in case America is attacked, they could have got a substantial relief on our income tax and the other taxes in this budget. I am sorry that the minister has not decided on monthly instalments. After all, the small wage-earner just gets his monthly cheque, and it would be far better if there was a provision for payment of this tax by equal monthly payments over twelve months in the year.

These matters I have raised are worthy of consideration, as the war is Canada's only business that counts, and the people will pay if they know it is needed.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): If one thing more than another makes me sick, it is to hear Toronto complaining about how much any budget is going to cost it. After having lived on the rest of the country as richly as Toronto has for so long, it ill becomes any person speaking for Toronto to complain about taxation. The city of Toronto has more grasping, greedy, unctuous people in it than any other city in the world. That statement does not need to be agreed to by any person, but it is my opinion—

Mr. MacNICOL: The most generous city in Canada.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is a generous remark which the generous hon. gentleman has made.

I had intended to speak for a few minutes with reference to the telegram read a short time ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the Premier of Ontario. I suppose sending that telegram was the right thing to do; anything at all tending to ease this situation was probably the right thing to do. Yet I doubt if it was really necessary to give the Premier of Ontario this cushion to fall upon. If the people of Ontario desire to have double taxation, it is entirely in their own hands. If they do not desire double taxation, they can make known their wishes to their premier and he can arrange that there shall not be double taxation. If, however, they desire it, we do not need to worry ourselves over it. You know, Mr. Speaker, I think the rest of Canada is getting somewhat sick of continually playing up to the Premier of Ontario and endeavouring to smooth and soothe him. I sometimes think our Prime Minister has turned the other cheek once, twice or three or four times too often to Ontario's premier, and it might now be a good idea if he would stop doing that and leave it to Ontario's premier to come to his senses by himself in quietness and without further urging. I have, however, no definite objection to the course that has been taken; I hope it works.

With relation to the 15 per cent tax on non-residents, I understand that the bondholder in the United States actually gets an exemption from his own government for any money he pays to the Canadian treasury. I happen to have a certain client out west who comes from Minneapolis, who pays a considerable sum of money in this way into the Canadian treasury. He is given full credit by the United States authorities for the money that he pays into our treasury under this particular tax, 5 per cent as it was, 15 per cent as it appears to stand at the moment. In such circumstances there is not any person in the United States for whom the Premier of Ontario needs to fight. It is true that there will be certain persons in the United States, artificial persons, such as mutual companies, who may not pay any tax at all there, and therefore no exemption could be granted them by the United States for the taxes they pay here. These would seem to be the only taxpayers who would be in any way injured by this tax. As against that, however, we must remember that any Canadians who earn income in the same way in the United States do not pay 5 per cent, do not pay 15 per cent but pay 16½ per cent. That is my information; If I am not correct I should like to be corrected.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MAYBANK: There remain, then, some bondholders outside Canada who claim the protection of the Premier of Ontario. There are those persons living in the Bahamas, Canadians who grew wealthy here and moved away in the hope of drawing money out of this country and not being taxed. They do not need our sympathy. There is nothing unjust to them about this tax. Those Canadians should be here standing shoulder to shoulder with their fellow-countrymen.

One other subject to which I should like to advert for a moment is this question of more and more and better and bigger conferences. I certainly would have no objection to more conferences if I could believe, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) seems to do, that they could do any good. But here is the position we are in to-day; the echo of the footsteps of the three wrecking premiers, men who came here and wrecked the conference, has only just ceased ringing in these halls. There would not be any use at all in this government calling them back at this time. Every person is entitled to his own opinion; the leader of the opposition seems to think we might effect something by recalling these men. But with all respect, I do not believe it. I do not believe it would be any use at all at this time for this government to call another meeting. The same people, or some of them, this time would probably only put their heads in the door and laugh and walk away.

Mr. McCANN: Does the hon. member suggest that the exchange of telegrams is a better method of reaching an agreement on this particular problem? Seeing that he is giving gratuitous advice to the province of Ontario, he might be good enough to answer that question.

Mr. MAYBANK: With regard to that I can give a categorical answer. Yes; I think that is the better way to try to reach an agreement. To have everything on record before the public in that way is decidedly better at the present time than to call another conference. I am not so sure that to-day's method will be successful, because I doubt if anything will be successful, with that man. But in any event I doubt if a conference would do any good, certainly not at this time. Should others desire a conference, I understand the door is wide open for them to have it. If there be any indication from the premiers of the provinces that they would like to confer, certainly this government would not stand in the way; nor do I think it should. The point at the moment simply is whether, at this time, this government could do any good in calling another conference.

There is the suggestion by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, that if there were a conference—and he said he thought there should be one—that it should be attended by the various opposition leaders, as well—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, thanks.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is just the sort of difficulty I had in mind. The opposition leader who sits closest to me says, "No, thanks." We could not get very far with that kind of conference. We would probably get too many "no thank you's" from the invited ones. Moreover, if such a meeting were convened, we would have to consider whether the premiers of the provinces would be willing to come here and have representatives of the various oppositions speaking on equal terms with them in presenting the opinions of their respective provinces. I do not fancy that would net us anything.

It seems to me, with respect to the general subject of conferences, that the only thing we can do at the present time is to let the matter rest as it is, until some of those who wrecked the last conference show a change of heart. I should hope that before long that might come to pass, and I should think that so far as Ontario is concerned, the people of Ontario will see to it that such a change of heart does occur.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Rates applicable to all individuals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I must express my regret and surprise that the Minister of Finance ignored the position I took and the request I made for a statement respecting the principle of the bill. I do not know whether he intended it as a discourtesy to me, but I certainly suggest I was entitled to a considered reply before the debate on second reading was closed. I am, however, charitable enough to think that perhaps the minister did not understand that that was expected of him, and I should hope that he would give a reply at a later stage.

While I am on my feet I would ask a question, as to why the two young ministers from Ontario have not had anything to say about this matter. These two gentlemen have been in the government now for about a year—and this is a matter of vital importance to Ontario, the province which they are supposed to represent. Are they tongue-tied or are they ham-strung?

Mr. MacNICOL: Both.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the question I should like to put to the two new ministers from Ontario.

Mr. MULOCK: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped the leader of the opposition would follow the good resolve he stated earlier in the debate this evening. He pointed out that he was desirous of showing a conciliatory manner, and that he did not wish to cause any trouble in what he described, I believe, as an embarrassing situation. Does he not think that at this time, when we have such vast difficulties in the world, when everything possible is being done successfully to launch the victory loan, and when every effort is being made to assist in saving democracy and freedom for the world, it is a poor time to engage in picayune party politics?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Both tongue-tied and ham-strung.

Mr. ILSLEY: When the leader of the opposition put his questions to me he was speaking on second reading of the bill, and he invited me to answer certain questions "here and now", to use his own words.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or at a later stage.

Mr. ILSLEY: I had already spoken in the debate on second reading, and the hon. member was followed by other hon. members. I took it that if I undertook to reply to his questions—and I shall do my best to reply to them, on one of these sections—it would be done in committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be satisfactory.

Section stands.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a desire to go into supply, and therefore I shall move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

46. Departmental administration, $356,425.

Mr. CRERAR: It is our desire to call an item in each of three or four departments, so that we may proceed with those departments at another time.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

182. Cadet services, $171,500.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

326. Departmental administration, $92,565.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suggest that one of the ministers ought to explain why the auditor general's report has been cut down in size. I have been trying to make comparisons between this year's report and the reports of previous years, and I find it impossible to make those comparisons because so much of what was found in earlier reports cannot be found in the present one.

The CHAIRMAN: The question might properly be asked on item 33.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not our intention to discuss these items to-night; we are calling them merely in order to go into the departments on Thursday and Friday. A full opportunity will be given later for a discussion of the point raised by my hon. friend.

Item stands.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE

33. Salaries and expenses of office, $455,790.

Item stands.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

MINES AND RESOURCES

136. Lands, parks and forests branch. Government of the Yukon territory—administration, $41,750.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): This item covers the administration costs of the Yukon. There is a slight reduction of a little over $2,000 from last year.

Item agreed to.

137. Lands, parks and forests branch. Grant to Yukon council, $50,000.

Mr. CRERAR: There is an amendment to this item to reduce it by $2,500.

Mr. MULOCK: I move accordingly.

Mr. COLDWELL: In Saskatchewan are a number of aged people who lived for a number of years in the Yukon and then moved to the province. Although they have never resided outside Canada, they are not eligible for an old age pension because apparently residence in the Yukon is not considered as being residence in any province. Under the agreements made between the dominion and the provinces, no province will take the responsibility for the payment of the dominion's share of 25 per cent of the pension in addition to their 75 per cent. In my opinion this ought to be ironed out. The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) will be better informed about this, but it may be that those who live in the Yukon have other ways of providing for old age.

I have in mind one case of a man whose wife resided in Saskatchewan for a number of years, but he did not establish domicile in the province to come within the meaning of the act. For a time he did get an old age pension, but he was cut off and has had to repay the overpayment made. Because of his residence in the Yukon it was considered to have been an improper payment. The Minister of Mines and Resources is in charge of Yukon affairs, and I suggest to him that some consideration should be given to this point. There are many cases of real hardship. This one old gentleman has suffered because he has been unable to get a sufficient pension, and even when he did get one for a while because the provincial authorities thought they were justified in paying it, he has since had to suffer a reduction to repay the overpayment. I ask the minister to consider these cases and endeavour to find some way to provide for these people, either through his department, or through the Old Age Pensions Act under the Department of Finance by agreement with the territorial administrator.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The Old Age Pensions Act does not apply to the Yukon. No arrangement has been made between the federal government and the territorial government similar to the agreements entered into with the various provinces. At present the dominion government pays 75 per cent of the pension paid, while the provincial government pays 25 per cent. In my opinion, this whole matter should be a federal responsibility, and residence in Canada should be the ground upon which a pension is paid. I must say that men and women who are no longer able to take care of themselves are treated more generously in the Yukon than they are in the other provinces. A pension of $20 a month would be of no use to anyone living in the Yukon because of the much higher costs of living. I agree, however, with the hon. member who has just spoken, that many hardships have been caused where people have left the Yukon after living there some years. A man may live in the Yukon for ten years and then move to Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. If he gets a pension, it is based upon the length of his residence in the province. As I say, this should be a federal responsibility, and residence in any part of Canada should be the governing factor.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) has moved to reduce this vote of $50,000 by $2,500. I happen to know why the Minister of Mines and Resources wants to have this vote reduced. I am aware that later on a similar amount will be provided in the supplementary estimates to be devoted to a certain purpose. I commend the minister for taking action in a deserving case. Compensation of at least some $2,500 is to be paid to a father for the loss of his son while a passenger on a government owned and operated ferryboat in the Yukon territory. The law is such that this man was precluded from going even to the exchequer court in order to establish his rights. The matter was considered by the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Department of Justice, and this grant of $2,500 is to be made and will, I know, be gratefully received.

I suggest to the minister that it might be well for him or some member of his staff to intimate to the comptroller of the Yukon and the council the inadvisability and impropriety of voting money on the strength of the federal estimates before these estimates become, in fact, votes or grants of money. The passing of any item in the estimates is a speculation. The fact that it is in the estimates does not mean that inevitably there is going to be a grant and I think these expectant recipients of public money should not presume to appropriate it or begin to expend it before it is granted by vote of this parliament on the advice of the respective ministers.

I have not taken up very much of the time of the house at this session, but since this is a vote to the government of the Yukon territory, perhaps it would not be out of place if I had a word to say about the Yukon. Probably there are not very many members of this house who know much about that far-distant territory. I shall not weary them with statistics but touch on just a few of the highlights.

To begin with, the Yukon has an area of 207,076 square miles and a population of little over 5,000 people. That means there are forty square miles to every one of the population. Consequently we are not overcrowded.

The Yukon was created a separate territory, carved out of the Northwest Territories in 1898, by the Yukon Act, which is the constitution of that territory. We were given a local government, consisting now of a comptroller appointed by the dominion government, and a territorial council or legislature consisting of three members, one from each of the three electoral districts in the territory. That council with the comptroller has practically the powers of a provincial legislature. Under the Yukon Act they can legislate concerning many matters including property and civil rights, and the members of this house well know how far that goes. When a legislature has the power to legislate on property and civil rights, there is practically nothing on earth that it cannot do.

We were given representation in Canada by a special act called the Yukon Representation Act. Never, even at that time when the population of Yukon was much greater than it is now, did we have a sufficient population to entitle us to representation in parliament. But because of the importance of the territory as a market for Canadian goods and its great gold production, all governments have continued the policy of keeping the Yukon represented in this parliament. Local laws are passed by that local council to govern local matters. Our mining laws, on the contrary, are all acts of this parliament of Canada.

Originally the mining laws of the Yukon were orders in council subject to change overnight, and they were changed in many instances without notice to the mine owners and others interested in the mines, with the result that we had a state of chaos there and a multiplicity of lawsuits. Once we got representation in parliament, it was not long before that condition of affairs was changed, and stable and permanent mining laws which can only be altered by an act of this parliament were enacted and are in force.

As a member of that local council I had the honour of assisting in drafting what is known as the Yukon Placer Gold Mining Act, and then of coming to parliament as the Yukon's representative. I had the duty of drafting, with the approval, support and assistance of the Hon. Charles Stewart, then Minister of the Interior, the bill which was enacted by this parliament and became the law of the Yukon, known as the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. To arrive at the terms of those acts as to both placer gold mining and lode mineral mining, meetings of the miners, both employers and employees, were held all over that territory, of men who came from all parts of the world where mining is done. Their views were heard and their suggestions taken and boiled down, and out of those conferences these acts of parliament became the law of the land.

The principal mining business of the Yukon is the mining of gold, as well as the mining of silver and lead. Last year the Yukon produced 108,077 ounces of a monetary value of $3,782,726, an increase over the year before of 17,568 ounces, of a value of about $615,000. The total amount credited in the public accounts of Canada to the Yukon as having been collected as royalties on gold mines up to March 31, 1940, amounted to $5,197,123.

Originally a royalty of 10 per cent on the gross output of gold was charged. That was afterwards reduced to 5 per cent, and the rate is now 2½ per cent on the gross output. The royalty is now paid by the transfer of the gold into cash at the various banks, and the banks see to it that the royalty is paid. Formerly gold was collected by royalty collectors who went from mining claim to mining claim and collected the gold in specie, gold dust, gold nuggets and gold.

Knowing the conditions that existed up in that country at that time and the strange things that happened under the midnight sun, I feel that there was a great deal collected that never found its way into the books of the receiver general of Canada, and that if all the royalties on gold collected had gone into the public accounts and into the public treasury, the Yukon would be credited with an amount far greater than $5,197,123.

Extensive deposits of galena ore are known to exist in the Yukon, galena being a combination of silver and lead, and many millions of dollars have been produced in mining that area. The chief operator in silver lead mines is the Treadwell Yukon corporation which has mined with great success and profit and paid the federal government substantial returns in taxation based on profits.

The system of taxation on lode mines is a graded system of taxation on profits. On placer gold the tax is on the gross output, regardless of profit or loss. That company buys hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of Canadian goods and pays substantial sums into the federal treasury in excise and customs duties. But the Yukon does not get credit for that, because the great bulk of its purchases are made at the city of Vancouver and that port of customs gets credit for them. These things are overlooked when people remark as to whether the Yukon is a bill of expense or profit to the dominion. Those of us in the Yukon who can be classed as old-timers appreciate the improved conditions in that territory, not only in the system and methods of government but in the conditions of life generally. We have seen transportation in that country progress from the dog team and canoe to steamboats and railways, and now we have a splendid aeroplane service carried on by the British-Yukon Navigation company, a British company with a fleet of passenger boats, a railway, and a fleet of up-to-date aeroplanes.

The Yukon also produces a considerable amount of fur, upon which, too, the government levies a tax.

Lode mining in Yukon began on an extensive scale as late as 1939, when the first gold brick was poured. In 1940, 1,147 ounces of gold were produced by that method. The remoteness of the country and the expense of equipment have made capital slow in investing in that far-distant land, but I have no doubt that eventually lode mining will be one of the great industries of the Yukon. In passing, I should like to pay a tribute to one gentleman of the geological survey parties which the minister sends up to the Yukon each year, namely, Doctor Bostock, who is most attentive and considerate in his attitude towards the miners in that country. He spares no time or effort in visiting and examining mining properties, giving the prospectors valuable advice as to formations and methods. Speaking for Yukoners, I may say that they are always pleased to see him come.

By those not familiar with the facts, the Yukon has been looked upon as nothing but a bill of expense to Canada, without adequate revenues and returns. In the early days that may have been true; but even then, if credit had been given for its value as a market for Canadian goods, and the government's returns in gold royalties, customs and other sources of revenue had been taken into account, I am of opinion that it would not have been in the red on that account. To-day the Yukon undoubtedly pays its way so far as the cost of administration is concerned.

The public accounts show that the federal revenues in the Yukon during the past fiscal year amounted to $349,252. In addition to that, the revenues of the territorial government were $153,485. The federal government expended $478,310, showing a surplus, taking into account the two governments, of $24,427. In addition to that, the federal government has large revenues from the Yukon business from which the Yukon gets no credit. As I said before, the Yukon buys the bulk of its goods in Vancouver. Let us for a moment take the approximate figures for four of the chief buyers of goods in the Yukon. First, the Yukon Consolidated Gold Corporation, an English company mining placer gold in an up-to-date way, paid last year, on goods purchased in Canada and imported to the Yukon, sales and excise taxes of $60,000 and cutoms duties of $30,000, plus income tax for which I have no figures; and last year they paid out $1,260,300 in wages in that territory. The sums of $60,000 and $30,000 which I have mentioned were paid to the collectors of taxes at Vancouver, British Columbia, and not into the Yukon. Take the Treadwell Yukon Corporation, a silver-lead mining company They paid in the same year in the same sort of taxes, $80,000. One firm of merchants having trading posts throughout the territory paid in the same sort of taxes, $10,000. In the case of another commerical company I have the figures for only two of its depots, where it paid in taxes, $32,410. The total in respect of the four companies I have mentioned is $212,410, all from Yukon companies, and all paid into the treasury through the port of Vancouver, British Columbia. I am confident that on careful examination a much larger amount could be credited to the Yukon; probably it would run as high as $300,000.

Or consider the figures of collections made in the Yukon. For the past fiscal year the customs, excise and income taxes amounted to $214,160. For the last fiscal year the income tax was $90,530, and for the nine months of the present fiscal year, 1940-41, it is $181,171, an increase of over 100 per cent in the nine months of this year. Post office revenues have increased steadily in each of the past ten years. Yukoners import all their clothing, all their machinery, all their tools, most of their timber and practically all of their food. They produce little but gold, silver, lead and fur.

The cost of all federal services in the Yukon is played up in the public accounts. For instance, if you turn to the item which the committee will be considering before long, namely, the expense of administration of the Department of Indian Affairs, you find that it cost Canada this year $5,465,187. Of that amount, the cost of maintaining Indians in the Yukon was less than $50,000. No particular mention is made of what it costs in the various provinces, but the Yukon is singled out as a horrible example of government expense.

Turn to an item in the estimates for the maintenance of a telegraph service. It is listed, northern British Columbia and Yukon, $129,508. Inquiry shows that $107,508 is spent in British Columbia and only $22,000 in the Yukon.

Or take the federal grants for mining roads. Last year they amounted to $1,208,920. Where did that money go? Quebec got $245,000; Ontario, $245,000; British Columbia, $240,000; Manitoba, $210,000; Saskatchewan, $130,000; the Yukon, less than $40,000.

Hon. members may have observed that I have made these rather voluminous notes on material which comes to me through the mail from the director of public information. In passing, may I remark, with all due respect, that the money which is expended on the department of public information is not well spent. Reams of so-called information come through the mail to every hon. member, although any items of interest may be found in the daily newspapers or heard over the radio. In my opinion it is a waste of money, salaries, time and material.

Another project which is of great interest to the Yukon is the Alaska highway. Various routes have been reported on to this government by an international committee. It is estimated by that committee that the cost of the Canadian section will be $25,000,000. That is for an unpaved, dirt road. Any hon. member who has had experience in government expenditures knows that when they say it will cost $25,000,000, you will not be far wrong if you say that it will require double that amount, or $50,000,000. We have had experience of the great difference between the estimates of what a public work will cost and what it actually costs. Older members will recall the estimates submitted for the construction of that famous bridge across the St. Lawrence. It cost millions more than was estimated. Take the construction of what is now the Canadian National Railways. At the outset, that was not estimated to cost Canada much more than $15,000,000. Everyone knows that it cost hundreds of millions, and to-day we have unfortunately an unnecessary duplication of railway service over thousands of miles of the country. All the traffic, passenger, freight and express could be handled by one road. Take another instance of estimates being away under actual cost of construction. Take that monument to unnecessary and ill-advised expenditure, the Hudson Bay railway. That was not going to cost much. What has it cost?

With regard to the Alaska highway, we should not lose sight of the fact that the mileage of that road through Canada—British Columbia and the Yukon—will far exceed the mileage necessary to build the Alaska road. The road when built must of necessity go through the Yukon. As a Yukoner, representing the Yukon in this house, I might be said to be disloyal to the Yukon if I did not advocate the building of that road. But, as a Canadian, I say that the money of the taxpayers should not at this time be spent on that project, nor should money be spent at this time on the completion of the railway terminal at Montreal. Neither project will help in winning the war; and unless we win this war, what use will any of these projects be to any of us? If the United States want a highway to Alaska across British Columbia and Yukon, and are willing to bear the expense of building and maintaining it, I am all for it. Let them come. Encourage them to come and do it. In view of the friendly relations which now exist, and which have existed for so many years between that great republic and Canada, which friendly relations, I am free to admit, have recently been so palpably strengthened and further cemented by the diplomacy of the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), Canada should not hesitate to allow the United States at their own expense to construct and maintain that highway across western Canada to their territory of Alaska.

In normal times, with prosperity prevailing in Canada, I would not make that suggestion. I should prefer to have Canada build and maintain the Canadian section of that road. There is, however, no discounting the fact that we have not now the money with which to do it. It may be said that Canada is prosperous. Perhaps it is by comparison with some countries of the world, many of which, instead of enjoying prosperity, are enduring slavery, degradation, poverty, misery and want under the heel of their savage conquerers. If it is suggested that Canada is prosperous, we know it is to a large extent false prosperity, built on the exchange among our people of huge sums of money being taken away from them in many forms of taxation, and some paid back to them for lands, goods, high salaries, services and labour said to be needed in this war. That spending has created a boom; but there will come an end to all that, and we should face the future and anticipate the return to normal life and business. Meantime, I say that, apart from war expenditures, only those expenditures that are absolutely needed should be made now. The construction at this time in Canada by Canada of the Alaska highway is not one of those necessary expenditures.

For a moment may I refer to the recruiting campaign. The Minister of National Defence very properly suggests that members of parliament should help. They should help, and I for one will help. But when one approaches a young healthy man of war age and suggests that he should join the army, the navy or the air force, and one gets this reply: "I will, if John Doe or Richard Rowe or somebody else will, but why should I go and let them step into my job that pays me well, while I go and fight for them?"—that is a hard question to answer. The word "conscription," meaning compulsory military service, is taboo. Why? Every member of this house knows why. It is for political reasons and nothing else. Leaders of both great Canadian political parties in the last election pledged those parties against conscription; but notwithstanding the fact that the leader of the party I have supported took that attitude, I did not hesitate during that campaign to say publicly, as I say now, that in my opinion the only fair and just way to raise an army is by compulsion. Capital owes a debt to the state. It is compelled by law to contribute the sinews of war; it is compelled by taxation. It would be as reasonable to say that only those who volunteer to do so should pay income tax. The payment of income tax, the payment of any tax, is the performance of a duty to the state, the payment of a debt to the state. All fit young men in Canada owe to the state a debt which can be paid only by their entry into the fighting forces. If they join voluntarily, so much the better; all honour to them for it. But if they fail in that duty, if they fail to pay that debt which they owe their country, they like the taxpayer should be made to pay. It is manifestly unfair to carry on recruiting in any other way.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture the other day declare among other things that conscientious objectors will be put into labour camps. I suggest to him that he ought to go further. I suggest that conscientious objectors so-called, Doukhobors, Mennonites, Hitterites and Dunkers, should be disfranchised federally, provincially and municipally; and when the time comes, their property acquired in this free Canada of ours should be taken from them at a fair price, and they should be sent back to the country whence they came. I do not think there is such a thing as a conscientious objector. That is a hypocritical objection. I suggest to the minister that in supplying these so-called conscientious objectors with picks, shovels and board and lodging, he equip them with foot-warmers. It is their cold feet that bother them, not their consciences.

To get back to the Yukon, we have there a splendid system of public schools, good hospitals, enough churches. The people have comfortable homes and fine families. On the whole, the people are industrious, prosperous, happy and contented. They realize that they are going through this life only once, and what they have here they cannot take with them, so that they make the best of it while they have it. I must pay a tribute to the women of the Yukon. Even in normal peace times the consideration they show those in need because of illness, old age or hard luck is remarkable. In this war, as in the last, they have been doing magnificent work in the Red Cross and the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire, and have made large quantities of useful clothing and sent them to Canadians overseas and to the suffering people of England. I am happy to say that, per capita, the Yukon purchases of war savings certificates were greater than those of any province in the dominion.

In passing, may I say a word about that splendid force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Ever since the Yukon was the Yukon, that is the force in which the people have had unbounded confidence and to which they have looked up as being responsible for law and order prevailing in that territory. They exercise their power in a commonsense way and with discretion.

Although I sit on the left of Mr. Speaker, I believe in giving credit where credit is due, and I congratulate the Minister of Mines and Resources and those of his staff who take part in the administration of the government of the Yukon. It is an economical business-like government and a pattern for many if not all of the provincial governments. In fact, the dominion government might very well take a leaf out of the Yukon book as to methods of government. For the most part the Yukon government gets a dollar's worth for every dollar spent, and I doubt whether many members of this house can say that is so of governments in those parts of Canada from which they come. I support the minister's motion to vote this sum, and I only regret that it is not a much larger one.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CRERAR: I should like to make a brief remark on the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when the item was called. Hon. members are aware that the federal government does not pay old age pensions. Old age pensions originate in the provinces and are paid by the provinces, and the federal government makes a contribution to the amount paid.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of 75 per cent, is it not?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, 75 per cent. If, for instance, there were a province that did not initiate and pay old age pensions, no old age pensions would be paid in that province by the federal government. The Yukon territory is in a sense similar to a province. It has a territorial government which operates under an act of parliament, and it is really a matter for the Yukon territorial council, which is an elective body, to initiate old age pensions. It has the power to do so, I understand, should the council in its wisdom decide it to be advisable.

Mr. MacNICOL: And if it did, the federal government would make the same contribution of 75 per cent?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no doubt the federal government would make the same contribution.

I appreciate very much what the hon. member, who represents in this house,—very worthily, may I say,—the Yukon territory, has said this evening. I value the compliment he has paid to the Yukon administration. It is due almost entirely to the character and efficiency of the officers of the department who have to do with the administration. We endeavour, so far as possible, to have that administration efficient, economical and worthy of the territory. Usually we get brick-bats from the opposition instead of bouquets; to-night I have had a bouquet, and I thank my hon. friend for it.

Item as amended agreed to.

135. Lands, parks and forests branch. Eastern arctic expedition, $25,700.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this item include the cost of sending the Nascopie into the Arctic?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. My hon. friend has stated correctly what the item is. It is to care for disbursements in sending the Nascopie to the far northern and eastern arctic, which is done once every year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the Nascopie carry geologists or mining engineers to survey or discover evidences of mineral along the trip?

Mr. CRERAR: Not many mining engineers or geologists make the trip on the Nascopie. I believe there have been a few occasions when that has been done. There are studies conducted by scientists in other fields, and they of course make their journey to the eastern arctic by this boat. In addition, the boat transports the mounted police who may be going to relieve detachments which have been on duty at the various outlying posts, takes in supplies, medical doctors and nurses who may be going to replace others coming out. It is the general service for all the government departments in the eastern arctic that comes under this vote.

Item agreed to.

134. Lands, parks and forests branch. Government of the Northwest Territories—general administration, operation and maintenance of services, including Wood Buffalo park, $266,655.

Mr. MacNICOL: On page 111 of the estimates where we find the statement of how the item is made up, the first item reads:

Superintendent, Mackenzie district, Northwest Territories and secretary, Yukon affairs.

Why is the secretary, Yukon affairs, not tabulated under the other item, 137, which pertains to the Yukon?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the reference to Yukon affairs there is due to the fact that the secretary performs dual functions. We have head office administration for the Yukon territory as well. This official who is described as secretary for the Northwest Territories performs somewhat similar functions in respect of the Yukon administration.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

VICTORY LOAN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPORTION OF PROCEEDS TO BE USED FOR WAR PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I have received a telegram from Toronto reading as follows:

Prospective investors are asking what proportion of the new war loan is to be used by the government for war purposes. To clarify this point would you please ask Mr. Ilsley for a definite answer so that the facts will reach the public through the press.

Mr. CRERAR: Whom is it from?

Mr. JACKMAN: From a gentleman in Toronto. If the hon. gentleman wishes his name, I can give it.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend should give the name.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name.

Mr. JACKMAN: The wire is sent by Gordon Perry.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend gave me notice yesterday of this question, and in reply I may assure him that the total cash proceeds of the new victory loan will be used for war purposes. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942, the ordinary expenditures of the government of the Dominion of Canada are estimated at $468,000,000, including $35,000,000 for wheat acreage reductions. The total ordinary revenue is estimated to amount to $1,400,000,000, which means that Canada is raising from current taxation about three times the government's ordinary expenditures.

We are spending more than this great taxation surplus over ordinary expenditures on the war effort; in fact we are spending on direct war effort a total of at least $1,300,000,000. Total expenditures on behalf of Canada are thus at least $1,768,000,000. In addition we are sending vitally needed supplies from Canada to Great Britain, which Great Britain is unable for the time being to pay for with Canadian dollars. This will add approximately $800,000,000 to our burden after deducting the amount of our own exchange deficit with the United States. Our government must provide the Canadian dollars with which to pay our workmen, farmers, miners, transport workers, et cetera, for the cost of producing these supplies which are so urgently needed. Or to put it another way by expressing it in percentages.

Canada's total expenditures, including aid to Great Britain, for the year ending March 31, 1942

	Per cent
Ordinary expenditures	18
War expenditures, including vital supplies to Great Britain	82
Total ordinary and war expenditures, including vital supplies to Great Britain	100
Where the money comes from Taxation	54
Victory loan, war savings certificates, et cetera	46
	100

If we do not include the net figure of $800,000,000 for vital supplies to Great Britain, then Canada is financing both its ordinary and its war-time expenditures by current taxation to the extent of 79 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the two combined make up 79 per cent? Seventy-nine per cent of the combined war and ordinary expenditure is made up from taxation. That should be clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are meeting out of revenues our total ordinary peace-time expenditures, plus our war-time expenditures, but not including assistance to Great Britain, to the extent of 79 per cent. It must thus be obvious to all that as Canada is raising in taxes three times its ordinary expenditures, every dollar raised through the victory loan is a dollar which will be directly devoted to war purposes.

In what I have just said I have been speaking of the cash portion of the victory loan. As the house knows, we are also making a conversion offer to holders of dominion 5 per cent national service loan bonds which mature on November 15, 1941.

CITY OF TORONTO

REQUEST WITH RESPECT TO REPRESENTATION IN CABINET OF BUSINESS AND COMMERCIAL INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he will be kind enough to give consideration to the following. From the business and commercial standpoint, the city of Toronto at present has no direct representation in the cabinet. This may not be a matter which a private member should bring up, but the Prime Minister's family have had a very long and close association with the public affairs of that city, his grandfather having been its first mayor. The city is the commercial and industrial metropolis of Canada, a leader in war work, recruiting, patriotic activities of all kinds, and a large subscriber to war loans. True, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was born and bred there and his distinguished grandfather has done a great deal for the city, but the Postmaster General does not represent a Toronto seat directly, and in the past we have at times had two or three ministers in the cabinet representing the city. Will the Prime Minister give consideration in the contemplated cabinet changes to giving our city increased representation in addition to our present representative?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for his kind personal references, and I shall be only too pleased to consider what he has said. But his remarks call to mind something I once heard Sir Wilfrid Laurier say when representations were made to him from Ontario, and particularly from the city of Toronto, respecting the cabinet. Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied, "You good people from Toronto want me to have a cabinet of angels, but you do not send me angels to make a cabinet of."

RED DEER POST OFFICE

REFERENCE TO MOTION FOR PAPERS PASSED ON MARCH 5

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the house passed a motion which I moved for the tabling of correspondence relative to the Red Deer post office. With the permission of the house I ask leave to withdraw that motion.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Monday, June 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 87, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Repeal of paragraph (c) of section 3.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Wait a minute, Mr. Chairman. I was in conversation with the Minister of Finance over an important matter when the Chairman was calling the sections, and I desired to have something to say on section 1. But first may I be permitted to make some interrogatories of the minister with regard to the subject matters to which I alluded yesterday on the second reading. If the minister is not able to give the information now, or if he prefers to deal with the matter at a later stage, it will be satisfactory to me.

At no stage of the proceedings has the Minister of Finance placed on the record a statement of the net amount which would be payable to each of the provinces under alternatives (a) and (b) of his proposals to the provinces if they vacate the income tax fields. The minister must have some calculations based on the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, or, if these are not complete, at least estimates based upon provincial financing for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940. The house and the country should have this information.

In his budget speech the minister stated that the net increase to the dominion from the changes proposed in the personal income and corporation taxes after making required payments to the provinces would be approximately $90,000,000. I think that is a correct statement of the position. The committee should also have information as to what the gross increase would be before the payments to the provinces are made, and an estimate of the amount which it is anticipated will be paid to each of the provinces. If the minister will give that information at a later stage, I shall be grateful to him.

What sections did you call, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 5 now. I called the other sections and members called "carried".

Mr. HANSON: Oh, no. I ask the committee to revert to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee to revert to section 1?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are certain matters that ought to be discussed. We cannot rush this bill through as quickly as that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. I must as chairman of this committee resent the expression "rushing the bill through". I have been very careful not to rush any bill through. I am trying my best to give every member of this committee the opportunity to speak, but it is my duty as Chairman to expedite the work of the committee to the best of my ability and in conformity with the rules of the house. I have already had occasion to draw the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition to the fact that implications of this kind are out of order. I have called each individual section. Hon. members of the committee have called "carried". Nobody objected, and we are now on section 5. If it is the pleasure of the committee to revert to section 1, then of course I am in its hands. I am the servant of the committee. But I do not believe it is fair to imply that we are rushing the work of the house, in the way the leader of the opposition has suggested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, after that interlude, and—

The CHAIRMAN: Again I object; it is not an interlude, it is a ruling. That was an improper remark on the part of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that with the consent of the committee we go back to section 1. I am not criticizing your ruling, Mr. Chairman, because it is desirable to get ahead with these sections as rapidly as possible. Perhaps, however, I was to blame in occupying the attention of the leader of the opposition while the sections were being called. I did not realize I was doing so, but certainly I should not want anyone to think that the sections were being carried without full opportunity for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Ilsley moves that the committee revert to section 1. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

On section 1—Rates applicable to all individuals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I regret that occasion arose for you to speak to me in the way you did. I had no intention of course of reflecting upon the Chair. But the Minister of Finance did come over to see me on a matter of some importance, and while the work of the committee was proceeding we were engaged in a discussion. I did not personally realize that sections of the bill were being called. Otherwise I would have been discourteous enough to the minister to rise immediately and make my observations. Let us start over again. I have no objection at all to the passage of sections 1, 2 and 3, but I do wish briefly to discuss section 4.

Mr. CHURCH: I have a point in mind which has reference to sections 1 and 2. I refer to the commitments which have been undertaken by some of the smaller groups who are subject to income tax, and I object to the increases in schedule A as they apply to these groups. Since the budget of 1940, and the taxes enumerated in the schedule appended thereto, many people have made commitments to build houses. I strongly dissent from the opinion expressed yesterday by the hon. member for Parkdale respecting housing in Toronto. As to slums in Toronto we have few now. The public utilities, the civic transportation facilities and good roads have made possible the building of small houses in Toronto and district at small cost.

In my opinion reconsideration should be given to schedule A, for the benefit of workers who have already made contracts for building or buying houses. It is a grave mistake to make jumps in taxes such as are here indicated, and which affect small wage-earners. Their commitments on mortgages and insurance premiums are already burdensome, to say nothing of heavy taxation. We have now in progress a campaign for victory loan subscriptions—and what it will cost, I have no idea. But about 70 per cent of the people in greater Toronto cannot subscribe to it, because of the heavy load I have mentioned, although they are anxious to do their part and subscribe in a small way.

Many of the persons affected are soldiers. If there were a postponement of the payment of mortgage commitments and insurance premiums where they have been regularly paid for years, at the same rate as the victory loan instead of 7 per cent, then they would subscribe. They are anxious to do so, because some of them are serving on victory loan committees. We hope this loan will go over the top, but we also hope that the revenue collected from people in receipt of the smaller incomes will be commensurate with the commitments they have made. I should like to have a reply from the minister, because at times he has not been unfriendly to the people I have mentioned, the small wage earners.

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter was fully debated when the resolution was before the committee, and also in the debate on the budget. I have no further observations to make now.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Earned income.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Paragraph (m) defines "earned income," and included in the paragraph is the expression "indemnities or other remuneration paid to members of dominion, provincial or territorial legislative bodies or municipal councils." By express direction the indemnities paid to members of parliament are included in the category of salaries and wages. I dissent from that principle. I do not wish it to be understood that I am arguing for exemption from national taxation, either with regard to income tax or national defence tax, as they apply to the indemnities paid to members of parliament. That is not so at all. I say that from the very beginning, from away back in 1917, members of parliament have been glad to pay the imposts levied upon their indemnities. My objection is that the paragraph is based on an improper and unconstitutional theory. Indemnities are not wages paid to members of parliament. They are, in fact, indemnities, as indicated in the act under which they are paid. Therefore I say it is wrong in principle to tax, as salaries or wages either for income or national defence tax purposes, the indemnities of members of parliament. But in order to keep the position absolutely straight I suggest the ministry should follow the principle enunciated when salary deductions were made in 1931. At that time members of parliament were the first people in the public service to take the deduction of 10 per cent on their indemnities. It was done on the theory that the crown would be authorized so to do by the people's elected representatives, who are not employees of the crown; they voluntarily relinquished 10 per cent of their indemnities for the good of the country.

I suggest therefore that the minister should correct the position indicated in this paragraph. He should maintain the constitutional position of members of parliament, and should take the authority, which will be given with the greatest good-will by members of the House of Commons, and, I am sure, of the other place, to put into effect what I conceive to be the correct constitutional principle. If part of these indemnities is to be allocated to the service of the state, then I suggest that it be done by way of a bill to deduct from the indemnities of members of parliament the income and national defence taxes applicable. But the indemnities ought not to be taxed on the theory that members of parliament are employees of the crown.

I expressly repudiate the suggestion contained in the Income War Tax Act that we are in any sense the employees of the crown. If one were to carry that a little farther he would reach the logical conclusion that we are also employees of the present government, and I expressly dissent from that idea. I am satisfied that if any private member thinks the matter through, and studies the constitutional aspect of the question he will agree that we are the representatives of the people under the constitution, and we are not here as employees of any government, no matter what its political stripe may be. This is a question of principle. It is not a matter of great consequence from the point of view of dollars and cents; that is not the point at all. But to say that we are employees of the crown is a false doctrine and we should not for a moment tolerate it in any legislation on the statute books.

I suggest to the minister that even if it is late in the session he consider adopting the principle that the taxation of members of parliament should be on the theory, not that we are employees of the government or of the crown, but that we are the elected representatives of the people and that we voluntarily submit to a deduction from that indemnity which parliament in days gone by saw fit to grant to us. That is the principle I am contending for. Simply by putting a clause in an act of parliament you cannot make me an employee of the crown. That is not the principle of democratic government. That is hoisting yourself by your boot-straps; it is saying that black is white.

We all agree that we should be taxed. No one for a moment has offered the suggestion that we should not be taxed as other people are. In fact we desire to set an example to the rest of the public in bearing our fair share of taxation, but let us put it on the proper principle and not on a theory that is false in fact and false under the constitution of the country.

Mr. O'BRIEN: In view of the fact that I raised this question when the matter was in the resolution stage, I am pleased that the leader of the opposition has presented the same view to the committee and has substantiated my remarks. Therefore I have nothing more to say except to ask the minister to see that the anomaly is corrected, as the leader of the opposition has urged. Parliament had the power to legislate as it did in regard to this matter, but when parliament did so it committed constitutional suicide, and I submit that we should now take our position once more on firm ground.

Mr. CHURCH: Earned income, as defined by section 4, is not earned income at all; in some cases not half of what can be classed as income is ever received by the earner when you allow for deductions that have to be made by the person earning it. The new income tax principle is very unfair. One of the main provisions is section 4 which gives the definition according to the officials. While I have great admiration for these officials, I submit that it is the function and the duty of parliament to revise these clauses. Under the law to-day, all that we can do is to perform a post-mortem, because we cannot change one word of Bill No. 87. Not one word can be altered by the representatives of the people, who are responsible to them for this bill. In Washington it is different. There they discussed income tax and revenues for months before the budget of the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, was adopted; they can make any changes they like. If we cannot make any changes we may as well pass the bill holus bolus and take the definition of earned income given us, which means salaries, wages, fees, bonuses, pensions, superannuation allowances, retiring allowances, gratuities, honoraria, and the income from any office or employment of profit held by any person, and so on. In some cases under this section as much as fifty per cent of the earnings from these sources has been taken away, and the earner does not get it at all, yet he has to pay on the full sum, not the net. Our system of taxation is most unfair. It is robbing Peter to pay Paul. I am in favour of income tax and always have been, but I believe the principle of this section giving the definition of earned income is unfair. The same is true of the section with regard to investment income. Certainly some part of it should be allowed for deductions now not considered in the matter.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. NEILL: Now that this matter has been introduced I would call the attention of the committee to another aspect of it. With very few exceptions, I believe, we all agree that income tax is a fair tax. Provided I get an income I am willing to pay a tax on it, whether that tax be large or small; but I do object, and I believe other members will share my view, to being taxed on income which is not received. Many years ago the then minister of finance put an amendment into the act—I have not got it before me now—expressly stating in so many words that if a person is away from home in the pursuit of his business and incurs any expense in connection with travelling, or board and lodging, he is entitled to deduct that sum from the gross profits of his business, in the same way that you are allowed to deduct the wages of people you employ. But when it comes to members of parliament that principle is not employed. We are taxed on the full amount of $4,000. Does any member suggest that he gets $4,000 net indemnity? The idea is ridiculous. I employ a stenographer at home solely in connection with political work, and I have other expenses while travelling in the district. If I were running a store I would be allowed to deduct those expenditures, but because I am a member of parliament they are not allowed.

The language used is "business or occupation". A number of years ago I took this up with the proper official and he said I was not eligible to deduct anything whatever because my status was neither that of a business nor that of an occupation. I asked him if he would tell me what it was if it were neither of these, and he said it was an honour. But you cannot live on an honour. The province of British Columbia does allow a certain amount to be taken off. It used to be $2,000. One was allowed to deduct that, just as a man running a blacksmith's shop is allowed to take off expenses. Later on the province reduced that allowance. It was a flat rate and did not go into details; it simply said $2,000. Since then they have reduced it to $1,000. That is an admission of the principle of the thing. We are no longer able to obtain that reduction there because income tax has been surrendered in that province.

I would not have brought this matter up because it might look as if we were trying to get something for ourselves. Now that it has been brought up, however, it is only right to point out to the Minister of Finance that we should be allowed either a flat rate or such an amount as we can substantiate without any shadow of doubt as expenses incurred in discharging our duties as members of parliament. It is not only the amount of indemnity that is involved, but if you have private means added to the indemnity that puts the rate into higher brackets, which increases the tax paid. Tax us all you like on a percentage basis, but do not tax us on something we never get or see. Tax us on our net income from being a member of parliament the same as you would tax us on the net income from being a storekeeper or anything else.

I concur in the view taken by the leader of the opposition, but that is on a somewhat different line. I suggest that we should be allowed either a flat rate in consideration of expenses incurred in obtaining this income, or else a certain amount by vouchers submitted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The leader of the opposition objects to having indemnities classed as earnings of an employee. I do not think they are so taxed. The section before the committee, 4(m), contains an exhaustive definition of "earned income"; it enumerates various varieties of earned income or what the act shall consider as earned income. It does not purport to bring them all under the heading of income of employees. The first few lines seem to relate to salaries, wages, fees, bonuses and so on, but it contains such words as "pensions, superannuation allowances, retiring allowances, gratuities, honoraria", and so forth. The middle part of the section is still farther away from any idea of wages or income of an employee, because it deals with the earnings which a person derives from the exercise of his trade, vocation or calling, and then finally the latter part of the section makes it clear that the definition extends to "indemnities or other remuneration paid to members of the dominion, provincial or territorial legislative bodies or municipal councils". I am unable, therefore, to appreciate the argument that in some way the indemnities are being branded as wages or salaries paid by the government to employees of the crown. I do not think that is so. They are simply swept within the definition of earned income, but without any legislative expression of opinion as to whether they are in the nature of wages of employees or not. There is no implication that they are that I can read into this section.

With respect to the argument of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, there is much to be said for it. It is very hard to know just where to draw the line between living expenses which can be allowed as deductions from gross income for income tax purposes and living expenses that should not be so allowed. Parliament, in its wisdom or otherwise, has decided that the travelling expenses, including meals and lodging of persons travelling in connection with their trade or business—

An hon. MEMBER: Or occupation.

Mr. ILSLEY: —while away from home in pursuit of a trade or business, shall be permitted as deductions. But of course it is a principle that should not apply generally. It could not, for example, be applied to a person who is working at home. He has lodging and living expenses, but it would never do to permit him to deduct those from income for income tax purposes, because the income tax is upon the income which he receives for the purpose, among other things, of meeting his living expenses. As I say, it is hard to know where to draw the line. It has always been the law since the inception of the income war tax act that sessional indemnities are income and taxable as income, and that no deduction is allowed for the cost of meals and room in Ottawa any more than deduction in respect of living expenses is allowed for the great mass of the population of the country.

Mr. NEILL: And what about travelling?

Mr. ILSLEY: Travelling expenses are pretty well provided for by statute. The statute provides a fairly generous allowance for travelling expenses, at least for one trip here and one trip back.

Whatever the abstract or theoretical rights in the controversy may be, it would be thoroughly impracticable for us and undesirable to make any change of this kind at the present time or under existing conditions.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I should like to refer to a paragraph of a letter I received from an official of the national revenue department dated July 29, 1940, when I asked a question last year for information. He says:

> As the elected representative of the people in the constituency of Northumberland, New Brunswick, you receive an "indemnity" which is paid by the dominion government. Under the definition of "employee" referred to above you are therefore an employee of the dominion government and as such you personally should file two copies of form N.D.T.1 with the representative of the treasury, House of Commons, Ottawa, so that the proper amount of national defence tax may be deducted from the moneys payable to you.

Therefore there seems to be a difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: From whom did the letter come? Is it the local office?

Mr. O'BRIEN: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: The dominion office?

Mr. O'BRIEN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The Minister of Finance has taken a very narrow view of the argument I used, in confining it to meals and hotel. There are other expenses such as I enumerated, the cost of a stenographer and so forth; and as regards travelling he has surely forgotten the days before he was a cabinet minister when he talks about the expenses being fully or even reasonably met by the allowance to come to Ottawa once a year. I suppose my travelling expenses in covering my district throughout the year will reach $300 or $400, apart from coming to Ottawa, and surely he would not say that is amply provided for. That is hardly the position.

As regards all other income, you pay on your net income, not the gross. You are allowed to take off the cost of obtaining the income, and part of the cost of obtaining this income, or wage if you choose to put it on that low plane, is what I have spoken of.

Running all through the argument of the Minister of Finance on these bills, and apparently a prominent consideration in the minds of his advisers seems to be the trouble of administration. If it is easy to administer, slam it on; if it involves a little trouble, avoid it.

British Columbia finds a way of dealing with this. For many years they put a flat rate on; they used to allow us $2,000 a year in recognition of the cost of being a member of the dominion parliament, and then we paid income tax in the province on the remaining $2,000. They have since reduced that to $1,000, and now it will disappear altogether. A flat rate is a simple way of doing it, and it would be a recognition of the situation. I remember hearing Mr. Bennett say in this house that he paid his income tax gladly. I would hardly go so far as that. I pay it willingly, but I do not like paying income tax on something which is not income. I believe we should pay on net instead of on gross remuneration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can hardly go as far as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I do not think I should ask the government to allow a deduction for the food I eat; but certainly there is a principle involved in connection with the indemnity of a member of parliament. Certainly he has to incur out of pocket expenditures that he would not incur if he were not a member of parliament. I am not going to labour the point; the hon. member has made out a good case and the minister has recognized that there is something in it, so that perhaps before another session something may be done.

[Mr. O'Brien.]

At the risk of incurring the indignation of hon. members who want to get this bill through I want to return for a moment to the other point. I object to being classed as an employee. It is true that under a technical construction of this act we are not declared expressly to be employees and therefore with earned income, but we are put in the same category, and that is not the theory of representative government in Canada. I suggest to the minister that we let it go for this year, but that between now and next session he give consideration to a recognition of the true position of a member of parliament, that he is here as a representative of the people under constitutional authority. He gets an indemnity against the loss that he sustains by coming here, and for other things of the kind; and we might be taxed by way of deduction from that indemnity just the same as the judges were taxed in 1931. Some of them, though not many, took the view that there was a contract in connection with their appointment and that therefore they should not be required to pay income tax. Parliament said, "All right; we will recognize the principle of that position, but we are going to deduct from the salary paid you by the crown 10 per cent as a contribution to the state." That was in a time of economic warfare. I am not sure just what the position is with respect to judges to-day; I have not looked it up, but I think there is some tax on them.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are subject to the payment of income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that it is a salary to an employee?

Mr. ILSLEY: The difficulty in connection with judges, under Mr. Bennett, was this. Mr. Bennett objected to reducing their salaries because he felt they should not be subject to reduction, and he held the same view with regard to the salaries of officers and men in the armed forces. There was much to be said for that view, but on the other hand it appeared unfair to reduce the salaries of civil servants and the indemnities of members of parliament by 10 per cent, as was done, and at the same time leave the judges and those in the armed forces untouched. The constitutional position, or something akin to it, was preserved by another plan. A tax of 10 per cent was imposed on the salaries of judges and those in the armed forces, so that it could be said that their salaries having been given them for life, and the independence of the judiciary being extremely important, their salaries had not been reduced, but they were being asked to pay a tax.

Mr. NEILL: In view of the statement of the minister that he cannot see his way clear to consider the point I have raised, I would ask whether he would be in favour of withdrawing the allowance of $2,000 a year given each cabinet minister in lieu of an automobile?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is relevant to this discussion.

Mr. NEILL: I think it is highly relevant and clearly a case in point, involving your car versus my car.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may not be quite relevant, but this matter crops up from time to time and we might as well face the situation first as last. What was the position? Prior to the institution of this grant of $2,000 a year to cabinet ministers and the leader of the opposition, ministers of the crown were supplied free of charge with luxurious motor cars, and all kinds of expenses were incurred until it was felt that the cost to the country was exorbitant. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says it was a scandal. Perhaps that is too broad a term to use generally, but I do think perhaps it approximates the position in certain instances.

Because of that fact it was determined to set up a new position. It was recognized that cabinet ministers and the leader of the opposition of the day—my right hon. friend the Prime Minister occupying that position at the time—should not be supplied at the public expense with a new motor car every year or every second year, with chauffeurs paid by the government, gasoline and oil bought by the government and all that sort of thing, but that they should be given a lump sum in lieu of the amount which had been expended in this way prior to that time. That was done, and I am satisfied that a decided saving to the treasury resulted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure there was a decided saving to the treasury, and the minister agrees with me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have always understood there was a saving.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt about it. It would take quite a lot of trouble to demonstrate it mathematically, but I am quite sure it could be done. I recall the instance of a Speaker of this house who got practically a new car by way of repairs, and it was charged up to the government. I am not going to go beyond that, but that sort of thing did develop in isolated cases. I would not have anyone think I believe it was general, but in some instances it did develop into something approaching a scandal.

What is the position to-day? Cabinet ministers and the leader of the opposition are voted by statute the sum of $166.66 per month in lieu of a motor car. What does that mean? If you have not a motor car it means that you absorb it into your general income, which I do not think is right. But if you have a motor car; if you keep a chauffeur; if, as in my position, you have to rent a garage or garage space, you have nothing left. I have kept an account of this thing, and I know that I am distinctly out of pocket. If I did not receive this allowance I would not maintain a car in Ottawa, and I think I would be better off. Then when I went home I would drive my own car, as other people do. Let us be fair about this thing. This is intended to expedite the business of cabinet ministers and the leader of the opposition, and to do away with a position which to say the least was not satisfactory. If it is the desire of the House of Commons in war time that this allowance should not be made, I should be very glad to hear it. Then I would at once dispense with the services of my chauffeur and send my car home.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But if it is the will of parliament that the Prime Minister of this country should have a motor car at the expense of the country—and I believe he should, or that he should have an allowance in lieu thereof—or that the Minister of National Defence, who has to travel a great deal, should have a car, or any of the other ministers, then I think this is a fair way of doing it. The Leader of the Opposition also has a position that requires him to travel a good deal, and in these cases I do not think it unfair to ask the country to make the contribution. If you pay a chauffeur $25 a week; if you pay your garage rent; if you pay the ordinary cost of maintenance, repairs and so on, you find that $2,000 does not begin to cover the expense, and you have nothing left for the depreciation of your car.

I think I have made a fair statement of the matter, and I hope hon. members will understand my position. So far as I am concerned, I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Annuities should come under this section, because these are generally made up of part income and part capital. A man may work for a company or organization which does not provide a superannuation or a pension, and he may pay for an annuity out of his earnings over the years.

Mr. ILSLEY: It should be in unless it is included in the other, because it is not regarded as investment. I shall have a look at it.

Mr. McCANN: If one is to take at face value the observations which one hears from members of parliament, I think it can be said that there is not a single member of this house who does not object to his full indemnity being taxed. I am surprised that more objection has not been voiced at this time. I have no objection to any member of the government having a car allowance to the extent of $2,000, although frankly I do not think it costs $2,000 a year to operate a car. It may cost that if one has to have a chauffeur, but surely if a man can drive his own car in Fredericton he ought to be able to drive it in Ottawa. There is gross discrimination between the allowance made to members of the government and the lack of allowance made to members of parliament. An allowance of $2,000 will cover the operating expenses and depreciation of a car, and in addition there are generous expense accounts for members of the government which are passed without question. I received an indemnity in 1940 upon which I willingly paid an income tax. I received that indemnity by virtue of the fact that I had spent a considerable amount of money in March, 1940, by way of legitimate expenses, in order to become a member of this house. If I had wanted to become a slave of some vested interest I could have obtained contributions to cover my election expenses, but in order to be free and independent, as I am, I paid my own expenses. I submit that I should be allowed to make a deduction for the legitimate expenses of printing, advertising, the hiring of halls and so on. I do not like to be classed as an employee of the crown; I am not an employee of the crown, I am a servant of the crown. If as a servant of the crown I choose to say that I am content that a deduction should be made on my indemnity, all well and good, but to give it to you with one hand and take it back with the other is neither fair nor honest. This is a matter upon which members of parliament should express their opinions freely. As I say, if you take at full face value the views that are expressed to you privately, it would seem that there is not a single member who does not believe that some deductions should be allowed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister put in annuities, at least to the extent of $1,200?

Mr. ILSLEY: I agreed that that should be done a few minutes ago, but I should like to reconsider it. I am not just sure whether some annuities are not in the nature of investment income. Perhaps the section could stand and we will give some consideration to that this afternoon.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think the reason so many hon. members do not like to say anything—I have never been bothered that way particularly myself, although perhaps I would be better off if I were—is that they do not like to talk about their own indemnities. As the hon. member who spoke previously said, we hear these things around the corridors and in the cafeteria, but for some reason or other hon. members do not like to have their criticism appear in Hansard. I delight having mine in Hansard, and I should like to have it in big letters, because this strikes me as being particularly unreasonable. The leader of the opposition has stated that he needs a chauffeur to drive him up to the Chateau Laurier. I do not agree with him. I think it would be cheaper if we gave him a taxicab.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that. I said I needed a chauffeur in Ottawa and I am going to have one.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I doubt very much whether it costs the leader of the opposition as much to operate his car in New Brunswick as it costs the member for Fraser Valley or the hon. member for Cariboo. His whole province is not as large as one of our ridings. I am prepared to produce my accounts to show what it costs me to run my car while at home, and there would be no charge for a chauffeur. I do not get any $1,400 or $1,500 with which to do it.

Mr. JACKMAN: You do not have the same responsibilities.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not depreciating the responsibilities of the leader of the opposition.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not mind him at all, Mr. Chairman. I realize that the leader of the opposition has a responsible position, but I have to go back to my constituency and travel all over to speak at recruiting meetings, and in many other types of campaigns. I will have to get up and explain to the people of my riding that it costs approximately $101,000 to operate private cars, as well as $2,000 a year for each of the ministers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have they all cars?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They get $2,000 a year whether they have cars or not. With all due respect to them, I do not think some of them can drive a car. I have to explain to my people this expenditure of $101,000 for private cars as well as $2,000 a year for automobiles. And there is supposed to be a war on. How can I explain that when I am asking the people to subscribe to the victory loan? It does not make sense. I realize that no member likes to talk about these things because he would appear to be talking about his own indemnity, but surely we have nerve enough to get up and ask that every one of the cabinet ministers, with the exception of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, serve for two months as a private member and pay his own expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have all done that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I gave a fair hearing to the leader of the opposition, and I think he could benefit by listening to British Columbia. We have had to make four trips to that province in one year. British Columbia happens to be on the Pacific coast, and for the benefit of 80 per cent of the members who have not been west I will say that it costs a little to get out there. You have to travel about your riding. It is not a salary that we receive, it is an indemnity. I have no doubt it is more money than many hon. members ever made in their lives, including myself. I am not a lawyer, I am a farmer. But I can take you to my room and show you forty applications for donations from different organizations. Every hon. member gets these; it is part of the game of being a member. Yet we are taxed down to $40 with which to go from here to British Columbia. This is supposed to cover our travelling expenses. We have heard from the organizer of the Conservative party of how many cow days it takes to buy a suit of clothes, or how many cow days it takes to buy a mower; I have not heard of how many cow days it takes to pay a lawyer's bill, but I can tell you.

Section stands.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Deductions for superannuation or pension fund.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has this been amended since last year, when, as I recall it, $300 was allowed and there was not the 5 per cent limitation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Three hundred dollars was the limit of the amount allowed to the employee as a deduction from his income for taxation purposes. This relates to the employer, not the employee.

Mr. JACKMAN: The employee can still deduct $300?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think we should be generous to the employee, because with old age pensions at $20 a month, starting at the age of 70—we hope it will be reduced to 65 when possible—a person with a very small income would feel it hardly worth saving to provide for his own old age unless there was some incentive. Five per cent on $1,200 a year would be $60 a year, which in forty years would amount to $2,400, plus accumulated interest, and the income on that sum would be less than the old age pension. People should be encouraged to save and provide for their own old age. I had the problem presented by a member of my staff whether it was worth while saving for an annuity because after a certain period of years the amount received would be hardly more than the old age pension.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Donations to charitable organizations by taxpayers other than corporations.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister give any information as to the amount of the deductions made last year as a result of this provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that these figures are no longer kept. For years they were kept but they are not available for last year.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Residence of dependents.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is proposed to amend this section by inserting after the word "act" in line 23 of the bill the words "or under subsection seven of section twenty-seven of this act."

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Proviso.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The explanatory note says that sections 13 and 14 are to prevent double taxation. I thought the minister did not object to the principle of double taxation. He told me once there was no objection to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is to prevent a tax on the same income both here and in another country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all right to tax twice in Canada, but not here and elsewhere?

Section agreed to.

Section 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Proviso.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a pretty important section and I am apt to get tangled up when I start to explain it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not understand it myself.

Mr. ILSLEY: I hope the hon. gentleman will understand it when I am through, but I am not optimistic.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): First of all we might have subsection 1 of subsection 9B of the act of 1940 read to get it on the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think perhaps I can explain it. There is some bond interest which is payable either in Canadian or in foreign funds. The provision first was that if a resident of Canada elected to take his interest in a foreign currency which was at a premium he would be subject to a 5 per cent tax. Certain debtors evaded that provision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How?

Mr. ILSLEY: Suppose the foreign currency was at a 10 per cent premium, for example. If the bond interest was payable in United States or Canadian currency at the option of the holder, and he elected to be paid in United States currency, he would have the right to be paid the equivalent of $110 Canadian dollars although the coupon was for only $100. Certain debtors worked out this technique. They said to their creditors, "Do not exercise your option and require payment in United States funds but ask us instead for $104.50 in Canadian funds and we will pay that to you".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the approach from the debtor company to the coupon holder?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. Municipalities did it largely. The result was that the creditor was just as well off, the debtor was about $5.50 better off on the coupon, and the dominion government was out its tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand the position. How does this correct it?

Mr. ILSLEY: A year or two ago we made a change in the section which was as I have described it, and the amendment provided that if the debtor had the right to require payment at his option in a currency which was at a premium, then the tax attached.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even if the option was not exercised?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That was ample protection for the crown, but it was interfering in cases where the debtors had defaulted in whole or in part. So that this is our third attempt at legislation on the subject.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a system of trial and error.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The proviso in the bill states:

> Provided, however, that no tax hereunder shall be payable if no part of the premium is paid by the Canadian debtor to the creditor.

If the creditor does not get any advantage, if he does not get even $101 for his $100 coupon, then no tax is collectable from him. Otherwise we would be collecting taxation in cases where he got $50 for a $100 coupon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that correct the whole difficulty?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just wait and see.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe it does.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suggest for the consideration of the minister a change in the wording. Would it not be better to say in line 17, "if no part of any premium" is paid, because in fact it is not "the premium." It may be called a premium, if we like, but I believe we need a more inclusive word than the word "the." "The premium" refers to the exchange premium. What the minister is driving at is any premium or bonus.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is arguing that it is an amount paid by reason of the existence of an exchange premium?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: But, strictly speaking, it is not "the exchange premium" itself which is being paid; it is an amount which is being paid or called by reason of the existence of a premium. Is that the argument?

Mr. JACKMAN: It might be argued that the bonus had no relation to the premium which, in the act, must refer to the exchange premium. They just say, "If you will not insist upon your right to United States funds, we will give you so much." If no bonus is paid by the Canadian debtor, I think that would almost cover the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree, although I may be wrong. I do not think there can be any ambiguity. The situation is this: I am the holder of bonds which are payable, as to interest, in either United States or Canadian funds. The United States funds are at "a premium." The words "a premium" are used in the earlier sections. This tax applies in certain circumstances, but only if part of the premium is paid to me by the Canadian debtor. Certainly if I get more than $100 in Canadian funds, part of the premium is being paid to me.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, it is for the lawyers to decide.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am obliged for the suggestion, but I believe the section is safe enough as it is.

Section agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask that sections 16 and 17 stand.

Sections 16 and 17 stand.

On section 18—Income capitalized, how taxed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was this point discussed in the resolution stage?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is new, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the intention?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is declaratory, I am advised by my officers. There are certain circumstances under which estates are subject to income tax. This would have reference to trustees, executors, and so on. This section appears in the bill to make it clear that these persons are taxed as single persons, and not as corporations or married persons. They are entitled to the exemptions indicated in the paragraphs mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has that not always been the law with respect to the income of estates before distribution? They never received exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; I should have said they are not entitled to exemption. They do not receive and are not entitled to the $750 exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or to dependents' exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the explanatory note would seem to indicate that this section is aimed only at estates which capitalize accumulated income; is that so? Estates which are not distributed but which under the statute are liable to income tax are not entitled to exemption. Here is a case of capitalization of accumulated income. One would never understand the inference, from the wording of the section, without going back to all these references. I do not understand why this section appears.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the present provisions of subsection 4 as appearing at section 19 of the statutes of 1940 are as follows:

4. (a) Income received by an estate or trust and capitalized shall be taxable in the hands of the executors or trustees, or other like persons acting in a fiduciary capacity.

(b) Income earned during the life of any person shall, when received after the death of such person by his executors, trustees or other like persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, be taxable in the hands of such fiduciary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That has always been the law.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, following some recent amendments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of the immediate past.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Section 18 of the bill states that income taxable under subsections 4 (a) and 4 (b) shall be taxed as if such income were the income of a person other than a corporation, provided that no deduction shall be allowed in respect of the exemptions provided by paragraphs (c), (d), (e), (ee) and (i) of subsection 1 of section 5 of the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this just a tightening up? Have these exemptions ever been allowed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they have not been allowed; it is simply declaratory of the practice, and brings the procedure into harmony with subsection 2 of section 11 of the Income War Tax Act, which relates to trusts for unascertained persons, and to income accumulating and in trust for the benefit of unascertained persons, and provides that that income shall be taxable in the hands of the trustee or other like person acting in a fiduciary capacity. Then it provides:

—as if such income were the income of a person other than a corporation, provided that he shall not be entitled to the exemptions provided by paragraphs (c) (d) (e) and (i) of subsection 1 of section 5 of this act.

So that this amendment brings subsection 4, as it appears in the 1940 statutes, into conformity with subsection 2 of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And into conformity with the practice of the past.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that has been the practice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think it must frequently happen that a married man subject to income tax dies, in the middle of a taxation period, leaving a widow and dependents. Suppose he dies on the first of July. The estate takes over the investments, we will say, and the income goes into the estate. For that year, before the estate is distributed, is any allowance made for the wife and dependent children? If not, it seems to me to be very narrow.

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends on the terms of the will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; it is not a question of the terms of the will. Suppose he distributes one-third to the wife and two-thirds to the children; they do not get it in the six months, as a rule. Very often provision has to be made for their maintenance. In justice and equity in the administration of the act, for the tax payable in respect of 1940, let us say, where the death occurs in the middle of a period, should there not be in 1941 a full allowance of $750 or whatever it may be for the wife and so much for the dependent child? Or is it split up, fifty-fifty? According to this, there would be no allowance at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: This does not apply to such a case. In the case the hon. gentleman has put, the deceased pays income tax up to the date of his death.

Mr. JACKMAN: And allowance is given accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: He gets the exemptions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does he get the full year's exemption for his wife?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I am advised that he does.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Application.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This brings it into conformity with the amendment the minister moved?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 21—Tax on non-residents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the gross rental question we discussed?

Mr. ILSLEY: The provision the hon. gentleman has in mind is in section 22.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

On section 22—Rentals from real estate taxed on net income basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This gives full effect to the minister's amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Annual returns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to delay the committee, but since we had the discussion and the minister was good enough to make the change with respect to businesses, leaving the individual returns to be made on March 31, I have received a great many letters on this subject to the effect that the experience of business men in filing their returns is that there is a difficulty on account of the lack of chartered accountants, just as there is a difficulty for the unincorporated company which has to employ chartered accountants. There is a great deal to be said in that regard. For years the public has been used to April 30 and has made plans accordingly. Now a month has been taken off and a protest is made on behalf of certain individuals. I therefore promised to bring the matter up again at this stage.

I am not sure that the minister made it clear why the department desired this change in the first instance. Was it to get the money in early? I do not think that is really a sound reason. Was it because of the great increase in the number of returns to be filed? I do not think that can be a reason, because there are twelve months in the year and just so many hours in the day to do the work. What was the reason for moving it forward a month in the first instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was considered that three months would give ample time normally for a person to compute his income for the preceding year and make his return. We have provided for four months for businesses, whether incorporated or unincorporated. It brings the money in earlier, yes. That was a consideration. Then we are proposing a scheme for payment by instalments, and this is about the middle of the period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For this year, but you have seven months if you start under the new scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are six months altogether. The first payment is made in September, but the interval between the first payment and March 31 is six months—October to March, both inclusive. In consideration of the taxpayer paying in advance, which would be equivalent to paying half of the income tax three months in advance, he is allowed to go on paying by instalments for six months after March without interest for the months from April to September inclusive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those of us who have adopted the present system of eight payments beginning in January will have concluded our payments, we hope, by the end of August. That will leave four months out of this calendar year, but we are confronted with the tax on this year's income payable next year, and we are given the option of four payments this year, September, October, November and December. We have three months in which to file the returns under this proposal, so that we must reckon our tax, if we are to take advantage of the scheme, as soon as possible after the end of the year and then pay a fraction of the tax as we estimate it ourselves. I think the minister has given the correct reason; I do not think the question of getting the money in is so important. It is just this—I use the word without being offensive—this bureaucracy has decided that it wants the returns filed one month sooner, without regard to the convenience of the taxpayers. That is the bald, naked truth. I do not think parliament should do this just because the officials of the department say they want it. The minister has to give us a better reason than that. Three months may be sufficient for the simple tax return; three months in a given case may not be time enough. I know that if a man makes a pro forma return and a substantial payment he is given consideration, and many a man is grateful for that; I know of cases. And that just has to be; sometimes it is not humanly possible to make the return.

I am not yet convinced that we should make this change. The minister receded in the one case; I ask him to recede in the other and to leave the date April 30. I do not think it will at all affect his programme of partial payments of 1941 income tax payable in 1942.

Mr. McCANN: In making an income tax return for 1941 under the present set-up it is taken for granted one can anticipate in September, October, November and December what his income will be in the last quarter of the year. In starting to make payments in September one does the government a favour by giving it the use of that money six or seven months prior to the time he is obligated to pay it. In recompense for the favour that the taxpayer does the country the government does him the disfavour of cutting the time down one month, saying "You must pay it thirty days ahead because you never did a favour for us before in that particular regard." I do not know whether the end of the fiscal year being at the end of March has anything to do with the government's desire to have the return made at the end of March. It may have. But the Easter holidays come along usually in April, and there are plenty of people who take advantage perhaps of a few days off at that time to make out their income tax return. I do not think the advantage that will accrue to the government by having the return made by March 30 outweighs the disadvantage that there will be to the taxpayer, and after all the taxpayer should be given some consideration. Let us not get into the state of mind that we can say, just because the government runs the business of this country and wants this, we are going to be regimented to the extent that the taxpayer has no more rights. That would be a bad state of things for this country to get into. People pay their income tax willingly, they want to make honest returns and within the prescribed time, but the government is doing no great favour to them in giving them a little latitude in the matter of the date of filing the return.

Mr. ISNOR: As one who associated himself with the thought expressed by the leader of the opposition in reference to the shortening of the time for filing the return, particularly as applying to unincorporated business firms, I can see that there are advantages as well as disadvantages in connection with it. I am wondering whether the minister had in mind in providing for returns from certain types of income tax payers by March 31 that he was doing the individual a favour. The larger firms, incorporated as well as unincorporated, are able to procure the services of auditors to prepare their accounts, and their time would be taken up to a large extent in the month of April. Anyone's experience in trying to procure their services is that we all wait until the last month to prepare our income tax returns or to check them. We have made a tentative balance sheet and it is then that we find it difficult to obtain the services of auditors. It is just possible that the minister had in mind that thought—greater efficiency so far as the department is concerned, and also making it easier for the individual to procure the professional help he must sometimes have in order to make a correct return.

Mr. ILSLEY: The leader of the opposition says this is what the bureaucracy want.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the reason the minister gave.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh no; that was not the reason at all. This term "bureaucracy" is used good-naturedly, but I think it is a shame to be using it too much, because it builds up the idea that there is a group of public enemies here in Ottawa setting their hands and faces against the people of this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well; I think I qualified it sufficiently. I do not mean that at all. I will withdraw the term if it is offensive; I certainly had no such idea in mind. I shall say, then, the "permanent officials" want this done. That is the correct description. And I suggest that that is not a good enough reason.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not the reason I gave, and moreover they do not all want it done either, if that is any satisfaction to the committee. However, I have to take responsibility for these measures, and the tendency to go back and say that this is what some bureaucrats of some kind want may be all very well occasionally, but I do not want the impression to be given that there is a group of civil servants who do not care anything about the convenience or interests of the people. They are doing a very important job and doing it well. I have often heard hon. gentlemen say that myself.

Our present system of instalments ceases in August. That is the plan that is under way now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is last year's plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: The eight-months plan. Now it is desirable to get the new system operating in September, and it is more desirable to have the date of payment approximately in the middle of that period than pretty well to the end, especially as there is no reason why it should not be. We are talking about individuals now. My income tax returns are not difficult to make, but I can make them just as well in January as in February or March; I do not need to wait until April, and I think that is true of the overwhelming majority of personal income tax payers.

The hon. member for Renfrew South says we are asking those who are paying on the new instalment plan to estimate their income for the present year. That is not the scheme. The scheme is that they pay on the basis of their last year's income for the months of September to December.

Mr. McCANN: That is estimating.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they know what their last year's income was.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. McCANN: But you are estimating it for this year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the hon. member said was true of last year; you had to estimate it before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Last year, under the scheme for payment in eight instalments, there was very little difficulty because an estimate could be made in January. An estimate cannot be made in September, nor do we ask anyone to do that. We are asking taxpayers to pay for September, October, November and December, on the basis of the income for the previous year.

Mr. McCANN: Anticipating that the income will not be lower in the succeeding year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there is no such theory at all. It is in January that the matter is adjusted and spread over the next eight months on such a basis that the whole of the income tax will be paid at the end of the twelve months period. No one is expected to proceed on the assumption that the income for 1941 will be the same as it was for 1940, or for that matter that the income tax will be the same. The one difficulty about changing this date to April 30 is that all our estimates have been based upon this amount coming into the treasury in March, and I do not think it would be worth while to upset everything by giving an extension for that one month. I do not think there is any real inconvenience here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In individual cases I believe there would be some inconvenience, but I would be inclined to think that such cases would be in the minority, as the minister has indicated. The consideration to which he has just alluded, namely, that it is intended to get in this money in this fiscal year, would be a factor; and I am sorry that this argument was not advanced at an earlier stage in order that we might see what were its implications. It would have the effect of bringing into this fiscal year a very large sum of money, but of course that would flatten out in succeeding years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): However, I am not going to press the matter any further. I have stated the objection on behalf of those interested; the minister will not accept the suggestion, and so far as I am concerned that is the end of it.

Mr. CHURCH: I think this change in date, which has been recommended by the departmental officials, is most unfortunate, because the people will not have finished paying their coal bills by the time all these documents must be again prepared and signed. In the recess the minister should endeavour to see if some arrangement cannot be worked out under which all the papers and documents in connection with municipal and provincial taxation would not be made at the same date, and returns would not come due in the very same month to be filled out and returned just when that has also to be done in connection with federal taxation. Such timing all at once is bad. It is unfortunate also that the timing has not been better arranged in connection with other matters, notably the victory loan now under way. I do not think that should have been brought on while this matter of heavier income taxes was being discussed. The timing is all wrong, and it injures the work of the department generally.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the consent of the committee I should like to make a statement about an income tax matter, perhaps not a very large one, that is not strictly relevant to this resolution. I wish the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) were here, but since I am not going to say anything unfavourable to him perhaps his absence does not make very much difference.

Some days ago the hon. member made the statement in the house that some dollar-a-year man, I think he said in British Columbia, had been making certain expenditures, and he asked me if those expenditures would be allowed as deductions for income tax and excess profits tax purposes. Shortly after that Mr. H. R. MacMillan wired me as follows:

> While absent here in connection with shipbuilding I observe in yesterday's papers reports of discussions in the House of Commons yesterday indicating that an unnamed dollar a year lumberman from British Columbia has built extravagant office building as a means of evading excess profits taxes. It is generally believed here that this discussion in the House of Commons refers to me and to the British Columbia Plywoods Limited a manufacturing company of which I am president. The building referred to was completed in May nineteen thirty-eight. It cost eleven thousand dollars which was charged to capital expenditure. Therefore it not only antedated excess profits taxation but it also in no way evaded any taxation. The circulation in such a prominent manner of such innuendoes undermines confidence in people and in institutions and adversely affects the public morale. Therefore I respectfully ask that you make these facts public.

After I received this telegram I made inquiries and found that it would be strictly out of order for any hon. member to make an explanation of this sort on the orders of the day, so I left the matter until in committee of the whole I might be able to read the telegram. I did not have any idea of the identity of the person referred to in this house; it may be that the hon. member for Fraser Valley did not refer to Mr. MacMillan, but apparently the newspapers in British Columbia identified Mr. MacMillan as the person referred to, and since he is a valued employee of the government at the present time, and also because of considerations of justice, I thought it desirable to read his telegram.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I concur in what the minister has done. I think it was quite apparent to those of us who heard the statement that the hon. member for Fraser Valley did refer to Mr. H. R. MacMillan. If the facts are as stated in Mr. MacMillan's telegram, which I do not doubt for a moment, then of course this is just another illustration of gossip being enlarged as it is repeated time and again. You can never catch up with a story like that; there always will be people who will think that what was alleged actually took place. I think the minister has done nothing more than justice to Mr. MacMillan in making this statement.

Section agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Sections 24 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Machinery or equipment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the implication of this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Two or three years ago we provided an income tax credit for capital expenditures made by taxpayers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the theory? That was before the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It was done to stimulate employment. Questions have arisen as to what expenditures should come within the meaning of the section. Specifically I mention rolling stock, buses, trucks and certain items of plant not affixed to the soil. It was claimed that these should qualify for the benefit of the section. The section itself is not clear on that and it may be that the courts would hold one way or the other. The memoranda which have been issued made the matter quite clear and this is for the purpose of making it clear in the legislation that machinery or equipment referred to in the section shall mean only such machinery or equipment as it required to be and is affixed for a permanency within the said period to the business premises of the taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is covered by section 90, part XIV.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is a brief explanation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This crystallizes into legislation the practice of the department so that it will defeat any attempt to make claims which it was not intended should be made?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct. It never was intended by the department, but it is always questionable what parliament did intend and that is for the courts to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Capital costs were not specifically limited to machinery and fixtures?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is arguable. The section reads:

> The capital costs on which the ten per centum shall be calculated are those costs incurred and paid by the taxpayer in the period beginning the first day of May, 1939, and ending the thirtieth day of April, 1940, in respect of work actually done in Canada during the said period, on the construction, manufacture, installation, betterment, replacement, or extension of buildings, machinery or equipment in the said period from the first day of May, 1939, to the thirtieth day of April, 1940, provided such buildings, machinery or equipment are to be used in the earning of the income of the taxpayer.

I believe the intention of the minister and of the department was that these should be permanent installations. The object of the section was to make work, it was to do away with unemployment. A typical case would be where a factory owner added an extension to his factory and brought in and fixed machinery to the premises and proceeded to employ help. The work expended on the extension of the plant and so on was what was contemplated by this provision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was never intended to apply to a new motor.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be an extreme case. Some machinery would have to be imported because one could not draw a distinction between that and machinery bought in Canada. However, it was always felt that it was going too far to extend this to movables and so on that were bought.

Mr. POULIOT: Sometimes a piece of heavy machinery gives employment to many men, but at other times it is not necessary to have a large piece of machinery in order to provide employment. In my county is a man who carries on an interesting trade, the roasting of peanuts and the frying of chips. The only machinery suitable for this work is made in the United States. He has gone to considerable trouble, and I do not know if he has succeeded in getting the foreign exchange control board to permit him to spend $25 in order to buy two machines which will give work to three or four more people during the summer season. This may be considered an unimportant matter, but nothing is unimportant which gives work to people, and from that point of view even the smallest thing should not be overlooked. In this particular case $25 of Canadian money sent to the United States would have enabled a machine to be imported which is not made here and would have given work to three or four people during the whole summer season. It should not be necessary to write several letters in regard to such a matter. Actually four people are employed, but the machine would mean eight people employed, which would mean more salaries and wages.

I would ask the minister to give definite instructions to the foreign exchange control board not to split hairs but to be reasonable when proper requests are made to them. Even if they do not understand the question that is submitted to them they should accept in good faith what is said by those who know more than they ever did in these matters.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not having the statute before me I would ask the minister what is the significance of this addition to subsection 2 of section 90, and what is the significance of the words, "said period" in the second last line of the clause to be added?

Mr. ILSLEY: The period referred to is the twelve-months period beginning May 1, 1939, and ending April 30, 1940. Section 90 provides that a certain proportion of certain capital expenditures may during that period be deducted from the income tax payable for that period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The period has not been extended?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And it is taken care of over a period of time?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, income tax credits are given over three years, if I remember correctly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One-third of the 10 per cent each year.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—To whom applicable.

Mr. O'BRIEN: On May 15 when this legislation was in the resolution stage I asked the minister whether he could define the position of piece-workers as against wage-earners. I will quote from Hansard in order to present the matter in sequence:

Mr. O'Brien: Before six o'clock I spoke privately to the minister, asking him to clarify the situation with respect to the tax as it affects the piece-worker. In the lumbering industry of New Brunswick, and I have no doubt in other provinces we have men working by the month on piece-work.

That sentence should as a matter of fact read "we have men working by the month and/or on piece-work." I continue the quotation:

They are paid by the cord. No doubt men in munitions and other plants are paid on a similar piece-work basis. Will the minister tell us if the tax should be deducted by the employer, or are such men treated as contractors?

Mr. Ilsley: If the piece-worker is an employee, the tax should be deducted. If he is an independent contractor, it should not. In that event he should make a return.

Mr. O'Brien: How would we know whether he is or is not? Does the law give any definition?

Mr. Ilsley: Yes. It is just one of those things which must be decided by the employer himself. It is a very mild legal question, but not one about which it would be necessary to consult a solicitor.

Since the matter is of the utmost importance in the province and in the particular constituency from which I come, as also across Canada, I thought that a more exact definition would be possible and so I wrote to the Department of National Revenue. I quote one paragraph from their letter addressed to me in reply, dated Ottawa, May 19, 1941:

Replying to your letter of the 16th instant you are advised that as piece-workers are regarded as employees for purposes of national defence tax a deduction for such tax is required to be made at the source in all instances where the employee's remuneration exceeds the amounts stipulated in ruling 48 on page 15 of the enclosed brochure.

I wished to have that put on Hansard so that it will be on record and the members of the house and the country generally will understand what tax is to be deducted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the case of piece-workers where the relationship of master and servant does not subsist, there is not an employer within the meaning of the statute. But if there is a power of dismissal as distinguished from the power of cancellation of a contract, there would be an employee. I should like to have that distinction made clear. In certain places in New Brunswick in the lumbering business a contract is given to a man to fell logs and yard them at so much per thousand feet, we will say. The man and his family may do all the work, and he is paid at the rate of so much per thousand feet. But there is always retained the power to cancel the contract if he is not proceeding satisfactorily. In most cases he cannot be dismissed, and there the relationship of master and servant does not subsist. I think that must be the test, and I think the department should take that stand. If a man may be dismissed and his service terminated the tax would be exigible. If there is no power of dismissal but only power to cancel the contract—there is a clear distinction—the tax would not be exigible. Most of these cases are of the kind I suggest, namely, piece-work at so much a piece for pit-props or so much a cord for pulpwood. The man is not hired in the ordinary sense of master and servant, but the right of cancellation is retained if the man's work is not satisfactory or is not being done according to specifications. In that case I do not think the tax is exigible, and I take the risk of so advising. I think it ought to be laid down by the department that where the relationship of master and servant subsists, the tax is exigible. That would settle the question. It is a practical one in New Brunswick.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that would be correct. Section 91, subsection 16, may have some bearing on the question. I am not sure whether the definition covers what the hon. gentleman has said, but it should be taken into account in deciding the question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would have to be decided in the light of that definition, but on a hurried reading the definition does not seem to lessen the force of my suggestion that if there was not the right of dismissal but merely the right of cancellation he would not be an employee within the meaning of the act. It says, "Any salary, wage, remuneration, compensation," and so forth. Of course, consideration for a contract may be termed compensation—and yet it is not true compensation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Subsection 5 of section 91 states that every employer at the time of payment of earnings to an employee shall deduct and collect the tax imposed, if the earnings are in excess of the stated amount. Does the employer have to make a return if the earnings are under that amount? If an employer knows, as a fact, that earnings are under the stated amount, must he make a return? For instance, would a man who has working for him, at his summer place, a person receiving only $600 a year, have to make a return?

Mr. ILSLEY: The employer goes by the rate at the time. If the rate is such that if continued for twelve months the annual earnings would be above the minimum, then such employer must make the deduction. If not, the employer does not have to deduct.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He does not have to make any return?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CHURCH: Subsection 5 does not give the employer a reasonable number of days, namely the time between June 2 and July 1, to take care of his pay sheets. This national defence tax is one of the most iniquitous taxes possible. When the government imposes the heavy burden indicated under schedule A, and then tacks on this additional burden, it is going beyond the powers it should exercise in respect of the small wage-earners. Large departmental stores and many other employers of labour will not, between now and July 1, have sufficient time to make out the schedules in conformity with the statute. The time is too short. I suggest it should be August 1.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When the resolution was before the committee I made inquiry with regard to regulations applying to farmers. My understanding was that a farmer was given the privilege of employing casual help for a definite period before he was required to make a return. According to subsection 5, if the daily rate is $3 a day the farmer would be required to send in a return, even if he had casual labour for only two days. Would the minister make some concession in this connection, so that a man would have to hire casual labour for a week or two weeks before being required to make a return? The actual incomes of many casual workers who receive $3 a day for stooking or threshing operations in western Canada would fall far below the figures set out in the act.

When the resolution was under discussion I raised the question as to the number of farmers across Canada who made returns last year. Many farmers had no idea that the act affected them, and consequently did not make returns. Has the minister any information as to the number of farmers across Canada who made returns last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I have no information available as to the number.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would consideration be given to the extension of the period during which casual labourers may work before the employer becomes liable for prosecution upon failing to make returns?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have in mind the circumstances of employment of a part-time gardener. He may tend half a dozen gardens. For instance, there is a man who puts in my garden and looks after it all summer. He goes and comes when he pleases, keeps his own time and puts in his bill at the end of the month. But he may be doing that work for six other people. I pay no attention to what he does when he leaves my place. I am not going to chase up and down to see whom the man is working for, and I have not done it. I have not felt guilty, nor do I believe I have defrauded the government of any revenue. But there ought to be some provision in the law with respect to that kind of employment. Any attempt to drive employers into making a return in circumstances of that kind is unworkable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Replying to the hon. member for Mackenzie, I do not believe we should make any change in the law. As it now stands, if a person is receiving wages at more than the minimum rate the deduction must be made. I do not know where we would start if we attempted to prescribe periods. At any rate that has not been done.

There is no difficulty in respect of most employees. They are on the big payrolls, where substantial numbers of men and women are employed. There are many of these odd cases which present extreme difficulties. As the leader of the opposition has said, in some instances employers will not pay much attention, because they realize the revenues would not amount to anything. In other cases they do amount to something, and I cannot take the position that the law should not be obeyed and observed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but what action does the department take to learn whether or not there are evasions? Is it just one of those cases where a check cannot be made, and nothing is done? Does the department check the returns which come in, and leave it at that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Investigations are made at the place where the employee works.

Mr. MacNICOL: I learned of two incidents lately which may be of interest to the minister. The owner of a property asked a carpenter what it would cost to erect a fence between his property and that of his neighbour, and was quoted a price of $24. Having submitted a price, I suppose the carpenter would be in the category of a contractor.

The owner of the property in question felt it unnecessary to make any deduction. Another owner of property sent for a carpenter to repair his verandah. He did not ask for a price, but when the carpenter had finished the work he handed the owner a bill for $18. In that instance the owner must make provision for the tax. I am sure there must be countless thousands of cases where the government receives no revenue at all.

Mr. GILLIS: In all instances the deductions for national defence tax are made by corporations, business concerns and so on. In the event of the national defence tax being deducted by a corporation from the pay of an employee, and in the further event of its being ascertained at the end of the year that earnings sufficient to bring the employee under the tax have not been earned, who applies for the return of what has been paid? Is the responsibility with the employee or the employer?

I have in mind the fact that deductions are taken weekly from the pay of employees who might not come under the tax. Many employees are not familiar with the regulations—in fact many hon. members sitting in this chamber are not as familiar with them as they should be—and as a result many who would be entitled to a refund do not understand the procedure necessary to secure a refund. If an employer is making a deduction he should be compelled to keep records, and if deductions are made from the pay of an employee who, it is found, has not come under the act, such employer should be responsible for applications for refunds. Is it right to assume that the individual must make application for a return of funds collected, if he does not come under the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The employee is the one who makes application. If, however, he wishes to make arrangements with his employer to apply on his behalf, or on behalf of all the employees, well and good; in fact such an arrangement would add greatly to the convenience of the department.

Mr. GILLIS: That arrangement could be made with employees where they have an organization? An understanding could be arrived at?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that on a large number of contracts of employment no tax at all is paid. It must be so in the very nature of things. The honest employer will do everything the statute says, but the casual employer may not. The only way to get this tax checked and collected is to pass a regulation requiring every man who hires out his services to carry a pass book, in which should be entered every dollar he earns, initialed by his employer and accessible to the government, so that the whole thing may be checked. Otherwise there will be evasions. There must be a better system than the present. It is all right in the case of permanent employers, big corporations with large payrolls and a large number of employees. They will do it in order to protect themselves, but in the smaller cases it will be ignored.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There must be a considerable number of people who do not have to pay the tax, their annual income not amounting to $660, or $1,200 in the case of married men, but who will not receive a refund of the money they have paid in. It would involve a great deal of bureaucracy, considerable bookkeeping, to keep track of every employee and employer. Would it not be more efficient to require persons who receive over $660 or $1,200 to make a return, as in the case of income tax? The employee might be asked to send in his returns and they could be checked over with the returns filed by those employing him. Has the minister anything to say with regard to such a system, whereby the whole procedure might be clarified and made more efficient?

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole principle is deduction at the source. In many cases returns will be made by these taxpayers, but in other cases the returns will not be made because the deductions will take place through the year. This provides a means of collecting the tax evenly over the year, and in any event it was felt, at the time the tax was introduced, that instead of waiting until the end of the year and then asking employees to make a return the deduction should be made throughout the period. I am sure a considerably larger proportion of the tax payable will be collected by the government under this method, because there will be quite a number who would spend it otherwise and to whom the payment of a lump sum at the end of the year would be extremely difficult, although they would not mind it so much if they had it deducted in this way.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am thinking of the person who does not have to pay the tax directly but from whom it is deducted. Many of these people do not know that there is a refund coming to them for the reason that their income does not come up to the specified amount. I believe the change to $660 is from the 1st of January, 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is $660 from the 1st of July, 1941, not from the 1st of January.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I do not like to delay the committee but I wish to revert to the subject I was discussing a little while ago. I refer to the definition of piece worker or employee. I may have a quaint idea of my position in this house, but I believe I am here to help to make these laws that we are passing, in conjunction with 244 other members. If that is so, I do not know why the minister should tell me that I ought to consult a lawyer to find out the meaning of any law in the making of which I am supposed to be helping.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said not to.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I asked for some information and the minister said: "This is a very mild legal question, but not one about which it would be necessary to consult a solicitor."

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. O'BRIEN: If it is a legal question and I do not need to consult a solicitor, then I shall have to go to a crystal gazer because I do not know where to get the information. In this house we are entitled to information. If members cannot obtain information we can readily understand the confusion that must exist in the country.

I believe the word "bureaucracy" has been used, and earlier in the day the minister said we should not allow the impression to leave this house that we are trying to establish anything of the sort. Perhaps not; but if on a simple question like this members of parliament cannot find out what the law means, a law which they are making, how in the world can people who are doing business in the country possibly expect to cope, not only with these techncial regulations but with the mass of information that is demanded by every department in the federal government and in the provinces? Why, one department wanted to know how much sawdust we were burning in our saw mill. Sawdust is a nuisance, and they said to use a 2,000-pound ton, just in case one might be using one of 2,240 pounds. That sort of information is voluminous, and yet in the maritime provinces, while there are several large companies, there are other concerns in the owner-managed category. There are hundreds of small companies whose business records can be carried in one's vest pocket, so that the information will not be obtained by the government until the officials in the department have some actual knowledge of what does happen from the time a man is hired until he gets his pay cheque and the goods that are produced are sold. An efficiency expert has been described as a man who knows more and more about less and less until he knows everything about nothing. It seems to me we are rapidly approaching that point in our economic life, and it is getting to the stage where all the discussion in this house seems to be concerned with the rich individual or the big corporation. But all this taxation, at any rate a great deal of it, is coming out of the owner-managed type of business, and unless that type of business is sustained and the government recognizes it as worth while in the economic set-up, then it will vanish and the owner-managed type of business will eventually be a museum piece.

It is all very well for these regulations to be exacted from large corporations, because they can continue adding clerks to their organization until of course the business can no longer stand the strain. Then, as so often happens, these corporations go through the wringer—corporations never die. All the money that is put into them by the public is squeezed out. But the individual has to face his own responsibility; he cannot dodge the issue. If we are to go on employing people in this country with some degree of stability, that type of thing should be safeguarded, and that I am afraid is what we are beginning to call bureaucracy. I think the people are getting a little afraid of Ottawa and the regulations coming therefrom. I believe the provinces are afraid of Ottawa. Perhaps that is one reason why the Sirois commission report was not accepted. When we down in the maritimes have something happen within our own provincial jurisdiction under the British North America Act, we believe we are reasonably close to the government and the government is reasonably close to the people; but with a national issue in Ottawa that situation does not prevail. I believe that the people are of the opinion that a bureaucracy has been built up, and if the minister fears that opinion is going abroad in the land then he as a member of the government should see that more, shall I say, common sense business principles, are applied to the Department of Finance so that what I might call this pseudo-efficiency may vanish.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not present in the chamber this morning when the minister evidently cautioned hon. members in regard to the danger of giving the impression that bureaucracy was increasing in this country. Possibly the minister was wise in cautioning hon. members in that regard, because it is very easy to give the impression that there is bureaucracy in government. But we can have a bureaucracy that is not in government. And it is the people in Canada who insist on being bureaucratic in their business who object to bureaucracy in government. If we are to have bureaucracy in Canada I would certainly rather have a bureaucracy over which the people have some control than one over which the people have no control at all. It is merely a choice of which kind of bureaucracy we are going to have. We can have a managed bureaucracy in Canada or a bureaucracy imposed on the people by a plutocracy. That is what you are going to have. So that there is not much choice. I am all for the bureaucracy that we can control so far as it may be controlled through parliament. There are other things that could be said in connection with that.

I am not going to take up time suggesting that this defence tax be reduced. We have already done that. But there are certain considerations involved. First, there is the consideration that those who are liable to payment of the tax because of the wages or salaries that they receive should not evade payment. I do not know whether the minister is satisfied that he is getting all the tax that should be collected in that way or not. On the other hand there is the consideration that those who are not liable for the tax, because they do not receive a wage that brings them within the act, should not be compelled to pay and then those deductions not be returned to them. I think the minister stated last year that the intention was that tax payments made should not bring the wage or salary below the minimum figure. Take a person receiving a salary of almost $1,200, say $1,190. That person, if he were making out an income tax report to the department himself, would not pay any tax at all. But this tax is deducted at the source. Unless he makes application—and I imagine that the application has to be supported in some way that is satisfactory to the minister or the department—he will have paid approximately $60, a month's wage, which he should not pay and on which he will be unable to get a refund.

There is considerable merit in the proposal of the leader of the opposition that every employee should carry a book in which would be entered by his employer the amount of wages received and the amount of tax deducted. Then at the end of the year all that employee would have to do would be to return his book to the Department of National Revenue and they could see what he had received in wages and whether there was any refund coming to him.

These, I insist, are important considerations, and some way should be found of working them out. We should be sure that those who are liable to the tax should pay their share, but those who are not liable because they do not receive a wage which is sufficient to bring them under the tax, should not have to pay it, and if it is deducted from their wages a refund should be made.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister should give us something more definite. The suggestion made by the leader of the opposition is a pretty good one. I employ quite a variety of labour, some on my farm, some in town in the garden; I have a large block on which at times I have painting and decorating done, and taking off the storm windows generally takes a day or so. I should like to know why the minister could not have a book or something of the sort that could be entered up. In making my annual return there is not room on the forms for me to put in the number of labourers and what I pay and so on, so that I always send in a separate statement with respect to the labour I employ, the hours they work, wages paid and so forth. I want to make an honest return. As I see it I shall have to deduct from every one of these labourers a certain percentage. What would the minister do if he were in my position? I employ a painter for a few days, or a decorator, and I supply the material; or there is the labourer in the garden. What would the minister do if he were in my position, assuming the act to be as it is now?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would make the deduction, I think, if the rate at which the employee was working was more than the minimum rate.

Mr. PERLEY: Most of this work is paid by the hour, and the rate will certainly go over $600 a year for a single man. One man I have now, a sort of jack of all trades, usually gets 60 cents an hour, sometimes 75, so that it would soon run over the $600 a year rate. Is it the understanding that I have to make a deduction every time he works for me for a few hours?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I would think so. I do not know about a few hours, but for every period of a day or more I think the deduction should be made. The man is probably earning more than $660 a year, therefore he is taxable, and if he does not earn that much he can get a refund. The hon. member is doing what most employers do; he sends to the department a list of his employees and what he pays them, so that the situation can be checked up at the end of the year.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have there been many applications for refund so far?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not very many.

Mr. MacNICOL: They do not know about doing it. It is "found money" for the government.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the amount collected under this tax in the past year?

Mr. ILSLEY: This tax came into force on July 1, and for the period ending March 31, 1941, the amount collected was $27,672,-017.87. That was for nine months. If that is multiplied by twelve-ninths it will give the approximate amount for the first full year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would amount to about $36,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you the refunds to date?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been no refunds up to date.

Mr. JACKMAN: In regard to these refunds, does the employee have to set out how many days he worked, how much he received and how much was deducted, or could he make a blanket claim just pointing out that he did not receive sufficient to bring him under the act, and ask the department to return the money deducted?

Mr. ILSLEY: He has to make his claim on the prescribed form. He has to show how much he has earned, where, from whom and how much has been deducted.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suppose it would not be possible for the department to do the bookkeeping for him if he put in a claim, knowing that he was under the minimum? It is obvious that most of these men cannot keep continuous records themselves. The government, on the other hand, will have the records of the employers, and I presume they must have a system under which they have an entry for each individual. It should be fairly simple in that case for the government to make the calculation for the man. Otherwise we cannot expect working men doing transient work to keep complete records; and I do not suppose the government wants to collect money from anyone who earns less than the minimum.

Mr. ILSLEY: That might be possible if he worked the whole year for one employer.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of course it would be very simple in that case, but if he had a number of jobs he would not know how many days he actually worked. Perhaps he just made enough to get along, and earned less than the minimum. Would not the government have the figures in regard to that individual? If it has, surely when that man files a claim the government could tell him what was his income and how much should be returned to him.

Mr. ILSLEY: He would have to tell the department who were his employers, otherwise the department would not be able to trace the deductions. If there were periods during which apparently he was out of work he would have to say so; otherwise he might have been working and the government would not know the name of his employer. He has to give the government some information about how long he worked, for whom, for how much, and how much was deducted; otherwise the department would have no way of knowing whether its conclusions were correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have there been many prosecutions as a result of employers making deductions and failing to remit the money?

Mr. GIBSON: There have been no prosecutions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I imagine there are in Canada employers who have made the deductions but have failed to report them, though I do not know of any myself. What machinery has the government to check up on whether or not all the money collected from employees is finding its way to the treasury? What machinery have you to find out whether the people who are collecting the money are making all the returns?

Mr. ILSLEY: The income tax inspectors in the various districts would have a pretty good idea whether any employers were holding back. If the inspectors were not getting returns from people whom they knew to be in business, presumably they would look into that. I have no reason for thinking that any employers at all have made the deductions and put the money into their own pockets. That would be theft, a criminal offence and a very serious offence under present conditions. I think if they deduct the money they remit it. There may be cases of delay; I do not know about that.

Mr. TUSTIN: In supplementary form T4, which has to be filed by an employer, will it be necessary for the employer to give the name of every person to whom he pays wages at the rate of over $600 a year and from whom he deducts the national defence tax? I know that must be done in connection with those more or less permanently employed, but what about temporary employees who work for only a day or two?

Mr. GIBSON: Those names have to be filed also, because if an application for refund is made we have to refer to the employers' returns in order to find out whether the tax has been deducted.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will there be a limit on the time within which these refunds will be made? Will that be six months after the end of the year, or what? I should think you would require a limit; otherwise you would not be able to balance your books very well.

Mr. GIBSON: The application for refund has to be filed within one year. That is the time limit.

Mr. WRIGHT: And what is the time limit within which the employer must make his return to the government?

Mr. GIBSON: He makes his return every month.

Mr. O'NEILL: It has been said repeatedly that many people who are paid at more than the minimum rate required before this taxation is imposed, do not work enough during the year to become liable to the tax, but the employers have collected that tax from month to month. Now the contention is made that these employees never have that money refunded. I should like to know if the minister has any figures that would show how many applications have been made for refunds or how much money has been refunded. That would give us some information with which to meet the contention that many employees pay a tax which they should not pay, and then never have the money refunded.

Mr. GIBSON: No refunds have been made as yet. The application forms are just ready to go out now, on which people may apply for refunds, but no claims have been received as yet.

Section agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: With the permission of the committee I should like to revert for a moment to section 29, which I came in just a little too late to discuss.

On section 29—Machinery or equipment.

Mr. ABBOTT: It seems to me there is serious objection to the possible retroactive effect of this section. Section 90 as originally enacted in 1939 provided that certain deductions might be made in connection with moneys expended prior to April 30 for work actually done in Canada during the said period on the construction, manufacture, installation, betterment, replacement or extension of buildings, machinery or equipment. In one instance a taxpayer expended a considerable sum of money, running into many thousands of dollars, for machinery and equipment to be permanently installed in connection with his industry. For one reason or another the installation was not actually completed prior to May 1, 1940, though the work was done, the machinery was manufactured in other Canadian plants, and it had been paid for. If this amendment is put through it will mean that this taxpayer will not be able to avail himself of what I believe to be a sound claim for tax deduction under section 90 as it now stands. In other words, the section has a retroactive effect; it says that machinery or equipment manufactured and paid for in Canada during the period must have been installed. I suggest to the minister that the difficulty can be obviated by striking out the words "and is" and the words "within the said period," so that the sentence would read, "machinery or equipment affixed for a permanency." Where a taxpayer relying upon the law has made expenditures of this kind, it is not equitable that an amendment should be brought in later to deprive him of the benefit of the tax deduction which he believed he was entitled to make.

Mr. ILSLEY: The situation outlined by the hon. member is new to me and this section was not intended to cure anything like that. If I understand correctly the construction put upon the section by the hon. member, it covers the case where a taxpayer has ordered machinery and—

Mr. ABBOTT: And paid for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Within the period.

Mr. ILSLEY: He has ordered it within the period and the machinery has been manufactured within the period by someone else. The hon. gentleman argues that that comes within the terms of the section. The idea I always had was that the work had to be done on the premises of the taxpayer, or that costs had to be incurred and paid by the taxpayer during that period in respect of work actually done in Canada, during the said period, on the construction, manufacture, installation, betterment, replacement, or extension of buildings, machinery or equipment in the said period from the first day of May, 1939, to the thirtieth day of April, 1940, provided that such buildings, machinery or equipment are to be used in the earnings of the income of the taxpayer. I think the hon. gentleman's point is well taken. Perhaps we had better let the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 30—To whom applicable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some time ago the government adopted order in council P.C. 7440, having to do with cost of living bonuses. If a conciliation board should decide that a cost of living bonus is necessary to maintain a reasonable standard of living for workingmen, will the government impose the national defence tax upon such bonus?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is taxable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a vicious spiral.

Sections 31 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On section 36—Interpretation.

Mr. ILSLEY: This refers to section 29 which has been allowed to stand, at the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott). If we drop that section, we shall have to drop this one.

Section stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONCURRENCE IN THE THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain) presented the third report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AUTHORITY TO UNDERTAKE PROJECTS INVOLVING ANNUAL EXPENDITURE OF LESS THAN $5,000

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act by empowering the minister, subject to the advice and representations of the advisory committees, to undertake certain minor rehabilitation projects and schemes and enter into agreements with respect thereto, provided that if the total amount to be expended under any such single project or scheme exceeds five thousand dollars in any fiscal year the approval of the governor in council shall be required; also to authorize the minister to pay administrative expenses and travelling and living expenses of officials and employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister make his statement at this stage, or would he prefer to make it after we go into committee?

Mr. GARDINER: I prefer to do it in the committee stage.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, under the bill as now drafted provision is made under section 12, for example, for the purchase of machinery by the minister up to an amount of $5,000, and there is provision for selling machinery not to exceed $500. Section 10 as it is now in the bill is the section under which provision is made for entering into agreements with provinces, municipalities and persons for doing certain things, such as taking over of lands which are to be placed in community pastures, or to be irrigated, or to be taken out of cultivation and perhaps seeded down to grass. But other works are undertaken such as the building of small dams, which probably cost $175, and small dug-outs on farms, which probably cost from $50 to $100. These have always been passed by the minister since the act was first set up. Other acts do make provision that expenditures up to $5,000 can be made by the minister and that anything over $5,000 requires an order in council. That is true, for example, with respect to public works.

It has been assumed ever since this act was passed in 1935 that expenditures up to $5,000 could properly be made under the general practice in the departments, but the auditor general questions the possibility of continuing the practice without special provision being made therefor in the legislation. It is therefore proposed that the act be amended by repealing section 10 and making it possible for the minister to pass upon these smaller projects. As it now stands, minor schemes and undertakings of the kind could not, according to the opinion given by the auditor general, properly be dealt with without the approval of council, and it is thought to be inadvisable that the smaller projects should be taken to council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there a legal opinion as to the legality of the former practice, or is it that the auditor general of his own motion has questioned the procedure?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think a legal opinion has been asked for or given, unless it was obtained through the auditor general's branch, but last summer they were disputing the right of payment under the legislation as it now stands. Up until that time, speaking from memory, I do not think they had disputed it at all.

Mr. POULIOT: There is one thing I do not understand about this legislation. In the first place the idea of it was to help farmers who were suffering from the drought and did not expect a harvest or who had suffered from poor crops in previous years. The purpose of the legislation was, of course, to increase production, to permit those who had had a succession of bad crops to harvest more wheat. But since then there has been a great change. There has been the policy of the curtailment of the production of wheat, and some farmers are to be paid now not to grow wheat. But here in this legislation we are starting out again to give to those who have been unable to get very much wheat from their lands the opportunity to produce more wheat. It seems contradictory from beginning to end. I am strongly opposed to it. I think it is absurd. In the first place you say: cultivate more; in the second place, cultivate less; in the third place, cultivate more and cultivate less! I do not understand it at all.

If we had such legislation in the province of Quebec all the prairie members would be on their feet protesting against it. But we cannot get anything from the Department of Agriculture for the province of Quebec. I remember the time when the older provinces could get anything because they were able to say they were not bankrupt. But in the west the farmer said to the municipality that he was bankrupt. Then the municipality said to the province that the municipality was bankrupt. Then the province said to Ottawa that the province was bankrupt. And then everything was given to them and we had to empty our pockets for them. A queer idea, surely, of preaching unity in this country. I cannot understand it. And now they are coming here again with this legislation. I am opposed to it. I find it nonsensical.

I remember the time, Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Dunning and Mr. Rogers were on the stand and I asked them if the western provinces had paid their interest. I remember I was told that Manitoba was doing fairly well, and Alberta was doing fairly well, but Saskatchewan had not paid its interest or very little. Mr. Dunning admitted that, and Mr. Rogers admitted it. The other provinces now have less revenue. Hon. members will remember my stand on the succession duties act, and here we are being asked to pay more to encourage this sort of thing. If it is sensible to pay farmers not to produce grain, how can we, on the other hand, spend money to give them the opportunity to produce more grain? I would like to have an answer to satisfy my mind.

Mr. PERLEY: Perhaps the minister is not going to answer at the moment. I would judge from the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata that the minister is not depending on him to get this amendment through.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not the only one who thinks like that.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister referred to the fact that this legislation came into force in 1935. At that time an advisory committee was set up and for a year or two it played an important part in the work which was done in that regard. This rehabilitation legislation, under the minister, has on the whole served a useful purpose in the west in the matter of conservation of water, the seeding of certain areas to grass, and the establishment of community pastures. But I have a grievance in relation to the way in which the act has been administered—I was going to say particularly as regards the machinery set up to administer the act in the last two years. I should like the minister to state to what extent this advisory committee has made representations to the minister, say, in the last year, and to what extent its recommendations have been accepted and acted upon.

The minister indicated that under this amendment he proposes to proceed with certain small projects, and among others he mentioned dams. I would ask him to give the committee some indication as to the number of projects he has in mind. Does he propose to go ahead with the scheme outlined last year in respect of dams, and in connection with which some preparatory work was done by way of the surveying of ravines leading into the Qu'Appelle river? Several sites were surveyed and set out at which dams would be constructed, and it was the intention, I believe, to proceed in the very near future. Does the minister propose to go ahead with that work?—because I might say here and now that I am not very much in favour of the scheme. We should have a definite statement from the minister.

I have a grievance in respect of the work carried on last year, more particularly in connection with dug-outs, and I shall state the grievance now. The dug-out scheme was inaugurated to give relief to farmers so that they could help themselves. The farmers made application to the proper authorities and received approval of their schemes, and they were supposed to do the work themselves, receiving about $150 for their labour. It was purely a relief measure. The idea was to give the farmer $150 to do the work, helping him by placing in his possession that amount of money, and also providing a water supply for his operations. There has been started what I consider to be a real racket with respect to the installation of these dug-outs. Certain contractors who had the machinery to do the work—the drag lines and ditch machinery—proceeded to make agreements with different farmers to do the work for them, and to collect the $150 in each instance from the department. This procedure was approved by the department. The contractors were in a position to put in hundreds of these dug-outs—a great many more than would otherwise have been possible.

I was invited to attend a certain meeting at which one of these contractors was to appear. I did not attend, may I say, but I learned after the meeting that the contractor had signed up many of the farmers for the installation of dug-outs on their farms. The contractor had the farmer sign an agreement in which it was stated that the contractor would do the work and receive power of attorney from the farmer to collect the money. My grievance is that while the face of the agreement bears the signature of a witness to the farmer's signature, no witness was present. I have in my hand one of the agreements purporting to have been signed by a witness. That witness was not at the meeting, and did not see the farmer sign. In fact the farmer who signed did not really know that this was the form he had signed. I have also a copy of a power of attorney taken from the farmer by the contractor. This too is signed by the witness, who was not present at the time the power of attorney was given.

I went to the contractor and asked him for the copy of the agreement I have in my hand. He gave it to me. I asked him for the power of attorney, and he gave me that also. When he opened his briefcase I saw that he had at least fifty of these documents already signed by the witness—and I have his name here. Those documents were all ready to be used wherever he went to secure a farmer's signature. The signatures, therefore were not witnessed at all.

There is one further point with respect to dug-outs. A number of farmers contracted for two, and some for three. A contractor who was building a dug-out on a man's farm suggested to the farmer, "Why not put in another one, while I have the machinery here?" The farmer replied, "Well, that would be all right with me, if I could do it." "Well," said the contractor, "the inspector will be here to-day. We will have him approve your application, and in that way I can do the job while I am here, and it will not be necessary to come back to do the work later." The inspector came and the application was made up. When it became necessary to have a witness to the second agreement he had made, and to the power of attorney the contractor was taking for the construction of the second dug-out, the question was asked, "How about a witness?" The inspector replied, "Well, your wife may witness this." When the farmer's wife took the pen to affix her signature the inspector said, "Just a minute, Mrs. So-and-So, you had better sign your maiden name; it would look better in the department, and it would be easier to have it approved."

I know of other cases of the kind—and all this happens in connection with the spending of public money. The farmer about whom I have been speaking did not want a second dug-out; he did not want even the first one. But he had attended a meeting where all the farmers were signing agreements for dug-outs, and he said, "Well, I will get in the swim."

I do not believe that was the intention, even of the minister. I appeal to him to see that that sort of thing is stopped. I am not accusing the minister, nor am I suggesting that he knows what was going on. But I have evidence before me showing that agreements were witnessed before they were signed. I do not believe the minister is the kind of man who would like to have that going on. I have brought the facts to his attention.

As I have said on other occasions, much useful work has been done under this act. At the present time however I believe there is a limit to which the development can be carried. The act has served its purpose. I do not believe there is much necessity for further developments. I suggest the minister ought not to proceed this summer with a general programme involving the building of large numbers of dams, as I understand is the intention in respect of the tributaries of and the ravines leading into the Qu'Appelle river.

I would ask the minister to make a statement respecting these matters. I appeal to him to have these practices stopped to which I especially referred.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I should deal first with the observations of the hon. member for Temiscouata. He suggests that these dams were built for the purpose of assisting in grain-growing operations. That of course was not the intention. The intention in 1935 when the procedure was first adopted, under a previous government, was the very opposite. I believe it was the intention to provide water for live stock in some sections which are comparatively dry. The water is put into small dams and dug-outs for the purpose of encouraging the raising of live stock on farms which previously had been largely given over to grain growing.

At that time there was some question, and there is still some question, as to whether grain farms on their past basis should be continued. At the same time it was provided that some of these lands should be re-grassed, or that some system should be followed which would embrace the possibility of stopping soil drift by sowing rye grass, or something of the kind, thereby taking it out of cultivation. That part of the work is still going on. It is apparent therefore that the objective behind the construction of dug-outs and building of small dams was not that of growing more grain. So far as I am aware, a number of dams have been built for the purpose of encouraging irrigation. That irrigation is on a small scale, when compared with the irrigation projects in the larger areas of Alberta. Again however the intention was to make it possible for people to get away from grain growing and to operate their farms in conjunction with pasture lands suitable for live stock rather than depending upon grain growing for their livelihood. I make these observations only to indicate that the intention was not that of producing more wheat, any more than is the present policy one of producing more wheat.

I agree with the last remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. If what he has described as having taken place in one or two instances has, in fact, taken place, then of course I should like to be provided with definite information. I should like to have the names of the persons concerned, including the name of the inspector who took the action indicated: because it is not the intention of any officials in the department or of myself that business should be conducted in that way.

When the hon. member states that the installation of dug-outs "last year" became a racket, I believe he was referring to 1939 rather than 1940. A practice had been growing up of making applications for dug-outs in much greater numbers than could properly be installed in any one year. That was true right from 1935 on. In 1935, possibly four or five times as many applications were made as there were dug-outs constructed or even started; those applications were carried on into the succeeding year, and even in 1936 the number of dug-outs constructed was comparatively small. At that time the amount which was allowed in payment for moving earth was three cents a cubic yard. As most members know, earth cannot be moved at three cents a cubic yard with any kind of equipment. It was, however, intended that this would pay possibly a third of the cost of the dug-out. The farmer would take his own team and do the excavating, and this cash would provide him, while he was constructing the dug-out, with something to pay for a pump and any other necessities which he might have to buy for cash. It was not intended at the beginning that this payment should be so much a relief matter, because three cents a cubic yard could not have given him any considerable amount of relief.

In 1936, or 1937—I am speaking from memory—the three cents a cubic yard was increased to four and a half cents, the idea being that the farmers at that time had to buy their feed and were not able to construct dug-outs unless they purchased grain, and they thought they needed more money with which to make a start. For two years the scheme was operated on a basis of four and a half cents a cubic yard. During that time comparatively few dug-outs were constructed.

In southern Manitoba there had developed a practice under which the municipalities secured drag-lines and excavated these dug-outs for the farmers in the community. Provision was made by the municipality for taking care of the amount which had to be paid over and above what was paid to each farmer. The money was paid to the municipality, and it was finally agreed that we would accept the assignments made by the farmers to the municipal council for the amount that was payable to them. That developed into the plan which has been referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

On every occasion when any change was made in policy it was submitted to this advisory committee that has been mentioned, and they argued for these particular changes in amounts and in the different methods of undertaking the construction. The strongest argument that prevailed was to the effect that during the drought period, when farmers were unable to provide even hay or grain, it was impossible to have horses in condition to go to the bottom of a thirteen-foot hole and bring earth up. They did make provision at first to dig the first four and a half feet by means of horses and to complete the last six or seven feet in the bottom with draglines, the horses taking off the top four and a half feet in the first twenty-four hours and the draglines coming and cleaning up the job. They were digging about one a day.

Variations of the methods were submitted to the committee. In 1938, I believe it was, the amount was raised to six cents a cubic yard, again on the advice of the committee, the idea being that they were not able at that time to get farmers, on account of lack of crops and so forth, to construct dug-outs, and they wanted the dug-outs there when they got moisture. We consented to six cents. I must admit that during the time the scheme was operated on the basis of six cents there did develop some conditions that could not be adhered to for any great length of time. I attended the meeting of the committee in the spring of 1939 and objected to the six-cent rate for dugouts constructed by dragline, and I had to argue against most of the committee. I finally stated that I would reduce the rate to four and a half cents that fall whether they liked it or not, and it was finally reduced.

During 1939 there were a great many dug-outs constructed on the basis of the six-cent rate, and, as hon. members know, the amount of money which was voted by this house for the purpose was exceeded. That is, there was an accumulation of applications over the whole previous three or four years during which the plan had been in operation. No method had been set up that would prevent farmers from going ahead and digging those which had been authorized in previous years; and on the accumulation, and with the operation of the drag-lines just prior to the outbreak of the war, when contractors had very little to do and used their draglines for this purpose, many more dug-outs were constructed than anyone had anticipiated in any one year, with the result that these payments had to be made last year.

I can understand why some of my friends have said—they have said it on previous occasions—that there were certain reasons for that; but I would recall once more that in the spring of 1939, in the month of May I believe—the records are all there—this whole matter was discussed in the advisory committee. I think every member of the committee will agree that it was the minister who argued for a reduction to four and a half cents and insisted upon it. As a matter of fact, in the fall of 1939 I personally stopped the further construction of dug-outs because they had exceeded the expenditure, and hon. members, partcularly those from the west, will remember that there was a great deal of criticism all through the fall of 1939, through the winter of 1939-40 and well into the summer of 1940 as a result of the action which was then taken. With the payments finally cleared up, the regulations under which we are operating now, the instructions under which the organization is carrying on, will not permit of their going beyond the amount of money actually voted. Therefore this year we are operating on the four and a half-cent rate per cubic yard, and operating under conditions where the amount of money voted will not be exceeded.

In referring to the matter of the Qu'Appelle valley, I can only say that engineering groups have been investigating the possibilities of irrigation development both north and south of Qu'Appelle valley and the streams running into Qu'Appelle, and in the Qu'Appelle valley itself. The information is not sufficiently complete at present to enable one to say whether the plan will be proceeded with or otherwise. My view at the moment would be probably the amount of irrigation which can be carried on in these areas will be quite limited, largely on account of the amount of water which will be available for irrigation purposes. There are other works which were put in many years ago, back about 1904, or somewhere about that time, on the Qu'Appelle west, in the vicinity of Long lake. Some of these are giving some difficulty now, as I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree. They are causing difficulty in connection with the level of the water in Long lake. There is some discussion going on with the committee concerned with summer resorts above Long lake regarding that, but until we have a complete report from the engineers with regard to the whole matter, I would not be prepared to say what will be done in connection with this development.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I always listen with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Témiscouata. This afternoon, however, I could not accept the views he expressed. I have not visited the hon. member's constituency, but from what I have seen of the beautiful province of Quebec, the probability of shortage of water would not be very real in many areas of that province.

In Saskatchewan and the prairies, however, large areas have been settled with a view to engaging in extensive wheat farming. Those areas were settled when it was taken for granted that there would be a sufficient supply of moisture to ensure a profitable industry. Through no fault of the farmers many of those areas have not received sufficient moisture.

The work carried on under this legislation has meant a great deal to many people, and therefore I hope the hon. member for Témiscouata will not object too seriously to the carrying on of this important work.

What I rose to say was to express thanks to the minister for extending the work into north-eastern Saskatchewan. Many hon. members have suggested that mixed farming might be developed much more extensively in western Canada. But where people have to haul water three or four miles, the raising of live stock presents a real problem. Through the work carried on under this administration, a great many farmers have been able to construct dug-outs and have adequate water for the entire year, and the money appropriated has been money very well spent.

In my constituency there has been some discussion in connection with the providing of a dam on the Assiniboine river north of Preeceville. I understand that this dam, if completed, would benefit the town of Kamsack to a considerable extent. Would the minister give some indication whether the policy is to provide dams of that sort? I understand that the money required would be sufficient to construct a great many dug-outs for individual farmers. If there were plenty of money available to carry on both types of work, there might be some argument for putting in the larger dams, but in the meantime I think all the money available should be used to provide dams for individual farmers so that they might be self-supporting to a greater extent than they have been. Would the minister make some statement in this connection?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be in a much better position to discuss the financial features of the programme when my estimates are before the committee, whether to-night or at some later time. I have not the books before me at the moment. I believe the estimates will be before the committee to-night, and I could discuss these items better at that time if hon. members will permit.

Mr. POULIOT: I take the opportunity to say through the Chair to my friend the hon. member for Mackenzie, who is very popular in this house and whose speeches are always appreciated by every hon. member, that he does not understand my point of view at all. I hope that situation will be changed in a few minutes.

In the first place, my constituency is one in which are to be found mixed farming, settlers and so forth. They are people who are accustomed to live by themselves, and they ask nothing unless they see people in the same circumstances in other parts of the country receiving something. Then they say, "How is it that those people get so much and we in this part of the country do not?" It is just as if they had smallpox or diphtheria or some other contagious disease and were put in quarantine. Nobody complained so long as they were accorded the same opportunities as our friends in the west received, but when some farmers in the west are given privileges and the east is discriminated against, then the complaints start. My hon. friend will understand why that is so.

I do not discuss the usefulness of this programme. I am not in a position to do so because I am not an agricultural expert. If I were I would be in a better position than the hon. member or any agricultural representative of the west who is an expert, because I would not be biased and would not have to rely on the votes of the people concerned to form my opinion. Now, however, I am not biased when I speak of my people because they get nothing. I make the statement that they get nothing. I make the further statement that the Department of Agriculture as now constituted is not a dominion department; it is a prairie department, and the eastern provinces cannot get anything out of it. That is the reason why I suggest the abolition of the dominion Department of Agriculture, and that the cost of it be distributed in proportion to the rural population of each province, so that everyone will be on the same footing. What good does it do the eastern farmer to be always reading in the papers that the western farmer gets a little more, a little more to-day and a little more to-morrow; that the day after to-morrow there will be something for him, and that next week he will have something more, a nice little toy to play with, while the other gets nothing in his stocking? The western farmer has always something new, a life-saver, good for the throat, a little dessert, and the other gets nothing. I find it unfair.

Mr. PERLEY: How about the cheese bonus?

Mr. POULIOT: And the more the western farmer gets the more he complains.

An hon. MEMBER: What about apples?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the growing of fibre flax?

Mr. POULIOT: If everything that is given to the east is summed up and compared with everything that has been given to the west, no one will see through what was given to the west. I mean by that that the west has received so much that it is impossible to see through what has been given.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. POULIOT: That will not give five cents to the eastern farmer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will it give anything to British Columbia?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. At the end of each session it has been customary to allow great leeway to hon. members, but a line must be drawn somewhere. The resolution before the committee purports to enable the minister to deal with small projects not exceeding $5,000 without the formality of an order in council, and provides for the necessity of an order in council for such projects as exceed $5,000. We shall not make much headway or observe the rules by comparing the amounts appropriated for the western provinces with those for the eastern provinces. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the resolution that is before them.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. I will now describe it as I visualize it. There is a little stream, and a little dam will be built. It cannot be a big dam, but it will be left to the discretion of the minister. And there is some sand. But the little dam will be built, and then there will be a little pond. The little pond will help to fertilize a little ground on both sides of the little stream. Then part of that water will be used for mixed farming; but since hogs are fed grain, the remainder of the water will be used for the production of grain. Therefore it is only because some pasture is required for the hogs, and the hogs will produce bacon for the allies, that this can be called a war project.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: Hon. members laugh, but this is the only possible explanation for calling the scheme a war project. I am sorry, but that is the only way I can see it as having anything to do with patriotism or serving the cause of the allies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to read the pertinent part of this resolution before commenting upon it:

> . . . that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act by empowering the minister, subject to the advice and representations of the advisory committees, to undertake certain minor rehabilitation projects and schemes and enter into agreements with respect thereto, provided that if the total amount to be expended under any such single project or scheme exceeds five thousand dollars in any fiscal year the approval of the governor in council shall be required; also to authorize the minister to pay administrative expenses and travelling and living expenses of officials and employees.

I am not arguing against the principle of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or against the necessity for the expenditures that have been made under that act, or against the benefits that have accrued to the people of western Canada, giving them an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves. But, Mr. Chairman, if I may use the expression, I am inclined to be slightly suspicious as to the reasons that actuate the minister in introducing this amendment which on its face appears to be so innocuous. In the estimates for the current year, 1941-42, an amount of $2,500,000 is provided to be expended in connection with projects under that act. The system in vogue under the statute is for the minister to appoint an advisory committee, which advises the minister. As the minister admitted—although he said some of us were rather suspicious of the coincidence that it was the year before an election—in 1939 there were overexpenditures. That situation was dealt with in the auditor general's report, to which the minister made reference, and I should like to quote that report in reference to this matter. At page 61 I find the following:

> Commitments of approximately $1,315,575.20 were incurred in excess of the amount appropriated without certificates of the comptroller of the treasury being secured in the manner provided for by sections 26 and 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931. These overcommitments, by group classifications, are made up of: land utilization, $22,036.47; water development, small projects, $909,553, large projects, $384,185.73.

I pause here to point out that under the statute authority was provided for the minister to make certain expenditures; yet in 1939 he exceeded the amount he was permitted to expend by over $1,300,000. Then the auditor general's report goes on to say:

> By an amendment to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act . . . the minister may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements with provinces, cities, towns, persons, etc., for projects or schemes for the conservation of water. Payments during the year were made in several cases on ministerial authority only, examples being payments to W. B. Ramsay, Regina, for construction in connection with the Magrath irrigation canal, $1,858.12 and to W. V. McKinnon, Saskatoon, re the Castle river test hole, $2,755.58. Similarly, payments for stock-watering dams and community projects where the total cost did not exceed $5,000 were paid without the approval of the governor in council.

In consequence of the auditor general having drawn to the attention of this house and the country the overexpenditure made by the minister on his own authority, there was a considerable amount of criticism. The minister now asks the house to amend the act as it now stands, and the amendment means this. Take a year when the minister might consider it necessary or advisable to overexpend the amount voted by this parliament and, in addition, to pay those who do the work, without the authority of this parliament. Apparently that is the reason for the introduction of this amendment. What does that mean? It means that parliament is asked to give the Minister of Agriculture the power, apart from any control by parliament, to expend any amount he chooses for such schemes as in his discretion he deems necessary, provided that the expenditure on any one project is less than $5,000 in any fiscal year.

Mr. McNIVEN: And subject to the advice and representations of the advisory committees.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, subject to the advice of the advisory committee which—I make no criticism in this connection—no doubt is appointed upon the recommendation of the minister himself. In this connection I noticed that when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked the minister whether he was bound by the representations of these committees, or whether he followed those representations in all instances, the minister made no reply. Therefore the situation as it now stands, is that if parliament gives the minister the power he seeks in this amendment, he can expend any sum of money he may choose; he can spend that money where he chooses and when he chooses without any control on the part of this parliament over that expenditure, provided that in no single project is an amount of over $5,000 expended. If he wishes to develop larger projects and expend greater sums of money, he does not require the consent of this parliament, the consent of the representatives of the people, all he needs is the authority of an order in council.

I listened with interest to his explanation of the purposes of and the reasons behind this legislation, and I again make the protest which I have raised before with regard to other similar legislation, that parliament has a duty, and that duty is to control the expenditure of money. Expenditures should not be made without the authorization of parliament. In war time it is necessary that the executive should have wide powers, but that does not justify this amendment. There has been a trend within this parliament in the last year to abdicate our rights to the governor in council to an ever increasing degree. The excuse may be given that we are at war. This would apply to war measures, but it does not excuse the minister being given carte blanche to expend money as he sees fit on domestic matters not related to the war.

Those who now sit on the government benches were loud in their criticism of the former government of Mr. Bennett for passing orders in council, but there has been no greater offender in the history of Canada than the present government. Fourteen thousand orders in council have been passed since the outbreak of war, 4,908 since the present session of parliament began, 2,898 of which were passed while parliament was actually in session. Statutes have been amended and suspended in their operation, and in one instance access to the king's courts has been denied. This resolution is a continuation of the trend against which I protested at the time the minister introduced the summer-fallow vote.

In connection with non-war measures this parliament is being asked to place in the hands of the minister power to expend money without the control of parliament, subject only to the whim of the minister. I protest against this tendency. I approve the principle of the act, but I do not see why this committee should be asked to approve a course of conduct which has been condemned by the auditor general and which is contrary to the principles of representative government. We should not be asked to place in the hands of any one man, however estimable he may be, power to expend money without the necessity of authorization by parliament.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the programme for this year with regard to the construction of small dams and dug-outs?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the hon. member was in the chamber a few moments ago when I replied to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I expect that my estimates will be up to-night, and a better opportunity will be accorded to discuss these matters. As a matter of fact, the Chairman has ruled that we are discussing the possibility of making payments up to $5,000, rather than questions of reconstruction and other matters like that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principle contended for by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is an important one, and so far I have heard no defence of its breach by the minister. My recollection is that because of the drought conditions that existed in 1934 and 1935, the technical officers of the government suggested this form of rehabilitation and amelioration in certain parts of Canada. Notwithstanding what the hon.

member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has said, I think there is a good deal of merit in this measure. I object, however, to this resolution having the appearance of a blank cheque, within certain limitations, in connection with new enterprises. There is no knowing to what extent the government may be committed under the principle of this resolution as it now stands. We should know exactly what is contemplated and what burden is to be placed upon the country.

By no stretch of the imagination can it be said that this is a war measure. It is simply a continuation of a rehabilitation measure which was approved by parliament in days gone by. Experience has shown that this whole thing has run away with itself in so far as overexpenditures are concerned. There has been no real check on that aspect of the matter, which has called forth remonstrances from the auditor general. In 1931 we passed the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, the intention of which was clear. The intention was not only to discourage but absolutely to prohibit overexpenditure by departments in any field of enterprise that they might undertake. So far as I can see, the minister has taken to himself powers which at least the audit department does not consider he ought to possess. I am aware that there has been a different interpretation in connection with the matter, and this should be clarified by an opinion from the Department of Justice.

Mr. GARDINER: I was not certain that there had been an option, but it has been sent to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister read that before he finishes? I had an idea that an opinion had been given, but I was not quite certain as to the legal position and power of the minister, according to existing legislation. According to the wording of the legislation, there is no limitation upon the gross amount that may be expended by the minister; that is left to him to decide, provided that the expenditure does not go beyond $5,000 on any one project. Of course that is a negation of parliamentary government. If the minister had been here in 1931 and 1932, I have no doubt he would have joined in the chorus of condemnation against the theory of giving blank cheques to the government. I am looking at the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) at the moment, and he is shaking with laughter because he appreciates the allusion I am making. If the theory was bad then it is bad now, and it may be worse now because the country is at war and we should be more careful about these peace-time expenditures. As a matter of fact, I do not think the minister has made out a case for continuing these expenditures at the present time. I say that with great deference because I have not personal information. Of one thing, however, I am certain, namely, that the way this resolution is worded it is absolutely bad in principle, and the minister should not ask us to pass the resolution in its present terms.

Mr. GARDINER: What is really being asked for appears in the bill itself which will be brought down later, and which conforms with the principle in many other acts and has been the principle adopted in connection with public works, I think, since confederation. I shall, however, deal with that in a moment.

For the time being I wish to refer to the fact already mentioned by others, that the first act dealing with this matter was passed in the spring of 1935. The date of the act is April 17, 1935. It is a very short act covering two sides of one sheet, and provides, first, for an advisory committee. It states, not the persons who are to constitute that committee, but the organizations whose officials shall constitute the committee. Then it goes on to provide that the committee shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted, in much the same terms as are used in the act with regard to the advisory committees that are there now. Then it provides:

> No member of the committee shall receive any payment or emolument for his services.

Another section provides:

> The minister may appoint such temporary technical, professional and other officers and employees as he may deem necessary and expedient for carrying out the provisions of this act and the salaries and expenses of such officers shall be fixed by the governor in council.

That is exactly the same section as is contained in the present act.

Another section provides:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

That is, everything that was provided for in that act is contained in those few sections. The advisory committee is there which advises the government; and, as was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the principle has been in the act from the beginning, that the minister or those administering the act may take the advice of the committee. That is the meaning of "advisory". They may proceed otherwise or just as they choose after having had the benefit of the advice of the committee. To an extent, that is true and has been true all the way through. Before we came into office—I am speaking from memory—there was only one meeting of that committee, and that was held very early in the setting up of the organization. There has been quite a number of meetings of the committee since.

The act of 1935 limited the amount of money that was to be expended. It provided:

For the purposes of this act the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada during the fiscal year 1935-36 and for each fiscal year for a further period of four years a sum not exceeding one million dollars per annum as may be necessary to continue and extend the work undertaken under this act.

Then section 9 provides:

The minister shall annually lay before parliament a report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

That is the whole act, and I would point out that unlimited authority is given there under order in council and within the amount of money which was voted by parliament, which in the first year was $750,000 and in each succeeding year, $1,000,000. In the first year the present government was in office the act was amended to remove the limitation on the amount and to make it the amount which was voted by parliament. From that year down to the present, only in one year has that amount been exceeded, namely, in 1939, and for the reasons I gave to the committee earlier in the discussion. I am sorry that the hon. member for Lake Centre was not in the chamber when I first explained the matter. I referred to the fact that this provision with respect to amounts under $5,000 is in the Public Works Act and that the same principle is followed by every department of the government in expenditures on public works.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted from the auditor general's report. I will again quote the same passage showing what the auditor general had to say:

Commitments of approximately $1,315,575.20 were incurred in excess of the amount appropriated without certificates of the comptroller of the treasury being secured in the manner provided for by sections 26 and 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931. These overcommitments, by group classifications, are made up of: land utilization, $22,036.47; water development, small projects, $909,553, large projects, $384,185.73.

The first thing I wish to say with regard to that is to reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre that this was an election year. It was not of necessity an election year, and I do not know that anyone had any idea that it was going to be an election year. Furthermore, it did not turn out to be an election year. I do not think anyone had any idea, until within perhaps forty-eight hours of the time the election was declared, that there was going to be an election even in the year in which it was held. I suppose my statement to that effect will be used against me after I make my next statement. It is this, that if I paid half as much attention to politics as my hon. friends think I do and had been half as much the politician as some of them think I am I would not in September and October, 1939, have stopped expenditures upon small dug-outs, dams and structures of every kind in connection with these water undertakings, simply because, under the programme as it was then being carried on, these works were exceeding the expenditures. It is true that some works could not be cut off immediately. If they had all been cut off immediately, it is true that there would have been an overexpenditure when I discovered it in September and October when I was in western Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was the minister's duty to cut them off.

Mr. GARDINER: And he did cut them off, but there was an overexpenditure for the reasons I have stated, and some of the criticisms which have been made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle are justified by the facts as they then existed. If they had not been justified, the expenditures would probably not have been stopped in the manner in which they were. But they were stopped and stopped within three or four months of the time the election was called.

Again I repeat what every member from western Canada knows, that I, in common with every member who contested a constituency on behalf of the government of Canada, had to meet criticisms to the effect not only that these expenditures were cut off but that the farmers were told and contractors were told that they could not receive payment even for works which had been done until the whole matter had been placed before the House of Commons and the money voted in order to meet the payments.

Mr. PERLEY: Did the minister not allow contractors to continue to take new contracts knowing that they were not going to get the money for another year?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know of any contracts that were let on that basis, but I know that some contractors said that they were going to go on and complete their contracts, believing that the government of Canada, whatever government was in power and whether or not an election was held, would recognize the liability of the government to pay for those contracts. Tenders had been properly called for and contracts let; under these circumstances some contractors said that they were prepared to proceed and complete their contracts, and they did.

Mr. PERLEY: I told one contractor that he was taking chances and he said, "I am willing to take chances".

Mr. GARDINER: I think it has been the general practice of governments to permit contractors to take those chances. As a matter of fact, it has been the custom here, ever since I have been in the house, and I think it has been the custom since confederation, that moneys are voted for public works, contracts are let, and certain moneys are expended in one year while certain moneys are spent in another year. When money is not sufficient, then further money is voted in supplementary estimates in another year in order to take care of the work. The contractor goes on with the operations, and the money as finally voted is paid. That has been done, and I believe it has been the general practice. The dredging of the St. Lawrence river is in exactly the same classification. Many other works in connection with which that practice is followed could be mentioned to the committee.

In any event, however, there was an overexpenditure of money; I admit there was a much larger overexpenditure of money than should be allowed under any act of this kind. Immediately I found there was to be an overexpenditure, I put a stop to it, and cancelled the authorization. I cancelled any contracts which could be cancelled at that time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What control is there on the part of the minister to ascertain at any time how much has been expended?

Mr. GARDINER: The control that exists in connection with all works of this kind, whether provincial or federal, is the control of the amount of money voted for a particular purpose. The amount of money voted in this particular instance was $2,500,000. That will appear in the estimates, as they will be brought before the committee—probably to-night. That is the limitation as to the amount of money which may be expended.

The limitation in the department, under the present provision, is that we divide that money, and we say, "We intend to spend so much on dug-outs, so much on small dams, so much on large projects, so much on grass, and so much on other things." The comptroller has insisted that this be done, and we have done it. If we do want to make an expenditure in one line in excess of what we had intended in the beginning, we can make it only if we have not expended all our money in some other section, and we have the expenditure of that money authorized by transferring it to the first referred to activity. Therefore I suggest that in respect of this $2,500,000, there is complete control, which did not obtain in connection with these transactions in 1939.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What were the controls in 1939?

Mr. GARDINER: There was not sufficient control. That is, the operations had been going on from 1935, with applications coming in from year to year. I explained all this to the committee this afternoon, before the hon. member entered the chamber. The applications came in for so many hundreds of operations in 1935, and as I remember it, only about one-quarter of them were completed. The others were carried into 1936. So many applications were received in 1936, and only part of them completed; the remainder were carried into 1937, and so on, until 1938 and 1939. Then in 1938 and 1939, because we partly were paying six cents a cubic yard, and because contractors found they could make money at that rate, particularly if the farmers gave them $25 in addition, the contractors constructed large numbers of dug-outs. The result was that before we discovered that we were likely to have an overexpenditure, the amounts had run into the figures indicated in the auditor general's report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, the thing got out of hand.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the position. As soon as it did get out of hand, we stopped the procedure, and placed in effect regulations which are now in control and which, I am quite certain, will prevent a repetition from now on.

With regard to land utilization, and just by way of explanation of what the auditor general says, I would point out that the treasury office now reports an error in its calculations of the overcommitment in land utilization, upon which the auditor general presumably based his notes. The amount, instead of being $22,036.47, is $3,797.80.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: From what is the minister reading?

Mr. GARDINER: From some comments I have prepared.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister is not quoting from the auditor general's report?

Mr. GARDINER: No; I have already read the statement to which reference was made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I shall not read it again.

Council was asked to authorize land purchases to this amount in excess of the available fund, in order that the legal procedure in connection with effecting the transfers, requiring some months to complete, might be commenced. That is, there is nothing irregular or unusual in this. Certain lands were required in connection with certain projects. The council was asked to authorize expenditures of money to secure those lands. Instead, however, of the overcommitment being $22,036, it was $3,797.

I believe I have already explained the situation with regard to small projects. My note is just in clarification of what I have already said. The same comment applies to large projects. In the case of small and large projects all construction authorized and to be completed to the end of the fiscal year 1940-41 has been paid for in full out of the funds made available by parliament.

The next section which was read by the hon. member is as follows:

By an amendment to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, chapter 7, assented to April 5, 1939, the minister may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements with provinces, cities, towns, persons, etc., for projects or schemes for the conservation of water.

That is the section with which we are now dealing, and which is, I believe, to become section 10 in the act. The quotation continues:

Payments during the year were made in several cases on ministerial authority only, examples being payments to W. B. Ramsay, Regina, for construction in connection with the Magrath irrigation canal, $1,858.12 and to W. V. McKinnon, Saskatoon, re the Castle river test hole, $2,755.58. Similarly, payments for stock-watering dams and community projects, where the total cost did not exceed $5,000, were paid without the approval of the governor in council.

From the beginning of the operations of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, that is from April, 1935, the minister in charge—and there have been only two, namely Mr. Weir, who was the minister under an earlier government, and myself—has, under authority of section 36 of the Public Works Construction Act, entered into contracts not involving expenditures of more than $5,000. This authority was confirmed by the treasury office on February 6, 1937.

That is, someone raised the question about it at that time. It was referred to the treasury office, and there was the confirmation that under the Public Works Construction Act we had authority to make payments up to $5,000. That was always considered to be so, both by the previous minister and by the department and, since I have been in charge, by myself and by the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, if that is so, why is this measure necessary?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall come to that. This authority was confirmed by the treasury office on February 6, 1937. It was not considered that this authority was removed by the addition to the act of the present section 10, providing for a wide variety of agreements with provinces, municipalities and others. That is the point to which reference has been made. In other words, it was not intended either by council, by the minister who brought in the legislation or by the officials of the department who drafted it, that this authority was removed by the addition to the act of section 10 as introduced into the house providing for a wide variety of agreements with provinces, municipalities and others.

As for community projects, which are small projects built for the use of a number of individuals instead of one, and the average cost of which is less than $1,000, it was considered that order in council P.C. 71 of January 11, 1939, which gave the minister authority to "enter into leases or other agreements in connection with the use of land, buildings and equipment," covered the agreements with the municipalities relating to these projects, and the expenditures thereunder.

At the time this matter was brought up, the question of payment up to $1,000 was settled by order in council, under the power which is given in the act to make regulations. In other words, I do not believe it was necessary for me to bring this legislation to the house. I think it would have been possible to have taken an order to council under the powers given under the act to make regulations, and to have had a regulation drawn up empowering me to spend money up to $5,000, just as I was empowered under the order in council of January 11, 1939, to spend money.

But I took this position, and I take it here now, that in view of the fact that criticisms had been made, not upon the basis of what the auditor general intended to be taken from the remarks which he had made, but upon the basis of the auditor general's remarks as they stood—criticisms which had appeared in magazines and newspapers with regard to these expenditures—the matter should be taken care of by the house, and that if $5,000 is to be expended under the act, as under similar acts and in connection with similar works, and if the minister is going to be able to pass upon them, the matter should be provided for in the act itself. That is why the act is before the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why does the minister ask for a resolution authorizing him to pay administration, travelling and living expenses of officials and employees?

Mr. GARDINER: We shall come to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why ask for that?

Mr. GARDINER: It is all dealt with here. As a matter of fact, to discuss it shortly, there is no act that is properly drawn, having to do with any matter such as this, that does not give that authority. What this act, as now set up, does is to empower the minister to appoint persons, of course with the consent of council. It does not, however, provide for his paying their expenses, and naturally they will not operate unless expenses are paid. But expenses have been paid and passed by the auditor general, and passed by everyone concerned, right down to the present time, and we considered that the authority should be in the act.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister admit, with respect to the criticism made of himself and the department, that no other interpretation could be put upon the auditor general's language? Surely he would not criticize anyone for having made criticism after reading that language.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to criticize those who made criticism on the basis of the auditor general's report. In view of the criticism, however, I think it is wise to have the act clarified and have it brought here rather than allow the matter to be handled by way of regulation.

Let me complete the statement. As for community projects, which are small projects built for the use of a number of individuals instead of one, and the average cost of which is less than $1,000, it was considered, that order in council P.C. 71, of January 11, 1939, which gave the minister authority to "enter into leases or other agreements in connection with the use of land, buildings, and equipment," covered the agreements with the municipalities relating to these projects and the expenditures thereunder.

Then on January 21, the comptroller of the treasury wrote to the deputy minister of the Department of Justice in order to get a ruling on the matter. Referring to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, he says:

Section 7 reads:

"The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof." In pursuance of this authority, the governor in council, by order dated the 19th day of June, 1936, P.C. 1464, approved what are called regulations (copy enclosed). Section 8 of the act of 1935 was considered inadequate, and by section 4 of an amending act was repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"For the purposes of this act the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditures in each of the fiscal years 1937-38 to 1939-40 inclusive, of sums not exceeding the amount appropriated by parliament in each year for such purposes."

This section has been interpreted as requiring—

These are the words of the auditor general:

—the approval of the governor in council of all expenditures regardless of their nature, and in effect to nullify the minister's authority under P.C. 1464.

To overcome this difficulty order in council of the 11th day of January, 1939 (P.C. 71) was passed. The intention was to revest in the minister authority to conclude those matters specifically mentioned, and in addition to vest him with authority to pay necessary administration and travelling expenses.

Under a further amending act, 3 George VI, chapter 7, section 8, as amended, was again amended to read as follows:

"For the purposes of this act the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure of sums not exceeding the amount appropriated by parliament in each year for such purposes."

Section 2 of the last mentioned act added three new sections to the statute as follows.

The first mentioned is section 10. I do not think I need read that one. It is the section under consideration now, and if it may be taken as read I shall have it inserted in Hansard so as to have the record complete.

"10. The minister may, subject to section four of this act and with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or with any city, town or other municipality within any of the said provinces, or with any person, firm or corporation, with respect to the development, promotion, construction, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme undertaken under and by virtue of this act or which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the conservation of water.

"11. The minister may, for the purposes of this act, and with the approval of the governor in council, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises which may be required for or included in any project or scheme, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

"12. (1) The minister may, for the purposes of this act, purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project or scheme; provided that the purchase of any single unit of machinery or equipment of a value greater than $5,000 shall require the approval of the governor in council.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act or law, the minister may sell any single unit or such machinery or equipment upon such terms as he may deem advisable, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the Receiver General: provided that the sale of any such unit shall, if its initial cost exceeded $500, require the approval of the governor in council."

I might recall to the attention of hon. members who were here at that time that the same discussion took place then.

Mr. PERLEY: That was not as the bill at first read?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it was changed to some extent. To continue:

I would very much appreciate—

These are the words of the comptroller of the treasury to the Department of Justice.

—your opinion as to whether or not the authority granted to the minister under P.C. 1464 and P.C. 71 has been nullified by the subsequent enactment of parliament dealing with those matters.

Note the question asked by the comptroller. He asks whether the authority which he admits was given the minister in the original act has been nullified by amendments brought in from time to time dealing with the situation.

You will note that any action of the minister under sections 10 and 11 must have the approval of the governor in council, whereas under section 12 the minister may act independently within certain limitations, which limitations appear to give recognition to orders in council of 1880 and 1918 (Treasury Mannual, pages 146 and 103 respectively).

Notwithstanding the specific terminology of sections 10 and 11, is it to be inferred that, in administering those sections, regard shall be had to the treasury board minutes mentioned, and that expenditures up to $500 may be paid on the authority of the deputy minister and up to $5,000 on the authority of the minister? Do you consider that the final paragraph of P.C. 71, having reference to administration and travelling expenses, is still operative? If not, is it your opinion that such expenditures must all be approved by the governor in council under either sections six or seven of the act or both?

These opinions were asked for after the discussion which had taken place with regard to payments which had continuously been made throughout the year covering expenses and all these other matters. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has stated, it will be recalled that a discussion did take place, led, I believe, by the then member for Kootenay, and on his suggestion I said I did not think it made any difference if there were inserted the words "by order in council" or something to that effect. The words "by order in council" were inserted.

But the legal authorities told me that it made all the difference, and that the insertion of those words made it impossible to administer the act in the way it had been and was being administered right down to the present. All of this indicates that those of us who are not legal draftsmen probably, at times, take too much responsibility upon ourselves.

The opinion given by the deputy minister of justice, Mr. W. Stuart Edwards, is as follows:

Dear Sir:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 6.

With reference to the questions raised on page 3 thereof, it would appear that the regulations contained in order in council P.C. 1464, dated June 19, 1936, and P.C. 71, dated January 11, 1939, are no longer effective; that the executive directions contained in the orders in council of 1880 and 1918 do not apply to the administration of sections ten and eleven of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; and that the final paragraph of order in council P.C. 71, dated January 11, 1939, authorizing the minister to pay necessary administrative and travelling expenses is inconsistent with section six of the act and is ineffective. It would appear that section six must be interpreted to authorize the governor in council to fix the salaries and the scale of expenses of the officers mentioned therein.

The provision proposed in the bill is for the purpose of placing in this act the same power which is in all similar acts and which was previously given through the public works act in dealing with matters of this kind. But we are told that, by reason of the amendment which I myself as minister agreed to at the time, that was made ineffective and that the act could not be administered as was intended. It would be practically impossible to carry out the intentions of this act under a provision that required every dug-out that was going to be constructed costing, say, $50 to be passed by council before it was even authorized. What happened is this. A farmer applies for authority to construct a dug-out. We are going to pay half the cost, four and a half cents on each nine cents. In order even to get that started, we would have to get an order in council for every one of them. As the plan will operate, we authorize the expenditure of money to the extent of four and a half cents a year on an estimated yardage, and check on the total amounts available for the construction of dug-outs, and when we come to the end of it we cannot spend any more money on that kind of project. But until that time the minister passes the different applications in the order in which they come to the office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What kind of engineering report does the minister require?

Mr. GARDINER: A farmer first makes application. The engineer goes out and takes soundings; he bores holes to find whether the subsoil is gravel or clay. If it is gravel, or even if there are streaks of gravel, there is no use in constructing the dug-out, because the water would get away. If the subsoil is clay, the dug-out may be made. A survey is made, largely by eye, of the conditions, whether there will be any water drainage into a hole if one is made, and a decision is given on that basis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have listened with great interest to the statement of the minister, but he has not answered my main objection to this resolution. My objections were, first, that it would place uncontrolled power in the hands of the minister to expend money over and above the amount voted by parliament.

Mr. GARDINER: No, not as it is operated now; it is controlled by the auditor general.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where in this resolution is there any control of the minister to prevent him from doing what he did in 1939, namely, overexpending the vote of this parliament by some fifty to sixty per cent? It is difficult for me to understand how, if there is any control of expenditure, the accounts coming in month by month as they necessarily must, a vote of parliament could be thus overexpended and not be found out until it became necessary to curtail that expenditure as a result of the outbreak of war. I ask the minister again to point out where there is anything in this resolution to prevent him from spending not $2,500,000 this year, which sum he is asking parliament to vote, under the estimates, but $3,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: There would not be anything in this resolution to provide for that. This resolution is to authorize the passing of amounts up to $5,000. It is the same authority which the Minister of Public Works and every other minister who is doing work of this kind have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What limitation is in the bill based on this resolution?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no limitation. The section will read:

> Subject to section four of this act undertake the development, construction, promotion, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme or enter into agreements with any province, municipality or person with respect thereto, provided that if the total amount to be expended under any single project or scheme under this section exceeds $5,000 in any fiscal year the approval of the governor in council shall be required.
> (b) Pay all necessary administration expenses incurred under the act and all necessary travelling and living expenses incurred by officials or employees in the performance of their duty.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

That is the new section 10 as it would read, the only difference being that it is provided in it that all expenditures over $5,000 must be passed by the governor in council. As it was before, it would provide that all expenditures even down to $1 had to be passed by order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister says, therefore, is that it legitimatizes payments up to $5,000 on any project without an order in council. Nevertheless the point made by the hon. member for Lake Centre is that unless there is some limitation somewhere on the gross amount that may be expended the minister's scope is still wide open. Where is that limitation? Surely the minister himself will agree that there must be some limitation.

When the minister comes to speak again on his estimates, or at some point, will he tell the committee what is the gross amount actually expended up to a certain date, what the commitments thereafter were and how far it is proposed to go with this expenditure, because, so far as one can observe, there does not seem to be any finality about it? It would also be interesting to know how many of these holes never held water.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And how many broke down.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the facts with regard to that and shall be prepared to give them, namely, the number of dug-outs that were full of water at a certain date after they had been dug, and the number of dams that went out. That, however, would come more properly under the estimates. I can only repeat what I said the first time I spoke with regard to this measure, which, by the way, was brought in by a previous government, and when we had the provision for the limitation removed. The statement which I made then and which I have no reason to withdraw was that it would take at least $20,000,000 to do this job. Speaking in round figures, I think about half that amount has been spent or will have been spent by the end of this year. The first time I spoke with regard to this measure I think I intimated that probably the projects then being discussed or talked about would require some ten years.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that $10,000,000 include all that has been lost in the dams that have gone out?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, which is not very much. It is surprisingly small, as a matter of fact, in comparison with the number of dams that have been built, but we shall have all that information when the estimates are under consideration. With regard to the question of control, the outside control is the $2,500,000 that is voted. Then, of course, as hon. members know, there is another control within departments; that is, the question of whether or not there is virament in the vote, whether you can switch money from one activity to another without the authority of council or of this house or of anyone else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a dangerous practice, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: That depends upon the nature of the vote. This always was a blocked vote; you could move money from one activity to another. I do not think it would have been unreasonable, and probably it might have been justifiable from the beginning, to suggest on some division being made by the house which would have put some limitation on the amount of money that could be spent for different projects, but that has never been done. Since this experience, however, the auditor general has insisted on that division being made by the department, and that has been done. That practice was followed last year and is being followed during the present year. That is, we set up certain amounts of money to be expended on reseeding to grass, on pastures, on dug-outs, on small dams, on large dams, on irrigation projects and so forth, and we have said that these were the amounts we intended to expend, making up the full $2,500,000. Then, in practice, before we can change from one to another, we have to show the treasury that we have cancelled some of the authorizations that made up the first total, or that we actually cannot complete them. In other words, we are following much the same practice that is followed when these votes are set up in the house in various amounts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has admitted that under the statute as it now stands there is no limitation.

Mr. GARDINER: There is the limitation of $2,500,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will read section 8 of the statute as it stood originally:

> For the purposes of this act the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada during the fiscal year 1935-36 and for each fiscal year for a further period of four years a sum not exceeding one million dollars per annum as may be necessary to continue and extend the work undertaken under this act.

Therefore, under the law as it stood originally there was a limitation of $750,000 for the first year and of not more than $1,000,000 a year for the next four years.

Mr. GARDINER: The limitation now is what the house votes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will come to that, because there is no such limitation; that is just the point I am raising. This section was repealed in 1937, and then in 1939 section 8 was enacted as follows:

> For the purposes of this act the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure of sums not exceeding the amount appropriated by parliament in each year for such purposes.

Under this section the authority of the governor general in council only is limited.

Mr. GARDINER: "Not exceeding the amounts voted by the house." That is the way these sections are always worded.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the present suggested amendment the minister will have certain powers over and above those possessed by the governor in council. Until contracts of $5,000 or over are considered, the minister has absolute power. Therefore the limitation under section 8 as it stands at the present time means that expenditures of $5,000 or over may be made to the extent of $2,500,000, the amount provided in the estimates; but no control whatever is imposed on the amount the minister himself may expend on projects amounting to less than $5,000. I bring this to your attention, Mr. Chairman, on account of the necessity of amending section 8 as it now stands, in order to provide that the limit of the expenditure shall cover not only the amount provided in the estimates, or the expenditures made under orders in council, but also the expenditures that can be made by the minister himself under contracts for less than $5,000. To-day under the law there is no limitation at all in that respect. There is nothing to prevent the minister from saying, "I will spend the $2,500,000 on projects costing more than $5,000. I will do that by order in council, but over and above that amount I will spend any sum I deem necessary, without restriction." It is just against that sort of thing, the failure to put in any provision which will protect the interests of the people of Canada, that I make my protest. I ask the minister to give consideration to the necessity of amending section 8 in order to limit the minister's power of making expenditure.

Mr. GARDINER: I will consider that point during the dinner recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: The point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) just before we rose for dinner was well taken. There will be an amendment to add the words "undertaken and by virtue of this act", which will make the minister subject to all the limitation of the act.

Mr. PERLEY: Earlier in the session I asked the minister if he would be bringing down any amendments to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and I understood him to say that he did not anticipate any amendment to the act we are now considering but he might have some minor amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I cannot see any real need for these amendments because I think the minister already has all the power he proposes to take by these amendments. Why did he find it necessary to change the advisory committee? He will recall that the advisory committee set up in 1935 was representative of municipal and other organizations throughout the west, and I think that was a useful committee. He should tell us why that committee was changed. Would he state also what projects he has in mind to undertake this coming season under the act as it will be amended? Would he state just how many dug-outs have been constructed under the act to date?

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the questions asked would come more properly under the estimates, that is, those with regard to the number of dug-outs, the amount of money spent on them, and so forth.

The other question was the subject of a long discussion during the session when a change was made in the committee. The first act provided for only one advisory committee. When I came into the department the officials advised me that it was most difficult to operate the act with one committee, that there were water undertakings, undertakings with regard to the improvement of land and undertakings with regard to the taking of land out of cultivation, and they wanted more than one committee. Provision was made in 1936 or 1937 for more than one advisory committee, and to-day we have three. The main committee is almost identical with the committee of that time. The leader of the opposition of the day took strong exception to changing the committee without naming the persons who were to be chosen, and I gave an undertaking at the time that the persons we intended to choose were practically the same as were on the committee at that time. The only changes made have been on account of changed circumstances. As a matter of fact, I think the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is still a member of that committee.

Mr. PERLEY: Representing the municipalities.

Mr. GARDINER: He was taken on to represent the municipalities. We continued him as a member afterwards, and so far as I know, he is still a member and has attended most of the committee meetings. I have not the names of the members before me at the moment, but when we get into the estimates I hope to be able to give the names.

Mr. PERLEY: What representations has the committee made to the department?

Mr. GARDINER: All matters of policy have been referred to the committee and discussed by them, and every action has been taken for which the act provides. The committee meets at least once a year, and on other occasions in between whenever it is necessary to call them together.

Mr. PERLEY: Have they made any special recommendations for the coming season?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not certain that the recommendations for the coming season have been gone into fully by the committee, but the hope is that the committee will meet as soon as I am permitted to go west after the end of the session.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The section outlining the duties of the committee reads:

> The committee shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Have any regulations been passed granting the advisory committee any powers in addition to those provided by the statute? In arriving at a decision as to what projects are to be proceeded with, does the minister make the decision himself, or are the individual projects submitted to the advisory committee?

Mr. GARDINER: As I stated, there are three committees, and regulations have been drawn up outlining their authority and their duties. I do not think those regulations have been changed materially since the committees were first set up. It stands to reason that only a small percentage of the works comes to my attention. The act provides that all matters of this kind are to be passed by the minister, but in practice they are actually passed by the officials of the department or the deputy minister. For example, authority is given to certain officials to pass upon dug-outs, and unless some controversial question arose I would not hear of it officially. That is the very reason why authority of this kind must be there. It is not possible to have all these dug-out projects, which may number from 1,000 to 5,000, come to the attention of the minister, but he has the authority to stop any of them or to pass any of them, if he so wishes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry I was not in the chamber this afternoon when the resolution was under discussion so that I might have heard the minister's statement. It is unfortunate that some of the committees have to sit practically all day in order to try to get their reports into the house before the house rises. That was the situation to-day with the committee on the defence of Canada regulations.

I should like to say something about the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act because I believe that this scheme has been of considerable benefit to the western prairies. I am hoping that in spite of the war and the necessity for war expenditures, projects under this scheme will not be unduly curtailed. I am not going to enter into criticism of the administration of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I have heard much criticism along those lines, and from what I heard before I came here this evening, similar criticism was raised by other hon. members on the opposition side who spoke this afternoon.

In my opinion the government should be encouraged to continue the prairie farm rehabilitation projects in western Canada. At the moment we are getting considerable moisture over a wide part of the prairies, but we know from past experience that that section of the country is subject to recurring drought, and I do not think the rainfall and moisture conditions we now have should be allowed, together with the war, to curtail projects which may be of primary importance in the course of the next few years. I know that where I have seen these projects on the prairie, they have done much to give the farmers on whose land they are undertaken a greater sense of security than they felt two or three years ago. To my mind that is a great thing both in peace time and now when the west is suffering from depressed prices, and with the outlook none too good. These schemes have assisted our people in that way.

I think, too, that this scheme might be expanded in future years into something more of an irrigation project than it has been regarded up to the present time. I do not mean that we should go in for any tremendous irrigation projects such as have been suggested at times, but I think we should keep in mind the possibility of irrigating some sections of western Canada and developing, for example, the industry in which my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is so much interested, the sugar beet industry, because, after all, we who live on the prairies and who are alarmed at the situation developing in the world, and the possibility of curtailed markets, know that somehow some of our people on the plains will have to transfer their interests from the growing of wheat to some other form of agricultural production. I notice that the minister himself has taken what I think is somewhat of a new line in the past few months. I recall that in 1936—I am not going to quote Hansard—the present Minister of Agriculture in this house criticized severely the suggestions which had been made by a former government for the curtailment of production. I have on my desk at the moment, or if not, I have upstairs—

Mr. GARDINER: Never mind getting it. I will agree to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have upstairs some posters which were sent to me only yesterday carrying the slogan "Help win the war by growing less wheat." My mind, when I read that, went back to the speeches of the present Minister of Agriculture in 1934, 1935 and 1936. O course conditions alter and opinions change. But I wish to urge the government to continue the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme and to expand it, and I am quite sure that if we do that, not only the people of the west but the people of all Canada will be repaid for the amount that is put into these projects.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 92, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR CHARITIES ACT, 1939

AMENDMENTS TO COVER FUNDS RAISED FOR PURCHASE OF WAR SUPPLIES, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of National War Services) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, to amend the War Charities Act, 1939.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion passes, would the minister either now or in committee give again the explanation which he gave on the introduction of the bill with such extensions as he may see fit to give us?

I must say that I heard his explanation with some surprise. I did not know that the condition existed to which he referred.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is a matter of detail rather than of principle, I think it would be better to deal with it in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I think it is important, before we proceed further, that I should give details of just what the bill intends to do. The division of voluntary services is responsible for the administration of the War Charities Act. When the act was first drawn, it was not under War Services. The intention now is to amend it to state that "minister" means the Minister of National War Services. The object of this bill is to provide a measure of control and regulation of the voluntary efforts of organizations throughout Canada in their desire to raise money for war charitable purposes. Under the act any organization which makes an appeal to the public for donations or subscriptions in money or in kind for any war charity fund or which attempts to do so by sponsoring a bazaar or any other entertainment for that purpose must be registered under the act. That is the provision as it has operated down to the present. Since this act was assented to on September 13, 1939, and up to May 7, 1941, 1,037 central funds have been registered. In addition, there are 751 branch funds, which have been registered under a central fund. During the above period the registration of sixty-six funds has been cancelled, and seventy-seven have expired, leaving a net of 1,645 which have been dealt with under the act. The great majority of applications come from responsible groups or organizations. That is, it is not very often that an application has to be refused. They are usually responsible organizations.

After investigation, certificates are issued to such organizations. Then, each application which is not approved, after an investigation, is cancelled and refused. Every effort has been made to prevent the commercializing of war charity efforts. We are finding that in some instances a high percentage of the money taken in entertainments, balls, and so forth, is consumed by expenditures. Where that is found to be the situation it is checked up with the organization, before further permits are given; and if the promoters are not able to satisfy the organization that they are going to carry on the ball, or the entertainment, or whatever it may be, in a manner which will secure for war purposes by far the greater part of the money taken in, then there is usually some objection.

According to the War Charities Act, all organizations registered under the act must make financial returns of their operations to the Department of National War Services, as of March 31 in each year. All of these returns are not as yet in for last year, but the department keeps after them until they finally send the returns in.

The collection of those which have been received up to date total $20,450,000. These figures include the figures for the Red Cross, but they do not include the $6,751,000 raised in the recent campaign for the Canadian war services fund. These figures do, however, include whatever sums organizations in the Canadian war services fund may have raised for the year 1940. Those would be amounts outside the united campaign.

A great many letters dealing with these different drives come to the department from time to time. I have before me the particulars of the last drive, namely, that for the war services, under the direction of Senator McRae. The following table will show the objectives in the different provinces, and the actual amounts received:

	Objective	Amount collected
Prince Edward Island..	$ 33,500	$ 64,900
Nova Scotia.....	244,000	360,203
New Brunswick.....	160,000	228,986
Quebec	1,175,400	1,525,552
Ontario	2,553,200	2,871,026
Manitoba	240,000	356,258
Saskatchewan	280,700	401,352
Alberta	225,750	310,185
British Columbia.....	525,000	601,000

Every province in Canada exceeded its objective in the drive, and a total of $6,751,462 was collected. Of that amount, $4,558,674 was collected in cash, and the remaining sum is to come along. It is estimated that by the time the total is all in, it will be in the neighbourhood of $7,000,000.

The cost of the campaign was 3·3 per cent of the total.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that include advertising?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe it includes all the cost. National headquarters received $32,000 in direct contributions. The campaign expenses amounted to 3·3 per cent, or $229,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Which societies combined in the drive?

Mr. GARDINER: The Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the Salvation Army, the Canadian Legion, the I.O.D.E. in western Canada, and the Knights of Columbus united in the drive.

Mr. PERLEY: Did all these organizations operate in every province, or were there some provinces in which there were other organizations?

Mr. GARDINER: All these organizations entered into the drive in all the provinces. Many other organizations, however, which existed, organizations which perhaps were not national in scope, or which were not engaged in actual war auxiliary services, put all their machinery at the disposal of the central committee, so as to put over the drive. I may add that a considerable share of the credit for the success of the drive, and for having all these organizations unite in it, is due to General McRae and the representatives of the different organizations who worked with him. He led the drive.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the division of the total amount among the different organizations which took part?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid I have not those figures before me. I would point out, however, that the amounts were arranged by each of the organizations submitting its budget to a board. That board, headed by Mr. Burton, reduced the budget considerably, part of the reduction being made in costs of collection. Those amounts had been figured on the assumption that there would be four or five drives, instead of one. Some overlapping was eliminated, because they were all going to subscribe funds for one common effort. The amount was cut down to $5,200,000. That was set up as the amount actually required; but in order to make a proper division across Canada, and to be assured that if some portion happened to fall down they would still obtain their objective, they set that objective at $5,500,000.

As, however, the figures I have indicated show, every part of Canada went over its objective. Therefore there is a considerable sum—I believe it is about $1,500,000 or $1,600,000—which is now in a special fund, under the direction of a trust board set up to handle that fund. Anything any organization requires in addition to its original allotment will have to be secured through that board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The fund is not paid to the government at all?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is kept in trust?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: In the last war this country had what was known as a patriotic fund. It consisted of moneys subscribed by municipalities, provinces, and private individuals. The day after this war was declared, this country adopted the statute of 1939, which dealt with moneys collected. It would seem that that is now being extended to war supplies.

The minister has said that the united war charities collected about $6,750,000, such moneys to be used by the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the Salvation Army, the Canadian Legion, the I.O.D.E. and the Knights of Columbus. The Red Cross is not included, although I understand it is to take part in the next drive.

I would point out that there are many organizations in the municipalities collecting money from tag days. In addition to that, there are some provincial funds. In this expansion of the War Charities Act, is it the intention to take care of those minor and local agencies, or are they just subsidiaries? I may say there is a wonderful fund, known as the Telegram British war victims fund. I doubt if any fund has done more to educate the people of Canada with regard to the great danger confronting the world and civilization at the present time than this great fund so cheerfully subscribed to all over, at not a cent's cost to the subscribers. That fund should not be interfered with in any way; it is registered, and is a blessing. It is doing great pioneer work, and I am glad to see that it is not interfered with by the new act. It is a separate organization. The war charities board that has been appointed under this bill comprises good citizens, and their first year's work has been well done, but I suggest to the minister that the time has come when the government should make a free, substantial contribution to the mother country in food, clothing and equipment of all kinds. Why could we not make a gift to the people there of grain, butter, and all kinds of food, clothing, and many other commodities that are not covered by the agriculture agreements which the minister has made with the mother country? Further, I suggest that any contributions of that sort and free gifts should be made immediately.

The other day I received a letter from two Canadian soldiers in a village in England. The place was bombed, and among the sufferers was a woman who had lost two sons and her husband. One of the soldiers who wrote to me asked this lady what she would like and she replied, "Oh, if I could only get two pounds of sugar and a pound of butter!"

There is in that reply a principle involved. Why not give this help and these free offerings? Are we or are we not at this time doing our full duty to the mother country? We can get the ships, but I do not think we are contributing many of the things that we could very well afford to send over to the old country as a gift. For instance, butter is badly needed. Under this particular section of war munitions and war supplies the government itself could collect and send over, weekly or monthly, as a voluntary gift, a large quantity of supplies from the people of Canada. I hope that this new fund of the war charities board will be a success. The work done by that board so far has been most commendable and well done, and I understand that the Red Cross is willing to join in the next drive. In any event, it is to be hoped that the element of time for the next drive will be considered carefully by the minister, because there is bound to be a conflict among these various loan and other appeals to the public. Many organizations and private individuals collecting locally are apt to come into collision, and I hope that every possible step will be taken to see that their activities are harmonized, and that the time will be arranged by the government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood there was a difference of opinion between the minister and the Red Cross officials in Saskatchewan in connection with the proposed drive. How was it finally settled?

Mr. GARDINER: The matter to which the hon. member refers was brought up in the house in the early part of the session. There really was not a difference of opinion between the Saskatchewan group and the minister, but there was a misunderstanding in the organization itself. That difference has been entirely ironed out within the organization. The proposal made at the time the united drive was organized was to the effect that if the Red Cross desired more money to carry on through this year, they should come into the drive which took place in March and ask for more money from the public at that time. They thought, or at any rate some of their officials thought, they would probably be able to get through this year without appealing for additional money, and they so intimated. I understand that later the Red Cross did conclude that if they were to do certain work which some of them suggested ought to be done, they would require more money. That question has been under discussion since, and it has been pretty well determined that if it is decided to go on with that particular work, some means will have to be found of obtaining money for the purpose. Whether that will be done by a limited collection, or how it will be done, has not yet been decided, but the spirit of the decision made some time ago is being carried out by the Red Cross and by everyone concerned.

At the moment the Red Cross is considering the question whether it will go into one united drive later on. As a matter of fact, it has indicated a willingness to do so. I would not say that it has been definitely decided that there will be only one drive, but the intention is that there shall be only two drives in the year. One will be in the early part of the year to raise funds for auxiliary war services, that is to say, all matters having to do with charities in connection with the war or auxiliary work in camps. The other, it is expected, will be held in the later part of the year and will cover many of the matters referred to by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who discussed many of these other activities that are going on. It is hoped that they will all be brought into the second united drive, so that there will be only two main national drives in the year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Covering the Red Cross and others?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, covering all activities. I did have the figures for which the member for Qu'Appelle asked. A few moments ago he asked about the allotment to the different organizations that went into the drive, and I was under the impression I did not have those figures. I find, however, they are here, and I will put them on Hansard:

	War services	Peace time	Total
Canadian Legion.....	$ 938,100	.....	$ 938,100
Knights of Columbus...	725,000	.....	725,000
Salvation Army.....	989,100	$459,000	1,448,100
Y.M.C.A.	1,281,000	458,000	1,739,000
Y.W.C.A.	238,465	49,500	287,965
I.O.D.E.	104,000	.....	104,000
	$4,275,665	$966,500	$5,242,165

That makes a total of $4,275,665 for war services and $966,500 for peace-time services, or a grand total of $5,242,165 for all purposes. That was the final amount allotted to the different organizations. These are the sums which will be allocated out of the collection, made automatically to these organizations, and any amount in excess will be in the special fund to be taken care of by the trust board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What machinery is set up for investigating the proposed charities?

Mr. GARDINER: A committee is proposed in the act. It has not yet been constituted, but we have auditors who check the accounts of these organizations, or have the accounts sent in to be checked. In my first explanation of the bill I should have said that the most important feature is contained in the definition of "war charities' fund," and the provisions that are made to enforce it. "War charities' fund" now means any fund having for its object or among its objects any purpose, charitable or otherwise, arising out of or connected with the war. It is not intended now that only those raising money for charitable purposes should come to this branch of the department, but any organization that is collecting money for any purpose from the public, and having to do with the war, must apply for a permit in order to make its collection, and its books will be subject to examination by the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that apply to small undertakings in procuring comforts for the local camps?

Mr. GARDINER: It is intended to apply more particularly to the raising of funds for Spitfires and all that sort of thing—probably one hundred or two or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the department considered awarding a decoration in the form of a ribbon, or a diploma, or a card of honour, to the associations throughout the country which have been doing such splendid work in knitting and gathering together comforts of one kind or another and sending them either through the Red Cross or directly to the boys overseas? In the last war a great deal of the same work was done by many organizations, and after the war some recognition was given to the occasional one. But down the ladder among the ordinary people in the towns and cities very little recognition, if any, was given to the many groups of ladies who did that kind of work. I always thought that the authorities failed in recognition of the vast amount of voluntary service that was given.

Since the present war commenced, I know that in my own riding the Davenport Conservative ladies under the chairmanship of Mrs. S. H. Gillson meet weekly in a room that is donated to them for the purpose, with heat and so forth, and there they sit all afternoon knitting and sewing and making comforts, which, when received overseas, are, I am sure, greatly appreciated. In fact, I have seen many letters that have come back expressing that appreciation.

The hon. member for Broadview mentioned another case of splendid work. He did not elaborate on it, and I think I should say a further word about the Toronto Telegram which has done wonderful service, which has cost that newspaper a large sum of money. Every dollar contributed to the Telegram war victims' fund goes to the Lord Mayor of London's fund. I believe the amount is now on the way to a million dollars and the work is continuing. The Telegram has done a marvellous work not only in connection with that fund but in creating, especially in the cities and towns of Ontario, in the schools, lodges, churches and organizations of one kind and another, a patriotic spirit that is most commendable and that I do not believe would have prevailed to the same extent but for the great work that newspaper is doing. The space that it is giving to the fund, if estimated in advertising dollars, would amount to a large sum. It also pays the full cost of the bookkeeping and collecting of that fund and sending it overseas.

As I listened this evening, I wondered whether the minister had in mind the bringing about of some means of giving fitting honour and recognition to organizations that do this sort of work. I am not speaking of the Telegram particularly; it may not want anything like that; but any organization that does such work is surely entitled at least to a letter of thanks from the government, and not only from this government but from the government in the old country.

Personally I have been thrilled by the work the minister has developed. He took over a new department, organized the programme and I think on the whole has done a very good job that has resulted in much comfort to the men overseas and in the conservation of a large amount of material which otherwise would have gone to waste. The minister I believe deserves the thanks of the committee for organizing this new department and doing what he has done.

Mr. McNIVEN: The hon. member for Mackenzie made some reference to a misunderstanding between the Saskatchewan Red Cross and the department; that is, some publicity has been given through the press to an alleged misunderstanding. Following the last war the Saskatchewan Red Cross continued its activities, established outposts in what might be called Saskatchewan's hinterland, and likewise maintained a nursing service. It has rendered invaluable service to the remoter parts of Saskatchewan. In addition, the Red Cross established a children's hospital which it has maintained since that time and has done a magnificent work. In the last fiscal year the Saskatchewan Red Cross raised approximately $696,000, which is not too bad for one organization operating in what is popularly known as the dust-bowl or the drought area of Saskatchewan. In that time they have organized some 800 branches, which function largely through the agency of women's organizations, and in addition to money contributions they have done much in the way of providing comforts for the soldiers. Notwithstanding their disappointment at the inability or unwillingness of the department to consent to a second campaign in 1941, they threw themselves, as an organization and as individuals affiliated with the Red Cross, wholeheartedly into the campaign for national war services, with the result that our province of Saskatchewan more than doubled its quota. I am sure that under the Minister of National War Services there will be no misunderstanding, and that much will be done to harmonize and keep intact the splendid Red Cross organization which has been built up in Saskatchewan.

Mr. STIRLING: Six charities have joined in the national campaign this year. I gather that it will be the policy of the government to increase that number and get more warrantable charities working together in these two campaigns. That being the situation, I should like to know what effect that policy will have on those districts where it has been the custom to join together locally, choosing their own war charities, campaigning in an appeal which shall be the only appeal for those six or twelve months, and making their own allocation. Will it be the policy of the government to attempt to do away with those efforts and substitute for them this national effort?

Mr. GARDINER: Our first intention was to build from those organizations which were in existence in many cities across Canada and gradually to bring Canada into one united effort in connection with, first, war services and then, as separate from that, the civil charities. We found, however, that was going to be too slow, and therefore we brought the organizations together with the idea of having a united drive arranged from the top down rather than from the bottom up. That was necessitated by certain conditions which arose in connection with financing. We had to raise much larger sums than we figured we might in the early stages. I think the only way the plan can operate successfully is for the different organizations enumerated of the group doing war auxiliary services, the names of which I have already read, and adding thereto the Red Cross, to keep in a group by themselves. All are groups that are actually doing war service either in the camps in Canada or at the battle front. The idea is to keep these organized in that way but to induce every organization interested in collecting funds to put forth its efforts to assist in collecting the money. After all, it is just about the same people who do the collecting all across Canada, irrespective of what appeal is being made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think they change the personnel of the organization, but they collect from pretty much the same people.

Mr. GARDINER: In most communities practically the same people will go out in the fall and collect for home charities. At another time, perhaps the same people will go out and put on a drive in order to collect funds for war charities, all under the auspices of this same organization. It is found that in some cities there are organizations purely local in nature, which do not extend to other cities, at least under the same name. Those organizations are interested in some work being carried on in their particular communities. I have in mind cities such as Montreal, for example, where certain organizations carry on work that is not done in other parts of Canada. Those organizations would hardly be considered national. They are doing work that is similar to certain national activities, but it is under different auspices.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand some $6,751,630 was collected in the first appeal under the war charities fund, but I should like to know whether it is intended in the next appeal to seek subscriptions from the municipalities and provinces as was done in the patriotic fund during the last war. I believe that was not done this time. This war charities board has done a splendid job in coordinating this charitable work and avoiding and saving duplication and overhead, and it must be remembered that this war is far different from the last so far as the collection of this money is concerned. Then I should like to know whether various local sporting bodies throughout the country that collect sporting equipment and other material for use by the troops in various local camps will come under this legislation, and whether it will be considered essential that they should register and take out permits.

There is one other question I wish to ask in connection with the parcels being sent overseas by the various organizations coming under this fund. These parcels are sent to the old country, to other theatres of war, and to Germany. I believe all the parcels sent to the old country by the post office are delivered, with the exception of those lost as a result of enemy action; but according to the British Hansard of a few months ago that is not the situation with regard to parcels sent to Germany. We must remember that there are a number of Canadian prisoners of war in Germany, and I was surprised to learn recently that there are thousands of women, a few of them Canadians, who are prisoners of war there as well. It was said in the British house that by reason of the difficulties in Spain, through which parcels were routed from Lisbon to Germany, a great many of these parcels have been lost, and at that time some eleven members that I named last February, of the British house asked the government several questions with regard to the delivery of these British parcels. Can anything be done by the war charities board, or have any rules or regulations been passed by that body, with reference to the sending of parcels to Germany for Canadians through the seven bodies included in this bill; and, if so, what are those rules or regulations? It seems to me that if the British Red Cross cannot deliver these parcels, it must be doubly difficult for these other organizations to do so, although the Canadian Red Cross reply that they do deliver them. They are all doing splendid work; I intend no criticism of them at all, but I should like to know if any rules or regulations have been adopted by the government or the board with regard to the delivery of parcels to prisoners of war, and I would ask the minister to take up the matter with the board and have some inquiry made into it.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the only way in which parcels can be delivered to prisoners of war in Germany is through the International Red Cross, and that the regulations in that respect were drawn up at Geneva. We had nothing to do with the drawing up of those regulations. As a matter of fact, that is one activity which the Red Cross now consider they may have to enlarge, compared with what they have been doing recently. The larger the number of prisoners of war in Germany, the greater and the more expensive will become that work; but it is all carried out under international regulations which were framed at Geneva, and the Red Cross organization is expected to do that work.

In answer to the other question, as to those who will have to apply for permits, as the legislation is now drafted all organizations collecting money for war purposes come under the act and will have to apply for permits to proceed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This section is considered necessary, is it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

On section 6—Proceedings for offences.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have there been any prosecutions?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think so.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the reason for repealing subsection 2 of section 12 of the act?

Mr. GARDINER: Previously the Minister of National War Services had to consent to any prosecution, but in practice all prosecutions are carried on through the department of the attorney general in the province. By the repeal of this subsection, the provincial attorney general is allowed to proceed with such prosecutions.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who would have to lay a complaint?

Mr. GARDINER: Anyone could lay a complaint. It might be done by some official of our department.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask a question arising out of the fact that all those collecting money for this fund are required to have a permit or to be registered. What would be the position of an organization which put on a play and collected perhaps $100, and then decided to give $75 of that to one of these funds? Would they come under this act, or would they not?

Mr. GARDINER: I should imagine that if they proceeded in that way they would not come under it, although I should not like to be too definite about it. Under this act the department would have power to examine into what reallly happened. If an organization indicates a desire to raise money for war purposes, it must ask for a permit in advance. If it was thought that some organization was trying to escape the necessity of securing that permit, and avoid coming under the act, while its real objective was promoted through the collection of money for war purposes, under this act the department would have the right to examine into the operations of that organization to discover what really happened.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

14. Production service. Production service administration, $35,560.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have before me sessional paper No. 210 in connection with the resignation of Mr. Newman, field man with the live stock and poultry branch, dominion production service. This return lists some of his qualifications. He graduated in 1924 from the Manitoba agricultural college. For one year he worked with Detroit Creamery Farms, Detroit, Michigan, as herdsman in charge of the herd on the state fair circuit and in charge of the Michigan state herd at the national dairy show, 1925. He then joined the staff of the dominion experimental station at Lethbridge under Doctor W. H. Fairfield, where he was in charge of live stock and dry land cultural investigations from March, 1925, until March, 1930. From 1930 until 1935 he was engaged in practical agriculture. During his period of practical farming he had interesting experience with stock on mineral deficient soils in northern Saskatchewan and with large scale farming, alfalfa production and stock raising in southern Alberta. In 1935 he joined the staff of the dominion live stock branch, and was with them until about a year ago. In my opinion Mr. Newman was a valuable member of the department, and I should appreciate very much having the minister make a statement as to why a member of his staff with such a valuable record should not have been retained in the department. Mr. Newman was performing a valuable piece of work, and surely there must be something wrong with the department when a man with a record such as his cannot be retained in the service.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As I understand the situation, Mr. Newman left the department of his own accord. There was no objection to him, in so far as the department was concerned, but he decided that he would like to leave the department and take up other work. I understand he is now doing some organization work in Alberta. The department did not desire him to quit; I understand he just left of his own accord.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He did leave, but it was understood that more responsible work would be given to him. I think the committee is entitled to a fuller explanation than the minister has given. This correspondence would indicate that he did not leave the department willingly or without giving the matter a good deal of thought. I think this department should make greater effort to retain men doing the type of work Mr. Newman was doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is the present director?

Mr. GARDINER: No one has been appointed to take his place.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like the minister to give a fuller explanation.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. GARDINER: The only fuller explanation I can give is that he thought he should be made permanent at an earlier date, which would, of course, carry with it an increased salary. He was not made permanent, and he left the service of the department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The correspondence indicates that Mr. Newman gave up a good position with the McIntyre ranch in southern Alberta when he was persuaded to come to the department on the understanding that he would receive a permanent position in the course of a reasonable time. I understand he was with the department five years and still had not received any assurance that he would receive a permanent appointment. I think the department should be able to determine in five years whether a man of this sort could be given a permanent position. There must have been some reason for keeping him off the permanent staff. This is a matter of considerable importance, and we should have a fuller explanation.

Mr. DONNELLY: This is not Doctor Newman, the dominion cerealist, is it?

Mr. GARDINER: No. If my hon. friend insists upon an explanation, the only thing I can say is that the department did not think it necessary to urge him any further to remain.

Item agreed to.

15. Production service. Health of animals—administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $1,652,495.

Mr. PERLEY: What success is the department having in stamping out contagious diseases among animals? The details on page 63 of the estimates show a great number of veterinary inspectors, and I should like to know if it is necessary to have 200 or so of these inspectors in this branch. Could not this number be cut down considerably?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been considerable pressure in recent years for the examination of cattle for tuberculosis, one of the reasons being the fact that animals shipped to the United States, where most of our surplus cattle go, must be examined unless they are to be slaughtered shortly after arrival. Many of the areas where dairy cattle are raised are insisting upon examinations being made. We have had to cut down considerably this year on these activities, and have had to reduce the amount of money available for this service, compared with two or three years ago. We should like to have more money to spend in order to clean up all districts.

The province of Ontario is insisting strongly on having many districts which have not yet been covered brought in. We have to go on and do the work in the districts that have been covered already, at least once and, in some instances, twice. We are not able to cut down on the staff immediately we start to discontinue bringing in counties because we must complete the work and reexamine cattle. At the moment, however, an effort is being made to reduce rather than to increase the expenditures on this work.

Mr. QUELCH: I hope the minister will find it possible to continue this work and expand the areas. The farmers in the smaller areas suffer a great disadvantage when it comes to selling their cattle. They find they cannot ship cattle unless they have been passed. Just a few miles south of me is an area into which cattle cannot be shipped unless they have been tested for tuberculosis. We understood at the time that a very large area was going to be taken in, but the department decided not to extend that area, and we are now under the difficulty of not being able to bring in stock from outside unless it is tested. It has been necessary to quarantine stock for six weeks and two months before they could be brought into that area, and that causes a great deal of difficulty and inconvenience. I hope the government will extend that area as rapidly as possible.

Mr. GARDINER: One of the difficulties in Alberta is that it was only three or four years ago at the outside that Alberta made their first request for an area to be taken in. Prior to that time, the government or the people of Alberta did not see fit to come under the act. Other provinces were coming in. The maritimes—I am speaking from memory—are completely covered, also a large part of the other two prairie provinces, and a large part of Ontario and Quebec, but Alberta did not start to come under the act until three or four years ago, and the area there is not as large as in some of the other provinces. I am sorry that the war has necessitated our cutting down on bringing in any new territory.

Mr. RICKARD: In Ontario, how many areas have been taken in, and is it the intention to clean up the areas already in?

Mr. GARDINER: I have a list of those counties which have applied but have not yet been tested. All the others which have applied have been tested. The counties which have made application but have not yet been examined are Hastings, Haldimand, Lennox-Addington, Dufferin, Huron, Bruce, Haliburton, Oxford, Perth, Wellington, Middlesex and Elgin. All the other counties which have made application have been examined at least once or are in the stage of going through the test for the first time. It is the intention of the department to clean up these counties if we can obtain sufficient funds from year to year, and we intend to clean these up before taking in any new areas.

Mr. RICKARD: A great many farmers feel that once an area has been tested, the work should be carried on if at all possible.

Mr. PERLEY: How many areas are there in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: The accredited areas in Saskatchewan are: Municipal areas 186, 35, 251, 6, 4, 344, 218, 36, 314, 158, 5, 156, 250, 217, 37, 219, 313, 189, 220, 185, 249, 315, 312, 279, 187, 375, 159, 157, 216, 345, 374, 155, 281, 280.

Mr. PERLEY: How many is that?

Mr. GARDINER: About thirty-five.

Mr. PERLEY: Is it not a fact that Saskatchewan is the healthiest province as regards not only human beings but animals as well?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to compliment the department upon this expenditure. I wish it were a little larger. I would also draw the attention of the committee, particularly members of the medical profession, to the fact that this item calls for an expenditure of $1,652,495 to take care of the health of the animals of Canada. In comparison with that, I should like them to note the total estimates to look after the health of the human beings of Canada. They amount to $1,011,605.

Mr. GOLDING: That is from the dominion government only.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The provincial governments have health departments, it is true, but I believe the federal department of health should extend its work.

Mr. WOOD: Has the health of animals branch made any investigation with regard to calf-hood vaccination for Bangs disease? This disease works greater ravages among cattle than even tuberculosis. I do not know whether the disease can be passed on to human beings as easily as tuberculosis. I have been led to believe that considerable experimenting has been done in the United States which would indicate that they have something there that is worth while, and I should like to know whether our department here is prepared to provide the serum for the prevention of Bangs disease and whether any investigation has been made into calf-hood vaccination.

Mr. GARDINER: The department has made investigations. We do not do this work directly but have undertaken, wherever any province desires to have it carried on in the province, to provide cultures with which to carry it on.

I should like to say a few words in reply to the remark of the hon. member for Yorkton. In all probability this work under health of animals branch would not be done at all if it were not for the fact that tuberculosis in cattle can be carried to human beings. All our activities in connection with contagious diseases in cattle are carried on because cattle and milk are used as human food. Therefore it is all part and parcel of the one job.

Mr. WRIGHT: In certain districts in the west probably 70 per cent of individual herds have been tested. Is there any provision in the act whereby when a certain percentage, say 75 per cent, of the herds in an area have been tested, that area would automatically become a tuberculous-free area and the remainder of the herds be cleaned up?

Mr. GARDINER: No. That condition may arise, but it is not accepted as a reason for making it an area. All the herds in the area must be checked by veterinaries and tested for tuberculosis before the area itself is called an anti-tuberculosis area.

Mr. McNEVIN: I rise to commend the minister upon the suggestion to proceed with the cleaning up of counties which have already been listed. I should also like to bring to his attention the county of Haliburton. The county of Victoria, just south of Haliburton, has already been cleaned up, and I believe the same applies to Ontario on the west and Peterborough on the east. The cattle population of Haliburton county is not extensive, but it serves as a source of supply of stocker cattle for Ontario, Victoria and Peterborough. It entails a substantial amount of work on the part of veterinaries serving that area to take care of the rush of stocker cattle which come down at certain seasons of the year. If at all possible, I think it would facilitate matters very much in the four counties I have mentioned, if that area could be cleaned up with as little delay as possible. Such action would greatly improve the supply of milk so essential for the important tourist business of this area.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I do not wish to take issue with what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario. Nevertheless, I come from a county where the subject of the tubercular test is a keen one. We in that county import from the west great numbers of stocker cattle. If pressure is brought to bear on the county of Middlesex to have the tubercular test, it will mean great hardship on the men who import those stocker cattle from the west.

An hon. MEMBER: Which part of the west?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Item agreed to.

16. Production service. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $530,000.

Mr. RICKARD: How much has been paid out in compensation?

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister give the figures by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount paid out since the beginning was $13,201,979. The amount paid in 1939-40 was $836,875.33. I have not the amounts by provinces.

Mr. TUSTIN: At what rate is the compensation paid?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount to be paid is two-thirds of the valuation. The highest valuation that can be put on grades is $60, and the highest on pure-bred cattle is $150.

Mr. WOOD: How much was paid out for hog cholera?

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount last year was $202,000. The total up to that time, for all preceding years, was $724,569.

Item agreed to.

17. Production service. Live stock and poultry, $707,597.55.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I believe I am entitled to express my views to the minister. In my constituency the farmers are engaged in either dairying, small fruit farming, or poultry raising. The position in which the poultry farmer of the Fraser valley finds himself is one in which it is absolutely impossible for him to carry on. Hundreds of thousands of their stock have had to be slaughtered, because they could not afford to produce under present production costs, and at present selling prices.

I have secured my information from the bureau of statistics, and from an equally well-known authority in respect of telephone and other rates, namely, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I believe he has no equal in respect of information concerning freight rates.

At the present time my constituency, and the province of British Columbia, must depend upon export rates because, roughly speaking, our price is based on the export rate received for nine-tenths of our production. That means, obviously, that the domestic rate applies to only one-tenth. I am speaking particularly to farmer members, although I am sorry there are not more in the house. I am glad, however, to see a few members of the legal fraternity who happen to represent farming districts. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I would point out that we must receive at least the cost of production, and that in the last year we have not received that much.

I would point out particularly to my hon. friends to the left that agriculture in Canada is not tied up completely with the word "wheat". With all due deference, I would point that out to the Minister of Agriculture. Wheat is only a by-product of agriculture in Canada.

Mr. WEIR: It is good poultry feed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right, now; I do not mind these interruptions from these small wheat farmers.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not think the Minister of Agriculture should allow that to go unchallenged.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know, from my past experience, that the Minister of Agriculture is quite capable of looking after himself. We are not getting paid—and I repeat it—for ploughing under our chickens. Last year on the average we received only sixteen and three-quarter cents a dozen for eggs in British Columbia. I do not believe the minister knew that, or that his departmental officials knew it. If they did, then they did not bring it to his attention. I repeat that sixteen and three-quarter cents a dozen was the average price the poultrymen in British Columbia were paid in 1940 for their eggs. It is all right for the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, because he will continue to plough under his wheat when I am through with these eggs.

An hon. member from Ontario has mentioned that egg production in British Columbia continues the year round. Any farmer member should know that production from poultry is greater from March to June. I am surprised there are not more practical farmers in the house.

In British Columbia our price is set entirely by the export rate, nine-tenths of which is for export purposes and only one-tenth for domestic consumption; and in order to get into the export market we have to ship to Montreal, Halifax or Saint John. For freight purposes bacon is put in class 4 and eggs in class 5, and both commodities are shipped in exactly the same type of refrigerator car. For the first time in my life I took some notes that cannot be disputed. There is this discrimination. I would point out to the minister and his efficiency experts that apples and eggs are shipped by the same type of transportation. A crate of eggs is 56 pounds and a box of apples 50 pounds, and the type of car is the same. Taking our two colossal institutions, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways, we find that the freight to Halifax and Saint John on apples is $1.29 per hundred pounds, minimum of 37,500-pound car, and eggs from British Columbia to Halifax and Saint John have a rate of $2.10 per hundred pounds, minimum of 40,000-pound car. I do not pretend to speak for all hon. members from British Columbia, but I certainly can claim to speak for the rural riding of Fraser Valley, and I say that while we have never questioned the right of the prairie farmer to a fair price for his wheat, a price that will give him cost of production, we ask for the same consideration from them and from the minister. We want to get cost of production so far as eggs are concerned.

A short time ago we applied to the government for some consideration with regard to the price of butter, and we advanced an argument to show how in our opinion the price could be arrived at. We realized that a contract had to be carried out with the old country in connection with cheese and suggested that it might be necessary to subsidize the price of that commodity in the ratio known in the ordinary farming district as two and a half to one so as to equalize matters in order to allow us to produce cheese. I am glad that the government has done that. At the same time I urge that something be done along the same line for the protection of the poultryman.

I give credit to the government for having reduced the rate on mixed grains, which were supposed to be used as feed for poultry on western farms and, I presume, in the maritimes. But let me point out to the minister, and particularly to his advisers, something that they have not realized, so far as British Columbia is concerned. Within two weeks of that rate being put into effect, the feed companies increased their price on feed from one to two dollars, and not one word was said by the price-fixing board. These facts can be verified by the department. We appreciate the so-called concession on mixed grains to the Pacific coast, but of what advantage is that to us when the feed companies immediately increase their price to the producer from one to two dollars a ton? The same applies to grain of all kinds—bran and shorts or mixed grains. Speaking for the largest poultry producing area in British Columbia, I say it is time the department stepped in. If you can say to the Ford Motor company or to General Motors, "You shall get a fair return on a gun carrier, bren-gun carrier, universal carrier or whatever it is called", then you can say to the poultry producer, "You shall get a fair return on the commodities you produce."

The price has been fixed on butter and wheat, and I commend the government in both instances because the price was too low. We have at least guaranteed an equitable return to the producers of apples in the east and in the west, and last year and again this year we have guaranteed a return to the fisherman for his lobster catch. Eggs happen to be one of the commodities of which Great Britain is much in need, and I suggest that a minimum return should be guaranteed the producer. At least he should get cost of production. With regard to this item now under consideration, amounting to over $700,000, I should like to know whether any provision is made therein to see that the poultry producer in British Columbia, who must be guided in his prices by the export market, will be protected in exactly the same way as the apple grower and the butter and cheese producer.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask members of the committee to be good enough to turn to page 65 of the estimates, which gives details of this item. They will see the absurdity of the classifications of the civil service commission. There is an expert, a B.S.A., who is in charge of the whole Department of Agriculture, Post Office and some other things, and he is crazy—and this does not appear in Hansard, nor is it in the statute book. I hope, however, that hon. members who have page 65 in front of them will take the trouble to follow me as I go through it. In the first place, there is one assistant director, production service, live stock who receives $4,920. Then there is one chief, live stock and poultry production services, $4,140. Then there are two associate chiefs, live stock and poultry production services, one at $3,660 and one at $3,510, or a total of $7,170. There is a chief registration officer at $3,660. Then there is one assistant chief, poultry production services —all services in connection with poultry—at $3,450, and there is another assistant chief, live stock and poultry production services, who has another job—not, perhaps, all poultry production services. It is live stock and poultry production services. Therefore he is more responsible than the man who looks after only the hens, roosters and chicks. He looks after live stock, big bulls and cows, and yet he gets less money, $270 per annum less than the man who only looks after hens and chicks. This must have been decided at Easter.

Then there is a district supervisor, live stock and poultry production services, at $3,300. The district supervisor has a little more than the assistant chief. Then there are the district live stock field men, one at $3,240, one at $3,000; and three supervising live stock field men, one at $2,880, one at $2,820 and one at $2,790. The supervising live stock field men are paid less than the district live stock field men, and the district live stock field man is better paid than the assistant chief, live stock and poultry production services.

What I say is not Greek; it is the kind of classification made by these so-called experts whom I call fools. I want the committee to realize that these so-called experts are fools, hon. members have it here and can check it for themselves.

Then there is a chief record of performance inspector at $3,000; three live stock production assistants at $2,760; sixteen senior live stock field men, one at $2,760, ten at $2,520, one at $2,490, one at $2,280 and one at $2,220. There is a senior poultry field man. That is an important position, it is like a decoration, S.P.F.M.; he gets $2,340. There is one principal clerk, and there are five live stock field men, two at $1,920, one at $1,860 and one at $1,845, a difference of $15, and one at $1,665. I find that a man must be very able to appreciate the services of two live stock field men and mark a difference of salary of $15 per annum. Joe has $15 per annum more than Tom. It shows how meticulously careful they are and how well they do things. If the one who received $1,845 had received $1,860, it would be theft because he would not have earned it!

Then there is a supervising record of performance inspector at $1,920. He should not be confounded with the chief record of performance inspector who receives $3,000. This is a much lower job. There are poultry field men at lower salaries, and record of performance inspectors who must not be confounded with the supervising record of performance inspector and clerks and stenographers and so forth. I know there are some doctors in the Department of Agriculture, I wonder whether the fellow who prepared these specifications is also a doctor. But I find it the greatest absurdity. Mark you, I do not blame the minister for that; it is the system, and I think the organization branch of the civil service commission should be abolished. It is only jealousy; there is no reason for all sorts of types being together on the same page in this way.

To conclude with a practical question; I would remind the minister that during those dark days when R. B. Bennett was Prime Minister, nearly all the bilingual propagandists of his department were fired. How many propagandists are there now? I hope the minister will be kind enough to answer the question. I shall be thankful to him for telling us how many more are there now than when the Bennett government was defeated?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I have an answer to my question?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not have an opportunity to answer before my hon. friend on this side was on his feet, but I would suggest that the proper place to discuss what my hon. friend was bringing up is under marketing. I have not here the officials to whom my hon. friend would like to address his remarks, but I shall have the information a little later to cover some of the points raised.

As to the questions raised by the hon member for Témiscouata, while there may be some things that are not exactly right in connection with the classifications they are not as foolish as he would have them appear. For example, take the assistant director of production services; the salary range in that classification is from $4,320 to $4,920, the increases being at the rate of $300 a year. Therefore an individual who comes in at the bottom of the classification, at the end of the first year goes up $300; next year, up another $300, and so on. It is possible that in going down the list of individuals one could take a man in his first year, compare him with one at the top of the list and say that it is difficult to justify the difference. Then another classification runs from $3,780 to $4,140; the next from $3,300 to $3,660, and the next from $3,000 to $3,240. There is some relationship between the classifications, but if one compares a man at the bottom with one at the top of the same classification, it might give a wrong impression.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to have my question straightened out. Under what section would it come?

Mr. GARDINER: Marketing comes under items 22 to 28; live stock and live stock products is item 27; dairy products, item 24. Marketing service administration, under which general discussion of marketing would come, is item 22.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all due respect to the hon. member for Témiscouata, I am not particularly interested in how much an individual receives so long as he gets results. But I point out that item 22—

Mr. GARDINER: We are still on item 17.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was trying to expedite matters. The minister pointed out that my question would be covered by a certain item and—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): The hon. member's question, I understand, comes under item 22, marketing service administration, to item 27.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I point out that item 22 does not include enough money, and therefore I shall have to ask to be permitted to explain myself a little more fully.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I understand what the hon. member has in mind, that the amount of money provided is not sufficient to cover what he is suggesting, namely, an increase in the price of eggs from sixteen to, say, twenty cents. Those steps are not taken under these estimates at all. The action in connection with the price of cheese, for example, and the price of hogs—and the action in connection with the price of eggs if that should be taken—is taken under the War Measures Act, and the money involved is paid out of the appropriation under that act where we are dealing with a condition that has arisen as a result of the war. There is not enough money in any of these items to deal with matters of that kind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister for understanding what I had in mind when I said this was not enough money. Is there any estimate under which the minister will be able to tell me later on whether or not the money will be available to increase the price of eggs as well as the price of cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be quite proper to discuss all marketing matters under the marketing estimates, in spite of the fact that the money is not provided under those estimates. The administration of those sums comes under those items; the individuals who are administering the expenditure of the money come under items 22 to 28, and it would be quite proper to discuss that matter then.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There is one other point on which I differ with the hon. member for Témiscouata. I am not particularly concerned with the salaries of the administrators. I am interested in the farmers; the administrators can look after themselves. I take it from the minister that there will be an item under which I can obtain some information with regard to what is to happen to the poultryman, who is a war casualty in British Columbia.

Mr. GARDINER: Everything having to do with the marketing of poultry, live stock and live stock products may be dealt with under that item.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister said that those classifications were not so foolish as I represented them to be. Of course that is a matter of opinion. Opinions are free. That is the opinion of the minister. I hold the contrary opinion, but that is my own business. On the other hand, I would very much regret having to take time to show in connection with every item that the classifications of each branch of his department are even more foolish than those to which I have already referred. I could show that to the satisfaction of anyone who has eyes to see and ears to listen.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Témiscouata asked one question to which I did not reply, namely, with regard to the number of bilingual persons employed on these staffs having to do with this branch of the department. There are 134 employees in the outside staff across Canada, and there are thirty-nine employed in the province of Quebec, all of whom I understand are bilingual.

Mr. WARREN: My remarks may be out of order, but since this question has been debated at some length I should like to relate a little story concerning the village of Eganville in Renfrew North, which I believe will indicate that some of the officials are not such fools as they would appear to be in the opinion of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

We can all remember how poultry was handled many years ago. The eggs were brought in by the farmer or the farmer's wife in a basket, assembled in the store and shipped without being graded or properly packed. A few years ago, however, a poultry pool was established in Eganville under the supervision of the poultry division of the Department of Agriculture. The Canadian Pacific Railway cooperated and furnished accommodation, but in the beginning the pool was very small. I remember that in the first year one young man took care of all the work, and even at that he was not kept too busy. Gradually, however, an improvement took place throughout that community with regard to poultry. Farmers found that it paid them to take proper care of their eggs; they discovered that they could make some money if they were paid for grade A eggs, and almost every farmer increased the number of his poultry. As a matter of fact, some of our farmers have gone into the business quite extensively; they have their poultry blood tested; they keep incubators, and ship thousands of baby chicks every spring. Some of the farmers will have perhaps two or three hundred laying hens, and they are profiting by this venture which was established under the supervision of these officials who have been termed fools. The farmer has discovered that if he wants to make any money out of poultry he must have his hens laying not only in the summer time but during the winter months as well, and that it no longer pays to bring in any kind of poultry not properly prepared for the market.

There are other benefits that have been obtained by the farmers. When eggs or poultry are graded by this young man, who was trained under the officials of this department, those grades must be accepted on any market: Montreal, Toronto or even the British market. If he grades poultry as No. 1, that poultry is No. 1 grade wherever it goes. That is one of the great advantages of a pool established on this basis. This organization has had a splendid record. This young man found it necessary to secure larger premises; this spring the pool moved into a larger building in that little village of Eganville, and he has found it necessary to obtain the assistance of three young women in order to carry on the work. Some little time ago I asked him if he would let me have a record of the business done last year compared with the business of the first year. I have not obtained that record as yet, but I am sure it must show an interesting story of the growth of this business. I know he told me that he has to get $30 in quarters every Saturday night in order to have sufficient change to take care of his business.

One day in this house I heard an hon. member call out, "What about eggs at eight and ten cents a dozen?" To-night I heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley mention sixteen and three-quarters cents as the average price for eggs last year in British Columbia. I take eggs to Eganville every week-end and have not received less than twenty cents a dozen for grade A. If they did not grade so high, I did not get so much. Those are the prices received during these spring months, but last fall and winter they were up to forty cents a dozen for a short time. A couple of years ago I was out to Vancouver on a hurried visit, having only a day or two to spend in that city. I called upon a friend of mine by the name of Jack Perrigo, who used to fix my binder for me when we were both young men. This man farmed later in Swift Current and then moved to Vancouver. He was anxious that I stay over another day because he wanted to take me up the Fraser valley. He painted such a golden picture of that district that I thought it must be the Garden of Eden, but I could not make the trip. From what the member from Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has said, I have come to the conclusion that it must be something like North Battleford. It was rather a coincidence, but when I was coming into the house to-night I got my mail and in it was a letter from my old friend, in which he states:

I am now living mostly all the time on my 400-acre farm in the Fraser Valley, and as dairy products are going up I am buying up 90 cows to milk as I have accommodation for this number in two large barns on the place. We fed 400 hogs this winter with very great success, and our marketings have been running about 60 per cent selects, up till a few weeks ago when we started shipping them a little lighter than before. We are shipping them now about 200 pounds live weight, and the last truckload of 28 hogs last week graded 23 selects, and five B-1's. The feed consisted of 75 per cent oats and 25 per cent barley with proper minerals, also some meat scraps. But as we have such great quantities of hay, which sells for such a small price, I have now decided to switch to dairy cows. I just mention the experiment we had with hogs to show what can be done with oats and which seems to be contrary to the general impression that they are of little value for hog feed.

I was very glad to have that letter and to know that in the Fraser valley there is at least one farmer who apparently is having great success.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish it to be distinctly on the record that the member for Fraser Valley has never yet apologized and never will apologize for the magnificent valley he represents. A little over a year ago I had the privilege of having the Minister of Agriculture visit my riding. Possibly if he had not visited the riding I would not be here to-day. I never have been and I never will be a yes-man. If I thought that my farmers were not getting what they were entitled to, I would be ready to say so. The fact that I am a supporter of the government does not mean that I will always agree with the government. Perhaps I know a little more about Canada than some hon. members because I have been in every province with the exception of Prince Edward Island. I have been in twenty-eight of the United States, and I know something of farming and pioneering conditions in different parts of the country. I claim that Chilliwack is the finest farming district in the dominion, even though I do not happen to live there myself.

I should like to take the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) along our main highway as far as the spa of Canada, Harrison Hot Springs, which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) paid us the honour of visiting a short time ago. I would be able to show him that 60 per cent of the farmers along that highway are the class of farmer that my friend mentioned. He did not mention the letterhead on that letter he just read, but I saw it. He was talking about a city farmer, a rose-bush farmer, a man who never had to make a living off the farm.

Mr. WARREN: At one time he did.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He may have at one time, but not to-day. I should like the hon. member for Renfrew North to show me a farmer in British Columbia with enough money to-day to go out and buy ninety cows. There is not a farmer in my riding with enough cash to do so, and I come from a good riding. I have something in my valley which the hon. member has not in his. I have a farmer who bought $1,000,000 worth of interest-free bonds in his own name, and $1,000,000 worth in the name of the company of which he is the president. That is the type of farmer about whom my hon. friend is talking. According to the letterhead, I imagine his friend is doing a very good business with the Department of Munitions and Supply. It is, however, a different proposition when one is really farming.

I can assure my hon. friend that I shall have nothing to say about the farmers in his riding because I know nothing about them. I have never been in his riding. I wish to tell him with all due respect that he has not the faintest knowledge about what he is talking in so far as the farmers of my riding are concerned. I have been compared with the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen). I think yesterday looked after the hon. member for North Battleford. I wish to tell the hon. member for Renfrew North that if he has no more sympathy for the downtrodden farmer than to commend the government for everything it does, whether it is right or wrong, the people of that riding will look after him in the same way as they looked after the hon. member for North Battleford on Monday.

I have asked for no sympathy from the hon. member for Renfrew North. I know what I am talking about when I speak about my riding. I shall be delighted to have him as my guest. I can show him a millionaire farmer who has his race horses, and another one who has carried on sugar-beet experiments at a possible loss of $40,000, for which I give him credit for experimenting. But he gets that money from oil and other stocks. I am speaking for the farmer who has not these things. I could show the hon. member for Renfrew North a farm in Fraser Valley which is renting for $5.15 an acre when the taxes are $4.88 an acre. He knows nothing of these conditions. Hon. members have never heard me deprecate the value of the minister's own province of Saskatchewan or its needs. I know nothing about wheat, and I know nothing about conditions in Renfrew North. But I do know about conditions in Fraser Valley. I know of one municipality of 5,500 people where the relief costs average $4,200 a month. I am told that there are corresponding municipalities in Ontario with an average relief cost of $27. It would bring about more harmony and unity from the agricultural point of view if some of these members from rural Ontario would come out for the farmer who is not getting a fair deal.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member for Renfrew North was critical of the hon. member for Fraser Valley for his reference to sixteen cents a dozen for eggs and stated that in Ontario he is receiving twenty cents for grade A large. He is fortunate in marketing his eggs in Ontario. In Alberta, grade A large eggs bring to the producers fifteen cents; grade A, medium, fourteen cents; grade B, twelve cents, and grade C, eight cents. Therefore I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley is correct in his argument that prices for eggs are to-day altogether too low; and while the government is considering minimum prices, they might as well extend their activities to poultry. May I ask if this estimate covers the branch which regulates the grading of eggs, or is that a provincial matter?

Mr. GARDINER: The last three or four speakers have insisted on discussing marketing. The marketing votes do not start until we get to item 22. If hon. members wish to discuss marketing, I wish they would let us reach the marketing items, when we shall have the officials here and be able to give them all the information they desire.

Mr. QUELCH: Does this item refer to blood-testing?

The CHAIRMAN: The details are given on page 65 of the estimates.

Mr. QUELCH: Page 65 refers to field men. What do they do? Do they supervise blood-testing of flocks for hatcheries? Is that a federal responsibility or provincial?

Mr. GARDINER: It is both federal and provincial, but much of that work is carried on by the provinces.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would the minister explain the item of $154,678 for prizes, bonuses and premiums?

Mr. GARDINER: These are prizes, bonuses and premiums for calf clubs, stallion clubs and clubs of that type existing across the country.

Mr. TUSTIN: Poultry clubs too?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; poultry clubs are included in that.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. RICKARD: Eggs would come under this item. Will the minister explain the new egg grading regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: That all comes under marketing. How you feed poultry to get good eggs comes under this item, but the grading and selling come under marketing.

Mr. WEIR: This is a production item which has to do with breeding better live stock, poultry and so forth. Having regard to what is going on in the old country and the possibility of destruction of some of their stock or the use for other purposes of their fine bred herds, have any steps been taken by the government or by private individuals to bring foundation stock of some of the better herds to this country since the war broke out?

Mr. GARDINER: There is some difficulty about bringing out cattle or live stock at present. I did visit a herd during this last week when I was returning from the calf sale of eighteen shorthorn cattle brought out from Scotland very recently. One of the difficulties in bringing out live stock is in establishing quarantine places at the shipping points. In this particular instance the man went ahead and arranged to bring out a certain number. The quarantine place was there at the time, and he managed to get one shipment through. That particular shipment was not of any great advantage to him in what he desired to do, because he was waiting to distribute them through a sale across this country and part of them to the United States. He desired to bring out still more, but in the meantime it had become impossible for him to get a proper quarantine place on the Clyde on account of conditions existing there. There are negotiations going on to try to overcome in some way these difficulties, but the war makes it very hard to get stock out without perhaps running into trouble because one might bring over to this country foot-and-mouth disease which would do more harm than any good he might get out of the shipments.

Mr. GRAYDON: In connection with foundation herds from the Channel islands, when the Germans occupied the islands a year ago this June or July most of the stock was taken over by the Germans, and the rumour is that it was slaughtered. Fortunately, however, a good percentage had been brought over to this country prior to the invasion, and we have in our constituency on the farm of B. H. Bull and sons a large proportion of the foundation herds of Jersey island. That perhaps may answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. GARDINER: I remember that the hon. member for Peel asked me a question in the early part of last session, and I must state that in reply I gave him information which was not entirely correct at that time, although we thought it was correct at the time. Two or three days later it was wrong. Arrangements apparently had been made to take out some of the best bred stock. My memory is that disease broke out and that it was impossible to move the cattle, and they were left there. What happened afterwards it is difficult to say. I imagine that some of them would be slaughtered, and probably disease took care of a good many of them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is the minister doing anything to check the sale of our pure-bred stock to other countries? In the last war, in November, 1917, the export of cattle was prohibited from Canada except to British possessions. After this war we shall have to build up our stock for Europe because their stocks are all slaughtered. The milk for Scotland all comes now from the northern part of Ireland.

Mr. GARDINER: We have done nothing yet to prevent the exportation of stock from Canada. While we are on production, I may say that it would appear that we still have very much more live stock of every kind than we had at the beginning of the war. Our production is up in all the different lines, and so far no great harm has come.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I had in mind that people from the south were coming over here, going through our herds and picking out our very best stock for shipment across the line.

An hon. MEMBER: They think they do.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): An hon. member says, "They think they do". We get a good price for them. We do not wish to discourage this practice altogether—but we should keep some in this country.

Item agreed to.

19. Production service. Plant products—seeds feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $521,642.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice it is proposed to spend $521,642 in connection with this item. I have here a large advertisement which has been used a good deal in the west. It reads:

Less wheat in 1941 will help win the war. See the secretary of your municipality, he can help you with your application. Published by authority of the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture.

Then there are small sheets bearing the words "Less wheat in 1941 will help win the war". Then there is a pink sheet on which appear these words:

Less wheat in 1941 will help win the war. We want hogs; we want butter; we want cheese; we want beef; we need feed. Why grow more wheat than you can sell?

This is also authorized by the dominion Department of Agriculture. As I pointed out, it is proposed under this vote to spend over half a million dollars for seeds, feeds and fertilizers. Would the minister be good enough to explain why on the one hand we are spending half a million dollars to produce more, while on the other hand we are spending large sums of money to discourage production. It seems to me that the minister might very well cut down this large appropriation.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the hon. member for Mackenzie is logical in his reasoning. The fact that you cut down wheat for one year does not necessarily mean that you are cutting down production. I do not think anyone would suggest that there is not enough seed wheat in Canada. One might, however, suggest that there are many other seeds of which we have not sufficient quantities. As a matter of fact, we did not have sufficient alfalfa seed, or seeds of any of the other grasses, to distribute throughout western Canada this year in connection with the acreage reduction plan. Much of the grass seed will have to be produced this summer, and seeded in the fall of the year, if farmers are going to take advantage of the proposal that they should have more grass next year than they had last year. All of this, of course, is related to the vote for plant products, including seeds, feeds, fertilizers and so forth.

We had difficulty in obtaining sufficient seed oats to seed the land taken out of wheat. We had difficulty in getting sufficient barley. The fact that to a certain extent we were shifting from wheat to other crops made all the more necessary the expenditure of money to provide seed, or to encourage the use of seed. But much of the work which has to be done in connection with seeds and fertilizers has to do with entirely different kinds of crops.

For example, when the war started, many of the seeds we were obtaining for gardening purposes were obtained from countries from which we can now get nothing. We are entirely barred from obtaining seeds of any kind from Holland, Belgium or other European countries. Much of the production of those seeds will have to be developed in this country. As a matter of fact, since the war started, there has been more reason for doing work in connection with seed development than there was before. The necessity for it is increasing all the time.

In so far as the advertisements held up to the view of the committee are concerned, I would suggest only this, that while we were discussing the wheat acreage bonus, the leader of the opposition asked me how much I thought would be required, and whether we would use the whole $35,000,000. I told him I did not like to prophesy, but I was not quite optimistic enough to think we would need the whole amount. I wish to say, however, that something induced the farmers to reduce their wheat acreage this year to a degree at least as great as I expected when we started the programme. After all, when one puts out posters and advertisements, he tries to put out something which will be effective. I suggest that something was effective in persuading the farmers to reduce their wheat acreage, when they cut it down to the extent to which it has been cut down.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the wet spring had something to do with the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: The wet spring might have helped. It is better to have providence with you than against you.

Mr. HAZEN: Why must the minister pay analysts' fees when he employs his own chemists? Why can they not do the work?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not sufficient analysts to make all tests required. Then, at times, tests have to be made quickly at places where departmental analysts are not available, and we find it less expensive to use local analysts than to send our men there to do the work.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the total amount paid to analysts, and are there many employed? If there are not too many, I should like to have their names, and the amounts paid to them.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry I have not the information in that form.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is done by the fertilizer branch? What are their duties?

Mr. GARDINER: They do inspection work. All inspection work to keep fertilizers up to a proper standard is done by this branch of the department. Of course certain work in connection with fertilizers is done by the provinces.

Mr. HATFIELD: Do they have anything to do with the regulation of prices?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not regulated the prices. However, when the war started, it was thought there would be some difficulty in handling fertilizers during the war period, in view of the fact that the war itself, through the manufacturing of munitions, interferes with certain of the ingredients contained in fertilizers. Some control has been taken over fertilizers by the war supply board, but it is not a matter of controlling prices.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why was the price of sulphate of ammonia, which forms a large part of fertilizers used in Canada, allowed to increase to the extent of $10 a ton, and why is it held by a monopoly in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: The department has received representations to the effect that the price of sulphate of ammonia has advanced substantially since the commencement of the war, and has referred the matter to the war-time prices and trade board for investigation as to whether or not present prices are justified. Those facts will no doubt be brought out by the investigation. Advance information indicates that, as claimed, the wholesale price of this product, bagged, has increased about $8 a ton. It is now selling at $36, as against $28 at the commencement of the war. The hon. member has said that there has been an increase of $10. The figure I have given may have been secured at a date different from the one he has used.

The reasons given for the advance in price is that manufacturing costs have increased, and the export demand is strong, at prices much higher than present domestic prices. That is the information I have. It has been submitted to the war-time prices and trade board, and we have not yet had their report.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many manufacturers of sulphate of ammonia are there in Canada? I understand that there are several manufacturers, because it is a by-product from coke ovens. I believe it can be bought only from one firm in Canada; why is that condition allowed?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to answer the first question. I understand that a number of firms sell sulphate of ammonia, but I have not the information as to the exact number; neither am I informed as to whether it is all sold through one company. I would have to take the hon. member's word for that.

Mr. PERLEY: I notice there is an item of $18,900 granted to the Canadian Seed Growers' association. Is that an annual grant, or is there any variation in the grant from year to year. There is an increase of $3,155 in the item. Would the minister explain the increase? What was the cost of the advertisement that appeared in the western papers urging farmers to grow less wheat to win the war, and out of what fund was it paid?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not checked it, but I presume it will be paid out of the amount voted by parliament.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the amount?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot say offhand. It would be for printing and the cost of sending out the advertisement. The information was sent to every person, and there are between 200,000 and 300,000 on the mailing list.

Mr. WEIR: This vote has to do with the administration of the Seeds Act, the Feeding Stuffs Act, the Fertilizers Act and the other matters mentioned, but it has no reference at all to the securing of seeds of any kind to seed acreage as suggested to the minister—oats, barley or anything else.

There is one other matter the minister might discuss—the interest taken in the production of fibre flax. I understand that the department has assumed control of the production of that product, and the committee would be interested to know to what degree it has been successful and what the efforts are in connection with it.

Mr. GARDINER: When the war started, there was considerable agitation to have the production of fibre flax increased, the reason being largely the experience which growers had during the last war. That experience indicated that if the control over seed for the growing of fibre flax was left free, the price would probably rise very high. It might get under the control of one or two individuals and be greatly increased. At the beginning of the war, the agricultural supplies board took control of all fibre flax seed in Canada and distributed that seed at a set price to Ireland and parts of England, retaining in Canada what they thought was sufficient to take care of the requirements of the farmers who would be growing fibre flax here. That seed has been distributed year by year to the different farmers at a set price. For No. 1 certified, it is $6 a bushel; No. 2 certified, $5.25; No. 1 uncertified, $4.25; No. 2 uncertified, $4. The order in council gives the information with regard to the matter, so far as the year 1940 is concerned. The number of production centres in Canada totals thirty-five, sixteen being located in Quebec, and nineteen in Ontario. In 1940 the acreage was 22,400, and it is expected that in 1941 it will be over 37,285 acres. The estimated acreage by provinces is: In Quebec 25,100; in Ontario, 9,985; in Manitoba, 2,000; in Alberta, 100; in British Columbia, 100. The total seed requirements for 1941, based on a bushel and a half an acre, amount to 57,000, for which sufficient seed is available, and the exports from the 1940 crop were 22,400 bushels, none of which was certified. Seed distribution was confined this year mainly to those who had facilities for processing the crop, and who applied first for seed. Seed of doubtful breeding was not purchased by the department because this would have meant ruin to the industry in its exports to Ireland. The varieties of fibre flax mainly grown in Canada are Cyrus, Liral, Dominion, Liral Crown, Liral Monarch, Gossamer and J. W. S.

Mr. WEIR: Does the government control production and designate where the fibre flax should be grown?

Mr. GARDINER: The department approves the area. It does not exactly pick out areas; but when individuals decide to go into the growing of fibre flax, the department investigates; if the soil and conditions generally are suitable, the areas are approved and the growers go ahead.

Mr. WEIR: Has the department control of all seed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. McCUBBIN: There is an item of $18,900 for the Canadian Seed Growers' association. What are the names of the members of the board?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount voted is the same from year to year, neither increased nor decreased. The association is spread across the country, but it would be difficult to give the names of all those engaged in the various organizations. Mr. Wiener is secretary at Ottawa of the Canadian Seed Growers' association.

Mr. McCUBBIN: Is there a board of directors?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a board of about twelve men, but I have not the names.

Mr. PERLEY: With regard to the increase of $3,155, the detail of which appears on page 67 of the estimates, this is apparently a new item under subsidies. Will the minister explain the subsidy item?

Mr. GARDINER: This amount is for assistance to junior grain clubs and is based on last year's records, which indicate that there were the following clubs:

	Clubs	Members
Nova Scotia	20	252
Ontario	108	1,863
Manitoba	139	1,471
Saskatchewan	264	3,600
Alberta	107	1,754
British Columbia	19	244

The reductions in the vote for 1940-41 eliminated the allotment of assistance to provinces conducting educational and field husbandry activities, and so forth. The allotments voted prior to this year were used as prizes for seed fairs and for similar purposes. Crop competitions, et cetera, and junior grain clubs benefited therefrom.

Mr. CARDIFF: I understand that sulphate of ammonia is a by-product of steel and coke. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand so.

Mr. CARDIFF: If that be so, one would think that since we are making and using twice as much steel since the war, this product should not have gone up in price to the extent of anywhere from $10 to $12 when there is twice the amount available.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether the hon. member was in his seat when we were dealing with this a few minutes ago. However, there is a piece of information here which I did not have before me then. Owing to munition requirements most of the ammonia produced in Canada for the manufacture of sulphate of ammonia is being diverted to the manufacture of explosives. Therefore it is possible that sulphate of ammonia may become scarce in the near future, and a reduction in its use for fertilizer may become necessary. I added that this whole question had been submitted to the war-time prices and trade board, but we have not yet had a report regarding it.

Mr. HATFIELD: I have not had an answer as to why the fertilizer manufacturers cannot buy sulphate of ammonia from the producers.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall have to give to my hon. friend the same answer as before; I do not really know. Probably, however, I can find out. The hon. member states that it can be purchased only from one concern, that there is a monopoly. I imagine that will be inquired into by the war-time prices and trade board.

Mr. HATFIELD: Are they investigating?

Mr. GARDINER: I should think they will be, with regard to price.

Item agreed to.

20. Production service. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $65,000.

Mr. SOPER: I think we are cutting down too much our grants to fairs and exhibitions. I realize that there is a war on, but fairs and exhibitions are the show-windows of the pure-bred live stock producer. They are just the same as the show-windows to the large department stores. This was never more impressed upon me than last fall when I started out to do a little purchasing and visited some pure-bred herds in eastern Ontario. In practically every place they gave as the reason for their stock not looking better that there was no show or fair at which to show their stock, and consequently their sales were down a great deal. It would be a big mistake in connection with our live stock industry to cut down on fairs and shows.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think the minister has been very fair so far as exhibitions are concerned, but I should like to corroborate what the hon. member for Lanark has said. On the Pacific coast we have developed a wonderful market for pure-bred high-grade stock, both cattle and horses, as far south as San Francisco. The minister has been very fair in the past, and irrespective of the war I think he and the department should take into consideration the future of live stock which is going to be in great demand in Canada. More consideration should be given particularly to class B fairs.

21. Production service. Grants to agricultural organizations, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $35,500.

Mr. PERLEY: Looking at the details on page 68 of the estimates, grants to agricultural organizations, I notice that $5,000 is granted to the Canadian council on boys' and girls' club work. How is that fund handled and distributed to the different clubs? Also, if I understand this aright, it is the junior calf clubs and so forth, and I am very much in favour of it, and would be in favour of increasing this grant, because a splendid work is being done. In my own province and district a number of these clubs are doing very good work, and the experimental farm at Indian Head provides for the meetings of this club and puts on short courses. Would the minister explain how this money is handled and distributed?

Mr. GARDINER: This $5,000 is the grant that is given to the central organization, of which Mr. McLaurin is secretary. The province contributes as well. Our proportion is $5,000; it is for the central administrative costs. The grants which go to groups that gather at exhibitions are contained in the $65,000 item just passed. That is one of the grants to fairs that we did not cut out; we believe that is an important part of the work and should continue right on through the war period.

Item agreed to.

22. Marketing service. Marketing service administration, $95,252.

Mr. HATFIELD: Under what board does the pegged minimum price on butter come?

Mr. GARDINER: Under the dairy products board.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why is there a provincial board for New Brunswick as well as the dominion board? They are both putting out regulations and prices.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a provincial board in New Brunswick, and I understand there is talk of trying to organize a board representative of the three maritime provinces, the idea being, as represented to me, that there is a peculiar situation in the maritime provinces in relation to different farm products, dairy produce being one. The situation is, I understand, that at certain times the price prevailing in the maritime provinces is the Montreal price plus the freight, and at other times under different conditions it becomes the Montreal price less the freight. Double the freight for that distance amounts to quite a margin. An effort is being made at the present time I believe, largely on account of the fact that dairy products are being marketed by the board in Great Britain; that is, we are simply making agreements with Great Britain and taking practically all the cheese for the time being out of Ontario and Quebec and sending it to Britain. Therefore there is a tendency for that to have some effect in the maritimes because they are not producing as much cheese as they consume; their cheese is not entering in any great volume into the export, and there is a situation that they wish to clear up for themselves. If they desire to set up a board, no doubt our board will try to cooperate with theirs in seeking to bring about proper conditions.

Mr. HATFIELD: Does the minimum price cover dairy products sold by a farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: The minimum price is set for creamery butter graded to certain grades, but the fact that there is a minimum price for creamery butter will have an effect on the price of dairy butter.

Mr. HATFIELD: Does a person building a cheese or butter factory have to have a permit from the department?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think a creamery operator has to have a permit. There are regulations with regard to marketing, but I do not think it is necessary to get a permit to start.

Mr. HATFIELD: The reason why I asked the question is this. A creamery company started to build a creamery near Fredericton a year ago. They were refused a permit by the department of agriculture of New Brunswick. They were buying cream and milk in that county and shipping it all the way to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to manufacture, and they were refused a permit to build a creamery in the town of Devon just across the river from Fredericton. Can a provincial department of agriculture refuse a permit to anyone to build a butter factory or a factory of any kind?

Mr. GARDINER: It would depend upon the provincial legislation. I am not sufficiently familiar with the laws of New Brunswick to say whether there is power to do that. While they have not had legislation in Saskatchewan, there was some indirect control over creameries due to the fact that they have the cooperatives which pretty well cover the province. For some time they did try to prevent the building of two creameries in one district, and they may have some similar regulations in New Brunswick. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have in my hand a copy of The People's Weekly, published in Edmonton, dated May 10, 1941, which contains a photograph of a number of apples headed "Government dumps unsold apples." Below this photograph I find this article:

> Growers not permitted to give them away in B.C.
> On April 16th last 5,000 boxes of tasty Delicious apples were taken from cold storage at Oliver, B.C., and dumped on the authority of the dominion government, which pays eighty per cent of the average price for the quantities which the grower cannot sell.

I checked up in the parliamentary library and found that one of the weekly newspapers published in the fruit district made reference to a similar article which appeared in the Vancouver press. It has not been categorically denied that this was done. Has the minister anything to say as to whether this is an accurate photograph of apples which were dumped and, if so, would he explain the policy under which that was done?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the article before me, and I do not know exactly to what it refers. I know that for the last two seasons we have had agreements, and that we are entering into another agreement this year, under which the government of Canada assists the apple growers on account of the fact that since the beginning of the war they have not been able to market their apples in Britain. In the first year of the war Britain did take some of our apples, but none have been exported since that time. The first year we canned some of the surplus; we dehydrated some, principally in Nova Scotia, and we entered into an arrangement with the apple growers of British Columbia whereby we agreed to pay them a certain price per box for any apples they had left the following March; and it was under that arrangement that some of the apples—I am not sure that the number stated is correct—had to be taken over by the federal government at the end of March of this year. I presume that is what is referred to in that article.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister complete the picture? This article goes on to say:

> Sponsored by the Vancouver board of trade, 72,000 apples were given away to school children last January. The gesture might well have been repeated.

The article also states:

> A resident of Oliver, in sending along the above picture of some of the dumped apples, states, "They are lovely apples, many of them wrapped, but they are not even allowed to give them away. The growers have not had 'apple money' for a long time."

Would the minister state whether or not those apples were thrown away?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that some apples were dumped out, but I can assure the hon. member that while a few of the apples in the boxes might have been good, they were not dumped out generally if they were fit for use. Some of the apples in the boxes might have been fit for consumption, but generally speaking any that were thrown out could not be used. As a matter of fact, the year before, we shipped a great many boxes of apples to the prairies, out of the quantity we had to take delivery of, and gave them away; and I am quite sure that if these apples had been good, they would have been given to somebody.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The article states that 5,000 boxes were dumped, and the photograph would indicate that a great many of those apples were in good condition. Many of the people on the prairies have not been able to buy apples for a long time, and apples have not been issued to people on relief.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what I am trying to say; I do not believe the article is exactly correct. They must have been poor apples, or they would have been shipped to somebody.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister say what quantity has been dumped? Apparently it was quite a large quantity.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: The contract is not completed yet, and we have not the final figures. Therefore I would not care even to try to guess at how many were unfit for use and were dumped.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As I understand it, the minister does not question the accuracy of this article—

Mr. GARDINER: I neither question it nor agree with it. I did not write the article, and consequently I do not know whether it is right or wrong.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In this connection I have a letter from one of my constituents which offers a suggestion in connection with getting rid of the wheat surplus:

> I happen to be the local attendance officer for this school district. By the teacher's report there were three children kept home during the month because their parents had no flour to bake bread for their lunches.

What applies to flour certainly would apply to fruit. I have before me a copy of "Farmers in a Changing World," the year book for 1940 of the United States department of agriculture. Has the minister given consideration to anything similar to the stamp plan in the United States which, under the direction of Milo Perkins, has been used to dispose of a number of surplus commodities? This article states:

> Millions of low income people would eat more of these surpluses if they had the chance. The stamp plan is designed to give some of them that chance. It kills four birds with one stone. (1) The farmer sells the so-called surplus through (2) the grocer, who thereby increases his business, to (3) low income families, whose health is bettered by eating these foods; and finally (4) the nation gains all around through partially solving an acute economic problem and lifting the standards of health at the point where they are usually lowest.

Has the minister given consideration to a plan of that kind in order to dispose of a considerable quantity of our surplus wheat and fruit, in view of the fact that we are not likely to be able to sell large quantities of Canadian fruit in the European markets for the next few years?

Mr. HATFIELD: And potatoes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and potatoes, because last winter there were parts of Canada without adequate supplies of potatoes.

Mr. GARDINER: We have gone very much further than giving consideration to it. I hope my hon. friend knows that this government combined with the provincial governments to do that very thing some time ago. A great deal of the fruit given away was gathered up in the eastern part of Canada and British Columbia and shipped to the prairies for distribution. We did that not only with fruit but also with fish, cheese and many other products. Then I think it was only two years ago that we bought up the extra butter in the months of June and July and gave it to people in cities right across Canada. As a matter of fact, the plan which has been followed in the United States has been adapted to the needs of this country. We have not the large centres of population they have in the United States, and therefore could not follow exactly the plan they have followed; but as a government we have bought up food and given it to people who otherwise could not have obtained it. We have bought fruits and vegetables of different kinds and shipped them into some of the very areas from which letters such as the one read by my hon. friend might have come.

Mr. HATFIELD: But not under the stamp plan.

Mr. GARDINER: Under a similar plan. All the stamp plan means is that these people go on to the market when they think the price is too low and buy up the surplus, which is delivered by means of stamps to unemployed people in the cities. We did not use stamps, but we gave them certificates which they could take and get butter with. It was much the same principle.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I at this moment ask the Prime Minister if he will tell the house definitely what new legislation is proposed at this session. On the order paper there is a bill standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and a government notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Somewhere in Votes and Proceedings I think I saw notice of two bills of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). That makes four bills. Are there to be any more?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend has mentioned all the bills that are intended to be brought down this session. May I say to him that I should be very much surprised if any of them proves the least contentious. They are quite short, and to meet situations that have developed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If they are not contentious we shall be glad to advance them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that they are not. There may be one or two supplementary estimates, but they also will be small.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

EXTENSION TO FARMERS WHO MOVE FROM TOWNSHIP AT END OF CROP SEASON

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DOMINION NOTES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since the repeal of chapter 70 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, by chapter 35 of 1934, are there any more securities upon the pledge of which dominion notes are issued?

2. Are the dominion notes issued by the Bank of Canada?

3. Did the Minister of Finance transfer the securities which are the pledge of dominion notes?

4. If so, did he transfer them to the Bank of Canada, for what reason, when and by what authority?

5. Were they again transferred by the Bank of Canada to the foreign exchange control board?

6. If so, why, when and by what authority?

7. Who holds these securities now and what are they?

8. Was there any issue of dominion notes by the Bank of Canada since the securities above referred to were transferred to the foreign exchange control board? If so, how many and for what total amount?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2. No.

3 and 4. As at the close of business on March 10, 1935, dominion notes were outstanding in the amount of $220,295,439.44, issued under the following authorities—

Dominion Notes Act..	$159,455,439 44
Finance Act.....	34,840,000 00
Chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915.....	26,000,000 00
	$220,295,439 44

The Dominion Notes Act as amended by chapter 34 of the statutes of 1934 required that the Minister of Finance hold a reserve in gold of 25 per cent against the first $120,000,000 of dominion notes issued and a reserve in gold of 100 per cent against dominion notes issued in excess of $120,000,000. Chapter 34 of the statutes of 1934 also provided that as additional security for the redemption of dominion notes "the minister may hold silver to an amount to be purchased from time to time under the provisions of the International Agreement dated at London the twenty-second day of July, 1933 . . ."

The Finance Act authorized the Minister of Finance to advance to any chartered bank or to any bank incorporated under the Quebec Savings Banks Act, dominion notes to any amount on the pledge of approved securities deposited with the Minister of Finance subject to regulations made by the treasury board. These advances bore interest and no gold was required to be held as security against dominion notes so advanced.

Chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915 ratified certain orders-in-council under which there had been issued dominion notes to the amount of $26,000,000, unsecured by gold but partly secured by the deposit of $16,000,000 of railway securities guaranteed by the government of Canada.

As at March 11, 1935, the date on which the Bank of Canada commenced operations, the advances obtained under the Finance Act by the chartered banks and the banks incorporated under the Quebec Savings Banks Act were repaid by these banks by the handing over of dominion notes to the Minister of Finance, and at the same time the securities pledged with the Minister of Finance by these banks as collateral for the advances were returned to them. With the repayment in this way of $34,840,000 in dominion notes, the amount of such notes outstanding was reduced to $185,455,439.44. Under the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada assumed responsibility for this amount of dominion notes outstanding. As consideration for the assumption of this liability, the dominion transferred to the Bank of Canada, under the authority of section 25(3) of the Bank of Canada Act, gold in the amount of $69,455,439.44, silver bullion in the amount of $986,363.18, and Dominion of Canada 3 per cent bonds due March 1, 1940, in the amount of $115,013,636.82. These assets turned over to the Bank of Canada were not required to be specifically held against the liability for Bank of Canada notes issued. Section 26 of the Bank of Canada Act sets out the reserve required to be held by the Bank of Canada as security against its outstanding notes and deposit liabilities and section 41 provides that in the event of winding up, the notes of the bank shall be the first charge upon all the assets of the bank.

The railway securities held by the dominion as security for dominion notes issued under chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915 are still held by the Minister of Finance.

5 and 6. Under the authority of order in council P.C. 1735, dated April 30, 1940 (the foreign exchange acquisition order, 1940), resident holders of foreign exchange, including the Bank of Canada, were required to sell their holdings of foreign exchange to the foreign exchange control board. Under the authority of order in council P.C. 1734, dated April 30, 1940 (the exchange fund order, 1940), the foreign exchange control board purchased from the Bank of Canada all gold held in unrestricted ownership by the Bank of Canada at the current market price. In accordance with the terms of these two orders, the Bank of Canada sold to the foreign exchange control board on May 1, 1940, foreign exchange to the Canadian dollar value of $27,734,444 and 5,888,565 fine ounces of gold, the current market value of which in Canadian funds was $225,772,887. To enable the foreign exchange control board to purchase the gold and foreign exchange from the Bank of Canada and the foreign exchange from other Canadian residents, the exchange fund set up by the Exchange Fund Act, chapter 60 of the statutes of 1935 was increased in the amount of approximately $325,000,000 by the sale to the Bank of Canada of $250,000,000 principal amount of one-year 1 per cent notes and of $75,000,000 principal amount of treasury bills, the proceeds of which were credited to the exchange fund. The exchange fund order 1940 furthermore provided that the bank's gold and foreign exchange reserve against outstanding notes and liabilities should be discontinued. The effect of these two orders in council is that in place of gold the Bank of Canada holds dominion securities, and the total gold reserves of the country are centralized in the foreign exchange control board, which under war-time conditions is responsible for transactions arising out of the balance of payments between Canada and other countries.

7. In the answer to questions 3 and 4 it was pointed out that securities pledged by banks under the Finance Act had been returned to the banks in question, and that securities pledged under the orders in council ratified by chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915 are still held by the Minister of Finance. In the answer to questions 5 and 6 it was pointed out that no securities are specifically held by the Bank of Canada against notes outstanding but that such notes are a first charge on all the assets of the bank. It is also noted in the answer to questions 5 and 6 that the Bank of Canada has transferred all its former holdings of gold to the foreign exchange control board and holds in exchange therefor dominion government securities. Weekly and monthly statements of the Bank of Canada published in the Canada Gazette show as of the date of the statements the amount of the assets and liabilities of the bank under various classifications. In regard to the gold so transferred by the Bank of Canada to the foreign exchange control board, it is pointed out that the operations of the exchange fund are, in accordance with the provisions of the exchange fund, not made public but are subject to audit by the auditor general.

8. No, but the Bank of Canada from time to time issues notes under the authority of the Bank of Canada Act. The weekly and monthly statements of assets and liabilities of the Bank of Canada, published in the Canada Gazette, show the amount of Bank of Canada notes outstanding as of the date of the statements.

ADDRESS OF FRENCH CONSUL-GENERAL IN MONTREAL ON TUNISIA

Mr. CHURCH:

Has the attention of the government been called to an address delivered at Montreal in March, 1941, by the consul-general of the French government, on Tunisia, and containing comments reflecting on the United Kingdom and her allies, and the conduct of the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question was answered on Monday last.

PURCHASE OF RIFLE RANGE SITE NEAR SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. From what person or persons did the government purchase property near Sydney, Nova Scotia, to be used for the purpose of a rifle range?

2. What was the acreage purchased from each person?

3. What was the total purchase price paid to each such person?

4. Was any agent employed in connection with such purchase, and, if so, what was his name?

5. What commission, fee or other remuneration, if any, was paid to him?

Mr. RALSTON:

1, 2 and 3.

From whom purchased	Area in acres	Total amount paid

Annie Gaudet	0·04	1.00
G. G. Cossitt, ¼ interest in 64·1 and right of way		131.00
Dominion Steel & Coal Corporation, ½ interest in 65·0		243.75
Henry Duffell	16·1	128.80

Note.—The total acreage to be acquired is 450 acres. The above shows the areas to which title has been obtained to date.

4. Mr. Colin Mackenzie, K.C., Sydney, N.S., agent of the Department of Justice.

5. None to date. The remuneration will be fixed by the Department of Justice.

CANADIAN GUARANTEES OF UNITED STATES LOANS TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Since the adoption of the lease-lend bill in the United States, has the Dominion of Canada guaranteed any United States loan to (a) Great Britain; (b) Poland; (c) any other country?

2. If so, when, and to what extent in each case?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR-TIME HOUSING

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What salary is being paid to Victor T. Goggin, general manager, Wartime Housing Limited?

2. What is the cost of office equipment purchased by Wartime Housing Limited?

3. What firm or firms of architects have been engaged by this concern?

4. What are they being paid for services rendered?

5. How many housing units were completed up to May 1, 1941?

6. How many housing units were under construction on the above date?

7. In what cities are houses being built by Wartime Housing Limited?

8. Are any members of the staff of the national housing department employed by Wartime Housing? If so, how many?

9. Were members of the staff of national housing moved to Toronto and later brought back to Ottawa? If so, for what reason?

10. What will be the cost, when completed, of the three staff houses being built in Hamilton?

PROVINCIAL PROPERTIES OFFERED TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT FOR WAR PURPOSES

Mr. CHURCH:

What provincial properties have been offered to the government, for use in this war, by the various provinces, (a) rent free; (b) paid for?

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INFORMATION

2. How many press liaison officers or officials including those attached to his majesty's forces, are there employed by the government, and (a) to what departments are they attached; (b) what are their salaries and other allowances; (c) what duties do they perform; (d) who instructs them; (e) under what parliamentary vote are they paid; (f) what were their previous occupations?

3. Are there any such officials in the naval service?

4. If so, (a) who are they; (b) what press articles have they written; (c) what has been paid for such articles, and to whom; (d) what was the total cost?

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES IN AND FOR YUKON TERRITORY

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Yukon Act to provide for the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in and for the Yukon Territory.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD FOR BRITAIN

PRESS REPORT AS TO APPEAL OF LORD WOOLTON TO UNITED STATES—VOLUNTARY CREAMLESS DAYS —COMMANDEERING OF CHEESE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

In view of the appeal made by Lord Woolton, head of the British food control, to the housewives of the United States to inaugurate a "creamless day" in order that it may be made possible to use the milk thereby saved for the manufacture of milk powder which is urgently needed in Great Britain, and also in view of the item in the New York Daily News with the heading "No Creamless Days in Canada", would the minister advise the house and the country if it is the government's intention to do anything with regard to this matter?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to give me an intimation of the fact that he intended to ask this question, and I have prepared the following answer:

We have had no information with regard to Lord Woolton's appeal to the American people other than what has appeared in the press.

It has been intimated to us from Britain that they would like us to turn all the milk possible into cheese and supply it to Britain.

The price of 14·4 cents on boat at Montreal offered by Britain is all that they can be expected to pay, as it is on a parity with what they are paying New Zealand. The Canadian government is, therefore, paying 1·6 cents above that price in addition to one cent premium on 93 score cheese and two cents on 94 score cheese. The Ontario and Quebec governments are adding as much as two cents a pound. Under these provisions the Canadian people are paying from 4·6 to 5·6 cents a pound in addition to the 14·4 cents which Britain is paying on practically all the cheese going to Great Britain, or about one-quarter of the return to the producer. This is being done to assure that this year and next the highest possible production of cheese will be made available to the British people.

To make doubly sure that the additional production thus secured will go to Britain the dairy board commandeered all cheese coming on the market from May 26 forward until further notice in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec where 93 per cent of all the cheese is made.

It will thus be seen that although we have not adopted the plan suggested in the United States we have met the appeal of Britain in the manner suggested. This fact has had the widest publicity and I am sure the method adopted is accepted by the British government as the best possible way of providing the greatest possible quantity of Canadian dairy products to Britain.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) whether he will supplement the statement he has just made as Minister of Agriculture in reply to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) in reference to the article by Mr. Shapiro? Was it authorized by his department, and did it pass the censorship?

Mr. GARDINER: The article was not authorized by the department. As a matter of fact I had neither seen nor heard of it until it appeared in, I believe, the Montreal Gazette.

ATTACK AGAINST THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

PROTEST AGAINST DISTRIBUTION THROUGH THE MAILS OF A PAMPHLET WRITTEN BY REV. T. T. SHIELDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I direct the government's attention to a pamphlet distributed to our population through his majesty's mails. This brochure sheds ridicule, insult and contempt on Christianism, the defence and liberty of which constitute one of the war aims of the allies. The author of this tract reviles with impunity the religion revered by over four million Canadians. While the Vatican is the target of axis newspapers, here, in Canada, an enemy of national unity and of the Victory loan is vomiting insults on Christianism and the august person of His Holiness Pope Pius XII.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. gentleman is drawing the attention of the house to something which has been published. He can do so without making any argument about it.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the government may, under the National Defence Regulations and through the censorship services, prohibit and suppress this subversive publication entitled "Pourquoi je ne suis pas catholique romain", and written by Dr. T. T. Shields. I beg to lay on the table the pamphlet entitled "Pourquoi je ne suis pas catholique romain". I request that immediate, proper and decisive action be taken in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. gentleman desires to lay a paper on the table of the house. In my opinion, he cannot do so. He can call attention to the document for the purpose of drawing it to the notice of the house, but without any argument.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ADDITIONAL DIVERSIONS AT NIAGARA FALLS—PROCEDURE IN INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question. In Votes and Proceedings of May 29 are recorded the notes of Canada and the United States with reference to the additional diversions of water at Niagara Falls. The last sentence of the United States note reads:

> If the foregoing is acceptable to the government of Canada this note and your reply thereto, when approved by the senate, shall be regarded as placing on record the understanding arrived at between the two governments concerning this matter.

Apparently the United States senate will have something to say as to the acceptance of the notes. Now, here is one sentence from the Canadian note:

> I have the honour to inform you that the government of Canada concurs in the arrangements set forth in your note. . . .

Are we to understand from the Canadian note that this parliament has no voice in this matter, which is so vital to Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, there is a somewhat different procedure followed in the United States from that which is followed in Canada, and for that matter in the United Kingdom, with respect to some international agreements. I assume that the reference to the senate in the United States note is due to that difference of procedure. This parliament remains a free parliament, and any matter which is of concern to its members can be discussed at any appropriate time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can be what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can be discussed at any appropriate time.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall bring it up when we go into estimates, then.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): What I think is intended by the hon. member is this. The government has agreed, by executive action and not by referring the matter to parliament, to a further diversion of the water of Niagara falls. If I understand him correctly, the hon. member objects to that proceeding, holding that before it becomes final, even for a limited period of time, the matter should be referred to parliament. I think he has taken a very proper stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be something in what my hon. friend has said. I shall look into it carefully.

ALBERTA NATURAL RESOURCES

AGREEMENT RESPECTING POWER DEVELOPMENT FOR WAR PURPOSES AFFECTING WATERS IN BANFF NATIONAL PARK

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 60, to amend the Alberta Natural Resources Act.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Before this motion is carried I would ask the minister to make a more extended statement. Perhaps he will do it in committee and thus save time. Hon. members will recall that when the bill received its first reading on April 7 a brief explanation was given, not more than is contained in the explanatory note. Will the minister be good enough to give a review of the whole position? The matter is an important one.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, when you put the question I was on my feet to make just the sort of statement which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has quite properly asked for.

It is quite true, as the leader of the opposition has remarked, that the provisions of this measure are somewhat unusual. I shall deal with that presently. It might be of interest to the house, however, if I gave a brief history of the development of the Banff national park and the conditions leading up to the proposals embodied in this bill.

The mineral springs that led to the setting aside of the Banff area were first discovered in 1883. In 1885 the government of the day passed an order in council setting aside ten square miles around these mineral springs. In 1887 the Rocky Mountains Park Act was passed, and at the same time the area in what is now the Banff park was increased to 260 square miles. In 1902 the act was amended increasing the area to 4,400 square miles. By order in council, in July 1892, under the Dominion Lands Act—another act altogether—the lake Louise area of 51 square miles was set aside as a forest park. The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act in 1911 repealed the Rocky Mountains Park Act. If hon. gentlemen will give their attention to this they will get the sequence of the story right through. The act passed in 1911 provided that "the governor in council may from time to time, by proclamation, designate such reserves or areas within forest reserves, as he sees fit, to be known as dominion parks." At the same time the park area was reduced to 1,800 square miles. In 1917 by order in council the area was again increased to 2,751 square miles, and in 1929 a further 103 square miles were added to it.

In 1930 the natural resources of the prairie provinces were transferred to those provinces. Prior to that they had been held in the right of the crown in the federal government and administered by the federal government. In the same year the National Parks Act was passed by parliament, giving more direct control over park areas, and the name Rocky Mountains park, which up to that date had described what is now the Banff park, was changed to the Banff National Park. I might say in passing that the effect of the National Parks Act was to vest more authority in parliament than had theretofore been the case, in this particular, that no park could be created anywhere in Canada without an act of parliament, nor could the boundaries of a park be either increased or reduced without an act amending the act creating the park.

I wish now to deal briefly with the hydro power development in this particular area. About 1909 or a little earlier the Calgary Power Company was incorporated, and in 1909 it developed on the Bow river, at what was known as the Horseshoe falls, a hydro plant having a capacity of 20,000 horse-power.

Mr. MacNICOL: How far is that from the site from Banff?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not sure, probably thirty or forty miles. In 1912 the Kananaskis power plant at another point on the Bow river, was developed to a capacity of 12,000 horse-power.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is that?

Mr. CRERAR: That is not very far from the Horseshoe falls. Again, in 1929, a further plant was developed, known as the Ghost River power plant, with 36,000 horse-power capacity. All these power plants are some considerable distance outside the present park boundaries.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the Ghost River plant east or south of the junction of the two branches of the Ghost river?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say at the moment, but I believe it is close to the junction of the Ghost river with the Bow river.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the total combined development of all these plants?

Mr. CRERAR: There is a development of 20,000 at the Horseshoe falls, 12,000 at Kananaskis and 36,000 estimated at the Ghost river.

In 1912 the power company made an application to secure the right to create a storage reservoir in lake Minnewanka. Lake Minnewanka lies up in the hills from the Banff townsite. I have no doubt that in the past many hon. members have visited that beautiful lake. In 1912 the company secured from the federal government the right to build a 12-foot dam which raised the level of the lake from a minimum of 4,763 feet above sea level to 4,775 feet, and by so doing gave 44,000 acre feet of storage. The lake level, under the agreement that resulted from the application, was to be maintained between the datum figures I have given—4,763 and 4,775.

Mr. MacNICOL: If you are going to maintain a datum it would be the higher figure.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, between those two levels, because the problem of the power company lay in the supply of water during the winter months. During the summer the flow down the Bow river was sufficient to enable the company to utilize its plants in a satisfactory way, but with the coming of winter the flow decreased and resulted in the company being unable to utilize its plants to their capacity.

Mr. MacNICOL: From the outlet of the dam is there any power developed between lake Minnewanka and the juncture of the Cascade river with the Bow?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall come to that in a moment. I should prefer to answer questions in the committee stage.

Since 1912 the Calgary Power company have on several occasions made application to secure more water from within the park area. Applications for storage and power privileges have been steadily refused by all governments down to the present time. It will be recalled by some hon. members, at any rate those from western Canada who are familiar with the matter, that between 1922 and 1930 there was considerable agitation over an application that the company had made to secure the right to put certain works on what were known as the Spray lakes, which were within the park area. The view was generally held in western Canada, and indeed in eastern Canada as well, that since the national parks were created as national playgrounds no industrial development should be permitted within the parks which would detract from their beauty and the purpose for which they were created. At the same time it was recognized that the power company required additional water. As a result of the discussions that took place at the time the resources were transferred to Alberta, the Spray lakes area was taken out of the park altogether. Then it became a matter for the Alberta government to deal with the power company in the disposition of the water from the Spray lakes. Nothing further was done, though I believe the company made application for and secured from the Alberta government the right to develop, but of that I am not sure at the moment. At any rate nothing further was done so far as the Spray lakes development was concerned. That is the history of the power development down to last autumn.

I come now to another phase of the story. Last November the Department of Munitions and Supply reached the conclusion, after a close study of the facts, that it was very necessary to set up an ammonium nitrate plant at Calgary. I am not familiar with the requirements of an ammonium nitrate plant, but natural gas, of which there is a large quantity in that particular area in Alberta, is a necessary material entering into the production of the nitrates that the plant is intended to produce.

There arose then the question of power. The Calgary Power company were approached and they stated that they were not in a position to guarantee the amount of power that would be required by the new plant. The amount was estimated by the engineers of the Department of Munitions and Supply, or of the government-created company, Allied War Supplies Corporation, at 23,000 horsepower. What was needed was a dependable supply of power to the amount of 23,000 horse-power. Consequently the Department of Mines and Resources was approached by the Department of Munitions and Supply, or rather by the company, first to inquire if we would agree to the erection of storage facilities at lake Minnewanka that would provide not only the necessary supply of water during the winter months but also for a new power plant to be built near Anthracite close to the lake which would produce the power required for the chemical plant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that the only available source of supply, or was it just a question of convenience?

Mr. CRERAR: The question of alternative power was raised by me with the Department of Munitions and Supply. I pointed out that the company could develop the Spray lakes area.

Mr. MacNICOL: And had not done it.

Mr. CRERAR: And so far had not done so. Secondly, that failing the Spray lakes area there was the possibility of developing power for this new plant by steam turbine methods I urged the arguments that had been made previously many times against changing the park area. I received in reply a letter from the Minister of Munitions and Supply which I shall presently read. The suggestions I had made were, first, that the Spray lakes development might supply the necessary power, and second, that if that were not available, steam turbine methods should be examined.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is having regard to the presence of Alberta coal?

Mr. CRERAR: That point was urged, having regard to the abundance of Alberta coal. In the letter I received from the Minister of Munitions and Supply it was stated, and I am sure it is a fact, that the Spray lakes development would take at least two years to complete before the additional energy from such development would be available. On the question of urgency, after full consideration of the facts it was agreed that that argument was tenable and sound There was then the question of turbine development.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister have engineering reports on the other point?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I have not engineering reports, but as a matter of fact it would take at least two years to develop the Spray lakes, because there would be required not only the works in the way of dams but also a very considerable tunnel for the diversion of water.

In regard to steam turbine equipment, such equipment is not made in Canada. It would have to be secured either from Great Britain or from the United States. Inquiry was made by the officials of the Department of Mines and Resources as to the length of time which might be required to procure this equipment. It could have been procured from Great Britain in about twelve months, if everything had worked out favourably, but there was the possibility that the plants manufacturing steam turbine equipment might be bombed, with consequent delay in the delivery of the equipment, together with the even greater risk of the equipment being lost through enemy action while in transit from Britain to Canada. So far as United States sources of supply were concerned, it was ascertained that no guarantee could be obtained in that country that the equipment would be delivered within two years. Those are the points I wished to emphasize. On November 15 my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply wrote me in reply to my letter in which I had set out the alternatives of steam turbine development and the Spray lakes development. The letter was as follows:

I have your letter of the 13th instant. The ammonia plant of the Alberta Nitrogen Company is scheduled to go into operation by the first of September next, and it is of the utmost importance to our war effort that the plant be assured of an adequate power supply from that date on. To be assured of power, a development must be made, and none of the possible alternatives to the lake Minnewanka development would afford this assurance. The Spray Lakes site is difficult of access and involves the construction of a high dam and a two mile tunnel. It could not be built in less than two years. It is a much larger project than is required, and the company is not in a position to undertake it.

As regards a steam power station, the plants manufacturing steam turbines are congested with orders, and deliveries are long and uncertain. Even if priorities adequate for the purpose could be obtained, they would be subject to the control of other governments, and, therefore, hazardous. Turbines from Britain would be subject to conditions in Britain and shipping risks. I am informed that in Edmonton, where coal is exceedingly cheap, the cost of steam power is far in excess of the price which the power company is quoting to the Allied War Supplies Corporation under the contract, and that the price of coal in Calgary would be substantially more than in Edmonton, with the consequent increased cost of power. As a result, and after investigation, the Allied War Supplies Corporation decided that the economic and feasible thing to do was to contract with the company. Furthermore, the power company is unwilling, under all the circumstances, to invest in a steam plant, and, if steam were selected, the dominion government would be faced with the financing of the construction and would have an uneconomical plant left on its hands after the war.

The lake Minnewanka development is simple to construct. No coffer damming or unwatering is required, and the site is accessible by good roads. The machinery would all be manufactured in Canada, and the promises of deliveries are such that the plant could be completed in time even without priorities, and, in any event, would be subject to our right to order priorities.

I am informed by the company that even at this late date, by putting temporary cribbing on the existing dam and by deepening the power canal, sufficient additional water can be made available to meet the requirements of the ammonia plant in the first season of operations.

With respect to the suggestion of scenery, there seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether or not the scenery would be improved.

With respect to the small government hydro plant, compensation will, of course, have to be paid for this.

With respect to the methods of granting the licence, it can, of course, be granted under the War Measures Act, but because of the amount of money involved the company has stipulated for an act of parliament. I see no reason why the licence cannot be granted under the War Measures Act and the necessary legislation passed at this session, but if for any reason this is considered objectionable, I have no doubt the company would be prepared to accept the assurance of the government that the act would be passed. Whichever method is adopted, it is essential that work be started immediately, and work cannot be started until the assurance of a licence is given to the company.

Yours faithfully,

C. D. Howe.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assume the company want some permanency.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, quite. I understand this involves an investment by the company of something like two and a quarter million dollars. The government of Alberta were consulted, because in a matter of this kind where water is stored and flows out of storage down a stream into areas that are under the control of a provincial government, it was felt that this should be done by amending the transfer agreement. There was also the proposal by the company that an arrangement be made with the government of Alberta to divert some of the water from the Ghost river, which is not within the park area, through the park into lake Minnewanka, by means of a canal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is part of the whole scheme, is it not?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But Alberta had a proprietary interest.

Mr. CRERAR: As a federal government we were not interested in that, of course; but the Alberta government were consulted, and in a telegram to myself as Minister of Mines and Resources, dated December 5, they said:

We received a copy of recent application of Calgary Power Company to develop lake Minnewanka in Banff national park. This province is anxious for development of power to aid industrializing our province and to do our utmost in contributing to the war effort. So far as may be required this government consent is hereby given to the granting of above application and to any modifications or alterations as may be agreed to be necessary or advisable.

So that the Alberta government placed itself squarely behind the proposal. By this time the adjournment of the house had taken place, and the problem arose as to how to proceed in order to get this done without delay. I should say that the question was very carefully considered by the government as a whole, and it was only the urgent necessity of securing a dependable supply of power which would enable this chemical plant to get into operation at the earliest possible day, and ensure its continuance in operation, that led the government to the decision that the storage reservoir at lake Minnewanka should be proceeded with.

Before proceeding with the matter we inquired of the Department of Justice, the government's legal advisers, as to the propriety of authorizing the company to proceed with this work by order in council under the War Measures Act. I should like to quote the opinion given by the Department of Justice on this point:

As the proposed project is, on the representations made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, clearly required for war purposes, I am of opinion that it would be competent to the governor in council, under and by virtue of the powers conferred by the War Measures Act, to grant your minister authority to permit the company to commence the construction of the works contemplated by its application upon the terms and conditions proposed.

On that opinion an order in council was passed, but it contained a provision that it would be subject to ratification by parliament; and the bill we are now considering proposes to give that ratification.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is P.C. 1983?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Accordingly arrangements were made to grant the company interim permission under authority given by this order in council and, as I said a moment ago, with the provision that it had to be approved by parliament. The licence has all the safeguards provided for under the regulations of the general Dominion Water Power Act. That act is of long standing, and the regulations under it are those which have governed power development throughout the country for a great many years.

In addition the licence contains special provisions designed to protect the natural beauty of the park. In the main these may be summarized as follows: In carrying out the proposal, the level of the lake will be raised from 4,775 feet, the present maximum, to a maximum of 4,840, or a total of 65 feet. It is estimated that not more than 30 feet of water will be drawn off the reservoir during the winter months at any time, to ensure the full supply of water necessary for the operation of these plants. So that the minimum low level is raised about 35 feet from its present maximum.

In doing that a very considerable area is bound to be flooded. The provisions of the licence, I believe, are ample to ensure that the work done by the company in clearing around the present shores of the lake shall be carried on in such a way as to detract as little as possible from the natural beauty of the lake. Consequently the licence contains definite provisions for clearing and close cutting of timber, and the taking out of the stumps on the part of the shore which might be subject to flooding or wave action. This is all being done to the satisfaction of the minister of the department.

In addition the company agrees to the release of sufficient water at any time the park authorities may require it for any purpose. It is anticipated that this will be required only for possible fire fighting purposes. In addition the company agrees to the construction at its cost of new roads, trails, wharves and so on, to replace those flooded or damaged, including a new road across the dam, and following the water conduit down to Anthracite, where the power plant will be established. The proposal is that a new power plant will be built. The licence provides that it has to be to a design satisfactory to the park authorities or to the minister.

The canal which will be made to carry the water to the new power plant will be constructed in a manner satisfactory to the parks authorities and to the minister, and in accordance with the dominion water power regulations. The dam itself will be of earthen construction. It will be very substantial, since, as I said a moment ago, the purpose is to raise the maximum level of the lake by at least 65 feet. The company agrees to provide a proper road across the top of the dam and down to Anthracite, perhaps a mile and a half or so, where it will connect with the road from Calgary to Banff, and to maintain these works in a way which will detract as little as possible from the scenic value—and if possible, in time, when trees and shrubs are planted, increase the scenic value.

To ensure that these works are carried out in accordance with the provisions of the licence the department has retained the services of Doctor Thomas Hogg, chairman of the Ontario hydro commission, to act in a consulting capacity. We have also retained the services of a landscape architect who is to study the effect of the proposed works on the scenic value. The company agrees to pay the expenses and remuneration of both these consultants.

If all the terms and conditions of the interim licence are complied with the company will be entitled to receive a final licence containing the following principal conditions: The right to raise the level of the lake to the points I mentioned a moment ago, that is, above mean sea level, and to store a maximum of 200,000 acre-feet of water, the level of storage to be the economic maximum as fixed by the minister; and the right to use all stored water, subject to the maintenance of the required flow in the Cascade river. The period of the licence is to be for fifty years from the date of completion of the authorized works, the rental for storage and power rights during the twenty years following the date of completion of the works to be the same as under the interim licence. I shall give further details with respect to that in a moment.

This is subject to revision after twenty years, and every ten years thereafter. That is, for twenty years the rental for storage and water paid by the company is fixed. After that it comes up for reconsideration at the end of twenty years, and every ten years thereafter, until fifty years have expired. The rental for lands occupied is to be fixed for a period of fifty years. All rights held and obligations assumed by the company under the agreement of March 1, 1912, are to cease from the date of completion of the works.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of that?

Mr. CRERAR: All rights held and obligations assumed by the company under the agreement of March 1, 1912—that is, by which they got power from the government of the day to build the 12-foot dam—disappear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is merged.

Mr. CRERAR: The minimum rental to be charged for water is fixed at $5,750 per annum. They have to pay that whether or not they use water. This minimum will be increased by a rather complicated formula—which, quite frankly, I would not attempt to explain to the house—depending upon the amount of water used. The estimated rental the department will receive for water will average between $8,000 and $9,000 per year.

In addition the company pays annual rental for the lands used or occupied within the park—that is, the lands flooded, the land where their power plant is settled, and the land for the canal leading to the power plant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very little. It is five per cent on the appraisal, is it not?

Mr. CRERAR: They agree to pay five per cent by way of annual rental on the appraised value of all these lands.

Now I come to another aspect. Under the agreement made in 1912 the Calgary Power company was authorized to construct a dam at the outlet of lake Minnewanka. The agreement also provided that if at any later time the federal government through the park authority decided to provide a power plant of its own for supplying the needs of Banff, the company would release 150 cubic feet per second when required by the minister so to do.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the present flow in cubic feet per second at the outlet of lake Minnewanka, and what will it be under this new arrangement?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot give that information at the moment, because the flow varies, depending on the amount of water. I come back to this provision of the agreement, which is one of the most important provisions. Under the agreement authorizing the company to build this 12-foot dam in 1912 as stated a moment ago the company agreed to release, upon request of the minister, at some future date, 150 cubic feet per second which might be utilized for power purposes within the park.

In 1924 the government took advantage of this clause in the agreement and erected within the park, to supply park needs and to give service to the residents of Banff, a power plant known as the Cascade river power development. It is some little distance below lake Minnewanka. Those who have visited the lake will recall where the plant is. The total cost of this plant to date, including the purchase of the distributing system in Banff, is approximately $240,000. Since completion of this plant in 1924 it has supplied power and light for the town of Banff and all requirements of light and energy for the park administration. The operating results for each of the last five years have been as follows: If we leave out of account the amount of light and power supplied for the park administration, making no charge for that, the operations in 1935-36 resulted in a deficit of $5,839.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The results depend on the rates charged.

Mr. CRERAR: These are the results based on the rates. There was a charge of 5 per cent interest on capital, also sinking fund charges. In 1936-37 the deficit was $3,829. In 1937-38, there was a deficit of $2,387; in 1938-39, because of the return of more prosperous conditions, shall I say, generally throughout the country, there was a surplus of $2,275. In the past year ending March 31, 1940, the surplus was $5,563.

Under the new arrangement provided for in the interim licence we abandon that power plant and the company agrees to purchase it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the new plant to be at the same site?

Mr. CRERAR: No. We agree to sell to the company this power plant, which, as I stated a moment ago, cost about $240,000, and the company will take over the whole system, including not only the power plant but the distribution system as well. They pay us the cost, less depreciation on a basis to be agreed upon, plus $100,000 in cash. The surplus last year was roughly 5½ per cent upon this amount. This result, I ask the house to bear in mind, was achieved without making any charge to the park administration buildings for light and power or for light and power required purely for park administration purposes throughout the whole park area.

Under the proposed arrangement the company also agrees to supply power and light to Banff and vicinity at rates not exceeding those at present in effect, and that is definitely embodied in the licence provisions.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is the rate now?

Mr. CRERAR: I could not say at the moment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think it is five cents.

Mr. CRERAR: Up until a few years ago there was a cash deficit in operation, but that deficit has been converted into a surplus by the increased use of power.

The company also agrees to supply the department for its purposes up to 500,000 kilowatt hours a year free of charge. That corresponds to the present situation, as we are using from our own plant about 400,000 kilowatt hours for which no credit is given to the plant. In addition, as the park develops, more power will be required, and when that time arrives the company agrees to provide such energy as is required by the department over and above the 500,000 kilowatt hours at a rate of one-half cent per kilowatt hour.

Within the limits of the foregoing provisions the rates will be subject to control by the Alberta Public Utilities commission. In other words, the rates to the residents of Banff under the provisions of the licence cannot be increased at any future time, but they may be reduced through application to the Alberta Public Utilities commission if the facts warrant such reduction. Thus the residents of Banff are protected against any increase in rates, and the department is assured of a considerable block of power free of cost and its additional requirements at a reasonable rate.

There is one other point I should mention. There are on the shores of lake Minnewanka a number of summer cottages, with small wharves which have been built by the owners.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are under lease, I suppose.

Mr. CRERAR: They are under lease. The company agrees to remove them all to new sites free of cost to any of the owners, and to reimburse them for any loss they may sustain. The company also agrees to build new wharves where such may be necessary.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have covered in a general way the main provisions of the agreement. Let me summarize, as follows:

The changes in the level of the lake are to be brought about in such fashion as will detract in the least degree possible from the scenic value. The works are to be built and landscaped on the suggestions of the landscape architect which the department has employed and which the company pays for, subject to this, that if there is a difference of opinion between the landscape architect and the company's engineers as to what work should be done, it will be referred to the minister, and his decision is to be final.

The power plant is to be built of a design satisfactory to the park authorities, and the dam and other works are to be treated in a similar way.

The government in its administration of Banff park is protected in the matter of electrical energy, in that it is to be maintained in its present position so far as the supply of power and electrical energy to the park is concerned.

I recognize, and I sympathize with, the very widely held view that our national parks should be kept as free as possible from industrialization of any kind; that they should be maintained as great natural beauty spots. This was the purpose of the parks act, and during the last fifteen or twenty years that purpose has been consistently carried out. As minister in charge of the administration of the parks—and in what I am about to say I speak for the government—I can say that these works would not have been agreed to had it not been that we were convinced of the urgency of a war need. The production of ammonium nitrates is vital to the manufacture of munitions of war. As I stated earlier, the plant was located at Calgary because the necessary quantities of natural gas were available.

We are in a desperate war. We do not know how many dreary, heavy months lie ahead. We do know this, that if we are to succeed, the implements and the equipment of war, the guns, the tanks, the aeroplanes and the munitions, must be supplied. The government felt that under the circumstances this plant should be brought into operation at the earliest possible day, and the importance of bringing it into operation as soon as possible is the justification for a departure from what has been the policy of all governments in this country for the last twenty years. It does not establish any precedent, because it is definitely tied up to war needs. No one can cite this particular case as an example to be followed with regard to the construction of works in the parks in the future.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but this is for all time.

Mr. CRERAR: What my hon. friend says is quite true; it is for all time.

Mr. MacNICOL: And not for war time.

Mr. CRERAR: It is true that after the war is over the Calgary Power company will retain the advantages which this additional supply of water ensures to it. But there was no way in which this development could be carried out for war purposes for the period of a year or two and then everything brought back to where it was before the development started. We had to recognize that fact; the house will recognize it, and no one more quickly than my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. This being so, once the decision was made that the development should take place we proceeded along lines which will ensure as far as possible the maintenance of the scenic values of the park, which will give to the government what we regard as a fair return for the advantages the company secures, and also a guarantee to the people of Banff and to the government that they will get their light and power needs for all time at fair and reasonable rates.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): In this debate on the second reading I do not propose to do more than offer a few remarks with regard to the principle of the measure. In the committee stage we can obtain further information on details and express further opinions.

When this matter came before the house on the first reading of the bill, we had the advantage of the brief remarks which the minister made on that occasion, and I suppose the memories of others than myself went back to the controversial times of ten and twelve and fifteen years ago, when a matter akin to this was a very debatable question in this house.

It is unfortunate, in my opinion, that a matter of such importance in principle and theory as this is, should have been delayed until so close to the adjournment of the house. It is a pity also, I think, that it was not sent to a committee by which all the necessary plans and documents could have been studied. As an instance, I read in the explanatory note that there is to be the diversion of a branch of a certain river, and I have been at a little pains to clarify my mind with regard to what that amounts to, lest it be the diversion of a river from another watershed into this watershed—which is always a matter of very great controversy.

I find, however, that the Ghost river is one which has several branches—shall I call them—at the tips of the fingers, up in the watershed; that this is the diversion of but one of these many branches; that in freshet time it is not an undesirable thing to relieve that piece of the mountains from freshet water, because the main Ghost river is what we in the mountains call a wicked river. It is diverted, therefore, and the water which is carried into it is diverted into lake Minnewanka. The Ghost river itself enters the Bow river below the two present developments for hydro-electric power on the Bow river, but this quantity of water will in future pass through the works at Minnewanka and then enter the Bow river, so that it can again pass through the two developments on the Bow river—which is an advantage that is understandable when explained.

But the minister has laid a good deal of emphasis on the fact that the government's decision was arrived at because of the intrusion of war necessity. I can well understand the anxiety of the Department of Munitions and Supply and that portion of the government and its officials that are intensely interested in everything which can assist the war effort. We all are, to an extent. But we must not shut our eyes to the fact that the war part of this argument is an intrusion into the larger question: shall such developments as these in the national parks be permitted? It was round that question that the controversy arose twelve years ago, and it is still a question on which there can be very wide diversity of opinion.

I am one of those who consider that the parks having been set aside for the very proper purposes of entertainment and rest, nothing should be done to impair their uses for those purposes. The very fact that the minister has explained in such detail the safeguards he has hedged around this arrangement indicates that the government itself is persuaded that that is the serious decision which has to be made. If this national park in the Rocky mountains were the only park we had for the purposes for which parks have been set aside, it would be a different matter, but different only in degree. A considerable number of areas have been set aside in our mountains for the purposes of recreation and rest; and the matter has been hedged around with safeguards. There are arrangements for beautification, arrangements for the use of the park, arrangements whereby the cottages will be moved at the expense of the company to a safe place, and particularly arrangements with regard to that dreadful strip all round this lake which lies between actual high water and what may be termed mean high water. Stumps have been removed and the clearing of debris leaves the strand, shall I call it, not unlike a sea beach.

Bearing in mind the fact that the government is making arrangements for that to be at least as little ugly as possible with these safeguards; that there are other areas which can be used for recreation and rest; that it is necessary in this case, as it will be in other cases, for a special bill to come before the house and be discussed in parliament, when there will be opportunities for protecting the public interest, and the further fact that these mountains on the eastward slopes of the Rockies are a natural watershed for the supply of power, which is now and will be increasingly required in the province of Alberta and even perhaps in Saskatchewan, I do not object to the bill going through in its present form.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I do not rise to oppose the bill, but there are some aspects of it that give me a great deal of concern. In the first place, I dislike more than I can tell the implication of the bill that this is for war purposes. I am not opposed to development for the purpose of prosecuting the war, but I am opposed to this proposal coming in at this time and the attempt to impress us with the suggestion that it is for war purposes. I have a keen recollection of the same sort of argument having been presented when the successful effort was made to dam the south branch of the St. Lawrence river near Massena, New York, during the last war, in 1918, and the solemn undertaking then given, that, parliament having permitted the damming of the river, the dam would be removed after the war. That was not done; the weir still remains and the water is still being taken out of the St. Lawrence for power into the state of New York.

I asked a question to-day on the orders of the day about a similar situation in connection with Niagara falls, also for war purposes; and now this bill is said to be for war purposes. If in each instance we could revert after the war to the condition which prevailed before the attack was made in the vicinities concerned, I for one would be one hundred per cent for it—and I am not opposing it now. I do say, however, that the public should know of these arrangements involving public resources, made under the guise of the prosecution of the war. We all want to prosecute the war, but I hope we are all opposed to the war being used as a means of raiding the public resources.

What is the situation at Banff? I have been there and I know the area. I am not opposing this measure but I say that the public should know. There is a fine body of water, lake Minnewanka, in the park. The river running out of it is the Cascade. It flows out of the west end of the lake into the Bow, not far distant from Banff. To the east, some ten miles over the divide, there is another river called the Ghost, which has two main branches. There is a great number of small branches, but the two main branches are the south fork and the other known as the main fork, I presume. The Ghost river is dammed, I understand—that is, the main Ghost river after the junction of the two branches. At least, that is the way I understood the minister. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) will know more about it. If the minister is wrong, however, then where is the dam that is producing the 36,000 horse-power?

Mr. EDWARDS: The dam is in the Bow river, immediately below the junction.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said that the Ghost river itself was dammed. Was he wrong?

Mr. CRERAR: When my hon. friend asked that question in the course of my remarks, I was not quite certain where it was. I thought it was on the Ghost river before its entry into the Bow, but the hon. member for Calgary West says that it is on the Bow just below where the Ghost enters into it. However, it is not a matter of much importance.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I was going to say in that regard is that if the minister were correct and 36,000 horse-power were developed on the Ghost river itself, then the diversion of one branch would interfere with power development on the Ghost river itself. But as the hon. member for Calgary West says, the 36,000 horse-power development is on the Bow river at a second dam, in addition to the first dam that develops 20,000 on the Bow. In other words, the company is now developing 56,000 on the Bow river. Is that right?

Mr. EDWARDS: All the power now being developed by the company is generated from the dam in the Bow river.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there only one dam?

Mr. EDWARDS: There are three, starting west from Calgary—the Ghost, the Horseshoe and the Kananaskis.

Mr. MacNICOL: So that all power at present developed is on the Bow river. Then the diversion of either of the other branches of the Ghost river would not lower the power on the Bow. I am somewhat familiar with water-power production, and in my opinion the diversion on the Ghost river of one branch of that river into lake Minnewanka would not lessen production of power on the Bow, because once the water flowed out of the Ghost into lake Minnewanka it would pass through the Cascade back into the Bow and flow down the Bow and increase power development.

Mr. EDWARDS: Except this, that at the present time the water that is now flowing down the Ghost river that it is proposed to divert into lake Minnewanka only goes through the one power dam at Ghost river, whereas if it is diverted into lake Minnewanka it will then go through the Minnewanka plant, through the Horseshoe plant, and down through the Kananaskis plant and the Ghost plant, thus being used four times.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thank the hon. member for the explanation, which is that two of the dams on the Bow river are west of the junction of the Ghost and the Bow.

Mr. EDWARDS: All the dams on the Bow river are west of Calgary. The first is at the junction of the Ghost river and the Bow, then the Kananaskis and then the Horseshoe.

Mr. MacNICOL: In other words there is no loss of power on the Bow by diversion of the Ghost.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the Ghost R.B.'s?

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister was not certain where the new power development would be built on the Cascade. I should like to know what the head of water would be on the Cascade, or if the flume is going to run from the 77 foot dam at the outlet of lake Minnewanka to the power plant on the Cascade.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I stated that the new power plant would be developed near Anthracite, which is within the park boundary, and the flume or channel which conveys the water from the dam to the power plant is to be constructed—

Mr. MacNICOL: From lake Minnewanka.

Mr. CRERAR: From the lake level. I cannot say just what the head of water will be. I do not know that that is very material.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the essential item in connection with power development, together with the flow. I have been figuring out what the possible flow would be from the watershed of the Ghost. So far as I can see, about 600 cubic feet per second, the watershed being about 100 square miles, would flow into lake Minnewanka.

I think that is all I wish to say about it at the moment. I did not like the raid on the St. Lawrence, which has never been rectified, said to be for war purposes, and now the raid on the Ghost also said to be for war purposes, because it will have some effect upon the park. A dam 77 feet high will raise the lake level away up the mountain side. The hon. member for Calgary West shakes his head; but how can you raise the water level 77 feet without going up the mountain side or flooding land? That means a pretty deep lake in the park.

If, however, the minister has given his consent and the work is now under construction, there is nothing we can do. But I point out to the public that this is just another example of the raid at Massena, and at Niagara Falls.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I place the onus in this matter squarely on the government. How does it come about that this bill, which was introduced and given first reading on April 7, now comes for second reading on June 4, a few hours before adjournment? The responsibility is on the government and not on the opposition if the session is prolonged a day beyond this week.

The Calgary Power company has been a menace to Canada. It is just as bad as or worse than Beauharnois. I will explain why. This company came into the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec and grabbed water power at Chats falls upon which the Ontario goverment had to take over power. The company started in 1912. It was incorporated not by act of parliament but by a charter under the laws of Alberta, and then came down here, and got a Quebec charter to develop on the Ottawa river at Chats falls in 1926.

Who are these people? They are some of the very same people, the Montreal people, some of them behind the Sun Life, behind the Beauharnois deal, part and parcel of the super power trust. Mr. Killam was one of them, the man who owned the Mail and Empire and sold it in a merger of two newspapers in Toronto. Where there used to be six Toronto newspapers reporting the proceedings of this house, to-day there is only one. Hardly anyone knows what happens in this chamber or what is being given away. How does it come about that this bill is introduced as a war measure in the dying days of the session? It is not a war measure. That nitrogen plant should never have been established there. They knew at the time that the Alberta government had no power and this government had no power to hand over all these great water powers to private greed for gain centred in Montreal, without this house amending the parks act.

Where are the headquarters of the Calgary Power company? According to "Houston's Financial Annual, 1940," they are at 244 St. James street west, Montreal, with an operating office in Calgary. The directors of the company are G. A. Gaherty, president; I. W. Killam, of blessed memory; R. B. Baxter; Fred C. Clarke; H. H. Parlee; S. B. Hammond, and—listen to this—H. J. Symington, K.C., the war-time power controller, if you please, who has saved only about 150,000 horsepower as a war measure by daylight saving all year and then in the morning from six to nine o'clock by domestic use of power. The saving in the result is little except for alloys for the Aluminum company. The regulation is not obeyed in some towns in new Ontario. This gentleman's name is also in another company, called Calgary power in Quebec. This is the company that started in 1926 at Chats falls on the Ottawa river, an interprovincial stream.

This same process is going on in Ontario and Quebec. The Calgary Power company went to Quebec and incorporated a company in 1926 after the notorious Sifton bills to grab all the waters of new Ontario were defeated here in the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal bills, which were talked out in this parliament by those who were then sitting in opposition. When this company found that the Sifton interests had lost these extension-grab franchises on the Ottawa river, the same people, known as the Ottawa end of the Calgary Power company deal, went to Quebec and got a charter under the name of the Ottawa Valley Power company, which was owned by the Calgary Power company exclusively. They secured incorporation under the laws of Quebec. They knew enough not to come to Queen's Park in Toronto, because by the British North America Act water powers and navigation rights, international and interprovincial, are under the control of this parliament. Having got the Ottawa Valley Power Quebec charter they also incorporated on August 11, 1926, as the Chats Falls Power company under the laws of Quebec, with head office at 244 St. James street, Montreal, and the same directors as the Calgary Power company, except one. On October 22, 1930, the name was changed.

How does it come about that although we have a standing committee which deals with water powers, that private bills committee has never been called? Why is this bill made a government bill? I ask the government to withdraw this bill, to leave it over until the session is resumed, perhaps in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. Not by the widest stretch of the imagination can this plant be opened by September 1 as the situation is at present; and if it is, they are going to sell power to private people in the district at fabulous prices and under no control whatever.

The agreement in the schedule of this bill is between the dominion government represented by the Minister of Mines and Resources and the government of Alberta. When the prairie provinces got back their natural resources in 1926 I opposed the giving over of these water powers which belong to the people of Canada unless restrictions were placed in the act, because, as I contended then on behalf of the people, these water powers should not be alienated for private greed and gain the way the central provinces were looted. There is some 42,000,000 horse-power of hydro-electric energy capable of development in this country, of which only one-seventh is developed, and part of that development is only seasonal. I want a national hydro policy for this country with power at cost. I contended then that some of these people who were grabbing water powers in the Ottawa valley and eastern Ontario and Quebec sooner or later would be rapping on the door of this parliament in a power grab, as well as in Alberta and Saskatchewan, seeking to get away from the protective provisions of the National Parks Act.

I do not believe we should part with these resources as a war measure, because this is not a war measure. The plant never should have been there. The power is to be granted in perpetuity. The huge cost of our war effort has been greatly enhanced by this way of doing business. Here a nitrogen plant has been located in the Calgary district; a string of air force training camps has been built across Canada, each requiring sewage and water services furnished at fabulous cost because of wrong locations. The same principle is being followed in this bill, and it all adds to the cost of the war. Where is the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) this morning? Why was this plant located where it is? Where is the cabinet minister representing the province of Alberta? Did these two hon. gentlemen recommend this bill, this parting with power rights forever, unregulated? I doubt it very much.

We must look into the history of this company to understand what is behind this application. This bill contains only two short clauses, one validating the agreement which is set out under the schedule "A" attached to the bill, and giving the minister authority to grant the licence referred to in the agreement, notwithstanding the provisions of the National Parks Act, which is chapter 33 of the statutes of 1930. The explanatory note states:

In 1912 the Calgary Power Company was given the right to construct a dam at the outlet of lake Minnewanka in Banff national park with right to store 44,000 acre feet of water. Following the decision to erect a nitrogen plant at Calgary for war purposes the company in November, 1940—

Away back in November of last year the government knew legislation would be required in order to get around the parks act, yet not one word was said about it until the first reading on April 7, 1941. Paragraph (e) of the agreement in schedule "A" gives the company the right to sell electric power to residents of Banff and vicinity for commercial and domestic lighting. Why, the rates will be so high that the local people will not be able to buy power at all. We had an experience with these Calgary power people in the Chats falls development, not far from this city, and that experience should make us think twice before we pass this bill in the dying hours of the session. The policy of hon. members of the New Democracy group, who are not here in very large numbers this morning, should be "no surrender." They and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stand for the preservation of our water powers for the benefit of the people; they are in favour of public ownership, and I give them credit for that. I would ask them to study this bill, study the history of this company in Ontario and Quebec from 1912 on and of the power ring that had Ontario by the throat.

There is a forward move of aggression by not only this company, from 1926, on, in Alberta, and elsewhere, but we know the history of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company, and we also know the record and history of the notorious Beauharnois company, and its subsidiaries, and interlocked directorate set-up. The great super power trust of north America never rests; it is ever on the march.

There is also, again, the Stormont Power company; I can tell hon. gentlemen that this is owned and connected with the Sun Life company, and that company's quasi power investments and the power campaigns, past and present, of that company in many deals at control. Recently in this house a question was asked by me in regard to the Stormont power plant, and, as I say, it was revealed that this plant is completely owned by the Sun Life company, one of whose employees, Mr. Lawrence Jack of Montreal, now is writing articles for this wonderful publication Saturday Night to tax public utilities which operate at cost. I think it would be better on this power matter to change the name to Montreal Saturday Night for such Sun Life articles, if it is going to discuss the natural resources of this country and tax Ontario's light and power and transportation services. It is not hard to see what is being done in this connection by the old power people in Montreal. Here we have a forward movement in Alberta; there is a forward publicity movement by the Sun Life to destroy public ownership, and it is going on all across the country. No surrender, I say, to these people here. Then the explanatory note continues:

. . . the company . . . applied for permission to increase the water storage capacity to 200,000 acre feet and to construct and operate a hydro-electric plant in the park for the operation of the nitrogen plant.

As the plans of the power company to develop such additional storage involved the diversion of waters outside the park boundaries and as the park was situated within Alberta, the application was submitted to the provincial government who approved of it being granted. The national resources transfer agreement does not contemplate developments of this nature being permitted in national parks and it was deemed advisable to enter into the formal agreement referred to in the schedule hereto.

As it was planned to have the plant of the nitrogen company ready for operation on September 1, 1941, it was therefore of the utmost importance that an adequate supply of electric power be available as soon as possible. To prevent delay in completing the power expansion work, tentative permission was given to the power company under the War Measures Act to commence construction pending and subject to approval by parliament and the Alberta legislature.

You can see how the War Measures Act is sometimes twisted, broken in a racket and extended for the benefit of private greed and gain; but when it comes to erecting a small annex, needed so badly for real war work, to a technical school in Toronto, costing not more than $150,000, in order to train men for the air force and aircraft munitions, what a different story is told.

I am absolutely opposed to this proposal. I will give just one instance of what this company did in Ontario, in order that the people of Alberta may be warned. I am not responsible for taking up the time of the house; far from it. At this time blame the government. The government is to blame for trying to force this bill through the house in the dying hours of the session, without any plans or information or any regard to the opinions of those representing the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. We know these power people in Ontario; we have learned something about their methods and how they go about getting things through this parliament, as they have for nearly thirty years in the past. Some of the millionaires who are at the head of this super power trust centred in Montreal know no politics; they are heard of at election time; they are millionaires first, last and all the time, grabbing the public domain. Now, under the War Measures Act, they are seeking to grab in perpetuity these natural resources which will be so badly needed after the war when unemployment again may have to be faced and high power rates will ruin Alberta as it will new Ontario. Then the price of coal will be so high that we shall not be able to buy any in this country. As a result industry will be starved and people will have to pay prohibitive prices for power.

What did this same company do in Ontario? I quote from page 304 of Houston's "Annual Financial Review" for 1940:

The Ottawa Valley Power Company, incorporated under the laws of Quebec, holds in part through ownership and in part by a lease from the government of the province of Quebec extending for seventy-five years from March 1, 1926, all the water power rights in the province of Quebec at Chats Falls, on the Ottawa river.

The Ottawa river is an interprovincial stream, you see.

The Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, through lease from the government of the province of Ontario, holds all the water power rights in the province of Ontario at the same site. The company and the commission have agreed that each is entitled to one-half of the water available for power, and, under a joint development agreement, there has been constructed a dam with capacity of 224,000 horse power—

That is about the same horse power involved in this bill.

—consisting of eight units of 28,000 horse power each, four of which are owned by the company and four by the commission. One-half the total installation was completed and placed in commercial operation in 1931, and the balance in 1932. The dam and power house are owned or held on the Quebec side by the company, and on the Ontario side by the commission and, under the terms of the joint development agreement, which extends for seventy-five years from March 1, 1926, must be used jointly for the purposes of the development.

And then there was a contemplated power shortage in the province of Ontario. If you will look at the last financial statement of the Calgary Power company, which appears at page 301 of this same volume, you will see that the total assets in 1939 amounted to $25,638,014 as against $25,360,687 in 1938, and they had a large surplus as well. The consolidated income account shows gross earnings of $2,173,613 in 1939, with operating expenses of $705,108 and net operating earnings of $1,468,505. In 1938 the gross earnings were $2,114,021, and the net operation earnings were $1,357,582. In 1937 the gross earnings were $1,998,058, and the net operation earnings $1,288,151.

It will be seen from the set-up of this company that it owns and operates three water power plants on the Bow river west of Calgary, of an aggregate capacity of 70,000 horse-power. The Horseshoe falls plant of 19,000 horse-power commenced supplying power in May, 1911; the Kananaskis plant of 13,000 horse-power in February, 1914, and the Ghost plant of 38,000 horse-power in October, 1929, this latter being the largest power plant in the province of Alberta. The company's reservoirs at lake Minnewanka and Upper Kananaskis lake, together with the storage at the Ghost, represent a reserve equivalent to 23,000,000 kilowatt hours. The company also operates as a stand-by plant a 14,000 horse-power steam station leased from the city of Calgary.

The company and its wholly owned subsidiary Prairie Power company, Limited, own and operate 2,542 miles of transmission lines supplying 210 communities which are served retail, and the 14 purchasers who resell to the individual consumers; 17,708 consumers are supplied retail with electricity and 1,014 with water. In addition, 49,439 customers are served with power generated by the company, and sold retail through others.

Prairie Power company purchases its power requirements from the cities of Regina and Weyburn, the National Light and Power company at Moose Jaw, the Dominion Electric company at Estevan and the Calgary Power company at the Alberta boundary west of Macklin. It sells power in bulk for transmission and local distribution to Canadian Utilities Company Limited for its system east of Regina, and to the Saskatchewan Power commission at four different points.

My main point is that during the war we should not give away these water powers, involving such large areas, without having any control. Let the government now take over this power company itself and its new 200,000 horse-power as a war measure. Make this a crown property, both as to power and as to nitrogen. Act now. The location of a nitrogen plant in the area was a mistake. Consideration should have been given to securing a more economical site, where commercial and domestic power might have been secured for this and many other war munition plants.

This bill should have been a private, not a public bill. It should have been placed before the committee on private bills or the water power committee. This is another sample of our luxurious war effort, and it is brought before us at the time of a victory loan campaign. Some of these companies in Montreal are interlocked with the great United States power trust. They have also obtained control of a system of newspapers on the north American continent. Certain newspapers who opposed them were forced to the wall, and we heard something about that in my newspaper bill to identify the owners in 1925 to 1930. Who has acted for the government in this stampede, and where are the reports of officials on all aspects of the matter?

What has happened in the Ottawa valley ought to be a warning as to what may happen in other places, including the prairies, if we part with these natural powers. They are gone forever. The government was badly advised when it located the nitrogen plant at the point indicated. It has been badly advised as to the power situation. This bill should not have been a government measure; it should not have been brought in under the War Measures Act, but as a private bill. Actually it is a private bill which enables these companies to make huge profits and sell power without regulation. If we agree to the passage of this bill we might as well abolish national parks, or any hope of a national policy, which, may I add, should have been in practice ten years ago.

I regret having to detain the house, but it is not my fault. I do not propose to remain in my seat and allow this bill to pass without making an effort to have proper regulation and control, and save these national resources for the people. It comes before us in the guise of a war measure, but it is not a war measure at all; it is a power bill. The plant which has been mentioned should have been located at some other place, and it could have been done at less cost to this luxurious war effort.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) pointed to the representation in the house while he was speaking. It was interesting that he should have done so, because when he spoke sixty per cent of the New Democracy members were in their seats, and the others were serving on committees. Approximately fifty per cent of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members were in their seats, and the others were on committees. Only eleven per cent of Liberals were in the house, and only about twenty-five per cent of Conservatives. It is obvious therefore that the representation was much greater in the New Democracy group than in any other. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were next in that regard.

I should like to say a few words about the principle of the bill. I shall not take much time in going into detail, because that can be done more advantageously when the bill is before the committee.

The minister spoke about the great emergency which exists. I am glad he is beginning to realize there is an emergency.

Mr. MacINNIS: Who told him?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We have been in the war about two years, and the government is just beginning to realize there is an emergency. When we look at the results on the other side of the ocean we must decide that it is time the government realized it should be doing something.

He mentioned something about the scenic value of national parks. No doubt there is something in what he said. I believe there is good reason for guarding the scenic value of our parks, but when Canada is so greatly in need of electric power, in my opinion scenic value must have only secondary consideration. It is a subject which might well be handled after the war is over.

I find myself somewhat in agreement with the hon. member for Broadview when he states that the Calgary Power company has a monopoly of electrical power in Canada.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When the house rose at one o'clock I had made reference to the control which the Calgary Power company was getting over electrical power resources all over Canada, and I think the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) was quite right in cautioning the house as to the dangers which might lie ahead. I have in mind the high rates for electrical power which are now being charged in the province of Alberta. In the city of Calgary, for instance, the consumer has to pay five cents per kilowatt hour. Out in the town in which I live we are paying eight cents per kilowatt hour, and in addition a seventy-cent meter charge. In the town in which I formerly lived the rate was ten cents per kilowatt hour and I believe still is, with an additional meter charge of $1.50. So that the hon. member for Broadview had reason to caution the house as to the control over the electric power generated in Canada which is being exercised by the Beauharnois company, of which company Calgary Power is a subsidiary. But I am not so much concerned about that just now, because if I understood the minister aright the province of Alberta will have control over the rates charged by Calgary Power through the public utilities commission.

What I am immediately concerned about now is making the power available because it is so urgently needed, and for that reason I am fully in accord with the step which the government has taken. I think that the Calgary Power company is to be commended for having decided to build this dam at lake Minnewanka, yet I feel it is going to be well-paid for it. The fact remains that despite the great need in Canada, especially western Canada, for electric power, this government has consistently and persistently refused to do anything to increase the number of hydro plants to generate electricity, and the only way in which Canada could get this plant built to supply power in this great war emergency was by letting a private company do the work. The government absolutely refused to do anything about the matter itself, and it is to be condemned, I think, for that attitude, particularly when the need for power is so great. We need electric power in Alberta for the ammonium plant and for the rolling mills at Calgary. Yet the government absolutely refuses to do anything on its own behalf, advancing as its only reason, of course, that it did not have any money. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) not so long ago said that anything that was physically possible would be made financially possible in order to win the war, yet despite that declaration, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) consistently took the stand that there was no money and that no matter how great the need might be, the government had no intention of financing the building of any dams. He brought that out clearly a while ago when he referred to the Spring lake project. He said there was a possible chance of developing a dam there, but the company had no money, and because of the lack of money we did not get the plant built and our war effort was hindered to that extent. That is the stand which the government has been taking right along.

I come back to the reasons why this dam at lake Minnewanka is being built. The government did not start this thing by itself at all, as the minister would lead us to believe. There were two reasons why this project at lake Minnewanka was started. One of them was the proper operation of the ammonium nitrate plant which was being built at Calgary. When that ammonium plant was being started there was no thought of building a dam at lake Minnewanka; in fact, after it had got started, the capacity of the plant was cut down by almost one-third, I believe, because of lack of power.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is quite incorrect in his statement that when the decision was reached to have an ammonium nitrate plant at Calgary electric power considerations were not a factor.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I did not say that electric power was not a factor but that there was no thought then of building a dam at lake Minnewanka.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is incorrect in that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When was it first thought of, then? When the Calgary rolling mills project came up, one of the main considerations was that there was not sufficient power to go ahead with the project. So that evidently plans could not have been properly laid by that time. I am not so sure that even yet the plant has been restored to its full capacity of 150 tons. I am open to correction on that, and I shall be glad if the minister will inform the house whether the plant is back to full capacity. I know its capacity was cut down, but it may have been restored.

One of the reasons why the Calgary rolling mills project was not proceeded with before was the shortage of power. A committee of all the Alberta members became interested in this project, and as a result the minister acted, and I think he did the proper thing when he decided to go ahead and build this project at lake Minnewanka. But the fact is that now the power is there. It is not even necessary to wait for it to be developed at lake Minnewanka. Because of the Calgary Power company's plant on Ghost river, they could use immediately the reservoir of water they have there to increase their supply of electric power, because, as I am informed upon good authority, they would have this fall, when they need it, the extra supply coming from lake Minnewanka. The unfortunate part of it is that now that we are in a position to have abundance of electrical energy there, the Calgary rolling mill is being taken out of that district and removed to Vancouver. That is a very serious mistake, not because the mill was originally in Calgary, but because, in view of the fact that we are at war, it should be opened in Calgary immediately. There is going to be considerable delay in transferring the mill from Calgary to Vancouver, not to speak of the cost entailed in the shipment of the equipment. If we need the steel, steps should be taken to start operations right where the plant is. If we do not need steel, that is a different matter, but the government has not intimated that there is any overabundance of steel.

Is there any reason why that electric power should not be used in the Calgary rolling mill immediately? I am informed that the present freight rates on scrap iron, whether moved east or west, are almost prohibitive—and freight rates are always going up instead of coming down. That should be a deciding factor in the production of this steel. Then comes the handling of this scrap iron. I am informed by reliable men in this business that a tremendous amount of work is required to prepare scrap iron for shipment either west or east of the prairie provinces. The obvious and most sensible thing at this time is to have scrap iron sent into Calgary, worked over there into steel plates or rods, and shipped, if necessary, to Vancouver. The rate would be less, and fewer cars would be required. I am informed that there are immediately available in Calgary over 200,000 tons of scrap. We could start producing steel at once in Calgary; we would not have to wait for the company to move its plant to Vancouver, which will entail three or four or five months' delay.

There remains the problem of labour. The minister may say that insufficiency of labour is one of the chief reasons why this plant should be moved from Calgary to the coast. But there are in the prairie provinces hundreds of physically fit men, unemployed, who could immediately be put to this work. He may say that they are not trained, but training is a matter of only a week or so; as a matter of fact, many of these men are skilled in industry and are wondering why, during war time, they cannot get jobs. Well they might ask that question, when we are supposed to be engaged in an all-out war effort—that term which is so much misused. There will come a time when these skilled men will drift to other places, and then the minister may have cause to complain that labour cannot be obtained. If we are serious in this matter, immediate action should be taken.

I have a letter from the Canadian Junk company, in which, referring to this very matter, they give three reasons, which seem to me sound, why this electric power should be used to open the Calgary rolling mill. They say:

Firstly, the expense of moving the mill would be avoided.

If I am not mistaken, the minister mentioned a while ago that there would be a certain amount of depreciation over a period of about two years, which this company would write off, relative to the cost of moving this equipment.

Secondly, there is the availability of cheap natural gas. Millions of dollars' worth of this gas is still being wasted, even with present regulations in Turner valley. Eastern steel mills obtain cheap fuel by using by-product coke oven gas. We are not aware that this method is possible at the coast.

Thirdly, scap steel can be landed at Calgary cheaper than at the coast. Fewer freight cars will be required,—

I think that is an essential point.

—as the finished product is less bulky than scrap steel, and there is a certain amount of shrinkage, due to manufacture.

The matter of shrinkage is important when one figures the excess freight rate which would have to be paid.

I cannot see any logical reason why the Calgary rolling mill should not be opened now and all the steel made which it is possible to make. That is one of the reasons why I believe it is high time that the project at lake Minnewanka should be developed and power produced as cheaply as possible. I hope the government will reconsider allowing the Dominion Bridge company to move these rolling mills from Calgary to Vancouver, because it will cause long and unnecessary delay in the manufacture of the steel which is now so greatly needed.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must rise to add some support to the case made so well this morning by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). In my opinion he made it very clear that this bill is quite unnecessary. The government, under the War Measures Act, has all the powers necessary to develop all the power potential at any place in Canada. I want to protest against the passing of special legislation which will give to the Calgary Power company the benefits which this legislation will, in my opinion, confer.

According to "Poor's Financial Records, 1940," this is a company which already has a very large control of power in western Canada. It was incorporated in 1909, under the laws of the Dominion of Canada. I quote:

> The company holds, in the province of Alberta, under licence from the government, all the water power of the Bow river at Horseshoe falls and Kananaskis falls, and the right to store water at lake Minnewanka, all for four periods of 21 years each, and all the water power at the Ghost-Radnor site, and the right to store water at Upper Kananaskis lake, both for a period of 50 years.
>
> The company has, since 1911, been engaged in the production and sale of electricity in the province of Alberta. Three-quarters of the electricity generated in the province is produced by the company's water power plants. Its 2,500-mile transmission system extends over a large part of the more thickly settled area of the province, serving a quarter of a million people. From a point 40 miles north of Edmonton, it extends southward to within a few miles of the international boundary, with a main lateral branch reaching east to the Saskatchewan boundary.
> In Alberta, serves 15,357 retail customers over its own distribution lines, and, in addition, supplies the entire power requirements of the municipal distribution systems of Calgary, Red Deer, Macleod, Cardston and Ponoka, and also most of the power used in a number of towns and villages on the system of Canadian Utilities Limited. Power is sold direct to the Exshaw plant of Canada Cement Company Limited, to coal mines and to a number of other industries. Company's lines also serve the Turner valley oil fields. An interchange agreement is in effect with East Kootenay Power Company Limited. During 1937, a new agreement was executed with the city of Calgary covering its power requirements for a further period of ten years from the expiration of the existing contract on July 31, 1940. The other wholesale agreements are for varying periods, and the distribution franchises are for the maximum periods allowed under the laws of the province.
> Company controls, through a wholly-owned sub., Prairie Power Company Limited, a modern system in Saskatchewan, comprising 180 miles of transmission lines, with distribution systems serving 2,810 retail customers. Power for operations of the systems of the Saskatchewan Power Commission and of Canadian Utilities Limited, is also transmitted over the lines of that company.

The explanatory note reads:

> To prevent delay in completing the power expansion works, tentative permission was given to the power company under the War Measures Act to commence construction pending and subject to approval by parliament and the Alberta legislature.

Mr. CRERAR: It is quite true that under the War Measures Act this work could be undertaken, but any authority under the War Measures Act lapses with the end of war and the conclusion of peace; consequently it is necessary to have authority by parliament to make it permanent and continuous.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is the very point I am complaining about. This parliament under the stress of war, when everyone is anxious that war production should be carried on as efficiently as possible, should not hand over to the Calgary Power company for all time the privileges in question.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not what you were saying.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is what I am protesting against. We can complete all the necessary power development at the present time and when the war is over make arrangements with the Calgary Power company for the disposition of this particular utility. I submit that the history of power companies in Canada is such that hon. members have reason to be suspicious of these corporations who come to parliament and ask for such consideration as the Calgary Power company is now seeking. As the hon. member for Broadview pointed out, one of the directors of the company, H. J. Symington, is one of the dollar-a-year men in Canada, as indicated in the latest list received from the Department of National War Services, and he is the power representative on the war-time industries control board. With one of the directors of this company occupying a key position on the war-time industries control board, it would be much better for this company to wait until the war is over before coming to parliament and asking that consideration, which might be all right in peace time, be extended to the company to make available to them benefits which will undoubtedly accrue for all time.

In the Winnipeg Free Press of November 25 there was an article from which I quote:

The Calgary Power company has applied for the right to convert lake Minnewanka in Banff national park into a storage basin and to develop hydro electric power from it at a nearby point. The reason given for the application is that the company is being asked to supply power to a new war chemicals plant in southern Alberta and that the needs of this plant will impair the company's power reserve.

Hon. members are most anxious that Alberta should have chemical plants and rolling mills and that every able-bodied person in that province should be working during the war period; and if additional power is necessary it should by all means be granted under the War Measures Act. But the time of this parliament should not be occupied in dealing with legislation such as this bill in behalf of the Calgary Power company.

According to a brief presented by the Federation of Ontario Naturalists, in January, 1941, it is said that this is not the first time that the Calgary Power company has asked for consideration of this sort. I read:

Prior to 1923, the company, with powerful support from city councils and boards of trade in southern Alberta, put on a drive to convert lake Minnewanka into a storage basin. The water was to be fed into the Bow river and would pass through the company's power plants at Calgary. The application, pressed vigorously prior to 1923, failed to succeed for the reason that lake Minnewanka is one of the loveliest lakes in Banff national park and the government of the day refused to permit the beauty of the park to be defaced by concrete dams and muddy waterless shorelines. The baring of wide stretches of shoreline is inevitable in a power storage development; the very purpose of storage makes wide fluctuations in the water level essential.

I am not pressing the point put forward by the naturalists, who are concerned about the beauty spots in Banff national park. I agree with those who drafted the brief that the lake is one of the most beautiful anywhere in the Rocky mountains, or in the world for that matter; but in time of war those who prize these natural beauty spots must be prepared to see them sacrificed if power is necessary. Granting that, however, it does not follow that those who are interested financially in the Calgary Power company should take advantage of the present crisis to obtain in war time what they could not get in peace time. When the war is over, I repeat, when we finish with Hitler, it will be soon enough to determine the financial arrangements that will be necessary with the Calgary Power company as a result of the developments they will find essential to supply the power needed in our war industries. This brief states:

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The government, under the War Measures Act, could authorize the development at Minnewanka by order in council—setting aside the National Parks Act—but it is understood this would be unsatisfactory to the company. When the war ends, the War Measures Act no longer operates, and the National Parks Act will at once come into play. Any development carried out under the War Measures Act, therefore, would be without statutory sanction in peace time. The company, it is believed, insists that special statute be enacted permanently authorizing the lake Minnewanka development.

I add my protest as forcibly as I can to the one made by the hon. member for Broadview. Taking into consideration the importance of the many other items that should be considered, and in view of the fact that not one single horse-power more of electricity will be developed by the passing of this measure, I ask the minister to reconsider the bill and let it stand until the war has been won.

Mr. M. J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): I should be remiss in my duty to my constituency and to the country if I did not say something in connection with this bill, inasmuch as the power project under discussion is wholly within the constituency which I represent, Calgary West.

At the outset I may say that no one should be more concerned about exploring all the considerations which have agitated the minds of hon. members than myself as the representative of those people. Certainly no people in any part of Canada are or should be more zealous to preserve the beauties of our national parks, because they not only enjoy the beauties of this locality but gain their livelihood from the visitors who come from all parts of the world to see the beauty spots of our Rockies. Yet it is a surprising thing that without exception I have received no word of protest in regard to this proposal from any of the people of Calgary West, which embraces Banff, Lake Louise and West Calgary. As a matter of fact the Banff advisory council, under date of November 27 last, wrote me a letter which I should like to read, showing what these people have to say with regard to this matter. The letter is addressed to me, signed by Mr. R. E. W. Edwards, secretary of the Banff advisory council, who by the way is in no way related to me. It reads:

Dear Sir:—

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a telegram sent last night to the hon. the Minister of National Defence.

The feeling in Banff is that no considerations should be allowed to interfere with the production of invaluable war material in the present crisis, especially as this project will enable production to be carried on at a minimum cost.

Also the existence of a plant capable of supplying almost unlimited power at low cost will be undoubtedly a great factor in the establishment of many new industries in the province of Alberta on the conclusion of the war and will prove a tremendous asset to the wealth of the province.

The raising of the level of the lake will do away with certain unsightly features which at present exist in the neighbourhood of the lake and render it more attractive than ever to the travelling public, and, finally, this scheme will provide decent employment for a large number of men who otherwise will, with their dependents, suffer much hardship during the winter months owing to lack of suitable work.

For these and other reasons, equally potent, which will suggest themselves to you, the advisory council ask that you do everything in your power to aid in procuring authorization for the carrying out of the Calgary Power Company's project as there can be no doubt that, both now and in the years to come, it will prove of inestimable benefit to the national park and to Alberta as a whole.

I have received similar communications from the Banff board of trade, the Calgary board of trade and numerous other bodies. I can truthfully say that I have not received any letter of protest or opposition to this proposal from any resident of West Calgary.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): And none from East Calgary.

Mr. EDWARDS: And the hon. member for Calgary East says the same thing so far as his constituency is concerned.

I think if hon. members were familiar with the situs of this lake and what is involved there would be little if any discussion in regard to preserving its natural beauty. Having visited the scene, having known this lake for the last thirty years, and having seen the operations as they are now in progress, I too am of the opinion that rather than being a detriment to or detracting from the attractiveness of lake Minnewanka this operation will in fact make it more attractive and more beautiful. Hon. members when they think of a dam ordinarily think of a high wall of concrete. But the dam which is being built at the west end of this lake contains no concrete at all. It is built of earth and gravel.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I may interrupt, surely there will have to be concrete where the water flows over.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is a slight by-pass over which water runs down to the Cascade river, but the amount of concrete required will be very small. In this place the water does not go through the dam to a power-house below as in an ordinary power development. The power-house is off to the south, beyond the mountain. The water is led off from the side of the lake down a flume to the power-house to be constructed at Anthracite.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If the hon. member will permit a question, why are our Canadians who are interested in the National Geographic society and other like organizations concerned with the preservation of the beauty of that area opposed to this bill?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have not received a communication from them.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have received four or five even from Ontario members of the association, who protest against the destruction of the beauty of this lake. I am not asserting that I have paid too much attention to that, but I ask the hon. member why they are opposing this development?

Mr. EDWARDS: I suggest that the hon. member direct that question to those who submit their protests to him. One of the things that bothers me is that protests come from people living thousands of miles away from this lake, people who perhaps have never seen it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Oh, yes; they have seen it, and they are Canadian citizens.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a national park.

Mr. EDWARDS: They are thousands of miles away, nevertheless. Let us be fair about this. I have talked with a number of people who object on principle to impounding water anywhere or making any economic use of the gifts of the Almighty. But after all we live in an industrial and power age; society must go on. I have not had the privilege of travelling on the continent of Europe, but when one thinks of an industrialized country, Switzerland is immediately suggested. Switzerland is world famous for its mountain beauty and also for its industrial development. I am informed that all the lakes and rivers in Switzerland have their waters impounded for power development, and the success of Switzerland as an industrial nation is dependent upon its water power. If it is true, as I believe it to be, that the waters of lake Minnewanka, which ordinarily in the spring run down into Bow river and off to the sea in a headlong rush, serving no useful purpose so far as power is concerned, can be stored so that they run down during the season when power is most needed, then I think that should be done.

Hon. members might think of the proposal now before the house not as a power development qua the national park but as an impounding of water, because the power that will be generated within the national park at Anthracite certainly would not begin to justify the capital expenditure entailed in the construction of this dam.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many thousand horse-power will be developed by diverting the Ghost river? The hon. member said a moment ago that it would not amount to anything. Does he know how much power will be generated at the first plant on the Cascade river? It is approximately 22,000 horse-power, is it not?

Mr. EDWARDS: The power will be relatively expensive, but there is 60,000,000 kilowatt hours to be obtained from it and from additional stored water under present plans.

Mr. MacNICOL: At $25 per horse-power, that means a large sum of money per year.

Mr. EDWARDS: The result of the construction of this dam will be to store water in lake Minnewanka where already, as the minister has pointed out, there is some storage of water. The dam will increase the amount of water stored there during the season when there is a heavy run-off, so that it may be used in the fall and winter when otherwise there would be a shortage of water for power purposes. It must be borne in mind that the water will be used at the Minnewanka plant; then it will go down the Bow river to the Kananaskis plant, where it will generate power; then it will go farther down the river to the Horseshoe plant, where it will generate more power, and then on down the river to the Ghost river plant, where it will generate still more power. In other words the waters stored by this dam will be used four times, and that is the fact that makes this a sound proposition. The last three plants named—the Ghost, Horseshoe and Kananaskis plants—are all outside the park area.

There is one other aspect of the matter to which I should like to refer. I became somewhat exercised when I learned that the government was considering the establishment of an ammonium nitrate or chemical plant in western Canada. I was told that the manufacture of ammonium nitrate under modern chemical practice required the compression of natural gas and air, and when I contemplate the millions of cubic feet of natural gas that have been going to waste in the Turner valley for at least twenty years, to my own knowledge, it seemed to me that there was only one logical and economical place where that plant should be erected, namely, at Calgary. But in addition to the gas, air and water, power is required. It is my understanding that the operation of this plant will require some 23,000 horse-power, and that power will have to be supplied continuously, night and day. There will not be high peaks and low ebbs as is ordinarily the case in commercial plants; there will be a steady drain on the power resources of that district, and the question was how that power should be obtained. There were other alternatives, to which reference has been made; there were the Kananaskis proposition and the Spray lakes development, which would have involved expenditures many times greater than those contemplated under this project, with the further objection that the power would not have been so readily available. It is contemplated that this plant, which is now almost completed, will be in operation this fall, that this plant at Minnewanka, operated by the Calgary Power company, will have power available for the operation of the plant at that time. Under this project power will be made available more cheaply than it could under any other scheme, and in addition no capital outlay is involved on the part of the Canadian people.

One other consideration which to me is cogent and convincing is that this project has the unanimous endorsation of the government of Alberta, who I am sure would be most jealous and zealous in protecting the rights of the people of that province. Certainly no one could accuse the government of Alberta of being unduly anxious to place themselves or the people of that province in the hands—or the maw, if you will—of the financial interests of St. James Street or anywhere else. Further, I am reliably informed that this company is in no way connected with or a subsidiary of the so-called Beauharnois Power Corporation. I am not concerned with that, however; I hope we may deal with this matter on its own merits. The province of Alberta, through its public utilities board, has absolute control over the rate structure of all public utilities in the province; and I am sure it will deal fairly but justly with the Calgary Power company should any attempt be made to take advantage of the people of Alberta in the matter of rates. I am not in the least agitated or exercised over the ability of the province of Alberta to look after itself so far as rates are concerned. Neither am I disturbed or alarmed as to the scenic beauties of lake Minnewanka. My personal opinion is that those scenic beauties will be enhanced, if anything, as a result of this improvement.

The other point about which I am concerned is the post-war value of this project, in common with that of all other war projects. This will entail no headache to the Canadian people; it is not an enterprise that will be pawned off for its salvage value. I see in this a stepping stone to the development of another economic centre for the Dominion of Canada. The province of Alberta is singularly blessed with natural resources such as coal, gas, oil, timber and other gifts of the Almighty, which are there to be developed. But, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has pointed out, we the people of Alberta realize that the corner stone of economic and industrial development is power—an abundance of power. The Minister of Munitions and Supply has emphasized that point. Here is a possibility of making available surplus power for industrial development following the war.

For these reasons I know my constituents are whole-heartedly behind the bill before the house, and are anxious that it should be proceeded with.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, with a good deal of what the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) has said, I am in accord. All that part of his speech which has to do with the development of the natural resources of Alberta meets decidedly with my approval. But the organization of this particular project, from its financial side, is a matter to which hon. members sitting in this chamber should give careful thought and scrutiny. We should consider how it is made up. Or, to use the ordinary expression in the street, we should check and double check this particular legislation, then soak it in vinegar over night, and come back the next morning and read it over. That is with regard to the financial phase of the legislation.

A few moments ago interjections were made respecting the loss of scenic value. I was prompted to interrupt because of correspondence which had come to my desk from certain school teachers and others who were worried about losing the natural scenic or real tourist value of that area.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The scenic value will not be impaired in the slightest.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Let me be the first to wave those suggestions to one side, in the interests of Canada. When I think of Canada's interests in this connection I think of what was in the mind of the hon. member who said that Alberta was blessed with natural resources of a kind which perhaps are not found to the same degree in other parts of Canada. I am thinking now, while the war is on, of the ammonium salts of all kinds, of the nitrates and the ammonium nitrates which can be produced from the natural resources of Alberta, and which are so much required at this time of war. I would waive all other considerations if I were sure that this legislation would increase the production of those vital necessities of war. I refer of course to ammonium salts and nitrates. We need them. Whether they come from the coal of Alberta, or from the nitrates and ammoniates reclaimed from the gases which come from the oil wells of the Turner valley—no matter whence they come, we need them. We in this chamber should address ourselves more and more to the task of accumulating in order to supply to our forces the chemical necessities of war. If this legislation is purely a war measure, as was intimated some months ago when the matter was first placed before us, and which has been again emphasized—then, yes, by all means let us support this legislation.

At the same time many of us are supporters of public ownership, and we are a little sceptical of what an hon. member has described as St. James street, Montreal, and Bay street, Toronto. We are public ownership men, but even if we have to put to one side our public ownership ideas and let private ownership come forward, with all its enterprise, intuition and forcefulness to develop this power, in order that through that power there may be developed more and more war supplies, then by all means let us go ahead with this legislation, and let the hon. member from the constituency affected, together with his associates, attend to their task of developing this power. Let them see to it that the power, in turn, is used to produce more and more war supplies.

I did not very much like the interruption to the effect that some of us live a thousand miles away from the scene where this development is taking place.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member for Calgary West made that suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It was suggested that that was one reason why we should not make interjections when a subject of this magnitude is under consideration. My answer is that we are Canadians, and as such we think of Canada from Halifax to Vancouver. And, in greater particularity, we are thinking of war conditions. Possibly we are not thinking just enough about the fact that the empire is at war. These picayune interruptions might very well be left to one side when we are discussing a problem of the magnitude of the one now under consideration.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that if this project, whether operated under private or public ownership, is going to help in any way whatsoever in our war effort, by all means let us get on with it. Let us produce the power, so that that power may produce more nitrates and ammoniates from the gases, coal and oils of the Turner valley. Let us produce from the coal of Alberta. Let us help out in this war effort in every possible way.

When the war is over the prairie provinces will need more ammoniates; they will need more nitrates after the last two decades of mining the prairie provinces. Because that observation comes from Ontario some of my western friends may not like it, but they know in their own hearts that crop after crop was taken off and no return was made to the soil. Protein crops have been harvested in western Canada. Here is a project which, if developed, will produce and return to the soil the protein value which has been taken from it in the last two or three decades. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting company spent a couple of million dollars at Trail, British Columbia, to recover the fertilizing value of the gases escaping from their stacks. They had in mind not only the fact that they were disposing of a nuisance to municipalities south of the boundary line and in Canada, but also the fact that those same gases had fertilizer value. The gases were therefore trapped and transmuted into salts which could be used as fertilizers. I do not know how many millions of dollars were spent, but the company did tackle the problem of saving the ammoniates and nitrates from the stacks of its gigantic plant at Trail. The scientific research carried on at the Trail plant has rendered a great service to Canada. It may be that the company was thinking ahead to the time when they might sell the fertilizing product to the western farmers.

The project we are considering to-day will twin up, as it were, with the development at Trail, and help to reestablish in western Canada lands which will again produce bushelage equal to that produced from those virgin soils twenty or thirty years ago. Let us keep in mind the fact that the Canadian people are public-ownership minded. We do not like to hear mention of St. James street, Montreal; we do not like to hear about Bay street, Toronto, because in this chamber for twenty years their tactics and ways of conducting business have been denounced. This is or seems to be a child of organizations of that kind. My hon. friend shakes his head. That makes me feel a little better about it, and if that should be the situation, I say to the hon. member for Calgary and those charged with the passage of this legislation, by all means let us give consideration to its passing. Let us have the power, let us have the nitrates, let us have the ammoniates and what-not. Let us one and all in this chamber address ourselves to the great task that is before us, namely, the winning of the war.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this bill, I am sure, has been before the department for many months. It came to my knowledge at least six months ago, and as a result of the information which I had received I made some, shall I say, cursory investigations into the proposal. The minister has, I think, stated with a fair degree of accuracy and detail the proposal embodied in the bill. The only fault I have to find with him at the moment is that he did not have the bill considered at an earlier stage in the session. The bill was introduced in April, some two months ago, but long before that the arrangements which it is now proposed to validate were entered into. I think it is safe to say that if the war feature were not in this proposal the minister would have had the very greatest hesitation in bringing forward legislation of this kind.

Mr. CRERAR: I can say at once that it would not have been brought forward under those circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I accept that statement without reserve. It is because of the war feature that I am disposed to give support to the measure. If it is represented to us in this house by those in a position of responsibility that this proposal, which is merely the extension of a principle which has already been adopted, namely, the harnessing of the powers of the Bow river, will in any measurable degree help win this war, I do not think we should hesitate very long about debating it. After all, let us be realistic; let us be honest with ourselves. We are always declaring that what matters most at the moment is the winning of the war. I myself have taken that attitude on many occasions. But I suggest to the minister that he should have brought this measure forward earlier in the session so that hon. members would have had more time to study it and know exactly its implications.

I think I should say a word about the sponsors of this power proposition. They are an old established power company in Canada, in the business for gain; there is no question about that. But they are engaged in a legitimate business, a business which has been recognized over a long period of years, and so far as I am aware—and I think I am aware of the facts—they are not in any way connected with the so-called Beauharnois interests—that is, Montreal Light, Heat and Power. It cannot be said, therefore, that they are in furtherance of a particular power monopoly in Canada. But even if they were connected with Montreal power interests I do not think that would be a factor in influencing me at the moment in connection with this measure or in weighing, pro and con, the arguments in favour of or against it. Suffice it to say that these interests have been in the Bow river valley and in that district now for a period approaching forty years.

I am not aware whether the proposal for this development was made to the power company by the officers of the crown, the department of munitions, or whether the position was the reverse, and I do not think it matters very much. I have no manner of doubt that the Calgary Power company, taking the broad and long view of the situation, has wanted to get this storage over a long period of time. Perhaps it is true, as has been stated, that in 1923 offers were made by the company with a view to securing increased storage at this site, lake Minnewanka. That I do not think is a vital question at the moment. The vital thing is this: is the government in concurring in this proposal helping the war effort? In so doing is it injuring, first of all, the national park at Banff, and, secondly, is it violating any great principle? If the whole power proposition in that region were being approached for the first time, other considerations might prevail. The doctrine of public ownership might prevail, although I do not know whether it would or not. I cannot subscribe, with my colleague from Danforth (Mr. Harris), to the principle of public ownership. I am not a public ownership man. I want to preach the doctrine in this house, and I have preached it before, of private enterprise in ordinary times. I do not, therefore, base on either principle any remarks I may have to make in connection with this proposal.

If it is established to the satisfaction of the government and of the minister and of the department that this development is necessary in connection with the war, then, whatever hesitation I may have from any other point of view, I think I should support the measure. The difficulty is just this. The capital cost of the proposed development is so great that no company would be justified in asking its shareholders or its creditors—and it must get the money from either of these two sources—to put up the necessary capital for an enterprise that was intended purely for the duration of the war. I am satisfied that the Calgary Power company or any other business concern would never consider this development purely as a war project and a war project only, and for the duration only. It just would not be business. In that event what would the company do? It would come to the government and say: "We will develop this power, but at your capital cost". That has been done on many occasions in this war. The government has done it very extensively, and I have often wondered whether it was justified in going as far as it has gone. I have not been able to investigate the different avenues in which they have taken that course, but I do know that the capital commitments of the country in that respect have been very great. But I have no doubt that the Minister of Munitions and Supply and members of the government charged with the responsibility will justify every capital expenditure on the building of government-owned plants on the ground of necessity for war purposes, although they are plants which would not be established by any private enterprise during the war unless it were fully compensated or had guarantees of compensation to absorb capital loss if in the meantime money was not made out of the operation of the plant.

This company asks as a condition precedent that, in consideration of putting up the two million odd dollars in capital for development of proposed storage, it be given this right for a long period of time, you might say in effect in perpetuity. Of course that must have created for the minister and for the department a substantial difficulty. It raises a question in my own mind of balancing the good resulting from the franchise, in the expenditure of money for this purpose during the war, against what is practically an extension of their franchise in perpetuity. I am not in a position, with the limited information at my hand, to judge as to whether the decision which the minister and the government have reached is a correct decision or not. If a matter of this sort were coming up early in the session I would want to have a bill of this character referred to some select committee to investigate, where they could hear the evidence pro and con, pass a judgment, and make a considered report to the house. That is not possible to-day. I think the minister has delayed too long proceeding with this measure.

However, in the final analysis he has decided this question in the affirmative. For that decision the minister and the ministry must take responsibility; and I assume that, by putting their imprimatur on this bill and making it a government measure, they are prepared to do so; and, because it is their responsibility, I propose to leave it there.

I would not want the house to understand that there are no implications on the other side. It is too late to turn back on this thing, even if the house were so disposed, because months ago the government gave an interim licence to this company, and I understand that the company have gone on with the work and expended already a very large sum of money on the basis of the undertaking given and of the order in council passed as long ago as December, 1940. I have no doubt that, through an informal undertaking made anterior to that, the company's work is near consummation; indeed it is stated some place, either in these papers or in the minister's statement, that the extra power which will be developed through this project will be available by September 1. If that is so it is all to the good as far as the war effort is concerned, because, make no mistake about it, the product of this plant in Calgary is needed, and will be needed more and more every day as the war progresses.

I am in no position to judge whether Calgary is the right place for the establishment of this plant. From what I have heard I should say it is admirably so adapted. If that is so, I am glad to see some government industrial establishment in the western provinces. It is something for which some of us from the smaller provinces have been contending in this house for months. We have argued that all this new war industry should not be located in central Canada, as has been far too much the case. Only six-tenths of one per cent of all the capital expenditures made by this government on war industry have been allocated to New Brunswick, that little province down by the sea, where, in the last war, we made literally hundreds of thousands of shells and other war material. That is one of the causes of complaint against the government. I know the excuse is that there is lack of power; I am not quite sure that the excuse is a good one. But that is merely in passing.

Another argument against this proposal, advanced in certain quarters, is that which, if my information be correct, prompted the permanent officials of the minister's department in their first opposition to this proposal—if they did oppose it—has to do with the question of the destruction of the scenic beauties. Notwithstanding anything that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) may have said, you cannot, generally speaking, disturb nature without some destruction of natural beauty. It is a question, then, of balance: which is the better thing to do. If you decide to disturb nature you should, so far as is humanly possible within the limits of engineering skill, minimize the destruction of natural scenic beauty. I have had the benefit of reading the draft of the proposed lease, the "interim licence" it is called, and I want to say that whoever drafted this licence took the utmost care to minimize as far as possible the damage which will accrue to the scenic beauties of that wonderful lake which I have had the pleasure of seeing and which I hope to visit again before I die. I repeat that whoever drafted this licence took infinite pains to guard against that danger, so far as it can be guarded against by foresight, by experience and by vision. I am inclined to think that there will be very little destruction of scenic beauty, and therefore I do not believe any great body of opposition should on that ground be directed against this proposal.

I should like to point out the full extent of the rights to be conferred under the proposals now before the house. At the risk of detaining the house a few minutes I will place them on record as they appear in the form of the draft agreement between this government and the government of Alberta. The provincial government has to consent in a certain degree and with respect to certain factors before this project may become operative:

(a) The right to raise lake Minnewanka to a full supply level of elevation 4,840 feet above mean sea level (geodetic datum) or such lesser elevation as may subsequently be determined by the Minister of Mines and Resources as being the economic maximum with the right to store water up to said elevation and use 200,000 acre-feet of the storage so created or such lesser amount as may subsequently be determined by the said minister—

That is, the Minister of Mines and Resources.

—as being the economic maximum by the construction of a dam across the Cascade River valley at or near the outlet of the said lake;

(b) The right to divert, take and use the water so stored for power purposes by diverting the same through a canal and conduit down a lateral valley to a power station to be constructed on the Cascade River flat at or near Anthracite, and at that point to return the water by suitable works to the Cascade river:

(c) The right to convey the waters of the Ghost river into lake Minnewanka—

I assume that this is part of the scheme with which the province of Alberta is concerned:

—through a canal extending from the park boundary to lake Minnewanka;

(d) The right to construct transmisison lines with the necessary rights-of-way connecting the proposed power station with the existing transmission system of the company outside the park and the system now supplying Banff;

(e) The right to sell electric power to residents in Banff townsite and vicinity;

(f) And generally the right to perform such acts in connection with said storage and power development scheme as may be approved from time to time by the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Be it borne in mind that this right is not for the duration of the war, or for to-day or to-morrow. When it is granted, when this legislation is passed, it is to be practically in perpetuity. All right. The thing is accepted; and because it is an accomplished fact, because it is represented as being necessary in connection with the war, we should be careful about the degree of our opposition to it. I am inclined to agree with the minister that if it were not for the war aspect we ought to oppose it; yet I can see another point of view with respect to the industrial development of that part of the province of Alberta.

War or no war, Alberta has the right, having regard to its great store of natural resources, to look forward to the day when it will be industrialized. What has been the whole effort of this country ever since I was a boy? It has been as far as possible to have an industrial life in Canada. I know there are people in this country who do not agree with that point of view. I have heard the minister himself in days gone by, right from these seats, declare that this country should encourage only those industries which are indigenous to the land. Well, we have gone a long way beyond that. If the people of Calgary have at their door great potential water powers, even though they form part of the national park, even though in the natural state they constitute a great beauty, I am afraid that if I were a citizen of Calgary I would be all for the development of the natural power, whether by St. James street or by the government of Alberta. What we want is progress. Are we to be hewers of wood and drawers of water all our lives? Are the people of Alberta to be confined to the growing of wheat all their lives? Present day indications suggest that they had better try to change their whole economy. If this will have the effect of changing the economy of that part of Alberta, then I think we are justified in voting for this measure, even though we may be violating some other tenets which we hold with regard to national parks. I will vote for the measure, but I must say that I do so after a great deal of hesitation and some study of the whole situation.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Since it is impossible to take advantage of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to develop the water power described in the schedule to Bill No. 60, an act to amend the Alberta Natural Resources Act, I do not share the views of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I do not say this because he has expressed them; I have other reasons. Of course everything we do, we are told, has something to do with the war. If a member blows his nose in this house we are to believe it has something to do with the war. We cannot move a step without having this said. I am opposed to this legislation and perhaps the house will sit ten days longer because of contentious bills that are brought in at the last minute. This is not the way to set an example to the provincial legislatures with regard to the passing of legislation.

It will be said, in reply, that it is the will of the province of Alberta, and that is all right. But there is something deeper than that. There was drum-beating when the natural resources were transferred to the prairie provinces eleven years ago, but it was a mistake, and the mistake was made before that. The mistake was in the creation of the western provinces. It was a great mistake. They should have remained northwest territories and everyone would have been better off. But as matters stand, the three prairie provinces having been created thirty-seven years ago, the natural resources have been handed over to them, depriving the dominion government of all guarantees it had for the loans made to the provinces. An agreement was signed between the dominion government and the government of Alberta and therefore it is pretty hard now to oppose this legislation successfully. I suggest, however, that legislation should be considered objectively, and with regard to every piece of legislation brought forward every member should ask himself this question: Is it good or bad legislation? Every member should ask himself that question without considering whether it pleases Mr. So-and-So or the Hon. Mr. So-and-So, or the Hon. the Premier of Such and Such a province, et cetera, et cetera.

Here we are in the presence of an accomplished fact, namely, that the government will disburse $240,000 on this project. Have we the means to do it? The answer is no, and we cannot decently ask the taxpayers of Canada to pay taxes for such schemes. It is all right for a man who has money in the bank to dispose of it as he pleases, but no government has the right to deprive the taxpayers of Canada of their money in order to encourage schemes like this to favour millionaires such as those in that company. It is bad legislation. No one can argue to my satisfaction that it is good legislation. How is it that the unemployed in my county cannot receive a cent from this government? It has been cut. Yet there are millionaires who own a big power corporation at Calgary and who can get $240,000. And we say it is a war measure. That is a great excuse; it is the general excuse.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) laughs. Well, he is a laughing example of self-contradiction. Every time he rises he says, "I am against this or that," and then, "I am all for it." He has only to scratch the inside of his hand with one or two fingers and he is all for it. I should like him to be more serious, and instead of being so contradictory he should have the wisdom to remain silent and not say black and then say white, and not say white and then say black.

I regret that at this time of the session, the closing days of the session, legislation such as this should be brought forward. It will have a bad effect. If Liberal members had been asked beforehand about it they would have been wiser than the government of Alberta and would have said, "No, we cannot do it." I wonder if it is not a reminder of the last provincial election in Alberta, and if there was not an agreement between the government and the Calgary Power company at that time. And is it not on account of that promise that the provincial government was bound to sign "yes" to the exorbitant request of the power company? One has only to open his eyes to see and to look and read between the lines. It is easy to understand. It is no secret; it is on paper, and it is not only on paper but on official paper, on the official record. Are we to spend money now to refund to the Calgary Power company any election subscriptions made to the government of Alberta? That is the question.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall detain the house only a very few minutes. The suggestion or claim has been made in the course of the debate that this is not a war measure, that there is something almost sinister behind the business of granting to the Calgary Power company the right to store water in lake Minnewanka. Let me make it unequivocally clear that this is a war measure. If I had not been convinced that it is necessary to provide continuous power for the development of an ammonium nitrate industry very much needed for the production of munitions, I would not have made the recommendation to my colleagues that this measure be proceeded with. And I am quite sure that the government would not have approved the measure. Let there be no misunderstanding about that.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) seemed to argue on both sides of the question. I rather gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) that he was in a somewhat similar position. The hon. member for Bow River stated that the Calgary Power company was a subsidiary of the Beauharnois company. It is not my business here to deal with either the virtues or the iniquities of power companies, but I can assure the hon. member for Bow River that there is no connection whatever between the Calgary Power company and the Beauharnois company. As a matter of fact in their own fields in other parts of Canada I understand that there is a good deal of rivalry between them.

The hon. member for Mackenzie also made the suggestion that we should let the matter stand, that we should not proceed with this measure until the war is over. That as a practical matter is quite impossible. The outlay by the company for these works will be almost $2,400,000. Even in these days that is a considerable sum of money, and if a company asked the public or its shareholders to supply this amount of money for a development of this kind on the assumption that after the war they would get some authority to continue it, it would be impossible for them to get the money. There can be no question about that in the mind of any reasonable person who is aware of the facts. The matter is one of war emergency, and I repeat, that is the only reason it is before the house.

The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is I think under a misapprehension, if I understood his remarks correctly. There is no proposal in this measure to pay $240,000 to the Calgary Power company or anyone associated with it. The government sells its present power plant and distribution system in the town of Banff to the Calgary Power company. That distribution system and the power plant cost $240,000, and we get from the Calgary Power company the depreciated value of the plant. The basis of arriving at the amount of depreciation has to be agreed upon between the government and the company. In addition the company pays to the government $100,000 over and above what it pays for the depreciated value of the plant, and on top of that, as I have stated, the government is assured of 500,000 kilowatt hours of electrical energy free of cost, its additional requirements at half a cent a kilowatt hour, and the citizens of Banff are assured of their light and power requirements at rates no greater than they are paying at the present time and under conditions subject to review by the public utilities board of Alberta when they wish to have them reviewed. In that respect I think we have effectively protected the people of the town of Banff.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In addition there is an annual rental.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. There is only one other matter with which I wish to deal. It is the criticism of the leader of the opposition that this bill should have been introduced earlier, or more time afforded for its consideration. Before the bill was introduced an agreement had to be reached with the province of Alberta, because under the terms of the transfer agreement under which the resources went to the province that was necessary. There were some delays in getting to the point where we were in agreement, and that agreement, as my hon. friend will know, was not signed until March 28, 1941. It will be recalled that parliament adjourned a few days after that for a long Easter recess. The bill was introduced before the adjournment, but there was not an opportunity then to proceed with it. Following the adjournment we got into the budget debate and a protracted consideration of the budget resolutions. I tell the house quite frankly that I had hoped to have the measure before the house weeks ago, but I did not have an opportunity to do so until yesterday, and then I made way for my colleague the Minister of Agriculture. Therefore we reached the measure to-day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How far has the development of the storage proceeded, and when will it be available? Will the nitrogen plant be ready for operation by September 1?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot at the moment say what progress has been made on the nitrogen plant. I think work was started on it immediately the decision was rendered in this matter.

So far as the storage works at the lake are concerned, that work has been going on for several months. I understand that the clearing has been nearly all done on the shores and a substantial start made on the dam. I have received information to-day that the level of the lake has already been raised, as at May 24 last, four feet above the maximum level under the agreement of 1912.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must have been more than six months ago that the decision to erect the plant was made; it says so in the explanatory note. The company made the application in November, 1940, following the decision to erect a plant.

Mr. EDWARDS: I happened to be in Calgary at Easter, and I know that according to present plans and expectations, not only will the ammonium nitrate plant be operating in September or October, but the power company expect to be able to deliver power in November at the latest, and everything is working according to schedule.

Mr. STIRLING: What type of construction will be followed in building the dam?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be an earthen dam.

Mr. STIRLING: No core?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not familiar with the manner in which earthen dams are constructed. As a matter of fact, I had some doubt about that point and consulted Doctor Hogg who, as I stated in my remarks this morning, has been retained at the expense of the company to advise the department. He tells me that an earthen dam is quite practicable and, indeed, is becoming one of the ordinarily accepted methods of creating these reservoirs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would there be any danger to the life and property of the population if the dam should go out? I do not know the location of it.

Mr. CRERAR: That was the very point I raised with Doctor Hogg, and he assured me that the plan under which the dam would be built would effectively safeguard it against any such contingency.

Mr. MacNICOL: Every dam has a core. The dams built by the hydro do not have concrete cores; they use either stone or an impervious kind of clay as a base. If a dam is properly constructed, the fact that it is made of earth does not make it any weaker. Many large dams in Ohio, some of which are a mile wide, are made in the same way. Part of the dam, however, must be of concrete in order to take care of the overflow. When the hon. member for Calgary West was speaking, it came out that there would be a concrete portion of the dam of sufficient width to permit the natural overflow to pass through when the water might not be required.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement confirmed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to preface my remarks by saying that this morning I understand the hon. member for Bow River offered some criticism because many hon. members were absent from the house when this matter was under discussion. I think the hon. gentleman failed to realize that many hon. members are on committees which have been sitting almost continuously while the house has been sitting. Since his criticism was put on record, perhaps this statement might also be noted.

I have read the agreement, and it seems to give a great deal of power to the Calgary Power company in connection with the water in that part of the Rocky mountains, not only in the lake itself but in areas adjacent to the lake. The company is given the right to raise the level of lake Minnewanka; "the right to divert, take and use the water so stored for the power purposes by diverting the same through a canal and conduit," and so forth; "the right to convey the waters of the Ghost river into lake Minnewanka"; "the right to construct transmission lines," and then the company is given a power franchise. I do not know whether this provision is new, but the company is given "the right to sell electric power to residents in Banff townsite and vicinity, and generally the right to perform such acts in connection with said storage and power development as may be approved from time to time by the Minister of Mines and Resources." These are wide powers, and I am wondering whether the diversion of these waters and the construction of these conduits will interfere with the natural beauty of this lake and of the national park. After all, this is a national asset which was deliberately kept for the nation when the natural resources agreement was concluded between the dominion government and the province of Alberta. I know very little about the Calgary Power company except that from time to time in past years it has been the subject of some public criticism on account of its rates and the wide powers that it enjoys. I also recollect that in 1929 or 1930—I have forgotten the year—when in the city of Regina we were considering a franchise for gas, the Nesbitt Thomson company, which I believe is the organization largely interested in the Calgary Power company—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is quite wrong about that.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I am wrong I should be glad to be corrected, but that was my recollection, and I am not so sure that it was wrong. I know the Calgary Power company has affiliations with other power organizations across this dominion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a Royal Securities promotion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I am glad to be corrected to that extent; I was relying on my memory. In any event, before an agreement of this sort is approved by this House of Commons, every alternative suggestion should be canvassed. I am a bit surprised that in Alberta, where they have a government which likes to make people believe it is progressive, they are still allowing the alienation of public resources and encouraging the dominion government further to alienate power resources; for, after all, water power is one of the most important assets we have in this country. I am never in favour of alienating those resources, even during war time. As the leader of the opposition pointed out during the course of his remarks, we are undertaking the construction of government-owned plants of various types, and it seems to me that if we need to produce war material and must expand our power resources in order to do so, the better policy would be for the governments concerned to expropriate some of these private organizations and restore the resources concerned to the general public of the country.

Because I hold that point of view I do not like an agreement of this kind. In any event, I do not like an agreement which gives the wide powers it contains. It seems to me that they are wider than necessary to do the thing the bill purports to desire to do. Therefore I take this opportunity of criticizing this agreement, and I would ask the minister if he can throw any light upon the several points I have tried to make, particularly with regard to any interference with the beauty of this lovely national park, and the alienation of an additional resource by the diversion of more water.

Mr. CRERAR: The extent to which the natural beauty of the area surrounding the lake, and of the lake itself, will be lessened by these works is a matter concerning which there is some difference of opinion. All I can say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is that we have taken every possible precaution to ensure that the scenic beauty will be disturbed as little as possible.

My hon. friend, the member for Calgary West, thinks that on the whole the beauty of the area may be enhanced by these works. There are those in the town of Banff who are familiar with the whole matter, and who hold the same view. I pass no opinion on the subject. After all, I suppose one's judgment respecting the beauty of surroundings of that kind depends to some extent upon his aesthetic tastes, or his sense of beauty. In any event, I can assure the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that every possible precaution is being taken to detract as little as possible from the natural beauty of the lake.

He seems to argue that in the agreement we are giving wide powers to the company. Possibly the hon. member has not read the agreement very closely. For instance, in paragraph (a) to which he referred, all we do is to give the right to raise the lake level above the point to which permission was given in the agreement of 1912. We permit the company to store up to but not exceeding 200,000 acre-feet of water.

Quite obviously, if a storage reservoir were to be created by the company under these conditions, it was necessary to give it power to create the conditions which would make such storage effective. Paragraph (b) confers the right to divert, take and use the water so stored for the purpose of developing this power at or near Anthracite. That is, in the first place we give the power to store the water, and in the second place we give power to divert from storage to the power plant. I do not think there is anything extraordinary about that.

Then under paragraph (c) there is the right to convey the waters of the Ghost river into lake Minnewanka through a canal extending from the park boundary to lake Minnewanka. The diversion of the water of the Ghost river is wholly a matter for the Alberta government. If that government says, "No, we will not permit diversion of water from the Ghost river," then of course the water from the Ghost river does not go into Minnewanka. It was necessary for us to give the company power to take water into the park from outside, into lake Minnewanka within the park. In doing so, it has to build a canal in order that the water may come from the Ghost river into lake Minnewanka for storage purposes. Again I submit there is nothing extraordinary in that paragraph.

Paragraph (d) conveys the right to construct transmission lines, with the necessary rights-of-way connecting the proposed power station with the existing transmission system. Quite obviously, if the company were going to develop power, it would require transmission lines to convey that power from the point of development to the point of use.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could those lines not be placed underground?

Mr. CRERAR: That has not been customary in Canada, except in large cities. I understand that the transmission lines will be placed back from the road, where they will be scarcely visible from the travelled highway. Again there is nothing extraordinary in the paragraph.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One follows from the other.

Mr. CRERAR: Paragraph (e) confers the right to sell electric power to residents in Banff townsite and vicinity. Arrangements were made, as I have already said to-day—

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not here.

Mr. CRERAR: —which protect the residents of Banff in respect of the price they have to pay for power and energy, and under conditions which we believe very fairly reimburse the government for the outlay it had made in the past. We are then relieved of the task of collecting meter rentals from the residents of Banff. In all matters where government operations of utilities of this kind are concerned, one runs into difficulties of that kind. Conditions arise where people cannot pay their power bills, and I have known instances where the good offices of the local member were invoked in an effort to obtain relief.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a wrong principle.

Mr. CRERAR: We relieve ourselves of all that. At the same time we protect fully the residents of Banff with regard to charges which may be made for light and energy used. That, again, I submit, is an ordinary provision.

Paragraph (f) is general in scope. There may be other operations the power company would have to carry out. It is given power to perform such acts in connection with said storage and power development scheme as may be approved from time to time by the Minister of Mines and Resources. In other words, the company is not given carte blanche to go ahead and do as it wishes. Every proposal it makes in that connection must have the approval of that member of the government who for the time being happens to be Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. MacNICOL: The company's plans will have to be accepted by the government's engineers.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe on reflection the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will agree that the powers given here are not as unusual or extraordinary as he indicated in his remarks a few minutes ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: The purpose of my remarks was, very largely, to bring out some of the points the minister has now made. He has cleared up several of them. At the same time I still believe the powers given are wide, although many of the explanations given by the minister have cleared up doubts which formerly existed. I hope that in another year committees will not be sitting coincidentally with the house, and that we shall not be placed in a position where we have to come into the house and ask questions which have already been answered. I understand that many of these questions were answered to-day.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the agreement hold any reference to what Alberta will receive for the water from the Ghost river?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or is the water given by Alberta without charge, or without any consideration?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say as to that. That was not a matter with which this government had to deal. I presume the Alberta government has made what it considers a fair and equitable arrangement for the use of the water.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I said before, I am not opposed to the bill, but I believe certain facts should be recorded so that the public will know what is being given away. I calculated this morning that the Ghost river would have a flow of about 600 c.f.s., but at the noon recess someone better qualified than I am to make the computation told me that the flow is 750 c.f.s. That is a substantial volume.

Mr. EDWARDS: At what point?

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member knows, it is all right to interrupt; but if he does not know, I do not wish to have interruptions.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am asking only for information. At what point in the river is the computation made?

Mr. MacNICOL: At the point of diversion. My estimation was made on the assumption that the lake, being about twelve miles long and about three-quarters of a mile wide, would have an area of about nine to ten square miles. Upon looking at the map, I would judge that the Ghost river watershed covers about 100 square miles. I am told that it is a little more than that. It is well known that the water yield from the lake Superior watershed is ·94 c.f.s. per square mile; Lake Huron, ·82 c.f.s.; Grand River at Galt, has an average flow of ·4 c.f.s. per square mile of watershed; and therefore I estimated this morning that 600 c.f.s might be the flow from the Ghost river, but someone better informed than I am told me that the actual flow is 750 c.f.s. I am informed that the head of water from Minnewanka to the power house on the Cascade is 320 feet. Now 750 cubic feet a second flow, with a head of 320 feet, means about what the bill says, a minimum of 20,000 horsepower. That is a substantial gift to somebody. At $25 per horse-power it would be $500,000 a year.

We learned this morning that after the water passed through the new power-house into the Cascade river and from there into the Bow river and on down the Bow river, it passes through three more power-houses. I should like to know the head at each one of these power-houses so that I can estimate the increased amount of power at each power-house and see just what the total value of this gift will be. If it means a gift of $500,000 a year at the new power-house, where the water pours into the Cascade, what would it mean at the three other power-houses? We have not been informed as to the head of water at any of these three power-houses. If there should be another $500,000 a year at these, it would mean a gift of $1,000,000 a year.

I am not opposed to this project as a war measure. I endorse all that has been said as to the necessity for Alberta having industries because that is important. But I have been opposed from the beginning to legislation of this kind being brought into parliament at the last minute and the argument being used to get the legislation passed that it is necessary for war purposes. I am bitterly opposed to that procedure. The same kind of thing was done in 1918 in connection with the Massena diversion. If the minister is perfectly satisfied, as he seems to be, that this project is necessary on account of the war, I shall not oppose it. I wish to say that I have every confidence in the minister. I listened to him carefully this morning, and I accepted his statement that he personally would not for one minute tolerate any such agreement as this at any other time than the present, but that it was necessary for it to go through as a part of our war effort. It must go through in that event; indeed, I believe construction is almost completed, and consequently all that we are now saying here can be of little benefit so far as this project is concerned. I hope, however, that what has been said here to-day will be a safeguard for the future and that if and when any other raid is made on the natural resources of this country, there will be a full and open inquiry publicly made, and that the parliament of Canada will be perfectly free to discuss it before any conclusion is reached. I realize that the minister's hands were tied in this case because, before the matter came to him, the Alberta government had already passed it and thrown it on his doorstep.

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is not correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: In any event, the Alberta government had endorsed the project. I was trying to get the minister out of a hole, and he would not let me do it. The Alberta government had, however, endorsed the project, and to a certain extent the minister's hands were then tied.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The location of the dam in question is not one of the beauty spots of the national park. It is by no means a spot of beauty. I wish to compliment the minister upon the precautions he has taken to improve the appearance of the park at this point. When this work is completed it will, in my opinion, be a much more beautiful spot than it is at present.

Like the hon. member for Davenport and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in this house, I am strongly in favour of public ownership of public utilities. All public utilities should under normal conditions be owned and controlled by the government. At the present time, however, this ammonium plant is needed for war purposes; it is essential for war purposes, and the power does not exist for the development of the project. It could be developed, true enough, from Spray river, or the power could be developed from coal. But either of these ways would occasion a delay of almost a year or more, and we cannot afford to delay at this time. We are in a war, and that work must be proceeded with quickly. For that reason it should be done by a private concern. We cannot wait to expropriate plants which are already carrying on and run them as a government-owned project.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there, or are there likely to be, any bridges erected over the canal from the Ghost river to Minnewanka lake? If any bridges are likely to be built, who is to erect them even if it should be at some considerable time in the future?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not anticipate that there will be any bridges erected in that section of the park to which my hon. friend refers, but if any bridge should be erected as a result of the development, it would be erected under the direction of the park authority in the area within the park.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yet, if these bridges were constructed, they would be running over a canal that is dug through the park?

Mr. CRERAR: There would be no difficulty about that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why should the public pay for them? They are not required now.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not conceive that they will be built. It is a part of the park that can be reached by a boat on the lake, but the approach to it is wholly impassable for motor traffic unless a road is tunneled out of the side of the mountain.

Mr. MacNICOL: Inasmuch as the diversion naturally destroys the river for power purposes to a point on the Ghost river where it joins with the Bow, are there any existing rights that someone will have to pay for on the Ghost river?

Mr. CRERAR: I could not say as to that, but as I have stated on two or three occasions, that is outside the park boundary.

Mr. MacNICOL: And therefore Alberta would take care of it?

Mr. CRERAR: That is wholly within the control of the province of Alberta.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AUTHORITY TO UNDERTAKE PROJECTS INVOLVING ANNUAL EXPENDITURE OF LESS THAN $5,000

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 92, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Minister may undertake projects and schemes and enter into agreements.

Mr. GARDINER: I wish to propose an amendment to section 1, relative to section 10 (a).

Mr. MULOCK: I move:

That section one be amended by adding after the word "scheme" in the third line of section 10 (a) the words "under and by virtue of this act."

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister explain?

Mr. GARDINER: That covers the point discussed yesterday by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was suggested that the minister was not obligated to keep within the terms of the act in relation to the vote of $2,500,000 for this year or whatever the amount may be for any other year; and this simply states:

(a) subject to section four of this act, undertake the development, construction, promotion, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme under and by virtue of this act.

Mr. PERLEY: Is it under this measure that the minister proposes to carry on the operations with reference to summer-fallow? Or is it under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. GARDINER: It is under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not think that there is very much more to be said with reference to this bill. We went into it pretty fully yesterday. The minister might give the committee some information with reference to the number of outstanding contracts at the present time, not completed before operations were started under this act. Are there any outstanding projects for contracts for delivery of materials or anything of that kind?

Mr. GARDINER: Everything for which the department was obligated down to the end of the financial year, that is March 31, has been paid. It seems to me that matters of this kind might be discussed much better under the estimates for the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which will probably be under discussion this evening. At that time I can have all the information here with regard to that matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

22. Marketing service. Marketing service administration, $95,252.

Mr. MARTIN: We have heard in the house during this session, from those who represent agricultural communities or communities which are composed of industrial and agricultural sections, a great deal about wheat, coarse grains and the like. While at this late date one is possibly open to censure for discussing a matter which has not already been discussed, let alone questions which have been, I propose to speak on a matter which is of concern not only to my own constituency but to the whole area known as the southwestern Ontario peninsula, and better known, having in mind the matter which I wish to discuss, as the corn belt of Canada.

The counties vitally interested in this matter in southwestern Ontario are those of Essex—my own county—Kent, Lambton, Elgin and West Middlesex. Eighty-five per cent of the corn production of Canada is in that area, and the counties of Essex and Kent are responsible for 65 per cent of the total corn production of this country. It is, of course, grown as a cash crop and is a vital factor in the income of the agricultural community in that area.

The recent agricultural policy of the government has affected that group and the ensuing farmers' income considerably. I do not propose to attack that policy but simply to indicate the effect which it has had upon this section of the agricultural community and to urge that a proposal which I brought before the house two or three sessions ago should be considered more fully and completely than it has been.

There is a similarity between agriculture as it is carried on in western Canada and in these counties, in contrast with the rest of Ontario, when one considers that the cash crops of these two latter find markets in central and eastern Ontario and not solely within the section where the corn crop itself is grown. The difference between agriculture in the counties in southwestern Ontario that I have mentioned and the rest of Ontario is illustrated by an analysis of the statistics of western feed grain shipped into Ontario recently from Fort William and Port Arthur under a freight subsidy plan jointly engaged in by the provincial and the federal governments. Under this plan, 1,900 carloads of feed grain were shipped into Ontario. The freight subsidy amounted to $338,000. Not a single car of this grain came into my own county of Essex or into the county of Lambton. Kent had four cars, and the county of Elgin, two. Therefore only six cars out of 1,900 under this scheme were shipped into the corn-belt area, and the reason is that we are a surplus grain area in contrast with the rest of Ontario. The fact is, however, that the $330,000 paid by both governments, provincial and federal, was of no direct monetary value to the farmers in this area. Moreover, the corn growers, being in possession of several million bushels of corn had to compete with western grains, and consequently their product was made cheaper on account of the favourable position in which western coarse grains found themselves as a result of the subsidy plan. This had a great effect on the price of corn.

On December 16, 1940, the Minister of Agriculture announced that the government was considering a subsidy plan. Immediately the price of corn was depressed. The minister will recall that I then pointed out to him by telegram and in person the difficulty that would arise from a scheme which, although it is true it had been asked for by the province of Ontario, had not been considered in its full aspects and was bound to be disturbing to the farmers in the whole area of southwestern Ontario. The policy became effective in February, 1941, and the price of corn had fallen to ten cents. The committee will realize that a price of ten cents, having in mind that the tariff on corn is only ten cents, and having in mind also the difficulties which farmers in that part of the country must face in common with farmers in other parts of Canada, was a serious matter; so much so that the largest agency buying corn in western Ontario announced on February 8, 1941, that, owing to the subsidy being granted by the government on feed grains from western Canada, prices for Ontario corn and other grains were temporarily withdrawn. Not only that, but many of the farmers who sold during the first three months of this year lost ten cents a bushel as a direct result of the feed grain subsidy scheme and were put in a definitely discriminatory position.

I am not unaware of the difficulty of the Minister of Agriculture, and I will not go so far as to say that this freight subsidy plan, having in mind the demands of eastern agriculture, cannot possibly provoke a justifiable argument. What I am saying, however, is this, that if the scheme has the effect of embarrassing one section of the community, the onus is surely on the administration to consider ways and means of mitigating that. Before coming to what I have specifically in mind, I should point out that the recent plan of the administration to increase production of coarse grains in western Canada by paying subsidies for land taken out of wheat production will also be a detriment to the corn growers of southwestern Ontario by reason of the added competition which these coarse grains will provide in the feed markets of eastern Ontario.

In March, 1938, I introduced in this house a resolution which was fully debated on all sides. The preamble indicated that there was a corn belt in Canada, that there was an area which produced at one time the entire corn consumptive needs of the country, and that every encouragement should be given to that area. The fact is that to-day we grow about 9,000,000 bushels of corn and consume about 15,000,000 bushels, and consequently we are compelled to import, mainly now from south Africa and the Argentine. The supplying of these importations under a definite policy on the part of the government, and greater encouragement to agriculture in that area, would bring about an increased acreage of corn production with subsequent benefit to the farmers from a financial point of view.

Having pointed out the problem generally in the preamble to that resolution, I urged upon the government two matters, and I urge them again. The first is that the government, in view of what I have just stated, should consider the necessity for improved marketing facilities and, second, the need for providing adequate storage, drying, government grading and inspection facilities in order that the quality of corn may be improved and the production increased. That resolution was adopted by the government of the day. The then Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in this house in the face of opposition from some quarters, accepted it; and his acceptance, to me, could only mean that he fully approved. Not having made any reservations, he could only have been assumed to concur in what the resolution sought to indicate. I regret to say, however, that while some interest has been displayed in this problem, no answer commensurate with what would seem to have been undertaken by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce has followed.

What did happen was that a member of the board of grain commissioners for the first time officially visited western Ontario, although western Ontario, from an agricultural point of view, is the most thickly populated area in Canada. As a result of the visit of this member of the board, Mr. Hamilton, it was decided to put in motion the operations of the wheat board. Consequently, with the setting up of this wheat board office went compulsory grading and inspection of wheat. Unfortunately, that compulsory feature was not applied to corn; and the figures, laborious as they may seem, nevertheless, even in the summarized form in which I propose to submit them, will indicate that if we could apply to agriculture, particularly to corn in southwestern Ontario, the same marketing principles that we have established with reference to wheat in western Canada, we would find occasion for considerable improvement.

I have here a table which, with the permission of the committee, I should like to place on Hansard and which I shall summarize.

Twelve months ending July 31

	Bushels
Kind of grain	1938	1939	1940
Wheat	982,429	1,695,005	3,252,738
Oats	289,980	79,410	89,685
Barley	260,612	95,210	64,180
Rye	36,131	3,000	5,000
Corn	116,000	508,360	860,538
Mixed grain	51,250	3,050	1,250
Buckwheat	276,643	247,619	109,962
Total	2,013,045	2,631,654	4,383,353

This table indicates the amount of inspection for the years 1938, 1939 and 1940. The figures are given in the Canadian Weekly Grain Statistics, August 4, 1939, and July 31, 1940, published by the dominion bureau of statistics. They show with regard to wheat, oats, barley, rye, corn, mixed grain, buckwheat, an original disposition on the part of farmers not accustomed to a compulsory, let alone a voluntary, scheme of inspection and grading. They show for 1938, covering inspections that were made in that year in Toronto and Montreal, a tremendous improvement over the preceding year. The figures for 1939 cover the first year in the Chatham office,

Chatham being a town in western Ontario, the centre of the agricultural community. After the Chatham office was established, there was an increase of 618,609 bushels inspected over the figure of the previous year, or an increase of 30 per cent. The following year, 1940, shows a still greater increase over 1938, of 2,370,308 bushels, or 118 per cent.

Most of the increase had to do with wheat. This was, I think, due in large part to the fact that during the crop year ended July 1, 1940, Ontario wheat was handled by the Canadian wheat board. The board made inspection and grading compulsory in connection with all wheat which it accepted. That this system of compulsory inspection of wheat was advantageous to the producers is evidenced by the fact that of 3,252,738 bushels inspected during the year, the grading was as follows:

	Bushels
No. 1 Canadian eastern.....	2,681,069
No. 2 Canadian eastern.....	445,126
Lower than No. 2 Canadian eastern	126,543

The importance of the counties of Essex and Kent, and the surrounding district in a slighter degree, as a grain producing and marketing area may be understood from a study of the grain inspections of the three inspection offices in the eastern division, which are located at Chatham, Toronto and Montreal. The board of grain commissioners, and I say with great respect the Department of Agriculture, have operated as though the Canada Grain Act and the board of grain commissioners were intended to have jurisdiction in one section of the country and not in another. Hon. members who recall the deliberations before the last revision of the Canada Grain Act will see of what importance this minor attempt on the part of the board of grain commissioners and the operation of the wheat board has really been. For the twelve month period from August 1, 1939, to July 31, 1940, inspections of all grains were as follows:

Chatham—2,066 cars, 4 cargoes, 26 bins and 23 trucks.
Toronto—1,207 cars, one cargo.
Montreal—203 cars, 20 cargoes, one bin.

With regard to that general survey itself, it indicates that where emphasis was placed in respect of Toronto and Montreal, that emphasis should now be shifted to southwestern Ontario. On the basis of cars inspected the percentages were as follows:

Chatham—59 per cent.

Chatham being southwestern Ontario.

Toronto—35 per cent.
Montreal—6 per cent.

I do not want to labour these figures too much, but before I come to my main argument I wish to place one more set before hon. members. I urged in this resolution that we should have better drying facilities to remove the large amount of moisture so that the corn would be able to compete satisfactorily even in the home market with corn from south Africa, the Argentine and the United States. As a result, a voluntary system of inspection was set up. The committee may be interested in the quantities of corn that were voluntarily inspected during 1938, 1939 and 1940. They show, in spite of what was said in this house, namely, that farmers would not subject themselves even to a voluntary system of inspection, that was not true. The amounts inspected were as follows:

Year ended—	Bushels
July 1, 1938.....	116,000
July 1, 1939.....	508,360
July 1, 1940.....	860,538

This indicates clearly that where an attempt at inspection was made for the first time on a voluntary basis to try to assist in the marketing of this important commodity to the farmers of southwestern Ontario, the claim made by those who supported my resolution was more than justified. These figures show that the quantity of corn inspected during the last of the three crop years was nearly eight times the quantity of two years before and about 70 per cent greater than the quantity one year before.

Hon. members may ask, "Why this insistence on inspection?" The fact is that the corn grown in that area has very often a moisture content of over 20 per cent. It should not be over 13 per cent in order to compete satisfactorily with corn grown in the Argentine, south Africa and even that which before the war was imported from the United States under a tariff of 10 per cent. Obviously the cornstarch people are not disposed to buy this product unless it is in a satisfactory state, and there is a great industrial market for it. I have urged the setting up of drying facilities to remove the excess moisture, and the establishment by the government of compulsory grading and inspection by government inspectors, so that, just as with regard to western wheat the trade throughout the world knows its quality by the official certificate attached, the farmers of southwestern Ontario might be placed in the same favourable position of being able, under the system I propose, to have their commodity, once it has been properly certified, stand on its merits as does western wheat.

After Mr. Hamilton visited southwestern Ontario, he made a report, which is available to anyone who wishes to see it. It was made to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, not the present minister who I am glad to see in his seat to-day, following my discussion I hope with great diligence and proper profit to himself. This report states:

> Before investigating the matter on the ground—

I presume meaning western Ontario.

> —I proceeded to Ottawa and interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It was decided that the investigation should be limited to the grading of corn; that the question of providing storage and drying facilities did not come under the board of grain commissioners.

That statement indicates that the question has not been approached in the comprehensive way in which it should be approached, because there have been subsequent reports made by the officials of the government, the last being by the agricultural supplies board together with a private survey that has been made, and reported in a valuable compilation entitled "A Survey of Canadian Research on the Utilization of Farm Products" issued by the national chemurgic committee of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. At page 12 of that report will be found substantiation of what I have argued before in this house and of my argument now, and of what government reports themselves indicate to be the only solution of this problem. I wish to quote one or two excerpts, removed perhaps from their context, but nevertheless not unfairly. Under the head of "corn starch" the report states:

> This is the principal starch produced in this country and is made almost exclusively from imported corn, which at the present time is mainly of South African origin.

Then it goes on to say:

> Starch factories have little fault to find with the quality of Ontario corn except that it is generally very high in moisture when offered. . . .

And here is a significant statement:

> If particular emphasis was being placed on what is now imported that we could produce ourselves, it would be difficult to justify the importation of starch or any of its products, or of corn for their manufacture. The requirements of starch and cereal manufacturers could be largely met by Canadian corn, even if it may not be quite as satisfactory as corn grown in more torrid zones, provided an adequate marketing scheme could be worked out. Manufacturers claim that, in the past, they have experienced great difficulty in getting orders filled on the domestic market. Shipping facilities have been poor, all of the corn having to be moved by rail since no elevator is available on the St. Clair river or on the lake front.

There, succinctly stated, is the answer. There is no quarrel with the commodity itself; the difficulty is with regard to the moisture content and particularly the inability of the trade to get the corn in large quantities on account of the absence of storage facilities and also because the trade has not faith in the commodity grown here since it does not bear the certification of a government-inspected and government-created scheme.

Another aspect of the matter was brought to my attention, and to the attention of others in western Ontario, after the present war began. It was pointed out that since we grew only half the corn consumed in Canada, and since the farmers were not disposed to increase their acreage by reason of the difficulties I have enumerated, in the absence of a proper marketing scheme on the part of the government we were compelled to import almost half our total requirements.

This importation of corn from south Africa, the United States, and particularly the Argentine, was brought to the attention of the agricultural supplies board headed by Doctor E. S. Archibald, who has made an analysis of this problem, which analysis is, I presume, available to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Doctor Archibald points out that approximately four million bushels of imported corn is now being used for industrial purposes, and this at a time when we have set up embargoes against the importation of many other commodities. He goes on to say that a considerable quantity of the imported corn used for feed also can be classed as used for industrial purposes, since it is used by manufacturers of mixed feed for poultry, hogs and other live stock. In order that industries such as those mentioned can be properly served, Doctor Archibald points out that the four requirements which I have discussed in another way must be fulfilled. Those requirements are: continuity of supply, the necessity of having the corn properly dried, grading and inspection, and facilities for shipping by either water or rail.

I am not quarrelling with what the administration has done under the freight subsidy plan in respect of coarse grains. Nor do I quarrel with its policy with regard to the reduction of wheat acreage. I do point out, however, the unfair position in which the Ontario farmer is placed. If this government is sincere in trying to meet this problem, surely we can no longer delay in providing suitable facilities for storing this corn in bulk, having it properly inspected and graded on a compulsory basis in order to satisfy the demands of the trade, and assisting in setting up those agencies by which the corn can be satisfactorily dried. Doctor Archibald concludes his report by suggesting a solution, which Mr. Hamilton was not permitted to do under the terms of his reference. Doctor Archibald says:

Before it (Ontario corn) could be used on a large scale for industrial purposes, it is probable that facilities for storing and drying would have to be made available.

I have given this matter a good deal of study and attention. There have been conferences galore with departmental officials. There has been a disposition to consider that the farmers in those areas where there is a large measure of industrialization are thereby provided with a market not open to their fellow farmers in the rest of the country, at least during the war. While I do not deny that, the fact is that in southwestern Ontario agricultural costs are higher, and upon close analysis the benefit of heavy industrialization is not as great as it may seem. I have attended the meetings of this house assiduously, day after day; I do not think anyone will accuse me of shirking my responsibility in that regard. I have followed the arguments advanced by hon. members who come from western Canada, and I know something of western Canada myself, having visited that section of the country frequently. In comparing the lot of the farmer whom I represent, or of the farmers throughout the so-called rich area of southwestern Ontario, I doubt very much if the difference in the standard of living as between the farmer of the east and the farmer of the west would be as great over the long pull as many imagine.

The government has met the wheat problem, at least so far as an approach to it is concerned; the government has met the problem of the dairy farmer, but it has not met the problem of that area in which most of the Ontario wheat and 85 per cent of the corn of this country are grown. If we go on in the haphazard way that has been followed in the past there will be only one thing for the farmers in that area to do, namely, go out of corn production. That would mean heavier importations. That would mean that the starch companies, instead of buying their corn from us, would continue to buy it from the United States, and this at a time when we are at war and when we are concerned with the conservation of exchange. Surely we cannot postpone dealing with this problem any longer. If the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce do me the honour of replying, I hope the Minister of Agriculture will not say that this is not his problem. Following that, I certainly hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not say that it is not his problem either, because that is the way in which this matter has been shifted round. This is a marketing problem. Surely the policy to be laid down is a matter for the Minister of Agriculture. The setting up of a storage plant under private or public auspices, following the suggestions that have been advanced, may be a matter for the Department of Trade and Commerce or perhaps for the Department of Transport. Nevertheless this is a problem which the government cannot shirk any longer. We wish to improve the position of the farmers in that area so far as corn is concerned; and I am sure every hon. member from western Ontario will agree that the time has come when, first, we must put our commodity in exactly the same position with regard to moisture as corn coming from other countries; and, second, that having done this, we must set up a satisfactory marketing scheme which will take account of the matters of compulsory grading and inspection that I have indicated.

I have just one further word. Latterly the province of Ontario and the federal government have been engaged in a survey of this matter. Since I have been a member of this house, there have been no less than six surveys of this whole problem. One would be almost inclined to think that the resistance to the sort of barrage I am putting up to-day is a survey. However, perhaps this time something is contemplated, because an effort has been made on behalf of the farmers of that area to institute a marketing scheme on a compulsory basis. The dominion government argued that it did not have the constitutional authority to deal with that matter, but now I understand that the two governments are dealing with the problem or at least propose to deal with it after the survey has been made. I am not a farmer; I simply represent a district in which this problem is acute, but I do urge that we should have a definite policy so that year after year we shall not be dealing with this matter in a haphazard, unscientific manner which indicates a clear lack of planning. There is a real marketing problem here. Officers of the crown have supported the contentions I am making, and all that remains now is for the government to carry out the recommendations that have been made. I am sure that if this is done and a compulsory scheme instituted, with proper drying and storage facilities provided, the result will be a great improvement in this branch of agriculture. I earnestly urge that the Department of Agriculture, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce take hold of this problem in a way that will call forth our everlasting gratitude.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that it is the desire of the chairman of the committee investigating war expenditures to bring in his report at this time. If the hon. member would permit me to make my reply after the evening recess, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Just before the dinner recess the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was reviewing the position in relation to corn, particularly that obtaining in the southwestern part of Ontario where the greater volume of corn is produced. The figures for Ontario for 1939 show a production of a little over 8,000,000 bushels, and in 1940, almost 7,000,000 bushels. Over a period of six years there has been an average production of 9,000,000 bushels. There is very little information with regard to the production in other parts of Canada prior to 1939. Manitoba had a production of 1,600,000 bushels in 1940. In previous years prices have been running from 55 cents up to 65 cents for Ontario producers. I think on May 20 of this year the price was 75 cents a bushel at the farm in Ontario, with trucking to elevator costing approximately two cents a bushel, making the price at the elevator 77 cents a bushel. The day before this memorandum was made up, which was within the last few days, the United States price was 71 cents a bushel for No. 1 corn at Chicago. Those are some of the facts with regard to the situation.

The hon. member for Essex East referred to the fact that corn produced in Canada, particularly that produced in the southwestern part of Ontario, has a fairly high moisture content. On account of this high moisture content and the fact that we have no proper facilities for drying corn, the product sometimes arrives in poor shape for feeding purposes in Ontario or other parts of eastern Canada. Different departments of government in recent years have been faced with the problem of providing driers at some particular points or an elevator or elevators with driers attached, in order that the corn may be handled more efficiently and in better condition. The report which was read before the dinner recess was prepared by the chambers of commerce, and it states that Canadian corn is suitable for commercial as well as feeding purposes, the main difficulty being that which was outlined to the committee by the hon. member for Essex East, namely, the high moisture content.

As was stated, consideration has been given to this problem on a number of occasions. I think that each time those who have investigated the matter have agreed on the methods which ought to be followed in order to handle the corn properly. Most of those who have investigated and dealt with the matter from the point of view of providing suitable feed for live stock have maintained that the cheapest way to dry this corn is in cribs upon the farms. It was stated that it takes from two to four months to dry corn, depending upon its condition and the time of year in which it is being dried. In order, however, to provide for shipments in the early months of the shipping season, it is necessary to have some artificial means of drying, if the corn is to arrive in good condition. So far as the preparation of corn for commercial purposes is concerned, it seems that it is essential that artificial driers should be established at one or more points.

The question is one which brings up the old difficulty that arises quite often in connection with different problems associated with agriculture and other industries in Canada, namely, that of provincial responsibility as against federal responsibility. Something was said about that by the hon. member for Essex East, and at this time I would only say that we would not care to carry that argument further than to say that where the greater part of a product is produced in the same province in which it is consumed, we would be desirous of at least having the advice and consent of the provincial authorities in connection with anything that we might undertake to do. We would prefer to have representations made to us from the provincial governments to the effect that they desire to have something done to putting pressure on provincial governments in connection with products of that kind. I think that inquiries which are being made as between the provincial and the federal government may result in something being done which will be helpful.

In connection with the construction of an elevator, it was stated by the hon. member for Essex East that we had been more or less passing the buck between departments in years gone by. He suggested that the Department of Agriculture was inclined to say that this was the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and he now suggets that the opinion is passed on that it is really the responsibility of the Department of Transport. I have made some inquiries into the matter, and I am convinced that the responsibility in so far as the construction of elevators east of Fort William is concerned, belongs to the Department of Transport. At the same time I am not going to shirk the responsibility of dealing with the matter as an agricultural problem. I am quite prepared to say to the hon. member that the department is quite anxious to give consideration to any representations that may be made to us or that have been made to us from the counties concerned, namely, the four or five counties in the southwestern part of Ontario. I would only suggest that we shall consider them subject to discussions which we may have with the provincial government.

I admit at once that some improved shipping facilities are necessary. I admit that some method of drying grain is essential to the proper handling of corn. I admit also that the government should take an interest in both these problems and try to find a solution of the problem confronting the people in that section of the province, more particularly in this period when we are interested in the production of corn, not only for commercial purposes but as a feed, and a good feed, especially in connection with the production of hogs which is so necessary at the present time. I think this is all that I can say at the moment until the matter has been fully discussed with the members of the governments concerned and with the government itself.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: I did not plan on pursuing the interesting argument advanced by the hon. member for Essex East, but in passing I should like to say that the apparent consideration which he has given to this subject and the interesting manner in which he has presented it should satisfy all hon. members that it is not necessary to be a farmer from one of the back concessions of Ontario in order to be able to discuss important agricultural problems. At eleven o'clock last night I was discussing the stamp plan in the United States, and the Minister of Agriculture mentioned that the Canadian government had distributed large quantities of butter, cheese, fish and other commodities. I am aware that the government have done a good deal in this field, but I contend that they have not gone nearly far enough, nor have they undertaken the problem in the systematic way which characterizes the stamp plan in the United States. On a former occasion I made reference to a book prepared by the Canadian Medical association, "Food for Health". A paragraph I did not quote before is found on the front page:

> By eating the proper kind and amount of food, you and your family are protecting yourselves against the diseases which go along with war and which spread in the period immediately following. In addition, good health enables wage-earners to stay on the job. Working time lost through sickness usually means a smaller pay envelope. We have a war to win. We must be fit for whatever task is required of us. Every housewife can do her bit—and help others do theirs by keeping her family's health at a high level.

On the fifth page, in heavy print:

> The Canadian farmer produces all the foods necessary for good health. Canadian grown vegetables such as tomatoes, turnips, cabbage, and fruits in season (apples, berries, cherries, plums, peaches, pears) can replace the more expensive imported fruits.

I am sure that hon. members were ashamed last night to hear what I read from a newspaper, to the effect that literally thousands of boxes of apples in British Columbia had been dumped. Other surplus foods are going to waste in Canada, and yet in this dominion there are people who are not getting enough to satisfy a decent standard of living. I am not able to say what number of people in this country are not getting enough to eat, but the last report submitted by the Department of Labour in connection with the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act sets forth, on page 34, that in March, 1941, there were in Canada 325,000 individuals on direct relief. If the people on direct relief in other parts of this country are in the same position as those on direct relief in my constituency, there are in this dominion a great many people who are not getting enough to eat.

I am not going to discuss all the foods which are available in Canada, but I shall refer briefly to one important food, namely, wheat or flour. Last evening I made reference to a school attendance officer in my constituency who reported that three families in his district are unable to send their children to school because they do not have flour in the house; and the information I have from my constituency is that notices have gone out to people on relief that there will be no more relief. I feel confident that the department at Regina will reconsider this decision, and that cases where it is impossible for them to manage without assistance will receive further aid. In the meantime, I feel sure, a great many families found themselves at the end of last month with no money, no credit at the store, and no way of securing flour except by imposing upon the good graces of the storekeeper.

In another vote the minister has asked us for $35,000,000 for the purpose of not growing wheat. Surely his department should be able, in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Commerce, to find means of providing that some of the surplus wheat in Canada is made available under a plan similar to the stamp plan in the United States, so that every householder in the nation shall have all the flour necessary to supply bread to his table three times a day. The minister should explain, when he is asking this parliament for $1,735,590.64 in connection with his marketing services, why he is not in a position to find ways and means of providing that all the wheat necessary shall be available to make bread for hungry children in this country.

The article in the pamphlet to which I have referred, stressing the importance of guarding the health of Canada, cannot be overemphasized. The minister would do well to give careful consideration to the carrying out of the principles of some plan like the stamp plan, or evolve a plan of his own, so that not a single family in this dominion will be denied the right to all the wheat products which they can possibly use.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): About a week or ten days ago, I believe, the hon. member for Fraser Valley made inquiry of the Prime Minister when the house would be prorogued or adjourned. Of course, the Prime Minister could not very well answer that question, because, while it is a well-known fact that the party in power summons parliament and sets the date when it will be opened, the opposition always decides when it will be prorogued or adjourned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not this time.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): That opposition may come from the official opposition or from hon. members of the various opposition groups, but that is the quarter where the opposition must come from, or the item would pass. Therefore the logic of the situation is, probably, why talk about an item concerning something which is already in force or in operation? You cannot change it anyway.

In order to clarify my position, may I recall to hon. members that, just before the Easter recess, when we were passing legislation embodying the wheat policy for the west, I endeavoured to make a few remarks around six o'clock and I was ruled out of order, but I was assured that I would have an opportunity to make those observations at a later date. It makes quite a difference whether a policy which is being discussed is or is not actually in effect. In any event, I wish to make a few casual remarks.

The Minister of Agriculture inserted in the estimates an item which has to do with his wheat policy. May I say that if the minister believed he had a policy which would be acceptable to all the agricultural interests from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, he must now be the most disillusioned man in the house. As a matter of fact, the thing is impossible, and I believe that the minister realizes it.

I have followed since 1938 the policy of the Minister of Agriculture with regard to wheat legislation, and I believe that any one who has done so cannot but admit that from that time up to the present he has certainly been a "sugar-daddy" to western Canada. If the people in the west are not satisfied with his wheat legislation, I do not believe it is possible to satisfy them.

A good many objections were raised by hon. members, some from western Canada, to the effect that his policy was one of regimentation, that the farmers were told they had to do this and they had to do that. As an actual fact, that was not the situation; there was nothing compulsory about the matter, as was evidenced by the statement of the hon. member for Moose Jaw that he intended to do just as he had always done—go on and grow wheat. I have, however, no doubt that the Minister of Agriculture wanted to make and did make a policy so attractive to western agriculturists in general that they would accept it. In my opinion he made a very good job of it. For instance, he offered $4 an acre for summer-fallow, up to a certain percentage anyway, which was taken out of wheat cultivation. I would say that $4 an acre is very attractive. I well remember that the hon. member who occupies the seat beside me—he is not here to-night—has some property in the west. I was witness to his signature on some leases which he was sending out west, and the sum he was paying for land summer-fallowing was $2.50 an acre. He mentioned that he had been getting the same work done in previous years for $2 an acre. I well remember, too, that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who is, I believe he will admit, a big wheat farmer, claimed that he was getting summer-fallowing done at $1.50 an acre, and that he could have hundreds and perhaps thousands of acres summer-fallowed at that price. The policy adopted by the Minister of Agriculture must have been quite attractive. I remember, when we were discussing certain property in the vicinity of an experimental farm at Rosthern, the hon. member for Wood Mountain, I believe, said that land there could be bought for as low as ten dollars an acre. Therefore, if one summer-fallowed land there for two and a half years, he would have the land for nothing anyway.

I agree with the hon. member for Essex East. I am not going to belabour this question, because he went into it fully, and I am in accord with what he said. Coarse grains were quite a problem, and the Minister of Agriculture declared that in his opinion it would not influence or affect the eastern farmer, but he said it so often that I rather think he believed it himself. I am quite satisfied that it is discriminating against the coarse-grain growers of the east. Barley is a good substitute for corn; and if you bonus it in the west and pay the freight on it to the east, it is decidedly in competition with corn produced in southwestern Ontario. I do not think the policy is quite fair to the corn growers of the country.

When the question was brought up before, I said that we grew all the grain we required, even last year under abnormal conditions. That is not quite true, although the south-western counties did not import any western grain. I wish to make it quite clear that I am not opposed to western agriculture. I should like to see the western farmers get as much as they can; I should like to see them get a dollar a bushel for their wheat. But what I did object to, and what I object to now under that policy, is that eastern agriculture cannot afford to pay for a bonusing policy for the west. That is what I objected to, and I still object to it.

I was also opposed, and naturally so, to the way in which the measure was brought down. The government used their powers under the War Measures Act to frame a policy and to deal with the matter in supply where there was no opportunity to move amendments or to change the regulations. The whole question should have been discussed in the committee on agriculture before it was brought into the house, and, if necessary, there should have been appropriate amendments which would have made the legislation workable and agreeable to all parts of the country.

I agree that on the whole agriculture has been getting a rather better deal of late; things are looking up a little. We must admit, however, that agricultural prices should be placed on a parity with prices of other commodities if we are ever to be on a sound economic basis in Canada. No party has, however, offered any policy or solution or panacea for this problem. They all say that something should be done, but they do not come forward with a concrete plan to put agriculture on a sound economic basis. The old law of supply and demand no longer operates; at least it does not function to the extent that it did before. That is true not only now but of the pre-war period. We must look for some solution if we are ever to put agriculture on a sound basis. When the war is over and we get back to a sound trading policy, the situation will probably clear up; but I have my doubts, because throughout the world we find no common standard of living, no common standard of wages, no common standard of money. I could mention several instances. I could discuss at some length the question of beet sugar. Cane sugar can be bought cheaper than beet sugar because the labour employed in harvesting the cane receives forty cents a day; but one cannot procure labour in our fields at less than $2.50 or $3 a day. The same is true of other commodities, and we are exporting only a small proportion of our agricultural products. There is no market for butter outside the dominion, and we have no large exports with the possible exception of wheat. We should, therefore, devise some plan of controlling prices and, to some extent, production. If the government could bring in some sort of national marketing act and work out a system of our own to place agriculture on a sound and safe economic basis, it would be a great boon to the farmers.

Mr. HATFIELD: I wish to commend the argument put forward by the hon. member for Essex East with regard to the growing of corn in Canada to supply our corn starch manufacturing plants. I have had some experience with corn starch, and I believe there are two plants in Ontario, one at Cardinal and the other at Port Credit. Those plants have large storage facilities, and all that would be necessary would be to install drying apparatus. The corn could be taken from the fields and dried in those plants. At present they import corn in the fall from south Africa and south America, bringing it here before navigation closes.

Mr. MARTIN: And the United States.

Mr. HATFIELD: There must be large storage facilities at those plants. Manitoba can grow good corn. Why, then, send out foreign exchange for corn at the present time? Most of it is coming from the United States to-day to supply the factories, and there is a large export demand for corn starch. The United States is shipping millions of tons of corn starch to Europe and all the other countries of the world.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not going to make a speech to-night. I was told that I was on the wrong item when I tried to discuss certain questions before, but I believe I am in order to-night. I wish to make one correction. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent made reference to western Canada. Let me inform the committee that, geographically speaking, British Columbia is in the west, although apparently the committee does not know this. We do not grow wheat, but we are in the west nevertheless.

Although I do not agree that the minister is a "sugar-daddy" to anybody—knowing his record in the past, I do not think he would not be a "sugar-daddy" according to my definition of that term—I am particularly interested in what will happen to eggs and poultry. Last night, it seems, I was in the wrong section, but I should like to have some explanation from the minister. I was informed that he did not have the right bodyguard or officials round him to give him the information on marketing. May I ask him what is to happen to that other war casualty in my riding, the small fruit grower. In British Columbia we depend upon our export surplus.

Unfortunately, owing to the war and shipping conditions, we have not been able to dispose of our extra berries, our processed berries, to Great Britain. I give the minister full credit that last year he was able to dispose of them, but I should like to know what provision is being made this year. The growers in my constituency must know now, because they are now starting to can those berries, probably with such a fine climate as British Columbia has, they are already canned, and we must know where we are going to dispose of them. Before this session closes—and I do not wish to have to talk for three days—I think we should know whether we are or are not going to get the same treatment for eggs as is given for butter, honey, maple sugar, lobster, apples and wheat. I repeat that word "wheat." It is a commodity grown in a couple of the provinces. We should like to know if we are going to get a minimum guaranteed price that will at least return the cost of production. Under this item of marketing services administration, I think the minister should be in a position, in view of his statement of last year, that the same treatment would be accorded to all producers in every part of Canada, to give us some assurance.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to add a word or two, not altogether along the same lines but along one vital line, namely, the matter of getting fruit through to the British isles. I have in my files three or four letters from those now overseas who find themselves unable to satisfy their requirements with regard to fruit and fruit juices. They ask for more apples from Canada, if necessary dried apples in order to save the freight, and they particularly ask whether it is possible to get apple juice. The condition which at present obtains is that companies such as Eaton's, Simpson's and other large department stores in Canada have arranged to pack for shipment overseas parcels of fruit juices such as tomato, apple and some orange juice which their friends here send to the boys overseas. One of my constituents writes me that there is a shortage over there of vitamins; I think it is vitamin C. It seems uneconomical for interested people in Canada to have to mail cans of apple juice overseas, the cost of mailing being four or five or six times the cost of the product itself. Yet people do so in order to satisfy the needs of their loved ones who are serving in the forces overseas. What I had in mind is that this marketing service might take hold of this matter in a rather big way and send overseas our tomato juice which contains this required vitamin, and our apple juice, dried apples and fruits of all kinds. So much for the local situation mentioned by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Passing now to the world situation, we find that our markets on the European continent are very much disrupted. We have been taught by the exponents of the policy of the Liberal party that overseas trade, and more particularly trade with Europe, is the lifeblood of this country. That trade has been demoralized by the present conflict. I am wondering what policy the Minister of Agriculture has in mind to improve Canada's position in view of our being cut off from that market, the result being, as we all know.

that in Canada we have a surplus of agricultural products. That surplus causes prices of these products to fall to a low level. Subsidize as much as you will; assist as much as you will by bonuses and subsidies of the kind that have been enunciated here, namely, $4 per acre if you make the ground black and in the way of becoming a desert again, or $2 per acre if you put it into coarse grain.

The spending of these odd millions, $35,000,000 in that instance, will not help the situation in the long run. In fact I am greatly concerned about the position we are getting into through these grants and allowances for having land black in July. I am concerned about the state it will be in by July of next year. It may be a desert. If it is, then we shall not be in a position to produce, even though, on account of the lack of a market for that extra 10 or 15 or 20 per cent in Europe, we have at present a depressed level of agricultural prices. Let us not be too much concerned about that, even though in Europe they have a false or pseudo-prosperity. Analyse that situation, due to the fact that a bushel of wheat in Germany to-day may buy $2 worth of goods and services, whereas in Canada a bushel of wheat will buy only fifty cents worth; in the matter of a decade that will prove only a false or pseudo-prosperity. On account of that false prosperity, goods and services are coming back to the producers of wheat, bacon and other consumable commodities to an amount out of proportion to what those goods and services are really worth.

In our land of prosperity and abundance the reverse obtains. Therefore I say to my hon. friends who concern themselves about the low price of agricultural and other products and materials which by nature we are able to produce, that this condition is probably just temporary and the world equation will soon balance itself. The world equation may balance itself, and even though the present situation is difficult; even though the economic pressure we have exerted against the totalitarian states has not worked to the extent that we had hoped, the day will come when they will want our goods. Therefore I say to the Canadian producer of primary commodities, "Stay with us in farm production and in the long run we shall win through." That prosperity which obtains in the totalitarian countries, due to a shortage of the goods they would like to consume, in the final analysis will bring about their defeat. When the men rescued from the Bismarck had their first meal on board a British ship they were amazed when they were served a full-course dinner. They were not accustomed to a full stomach on which to work. That is the very thing that will pull us through. Therefore I say to the minister, and to all those who are looking to him to save agriculture in Canada to-day, that they should have patience, because in the long run we in Canada, together with the other members of the British commonwealth that have large supplies of these commodities, will get these commodities through to Britain.

That is the job of the minister; he must see that Britain gets these goods. We are all glad and willing to help in any way possible that this may be done, whether it is eggs from British Columbia, wheat from the prairie provinces, fruit from the land of Evangeline, or pork from the eight million hogs throughout Canada; let us get these products through to Britain. It is said that armies travel on their stomachs. Let us make sure that the Englishmen, the Canadians and all those fighting in our behalf have full stomachs on which to fight, even though prices are low here. The people of the totalitarian states are almost starving for those commodities of which we have an abundance; and when this conflict is over—pray God that may be fairly soon—they will want those products and we shall be able to reestablish our channels of trade. Then, once more Canada will return to her place as one of the greatest exporters of primary products. Consequently I hope the minister will tell us what the marketing service has in mind with regard to securing those commodities of which the United Kingdom is short, and, beyond that, supplying an abundance of all commodities, without regard to cost, so that the armed forces of the United Kingdom may give a good account of themselves and, at the same time, we may escape the difficult situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Might I have an answer to my question? I have to attend a committee meeting, and I do not wish to have to listen to all this oratory.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Fraser Valley has asked for information with regard to the possibility of marketing certain fruits which have to be disposed of in British Columbia each fall. Last year we made an arrangement with Great Britain whereby they agreed to take delivery of 1,700 tons of the type of berry products in which the hon. member is interested. We found that we were able to deliver only 1,300 tons, for the reason that this was all we were able to obtain at that time by way of surplus. This year the marketing branch of the department is negotiating with the same authorities in Britain for an arrangement under which they will take somewhere between 1,700 and 2,500 tons.

Mr. NEILL: The minister is referring to processed fruit, is he?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, processed berries. The negotiations have not been completed, but we expect that an arrangement similar to that of last year will be arrived at, and we hope it will take care of any surplus that may be available this fall.

With regard to eggs, we have had some little difficulty until very recently. During last month, I understand that we completed the shipment of 180,000 cases of fresh eggs to Britain, and we are making arrangements to deliver more than 230,000 cases this fall; we are storing them now for delivery at that time. I quite appreciate that this is a very small proportion of the eggs produced in Canada, but I think I am correct in saying that we were shipping only a very small proportion of our eggs to Britain before the war. Then, again, it is just possible that we have a greater production at the present time on account of a general stepping up of production of all farm products throughout the country, and it may be necessary for us to dispose of a larger quantity than we have in mind at the present time. In any event, negotiations are going forward looking to the disposal of that surplus.

With reference to the other questions raised by the hon. member for Danforth, I do not think the situation is exactly as his remarks might lead one to believe. We are disposing of more farm products of every kind—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister address himself to apple juice and tomato juice?

Mr. GARDINER: I will come to those. We are disposing of more of the stable farm products generally exported from Canada, with the exception of wheat, than was the situation before the war.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): We quite agree with that.

Mr. GARDINER: We have had some difficulty with regard to apples. Before the war we exported to Britain fifty per cent of the apples grown in Canada, while in the Annapolis valley of Nova Scotia the export figure reached approximately 80 per cent. During the first fall of the war, at some inconvenience to herself Britain did take a certain proportion of our fresh apples from the maritime provinces and British Columbia, but during the second year they did not desire to take delivery of fresh apples. One reason for that was that apples are bulky in relation to their food value and take considerable shipping space which is of greater importance to Britain at the present time in connection with other foods.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I asked particularly about dried apples.

Mr. GARDINER: I am coming to those. In the first fall of the war not only did we deliver a certain percentage of our apples to Great Britain; the government itself took over the remainder of the apples, which were canned or dehydrated. I think we still have some of those apples which were grown in 1939, and canned in the winter of 1939-40. We have given away some of them. We have sold some of them. We gave some to some people who told us afterwards that they would just as soon we had not shipped them.

Mr. STIRLING: Nova Scotia apples?

Mr. GARDINER: They were dehydrated apples. That statement was made, not because the apples were not good enough, but because they took up shipping space at a time when other foods of greater importance had not enough shipping space. Under those conditions, of course we are not pressing our apple crop upon the British people.

I may say that when I was in England last fall I did discover some apples in a market in Liverpool. I made some inquiries as to how they got there, knowing that we were not shipping any apples from Canada. I did not understand how apples might have been received from some other countries. When I made inquiries I found out that the apples were some which had been taken off a captured boat, and were being disposed of simply because they had been landed in Great Britain.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Distress apples.

Mr. GARDINER: I state this in order to indicate that the British people are not taking apples at the present time in anything like the quantities they were taken before. They are not taking fresh apples at all, so far as I know and, from what I can learn, they are not anxious to receive even dehydrated apples, and certainly not in the quantities we could supply. In other words, we have some difficulty in disposing of our apple crop. It is costing the government about $2,000,000 a year to take off the market apples which cannot be disposed of and which, had there been no war, would have been disposed of in Great Britain.

I believe that the same observations would apply to a greater or lesser degree to apple and other fruit juices. Perhaps it applies to a lesser degree on account of the fact that the juices may be canned and shipped in a form which is not as objectionable as fresh apples would be. At the present time, however, there is not any considerable demand; as a matter of fact, there is no demand at all for them.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Do I understand the minister to say that there is no demand for fruit juices?

Mr. GARDINER: We have no request for fruit juices up to the present time; but for tomato juice there is a demand.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): With all due deference to the minister, there is a great demand for orange, apple and tomato juices.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who is making the speech?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister is, but I am correcting him.

Mr. GARDINER: I can only answer the questions I have been asked from the information we have in the department. If the hon. member for Danforth has other information, I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is a shortage of apple and tomato juices.

Mr. GARDINER: It is scarcely correct to imply that agriculture is not doing as well in the matter of volume shipped from this country, or in the matter of price received—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): No such inference can be drawn from what I have said.

Mr. GARDINER: —at the present time, as it did before the war. In other words, Great Britain is taking from Canada to-day very much greater quantities of pork products than we sold to all countries to which we delivered pork products before the war.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I agree.

Mr. GARDINER: In other words, we are not shipping less; we are shipping very much more.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I agree with that. The minister has no right to draw the inference that I said anything different.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe I had better try to answer the inference—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There was no inference at all.

Mr. GARDINER: —and have the information complete. My memory is that in the last complete year before the war we shipped about 160,000,000 pounds of Wiltshire sides to Great Britain. This year we shall ship 450,000,000 pounds, or almost three times as much. While the actual market price as it would prevail upon the market if nothing were done about it, other than to accept the terms of the agreement, is approximately the same as the market price in that earlier year, the government of Great Britain raised that price a short time ago in order to assist in bringing the price up to the level of the United States price. That was done by increasing the price allowed us under the agreement from 80 shillings to 85 shillings. Since that time, the government of Canada has added an additional 75 cents per hundred pounds of Wiltshire sides, in order that Canada might do her part in increasing the price up to the level which has been produced in the United States market.

This has been done for a twofold purpose: first, for the purpose of giving the best return we can arrange at the present time. Whether it is satisfactory to agriculture all the way across Canada, I am not going to try to argue. It has, however, been for the purpose of securing the best price which we consider we could arrange. That price is a little bit higher now than was the price in the year of the first agreement. I think farmers across Canada have expressed themselves as being fairly well satisfied with the price we obtained in the first year of the agreement. The price prevailing now is better.

Mr. TUSTIN: That 75 cents is included?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It was a little better even before we added the 75 cents.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member permit me to finish my answer to his speech? The second purpose is to encourage the farmers to produce still more next year. The present position is that Great Britain is taking all the surplus pork products, and particularly Wiltshire sides, that we have available to ship to her. We are shipping it all, in so far as bottoms can be secured. I believe she will be prepared to take all the Wiltshire sides we can produce, or that we are likely to produce—I shall put it in that way—within the next twelve months.

We want the farmers to understand that the government of Canada, along with the government of Great Britain, is and will be prepared to see to it that in view of the circumstances a reasonable price is maintained, to the end that we may get the highest possible production.

That brings me to the reference made a few minutes ago to the policy which has been followed in connection with wheat. It has been suggested that we simply bonused the farmers to the extent of $4 an acre, in order to have them keep their land idle. That is not what we did. We asked the farmers to reduce their wheat acreage, and we gave our reasons for doing so. We said, "We have now enough wheat in storage in Canada to supply all Great Britain's needs, all our own needs and all the needs of any other countries to which we have any reason to believe we shall be supplying wheat within the next two years." We have enough wheat in storage now to supply purchasers for two years. We said, further, "It is costing the government of Canada a certain amount of money to take delivery of that wheat, in order to make it possible for the people who grow it to live." The amount that we have been paying out is 70 cents a bushel Fort William for every bushel of wheat delivered. Then we would add to that about ten cents a bushel a year in storage and carrying charges for each year the wheat is going to be carried. If we carry it into the third year, having two years' supply already on hand, it will cost the government about one dollar a bushel to take delivery of that wheat and carry it until such time as there is a demand for it.

We have said to the people of western Canada; we have said to the people of all Canada that, on that basis, for every bushel of wheat that they keep out of production, that is, every bushel of wheat that they do not produce this year, they will be making available from the amount of money that the government of Canada has to raise one dollar to be expended during the next three years in prosecuting the war. It was on that basis that the pamphlets, which were quoted here last evening and which were referred to again to-day, were put out in western Canada. Those pamphlets were to the effect that to grow less wheat in 1941—not grow less wheat in 1942 or in 1943—would help in the prosecution of the war. I say that to reduce the bushelage by a million bushels which the government would have had to take delivery of will help in the prosecution of the war financially to the extent of one dollar a bushel for the three years; to the extent of $1,000,000 for every 1,000,000 bushels

It was upon that basis that we asked the farmers of western Canada to reduce their acreage this year. We said, "We are not coming to the people of western Canada at the present time and saying that you should not grow wheat; we are not coming to the people of western Canada and saying that at some future time you should not grow wheat; we are coming to them and we are saying two things, first, that there are certain products that ought to be produced this year in greater volume than you have been producing them before. We want more butter; we want more hogs; we want more cattle, and if we are going to be able to produce these products in Canada we must have more feed grain." We said, "In addition to helping us out in financing the war by not asking the government to take delivery of the same amount of wheat this year that they have in the last two years, if you grow more coarse grains, either you will make it possible to produce these other products on the farms where you are growing the crops or by shipping them to some other part of Canada you will be making possible the production of these other products in other parts of Canada."

Up to date the reports indicate that the farmers of western Canada followed our advice in the matter, and advices up to the present indicate that they have reduced their acreage by close to 7,000,000 acres. That is, out of a total acreage of somewhere around 27,000,000 acres, they have cut off about 7,000,000 acres. Some of that land is being put into summer-fallow, and to the extent that they have reduced wheat acreage they will be paid $4 an acre for having done so. My hon. friend says that he fears a desert next year. I do not fear a desert as a result of summer-fallowing in western Canada, but I would say there is a possibility that we may have more wheat next year because we summer-fallowed this year.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That would be all right.

Mr. GARDINER: This summer-fallowing may amount to three or four million acres this year. The hon. member for Danforth says, "That would be all right." I think it will be all right from the point of view of having a greater production next year. I am not one of those who think it is a good thing over a period of time to reduce the production of food. In the long run I think it is probably a good thing to increase the production of food. While it may be necessary this year to cut down the production of wheat on account of the position in which we find ourselves in relation to the whole problem, in the long run I do not think any harm is going to come from having three or four million acres of land in a better condition to produce more grain next year, whether it be wheat if we want it, or whether it be more coarse grains in order that we may produce more of other products.

The remainder of the six, seven, or eight million acres, whatever it may turn out to be, which has been taken out of wheat will be put into coarse grains and grasses. From the coarse grains we shall produce largely pork products, and from the grasses, in the summer months, we shall produce dairy products. We have had some experience already in connection with dairy products as related to the policy which has been followed. This is the policy which my hon. friend said a few moments ago brought forth considerable criticism two or three months ago, but it is not bringing forth so much criticism now. Since the beginning of the war we have followed the policy of keeping a close check on agriculture right across this country, and of not going out in advance of the time when it is necessary and calling upon everybody to produce something which we could not get rid of. We have had one experience of that kind, although we did not have to ask to have it produced; it was produced in the natural course of events. We have more wheat than we are able to get rid of for the time being, but we are fortunate in the fact that wheat is a product which will keep for a long term of years. After we hold our wheat, it will be just as good as a food product three or four years from now as it was when it was grown. That being the situation, it is fortunate that that is the product which we have in greater quantity than it can be disposed of at present, because I have no doubt that it will be used in due course to feed those people who will be requiring it.

In the meantime people must live; in the meantime people across the seas must have meat products which they cannot get elsewhere, and in the meantime we can get better returns by producing those meat products than we have been able to get for the last ten years. At the same time we shall be serving the purpose we are trying to serve in relation to the war itself. I have said that we have increased deliveries of pork products from 160,000,000 pounds in the last complete year before the war to 450,000,000 pounds this year, and we hope that the increase will be greater next year. We are fairly well assured that with the war proceeding toward a successful conclusion we shall be able to dispose of those products in a way which will be as favourable as possible under the circumstances for those who produce them.

In so far as cheese is concerned, if I remember the figures correctly, in the last year before the war we delivered about 72,000,000 pounds. Last year we delivered a little over 103,000,000 pounds, and this year we have contracted to deliver 112,000,000 pounds. Only two or three weeks ago certain newspapers in Canada were saying that we had failed entirely in our policy because we had allowed farmers to get rid of their cows, and they were not going to have the milk with which to produce cheese. I have here on my desk to-night an article written yesterday by one of the same newspapers to the effect that we have thrown away a million and a quarter dollars by putting another cent on cheese which we did not need to put on because the farmers were going to produce the cheese anyway. I cannot understand that kind of argument, where people with one breath argue one way, and with the other breath argue another way. Nevertheless, three or four weeks ago the farmers took milk to the cheese factories in volume which produced 31 per cent less than was produced in the same week a year ago. The gradings for this last week show that in the last week for which we have a record, they took in sufficient milk to produce approximately 47 per cent more than they produced in the same week a year ago.

I quite agree with the writer of the article in this particular paper when he says that the farmers of Canada would have produced that cheese even if we had not put an extra cent on the price. I would, however, call attention to this. Britain places cheese right at the top of the list of her food necessities. She wants cheese; it has a food value, and it takes as little shipping space as any of the more important foods. It is a product which the British people are accustomed to placing in their ration of food. Our Canadian cheese is a good product. We knew, when we put an extra cent to the fifteen cents on ship at Montreal plus the one cent premium on 93 score, plus the two cents on 94 score, plus the subsidies which are provided by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, that the farmers were getting a better price for their cheese than they had had over a long period of years extending back before the beginning of this war. We knew that they turned out within this last year more than 140,000,000 pounds of cheese, as against 100,000,000 a few years ago; that they exported to Britain 103,000,000 pounds, as against 72,000,000 pounds in the year before the war; that this year they will deliver not merely 112,000,000 pounds but probably 120,000,000 pounds or even more. Whether they do or they do not, we believe that the price which is now established will have the effect of keeping farmers delivering milk to cheese factories, as against taking it to creameries, where we have guaranteed the minimum price for the summer at a level of 30 cents in June, 30½ cents in July, 31 cents in August, 31½ cents in September, and 32 cents in October. With these two levels of prices established, we believe that the Canadian farmer will raise next year his production of cheese to the level it reached in the last years of the last war, and we shall be exporting, not 72,000,000 pounds as we were doing at the beginning of the war, but twice as much cheese, to Britain alone, as we sent at that time.

That is the objective we have in mind. That is our policy. We have brought the farmers through the last two years—it is true, with some dissatisfaction as regards price—without encouraging the production of great surpluses which we could not get rid of for the time being, but in a condition of mind in which, as a newspaper says that was criticizing us three or four weeks ago they would have produced the product even though we had not raised the price. With the increased price level, however, they will go on next year beyond our fondest hopes in connection with the production of food.

All this is connected with the prosecution of the war. I was told the other day, by a man prominent in matters having to do with Britain's policies, that Great Britain will win this war. He did not say "if", he said that "Britain will win this war because we are going to feed the British people." When he said "we", he did not mean Canada alone; he meant all the people in the world who are associated with Britain in fighting this battle. "We are going to maintain the sea lanes. We are going to see that food gets over. As food is destroyed we are going to produce more. And," he said, "the people are going to maintain the morale which is necessary to the winning of a victory, on account of the fact that they are assured that they are going to be fed; and the battle is going to be fought through to the final conclusion."

We in Canada can play our part, and our farmers are playing their part. The government is not able, as we all agree, to pay all that the farmers ought to have, but in conjunction with Great Britain and with the United States to the south, we are trying to supply all the food we can send from this continent to Great Britain. We have done it not only by maintaining prices as high as we possibly can, and by encouraging production, but by keeping a check on the consumption of the important products, and we have tried to maintain that consumption at not a higher level than was maintained under the favourable conditions of last year.

To my hon. friend here who was talking about the circumstances of those on relief, I wish to say only this. We in Canada have passed through a very difficult period. Everyone in this chamber knows that. He knows how we used to argue about it ten years ago; he knows that we argued about it five years ago, and that we argued about it even two years ago.

Mr. HOMUTH: And you are still arguing.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not been arguing about it very much since September, 1939. Some of us said ten years ago, five years ago, and three years ago, that the reason for the unnatural condition which existed in connection with food products, of which we are large producers, was that certain people were getting ready for war. There were those who scoffed at that idea, but to-day we are all convinced that they were getting ready, and they got ready to such good advantage that it is taking us from two to three years to catch up with them. We know now that preparations were being made not only in the matter of munitions, but in the matter of food. I believe every hon. member will agree with me when I say that the farmer, being a producer of food which is necessary in the same quantities per man in time of peace as in time of war, is about the only producer in Canada who was ready to supply his product in much greater quantities than could be used in this country when the war did come. He did not stop when the war broke out. He went right on producing no matter what the price was, and increased the amounts, hoping, no doubt, for some increase in prices as a result of the fact that we were at war.

Mr. HOMUTH: He was encouraged to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: He was encouraged, and he should have been encouraged to do so.

Mr. HOMUTH: You encouraged him.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says that I encouraged him. I am afraid that if the production had not been adequate at the present time he would have said that I should have encouraged him. But I accept what he has said as a compliment. We encouraged the farmers, and the products which we asked them to produce they have available and will have available in greater quantities as the months go by. What I wish, however, to point out in this connection is, that while there may have been in Canada some few months ago about 300,000 unemployed, there was a time not very long ago when we had over 1,000,000. In other words, our unemployment rolls have been cut down considerably, and to that extent we are presumably better off than we were before.

In connection with the problem of relief, the hon. member for Mackenzie knows that it is not one which is dealt with under the Department of Agriculture. I am not trying to shirk a responsibility when I say that. Agricultural relief in western Canada was taken care of for a period of time under this department. But urban relief was never a matter which was under our charge. We did, through this department, take farm products off the market at a time when we had surpluses, and we distributed them to people who were on relief. We went even further than that. We realized that in a country such as Canada people do not easily go on relief; they go on suffering a great deal of inconvenience and underfeeding in their families. Only then do they go on relief.

I think I said, on the occasion when we first took butter off the markets and gave it away, that the first thing a poor family does is to quit eating butter on account of its price and to start eating some cheap jam. Eventually they go down the list until they get to blackstrap molasses, finally giving that up, having nothing on their bread and eating it dry. That is the process they go through. We gave away butter, cheese and other products. We did not follow the stamp practice which prevails in the United States, but we did the thing that we thought was suitable to this country; and I may say what I said in reply to the question with regard to the notice that had already gone out in the province of Saskatchewan from the provincial government to the effect that there will be no relief in certain areas this year. That notice has gone out ever since we passed the peak of our unemployment condition. It is necessary from year to year to take persons off the unemployed list and off the lists of relief as conditions improve in their areas; and just as that order went out last year and relief was given later on where it was absolutely essential, so the order has gone out this year; all of which means that every person who was on the list is cut off and must make a new application again to reestablish himself as being in a position warranting the receipt of relief. I have no doubt that where it is absolutely essential it will be given.

In relation to the matter of distributing wheat or flour, or making it possible to get it, these relief lists do make that possible. I can understand, knowing conditions as I know them in the northern part of Saskatchewan, that some people have not been able to get all that they need. But knowing more particularly the frame of mind of many people in that province, I know that fathers and mothers will get along without flour for quite a while before asking for it from anyone, whether the municipal council or the government or anybody else. I know Saskatchewan well enough, however, to realize that if their neighbours know the situation, these people will not have to go without flour very long. I realize also that they should not be left in that condition and that governments should do something about the matter. But again, I have sufficient confidence in the governments of the three prairie provinces to believe that where these conditions do prevail, those governments, as soon as the facts are made known to them, will see to it that food is got to these people. I do not wish to say anything more with regard to this particular item.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am hopeful that the hon. member for Fraser Valley will feel now that at least the minister has answered the question he raised with regard to eggs. In an agile manner, the minister slipped from eggs into pork, and it was quite interesting. He knows, as this committee knows, that the reason why we are able to supply more pork products to the United Kingdom, the greatest market in the world for pork products, is that Denmark is unable to ship now to the British isles. Poland, which took second place, is now unable to ship to that market, and the same is true of the Netherlands. For the last decade they have found it difficult to get their products into the United Kingdom. It was my privilege to be in Rotterdam less than a decade ago, and when I went to the steamship office and asked them to change some pounds, shillings and pence into guilders, speaking perfectly good English the man in the exchange office complained to me most bitterly, when he found that I was a Canadian, that we had stolen their market in the United Kingdom for the dairy products of the Netherlands. That was what he complained about while he was making change for me. There is the answer, and I cannot understand just why the minister should give us again one of those Napoleonic orations, slipping from eggs over to pork, picking out the choicest morsel, and discussing our exports of these commodities. I do not know why he should feel disposed to address us in the way he did—those of us who have asked questions in this house or made suggestions which we have felt to be constructive. Why should he put upon those questions or suggestions the construction he does, implying that hon. members who do this are not doing all that they can. He is wrong in that regard, Mr. Chairman. We, too, with him and with all the farmers of Canada, are trying to do a job not only on our own behalf but on behalf of our empire in seeing that they have more and more supplies. How they will get more and more supplies by our spending $35,000,000 more for the purpose of making land black on the first of July, I do not know. I know it is not to our advantage to make the lands in the west less productive. On my own farm, which has been producing fruit and vegetables, I found last Sunday that the land was entirely seeded down in mixed grain, and I found four able-bodied citizens, ordinarily resident on that farm, working in munitions plants at fifty cents an hour. That is taking up the slack that is produced out west. In the long run the policy there will not make for greater supplies, not only to Great Britain but to the whole civilized world when the conflict ceases. I say to the minister: Use your $35,000,000 to pile up more and more of the gold, the gold being wheat. The minister says that wheat will keep; I say that it will keep. I must sit down now, because my hon. friend the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) kindly gave me just three minutes. He wishes to speak, and I shall have to stop, but I hope that when the minister rises again we shall have a reply to the observations that have been made with regard to eggs and fruit and more particularly the observations of the fruit man from Fraser Valley, the hon. member representing that constituency.

Mr. NEILL: It gives me great pain to have to differ with my hon. friend who sits next to me (Mr. Harris). I differ with him in his estimation of the minister's speech, and I am afraid I am compelled to state that in my opinion he was a little off with regard to the demands of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). That hon. member did not mention fruit; he mentioned eggs. I would explain to the committee the advantage of the trade that has been built up, started some years ago—by the present government I think—in the processing of fruit for shipment to the old country. There was a large surplus of small fruit, such as raspberries and loganberries, which would have been a dead loss but for the discovery of this method of processing it. They do it in sugar and it will keep a long time; they can ship it to the old country more or less in bulk. I hope that trade will be encouraged and supported by the government. What I was going to begin my remarks with, however, was to say that although this is late in the session and I know that language is unwelcome and words are a weariness to the house, I should like to thank the minister for his dissertation, as my hon. friend called it, or statement. I thought it was a very fine statement. Few men in this house are equal and none is superior to the minister in ability to make a statement of that kind. There was no claptrap about it, and above all, although he mentioned the war and talked about our responsibility in connection therewith and the duties that rest upon us in that connection, there was no suggestion either inferentially or directly, such as we have too often had, that if we ventured to disagree with or criticize the methods he was proposing we thereby showed ourselves disloyal or were guilty of holding up the war effort. I am tired of these suggestions, whether implied or direct. I was glad to hear the minister give his capable explanation, covering the whole ground for which his department is responsible from east to west and giving us what I thought was a clear and useful exposition.

Coming back to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I came into the chamber last night just as he was finishing or was interrupted, being told that he was making his remarks on the wrong item and would have an opportunity to-day. It was in my mind to support him by what local knowledge I have of the matter; but when I came to look up in Hansard what he said, as reported at page 3451, I found he had made an excellent statement, so that I need do no more than say "them's my sentiments". He was dealing with eggs and the condition of poultry-keepers in his district. I, too, am familiar with the subject because I used to be in the feed business in a district where many people went in for chicken raising. They nearly all went broke, and a proportion of them, I am sorry to say, left an unpaid feed bill. When we talk about going into eggs in British Columbia, we do not mean keeping fifty or 100 hens round the back door, fed largely on table scraps, which is the best of all feed, but which we cannot obtain in quantities. Keeping hens in that way is always profitable; any one can show a profit on fifty hens; but when you try to do it on 5,000, when everything has to be bought, it is a different matter. The big egg people in British Columbia almost invariably find it a failure for that reason. You can go along road after road and see places that have been abandoned.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley spoke about the price of eggs; I presume he knew what he was talking about when he quoted figures. He said that the average price last year was 16¾ cents a dozen. If that was the average price, it means that the low price was very much less, and that eggs could not be produced in that province, where all the feed has to be hauled in from the prairies at a very high rate, an improperly high rate, and the eggs shipped back to the eastern market at another very high rate, at anything like that price. The hon. member for Fraser Valley said:

> I should like to know whether any provision is made therein to see that the poultry producer in British Columbia, who must be guided in his prices by the export market, will be protected in exactly the same way as the apple grower and the butter and cheese producer.

That is, will he have a guaranteed minimum price? That is what he would like to know and what I should like to know. They have done it for the munitions factories, guaranteed not only wages but a fair profit. Nearly the whole lobster catch was taken over by the Minister of Fisheries, and he did well with it, almost made it pay, a remarkable thing for a government department. Wheat has been treated generously; a minimum price has been fixed for butter, the same for cheese and the same for apples. Why is it that this one industry, outstanding among all the rest, is left without any protection of that kind? We are aware that the British market is in great need of eggs. As the hon. member pointed out last night, the ten per cent or so sold in outside markets governs the domestic price. As he pointed out, we say to the Ford Motor company and these big munition makers, "We will guarantee you not only expenses but a fair profit." Is it not fair to say to the egg producer, "We will guarantee you a fair return on the commodities you produce," which are so badly needed?

The minister spoke at some length and with great clarity as to what he or the government had been able to do in the disposal of eggs last season. He evidently did the best possible under the circumstances. But what we should like to know is, what price are we going to get for them? They have been disposed of, yes; but what is the use of raising them to sell at a price below the cost of production? As I said, you can keep two or three score hens and make them profitable; but when you get into the larger numbers, you have to have the money coming in to pay for the feed, which has to be brought in from the prairies at a rate about half as much again as it should be and half as much again as is charged for export to China or the British empire. The export rate is much lower than the domestic rate. It does not seem fair or just that when the railway hauls a carload of No. 1 wheat from Calgary to Vancouver for export at a certain rate, I think it is twenty cents a hundred pounds, yet it is entitled to charge forty cents, now cut in some instances to thirty cents, for identically the same wheat for the use of British Columbia industry. It does not make sense.

I should like to have an answer to the question. Why is it impossible to peg the price of eggs? Is it lack of money? No; we are dealing in millions; it cannot be that. Is it lack of interest? No; it cannot be that; the minister has taken an interest in the disposal of eggs. Is it lack of unity among the farmers? Is it the age-old antipathy of farmers to cooperation? If they were to form a union, perhaps they would be listened to, but we are foolish enough to divide our influence between Liberals, Tories, C.C.F.'s and so forth. If the egg producers would get together and demand their rights, they would probably be listened to with greater attention.

[Mr. Neill.]

We want, do we not, to preserve this industry to produce this greatly needed food for Britain; we want to keep up an industry by which numbers of our people can live; but if something is not done, they will be put out of business. It seems to me an unanswerable proposition. The government have taken care of all these other people, the lobster fishers, the producers of cheese, butter, apples, all except the egg producers who are left to sink or swim, and I am afraid they are going to sink.

Let us give to the government the credit that is coming to them. A few months ago they did use their influence to get the railways to put in a considerabe reduction in the rate on No. 3 wheat and better. We were running short of the lower grades and were not allowed to ship the higher grades under the lower rate. The government did help us there, and for the moment we are allowed to put in higher grade wheat at this medium rate which, however, is still much too high. But that is not sufficient. They made an offer to the eastern provinces to pay half the freight rate on the lower grades if the province would pay the other half, but the British Columbia government did not have the gumption to follow that up. Instead, they got this temporary and rather illusive advantage of having Nos. 1, 2 and 3 grade wheat included in the lower rate. There is plenty of No. 4 wheat still on the prairies, and therefore this rate really does not do us much good. Is the minister going to help us? I do not speak for myself because I do not own a hen, I would not if I had the opportunity; I speak on behalf of the people who are trying to make a living raising chickens, in the constituency of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, New Westminster and some other ridings on the lower mainland and also parts of Vancouver island. I would just say this. If the minister does not do something for the British Columbia poultryman, he is going to have to go out of business.

Mr. GARDINER: Just in case I forget this later on, I should say that in addition to securing a reduced rate on feed, the government took up with the railways the question of getting a reduced rate on export eggs, and some reduction has been made. I am not able to give the reduction at the moment, but I just wish to make that statement now.

Under the arrangements now being made, the price paid for eggs varies from about sixteen cents to twenty cents a dozen. I quite agree that this is not a sufficiently high price to satisfy those who are producing eggs, but that is the price being paid under the arrangements I mentioned earlier this evening.

Mr. NEILL: What was the price?

Mr. GARDINER: From sixteen to twenty cents, depending upon the part of Canada in which the producer lives. As to why eggs have not been dealt with as some other products have, I would remind hon. members that only a very small percentage of our eggs, either before the war began or since, have gone to Britain. I should think that percentage would not be more than one per cent before the war, and perhaps a little more than that since. On the other hand, we have sent 70 per cent of our cheese to Britain and 64 per cent of our pork products; about 70 per cent of our wheat has been going for export, although not all to Britain, and about 50 per cent of our apples went to Britain before the war.

In the beginning we tried to deal with those products which had been most affected by the war; and, as I stated on a previous occasion, we tried to deal with the products the market for which had been destroyed by the war. The first two products were tobacco and apples. We did nothing with regard to tobacco, except to induce Britain to take some of it. We did something with regard to apples and other similar products. Then we tried to increase the return to the growers. One hon. member said to-night that I had dealt with the wheat problem in a fine way, from the point of view of the wheat growers. The wheat growers do not have that opinion. They believe, as a matter of fact, that since 1938 we have lowered the price of wheat, and that is so. In 1938 the price of wheat was eighty cents; it is now pegged at seventy cents. In 1937 the pegged price was 87½ cents. We have not pegged the price of wheat at that height since the beginning of the war, and since 1938 we have been asking the wheat grower to put up with conditions more difficult than those which existed before the beginning of the war.

Mr. FAIR: Why?

Mr. GARDINER: Largely because of the great surplus of wheat I mentioned in the beginning, which makes it impossible for the government to do otherwise at the moment, not because that is our desire but on account of the great surpluses which have been piling up.

To come back to the question of eggs, there is still only a very small proportion of our egg production going to Britain. We have not been letting this matter go without giving any thought to it, but I really believe eggs are in a different class from that of some of the other products. Particularly is that so for this reason, that probably we should find some way of basing the price of eggs in Canada upon the consumption of eggs in Canada rather than upon the consumption of eggs in Britain. It appears to me that the price of our eggs up to the present time has been pretty well fixed by what we could get for the small surplus that we have been sending out of this country.

I am sure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni will agree that it would not be the easiest possible thing to fix egg prices in this dominion, where distances are so great and conditions vary so much. In British Columbia they feed and house their chickens as they should be fed and housed. On the prairies we let them run wild and feed them not only on what is left from the table but very often on grasshoppers, which do not make the flavour of the eggs very enticing. People are not inclined to eat a second "grasshopper" egg if they can avoid doing so. In Ontario there is not the same care taken in the feeding and housing of chickens as in British Columbia. I travel in Ontario quite often, and I find that most of the chicken flocks in this province still have the run of the farms, and one cannot produce good eggs with the hens running all around, picking up anything they can find to eat. In the maritimes there is probably a little more care taken in connection with poultry. Therefore it is not the easiest thing to regulate the price of eggs in a country like Canada. We might be able to handle the situation as it exists in British Columbia and in the extreme east; but the man in the middle west, who just lets his hens run wild and regards whatever he gets for the eggs as something extra, presents a greater problem, and it is difficult to control the prices of eggs under these conditions. We have, however, given the matter considerable thought, and we hope to arrive at some conclusion which will be of greater help than anything we have been able to do up to the present.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am somewhat at a disadvantage in taking part in this discussion because I have been attending a meeting of the war expenditures committee. I am glad some concession has been given the poultry raisers of British Columbia with regard to the freight on feed grain, but I should like to ask the minister why nothing has been done along the same line for the people of the maritime provinces. The government and agricultural societies of Nova Scotia have been appealing to the federal government for a considerable time for some concession which would enable the surplus feed grains of the prairie provinces to be delivered to the stock feeders and poultry raisers of the maritime provinces. Up to the present time, as I understand it, the department has been unable to grant this concession, but we are still hoping that something may be done.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thoroughly endorse what has been said as to the necessity of fixing egg prices. We have heard of eggs being sold for sixteen cents a dozen, but in some parts of Saskatchewan during the month of April eggs were selling at ten cents a dozen, and I know of one point where eggs were sold at three dozen for a quarter. This indicates how necessary it is that we should do something for those producing eggs. On the other hand, however, I agree with the minister that we must consider the needs of our friends across the ocean, and I believe he is encouraging the production of those goods that are considered most necessary at this time. In all probability we shall be called upon to send bacon and other foodstuffs to Great Britain in ever-increasing quantites as the war goes on and the shortages over there increase.

The hon. member for Danforth seems to believe there is some prosperity in Germany. As a matter of fact, if there has been any improvement in their standard of living lately, it is because the nazis have plundered all their neighbours, which, of course, is one way of solving their problem and raising their standard, if it has been raised, which I doubt very much. German standards have always been much lower than those of Great Britain, of this country and of other parts of the democratic world. But that does not meet the problem which was raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, namely, what are we going to do with large quantities of fruit that are being produced in Canada from orchards which are well established? We cannot continue processing apples, and building up large reserves of dried fruits and apple juices.

To my mind, however, a great deal might be done along the line suggested by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I am of opinion that eventually the war will be won by the nation which can maintain the best morale, and that it is essential that in our country the morale of our people should not only be maintained but be raised considerably. One of the ways in which we can raise the morale of our own people is to give them better and more food. We know there are certain vitamins in fruits which have been found actually to improve morale, and to enable people to withstand shock which otherwise, without these vitamins, they would not have been able to withstand.

So far as sending fruit to Great Britain is concerned, as was suggested by the hon. member for Danforth, I am afraid the shipping situation makes that practically impossible. There are some of us in the house who have relatives across the seas, and who from time to time have sent parcels of food and parcels of canned fruits, through the Dominion Canners—and quite economically, incidentally—to our relatives or friends in Great Britain. I understand, however, that that is now to be cut off. It is to be prohibited, so that an individual cannot send even those canned fruits we have been sending over in the past year or so. The reason is that there is a lack of shipping space.

Consequently we are going to have much greater difficulty this year than we did last in dealing with our Canadian fruits. There are thousands of people in Canada who could do with a better diet, with greater variety, and with more fruit and fruit juices. In a country in which are grown large quantities of fruits, it lowers the morale of the people when they learn that these commodities are being wasted or are allowed to rot, as apples and other fruits and vegetables have rotted in the last several years at a time when many were in need.

I have before me a chart prepared at one of our Canadian universities, and I must confess I had not quite realized the situation myself, despite the fact that I had gone into many figures dealing with social conditions. Looking at the chart, I find that of every ten persons over seventy years of age in Canada, four and a quarter—if I may put it in that way—are receiving old age pensions. That is to say, they have to live on incomes of from $200 to $365 a year, or $1 a day. In the two prairie provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, six out of every ten persons, or 60 per cent of all people over seventy years of age, have already applied for and are receiving some assistance under the Old Age Pensions Act. I may say for the benefit of some of my hon. friends from New Brunswick, who may not have seen a similar chart, that in their province the situation is slightly worse than the one I have described in the two prairie provinces.

The same condition affects the foods the people are buying, and the incomes with which they have to buy them. In order to secure a liberal diet on the basis of 1940 prices in Montreal, a family of five would need an income of $1,400 a year—and that is a very modest income. Out of that they would spend $11.43 a week for foodstuffs. But a vast majority of our people in Canada have not incomes of $1,400 a year, and as we go down below that figure we reach a point which does not permit of decent health standards. It seems to me that when the hon. member for Mackenzie suggests that some system of distribution might be worked out to apply to fruits, and other palatable and vitamin-bearing foodstuffs, to supplement the diets of the lower-paid wage-earners, the aged people and the children, he is on the right track. We should be considering this as a marketing problem. True, it is not a problem which will bring a profit to the government; that is, a profit in money, expressed in terms of dollars and cents. But it is something which will bring to the government a great deal of profit by way of improved morale and improved physique. We know now what we did not know before, that those terrible years of relief, starchy diets and low levels of subsistence did cause a great deal of havoc among our youth. We know that, because when we were perhaps more particular than we are now as to the type of physique we recruited for the army, large numbers of men were turned down on account of physical unfitness.

As I said at the outset, I believe that this war is going to be a test of endurance. If it is to be a test of endurance it is also going to be a test of morale. One way of keeping up the morale is to see to it that our people enjoy some of the fruits we are able to produce in abundance in this country.

One other point I would make about marketing, and it is this: I thoroughly agree with the Minister of Agriculture that we cannot continue to pile up vast quantities of wheat. But I believe, too, that wheat and other foodstuffs may yet be a very important war weapon. I believe that the fact that we have these large accumulations of wheat and of other foods in Canada, and the fact that we can tell the people of Europe that the moment they are able to cooperate with us in any way to overthrow the dictatorial powers, we can feed them, and feed them abundantly, may yet be the trump card in the winning of the war.

I am not alarmed when I see these large piles of wheat, provided we carry it over in the right way, and do not expect the man who produced it to carry the entire load. That is not fair or just, when that wheat may, as I say, be the psychological factor which will be of great benefit to the whole nation in future years. I do not believe that Canada, Great Britain and the United States—although the United States is not yet officially in the war—have used sufficiently this abundance of foodstuffs, as a weapon of propaganda. I have said before that I frequently listen to radio talks in English broadcast from Berlin and Rome. They are clever—diabolically clever. I believe that we are not sending out enough propaganda of the right type. We know perfectly well that the people of France, Belgium and other occupied countries have been reduced to a very low standard of living. We should be telling them that we can feed them, if they can cooperate with us, and achieve victory.

Of course I think we should also let them know that it is part of the nazi and fascist systems to underfeed the people outside the German reich and thus to control them easily. We ought to engage in propaganda to encourage the oppressed peoples to look forward to the time when they will be able to cooperate with us in overthrowing those who, if victorious, will keep them permanently underfed in order that they may be permanently under control. As I say, I think charity begins at home. I use the word "charity" not in the colloquial sense but in the real meaning of the word. If you like, love begins at home. During the next three months we ought to devise ways and means to cope with the abundance that providence may give to us this autumn of fruits and other commodities that we cannot export and yet must grow because we cannot destroy our orchards. In that way we can give our people better food and thus maintain and improve their physique and morale. I suggest that the minister should consider this in connection with marketing plans.

I have one other observation to make which is not quite as pleasant. This has to do with the marketing of grain. I have been told—and perhaps the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce have heard this—that as many as a hundred operators on the grain exchange are being given a certain amount of business of a speculative type, namely, by spreading options from one month to the next. This is just enough business to allow them to make $150 or so a month. This may not be true, but some of our farmers believe that it is true. This sort of thing, if true, tends to undermine the confidence of our people in our government. If grain brokers are no longer required, they should not be put on relief at the expense of the agricultural industry, especially at a time when many think that the grain exchange should be closed.

Mr. HATFIELD: I wish to protest against the importation of small new potatoes from the United States. Hundreds of cars of Alabama and California new potatoes came in during May when our potato growers were selling their potatoes at less than half the cost of production. These United States potatoes are of a grade and size which our growers are not allowed to market in Canada.

Foreign exchange is being used to bring in these potatoes. An order in council was put through on March 25 which was supposed to cure this condition, but it did not. They changed the grade from U.S. grade 1, size B, to U.S. grade 1, size A, but a proviso was included that until August 31 inclusive in each calendar year a minimum diameter of $1\frac{7}{8}$ inches was the only size requirement for new potatoes. The United States have new potatoes all the year round, and therefore small potatoes can be shipped in here any month of the year.

Mr. TRIPP: I am sorry the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has left the chamber. When he was talking about vitamins or the sources of vitamins, I should have liked to suggest to him that he would better have considered the fish on our eastern coast. Ten times the amount of the proper vitamins can be obtained from ten cents worth of cod-liver oil as can be obtained from ten cents worth of fruit juices.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have not received an answer from the minister to my question as to why the maritime provinces have not been given the same concessions as have been granted to the poultry raisers of British Columbia in connection with freight rates on grain for poultry feeding.

Mr. GARDINER: In all the discussion I forgot the hon. member's question. Last winter the eastern provinces, particularly the maritimes, asked us to give some assistance in the bringing of feed grains from Fort William. A little later on, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario became involved in the discussion. In the first instance we did agree to pay half the freight on feed grain from Montreal to the maritime provinces, but that was not considered satisfactory. The other two provinces were brought into the discussion, and we finally offered to pay the freight on feed grain from Fort William to all the five eastern provinces. After we had made that offer, much to our surprise the only province that took it up was Ontario, which perhaps needed it the least. They took 3,200,000 bushels and an additional sixty carloads. Before they could stop buying, they had another sixty carloads, and since no one else had come in we extended the offer to those sixty carloads. The other provinces came to the conclusion that it would be better policy for them not to take advantage of the offer. Probably, if we had agreed to pay all the freight, or if we had agreed to enter into an arrangement by which they could charge half the freight to the farmer, they would have accepted. We took the position that the intention was to give the farmer cheaper feed and to make feed available to him on the same basis as it was available in the other provinces. We thought that anything which was allowed should be paid by the governments and that the farmers should get the full benefit of the price, less the freight. It was left in that way, but the other provinces did not take advantage of it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What about the concessions on grain for poultry purposes to British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: That rate aplies only to British Columbia. Freight rates generally are dealt with by the transport board, and I understand that the position always taken by that board, as it was taken by the old board of railway commissioners, is that they will not set up any rates for any particular section of Canada which discriminate against any other section. When rates were established as between the prairies and British Columbia, the fact as to whether there was discrimination was taken into consideration. In connection with the shipment of grain from the prairies to the maritimes we went first to the transport board, and they took the position that they could not give a special rate for the maritimes without discriminating against the provinces in between. They finally took the position that they would not give a special rate even when all five provinces were being considered, because there would be some discrimination. After that decision had been given, we agreed to pay half the freight. We said to the provinces that we were quite prepared to pay half the freight provided they could get the railways to take part of the other half and then they take what was left. They again went to the railways, and the same position was taken, that there would be discrimination and, therefore, they would not reduce the rates.

Mr. FAIR: A short time before I left old Ireland to come to Canada, one of my neighbours who was a farmer thought he would wean his dog off eating, and he succeeded in doing that, but the dog died a few days afterwards. I think all will admit that that is a mean trick for anyone to try. Having listened, however, to the hon. member for Danforth, and also to statements of the policies of ministers of agriculture for the last number of years, not alone in the Liberal government, but in the Conservative government as well, I feel that they have been trying to wean the dog off eating, because the policy pursued by both those parties has been to starve out the farmer. I do not know whether in their opinion it is sound or sane business, but to my mind it is insane business. No country can survive unless its farmers are prosperous; and I might suggest that they should do what has been practised by a number of other industries in Canada for years past. If farmers were organized as they should be, they would be able to demand and obtain their costs of production plus a reasonable profit. If they did not get that cost and profit, they would do what the industrialists did in August, 1939, shortly before the war started; they would go to the government and demand certain things, and they would have their demands granted, as the industrialists did when they had their profit restrictions removed by orders in council which were imposed by parliament only that spring.

I am not going to suggest for a moment that the farmers go on strike at this time, but I would assert that, if they did so, they would be doing only what other interests in Canada have done in years past, and, perhaps, would do yet if their requests were not met.

The Minister of Agriculture has admitted on several occasions that we as farmers are entitled to better prices for our products, and says that the reason why we are not getting better prices for those products is that there is a surplus. If industry had a surplus of aeroplanes, Bren guns, ships or anything else, I wonder whether they would give them away at half the cost of production. They would not; they are too well organized and have too much control over governments to-day to do anything of that kind. But because farmers are unorganized, and, many of them, underfed, they are easy to control. For the past number of years, as far back as I can remember—thirty years at least—we have been controlled because we are underfed and are not able, owing to conditions which have been imposed on us and which we are not organized to fight, to demand the rights which properly belong to us.

Time after time in this house I have heard the Prime Minister and other hon. members plead for Canadian unity. They have declared that we must have equality of sacrifice. I ask the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers who are on the front benches to-night, is there an equality of sacrifice, and are all the industries in Canada treated alike? Inevitably the answer must be, no, the farming industry is being sabotaged and sooner or later must go down.

Since I came to the house we have presented arguments supported by figures issued under the authority of the government, to establish the truth of what I have said. I have no doubt that the government has sufficient evidence from every corner of this chamber to prove that we are not getting a square deal. The other day I quoted figures of wheat prices between 1926 and 1929. Upon the basis of that period, labour and industry alike are living under conditions equal to those which prevailed at that time. I quoted figures to show that if the farmers were paid on the basis of the average obtained for wheat at that time, we would be getting $1.35 a bushel. Instead of that, we receive 70 cents basis No. 1 northern at Fort William.

Advantage is also taken of the farmer in the matter of grades. I know of instances where wheat which graded No. 1 northern when threshing commenced was later brought down to No. 3. Nothing was done about the matter; the farmer had to take the rap. Such conditions should be remedied. Perhaps part of the poor success of our recruiting is due to some of the deals which have been handed out to the farmer.

To keep people underfed is to keep them under control. Something will have to be done. We must have forward-thinking people at the head of the government, men of progressive minds who will figure things out from the long-range point of view. The government travels just as fast as it is pushed.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the item before the committee is marketing. The policies of the government on wheat are not involved. The item before the committee is marketing, and the particulars in connection with it are to be found on page 68 of the estimates. The hon. member is in order when speaking on that subject, but not in reviewing statements which, to use his own words, he has already made.

Mr. FAIR: I am discussing conditions in connection with marketing.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I further call attention to the fact that the marketing of wheat is not under the Department of Agriculture at all; it is under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the proper place to discuss it is on the estimates of that department.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, that is just a side-line. We shall have a chance to discuss it later on. But—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. FAIR: I say that the marketing of wheat has been discussed by other hon. members, and not a word was said against it. That is not fair.

The CHAIRMAN: I thought it was Fair.

Mr. FAIR: Yes; Fair is speaking, but he is not getting fair treatment, because on different occasions I have been ruled out of order when I tried to answer questions raised by other speakers. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. FULFORD: Are you Fair?

Mr. FAIR: Yes, I am Fair. I am not to be kidded, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN: This should bring to the attention of hon. members the difficulties into which the chairman falls when he gives latitude and the rule is not strictly adhered to. It appears that when I was away from the committee the discussion was broadened, and when I came back I noticed that hon. members were not talking to the item. But we must draw the line somewhere.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your position, and I know that hon. members, including myself, have got out of bounds, but it is not fair that I should be singled out rather than anyone else.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is the last one to whom I would not be fair.

Mr. FAIR: I should have the same rights as other members.

I have here a statement of the United States programme in connection with the production of foodstuffs. Perhaps I had better read this. This is production, not marketing, but I come to the marketing part in the same article:

> Under the expanded programme, and . . . assuming continuation of existing price relationships and taking seasonal price variations into account, the department will make purchases in the open market to support long term prices (Chicago basis) at levels approximately as follows: Hogs, cwt., $9; dairy products (basis of butter, lb.), 31 cents; chickens, lb., 15 cents; eggs, doz., 22 cents. It was pointed out that these prices would be subjected to the customary commercial differentials for market grades and qualities.

As regards eggs, somebody has raised the question, and it may be in order to make one brief protest. I understand that the grades are not what they should be. The price per dozen is raised, but the grades are being changed sufficiently to keep the price down. Possibly more will be heard on that point when the question of egg production comes up on a later item.

I do not know that there is much use in saying any more. The government has got a programme, and apparently it is going to follow it out, with the result that it will sabotage to a considerable degree, as it has done in the past, the industry of agriculture.

Mr. PERLEY: I did not intend to speak on this item. I have been waiting to discuss another subject, but I thought I would point out that this whole discussion has been out of order for an hour and a half, although I have been ruled out of order on two or three occasions recently. Even to-day, when I undertook to discuss a certain question on a bill, the minister suggested that it would be better for me to leave the matter until we came to item 29. Yesterday I was ruled out of order on the question of production. This discussion on marketing has been out of order to-night. Last night one or two hon. members switched to a discussion which they thought they could carry on, but they were ruled out. The minister has been the chief transgressor. He gave a careful and interesting outline of the situation with regard to markets in Britain, and he covered everything. He covered item 26 and item 24; he spoke about the bonusing bill; he referred to summerfallowing; he discussed the advertisements discouraging the growing of more wheat; he mentioned butter, cattle, cheese, hogs and feed grain—and all this under the question of production. He might have told us what will be done with feed grains this year, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has tabled an order in council which practically makes it impossible for the farmer to do anything this year except under the most drastic conditions. The minister covered a great range of subjects.

Mr. McNIVEN: He did it satisfactorily.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes; I do not deny that he did. No one is better able to do it than the minister. He said that the one industry which was in a position when the war broke out to produce the materials necessary to assist in large measure in winning the war was agriculture. I suggest that it would be well if he would do something to make it possible for the farmer to receive for his products a price bearing some favourable comparison with prices paid for other commodities. I am not going to take up more time now. I agree with what the hon. member for Danforth said. The condition in Great Britain with regard to bacon and dairy products is attributable largely to the war, although the minister has boasted about increasing our exports of these products to that market. Of course, it is a splendid thing that we are able to supply these products, and the farmer will do his part to produce the necessary commodities from time to time and to continue producing, even at a loss, for the purpose of winning the war. I rose at this stage merely to lodge a protest, because, as I say, I have been ruled out of order several times in the last week, and to-night this whole discussion, for at least an hour and a half, has been altogether out of order.

Mr. GARDINER: All hon. members will recall that some weeks ago we gave an undertaking to certain hon. gentlemen that in view of the fact that we wanted to wind up the discussion on the wheat acreage reduction, we would permit, under this item, the discussion of the question which the hon. member for Lambton-Kent raised to-night. The discussion was out of order, but that undertaking was given. That is one reason for the discussion that took place to-night.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand that any one of us who wished to ask questions about wheat acreage reduction should have done so on this item?

Mr. GARDINER: No. I would suggest that there is an opportunity for discussing the administration of it under the estimate having to do with prairie farm assistance. However, we said that we would give an opportunity to those particular members to discuss the question on one of the administration items in agriculture, and the only administration item was this one under marketing.

Mr. PERLEY: I myself was waiting to speak on item 30.

Mr. GARDINER: The discussion on corn was carried on for the same reason.

Mr. RICKARD: When the committee rose last night we were discussing apples, and I wanted to say a few words on the situation in that regard. I congratulate the minister and the department upon what they have done for the apple growers of Canada. The attitude they have taken towards marketing and control of apples in the dominion has been a wonderful thing for the producers. Without that assistance it would have been difficult if not impossible to market our apples owing to the loss of the export market. The government have spent many thousands of dollars in advertising. In fact, not only governments but cooperative fruit growers associations have done so. I hold in my hand one advertisement in the form of the picture of an apple. It is a good apple too. We are told to eat more apples, that apples are good for the health, and so forth. During the past few weeks I have visited some of the camps throughout the country, and I must say that the apples used there are a long way from the sort of apple depicted in this advertisement. I understand that these apples are domestic grade. There is a great difference in domestic grades, and if we are simply to accept anything as domestic grade, we are going to get down to rather poor apples. When two and a quarter inch apples are allowed to go into domestic grades, and the apple has spots or fungus the size of a five cent piece, although it complies with the law as a domestic apple, we are a long way from the sort of thing we are advertising. My contention is that if we advertise apples in this way we should try to give the people a product that more closely resembles the thing we advertise. In our county there is a difference in the grading of domestics.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sorry, but I cannot see the relationship between the item under discussion and the question of grading apples, unless there is something which has escaped me. I am afraid that the discussion is out of order.

Mr. RICKARD: I understood that we could discuss these matters on item 20.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on item 22, and apples would come under fruit and vegetables.

Mr. RICKARD: I suggest that it might be just as well to dispose of the question now. What I was saying was that if we are going to advertise our apples in this way we should give the people what we are advertising or something near it. In our county a great many growers sell their apples as domestic. There might be forty or fifty per cent No. 1 in them, and the people who buy a hamper or a barrel of those domestic apples get a good grade. But when we grade them as the law says down to a fair domestic and take all the good ones out, which they are doing and selling them to these camps, I think we are getting down where we shall not be advertising our apples in the right way. There seems to be a lack of inspection on the part of someone in allowing this grade of apples to be sold. I saw in some of those camps apples that were not No. 3s by any means. I had one inspector go and look at some—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Unless the committee is willing to take items 26 and 22 together, I shall be in trouble with my own ruling if I allow the discussion to go on along these lines. Is it the pleasure of the committee to take at the same time items 22 and 26?

Mr. GARDINER: Agreed.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried. All right, carry on.

Mr. RICKARD: I was speaking about the grading of apples. If we are going to sell our apples we should sell them in accordance with our advertising. I was at some of those camps and saw apples that were not No. 3, and the inspection must have been very poor to allow those apples to be sold. We are paying inspectors; we have quite an inspection service; we have a fruit branch that is supposed to look after these matters. But as an apple grower I do not think we are doing justice to the business in allowing this kind of apples to be sold. I pass this information on to the minister, for I know I would not be allowed to send them out of my orchard. I understand that these apples are put in cold storage, bought from some cooperative concern, and I cannot understand why they were allowed to go into that cold storage plant, or allowed to get into the camp. We have inspectors; they are well paid; if we have not enough, let us get more, and control this thing.

I also want to congratulate the department upon what they have done for the apple grower.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister mentioned dehydrated apples. What is the surplus of dehydrated apples now?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures as to what we have left, but the amount is getting very low. We have no great quantity left.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not believe there is one woman in twenty-five throughout Canada who really knows what can be done with dehydrated apples. Some different advertising should be done in regard to the matter, because dehydrated apples will make much better apple pie or apple sauce than fresh apples.

Mr. RICKARD: I do not agree.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The apples which the hon. member mentioned are put in storage for some months and then they have not the flavour. I agree, however, with the hon. member with regard to the grading of apples. In Peterborough county I do not think one can get a decent apple at less than sixty cents a peck after October 1, and they are not properly graded at that. That is why people are starting to use dehydrated apples.

Mr. EDWARDS: In the details given on page 68 of the estimates under "marketing service", I see two home economists and one assistant demonstrator and lecturer. What are the duties of these persons, and how do they contribute to the marketing service?

Mr. GARDINER: Their work is to provide recipes and so forth, to overcome the very difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough West, namely, to teach women how to use dehydrated apples. We could use half a dozen more of them to good advantage but did not think it wise to spend the money at the present time.

[Mr. Rickard.]

Mr. EDWARDS: That raises a question which I think is of vital importance. We are dealing now with one of the primary industries and primary products of Canada. If secondary industry finds it expedient and advisable to have a merchandising service and actually goes out and demonstrates the value and usefulness of its products, then it seems to me that this department might very well adopt those methods which have been found efficient in the promotion of the use of the natural products of Canada in their natural state. We are all familiar with the methods adopted even by manufacturers of chewing gum in demonstrating the uses of the article. Nearly every successful manufacturing industry in Canada has found it profitable and expedient to increase the consumption of the product or service which it is purveying by actually getting out and selling or merchandising that product or service. We had one example two years ago of what this department can accomplish in "selling" to the Canadian people, our own home people, the value of the Canadian apple in its raw state. We are all familiar with the satisfactory and gratifying result of that in increasing the use of our apple crop.

What disturbs me—I referred to it once before—is that there seems to be a tendency to do the very opposite of what successful industry and commerce do when faced with a similar situation; that is, instead of expanding our appropriation for advertising and demonstrating the value and usefulness of the commodity, the department is spending less money. The minister has said that we could profitably use half a dozen more demonstrators. If, by the employment of six or eight or ten or twenty home economists—

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. gentleman speaking to item 28 now?

Mr. EDWARDS: No; I am speaking to item 22.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no decrease in that item.

Mr. EDWARDS: The minister has just stated that the department could use six or eight more home economists and demonstrators in connection with the marketing services, and it is my suggestion that instead of contracting our expenditures in connection with the merchandising and marketing of agricultural products in Canada, we could and should increase our appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. McNIVEN: I was surprised a few moments ago to hear the hon. member for Qu'Appelle state that during the last couple of days he had been called to order on more than one occasion. I can scarcely credit that statement, for in the course of his remarks during the last few days I have heard him express greater approval of the policies of the government, and a greater degree of confidence in the Minister of Agriculture, than in the last five years. So eulogistic were those references that I quite anticipate that during the summer months the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will be going through the constituencies of Saskatchewan expressing sentiments similar to those which were expressed to me by a former confrere of the hon. gentleman, the late member for Parkdale, whom we all respected and admired, who told me that he thought the present minister was the best Minister of Agriculture Canada ever had.

Mr. PERLEY: To what item is the hon. member referring?

Mr. McNIVEN: I am marketing the Minister of Agriculture. Under this item of marketing I should like to bring one matter to the attention of the minister. In British Columbia, under the provincial marketing act which has been declared intra vires by the courts, they have set up either one or two companies which control the fruit industry of that province. There is a monopoly, which is subsidized by the dominion government, particularly in connection with apples, to the extent of $1,750,000. That monopoly is further protected by the difference in freight rates; by the usual rates of duty that obtain; by the dumping duties that apply during certain seasons of the year, concerning which we are receiving notices every other day; by the 10 per cent general duty, put into effect last fall, and finally by the 10 per cent foreign exchange rate. Therefore the fruit industry of British Columbia is to-day the most highly protected industry anywhere in this country, and by reason of that protection they have set up a monopoly with regard to the sale of fruit on the prairies.

I am not going to detract from the quality of the fruit produced in British Columbia, but they are exercising the monopoly they enjoy in this way. Dealers on the prairies who have been in business for years are denied the right to purchase fruit from this monopoly. They have the cash; they are willing to live up to every condition imposed by the monopoly; yet they cannot buy the fruit. The monopoly takes to itself the right to select its own dealers and designate the terms upon which its products shall be sold. I protest most emphatically against any monopoly, subsidized and protected as this one is, selecting its dealers here and there and driving out of business other individuals who have been in the business for a period of years.

We have a great many monopolies in this country, and it seems to me that we who live on the prairies are the victims of all of them. We have the fruit and lumber monopolies of the Pacific coast. We have the industrial monopoly of eastern Canada. We in Saskatchewan, in the centre of Canada, a million people, sit there battered and bruised, pillaged and plundered, raped and robbed, sucked and squeezed, the ready victims of the voracious. I wish to raise an emphatic protest against the continued operation of this monopoly, and to ask the minister to exercise his usual ability in coping with this situation. I ask that he require this monopoly at least to extend its privileges to all those who have been in this line of business for many years.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member has just delivered a carefully phrased and rather severe stricture on the fruit industry of British Columbia, which I do not think it would be possible to answer completely in ten minutes. It does occur to me, however, that if conditions are one-tenth as bad as he has described them, he has a ready opportunity at hand to gain redress, about which as a lawyer he must know a good deal. He can make use of the machinery under the Combines Investigation Act to lay bare the wickedness of this combine.

Mr. McNIVEN: That has been attempted already, but they have no jurisdiction because this is a provincial company, authorized and approved under provincial legislation.

Mr. STIRLING: I suggest that a provincial statute cannot give that company rights within the province of Saskatchewan, because that is outside the jurisdiction of that act. I therefore repeat that if the situation is as bad as he has described it—and I am not ready to subscribe to all the points he made in his rapidly painted picture—he has at his disposal an opportunity to make use of the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I do not accept his statement that this has been tried and is not efficacious for the reason he gave.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The question raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to the price of eggs either was not answered satisfactorily by the minister, or I failed to hear it.

Mr. GARDINER: Apparently it was answered to the satisfaction of the hon. member who asked it, because he left the chamber immediately after I gave my answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am interested in this matter of the price of eggs. It seems to me that the minister should be in a position to give us some specific statement regarding Canada's proposals in respect of eggs.

Mr. GARDINER: If we are to keep to the item, then the hon. member is really discussing item No. 27.

The CHAIRMAN: When a question has been raised and the minister has answered, if any hon. member is not satisfied with his answer, then the hon. member's remedy lies in voting against the item. But it is against the rules of the committee to repeat an argument or to repeat a question. The question has been developed respecting remedies to be applied in connection with the price of eggs. The minister has given a lengthy answer as to the reasons why the price of eggs has not been regulated to a greater extent by the department. I repeat the same questions over and over again is against the rules of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not entirely sure that I know what this is all about. I have been trying to learn ever since I came into the chamber to-night. It would seem that we are discussing a question of marketing; surely the price of eggs is connected with marketing?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, but it has been discussed already. The very same question was put to the minister, and he answered it. There is a rule against repetition of the same question. That is the point I am drawing to the attention of hon. members.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely that does not prevent me from commenting upon what the minister has said?

The CHAIRMAN: It is quite permissible for the hon. member to comment upon the minister's answer, but he must not repeat the question to which an answer has already been given. That would entail tedious repetition, and it is clearly prohibited by the rules.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me strange that Canada cannot give any sort of commitment as to what the price of eggs will be. I am not asking the question. It was pointed out, however, that the United States is offering to buy eggs at twenty-two cents a dozen, and that the price will remain at that figure until June 30, 1943. My general comment is that the price of eggs throughout Canada is very uncertain. No man can have any assurance whatsoever, if he buys a number of baby chicks this spring, develops them and goes into the production of eggs, as to what the price will be.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

If we want to have egg production in Canada, then, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the one way to get egg production is to guarantee the price at which producers of eggs will be able to carry on. No such price has been guaranteed, and it is my contention that the minister and the Department of Agriculture should be prepared to make that guarantee. If the United States can guarantee a price of twenty-two cents a dozen, then we should be able to come somewhere near that. The objection I had was that the minister had not given us any clear or definite statement.

Mr. GARDINER: If I might again draw attention to the fact, I would point out that this discussion should be under item 27. I have already answered the question twice, and I would be out of order in answering it again. Everything connected with the sale of eggs comes under the item for live stock and live stock products. I should like to have one or two of these items passed to-night, even if it is almost eleven o'clock. We have been discussing about eight items at one time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I grant that all that may be true. I have been sitting quietly, listening to other hon. members talk, and I had gathered that the matters to which I have referred were under discussion.

Mr. GARDINER: When we reach item 27 I shall be prepared to answer the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just fine. I am concerned about learning what we are discussing. All I wish to say can be said under item 27, and if I am permitted to do so I shall be satisfied. I do not wish to be out of order.

Item agreed to.

24. Marketing service. Dairy products, $357,082.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would the minister give some further information as to the price of cheese? In what he said earlier, it would appear the government intended to put on another cent bonus, and make the price sixteen cents f.o.b. boat, Montreal. He said that we are going to make more cheese this year and next year. I thought he left the impression or the inference, that sixteen cents would be the price for both years.

Mr. GARDINER: At the present time the return to the farmer is from eighteen cents to twenty cents a pound.

Mr. TUSTIN: I understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe that is a sufficient return to induce production for the remainder of this year, and probably well into next year.

Mr. TUSTIN: That was not the point I was trying to make. I understand that there was a bonus of one cent for cheese that grades 93, and two cents for cheese grading 94, besides the provincial bonus of two cents. To-night, however, the minister said that the government of Canada had increased the bonus so that it would bring the farmer sixteen cents f.o.b. Montreal. He said that we were going to produce more this year and next year, and I thought he left the inference that that price would prevail for the two years.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that at the moment I do not see any reason why the price should go below that. Only events in the war for which we are not looking would cause that.

Item agreed to.

25. Marketing service. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $114,864.64.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): How are the subsidies to these cold storage plants computed?

Mr. GARDINER: These are only instalments on existing subsidies. They are spread over five years, and in this vote only enough money is provided to make payment to meet commitments made some years ago. There are no new ones this year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These are to help build plants?

Mr. GARDINER: The provision is that we pay 30 per cent of the cost, spread over a five-year period. We are cold storage warehouses this year. These are payments due under commitments made two, three or four years ago.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE THAT MEMBERS OF CONCILIATION BOARDS SHALL NOT HAVE PECUNIARY OR OTHER INTEREST

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 96, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Explain.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by this bill is an amendment of section 12 of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. As the section now reads it provides that no person shall act as a member of a conciliation board who has any pecuniary interest in the matter in dispute. In an endeavour to secure a more impartial board than in some instances we have secured, these words are being added to the bill:

—or who is then acting or has so acted within a period of six months preceding the date of the application for a board in the capacity of solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent of either of the parties to the dispute.

The purpose, I think, is obvious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this the only section which is to be amended?

Mr. McLARTY: It is the only section to be amended under this bill. It is with the thought of securing an impartial board which can deal with matters in dispute.

Mr. CHURCH: Does the act or the amendment now apply to public utilities?

Mr. McLARTY: It applies generally to utilities, yes. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has always so applied.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OIL REGULATIONS

Mr. HOBLITZELL:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to a statement appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, May 28, in which Mr. Cottrelle, oil controller, answered criticisms made regarding oil regulations?

2. Will the government give consideration to the suggestion of investigation outlined by Mr. Cottrelle?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. This is a matter concerning government policy which will be announced in due course.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TORONTO POST OFFICE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What are the details or break-down in sessional paper No. 281a, tabled recently, regarding the operation of the Toronto post office, showing a surplus over all expenses, maintenances, salaries and overhead of $1,531,551.66?

2. What becomes of this surplus for the last year of record, and will the price of drop letters be reduced from two to one cent in the city?

FINES FOR SOLDIERS HITCH-HIKING

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many soldiers at Camp Borden and Petawawa have been fined for a breach of a regulation issued under the authority of the officer commanding, preventing hitch-hiking?
2. How many from Toronto were fined $5 each from their weekly pay?
3. Who authorized this fine, and under what section of the statutes of Canada, the Army Act, the Militia Act, the Air or the Navy Act was it imposed?
4. Was the scale of fines sanctioned by the government, and on whose orders?
5. What becomes of these fines?
6. Who authorized such penalties and will an inquiry be held in the matter?
7. What fines were imposed on air men or navy herein?

LABOUR DEPARTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF AN ASSOCIATE DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Labour Department Act to provide for the appointment of an Associate Deputy Minister of Labour.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the consideration of the house.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ADDITIONAL DIVERSIONS AT NIAGARA FALLS—PROCEDURE IN INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked a question yesterday concerning the matter of diversions of water above Niagara. I was not in a position to give him an exact answer at the moment, and my hon. friend said he would bring the question up again, possibly on going into committee of supply. But as the Speaker leaves the chair without question being put, on going into supply both to-day and to-morrow, I have thought I should give my hon. friend immediately the information he desires and thus perhaps avoid the necessity for debate. I will summarize first the facts relating to diversions and then discuss procedure.

In article V of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909, Canada and the United States agreed not to divert more than a specified amount of water from the Niagara river above the falls. There was no change in the amount of diversion until November, 1940, when, by an exchange of notes, the United States agreed not to object to an additional temporary diversion at Niagara by Ontario of water equivalent to diversions which Ontario was to make into the great lakes basin from the Albany river basin. This exchange of notes was tabled in the House of Commons on November 12, 1940.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement signed on March 19, 1940, which is expressly subject to approval by the parliament of Canada and the United States congress, has two provisions affecting diversions at Niagara.

Article VIII of that agreement authorizes each country to use for power purposes any water diverted by it into the great lakes system. Article IX provides for the construction of remedial works at Niagara and for the subsequent additional diversion by each country of 5,000 cubic feet per second in excess of the amount specified in the Boundary Waters Treaty. These articles are, of course, not yet in force.

The exchange of notes signed on May 20, 1941, which was tabled in this house on May 29, provides, as a temporary measure in view of the present emergency, for an immediate additional diversion of 5,000 cubic feet per second by the United States and for an immediate additional diversion of 3,000 cubic feet per second by Canada. The temporary nature of this arrangement is made clear by provisions in the notes. The arrangement is expressed to be for the duration of the national defence emergency and, in all events, is subject to reconsideration by both governments on October 1, 1942. Furthermore, it is provided that the arrangement will be subject to the provisions of article IX of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement when that agreement comes into force.

The reasons for this emergency arrangement were explained in full by the hon. the Minister of Mines and Resources when he tabled the notes on May 29. It is not necessary to repeat these reasons, which lead to the conclusion that war needs make the increased diversion essential. As explained on May 29, the advisers of the Canadian government and representatives of Ontario and Quebec are satisfied that the increased diversions will not be detrimental or harmful to Canadian interests.

Turning now to the constitutional question of the proper procedure to be followed in such cases, as indicated in my reply of yesterday, under the British and Canadian constitutions, the crown enjoys the sole right of conducting all foreign relations, which includes the making and, if necessary, the ratifying, of international agreements of all kinds.

In the United Kingdom, it is a rare thing for the government to ask the approval of parliament or of the House of Commons before making or ratifying treaties, even formal and important ones.

In Canada, without derogating from the legal rights of the crown, a custom has developed different from that in the United Kingdom. On June 21, 1926, this house adopted a resolution which I moved, the final paragraph of which reads that the house considers that:

. . . before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty, convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be secured.

On April 12, 1928, in the course of the debate on the International Sanitary Convention in this house, I said:

I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings. In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character.

Since 1928 the custom in Canada, both under the government of Mr. Bennett and under the present government, has moved even farther away from the United Kingdom practice in the direction of more parliamentary control of international agreements. The present practice is that, except in the case of very unimportant agreements or in the case of great urgency, the Senate and House of Commons are asked to approve formal treaties, conventions and agreements, before they are ratified by or in respect of Canada.

However, while the practice has developed in this way in the case of formal agreements requiring ratification, it has never been the practice in Canada to ask parliament or the House of Commons to approve agreements which are in the form of exchange of notes. Generally speaking, agreements are made in the form of an exchange of notes either because they are too unimportant for a formal agreement, or because they are intended to be of a temporary character.

In the opinion of the government, it would be a mistake to change the custom still further by asking parliament or the House of Commons to approve exchange of notes.

Following the principles which I have outlined, parliament was not asked to approve the exchange of notes of November, 1940, which authorized a temporary additional diversion at Niagara by the province of Ontario. So far as the question of procedure is concerned, there is no ground for distinction between that exchange of notes and the one signed on May 20, 1941. There was no reason to follow any different procedure on this occasion.

It might be pointed out that neither of these two exchanges of notes requires legislation in order to give them effect in Canada. The only thing which the Canadian government has promised to do in the notes of May 20 is to refrain from objecting to an additional diversion of water by the United States.

The United States government for its part desired to have the approval of the United States Senate before being bound by the latest exchange of notes. It would not be appropriate for me to attempt to explain the reasons for this decision. The constitutional provisions and practice of the United States in the matter of international agreements is, as I have said, not the same as that of Canada. It would not seem desirable that Canada's treaty procedure should be altered solely because the United States Senate is being asked by the United States government to approve this particular exchange of notes.

While it is not the practice in Canada to ask for parliamentary approval of exchange of notes, it is customary and desirable to table any such which are of importance or interest. The purpose of tabling them is not merely to inform the house, but also to provide a basis for debate, if so desired, at the appropriate time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For purposes of information may I ask whether the proposal immediately under discussion is not in effect a departure from the treaty itself? That is my understanding of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may be correct; but certainly, as I have indicated in what I have stated, what is being attempted is simply of a temporary nature to meet an emergent situation, and the whole principle involved will come up for discussion when we are dealing with the treaty itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that is the theory on which the exchange of notes has been made, but it is a vain hope. Once this water is diverted it will never come back and therefore the diversion is not of a temporary nature. One more question. If my recollection is correct, the Prime Minister has stated the trend of policy and practice in Canada. But have we not in one important event at any rate departed from that practice, namely, the joint defence board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to give a little thought to the question which my hon. friend has just asked.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I raised the question I should like first to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his remarks to-day. I shall consider them thoroughly and perhaps not make a decision until early next week. That is, I will not interfere with the estimates as they come in to-day and to-morrow, but after reviewing the matter I may say something on Monday or Tuesday, because I am concerned about the principle involved.

As the amount of water now referred to in the notes will raise the total diversion at Niagara Falls to I believe some 69,000 cubic feet per second, it is a matter of major importance to this parliament, and perhaps a brief statement on Monday or Tuesday might clear the air a little.

Mr. CHURCH: This very same matter, the diversion of 5,000 cubic second feet, was before the house in 1929 and was debated on a proposed treaty which grew out of the Shipstead act; then 10,000 cubic second feet diversion was to be given to each country for additional power from the Niagara river for power purposes. The matter came up in a debate in which I participated over a period of two days. The matter was then made the subject of a proposed treaty between the two countries. Half the power in the surplus water was to be given to Ontario, in accordance with the decisions on the various waterway cases before the privy council. Ontario owns half the river bed and the banks and rapids and the water for power purposes in half the river. The surplus waters in boundary waterway streams subject to navigation rights belong to the provinces and states. Under the 1929 treaty which grew out of the bill introduced by Senator Shipstead at Washington, Ontario was to get its half for public ownership under the Ontario hydro electric power commission. The treaty would have become law in 1929 but for the opposition of New York state which wanted to give its share to private ownership. Canada by that proposed treaty consented to distribute one-half of the extra flow of this 10,000 cubic second feet which belonged to Ontario for public ownership; New York state wanted the other half for private ownership. For this reason the treaty was not adopted, though validated over here. I fear for the scenic beauty ever being preserved except by additional remedial works in the river. The levels are lower now than they were then.

I would ask the Prime Minister if, having regard to the decision of the privy council on the waterways, this can now be accomplished over the head of parliament as a war measure and not, as in 1929, by treaty. I suggest that he read the briefs and the debates which took place here in 1929 as to this new procedure. There is a great principle involved and all papers and plans should be tabled. If the executive can in this way part with public and private property over acts of parliament, then if the procedure is carried to its logical conclusion it could give away the whole country for a few pounds of Boston tea.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has asked me about half a dozen questions, I think. I shall have to look at the record to see exactly what the points are upon which he wishes to be informed. I will seek to give him an answer in due course.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

METHOD OF PAYMENTS BY EMPLOYERS UNDER THE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I have not given him notice, but I am satisfied that the minister will be able to answer—if not now, perhaps at a later stage in the day. Has any decision been reached by the unemployment insurance commission which will require all employers whose employees come within the scope and operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act to pay such employees weekly? If so, under what authority has this decision been taken? It is quite apparent that this would mean a substantial amount of increased cost. I have no doubt it would be a great convenience to employees. I am wondering whether this was the principle upon which the decision was reached, if it has been reached, or is it for reasons of administration; but particularly, under what authority is the action taken?

We know that most big corporations pay fortnightly, and that makes for permanency of employment. It no doubt would be a great convenience to employees to have wages paid weekly, but this would be upsetting the whole present modus operandi for most of those concerned.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): As the leader of the opposition stated, I had no notice of his intention to ask this question. The very suggestion comes to me as a considerable surprise, because I believe that the commission has been working with such organizations as the railway companies to arrange the most convenient way in which payments may be made under the Unemployment Insurance Act. However I assure the leader of the opposition that I shall take the matter up at once, although offhand I must say that I do not believe the suggestion given to him is correct.

WHEAT

REPORTED SHIPMENTS FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA TO THE FAR EAST IN JAPANESE BOTTOMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have given notice. I have been informed that there is now being loaded 4,000 tons of wheat, approximately 144,000 bushels, for Japanese account. It is further reported to me that the total sale by the wheat board is for 14,000 tons, or about 500,000 bushels, that 10,000 tons remain to be loaded in other vessels, and that the grain is being shipped in Japanese bottoms. Furthermore it is reported to me that the wheat is being loaded in sacks, which method is wholly unusual, to say the least, and lends support to the theory that the ultimate destination of this wheat is not Japan but other countries of the axis.

I should like to know from the minister whether this report is true; whether the Canadian wheat board is dealing with the Japanese government and Canadian wheat is being exported to that country, and whether inquiry is being made as to the ultimate destination of this wheat.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps this is a question which as Secretary of State for External Affairs I should answer. I was told last evening that a press dispatch had come from Vancouver to the effect that shipments of grain to Japan were being made there. I immediately requested my office to issue a statement to make clear the nature of the shipments that were taking place, and the following communication was given to the Canadian Press as a release and appears I think in the papers of to-day:

> It is announced from Ottawa that the wheat that is at present being shipped to the far east from British Columbia was under firm order before the present export permit requirements came into force. The authorities state that practically all of this grain is destined for north China for consumption there.
> In accordance with their policy with respect to the export of all commodities under wartime conditions the government are carefully watching shipments of wheat.

I might particularize a little in reference to that statement. Orders had been placed on the part of Japan for the wheat in question before any export permit requirements respecting wheat shipments had come into force in Canada. Shipments were actually stopped at the time because of export permit requirements coming at that moment into force, but on careful consideration of the whole matter it was felt that as the order had been placed before this requirement came into force, those particular shipments should be allowed to proceed. That course, I may add, is in accord with international usage.

My hon. friend referred to the shipments taking place in Japanese bottoms. I might explain the situation governing that aspect. As my hon. friend knows, all British bottoms are being requisitioned at the present time for use by the British empire, and in order to enable these wheat shipments to go forward it was thought best to require of the Japanese government that the shipments should be made in their own bottoms.

My hon. friend also asked as to the part of the wheat board in the transaction. I am informed that the wheat board had no part whatever in this transaction. It was a private firm transaction.

As to the loading in bags, I am informed that shipment by bag is the usual method where elevator unloading facilities are not available. I might add that inquiries made in Japan itself by our legation, and also inquiries that we have made of the Japanese minister here, give us every reason to believe that these shipments of grain are to go to north China. As my hon. friend is aware, the Japanese government control a large part of that area at the present time, and I understand that the people there are in a more or less famished condition. These shipments are, I understand, to serve the needs of those people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am curious to learn how any private firm could make a commitment of this kind without obtaining the wheat from the wheat board, which owns all the wheat in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I may be incorrectly informed, but my understanding of the situation is that no one can ship wheat without the consent of the wheat board or without obtaining the wheat from the board. This is a large transaction, involving half a million bushels. The wheat board must be in the picture somewhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My information is that it is not.

FUEL FOR HEATING PURPOSES

STEPS TO BE TAKEN TO MEET POSSIBLE SHORTAGE NEXT WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the government a question with reference to the possibility of a coal famine next winter, and to direct attention to the meeting of a committee which took place in Toronto yesterday at which Colonel K. R. Marshall, president of the Standard Fuel Company of Toronto, warned the committee to expect a fuel shortage during the coming winter. The newspaper report states:

"I know one firm which is already 1,600 carloads short on their orders," Colonel Marshall said. "I foresee a shortage in both coke and fuel oil this winter."

In this connection I should like to direct attention to sessional paper 175C, brought down in this house last month, which I contend is insufficient and incomplete. This return had to do with this very matter of the supply of fuel for the winter, and this question was asked:

Was coal rationed by the government during the coal famine in 1917? If so, under what legislative action or rules and regulations?

What study is being made, or action taken, regarding the use of other forms of heating, as a substitute for coal?

The answers to these questions were not at all satisfactory, and I should like to know if a further study of the question will be made having in mind the full utilization of gas, oil and electrical energy for heating purposes during the coming winter, and also whether any action will be taken following this meeting in Toronto yesterday at which a coal famine was predicted by at least two-thirds of the coal dealers of Toronto.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I noticed that in asking his question my hon. friend had to make use of information which has been handed to him or which he himself has written out. Sometimes it is a little difficult to tell whether the hon. member is asking a question or making a speech. I am afraid I shall have to ask him once more to let me look at the record before attempting to reply to his question.

CHIGNECTO CANAL

QUESTION OF CONSTRUCTION AS DEFENCE MEASURE ASSOCIATED WITH ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the Minister of National Defence in a position to make any statement with respect to the attitude of the United States and of his department towards the construction of the Chignecto canal as a defence measure, in association with the proposals having to do with the St. Lawrence development?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am not in a position to make any statement at the moment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION PRIOR TO ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if at some stage during the remaining days of the session some opportunity will be afforded for a discussion of the question of national defence?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend has mentioned this matter to me already. As he knows, there are still some estimates of the Department of National Defence which have not been passed; apparently these are noted as being for other than war purposes. So far as I am concerned I shall be glad to have any matters which it is felt necessary or desirable to discuss taken up on those items. I suggest that the item covering the salary of the minister might be as good a place as any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is statutory, of course, and not open to discussion. When could the discussion take place?

Mr. RALSTON: I had in mind that the national defence estimates might be called at any time. I was not in the house last night when the announcement of to-day's business was made, but why not take them up to-morrow?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be satisfactory, but not in the evening.

Mr. RALSTON: I hope my hon. friend will not impose too many conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister knows the situation in this house on Friday evening.

Mr. RALSTON: I should think to-morrow would be satisfactory.

RAILWAY AMALGAMATION

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION ON ORDER DEALING WITH CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY FINANCING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Will hon. members have an opportunity of discussing the question of railway amalgamation when order No. 7 is called, having to do with Canadian National Railways; and, if so, will it be called this morning, this afternoon or to-night?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot indicate to my hon. friend just when the particular matter referred to may appropriately be considered. Mr. Speaker has a voice in some of these matters, as well as the leader of the house; I have no doubt, however, the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to discuss the question.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

QUESTION AS TO MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED ON JUNE 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the government could tell the house when we may expect concurrence to be moved in the report of the war expenditures committee?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall have to give my hon. friend an answer to that question later.

AIR CADET LEAGUE

STATEMENT AS TO ORGANIZATION OF LEAGUE AND METHODS OF OPERATION OF UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): In view of the wide interest that has been taken throughout the country in the Air Cadet League of Canada, perhaps I may be permitted at this time to present a statement which the league has asked me to make. A great many hon. members of this house, as well as many people throughout the country, have been very much interested in this project, and if I place this statement on Hansard it may serve to clear up some difficulties which have presented themselves. I should add that this statement has been prepared in conjunction with Mr. G. B. Foster, K.C., of Montreal, president of the league.

Organization of the Air Cadet League of Canada was concluded at a meeting in Ottawa early this week. The directors of the league have returned to their provinces to set up provincial committees which will foster the movement in their provinces. As soon as these committees are ready it will be possible for public bodies, service clubs, school boards and public-minded citizens to apply to them for advice and guidance in sponsoring units in their districts.

Briefly, the plan is to have the operation of the league decentralized. Each unit will be self-supporting and stand on its own feet. The minimum number of boys necessary to form a unit at this time is fifty senior air cadets, that is, between the ages of fifteen and eighteen. The provincial committees will further the objects of the league in their provinces and assist and advise the various regional committees who sponsor units, but once a unit is in operation it will deal directly with cadet headquarters in Ottawa on routine business, there being no such thing as regional or provincial branch offices of the league.

Boys wishing to be air cadets do not join through league headquarters. They should keep in touch with their local situation and join the unit in their district when it is formed.

The headquarters of the league is situated at 122 Wellington street, Ottawa. The officers of the league are as follows:

Patron: His Excellency The Right Hon. The Earl of Athlone, K.G., Governor General of Canada.

Honorary President: Air Marshal W. A. Bishop, V.C., D.S.O., M.C., D.F.C.

President: G. B. Foster, K.C., D.F.C.

Honorary Secretary-Treasurer: Arthur L. Melling.

Secretary-Treasurer: L. G. Dando.

The Board of Directors

President: G. B. Foster, K.C., D.F.C.
Hon. F. P. Brais, K.C.
H. R. Carson.
A. W. Carter, M.B.E., D.S.C.
Pierre De Varennes, K.C.

T. M. Sheard.

A representative to be selected from the province of Nova Scotia, and a representative to be selected from the province of Prince Edward Island.

CANADIAN ARMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PROGRESS OF CURRENT RECRUITING CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Will the Minister of National Defence, before the house adjourns, give a report on the recruiting campaign?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I can tell my hon. friend now about the report with regard to the recruiting campaign. I had intended to do it on the estimates, but my hon. friend is concerned about it, and I shall be very glad to tell him what the situation is.

Reports this morning are that up to yesterday 24 per cent of the total allotment had been enlisted. That is, 24 per cent have been actually enlisted since the radio address which I made. That does not include those who were enlisted prior to that date, in connection with current reinforcements, which will have to be considered. I am not taking account of that now. That is, there is a total of 7,655.

I may say, with regard to the different districts, that each district is being informed not only as to the percentage which has been raised of its quota, but also of the percentages which all other districts have raised, so that each district may know just what increase is being made by it in comparison with other districts.

I may say, further, that to give a statement of this kind is perhaps not altogether fair to districts, for this reason: in connection with the call no less than 8,000 of the 32,000 which were asked for are asked for the purpose of replacing units of the fourth division which were absorbed by the armoured division. Those new units of the fourth division are just now in process of mobilization. The reserve units have been, in some cases, authorized to mobilize—I think perhaps in all cases now. But in some cases officers have not been completely appointed, and in districts where that is taking place the mobilization of those units will of course give a sudden impetus to the recruiting in such districts. We believe a large proportion of the personnel of the reserve units will come in at once. So that hon. members cannot be guided by time to time percentages until the recruiting of reinforcements and the recruiting of reserve units is complete.

In that connection my hon. friend gives me an opportunity to say this: we have had great help from civilian committees. I have been tremendously encouraged by the help which has been given, and the assurance as to the work which the large civilian committees are doing. They are just, as a matter of fact, getting into their stride now. Recruiting has accelerated rapidly over the first days. I think yesterday was the second highest. It has more than doubled the recruiting of the first days after the call was made. I believe this improvement is due in large measure to the assistance which the civilian committees are giving, and I am sure to the assistance which the district officers commanding and their staffs are giving.

I only wish to say—I may have an opportunity to say it again—that I ask members to put their backs into this effort. I know they are doing so. I have had assurances from many of them, and also from members of provincial legislatures as well. I feel that at this time the thing to do, if I may say so, is to look at our particular corner of the vineyard. That is the place to work; and we have the right to expect that each person will do the same. I want to say to hon. members that most of what I have received by way of criticism has been constructive. There have been cases in which people have been blue, down and low. But that is what we have to take in connection with recruiting campaigns.

I consider this is partly a matter of raising men for units we have pledged to the British, and to fill up the fourth division as well. I have every reason to believe that with the acceleration which has taken place in the campaign, and with the assurances we have received, the campaign will be a complete success.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Would the minister reply to a question on enlistments and the present system of records in his department? I asked about the same thing the other day, as to whether it would be possible to have an official statement given out monthly as to the enlistments in the various forces. The minister said he would reply to the question which had been asked by me in the house regarding records as to enlistments being published according to municipalities, like the victory loan and income tax, on a unit system.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid my hon. friend's question has been a bit obscured by conditions in the house. If I understood him correctly he was asking, roughly, for enlistments in the three arms of the services. I do not know that that is possible. It depends of course on what activities there are in the army, and whether there are sufficient enlistments at that time. I doubt if what the hon. member suggests would be advisable. However, I shall take it into consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: The air force adopted that system at manning pools. It is an incentive to recruiting in each centre to know what each town and province is doing, and the deputy minister for air arranged it in Toronto last July.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister suggested that we should look to our localities. Could he tell us how military district No. 12 is proceeding?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to tell my hon. friend. As I say, I do not think it is quite fair to the district officers commanding. As I have pointed out, the officers have a right to the information not only with respect to their own district, but with respect to other districts as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister be good enough to inform the house as to military district No. 7? It would be extremely gratifying to every hon. member in the house.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES IN AND FOR YUKON TERRITORY

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Yukon Act to provide for the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in and for the Yukon territory.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is a simple matter, arising from the substantial diminution of judicial business in the Yukon territory. It has decreased considerably from year to year. Conditions there are not at all what they were when the Yukon Act was enacted.

The Department of Mines and Resources, which is charged with the administration of the Yukon territory, suggested two or three months ago that when Mr. Justice Macaulay, who was the judge of the territorial court of the Yukon territory, retired, it would be better and much less expensive to have what is left of the legal business in that territory transacted by stipendiary magistrates, as is done in the northwest territory. Those magistrates are doing other work for the department, and the change would mean a substantial economy. Mr. Justice Macaulay has agreed to take his superannuation, and it became effective on the last day of May—only a few days ago. This authorizes the governor in council to appoint a stipendiary magistrate to do what little work there is. He will also do other work for the Department of Mines and Resources. We will save the salary paid to the judge, and there will be other economies as well.

I regret that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has had to leave, but I may say that I have discussed the matter with him. The first suggestion of the Department of Mines and Resources was to do away altogether with the position of the judge of the territorial court, but that is not what we are doing. We are not replacing him, but the position can be filled if this experiment does not prove satisfactory. The hon. member for Yukon would object to abolishing the position, but this bill was submitted to him before he left, and it meets his views.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister's statement covers the whole field. I am glad to hear him say that it is not intended at this time to abolish the position of judge of the territorial court, although on the grounds of strict economy such a course might be justified. No part of the country likes to see its status reduced, and that would be the effect. The minister has in mind the appointment of one stipendiary magistrate to act in lieu of the judge of the territorial court, who is at present an official of the government. Is there any objection to telling us who this official will be, and what are his qualifications? I am thinking that he should be a man with legal training.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And of some standing in the community, because after all he is to administer justice. Will he have civil as well as criminal jurisdiction?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will he be clothed with the same jurisdiction as the judge of the territorial court?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): His status will be almost that of the territorial court judge, and he should be a man of experience and ability and possess judicial qualifications. He is to administer all justice, both civil and criminal, in a widely scattered territory and he should be fully qualified. If the minister does not care to indicate who he is, perhaps he would indicate his qualifications. It may not be desirable to name him on the floor of the house, but will the minister say that he is competent to exercise these functions?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not the slightest idea as to who may be appointed, but he will have to possess legal qualifications. We have two stipendiary magistrates to-day in the northwest territories who are doing work for the Department of Mines and Resources. Both these gentlemen are qualified lawyers. They were appointed upon the recommendation of the Minister of Justice—because, after all, they have to administer justice—but it was done with the concurrence of the Department of Mines and Resources. To some extent this appointee will be an officer of that department. I do not know whether the department has anyone in mind; as a matter of fact I have not discussed with my colleague any name. My hon. friend may be assured that he will be a qualified lawyer—not, of course, with high court standing; we could not find one with that qualification to serve for the salary attached to the office. I believe the intention is to pay a salary of about $4,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that extra or all told?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All told. He will have to live in the territory. His decisions will be subject to appeal to the appellate court of British Columbia, as were the decisions of Mr. Justice Macaulay.

Mr. CHURCH: As to this Yukon territory stipendiary magistrate, when the estimates of the Minister of Justice were being considered last spring reference was made to these judicial appointments, and the general principle applied in appointments. Recommendations have been made by the Canadian Bar Association in connection with the appointment of judges and other judicial officers—not in this case, but the principle is here. What are three separate justice departments in England are linked under the one minister here in Canada, all combined. I have received within the last few days two or three letters on this subject of law reform and our method of judicial appointments, and I urge upon the minister that he give consideration to the representations of the Canadian bar and other associations that more care be taken in making these appointments.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The remarks of my hon. friend would apply more to appointments to provincial courts. In this case the Canadian Bar Association would hardly be making the suggestions my hon. friend mentions. However, I shall be pleased to take his remarks into the fullest consideration.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 97, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of stipendiary magistrates.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is merely the language of the resolution authorizing the governor in council to appoint stipendiary magistrates. It is the language which is used in the Northwest Territories Act, and the form of oath is exactly the same as the form which is in that act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is an understanding that although authority is taken to appoint such number of persons as stipendiary magistrates as the governor in council may think fit, only one will be appointed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): One—and possibly temporarily.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $29,414,206 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1941; to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company or of any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways system and for the issue of substituted securities for such purposes; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for the purposes aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $29,414,206 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system; to authorize the company to pay supplementary contributions to certain railway employees' provident funds; and to authorize the making of further temporary loans to the said company for interim deficits, said loans to be reimbursed from the annual revenues.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the minister to make a general statement covering the necessity of this measure. I am aware that this is the usual resolution preceding the introduction of a bill. Certain portions of the resolution are obviously necessary, having regard to the operations of the railways, such as authorizing the company to make supplementary contributions to the employees' provident funds, the giving of temporary loans, and that sort of thing. But I should like the minister to give, for the purposes of the record, a break-down of the twenty-nine odd millions, and to explain why, with the revenues of the railway mounting beyond any previous levels—having regard, of course, to the great increase of traffic which is largely if not wholly due to the war—there is no indication on the part of the management that this year an operating surplus may be expected, which might be devoted to purposes other than, we will say, working capital. I am astonished that there is no suggestion of an operating profit this year. I am astonished, having regard to the growth of traffic, that last year we had to provide in the neighbourhood of $17,000,000. I am afraid that there is not the economy visible in the operation of the system that there ought to be. I am making no attack on the railway. I believe that the national railways are doing excellent work in connection with the country's war operations. In the eastern provinces, at all events, they are moving a very great amount of traffic. But the country is paying them at the approved rates for all this traffic, and they must be in receipt of very substantial sums of money from the war appropriation fund—millions in excess of what anybody knows about.

The railways are embarking on capital expenditures of a character which seem to me to be unnecessary at the moment. No great system of railways, indeed no business, can be carried on without annual capital expenditures. They cannot be static; they must go forward. But I wonder if the government has given consent to certain capital expenditures which have already been undertaken. I have in mind the installation of the electric control between Pacific Junction and Truro, which will cost at least one and a half million dollars and will probably run to two millions, involving also the expenditure of at least half a million dollars of United States exchange at a time when there is need to conserve our exchange position, and that in respect to a project which must be regarded as somewhat of an experiment in a cold climate such as that of Canada.

Frankly, when I heard about this I wrote to one of the vice-presidents and received in confidence from him a statement of the railway position. I am bound to say that he made what was to me a convincing statement of the utility of the proposal. But there is in this country a view that at this time the government should not permit the railway company to embark upon expenditures of this kind, which can be justified only because of the war. And how many crimes are committed in that name? When the war is over this expenditure will be useless, I am informed. I believe it operates with great advantage in the winter time in countries which have not the severe weather conditions that we have in Canada. The idea is of course to relieve congestion. It is an electrical mechanical device intended to supersede employment on the railway itself. I am convinced that the proposal has its merits, but I want to know what is the justification at this time for this capital expenditure, having regard to the fact that it constitutes a substantial charge on the foreign exchange control position and on the conservation of our exchange.

I would ask the minister to give the house a statement with regard to the Montreal terminal, which is not yet completed and which will cost about $30,000,000, a very considerable portion of which was expended in war time. In no sense can this work be justified as a war measure, and it involves millions in foreign exchange. I should like the minister to give the house information with respect to what is being done in connection with the redemption of equipment trust certificates. This is an old problem in connection with the national railways. There is in effect what is commonly called the Philadelphia plan, whereby railways acquire rolling stock on the basis of deferred payments. As a rule the railways make an initial payment. The equipment is mortgaged under trust agreement to a trustee, who issues securities and the money is payable in a term of years, or from year to year in serial form. It was looked upon with great favour by investors in days gone by, but as regards the Canadian National Railways, especially in the darker days when the earnings were not sufficient, these equipment trust payments, if my memory serves me rightly, were not made out of earnings at all but out of sums advanced by the government against which long-term securities were eventually issued, constituting in turn a dead-weight debt on the system, and covering in some instances a period expiring at a date beyond the lifetime of the equipment.

I should like to know how much of this $29,000,000 is in payment of equipment trust certificates issued and maturing, which the company is not able to take up out of operating expenses, which is the basis of the whole plan. I should be happy if the minister could assure me that none of this $29,000,000 is to be devoted to that purpose, though I know from past experience that substantial portions of capital authorizations have had to be so used because the railways did not have the moneys to retire these obligations. If the minister is able to assure the house and the country that in this connection the railway is taking care of its commitments and that no new securities will be issued against these payments, no long-term securities which the railway cannot absorb, it will be a matter of relief to all of us.

The particular point to which I desire to call the attention of the minister is the one I adverted to earlier in my remarks. Will he explain to the house why, with greatly increased traffic earnings, there is no budget before us looking to a credit balance in operations this year. It may be that my understanding is incorrect, but the country will expect that the system this year will take care of its operating expenses, interest on sinking fund charges and maturities falling due for equipment trust payments. But over and above that, with the revenues mounting, as I know they are, as we see in the press weekly, to heights hitherto unthought of or unheard of, I do not understand why there should not be a substantial credit balance to the treasury of the railway company, which in turn would be reflected in the operations of the Canadian treasury, to take care of some of the deficits of the past year or to reach such other destination as may be suggested. Or is it the theory of the railway company that it will not disclose to the house and country just what its actual expectations are, so that it may have in hand a substantial sum of money which it may use to embark on other enterprises, which parliament will not know anything about but of which of course, if they are capital, the ministry will know, and to which both the ministry and finally parliament will have to give consent on an ex post facto basis. That is what is happening. Expenditures are being incurred on capital account and all that parliament is called upon to do is to ratify what the management does.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I am not questioning the judgment of the management in most cases. Probably if left alone and freed from political interference the management would operate the road on a basis that would show returns, especially when the earning power is as high as it is to-day. But every once in a while some minister, like the Minister of Transport, steps into the picture and says, "You have to honour my election pledges." That is exactly what has happened in connection with the Montreal terminal. It is a shocking thing. I have said it on more than one occasion, and I repeat it here to-day: this country was called upon to pay an election debt of $30,000,000 because the Minister of Transport, then the Minister of Public Works, made an election pledge in a by-election in Montreal years before the war began. However desirable it was to clear up the railway situation existing in Montreal it is little less than criminal to keep on with the work when the country is spending at the rate of $5,000,000 a day on the war effort. We are being taxed to the limit to pay for this war, yet the country is asked to meet a $30,000,000 capital expenditure to fill up that hole in the ground in Montreal in order to redeem the word of the Minister of Transport, then the Minister of Public Works.

There are many other things that I could refer to, but generally speaking I want to know why it was that with all the traffic that accrued to the system, splendid increases during the last year, it went behind $17,000,000, and this year is budgeting for no profit on operations. It is incomprehensible to me. Every class one railroad on the north American continent is doing better. The United States has not yet entered the war but is approximating that position, and as a result there has been a great increase in railway traffic. Every railway in the United States is budgeting for increased earnings, in most cases sufficiently large to take them out of the red. I have in mind at the moment the New Haven system, which operates in New England. A very large portion of their revenue comes from passenger traffic, which has felt bus competition perhaps even in a greater degree than freight traffic has felt truck competition. Yet I saw the statement very recently that the New Haven is budgeting for a surplus on operations next year.

I am delighted to see that earnings are going up by leaps and bounds, because as long as that state of things continues it makes more remote the time when we shall be called upon again—if we ever are; I hope we never shall be—to pay operating deficits. But the minister and the management should explain why it was that we had to pay an operating deficit last year of $17,000,000, in addition as I understand—I am subject to correction—to arrangements for new capital expenditure; and why it is that they are budgeting for no profit this year. This information is due to the Canadian people and I would ask the minister to give us the fullest possible statement.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. leader of the opposition should not forget that a considerable amount of money has been already spent on the terminal station at Montreal. The plan was made a long time ago, but on account of the depression the work was suspended for some time. The money that has been spent is an investment and an asset, but it is a dead asset so long as the work is not completed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have the defence come from the minister, not the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: But as a member from the province of Quebec I can say a few words before the minister answers. I am not answering in place of the minister. As a member from the province of Quebec I am answering complaints made by the leader of the opposition about expenditures made in the province of Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not complaining because the expenditure is made in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Témiscouata must not try to represent me as an enemy of Quebec or of the national system. I object to that. It is not the basis of my remarks, although I have no doubt that will be the basis of his remarks in the province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say that, and the leader of the opposition, like any other hon. member, should obey the rules. I have the floor. I did not utter the words that the leader of the opposition has imputed to me, and it is just as bad to put words in the mouth of a member who has not uttered them as to impute motives. Besides, although the hon. member for York-Sunbury is the leader of the opposition, he has no more rights than the member for Témiscouata or the member for any other constituency. Therefore when I have the floor I object strongly to the leader of the opposition rising as he did, unless he rises to a question of privilege or asks permission to interrupt me. I give him that little lesson in parliamentary practice; it may be useful to him. I do not want to be interrupted by him any more, and I do not want him to put words in my mouth that I have not uttered. He is a little older than I am and it is time he read the rules. He has enough experience to be able to understand them.

That being said, I never stated that the leader of the opposition was an enemy of the province of Quebec. What I said was that it is because this money is being spent in Montreal that there is so much criticism.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No—because it is war time.

Mr. POULIOT: No; it was undertaken before the war, and it is important to complete it now. When my hon. friend comes from his beautiful country into the city of Montreal he does not come into a station, he comes into a shed. The most shameful so-called station in Canada is that of the Canadian National Railways in Montreal. Every hon. member who has visited the metropolis of Canada knows that. It is filthy, it is abominable, it is a bad advertisement for Canada. I believe that the government was very wise not to spend at once the whole amount required for the construction of that station. It was done gradually as conditions permitted. But it was rightly done, and now there is a small amount, something like $2,000,000, required to complete it and make the dead asset a live asset. Surely that is worth doing. It is very good business. My hon. friend must remember that at the time Mr. Bennett was in power—I do not know whether he was then a minister, but at any rate he was a member supporting that government—the big sign that faces up Windsor street in Montreal beside the Bonaventure station, the sign that is seen from the Windsor hotel, was not lighted for months and months, and it was only as a result of protests of Liberal members that it was lighted again. It was the Canadian Pacific Railway company that asked the government not to light it, because it was too good an advertisement for the national railways. That is the kind of petty thing that was done by the Bennett government for the Canadian Pacific railway and against the Canadian National railways.

Where does this protest come from? It comes from the Canadian Pacific railway. Either knowingly or not the hon. gentleman is arguing the case of the C.P.R. against the C.N.R. when he complains about the construction of the new terminal in Montreal. Montreal is a growing city. Montreal is much larger now than it was when the terminal was started, and the hon. gentleman has travelled enough to see that in many places the big railways have stations that are rather close together. But I would ask the hon. gentleman another question. Let him speak about the closing of the Canadian National station in his own beautiful city of Fredericton. After I am through I should like him to give some explanation about that. Fredericton is not as large as Montreal, but it is the capital city of the great province of New Brunswick and I do not understand why the Canadian National station there should be closed. When was it closed? And was it not the hon. gentleman himself who asked to have the Canadian National station closed at Fredericton?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman does me too much honour.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a moment; my hon. friend will have an opportunity to speak when I am through. One spring there was so much ice in the river that the bridge at Fredericton was carried away; and it was due to the persistent effort and very excellent work of the hon. gentleman's illustrious predecessor, Hon. W. G. Clark, now lieutenant governor of New Brunswick and then one of my best aides on the civil service committee, that the bridge was rebuilt. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not say that was a useless expenditure; I am sure he will not make any joking references to war-time expenditures in reference to the Fredericton bridge. But I wonder if it would have been rebuilt if the Bennett government had been in power, and the hon. gentleman had been a member of that government. I know the trouble that was experienced by the great lieutenant governor of the great province of New Brunswick in having that bridge constructed; he did very excellent work, and he was successful. We did not complain about it; we realized that it was necessary and in the public interest.

The hon. gentleman is so much concerned about the importance of his functions that he does not like an ordinary hon. member to speak to him; he wants to be answered only by a minister of the crown. A privy councillor can be answered only by a minister, he believes; a back bencher, or a member of the rank and file, has not the right to answer the hon. gentleman. Well, I am not impressed by high hats. When I was a child I was told that a cat might look at a queen. I am not a cat; the hon. gentleman is not a queen; all comparisons are odious, but everyone will understand what I mean. I want the hon. gentleman to be just as generous to Montreal as Quebec members have been to Fredericton and Toronto, the holy city. We do not complain about anything when it is useful and necessary. Let us not be narrow; let us not be pettifogging; let us not be hair-splitters, and in our humble spheres let us all try to be builders of Canada.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. CARDIN: The first criticism offered by the leader of the opposition had to do with the absence of a prospective surplus in the finances of the Canadian National for the year 1941. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is asking a little too much. The situation of the Canadian National is most encouraging, however, from the financial point of view; and if there is no indication of a surplus in dollars and cents for 1941 at least we have the pleasure of observing that this year parliament is not called upon to provide for any deficit, as we have had to do in the years gone by. The position of the railway this year is going to be better by at least sixteen or seventeen million dollars, and it is because the revenues of the Canadian National have increased that we are able to avoid the necessity of coming to parliament to make up the annual deficit.

My hon. friend made one observation which I am quite sure did not come from his heart. He indicated, or rather insinuated, that the present directors of the Canadian National were not as free in their deliberations and the exercise of their judgment as they have been in the past. I can assure my hon. friend that nothing has been done to interfere with the free disposition of Canadian National affairs by the Canadian National board of directors. I have not interfered in any manner with the exercise of their judgment; I have not pressed my views upon them contrary to their will or against the public interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about your predecessor?

Mr. CARDIN: I imagine I could say the same thing about my predecessors, but I would not like to go into that field because I might be inclined to say things as to which I have some information but about which I am not perfectly sure. At all events let me reassure my hon. friend that the board of directors is as free now as it has ever been since the inception of the Canadian National system.

The hon. gentleman referred to two capital expenditures which apparently he does not like. The first was the expenditure to be made in the establishment of a central traffic control between Pacific Junction and Truro.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say I did not like it; I questioned the advisability of that expenditure in war time, and wondered whether the system would be efficacious in our climate.

Mr. CARDIN: This recommendation came directly from the management of the Canadian National.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt about that.

Mr. CARDIN: The expenditure is being made on the basis of a strong recommendation coming from the technical officers of the Canadian National. I had no knowledge, and the government had no knowledge, of this matter before it was suggested to us in a report made by the officials of the railway, and the reason for it is the increase in traffic which has developed, more particularly since the beginning of the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I accept that without reservation.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend knows the situation exactly in that locality. The directors of the Canadian National admit that they might be able to handle the situation that exists at present in that section of the line; but with the traffic continually increasing, and having in mind representations of the Department of Munitions and Supply and other war organizations that during 1941 and 1942 the railway will have to look after much more traffic, they are afraid that a bottle-neck may develop in that section, which is mainly a single track service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And a one way service.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; and it is the opinion of the technical men and officials of the company that otherwise it would be impossible properly and satisfactorily to handle a much heavier traffic over that line.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister say whether at any time, because of congestion in the winter season, which I admit, the transportation of goods for overseas has been delayed? In other words will he say that a single ship has been forced to stay at an eastern Canadian port for lack of cargo?

Mr. CARDIN: No, I cannot say that; my hon. friend is quite correct. Up to the present time the railway facilities have been adequate to meet the situation, and as a matter of fact the Canadian National has taken more traffic to Halifax than the port has been capable of handling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is true.

Mr. CARDIN: But the port facilities of Halifax are being developed, and that development will increase tremendously during 1941. A proposal has been advanced to use a certain number of lighters, on which the freight will be transferred from the railroad cars to the ships in the port.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are going to adopt a lighterage system?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, and the facilities at the port of Halifax are to be substantially developed. According to information we get from the officials of the Canadian National Railways there is not only the possibility but the probability that with the present railway facilities between Pacific Junction and Truro we would not be able to handle the traffic.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the alternative be a double track?

Mr. CARDIN: That would be more expensive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I believe so.

Mr. CARDIN: In all sincerity I can assure my hon. friend that the directors and technical men of the Canadian National Railways were in no shape or form influenced by the minister or by the government in proposing such an expenditure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am prepared to accept that.

Mr. CARDIN: They thought it was in the best interests of the Canadian National Railways, and believed it to be absolutely necessary in order to avoid the creation of what is known as a bottle-neck in that section of our line.

I come now to another point with which my name has been often associated. On many occasions in different parts of the country and in the House of Commons it has been suggested that I forced the hand of the Canadian National Railways toward the completion of the Montreal terminal. That is not the situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is a crude way of putting it.

Mr. CARDIN: What I said in Montreal, and what I advocated not only on one but on several occasions, was only the adoption of a proposal which had come from the railway itself. The completion of the Montreal terminal is not being imposed upon the Canadian National Railways by the present minister or the government, either now or at any time. I advocated the completion of the terminal because the technical advisers and officials of the railway had expressed the view that it was desirable and in its interest that it be completed. One has but to remember what the situation was, in order to realize the truth of that suggestion. Many people have a misconception of the whole situation. The terminal project was originated as far back as 1929, when the revenues of the railways were increasing substantially. Work was abandoned in 1931 or 1932, when we reached the depression years. But when the question was revived in 1939 the Canadian people had already invested in that terminal nearly $17,000,000. It was lying as a dead asset; it was bringing in no revenue, giving no facilities to the railway, in a word remaining in the same position as that in which it has stood for a long time.

It was decided in 1939 to proceed further with the work. I might add in passing that I had no responsibility with respect to railways at that time. The scheme was one which first of all involved an exenditure of $53,000,000 or $55,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A grandiloquent scheme.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. It was reexamined in 1939, and it was then established that with an additional expenditure of about $12,000,000 the work would be completed and facilities made available. It was thought at that time it would be in the interests of the Canadian National Railways to take advantage of the large expenditure which had been made up to that date, but which was then lying dormant, and to proceed with the work. The question has been before the committee on railways and shipping. It has been approved by a majority of the representatives of the people of Canada. It has been discussed and examined in all its aspects by members of the committee, and has been discussed openly in parliament.

When I spoke in Montreal—and I am not ashamed of what I said; I do not wish to retract one word—I only expressed the desire and indicated my determination to see that a project which had been proposed by the railway itself should be carried out. Any man who has knowledge of the city of Montreal, and of the facilities in that city at the disposal of the Canadian National Railways, will not hesitate to admit that something must be done at that point, if the Canadian National railway system is to expect to obtain its fair share of the traffic in freight and passengers. It is entitled to that traffic.

Any citizen of Canada, whether he lives in Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver, can be proud of and satisfied with work which will do away with that rat-nest which is called Bonaventure station in Montreal, and no people, except citizens of Montreal, would have tolerated such a condition so long.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And a war on! We are always being told there is a war on.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: They are the only people in Canada who have been tolerating a situation such as the one which has existed in Montreal since 1929. In 1939, $17,000,000 had already been expended, and to make the terminal useful there was involved the matter of adding $12,000,000 in order to complete the project and to make it a useful and profitable undertaking for the railway.

People are arguing as though the government were spending $30,000,000 this year on the Montreal terminal. We see articles in the newspapers and listen to speeches in which the question is asked: "What is the use of spending $30,000,000 to provide a terminal in Montreal?" That is not the situation at all. Those who speak that way simply desire to prejudice public opinion outside this house against the interests of the Canadian National Railways. I have explained that $17,000,000 had been spent before the work was stopped in 1931. Since 1939, when the project was revived, there will have been spent—including this year's expenditures—the sum of $12,000,000, to revive that project and to turn it into a reasonable and profitable undertaking for the railway.

This matter involves not only the building of a station. The Montreal terminal project covers the relaying of tracks and the opening of the coach yard at Point St. Charles, the unifying of five Canadian National railway stations, and does away with twenty level crossings in St. Henri, a very active centre of Montreal. What has been done? Up to the present we have disposed of eleven of those level crossings, which had been responsible for the deaths of many people and had caused enormous delays in the handling of freight and passenger trains, to the detriment of the Canadian National Railways.

If the project is completed, the remaining nine of the twenty level street crossings will be relieved to a large extent, because passenger traffic will be taken off them. Only the freight traffic to be handled at the Bonaventure and Turcot terminals will remain. When the new station is established the passenger, mail and express traffic will pass through the new station, and the Bonaventure and Turcot areas will be used only for the transportation of freight. This will give freight handling facilities to the railway covering an area of 21,000 square feet of space at present occupied by express and mail services in Bonaventure station. Instead of moving passenger coaches several miles from Bonaventure station to Turcot station, they will be moved to the new coach yard which has been established at Point St. Charles.

Many people seem to have a misconception of the situation and express exaggerated views. Their minds have been affected to a certain extent by propaganda which has been put out, not in this house, against the Canadian National Railways and in favour of its competitor. I am not afraid to mention it; that is the situation. As a member of the government, as one having something to do with the Canadian National Railways, as a citizen of Canada, I want to give this organization of the people a fair opportunity of competing with its principal competitor and others in the handling of freight and passengers. It is of no use to complain that the Canadian National Railways is not doing this or that, is not up to standard. Let us give to the Canadian National Railways the necessary facilities to fight their own battles—as Mr. Churchill has said "give them the tools"— and they will be in position to show better results than they have shown in the past. Probably in the course of a year or two they will be able to show what my hon. friends have been asking for, a surplus, which will help to reduce the indebtedness of the country in regard to this great undertaking.

I have no desire to hurt the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have the greatest respect and consideration for that company, and have always admired the men who have directed its affairs. At all times I have been proud as a Canadian of the developments which have resulted from the establishment of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But conditions have been such that the Canadian people now own a railway system which has been acquired with their own money. It is only right that we should give it a fair deal and provide it with all the reasonable facilities it requires for the proper handling of freight and passengers and the betterment of its position.

Without wanting to be unfair or to hurt the feelings of anyone, which is not my practice, I must say I was surprised at the attitude taken by certain hon. gentlemen in regard to the Canadian National Railways. To a large extent the Canadian National Railways is the baby of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was in 1917, under the war measures act of that day and under closure, that the Canadian Northern Railway became the property of the Canadian people. A price of $10,000,000 was paid for the shares of a railway which was in such financial condition that it had to be purchased in order to preserve the service. It was during a war that that expenditure was made, and I think I have some reason for saying that to a certain extent it is the child of most of those who criticize the Canadian National Railways to-day. Apparently they are blaming us because we are not ready to strangle their own baby, because we want to provide for its growing up, because we want it to be able to take a proper place in the affairs of the country. That is the situation. The Liberal party is not responsible for it. We accepted the gift when we came into power in 1921; we undertook the task. I can recall the speeches that were delivered then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not remember the attitude taken by the then member for La Prairie-Napierville, who sat about where the minister now sits, and who said that he was going to give it away for a dollar?

Mr. CARDIN: I remember that. I remember quite well when the question was raised in the House of Commons in 1917. I was in the house at the time and I remember the bitter discussion that took place between the present leader of the Conservative party in the other house, and the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett. Those two gentlemen were not in agreement. In those days Mr. Meighen was advocating the purchase of the Canadian Northern and was using all the powers of his keen intellect to convince parliament that that should be done. He even went to Montreal in order to convince St. James street that it would be a good deal to buy the Canadian Northern. He was very effective in his argument and it was a pleasure to listen to him state his case. As a back bencher I was very much interested. But he got a strong reply from Mr. Bennett, who was full of enthusiasm in those days, as he always has been. He disagreed bitterly with Mr. Meighen. Many people in Montreal and in other sections of the country did not like the decision of the so-called union government in 1917 to acquire that railway, but they accepted it. Since that time the critics have never stopped trying to interfere—I repeat, not in this house—with the free and natural development of the Canadian National Railways. They have the same interests in mind that they had when they opposed the acquisition of the Canadian Northern.

The situation is not new. The arguments which are advanced to-day, are exactly the same as those that were advanced in those days. The same arguments have always been advanced at any time that the Canadian National Railways proposed something in the way of capital expenditure in order to better its position. It is the same position, the same thing. But now they add a new element—the war. We are all ready to admit that during the war we must dispense with certain expenditures. But that policy should not be carried to the point of strangling our own organization and preventing it from doing business in a proper manner and developing its capacities.

I might mention to my hon. friend the lighterage system which it is proposed to establish in the port of Halifax. After the war this will have to be handed over to the salvage officer to be disposed of for a few dollars. But it means an expenditure of from three to four million dollars now. This expenditure must be made in order to accommodate the traffic through that port. It is an expenditure that will be gone forever, but it is considered necessary in order to expedite the flow of food, munitions, machinery, tools and other fabricated materials. The Canadian National Railways are doing the same thing. This new development will help them to handle, not only their ordinary business but their war business as well, which at present is a heavy task. One has only to listen to what is said by the officers of the Canadian National Railways, or read the reports of the company, to become convinced that from the point of view of the war, this is most important. For $2,000,000 we will be able to bring into full usefulness an undertaking which has already cost the country $27,000,000. Would it be a proper attitude for even a business man to take to say, "We have $27,000,000 frozen there; it will take only $2,000,000 to make it a live asset, but we will not spend that because of the war?" That kind of argument is not in favour of the war; it is against the war, and I do not hesitate to make that statement. These facilities will be useful for both war and peace purposes.

I ask my hon. friends to pardon the little heat in my observations. Those who have known me for some time realize that it is difficult for me to argue in the tone used by some people without heating up a little. In order to do that I would have to change my temperament and nature, and it is too late now at my age to do that. I have had no intention of hurting the feelings of anyone; I simply wanted to give the situation as I understood it. I hope there will be no resentment with respect to the observations I have made.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: This afternoon at one o'clock I was going to make a few remarks, following the minister. I listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion this morning. When the promise that the station was to be completed in Montreal, was made during a by-election, I felt that a great disservice had been performed to the national railways. Having said that, I am not criticizing the completion of this project, because I believe the Canadian National Railways need a terminal which is a credit to the system. Several years ago when I was travelling west by train a gentleman from the United States was sitting beside me, and in the course of the discussion I asked him if he had ever travelled across Canada on the Canadian National railway. He said, "No; my impression is that it is a rather dilapidated institution." I said, "How did you get that impression?" "Well," he said, "I have seen its station in Montreal, and I thought the railway looked like a small affair,"—on account of the station at Montreal. As a matter of fact, of course, we know that the Canadian National railway operates, at least in its transcontinental service, as fine and as comfortable and as efficient a train with as good a service as can be found anywhere in north America. I believe therefore that the completion of the terminal at Montreal is justifiable from that point of view. Unfortunately, as I have said, the announcement of the construction was injected into a by-election, with the result that many people across Canada think that the government is fulfilling a pre by-election promise. It is unfortunate that that impression should be abroad.

With regard to the resolution now before us, expenditures upon the national railway have to be made in order to provide us with the efficient transportation service which we require. I am always suspicious when the national railway is under attack, because there are people in this country who would like to see the system taken out of public hands and returned to private control. But when we look over the record we find that the competing railway, efficient and privately-owned, has probably received, taking into consideration the times in which we live, greater, or as great financial assistance as the national railway has ever received.

The Drayton-Acworth commission's report in 1917 gave some figures which, I suggest, we might well look at occasionally. It will be found that to June 30, 1916, public subsidies to private railways amounted to $163,000,000; the proceeds of land granted, $158,000,000; loans, which were never repaid, $118,000,000; guarantees of securities, over $268,000,000, and the land grants exceeded 14,700,000 acres. If we examine the record of grants to the private railway with which comparisons are so often made, we find that gifts to the Canadian Pacific Railway alone amounted to $228,500,000, plus 11,482,132 acres of land valued by the company itself at over $119,000,000. Our national railway system, or those who organized it after the various bankrupt institutions were taken over by the crown, have really done a remarkable job in welding it into a strong and efficient railway system. I am not going into the history of railway building this afternoon, but it will be recalled that when the government was constructing the transcontinental railway—the Grand Trunk Pacific linked up with the section built by the government across northern Quebec and northern Ontario—the same government at the same time was guaranteeing the bonds of a third transcontinental railway which was being promoted by Mackenzie and Mann.

If one looks back at the building up of the railway, nationally owned—or rather nationally controlled, for that is the more appropriate term, since we are really operating the railway not so much for the benefit of the people of Canada as for the interests that were on the verge of bankruptcy in 1917 and 1918—I believe that the charges which are sometimes made of extravagance—and we have an inference of extravagance at the present time—may be regarded from the point of view that, if we compare the history of the two railroads, both have been guilty of certain extravagances, and that the one has no right to cast a stone at the other.

I was looking up some figures at noon to-day, and I found, for example, that between 1923 and 1931 over $450,000,000 of capital were expended on reconditioning the run-down railways which now comprise the Canadian National railway system. In the same period of time the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was in much better shape and had far less mileage, spent $253,000,000 for the same purpose. It was a period of reconditioning and rehabilitation of railways following the great war.

I have often heard criticisms of the Canadian National system on the ground of extravagance in the building of hotels. But again let us consider the comparative expenditures. The Canadian Pacific Railway, starting with $25,000,000 invested in hotel buildings, increased the investment to $48,000,000, an addition of $23,000,000. In a similar period of time the Canadian National Railways increased their expenditures on hotels from $10,000,000 to $22,000,000, an addition of $12,000,000. Let us keep this picture clearly before us.

There are still those to-day who advocate the amalgamation of the two railway systems. I have always opposed amalgamation because I believe that the propaganda in its favour has been put out by private interests who seek the control of our transportation systems. I believe that the national road should be retained as a national asset, and that it is our responsibility to parliament to keep it out of politics in every particular. That is why I stated at the outset that in my opinion it was unfortunate and was a grave error to inject into a by-election the building of the terminal in Montreal. It may have elected an hon. gentleman; nevertheless it has caused a great deal of criticism all across Canada. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could have been elected without that promise. I do not know.

I support the bill in so far as it will further assist our railway system to meet the needs of the time; and in the expenditure of this money to make the railway more efficient I hope the government will take into consideration the promotion in every way of the business welfare of our own government road. I have no animosity towards the privately-owned road. It has rendered a great service to the country, but it has been very well paid for that service, and I trust that our national system will continue to render a still more excellent service than it has given in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I first of all extend my personal congratulations to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) on the vigorous manner in which he defended himself this morning. Time has not withered his intellect, whatever it may have done to his physique, and it was a pleasure to me to see him exhibit once more across the floor of this house some of that old fire which animated him in days gone by. I can safely say that as between us as individuals there has never been anything but the very best feeling, and if I made an attack upon him for the election promise he gave in the city of Montreal prior to the resuscitation of this Montreal terminal question, he will understand that I was attacking him as a politician and not as an individual.

In the course of his remarks the minister referred to the birth of the national system. What he said in that regard was true. The system was set up by a former Conservative government on the theory, and because of the fact, that private interests had failed and that this country was at war, and that these railways could not or should not be allowed to go into the hands of a receivership at a time when the country's credit was being strained to its utmost to sustain a national war effort. That may have been a mistake; I do not know. I do not think I am in a position to judge, or that anyone is in a position to judge. At all events, that was the consensus at that time, and whether history has borne out the wisdom of that judgment I leave to hon. members to decide for themselves.

I do recall, however, having read with a good deal of intellectual pleasure the attacks that were made from across the floor of this house, from this place, upon the proposals then brought before parliament. If anyone wants interesting reading, I suggest that he read the speeches of D. D. McKenzie, house leader of the Liberal party when that legislation was brought into parliament. If he wants to come down to more modern times, let him read the speeches of the late Walter Mitchell in this house, delivered from that side of the house after the change of government in 1921. Let the reader see what he thought of the national railway system, and then reflect that later on the Liberal party sought to take into its bosom this orphan child which they would have condemned to death at the time of its birth.

We had better view this matter realistically. We have the national system and I think that as long as conditions are as they are to-day we shall have it. I do not want anyone to say that I am an enemy of the national system. I never have been. Personally I have consistently opposed the physical amalgamation of the two railroads. I am wondering, though, what will happen after the war. Some government may have to deal with a problem which was acute during the depression years. That is something we shall have to anticipate, and that is one reason why I want the management of the national railways at the present time to prepare for the rainy day that is bound to come, and if there is any possibility of doing so to set aside a reserve against the time which I think will come. Do not let anyone say that I have ever attacked the national system in this house. I have never had any professional connection with any railway except the national system. For ten years I acted as counsel for the system in the province of New Brunswick, between 1910 and 1921, and the former chief counsel of the railway did me the honour to say that I had won more lawsuits for the government railway system than any other counsel in any given period. I was proud of my connection with the national railways.

Mr. MARTIN: They should have been proud of you.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, they paid me and I think they discharged fully their obligations to me as I endeavoured to discharge my obligations to them. My remarks with respect to the management in connection with the Montreal terminals are based upon this theory. I know that a grandiloquent scheme was started by Sir Henry Thornton, estimated to cost $60,000,000, and having regard to the expenditures that were made at that time it would probably have run into far more money than that. The undertaking was stopped, of necessity, during the depression. I know the site was an eyesore in Montreal—that "ditch" as it has been called. There were operating difficulties, but they were operating difficulties which the railway encountered and overcame for a period of more than ten years.

It was always visualized, I believe, that either the scheme itself or something analogous to it would some day be completed. It is too bad that a start was made as a result of a political promise. The minister denies that. Shall I put it this way, that the management had an intelligent anticipation of the minister's wishes. That is the most charitable view.

Mr. CARDIN: It is a great compliment the hon. member is paying me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am complimentary to the minister. I have always been complimentary to him. He is of a mental and intellectual stature that commands my admiration. I dare say he is the most astute politician that ever came out of the province of Quebec. That remark is not uncomplimentary, and is not intended to be.

The resumption of this undertaking when the war broke out was astonishing. What was the government's policy with respect to all other public works? It clamped down on everything, in the interest of conservation of resources for the war effort. But this undertaking was not touched. That is what I am complaining of, and that alone. I could take hon. members down to the little city of Fredericton where an agricultural laboratory was being built. Some $7,000 was required to complete it, but the work was stopped, and unless great care has been taken the building must have greatly deteriorated. I understand arrangements were ultimately made to cover it in and save the structure. But no one has criticized that government policy. That was a proper course to pursue and is the course which ought to have been pursued in connection with the Montreal terminal. But they went on spending the money and are spending it now. Of course it would be silly to stop it at this stage and I am not suggesting that. What I was suggesting is that it could well have waited.

The hon. member for Témiscouata did me too much honour in suggesting that I was the instigator or father of the idea of union terminals in Fredericton. What was the position there? Both railways enter that city; each had separate freight facilities and separate passenger facilities. The freight facilities of the national railway were incomparably better than those of the Canadian Pacific, and adjoined the Canadian Pacific tracks and yards. The Canadian Pacific Railway had a much better located passenger station. The officials themselves, in order to cut down expenditure during the war, met and agreed to combine the facilities. The arrangement was consummated before the public knew anything about it. The passenger facilities of the Canadian Pacific and the freight facilities of the Canadian National were to be used. It was a common sense arrangement, and has worked out well and to the satisfaction of the community, although the saving has perhaps not been as much as was hoped or anticipated. That is the sort of arrangement that should take place in a good many places in this country, with consequent elimination of duplicate services. All this question of amalgamation, or whatever you would call it, has receded into the background. No one hears anything more about it. Circumstances alter cases, and the question is not a live one to-day.

Coming back to the resolution, those of us who are not members of the standing committee on railways and shipping should have from the minister some definite information as to what really underlies this resolution. As I said this morning, a big railway system of necessity must have capital expenditures every year. It could not be otherwise. A portion of these capital expenditures is for refunding operations. These happen every year. But the membership of the house should be informed as to every aspect of the proposal underlying this resolution. And I am asking for information with respect to the refunding of equipment trust certificates.

Mr. CARDIN: In the absence of the Minister of Finance I can give to my hon. friend at least a part of the information he seeks. But before doing so I cannot help expressing my thanks for his kind words in regard to myself and the little I have been able to achieve in my political life. I hope hon. members will understand that I am not as bad as he pictured me by overwhelming me with all kinds of compliments in regard to my political sagacity.

The amount of $29,414,206 which is required by the Canadian National railways for the year 1941 compares with an amount of $21,000,000 in 1940 and somewhat similar amounts which have been provided by parliament as far back as my recollection goes, up to 1937.

The first item is additions and betterments. This represents a proposed expenditure of $15,691,257. The second is new equipment purchases, $13,270,206. The new equipment which is required by the railway is requested mainly on representations made by the Department of Munitions and Supply and the war departments, which state that the traffic that will have to be moved during 1941 will exceed by a very large amount the traffic moved by the railway during 1940. As a result of examination of the requirements for munitions and war materials it has been represented to the railway that the amount of freight they will be expected to move during 1942 will exceed by far that which is expected for the year 1941. Basing their estimates on these representations, made to them by those who are supposed to know, as to the volume of freight that the railway will be called upon to move, it was decided by the management that they should provide additional cars and locomotives required for the movement of that additional traffic.

Next is the acquisition of securities, amounting to $340,000. I can give the details of those securities. They are: Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad Company, Toronto Terminals Railway Company, Northern Alberta Railways Company, Chicago and Western Indiana Railroad Company; total $340,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these annual accruals, or are they buying these securities in?

Mr. CARDIN: No, they are annual. We provide also for maturing capital obligations, sinking fund and equipment payments. The amount of that item in round figures is $9,378,000. If my hon. friend desires I can give a list of the maturing capital obligations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the $9,378,000?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have that here. Just on that point, if the minister will refer to page 5 of the Canadian National budget for 1941 he will see the heading, "Retirement of maturing capital obligations, sinking fund and equipment principal payments". Then follows a tabulated statement of the different issues, beginning with April 16 and running down to December 31. I see an issue dated May 1, of Canadian National four and a half per cent equipment trust certificates amounting to $1,000,000. Is this particular issue a serial maturity falling due May 1, 1941, issued to buy equipment in days gone by, which ordinarily, under railway practice, should be paid out of earnings? I am just taking that as one illustration.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think I could do better than read from the evidence of Mr. Cooper, comptroller of the Canadian National, as it appears at page 96 of volume 2 of the minutes of proceedings of the railways and shipping committee:

This, of course, is purely a financial transaction. We are paying off funded debt, and repayment of funded debt has no effect on the income statement as such. It is simply a reduction of the funded debt liability account. If it is in your mind, for instance, that these annual instalments represent an annual charge to the operations for the wearing out of the equipment against which they were issued, then I think your idea is wrong. The charge to operations with respect to the wearing out of the equipment itself is taken care of by the charge for depreciation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position of the charge for depreciation on all the rolling stock?

Mr. CARDIN: The estimated depreciation reserve increase for 1941 is $9,269,257, of which only $2,069,257 is going to be required for what is called physical retirement of stock. The balance of $7,200,000 is to be used for capital expenditure; and the bill which will be presented after the resolution is adopted will provide for the utilization of that balance of $7,200,000. I am told that it was agreed in 1940 that no sinking fund should be kept by the railway, that they should not invest the amount of money they might put aside in the depreciation account; but that if they required it they would have that fund for capital expenditures. The money would be there; it would be money or material acquired or purchased.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said the reason for the large amount requested for capital expenditure was the need for new equipment. I direct his attention to page 3 of the railway budget, where I find this item: "New equipment purchases: Canadian National Railways: Freight cars, 125 ore cars." Is that a war requirement? "100 overhead refrigerator cars." Is that a war requirement? "250 70-ton triple hopper cars." Is that a war requirement? "200 52-foot flat cars." I would assume that to be a war requirement. Then there are to be purchased 25 air-conditional first-class coaches; 7 steel mail and baggage cars, and 8 second hand coaches. Are these coaches being bought in the United States?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only item covering new locomotives is for the Grand Trunk Western, who are buying 25 locomotives and a very substantial number of freight cars including 200 50-foot auto cars. I hardly think the budget bears out the minister's explanation with regard to war requirements.

Mr. CARDIN: I was not expressing myself very clearly if hon. members understood me to say that all this was justified only in connection with war purposes. I am told by the technical officers of the Canadian National that they are short of equipment for the ordinary work of the railway as well as for war purposes. They are short of passenger coaches, for example, even now; they are also short of those types of freight cars to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. If we want to cope with the present situation in regard to ordinary traffic, and also in regard to war traffic, we must have this equipment not only in Canada but in the United States. If the war had not occurred we would not require as much equipment, but these purchases are necessary partly for ordinary purposes and partly for war purposes.

My hon. friend mentioned the locomotives. We are providing for the transfer to Canada of twenty-five locomotives which are not entirely suitable to meet the necessities of the service on the lines in the United States but which will be quite sufficient to meet the necessities of the service in Canada. Therefore we are proposing to have twenty-five additional locomotives built in the United States for service in that country. We propose to do this under an equipment trust by paying a certain amount of cash, as my hon. friend mentioned in his opening remarks this morning, and the balance in instalments. We are not building twenty-five locomotives in Canada. We could not, in war circumstances, readily build them here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That position is unquestionable. I agree that the railway must have new rolling stock.

Mr. CARDIN: Exactly. But I do not want to be taken too literally when I say this is required exclusively for war purposes. I may have gone a little too far in what I said previously in that regard, but the main expenditure is to cover the necessities of the war.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): My first observation is that I do not feel disposed to join in the mutual admiration society which occupied so much time this morning. I hope the minister will understand that, and accept what I now say in the spirit in which it is offered.

For the last decade, ever since we first set up the committee on railways and shipping, time after time we have asked the management of the Canadian National Railways to set their accounts in the same order as obtains in respect of class one railways in the United States. It has been suggested that they set up the depreciation necessary to take care of wear and tear, so that we might have at least some comparative statement when we were considering the statement presented by the management of the railways, and that which is placed before our committee.

At long last we have a recommendation in the report before us. The resolution states:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $29,414,206 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1941.

When one considers the first sentence in the resolution he must remember that when the report of the committee on railways and shipping passes the house the auditors will have mandatory powers to set up a depreciation account, in accordance with the rules of the interstate commerce commission, which governs class one railways in the United States. The amount of depreciation mentioned at one point is $11,307,000. I am of the opinion it will be a good deal more than that. That will immediately find its way into the liquid position of the railways. As I gathered from the minister's remarks, it can be used for capital expenditures, and it is possible that it should be used in that way. Nevertheless, it must be earned, and if, as the minister intimated, it is not going to be invested, and will go into capital expenditures, then I have no complaint. But if it is set up on the balance sheet as being earned, and then invested, I say to the Canadian National Railways: "Do not come back to the house next year and ask us to discharge the entire deficit, a portion of which would be accumulated from the mandatory powers asked for by the auditors in setting up depreciation reserve."

Further on in the resolution we find these words: "To authorize the making of further temporary loans to the said company for interim deficits." If this depreciation practice is proceeded with during 1941 there should be no necessity of further temporary loans to the company to take care of interim deficits, or for loans to be reimbursed from the annual revenues; use the depreciation reserves. That is all I have in my mind with regard to that part of the resolution.

Let us consider the very necessary additions to rolling stock, a condition which has been brought about by the war. Page 6 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways sets out what is required to meet anticipated war requirements. Then it adds that the following equipment was acquired: 5 mail express cars, 4 coaches, 25 baggage cars, 60 refrigerator cars, 150 ballast cars, 15 cabooses and 21 work units. Evidently that is just for the ordinary use of the system throughout Canada, and is not necessarily related to war requirements.

I have in mind a constructive suggestion, and I am wondering if the idea I shall place before the committee has been explored. It would seem that the increased service which the Canadian National Railways have had to give because of war requirements cannot be chargeable entirely to Canadian account. A good deal of the extra traffic which to-day is carried on the Canadian National Railways arises from United Kingdom purchases in the United States. Purchases made in the mid-western states pass through Chicago and then through Canada to seaboard, and are carried in equipment of the Canadian National Railways. When our railways are transporting United Kingdom purchases in the United States they collect their toll, and thereby their revenue position is improved. Have we explored the possibility of charging to the Hyde Park agreement or to the lease-lend bill the cost of the extra equipment required to perform that service for the United Kingdom? If they were so charged could we avoid the necessity of making these further purchases of equipment, or of having our friends in the United States lend such equipment to us?

I have in mind the fact that taken as a whole our equipment is in good condition. With the cessation of hostilities the extra business we are now enjoying will disappear, and we shall have on hand a tremendous amount of equipment. That will have to be paid for, and it is possible that at the close of hostilities we may not be in too good a position to make payment of our maturities.

May I make one or two observations respecting attempts made in this chamber to get some conception of what is involved in the publicly-owned railway, and what was in the minds of some of us respecting the railway itself. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said he believed there were some who would still like to see this property revert to private ownership. When he made that statement someone in this corner interjected, "Where would they get the money to pay for it?" My opinion is that private funds are not available in sufficient quantities in any one repository, or in any group of privately-owned organizations, to purchase the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was referring to private control.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I shall say more about private control in a moment or two. The suggestion I am about to make may meet with the approval of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I make it after listening to debates in the house with respect to the Canadian National Railways during the last two decades. I am not going to trace the history of the railways for twenty years, but I know that I first sat in this chamber as the result of an election during which on every platform in my railroad constituency I advocated the public ownership of these more or less disjointed railways. I suggested that they become one entity, so that they might be of some real service to Canada. At no time have I changed my position—and I am still here. But at the same time, those of us who have followed that course consistently for twenty years cannot help hearing, ringing in our ears, the words, "Sell her for a dollar." That is what we heard for ten years from my hon. friends who now sit to the right of the Speaker.

Mr. CARDIN: From one.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): But the cheers echoed right across this chamber, the "hear, hears" and the "yea, yeas". In those days the minister was not charged with the responsibility of the conduct of the Department of Transport, and at least he did not dissent. I cannot recall any dissenting speech on his part. However, I am not going to thresh old straw; I merely mention this to show that it is impossible to keep a problem of this kind out of politics. I use the word "politics" in the higher sense, if it is possible to use it in that way. When a minister makes a statement, whether in St. Henri or elsewhere, whether he is the head of the Department of Transport or of any other department, his voice is listened to across Canada as well as in the province of Quebec. Those who are charged with the management of the railways, from the personnel on the payroll up to the directors, do not need to throw up a straw in order to see which way the wind is blowing. They cut their coat according to their cloth, as we all know. It is just plain common sense; it is an attempt to follow out the ideas which emanate from this house and which are announced by those who occupy the treasury benches.

If that is so, and we will admit it, speaking on my own responsibility and not for the party with which I am associated or for any other group, I make this suggestion. The minister more or less sits in with the directors of the railroad. There is a number of groups in this house; why not appoint from time to time two members of this house to act as directors of the Canadian National Railways for a dollar a year? Why not let them sit in with the directors and become acquainted with the railway problem? I hesitate to use the word "farce", but that is what it really is when we are asked in the short space of two or three weeks to try to analyse the statement and to know all about the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. JACKMAN: Two or three days.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) says "two or three days". That has been the position this year and in previous sessions. What happened at this session? On November 22, 1940, authority was given to form a committee to deal with this matter. We waited until March 27, 1941, before the personnel was announced. On May 5 the personnel was amended, four were taken off and four were put on. The committee was finally organized on May 20 and started to sit. Then it sat morning, noon and night. Our constituents expect us to be in the chamber some of the time, but it has been my experience that as many as four committees, on which I was supposed to serve, have been sitting at the same time. I say to the minister that that is not necessary. These statements should have been ready at least in February or March and we should have got down to work immediately. Then we would have been able to give the attention to this problem which we would like to give. The last point I have made emphasizes the suggestion which I as an individual have made to the minister. I think the members of this house are big enough to be ready to serve Canada in connection with this problem and to leave their politics on the door mat before going into the directors' room.

Last year I think the railway accounts were considered in June or July, but the budget had been drawn up the previous December. We had had almost six months' experience of earnings, and it was found that these amounted to some $15,000,000 more than had been contemplated. The vote passed last year was first $15,000,000 odd and amounted finally to $17,398,971, and in July, 1940, it looked as though this would not be required. Then what happened? We asked, "Why vote it if we do not want it?" The reply was, "Well, there will not be so much wheat to be hauled, and probably we shall not have as much export business." The fact now comes out in this report that expenditures were made in other directions. As a humble member of that committee ten months ago I certainly did not expect that within the next twelve months I would be met with a request for $3,500,000 for the Montreal terminals. I am not debating the Montreal terminals at this time, I merely say that when we voted that $15,000,000 we accepted the minister's statement that the haulage of western crops would not be so large and that we might run into a deficit during the year. Then we get this statement showing these expenditures and they include items not discussed last year.

Reverting for a moment or two to the minister's statement that there is a war on now, that there was a war on in 1917, that conditions are the same, that the speeches made then in opposition to the Canadian National Railways or the buying of the system were similar to those being made now—

Mr. CARDIN: I referred to propaganda outside the house.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I recall that the minister referred to propaganda outside the house. I submit that the foundation of the propaganda outside the house and the propaganda itself are two different things. Let me speak first of the foundation for the propaganda. In 1917 we had a number of disjointed railway lines spread across Canada and the people who depended upon those lines for their connection with other parts of Canada expected that they would continue to operate. Some lines served very remote parts of the country, and the people expected that the service would be maintained. There was a universal demand that these lines be placed under public ownership. That was the condition then. The condition now is that we have a rather good system. It is an expensive system, and portions of it are not economical, but in the main it is a good system. It is a good system because we have been extravagant during the last decade in the purchase of equipment. The rails upon which the heavy cars and engines operate have been renewed, and in the main the system is in first-class order, certainly as compared with its condition in 1917. With regard to to-day's expenditure I come to my next point. There is a marked difference between conditions then and conditions now. In 1918 the United States was in the war. When the war was on and after, the New York market was open for borrowings, and we did borrow millions; we got into the billion figure. We were able to get all the money we wanted—quick money with which to discharge our obligations at that time.

The position to-day has entirely changed. Due to the neutrality law of the United States, the Johnson act, our friends in the United States are unable to lend us money. It is true that they have gone a long way in helping us with the lease-lend bill, and I hope the railway system will take advantage of anything they can obtain in the operation of that legislation. But that is not enough. We are still short of several hundred million United States dollars, and while the present acts are on the statute books at Washington, we have no place to go to get that money. So to-day, as I say, we are forced by sheer necessity to avoid all possible capital expenditures in the United States for railway supplies. Down in the maritimes, instead of double-tracking their road they are putting in safety equipment to the amount of a million and a half dollars, with the intention of assisting the movement of freight. The minister knows, I believe, the item I am referring to. Where is that equipment coming from? Rochester. How is it paid for? With United States dollars. There is a direct obligation upon the foreign exchange control board to provide a million and a half United States dollars. The degree of that necessity, in my opinion, should be measured against the necessity of providing United States dollars for war equipment, and the question should be given very serious consideration.

I turn to the next point, having reference to retirements of obligations which are coming due. As the statement is drawn this year, there is no analysis showing what part of this money has to be paid in Canadian dollars, or in sterling, or in United States dollars. For our convenience all these sums are shown in the same kind of currency. The minister should make a statement of exactly how many United States dollars we shall have to find this year, not only to meet the purchases which are being made, but to retire maturing obligations. As I have said on a previous occasion, every possible United States maturity should be renewed rather than paid off. I made a general criticism of the conduct of the treasury benches during the last three or four years, and part of that criticism is related to the Canadian National railway accounts. The first war cloud showed up some four years ago, or it may be more exactly dated about three years ago, when the Prime Minister made a statement to that effect, and the mistake which the treasury has made ever since that time was in not seeing to it that every dollar coming due in New York from then on, instead of being paid off, instead of our banks and insurance companies using the money we had in our tills to pay it off, and then tying up the cash by floating more Canadian bonds, should have been renewed. The net result of that mistaken policy is that to-day our till is bereft of liquid capital, and a great deal of that bereavement is chargeable to the fact that, not only the railway maturities but all other maturities which have come due in New York during the last three or four years, were paid off instead of being renewed. They were paid off because our banks and insurance companies were short of investments and thought they would like a few more Canadian bonds. And now, those obligations having been paid off, and having no chance of borrowing in the United States, we must endeavour at this late day to renew any obligations which are maturing in the future. There are very few such, but I emphasize that, no matter how few they are, they must be renewed in New York if at all possible.

To summarize the ideas I wish to leave with the minister: Conserve every possible United States dollar for the purchase of essential war equipment, even if you have to put a check-rein on the directors of the Canadian National Railways. Keep in mind the possibility of using the lease-lend bill operations for the carriage of United Kingdom purchases, whether it be the expense of carrying the material or the capital cost of the extra equipment necessary to carry it. Borrow as much equipment as you can in the United States and avoid the necessity of new purchases. And then—speaking personally for the moment—give consideration to placing on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways two, or three, or if necessary even four, members of parliament so that they can take a special interest in the people's railway problem. After all it is the people's problem. Our directors, who are doing a good job for us, perhaps have not the same perspective as we have here, and they have no more responsibility than we have. In turn, we could interpret their ideas, perhaps, a little more ably and accurately to our fellow members of this house; the family might be a little happier, and they would not be coming here so anxiously to get their legislation passed and get away, if they have to sit morning, noon and night, to accomplish their object.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if anything in the resolution refers to the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice this sentence in the resolution:

—to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company or of any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways system. . . .

The Hudson Bay railway is operated by the Canadian National Railways, is it not?

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. CARDIN: No, it is not covered. It is not a part of the Canadian National railroad system.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is it covered?

Mr. CARDIN: It is operated by us, but it is operated as a separate organization.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is a large defiicit on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. CARDIN: It is not provided for in this particular resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: There is an item in the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the purchase of equipment, rolling stock, and so on, does the railway buy the equipment outright? Does it rent a considerable amount of equipment, or does it buy it on time? Is it financed by one of the United States finance corporations, such as the American Guarantee company, the Chase National bank, or a similar institution? I have seen on certain of our engines a little plate stating that the engine is the property of one of these organizations. It has always seemed to me that a government institution, at least, should not be buying on an instalment plan, with the interest and other charges which are involved in that form of buying. Is any of our equipment purchased in that manner? If so, why should we do that, when it is a government institution; and, particularly at this time, why should we be paying dues to a United States corporation, in view of all the difficulties of exchange? If we are doing that, why not pay the balance owing and discharge ourselves of obligations which cause a good deal of concern at the present time?

Mr. CARDIN: My understanding, Mr. Chairman, is that we only supply or vote the money to the Canadian National, and they themselves buy the equipment they require. I am informed that for a very long time there has been no issuance of money for the purchase of anything in the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not mean buying in the United States; but do we purchase any equipment through finance corporations of the United States?

Mr. CARDIN: No. The railways do that directly, and they own outright anything they buy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is hardly correct. Under Sir Henry Thornton the Philadelphia plan did operate, and it is still operative, although no new financing may have been done, in that way. This is a well understood plan much in favour with the railways, and it has its advantages in financing the purchase of railway equipment. All railways do it, and they know their business in respect to matters of the kind. I am not criticizing it. All I suggested was that we had not paid annual instalments out of operation but refunded these amounts, and they are allowed to go into the debt of the railway. They were in days gone by, at any rate, and they will be there long after the equipment is worn out. It is not good business.

Mr. CARDIN: We are at present providing, out of the fund which will be accumulated this year, $9,000,000 for the retirement of equipment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For two years they have been doing it.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think I can say very much in answer to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). He made certain representations that may be well worth considering, and I cannot go further than to say that I will make note of them. My hon. friend complains about the provision, in the bill which is to be introduced, for the temporary deficit in the operation of the railway. This is necessary because, as I am informed—I have a good deal to learn in these matters—in the first part of the year the Canadian National Railways cannot meet out of cash all expenditures, but by the end of the year they have sufficient revenue to cover advances made them by the government to meet a temporary deficit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have a large working capital.

Mr. CARDIN: No. That is the explanation given me. The hon. member for Danforth also referred to the fact that the central traffic control, which was proposed to be established in the maritime provinces, was United States equipment and had to be paid for with United States dollars. That is perfectly true, but we could not procure the equipment elsewhere. What is the position of the minister or even that of the directors? To whom can they go for proper information to guide them in their decisions? They have only one course to follow, and that is to give heed to the representations made to them by the officers and the technical employees of the company. If they do not go to these informed persons, to whom can they go? It is all very well to say that our judgment in parliament may be as good as the judgment of a man working for the railways. On certain questions I entirely agree with that view. But when it comes to technical matters, to purely traffic questions, I must confess that I do not feel qualified to balance my judgment against the judgment of the technical officers of the railway. We must take someone's word if we are to have a proper administration of the railways.

My hon. friend also complained that the procedure in the railway and shipping committee was not very satisfactory, that we are looking into accounts after the expenditure is made. That is true, but I wonder how it can be avoided. Speaking almost entirely as a layman, I submit that the Canadian National is more closely watched in its expenditures than any privately-owned organization, because at a meeting of a great corporation—we all know what it is—the shareholders have not the same means or facilities for acquiring information, nor have they the requisite audacity to go through all the statements of expenditures and to cross-examine the officers of the concern, as members of parliament have an opportunity to do. It is true there have been delays, and we have always had some complaints in that respect. There may be room for improvement there. Taking the system as a whole, however, while it may not be perfect it is to a large extent quite efficient, and provides the proprietors, the Canadian people, with a greater amount of detailed information than the ordinary shareholder of any large private organization ever receives. There may yet be room for improvement. I am not disputing my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Simply to preserve the sequence of the record, may I point out that this statement was issued at Montreal on March 19 and two months and one day thereafter, May 20, members of this house began to consider it. Why should there be a delay of from one to three months in every year?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not objecting to my hon. friend's observations, nor am I prepared to say that there is no foundation for some of his criticisms. I am speaking of the situation as a whole and I am trying to explain that with all the imperfections of our organization in connection with the Canadian National the people of Canada are more fortunate than the ordinary shareholders of any large private organization in the country.

The hon. member for Danforth said that we should renew the bond issues that we have in the United States instead of discharging them, because that will cost more. I understand that at present we are experiencing some difficulty in making new issues in the United States on account of the neutrality act and other impediments and difficulties that exist there.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The neutrality act provides for the renewal of maturities.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wish the minister would clarify some figures with regard to the Montreal terminal. I may tell him that in Toronto the building of the Montreal terminal at the present time is a cause of considerable grievance, so much so that I ask the minister to give me figures. When I was in Toronto during the Easter recess I found myself in the position of having to defend the Liberal government. Everyone said, what about the Montreal terminal? I should like the minister to give me a good brief in the matter. In particular the minister made the statement that it was a shame to have this tremendous uncompleted asset in Montreal in such a state that it could not be used unless a few more millions, I think $2,000,000 was mentioned, were spent upon it; if that were done, it could be made useful. I find, however, according to sessional paper 92D tabled on March 26 last, that the sum of $3,599,000 was spent on the Montreal terminal in 1940. We are appropriating $4,100,000 to be spent during the present year. On top of that the dominion government appropriated under the heading of unemployment relief a further $1,500,000 which was spent partly in 1939 and partly in 1940; I think it is all spent now. Altogether that makes the substantial sum of $9,200,000 to complete the Montreal terminal since the beginning of 1940—we leave aside the few months of 1939 following the declaration of war. If my figures are correct it is quite evident that this very large sum was spent to complete the terminal during the last two years, which sum might better, in the judgment of many of us, have been retained for war purposes and the completion of the terminal left until the war is over when we may need to find work for the returned men.

Mr. CARDIN: When I said that $2,000,000 would complete the Montreal terminal I had in mind new expenditure, new disbursements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): New commitments?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, new commitments to be made. In fact up to May 1, 1941, the sum of $27,296,000 had been spent or covered by commitments, and the estimated balance to complete is about $2,500,000. In the estimated requirements for 1941 of $4,100,000 is included $2,000,000 to cover commitments, contracts that have been awarded and cannot be stopped or modified. So that the only amount to be spent or for which commitments have not yet been entered into for this year would be $2,000,000. We are committed for $2,000,000 out of the $4,000,000 required to complete the construction. There is also an estimate for 1942 of $343,000. That will represent a total expenditure from 1939 to 1942, bringing the terminal to completion, of $10,216,666.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much will that expenditure exceed the estimate that was made on the modified scheme?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid I could not answer that question at the moment. I have not the information before me.

There is something more that I should give the committee to make the picture complete. Besides the expenditures that have been made since 1939, which I have just mentioned, there was in the fiscal year 1938-39 an expenditure under vote 631 of $30,449.52, and under the estimates for 1939-40, vote 586, an expenditure of $1,500,000 on the terminal under unemployment relief. In order to provide work in Montreal the government decided then to contribute half of the labour cost of the work. These amounts of $1,500,000 and $30,000 are in addition to the figures I have just given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nearly $12,000,000?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, and that was the estimate made at the time the project was revived in 1939 and the plans revised—that it would cost in the neighbourhood of $12,000,000 to complete the work.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to say a word and make a suggestion to the minister. The improved earning power of the Canadian National Railways last year was not due to any normal growth of business, nor was it brought about by any improvement in the management of the railway. It was due to an abnormal condition brought about by our war effort. We have no reason to believe that this increased business will continue after the war is over; on the contrary we have every reason to believe that after the war railway business will return to its former level, conditions will be difficult and we shall be faced with hard times. My suggestion is that the minister and the government should give consideration now to the problem that will confront the Canadian National Railways when the war is over, and should make plans to meet it. The time this problem should be considered is now, when conditions are comparatively good. The government should not neglect the matter because it is not pressing at the moment.

I had the honour of being a member of the standing committee on railways and shipping. When the president of the Canadian National Railways was giving his evidence before the committee I asked him this question:

Are the directors looking ahead to the time when peace will come again, with a view to adopting methods or policies to improve the position of the railroad after the war?

In reply the president said:

I think the experience of the war in respect to the increase in traffic and the improved financial result clearly indicates that what is wrong is the lack of traffic, and I do not see what the directors can do about that after the war, as it will depend entirely upon the conditions that obtain at that time.

I then asked him:

In all probability after this war we will experience a depression and be up against hard times. Are you looking forward to improving that situation at all? Have you considered it?

His reply was:

My point is this: I do not see what can be done on the part of the directors or anyone else to anticipate that condition. We do not know what it will be, and if the circumstances are such that the traffic is greatly reduced I do not know how the directors or anybody else can produce the traffic.

To suggest that if we cannot get enough traffic we shall not be able to do anything, that we shall just have to go behind, as I understand we did go behind at the rate of about a million dollars a week, in my opinion is to adopt a defeatist attitude. I do not think the government want to adopt that attitude. This is a problem to which the minister and the government should give attention now instead of waiting until after the war, when it will certainly have to be faced.

Mr. JAQUES: The leader of the opposition has objected to this bill because, as he says, it is likely to interfere with our war effort. I think that is a very reasonable stand to take.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not object to the bill. I think the bill is inevitable, but I wanted certain information about it.

Mr. JAQUES: He objected to the rebuilding of this station; I believe that was a reasonable stand to take, and I agree with it. The hon. leader also said that it would be a good thing to leave all these projects until after the war, when they could be used to absorb some of our unemployed. The hon. gentleman who just took his seat referred to the inevitable depression that will follow this war, but what guarantee have we that the next depression will be regarded at all differently from the previous one? Before the luncheon recess the minister said this station had not been built before the war because of the depression. And why was nothing done during the depression? There was only one reason. Here were hundreds of thousands of men willing and able to do the actual construction work; miners, steel workers and so on all down the list, were looking for work, but nothing was done. Why? There was only one answer: because there was no money. And there was no money because, as the Minister of Finance told us on Monday afternoon, neither the government nor this house has any control whatever over the financial policy of this government. That is the reason.

Mr. ILSLEY: I deny that I made that statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, the Bank of Canada controls the financial policy of this country, and certainly the Minister of Finance told us that neither his department nor this house had any control whatever over the financial policy of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I deny that I made that statement. I said the government had no control over the internal operations of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if I did not say that I meant to do so. We were talking about the internal operations of the bank at that time. I find that this matter was discussed at great length in the banking and commerce committee of 1939, and at that time the phrase used was "day to day operations." I had no intention of announcing any change in the policy that was laid down at that time. The distinction between having something to say about monetary or financial policy, and the government controlling the day to day operations of the Bank of Canada, was made very clear in 1939. Just before six o'clock the other evening I was the object of some rapid questioning here, and it may be that I went further than I should have gone. I have not looked at Hansard to see what I said, but I want to say to the members of the Social Credit party right now that I do not want them to attach any significance to any statements I made at that time in so far as they were at variance with the clearly established rule and policy laid down in the banking and commerce committee in 1939.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not blaming the minister, but I should like to quote his words.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman must accept the statement of the minister as to what he meant.

Mr. JAQUES: I accept his statement as it appears in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman cannot accept Hansard as against the statement of another hon. member of this house. When an hon. gentleman says that he made a certain statement, and that what he said was so and so, any other hon. member must accept what he says.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the record is the other way I would raise a point of order at once.

The CHAIRMAN: Hansard is not the record of the house; and Hansard cannot prevail against the statement made by an hon member. Hansard is only for the convenience of the public; it is not the official record of the house, and under the rules no one can challenge a statement made by an hon. member as to what he did or did not say.

Mr. JAQUES: Then this makes the case even worse, because if the government had control—

The CHAIRMAN: Furthermore it is not permissible to quote anything said during a debate, other than the one now proceeding, which took place during the present session.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not quoting from Hansard; and of course I must accept the minister's word. But having done that I say that if this government and this house had complete control of the financial policy of this country, that makes the case even worse. Not only did this policy of deflation prevent the construction of this station and hold up every other public work that should have been and could have been done when we had the men and the materials available; it also prevented us from rearming in order to meet the challenge that we must have known was coming. Let me quote from a letter written to the London Times by Admiral of the Fleet Lord Chatfield, with regard to the loss of the Hood:

> The Hood was destroyed because she had to fight a ship twenty-two years more modern than herself. This was not the fault of British seamen. It was the direct responsibility of those who opposed rebuilding of the British battle fleet until 1937, two years before the second great war started.
> It is fair to her gallant crew that this should be written.

The reason the navy was not rebuilt was the same reason the station was not rebuilt—because they had no money.

Let me quote the words of a Conservative member in the British House of Commons uttered on April 9, 1941, during the course of the budget debate. Remember, this was a Conservative member—not a socialist or a social crediter. He said this:

> There has been a lot of talk about the period after the war. Many think it premature to discuss what will happen after the war. I think it right to do so. We have the lessons of the last war before us. I well remember coming back from France in 1919. This country was richer and had a higher prestige than ever before in its history. We had the greatest navy, the greatest air force, and the finest army in the world. We had the land of England better cultivated than it had been for two generations. We had more skilled mechanics, more skilled shipbuilders, in the country with magnificent new factories and machinery. The whole world was clamouring for our goods, and primary producers throughout the world had good incomes because prices were satisfactory, and they could pay for our goods, and they were demanding our goods. Our position was of immense wealth, but financial theory said: "You are poor," and for 20 bitter heart-breaking years we laboured to make the actual facts fit financial theory. Prices of primary producers throughout the world were forced down by our financial policy of deflation, we ruined the farmers of the world and the farmers of our own country. We destroyed shipbuilding yards, pulled down factories, scrapped machinery, forced our skilled mechanics and artisans to migrate to America and the Dominions; we made the soil of England go out of cultivation and become more derelict than it had been for hundreds of years. And at the end of 20 such years of bitter and hard work, we had made the actual facts fit the financial theory, and we were poor indeed and unable to keep up adequate armaments, and our prestige sank almost as low as it had ever been.

May I again remind the committee that these words were uttered by a Conservative member of the British House of Commons. One might say that anyone speaking there is facing death at any moment. In fact it was shortly after those words were spoken that the House of Commons met with the same fate as the Hood—and for the same reason.

There is a confession. When I hear any hon. member either on this side of the house or on that side make a similar confession, I shall have some faith in what is intended for this country after the war is over—and not before.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was interested to hear the minister tell us in his usual impassioned way how fortunate we were as a Canadian people to be shareholders in the Canadian National Railways. I believe the records will prove that our fortune has been largely limited to the matter of paying annual deficits.

I notice in the resolution that we are asked to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for certain purposes, and to authorize the making of temporary loans to the company, secured by such securities, and not exceeding $29,414,206. At what rate of interest will this money be available?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. It will be at the market rate. I cannot say just now what the market rate will be.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I take it, then, that these securities will be sold through the ordinary channels at the ordinary rates, through some commission agent in the usual manner.

Mr. CARDIN: It will be done in the usual manner.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What will be the approximate guaranteed rate of interest?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid I cannot answer that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not even within 2 per cent?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems too bad we cannot have that information, because the resolution provides for the guaranteeing of the interest and principal of securities. I had expected to hear someone ask why we had to go on the open market for this money—money which will be guaranteed by the federal government, and which would be an absolutely gilt-edged security. Why should we have to pay interest to outside concerns? I cannot understand it. Why not use our own Bank of Canada? The people of Canada are beginning to wonder why we should have to pay interest from our tax revenues on guaranteed funds, when we are borrowing money guaranteed by this government. There can be no reason. Why should there be rates of interest, and why should we not know what rates we are going to guarantee?

The resolution provides for an expenditure of $29,414,206. It seems to me we are going to be buying up materials and using labour which, we are given to understand, is desperately needed at the present time. Until we are on the safe side in respect of production of armaments and effective equipment for our men, the using of this material and labour is almost sabotage.

Mr. GILLIS: The resolution states that a portion of the money will be used to authorize the company to pay supplementary contributions to certain railway employees' provident funds. I should like to have a brief description of what these funds are. Are they pension schemes to which contributions are made by the employees? I have had correspondence which would seem to indicate that there has been some pretty mean administration in respect of employees' pensions paid by the Canadian National Railways. Of what do these railway employees' provident funds consist, and how are they administered?

Mr. CARDIN: I regret that I am not in position to give complete information as to that, but I shall undertake to give it when the bill is under consideration. Speaking from recollection, I understand that this is a contribution to assist a fund which is not in position to sustain itself. I believe I have read somewhere that most of this fund has been invested in securities which are now frozen to a certain extent and cannot be used satisfactorily to meet pension obligations. The government is contributing to that scheme of pensions in order to keep it working during the period when the assets are frozen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About how much is going into the fund?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that this provide only for authority to the company to make contributions out of revenues, that none of this $29,000,000 is to go into the fund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Upon a reading of the resolution I think that will be found to be correct.

Mr. GILLIS: If this is a contributory scheme, and if the government assists in supporting it, what representation has the government on the board which disburses the fund?

Mr. CARDIN: It is a contributory scheme.

Mr. GILLIS: Under the complete control of the management of the railways?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: The government makes a contribution but has no jurisdiction?

Mr. CARDIN: We are authorizing the railways to make a contribution. I repeat that none of this $29,000,000 will go into the fund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is an old fund which went back to the days of the Intercolonial railway, and which may be in the position to which the minister refers in that contributions are made by the government from time to time. My understanding is that this fund is operated by a board of trustees made up of representatives of the management and the employees.

Mr. CARDIN: The government has certain representation.

Mr. CHURCH: As a public ownership supporter I have been considerably interested in this resolution. During the last election, I believe both parties had a policy. This is one of the most important problems we have to consider, and it is unfortunate that more time is not given to its discussion in the house. We took three weeks on wheat. A select committee was appointed one day without notice being given on the order paper, and it has made two or three reports. Every Canadian is a shareholder in this road, and it is unfortunate that more attention is not given to this matter. Look at the interest that has been taken in public ownership and public utilities in Ontario. The financial statement issued there is just like a bank statement. This Canadian National railway system is made up of the old Intercolonial, the old Canadian Northern which should have been put into receivership, the old Trans-Continental, the old Grand Trunk, and outside services in hotel and marine and other services and subsidies. It is a long story.

Certain parts of the resolution do not conform to the policies which have been set out by two royal commissions. The first was the Drayton-Acworth, which sat in 1917, and the second was the Duff commission. One can learn little or nothing from the financial statement of this publicly-owned railway system. In my opinion the government made a great mistake in not having at the start moved the head office of this system to the city of Toronto. Ontario is a great public-ownership province, and the railway makes most of its money in that province.

I am a supporter of public ownership, but this is not real public ownership at all. It is the mistakes of private ownership from the start. The resolution shows that advances are to be made to subsidiaries which are operating at a deficit. It will be noticed that there is a difference in the way we finance the war and the way we finance these deficits, yet the war requires a much greater expenditure. In the case of the war, we are charging two-thirds to income and one-third to capital, reversing what was done in the last war; we are asking the people of the country to pay the greater part of this two-thirds by many new forms of taxation, although this generation suffer in flesh and blood as well. In this case many old debts are refunded from year to year, with a heavy interest burden. In my opinion there should be a different system of accounting and auditing and a different form of financial statement and set-up so that the workers and the business people of the country may understand the exact financial set-up, and there may be a complete intelligent balance sheet easily understood by all.

So far as I can find out, since 1920 the deficits of the Canadian National Railways have taken $633,718,706 from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers and no assets have been created. The Duff commission which was appointed in 1932 dealt with this matter of refunding and made a recommendation that in connection with the deficits of the system it was undesirable to issue securities guaranteed by the government, that the government should borrow the money and pay the deficits itself. I believe there has been some amendment to that. In my opinion the Bank of Canada should deal with this particular matter, be placed in charge of these securities, take care of deficits as a trustee, and consolidate these government and crown properties, and it should be consulted more regarding the financing of the whole proposition.

As regards the amounts the railways have made out of the war, it appears that $2,750,000 was earned by one railway and $2,500,000 by the other. The relief which would be obtained by the cessation of the annual deficits would aid in both peace and war to bring about prosperity; it would leave that much more money for the government to spend elsewhere, and reduce the annual tax rate. The fund now used to pay these losses would be available for other governmental purposes.

These deficits cannot be overcome by increased efficiency of operation. To my mind there is no evidence that, broadly speaking, this railway is not as efficiently managed as possible. There are some features which indicate extravagance and in respect of which no vision or foresight is shown, and the requirements by way of capital expenditure as set out in the resolution would be much less if such foresight had been shown. I have in mind the United States affiliations; I note how the luxurious cars in these trains compare with the cars in other trains within Canada, and especially those of the oldest rolling stock used in the transportation of troops.

I say, therefore, that the losses which are shown in the resolution will not be brought to an end by increased business. The railway is not progressive enough to recognize the inroads made by the motor bus as a factor in transportation. As a result, the railways have lost the cream of the business. Reduced mileage and cooperative effort between the two railway systems which will do away with unnecessary duplication of services constitute the only method of reducing the loss. There has been delay in acknowledging this fact, and a lack of courage in this particular matter. Compare the subject matter of this resolution with the way in which the railway problem is handled in the Union of South Africa, where new methods of operating and financing the railways, as to both capital and income, have been successfully tried also in the United States to some extent. In the great war that government took over the railways in the United States for the period of the war and consolidated services, and returned them afterwards to private operation, taking care of the deficits and charges in many ways as a war effort in part. In this country, however, little has been done under the statutes providing for coordination. Co-operation on a minor scale has not effected enough saving to meet the needs of the situation. The economies resulting from cooperation on a minor scale between the roads have had little effect in reducing the debt for either capital or maintenance. In nine months prior to July 1, the two railways cooperatively abandoned, were granted permission to abandon or were preparing to abandon 750 miles of lines estimated to bring about an annual saving of $647,040, but the total amount saved by the companies through piecemeal cooperation is only slightly under $2,000,000. In my opinion the amount asked under the resolution, $29,000,000, is too much, because only the surface of possible savings through coordination has been touched. Competitive lines are still being operated to take care of business which could be efficiently handled by one road.

Take the matter of the troop trains. I refer to the return I received to an order of the house, setting out the sums which I stated a few moments ago. I maintain that there has not been the coordination of services and cooperation there should be, and soldiers should be given better trains and services, and cut-rates much more than they are given.

The resolution makes reference to the refunding of capital obligations. Some of that debt is due to duplication of services in terminals and to equipment. In Vancouver one union station could easily take care of all business; yet two separate stations are being operated. The same is true of Winnipeg and more especially of the wastage on the Montreal terminal. In Toronto there are two or three stations. The one in North Toronto is practically closed and rented for the period of a year and one union station, while it effects many economies, is not what it should be. We all know the situation in the city of Montreal. The taxpayer has to pay for all this; he has had to hand over deficits averaging $45,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year for many years. I can only say that so far as the revenues go, based on rates and returns per mile, per car mile, and all that sort of thing, the statement does not indicate very much relief for the taxpayer. I am sorry that we have not been given more information about the auxiliary services, namely, the hotels and the merchant marine. It would be a godsend if we had at this time, for use in the present war, all those fine merchant marine ships which were sold for a very small sum of money five years ago.

Three or four reports have been presented by the committee which considered this $29,000,000 issue of securities. The third report has not yet come before the house. I hope that an opportunity will be given to deal with it, because in my opinion, if report No. 3 is a sample of the committee's work, they are not dealing with the facts of this situation from a commercial or business point of view, but are considering in their report solely the questions from the political aspect of carrying on and getting business for the branch lines and all the other projects which in their opinion have to be carried on.

We have had to suffer the consequences of the railway bungle almost since confederation. We have a railway mileage on two roads of 43,000 miles, equal to Germany, with a population of over sixty million, that of France, and that of England, whose population before the war was forty-six or forty-seven millions. I wish the national railroads every success. It is obvious that the taxpayer will again have to pay, and he should be given the facts. I believe the only proper statement I have ever seen was given in 1937. The figures then stated may not be exactly applicable to the position to-day, because the deficits have been reduced. But a clear statement of the whole history of this road and all services was made by my former leader, Mr. Bennett, in the house in answer to three questions raised in 1937 by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling). It will take only a few moments to read those questions and answers, and I will therefore quote what appears in Hansard of January 29, 1937. The first question was:

1. What is the total indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways to the public?

The answer was:

$1,184,612,248.59 at December 31, 1936.

The section question was:

2. What is the total annual interest on this indebtedness?

The question referred to 1936. The amount has been reduced considerably since then, but the principal is the same. The answer is:

The last question is the most important one so far as this resolution is concerned:

3. What is the total indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada? That is, how much money from time to time did we pay out of our revenue fund to these properties?

The minister made this answer, and I conclude with the reading of the three paragraphs of his statement:

3. Of the total cash expenditures by the dominion, amounting to $1,468,611,114 (not including interest on loans) as shown on page 7 of the Department of Railways and Canals report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936, the following are the amounts that may be considered as charged against the Canadian National Railways:

Loans to C.N.R. (includes loans to former privately-owned roads) on which interest is accrued but not paid	$ 645,527,455 83
Investment in Canadian government railways	388,880,002 78
Stores and open accounts of Canadian government railways	15,748,921 60
The following amounts are in suspense:
Temporary loans (interest paid currently)	36,390,204 25
Expenditures under supplementary public works construction act, 1935 (unemployment relief)	5,068,081 85
Balance covering all deficits, subsidies, and all other items which have been absorbed in the net debt of the dominion	376,996,447 69
Total	$1,468,611,114 00

I am in hopes that the government, instead of presenting all these 1941 cumbersome statements, will be able to issue a clear budget such as is provided in Ontario in connection with public utilities developments, involving very large sums of money, of the hydro electric system. In the provincial and local hydro systems the method followed by the hydro board in making a report on the hydro municipal utilities gives a clear statement to the public. By means of page advertisements in the newspapers, the position of the Toronto transportation system and buses could be quite clearly presented.

As I have said, I wish the government every success in this operation. The time will come when some changes will have to be made. I am sorry to have detained the committee, and now, while I do not agree at all with his policies, I wish only to compliment the minister upon one thing; I am glad to see him this session with his health somewhat restored, and I know I am expressing the sentiments of every hon. member, because his health was said to be impaired by overwork. I do not agree with all the minister has done, but I wish to pay him this tribute, and not only him, but I wish to pay tribute to the Speaker, the Clerk of the House, and the Chairman of Committees, the Deputy Speaker.

The Clerk of the House, by his vision, politeness, courtesy and efficiency has added greatly to the effectiveness of parliament, and I have found, over twenty years, the House of Commons to be a place of much kindness. I only hope the railway will consider these matters and that a better statement will be forthcoming. They are spending a great deal of money without any commensurate efficiency in some ways at times. I travel on the railway, and I can say that the service is not what it should be. The system is being starved, and no doubt for the money it costs it should be better. What is needed is a proper publicity department to put the facts before the people. There is, in connection with the railway, a publicity department which is costing the country a large sum of money, but the whole organization is not worth as much as it should be. All it does is to spend money on entertainment and on work that could very well be done without as an economy. The minister should consider closing the head offices in Montreal and moving them to Toronto. The Minister of Finance is sitting beside him, and I suggest that he should wield the big stick on the railway in this matter of expenditures, because there is too much expenditure and not enough efficiency to-day. An effort should be made to operate the system from the commercial aspect. The Minister of Finance should provide a part of the deficit from revenues without refunding a lot of money, which costs a great deal in interest rates. He should wake up the Canadian people to the fact that they are not getting the service to which they are entitled. There is duplication, waste and luxury in Canada's railway. I know that this exists in the other system, too, but the other system is a taxpayer while this is crown property. The people of Canada are the shareholders, and members of parliament, their representatives, should be able to go back to their constituencies and give a plain and intelligent statement of facts regarding the present financial condition of the road from the commercial aspect and every other phase of the railway.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National railway system during the calendar year 1941, to provide for the refunding of financial obligations and to authorize the guarantee by his majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 87, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Isley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 4—Earned income.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is the clause which the hon. member for Peterborough West asked to have amended so that annuities would be regarded as earned income. I have gone into the matter carefully, and I regret that I am not able to agree to the amendment. I would ask that the section be allowed to pass.

Section agreed to.

On section 16.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the government succumbed to the importunities, or threats, or whatever you like to call them, of the premier of Ontario? I am prompted to ask that question because in this afternoon's Journal there is a statement that the government is introducing an amendment to the act which will cancel the recently imposed 15 per cent tax on interest from provincial bonds held by non-residents of Canada, and that the amendment will restore the tax to the former 5 per cent level. If that is true, it is a great victory for provincial rights.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a statement to make in that regard. The hon. gentleman has not made it any easier for me to make that statement. I thought from his attitude the other night he was disposed to be helpful—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I always am.

Mr. ILSLEY: —but I do not think his statement was. I would ask the committee to follow the statement which I am about to make, because it is a matter of great importance.

Before proceeding with this section, I wish to make a statement with reference to the controversy which has arisen in connection with the application of the increased tax imposed on foreign holders of provincial bonds. On Tuesday last I placed on Hansard a copy of the telegram which was sent by the Prime Minister to the Premier of Ontario on May 30. As the committee will recall, this telegram stated that we learned with keen regret of the attitude which Mr. Hepburn continued to take with regard to the increase in the tax on interest going to foreign holders of provincial bonds, and that as a result of the imposition of this increased tax the government of Ontario considered it necessary to reject the offer made by the dominion to the provinces in the budget of April 29.

The telegram went on to reiterate our conviction that the tax was fair and reasonable; that it represented only an increase in a tax that had been in effect since 1933 without protest from the province of Ontario; that it was low compared not only with taxes imposed on other income earned in Canada but also with similar taxes imposed on non-residents by the countries of which our foreign bondholders are citizens; that it constituted no threat to the credit of Ontario or of any other province; and that it was validly imposed and could be enforced. Nevertheless the telegram indicated that the government consider that it would be most unfortunate were there to be any serious controversy between the dominion and the largest and wealthiest province of Canada at a time when the major consideration of all Canadians should be the most effective and most united prosecution of the war.

What was viewed with particular regret was that under such conditions the government of Ontario should feel it necessary to make the increase in this tax on foreign bondholders its reason for refusing to accept the offer made to the provinces in the budget. Were the matter to be left in this position, it was pointed out that the citizens of Ontario would be prevented by prospective double taxation of their incomes from making as large subscriptions to the 1941 Victory loan as otherwise they would be able and willing to make. Since this government was anxious to remove any possible excuse for the continuance of such a situation, the telegram concluded by offering to restore to its previous level the tax on interest received from provincial bonds by foreign bondholders if the government of Ontario on its part would be prepared to give the dominion prompt assurance of its willingness to accept the offer which was made in the budget.

On Saturday last the press of Ontario carried a statement purporting to have been made by Mr. Hepburn to the effect that the dominion was tying up the offer made in the budget with the increase in this tax on non-residents, and that it had intended all along to use this increased tax as a device for securing the acceptance of the other offer. I think I made it clear beyond peradventure the other evening, that it was Mr. Hepburn who had tied the two things together and that we were only trying to remove what he himself said was his reason for his refusal to accept the offer I made in the budget.

While in the telegram of last Friday the Prime Minister had asked for prompt assurance with regard to Ontario's position, we have not as yet received any reply from the Premier of Ontario. We cannot very well delay any longer in proceeding with this bill. We do not propose to allow our motives to continue to be misrepresented or to allow the action of this government respecting one item of taxation to be cited as a reason for the non-acceptance by the government of Ontario of the offer we made in the budget. I wish, therefore, to advise the committee that after very careful consideration we have reached the conclusion that we should remove all possibility of doubt as to the respective positions of the two governments in this matter. Accordingly I propose to introduce an amendment to the bill as it stands, in the form of an additional section, the effect of which will be that in so far as this tax is concerned, absolutely no change will be made in the law as it stands now and as it has stood for the last eight years, in respect of the tax imposed on foreign bondholders as a result of the interest they receive from their holdings of provincial bonds.

This amendment will take the following form:

That the said bill be further amended by inserting after section 17 the following as section 17A:

17A. Notwithstanding anything contained in sections 16 and 17 of this act, section 9B of the Income War Tax Act shall, in the case of interest received from or credited by his majesty in right of any province, have effect as if the said sections 16 and 17 had not been enacted.

It will be noted that not only will the foreign holder of provincial bonds be left in exactly the same position as before, but also that there will be no change whatsoever in the rights and liabilities of his majesty in the right of any province. We believe, and we are advised by the Department of Justice, that by the law as it stands and has stood since 1933 the tax has been validly imposed on interest received by foreign holders of provincial bonds, but this has been challenged by the government of one province. It may be that in view of the proposed amendment the government of Ontario will not wish to create any difficulties in the collection of a tax to which they have not objected during the last eight years under peace-time conditions. If, however, they think the foreign bondholder should not only not share to some extent with all Canadians the increased burden imposed upon Canada by the war, but should also be relieved from taxes which they have been paying in peace time, and if, therefore, they request us to test the legal position in the courts, we shall immediately submit a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada in order that the whole position may be clarified.

There will, I am sure, be some hon. members who will criticize the action which I am now proposing and will strongly contend that we should not make any change at all. On grounds of strict logic, on grounds of the fairness of this tax on the foreign bondholder, and on grounds of the country's financial needs, their position is one with which it is hard to disagree. On the other hand, we have had to weigh the larger issues involved. In the first place, it would be, I repeat, a great misfortune if in war time there should develop a serious controversy between the dominion and the largest and wealthiest province allegedly over the proposed increase in this tax by the dominion. The fundamental matter to-day is the united and effective prosecution of the war, and we should all be big enough to recognize that simple fact.

In the second place, the revenue which we would receive from the increase in this tax on foreign bondholders is a consideration of minor importance compared with the importance of the dominion not doing anything which could be cited by the government of Ontario as an excuse for its refusal to accept an offer which would save the people of Ontario from paying an extra $29,000,000 or thereabouts in taxes.

Finally, the question of taxation of this kind seems to be a highly technical matter, and it appears to be difficult to get to the people of Ontario an unprejudiced view of the relative merits and demerits of this tax proposal. It is extraordinary to me that this should be so, but when I read some of the statements which have been made about this tax increase I am forced to the conclusion that the position of the dominion government must be made so clear as to permit of no possibility of misunderstanding or misrepresentation.

It is for these reasons that I offer the amendment which I have read.

I wish also to offer an amendment to section 16:

That section 16 of the bill be amended by adding thereto subsection 2 reading as follows:

2. That subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (e) of subsection 2 of the said section 9B be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided that in the case of motion-picture films, one-third of such payments shall not be subject to the tax under this section."

The gross tax on motion-picture film rentals was for several years 2 per cent. In 1939 it was raised to 5 per cent. By the increase under this budget that was multiplied by three, raising it to 15 per cent. I am convinced after exhaustive investigation, having spent a great deal of time on the matter, that 15 per cent is too high and that 10 per cent is high enough. Therefore I am moving that only two-thirds of such payments be subject to the 15 per cent tax.

It may be remembered that between 1936 and 1939 the ordinary rate was 5 per cent, and that that was subject to a deduction of 60 per cent. Therefore I am merely proposing that the 15 per cent be subject to a deduction of 33⅓ per cent.

If the committee should ask me why I selected 10 per cent I could not answer; it is more or less arbitrary. But 15 per cent is a terrific weight when applied to the rentals of motion-picture films.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will this enable the picture-show people to lower the prices of admission.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will this leave any profit to the distributors?

Mr. ILSLEY: Practically all the companies supplying motion pictures to Canada now have a loss on their operations. This reduces the loss.

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the Supreme Court Act no question can go to that court unless there are two parties to the issue and a text to the reference. The reference in this case, if it goes to the supreme court under the Supreme Court Act will be the Attorney General of Ontario versus the Attorney General of Canada. I suggest that, since the same matters are involved, there should be a reference to the court not only of this particular question to which the minister refers if Ontario consents, but also on death duties and income taxes, about which there are grave doubts as to the powers of this parliament in view of the provisions of section 92 as to property and civil rights in the provinces and other sections. I suggest that these matters be included in the text of the reference as well; they are co-related, and also that the Minister of Justice, if there is a reference as a matter of law and public policy, should lay the text of it on the table of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to say a few words regarding the announcement the Minister of Finance has just made. I appreciate the difficulty in which the minister finds himself; but on behalf of what I believe to be a very large number of people in this country I wish to register a most emphatic protest against the release of foreign bond holders from the taxation which was proposed. We are at war, and it seems to many people that the burden of the cost of the war must be spread over all who can share the burden; not only who live in Canada but who have an interest in Canada. That, I believe, is a fair view of the situation.

I was a spectator at the dominion-provincial conference. There I heard the minister make it very clear indeed, not as a threat—I think anyone who was there realized that no threat was made or intended—that because of the failure to straighten out certain constitutional matters in the discussion of the report and recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois inquiry, the necessities of war would compel the dominion to enter into fields then occupied by the various provinces. This naturally was one of the fields contemplated; and I am of opinion that in spite of the fact that the government has been obliged to take this step as a result of the attitude of the premier of the largest province of this dominion, we should not let this occasion pass without registering our protest against any provincial premier interfering with our vital efforts to raise the revenue that must be obtained for the conduct of this war. Those who are giving lip-service to the Dominion of Canada's war effort ought to be prepared to do more than that; and if there is one province that is in a position to assist the government in every way, it is Ontario.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the attitude of the premier of Ontario; but I have felt, as many others have felt, that all too frequently Mr. Hepburn speaks and acts for certain interests outside the Dominion of Canada. In this instance I think, on the very face of it, that would appear to be the situation. I wish to make a most emphatic protest against the government taking this step. As I say, I know the necessity is great; I realize that we must get this tangle straightened out, but I believe I speak for a number of people in this country when I say that the primary place to get money for our war effort is from accumulations of wealth. I believe those who have accumulated wealth invested in the Dominion of Canada ought to be prepared at this time to share the burden with those who reside in this country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to register, just as emphatically as possible, an opinion directly opposed to that expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I believe the minister has done exactly the right thing under the circumstances. The very statement made a moment ago, that when this matter is taken to the courts it will be a question of the king as his power is vested in the Dominion of Canada versus the king as his power is vested in the province of Ontario, is sufficient to indicate the desirability of the dominion cooperating with the provinces in all respects.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister say whether this amendment will cover provincial guarantees, such as the bonds of the hydro electric commission of Ontario, which may be in foreign hands? As I understood this originally, it was not intended to cover municipal bonds which were in the hands of foreign investors.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is just provincial bonds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Direct obligations?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then it will not cover the hydro bonds?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry to say that I did not give consideration to that question. The whole point raised was in connection with payments of interest by his majesty in the right of the province, and that is the point covered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I suggest to the minister that he should have in his department some practical men who know about public financing, because the hydro bonds run into many millions of dollars, and he will find other publicly owned enterprises in Ontario in the same position, where they have issued their own bonds which are guaranteed by the province. The minister is giving relief to direct obligations, but he is not giving relief to indirect obligations, which, in effect, are the obligations of the crown in another corporate form. I am afraid the minister may run into similar difficulties in that connection, and I believe consideration should be given that point.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to support what has been so very well said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It has been stated in this house on previous occasions that it is not only the people of Canada who are concerned about the outcome of the present conflict, that all who have money invested in Canada stand to lose or win according to the way the tide goes in Europe. I think the hon. member made out a very good case for the suggestion that those who have investments in this country should carry their full share of the load, as originally proposed in the budget. Can the minister tell the committee what this compromise will mean to the treasury in terms of dollars and cents?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I cannot tell the committee that. It would be impossible to give an estimate that would be at all accurate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the film tax, I understood the minister to say that there is a loss in that industry, and therefore the effect of this taxation is to tax a loss. If that be true, this would not seem to me to be a very good field for taxation. I am astonished to learn that these people are operating in Canada at a loss, but of course the minister knows.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that my statement that all had losses was too broad; that some had losses and some had profits, but that, as a whole, the industry seems to be operating at a loss if their statements are to be taken at face value.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose that depends upon how they keep their books.

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends upon their expenses and the principles under which they operate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They may not be all losses?

Mr. ILSLEY: The industry is in bad shape.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is the tax on interest paid to non-resident holders of dominion bonds the same as the tax proposed on non-resident holders of provincial bonds?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is no tax at all?

Mr. ILSLEY: None in connection with dominion bonds.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think it is quite unfair that the interest paid on dominion bonds held by non-residents should not be taxed while the interest on the bonds of any province is taxed. If one is to be taxed I think the other should be taxed as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what about the ethical question that arises? The dominion government sells its bonds to a non-resident, we say, "We will pay you so much money if you will lend us so much money." After that has been done, we turn round and take back, by force majeure, part of what we undertook to pay. Surely an ethical principle arises there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the same principle not apply in the case of a province?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, because they are two different authorities.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not think the Minister of Finance should feel so very badly about giving way to the Premier of Ontario. I approach this problem from an entirely selfish point of view; that is, selfish from the point of view of the dominion or the province. These obligations which are expressed in terms of United States currency were created because we required the money to carry on our operations in Canada, or to carry on industrial development, or to construct public utilities such as the hydro electric and other similar enterprises. After the war is over, probably the time will come when we shall want to go back to the United States and borrow for development purposes, and in order to provide work for Canadian workmen. The question is not whether United States investors should bear their share of the burden of Canada's war effort. They bought these bonds on the understanding, perhaps implied on their part, that they would receive the full amount indicated on the coupons. Already these investors are faced with a discount of 11 per cent by reason of the fact that our money is worth that much less than United States money; and if the 15 per cent provided in the original resolution had been added, it would have meant a discount of 26 per cent on the securities held in the United States. I do not mind this tax of even 15 per cent being applied to those who receive dividends on common stocks, the proceeds of which were invested in Canada, because they took their chance on the development of this country, and they expected to make a profit or receive an income higher than the bond return. Therefore they must in all equity bear their share of the expense of protecting that investment in this dominion.

The position of the bondholder is, however, somewhat different. Therefore, when we approach this problem from the selfish point of view of Canada, we must realize that we shall again require money from the United States for development, and there is no use in antagonizing the United States investor more than we need to. I believe, however, the publicity which has been given to this 15 per cent tax has been out of all proportion to the feeling against it on the part of certain United States bondholders. It has become somewhat of a political tempest in a teacup.

I believe, however, the government of Canada may find it is doing a very good service to this country, and not merely obliging the premier of one of our provinces, in taking the attitude which has been indicated. There will come a day when we shall want capital. When the United States investor in our securities looks at the position in Canada he will not conclude that we have yet reached the limit of our own sacrifice, or that we have reached the point where we must place a tax on the United States investor. He will see that in our ordinary everyday life we do not seem to have had to sacrifice a great deal. It is true that there have been substantial financial sacrifices on the part of some, and others, of course, have enlisted in the armed services. I am speaking, however, of ordinary civilian life.

If the minister says that we do require money and that we must place a tax on the United States holder of our securities, then why not impose a 50 per cent tax? Possibly that could not be done in fairness, but the legal position would be much the same. Of course it is absurd.

I believe the policy which is now being adopted will redound to the material benefit of our country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I doubt very much if the relief which it is said will be given under this amendment will be sufficient. I imagine the debt of the Ontario hydro and the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway, a great many of whose bonds are guaranteed by the province, would almost equal the amount of the debt of Ontario. As a matter of fact, they are Ontario government bonds, and are just the same as if they were issued by the Ontario government. I suggest that the minister should consider that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: This amendment covers amounts received from or credited by his majesty in the right of any province. That may cover the hydro, although I am not sure about that. It may be an agency, or an emanation, or something of that kind. The objection raised was, however, as to principle, with respect to the crown in the right of the province doing so-and-so.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am sure the minister knows that if it does not include the hydro and the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario, it will not be accepted as assuaging the difficulty. If the minister is going to go part way, then I suggest that he might as well go all the way and be quite explicit about the matter. Let us hope that some good will result from it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the minister pass his amendment now, and that the bill be held for third reading, until that position is made certain. The suggestion is made with a desire to be helpful.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe the point ought to stand until eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Ilsley moves that section 16 stand.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; 16 has passed, has it not?

The CHAIRMAN: Is it section 17?

Mr. ESLING: I do not wish to interrupt the discussion, but I should like to say a word about that portion of the amendment relating to films. I recall that in 1936 the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning, reduced the remittance tax on films, particularly and specifically, from 5 per cent to 2 per cent. The plea at that time was that after the films were used throughout Canada they were useless, and that, therefore, the film agencies were losing large sums of money.

In what I am about to say I shall refer to the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, a government publication in black and white. It goes on to show that the films which we see thrown upon the screens are not the actual films brought into Canada. They are only prints. The actual film is a negative, and it is sent to a processing plant in Montreal. I suppose that it enters Canada in bond, and for purposes of valuation it is valued at five cents a foot, the rate of tax being 32½ per cent.

The negative goes to the processing plant in Montreal, and from it as many prints as are required by the agency are made, the negative then being returned to the owners or producers in the United States. The business with the various theatres or film agencies which, in 1936, numbered sixty-three, is done as between those agencies and the processing plant. The agencies pay the processing plant. Taking for example a standard film of seven thousand feet, we find they pay a processing fee of three and a quarter cents a foot, plus sales tax. Therefore each print as shown upon the screens of the various theatres represents something like $246, and no more. One would think that that sum would be taken in during the first showing in a large city

Returning to the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we find that the total revenue from rentals to theatres received by the various film agencies in 1938 amounted to something like $8,500,000. I believe that is the last year for which we have the figures. The amount may have been $8,000,000. The report goes on to show that they take from that about $1,060,000 for wages and about $2,500,000 for cost of distribution of films to theatres across Canada. It shows, too, that after all these deductions, the film agency had at least $5,000,000 to remit to the picture producers in the United States.

One can see at once, therefore, that inasmuch as these are only prints, there can certainly be very little loss. It is also difficult to understand why the remittance tax affecting the picture producers in the United States should be decreased while a small United States investor in a Canadian mining property pays the full remittance tax.

It was on those very representations, taken from the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, that either last year or the year before the Minister of Finance put the film tax back to 5 per cent. I am wondering whether those who offered the suggestions have had an opportunity to go through the figures in the report I have mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): May I point out to the Minister of Finance that I had no intention of implying that I was opposed to the imposition of a tax on bonds held by non-residents. I think the remark made by the leader of the opposition needs a little explaining. For the life of me I cannot see why the dominion should impose a tax upon provincial bonds, and not one upon dominion bonds, when both are held by non-residents. This will certainly affect the credit of the provinces. As the leader of the opposition says, it may be necessary for the dominion to go to foreign countries in order to get money, but I think we have a great deal more money here in Canada available through our Bank of Canada if necessary. If, however, it is necessary for the dominion to go to foreign countries for more money, it will be equally necessary for the provinces to do that. If the dominion has no money for its own needs, it certainly will not have any for provincial use.

One of the greatest dangers is the fact that if the dominion should take this action, should discriminate as between provincial bonds held by non-residents and dominion bonds held by non-residents, to tax the one and not the other, it will be forcing the provinces to come to the dominion for any money they need. In that way there will be a further centralization of financial control, making the provinces that much more subservient to the dominion. That is not the right principle to follow. In fact, I cannot see why provincial bonds should not be a better security than dominion bonds. After all, if it is true—I use the word "if" advisedly—that the provinces have complete control of their natural resources, then I cannot see where the security for dominion bonds comes in. Of course, when it comes down to the fine point I doubt that the provinces have that control. When that is challenged, they generally find they do not have it. This is a question of foreign exchange, and I can think of several ways in which we can get more foreign exchange if we are really serious about the matter. Again I use a word advisedly. We could save United States dollars, or perhaps I should say Canadian dollars, by using Canadian coal. The saving in exchange would amount to about $15,000,000 a year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry to have to rise to a point of order, but I think a discussion on foreign exchange is irrelevant.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister wants to raise money, and I am simply pointing out an alternative.

The CHAIRMAN: That would not come under section 16 or the amendment thereto. I thought the hon. member had almost finished his remarks; otherwise I was on the point of stopping him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I had just about finished in that respect. I was speaking about the 5 per cent taxation which is to be placed upon provincial bonds. I cannot see why it should be placed upon those bonds if it is not to get revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two subjects under discussion; one is the conservation of foreign exchange, and the other is the obtaining of revenue. The conservation of exchange is not a question of increasing revenue; it is a question of keeping a supply of foreign exchange in the country in the hands of the foreign exchange control board. The two subjects are not the same and are not directly connected.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I quite agree with the minister that the one has to do with increased revenues, and the other possibly would have to do with the conservation of foreign exchange. But speaking on this section directly, I think the dominion will bring about a great deal of trouble for itself by creating a distinction between provincial bonds and dominion bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we are not creating a distinction; we are simply continuing to do what has been done since 1933. The interest on provincial bonds has been subject to a 5 per cent tax while dominion bonds have always been free. The market has adjusted itself to that fact, and bonds have been bought and sold with that in mind. The hon. gentleman seems to be talking as though we were now creating a difference between the two.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The increase to 15 per cent precipitated the argument between the provinces and the dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: The exception taken applies only to moving-picture films?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is no exception for other forms of amusement?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a question of forms of amusement. We have a withholding tax of 5 per cent, and this is being increased to 15 per cent on:

> All payments received directly or indirectly from Canadian debtors in respect of
> (i) any copyright, used in Canada, relating to books, music, articles and periodicals, newspaper syndicated articles, pictures, comics and other newspaper or periodical features and
> (ii) any rights in and to the use of any work, whether copyrighted or not subsequently, produced or reproduced in Canada, by way of the spoken word, print, or mechanical sound on or from paper, composition, films or mechanical devices of any description.

Those are subject to a gross withholding tax, heretofore of 5 per cent but from now on of 15 per cent. I am moving an amendment to make it 10 per cent in the case of this very important class.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 29—Machinery or equipment.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) had an objection to this section which I think was well taken, and I am proposing an amendment, which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

> That section 29 be amended by striking out the words "and is" in the first part of line 44 and the words "within the said period" at the end of the line.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount was referring to machinery which had been ordered, actually manufactured and paid for within the period and which was to be affixed but had not actually been affixed within the period to the premises of the taxpayer. We agreed that that classification should be covered.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 36 agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 17—Collection and remittance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister tell me what decision has been reached with respect to bonds guaranteed by the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am about to do that, under section 17A.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That the bill be further amended by inserting after section 17 the following as section 17A:

17A. Notwithstanding anything contained in sections 16 and 17 of this act, section 9 (b) of the Income War Tax Act shall have effect as if the said sections 16 and 17 had not been enacted, in respect of interest and bonds or other obligations of or guaranteed by his majesty in right of any province and in respect of interest on bonds or other obligations provision for the payment of which interest is made by his majesty in right of any province pursuant to a statute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a redraft?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And is it limited in the latter part of the clause where it reads:

. . . and in respect of interest on bonds or other obligations provision for the payment of which interest is made by his majesty in right of any province pursuant to a statute.

Just what are the implications of that clause? Does it cover the case where a province pays the interest direct or where recourse may be made to the province in case the principal should make default? What is the position with respect to, say, the hydro electric commission of Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY: The case of the hydro electric commission, if its bonds are guaranteed by the province of Ontario, is covered, not by the last few words—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But by all of them?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: —but by the words right in the middle of the section, namely, the words:

. . . interest on bonds or other obligations of or guaranteed by his majesty in the right of any province. . . .

The words from there on, namely, the last few words of the section, relate to certain cases, wholly or mainly in the province of Quebec, where the provincial government pays to certain charitable institutions money with which to pay their interest, and does so by virtue of statute. It is just a question whether that case should be covered, but we thought that probably it would be fairer to cover it. It is not the case of an obligation of the province to the bondholder. There is, however, a statutory obligation on the province to put the corporation or institution in funds, so that the corporation or institution can pay the bondholder.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In a measure they are analogous, although there is no direct guarantee.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is fairer, I think, to put it in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has not decided to do anything in respect of municipal obligations held outside the province?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then I think it is just too bad that the municipalities of this country do not raise the same protest that the premier of Ontario has done, because, apparently due entirely to the protest which the premier of Ontario raised, we granted him this concession. Here are large municipalities who have issued bonds, and they are going to be sitting back and holding the bag. I do not think it is fair. We are treating the municipalities most unfairly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister any information as to the amount of municipal bonds issued by Canadian municipalities, payable in Canadian funds, which are held, we will say, in the United States? Is it a substantial problem or merely a small one?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not any information. It is however a small problem compared with that of the provinces, and that of the provinces is very small compared with that of the dominion, if we were to do anything about the dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister sure of that statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I am not sure of it. I am informed that that is the situation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a recollection that the hydro-electric belongs to the municipalities and that they have guaranteed the bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is another point. I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the hydro-electric is a provincial corporation.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): Large sums of money will be required to finance our war effort. This money will have to be raised by taxation or borrowing. I believe that the moneys required to satisfy the budget will be raised. I believe also that the moneys required to satisfy the loan which is now being floated will be raised. I am proud to point out that Turner Valley, which is in the riding of Calgary East, which I have the honour to represent in this house, was the first area in all Canada to "go over the top" in the way of raising its war loan quota. I have known for some time that Calgary East was the leading riding in all Canada, and I hope that hon. members will also appreciate the fact. I hope that every district in Canada will emulate the high standard set by Calgary East and play its part in the raising of our war loan.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

27. Marketing service. Live stock and live stock products, $519,037.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some months ago the government put through an order in council detailing the manner in which farmers must dispose of their wool, and setting forth certain regulations governing those who purchase that wool. Upon whose advice were those regulations made? Was it upon the advice of the officers of the department, upon the advice of the wool dealers, or upon the advice of the mills?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The provision was brought in by the department but only after full discussion with the different organizations concerned and with their consent.

Mr. HOMUTH: From what I can gather, those who were concerned with this matter, and perhaps asked for their advice, were more particularly the wool dealers, the larger wool buyers or those who control the wool market of Canada. Certainly no regulation like this was ever passed after the farmers of the country had been taken into the confidence of the government and their advice sought. For years the farmers have been privileged to take their wool to the various small mills or to have the dealers call at their farms and purchase the wool there, and in most instances these farmers have received a pretty fair price. Under this regulation, however, the wool may be sold only to some one who is in a position to grade it. Wool must be graded and the various grades designated, a report being made out, and the farmer is paid according to the various grades he has supplied.

There are thousands of farmers who have always looked upon their wool as a ready cash sale. Farmers have come to our plant, but we are not buyers of wool to-day because we are not prepared to set up a grading station, and most of the small woollen mills in the country are in the same position. The result is that the farmer is almost forced to-day to send his wool to the cooperative wool growers of Toronto. The name in itself is misleading. It is simply a name; it is not what one would think it would be, with the name, Cooperative Wool Growers Association. People send their wool there and receive part payment for it, and they have to wait a long time before they get their final returns. It is not a cooperative concern, as suggested by the name, in the sense that the farmer eventually gets paid in proportion to the profit made by the company. It is a privately-owned company.

In my office on Saturday morning was a farmer who had 1,500 pounds of wool. He had always taken his wool to one of the small mills or one of the larger ones in our territory. The larger mills now say they will not buy it because they would have to set up a grading station. There must be some one to grade the wool and designate the various grades, setting a price, and in that whole territory where there are many mills none of the mills will handle wool. In the old days the farmer took the wool to the mill. The mills that were making blankets would not grade the wool because they would put it into their blankets as it was. The farmer to-day is practically forced to send his wool to the cooperative wool growers of Toronto, take part payment and then wait for months for his final settlement.

We are so regulating and regimenting the farmers that they cannot sell or do anything without filling out a lot of forms and complying with various conditions which are rather ridiculous, and many of these regulations are made by men who have approached certain sections of business in the country without having a practical knowledge of what should be done. This has worked a great hardship on the farmer who raises anywhere from fifty to 2,000 pounds of wool. There are farmers with thirteen, fifteen twenty, thirty or forty sheep, and every time we make regulations such as these we force the farmers into the hands of those people who have been making money by farming the farmers. The sooner we do away with many of these regulations, the better it will be for the farmers. This regulation was ill advised, and it is certainly working to the detriment of those men who have a few sheep on their farms.

Mr. KIRK: The hon. member asked who had advised this legislation. I did not hear the minister's reply.

Mr. GARDINER: My reply was that the department was responsible for the provisions, but they were brought in after different organizations affected had been consulted.

Mr. KIRK: What organizations?

Mr. GARDINER: All purchasing organizations and farm organizations such as cooperatives, and the mills as well.

Mr. HOMUTH: Surely the minister does not say that there are farm organizations which make up the Cooperative Wool Growers Association?

Mr. GARDINER: There are in some parts of Canada, probably not in all.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister define and explain the respective provincial and federal fields in the grading of poultry and eggs? I ask this question because, while the grain rates to the consumer may be quite satisfactory, so far as the producer is concerned I am confident that they are not. I have heard a great deal of criticism, from many prominent poultrymen, of the method of grading eggs at country points. I have carried out some experiments to see whether that criticism was justified, especially in the rush season at the height of production. We have graded and candled a number of cases of eggs, put the culls in another case and shipped them all, and there was practically no difference in the returns on those cases, which convinced me that, in the rush season at any rate, returns are based upon average instead of upon individual shipments. Can the minister give us any information on that point?

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. GARDINER: The grading of eggs is carried on under exactly the same conditions as the grading of butter or any other farm products. If the product is produced in the province where it is finally disposed of, it is the responsibility of the provincial government. They can, if they desire, handle that product, and the federal government would have nothing to do with it. If, however, the product enters into interprovincial trade, then it becomes the responsibility of the federal government, and likewise if it enters into international trade.

In actual practice, in order to overcome the difficulties inherent in the federal system the provinces have been following the practice of appointing the federal inspectors as their inspectors, and it is the federal inspectors and graders who do the actual inspection and grading of the different farm products, including eggs, butter, wool and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Can the minister tell us what effect the size of the yolk has in the grading of eggs?

Mr. GARDINER: I should not like to try. We pay experts to do that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When one goes to a restaurant and gets eggs, he is never consulted about the size of the yolk. I had a letter the other day complaining about this. This lady said she took some eggs to market and was docked on the price because the yolks were too large. That is the first time I have heard of grading according to the size of the yolk.

Mr. GARDINER: If one waits long enough he will not need an expert to decide that question. As eggs become older, the yolks flatten out and tend to enlarge, and when the eggs get old enough you will not need an expert to tell you.

Mr. QUELCH: Who is responsible for checking up the egg graders in such plants as Burns, Swift's and other large buyers?

Mr. GARDINER: The federal government is responsible for checking what is done by those graders, although I understand we do not pay them. They are employees of the buyers.

Mr. QUELCH: What check is made on those graders? The opinion in the country is that these men are definitely working in the interests of the packers. Does the government check periodically the work of these men to see whether they are grading according to standard or are favouring the packing plant?

Mr. GARDINER: There are checks made on the work done by these men. Last year there were some four to five thousand inspections made. If the eggs are not properly graded they are detained by the government. I was trying to find out from the officials what might happen to the grader; I assume if he made too many mistakes, the company that engages him would deal with him, if the eggs graded by him were being detained by the government.

Mr. HOMUTH: By "detained by the government" does the minister mean that the government confiscates them?

Mr. GARDINER: They are detained until they are regraded, and of course loss of time and all that are involved.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood the minister to say that if an inspector made too many mistakes, the company would deal with him. What we in British Columbia are particularly interested in is—

Mr. HOMUTH: What side he made the mistake on.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If he came from Waterloo he would make a mistake no matter what he did. What I wish to know is what check is kept on these inspectors. As I understand the situation, a farmer in selling eggs is at the mercy of the company buying them as to what grade he gets, whether A1, or A2, or cracks, or whatever the grades are. Am I to understand that we have no inspectors in the federal department protecting the farmer on the grading of these private concerns?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I used the wrong term a moment ago. The graders are in the employ and under the control of the plant, but the inspectors are employees of the government. They move about from place to place; it is not always the same inspector who goes to a plant, but these inspectors inspect the work of the graders.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That being the situation, are there or will there be any inspectors under the federal government checking the plants and dealers in British Columbia on behalf of the farmers who are now at the mercy of private companies as to grades?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there are inspectors who will be checking the grading in the British Columbia plants.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They will then be instructed to do a little more checking?

Mr. QUELCH: I am aware that action has been taken with regard to grading of eggs so far as the consumer is concerned, but I have not heard of any action being taken on account of undergrading to the producer. I urge that closer inspection be made of the graders, and if it is found that they have been undergrading, instead of just detaining the eggs, I suggest that the graders should be fined, and fined more heavily if the practice is repeated. I am not making any criticism of hog grading, which, generally speaking, I have found satisfactory. In the past I think the trouble has been misunderstanding of weights rather than in grading. I have also no criticism of the grading of cream, but so far as poultry and eggs are concerned, I am satisfied that the whole thing is in a rotten mess and should be cleaned up.

Item agreed to.

28. Marketing service. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $13,000, $25,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: With regard to the marketing of pork, a short time ago a regulation was passed by order in council limiting the amount of pork available for consumption in this country to, I believe, 40,000 carcases a month. That, I understand, was done in order to make more pork available for export to Great Britain. If the pork is needed there, we should make it available. During the month of March, however ,there were 47,000 carcases consumed in Canada, and during April, 51,000. We have now limited the number to 40,000, and so far as I can find, we have made no provision to see where these 40,000 carcases are consumed. We are allowing the old law of supply and demand to operate. The result has been that in many of the city shops the price of pork has advanced by from three to five cents a pound. Are the government taking any steps to remedy this situation?

Mr. GARDINER: The situation is that last fall, as hon. members know, we undertook to deliver to the British government 425,000,000 pounds of Wiltshire sides. During the preceding year we had delivered about 330,000,000 pounds. We estimated that this year we would be able to deliver the 425,000,000 pounds, and therefore undertook to do so. Weekly deliveries during the winter months, beginning last October, ran very much higher than a year ago, and were even beyond the amount which it was estimated would be required to fill the new contract. It will be recalled that I announced in this house more than six weeks ago that this spring the British government asked us to complete our deliveries by an earlier date, which meant that we were required to deliver within the year about 28,000,000 pounds more than we had contracted to deliver.

Last year the United States price for live hogs averaged three cents below the Canadian price. There was a gradual advance in the United States price during the winter, and about the time we were asked to increase our deliveries, prices in the United States reached just about the Canadian level and hogs began to move into the United States at various points, particularly further west. The price in Alberta, for example, is lower than in other parts of Canada, because the freight rate increases as one goes further west, but the price on the United States side of the line, in Portland, Seattle and other places, is sometimes even higher than the Chicago price. As a result, it is only natural that hogs should go into the United States at those points, and also over the mountains to Vancouver. There is also a tendency for hogs to move to the United States from as far east as Winnipeg at a much earlier date than would be the case in the eastern part of this country.

It was very important that we should deliver the full quota to Great Britain this year, not only because they need it so much but because we wish to establish ourselves as people who deliver what we contract to deliver. During the period we were negotiating with Britain, which negotiations brought about the higher price put into effect a short time ago of 85 shillings per 112 pounds as against the 80 shillings we were receiving previously, it became necessary to take some action in this regard. We can only estimate the number of hogs that will continue to come on to the Canadian market during the year, and in order to make absolutely certain that we would be able to deliver the full quota that we had undertaken to deliver this year, it was decided by the bacon board to say to the people of Canada and to the packing houses, "We think we in Canada should be satisfied for the time being with the same amount of pork products that we consumed last year," and I might add that last year we consumed more pork products than in any previous year in our history. Therefore the level which has been set for this year for the consumption of pork products is equal to the highest level we have reached in our history. For the time being, then, we are saying to those who deliver pork products to the trade, "We want you to deliver only the amount you delivered in the corresponding week one year ago."

On that basis the amount of pork being consumed in Canada to-day is reduced, to a certain extent, below what it might have been if that regulation had not been imposed; and we are quite satisfied that under conditions as they now exist we shall be able to get along on that basis. But after the British price had been increased, the United States price continued to rise, and accordingly we added another 75 cents per hundred pounds of Wiltshire sides in Canada so that the price has been increased not only by the British government but also by the Canadian government. We are not certain how long we shall require to continue this regulation with regard to consumption in Canada, but it has been continued up to the present time.

Mr. WRIGHT: That does not answer the question I asked, which was whether the government were taking any steps to see that the consumers are protected while the amount of pork available is restricted.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, when you start to restrict the consumer you reach a point where you also restrict the producer with regard to the price he receives. After all, what the farmer gets out of the hogs he sells in Canada is the British price for the products sold in Britain plus the price received from the consumer in Canada, and those two prices are averaged in the proportion that these pork products are consumed in these two markets. About 64 per cent of our hogs are consumed in Britain and about 36 per cent in Canada; or, roughly speaking, about one-third in Canada and two-thirds in Britain. Therefore, if you increased the price of one-third of the hogs by three cents, and spread that increase over all the hogs consumed, it would mean an increase of one cent in the general price. I am not at all certain that we want anyone to step in and begin to control prices on our local markets too soon, at least in the interests of the producers of the hogs. Probably the Canadian people will accept the position, as I think it was accepted last night with regard to eggs, that we in Canada should be prepared to pay at least as much for the Canadian farm products we consume in Canada as the British are paying for them, and that in some instances we should be prepared to pay even more. Consequently I hope no one will start too soon to control prices of pork products or other commodities.

Mr. WRIGHT: The point is that the price the British are paying has risen by approximately $1 per hundred; the price being paid by the consumer in Canada has risen three to five cents a pound, yet the price the farmer receives has not gone up $1 per hundred.

Mr. GARDINER: If one were to examine the margin last year between the prices paid the farmer and the prices received by the packer, as against the margin this year, it would be found that the margin had been sufficiently narrowed to take care of more than the difference which has been indicated.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As a farmer in British Columbia I never had much experience with hogs until I became a member of this house. Since the question of eggs has been brought up again, I should like to say that last night I thought the minister gave a very fine statement, one which I was quite prepared to accept. He dealt with the agricultural situation in a way that I do not think could be equalled by any other man in Canada. In his argument as to the setting of a minimum price for eggs—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The item we considered yesterday is out of the way now. We are now on item 28, which has to do with the marketing of agricultural products. I am afraid the hon. member is out of order, because if he will look at page 72 of the estimates, where the details are given respecting this item of $25,000, he will find that there is no mention of the matter to which he is now referring.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you. May I ask the minister a question?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I presume that eggs are marketed as other farm products are marketed. Possibly my phraseology was wrong, and if it was, I shall have to correct it so that I may come within the bounds of item 28. Is any provision now being considered by the government to guarantee to the producer of eggs at least the minimum cost of production? If not, will it be considered? If so, will it be considered on the grounds taken with regard to butter? As I understand the situation, certain provinces have different prices set, on the ground that some provinces are exporters while others are importers of butter. In the setting of a minimum price for eggs, could it not be done on the assumption that some provinces are importers and some are exporters? Will any consideration be given to this question?

Mr. GARDINER: Just to clear up the point we are discussing under item 28, may I point out that this is the vote under which we advance or attempt to advance the sale of Canadian farm products outside Canada, and under which we carry on our advertising to further those sales. To the extent that we have entered into an agreement with Great Britain, or to the extent that we may have negotiations with Great Britain with regard to eggs, the matter may properly be discussed under this item. It is only to that extent that we are controlling the price of eggs in Canada at the present time.

During the month of May we shipped 180,000 cases of eggs to Great Britain. We have sold an additional 230,000 cases, to be delivered later in the season. The price basis of those eggs runs from sixteen up to twenty-two cents, depending upon the grade, and the type of egg being shipped. The fact that we are shipping out a very considerable part of the surplus does tend to set a minimum price; but up to date we have not gone beyond that in connection with eggs. As we go along, it may be necessary to take further action, but up to the present time we have not done so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the minister consider the price of sixteen to twenty-two cents a price equal to the cost of production, let alone profit?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member would have to tell me what farmer he is speaking about. I would not want to say.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall be delighted to tell the minister. I am speaking about the farmer from the Fraser valley. I appreciate what the minister has said, namely, that the taking over of the surplus automatically helps the Fraser valley, or any other poultry section in Canada. Am I, however, to conclude that the minister and his department are seriously considering paying a subsidy, or freight rates, or is he in some other way going to guarantee to the poultrymen exactly the same treatment as is being accorded to the wheat farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: The British Columbia government does bonus eggs to the extent of three cents a dozen, and that has the same effect on eggs as other bonuses at other points have in respect of the prices of other products. It is only on account of that bonus of three cents that they are able to handle eggs under the prices which prevail in connection with the British shipments.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I still have not obtained an answer to my question.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry, but I cannot answer that question without starting another discussion which would be entirely out of order under this item. I do not wish to get into that position.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I asked a question and I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I have already covered the question in the item which has just been passed. I do not wish to go back and discuss it all over again. I do not wish to be the one to start a discussion by answering a question.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why do we have this great reduction in the item for marketing agricultural products?

Mr. GARDINER: It is due to the fact that we are at war. The vote originally under this item was for $500,000. That was at a time whem we were trying to promote the sale of farm products in all European countries, Great Britain, south America and elsewhere. Since the war however, we have confined our activities largely to advertising within Canada, and to the negotiation of agreements with Great Britain. In view of the fact that the officials quite often come here, our expenses in connection with those negotiations are not as great as they formerly were.

Mr. HATFIELD: But we have lost the European market, and we have to look up new markets in south America and other countries to take their place. I should think it would cost more money to develop new fields than to look after the old markets.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister has not answered my question. What machinery has the government to ensure that the spread between what the farmer receives for his product and what the consumer pays is kept within reasonable bounds? At the present time the average price to the farmer is twelve cents a pound, dressed, while the consumer pays forty-five cents a pound for bacon and sixty cents a pound for ham. Every time the price the farmer receives rises half a cent, the price the consumer pays rises two cents. What is the reason?

Mr. GARDINER: The advance on dressed pork products has been from one and a half cents to three cents a pound, depending upon which part of Canada is involved. That is comparable with an increase in the price of from three to five or six cents a pound on the different cuts of pork. Therefore, if the increases in the prices of cuts going to the consumer range from three to six cents, they are just about proportionate to the increase which has taken place in the whole dressed product, which includes most of the cuts, and some which are not termed cuts at all.

Mr. WRIGHT: My question is not yet answered.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. GARDINER: The answer is that there is not any too wide a margin, so far as our check goes.

Mr. WRIGHT: The government has no machinery to ensure that that spread is kept within bounds; is that the answer?

Mr. GARDINER: The bacon board is the machinery that is there especially to check on the price, to keep track of what is happening all the way across Canada, and to make agreements with Great Britain which will be satisfactory to both producers and consumers in Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then the proper authority before which to lay complaints would be the bacon board?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Coming as I do from a beef and cattle district, I wish to say that our farmers have a bone of contention because when a farmer or drover ships cattle to the Toronto market, he is docked one dollar if the animal has a horn or a stub of a horn. What check has the federal Department of Agriculture on that practice? How is it that the packer is able to take that dollar and put it into his own pocket? Why should the dollar not be put into a fund to improve our live stock?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the packing houses, I think, which put that dollar on, but in the three western provinces the three provincial governments, as I understand it, confiscate the dollar, and I think Ontario was considering doing the same thing. My information is that up to the moment that has not been done in Ontario but is under consideration.

Mr. HATFIELD: Who advised the department as to the order in council passed on March 25 with regard to the grades of United States potatoes that are imported? The grade specified in the order in council does not exist in the United States. They have no such grade.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not so sure who advised the government in the first instance on the grading of potatoes, because that would be long before my time. Changes are made from time to time in the grades. That is done after consultation with provincial authorities and others interested in the trade, and any changes made are based on the knowledge of the department as to the growing of potatoes across the country. The advice would be obtained directly from officials paid for such a purpose.

Mr. HATFIELD: But the order in council of March 25 specified a grade in the United States which does not exist there. They have no such grade.

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that the officials in Washington have been consulted with regard to the matter. The whole matter has been discussed with them. While they have not at the moment the grades referred to in the order in council, it is their intention to have similar grades established.

Mr. HATFIELD: In the meantime, in the month of May, about 200 cars of these potatoes came in from the United States. Had they been grown in Canada, they would not have been permitted to be marketed.

Mr. GARDINER: I assume that the hon. member is referring to the new potatoes that come in early in the year, the small-sized new potatoes? I assume that is what he is complaining of, as he was this afternoon.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister should go a little further with regard to eggs. He answered a question last night and said that he had answered it to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Fraser Valley because the hon. member had gone out of the chamber. Evidently, however, he did not satisfy him. I think some definite action should be taken by the dominion government with respect to the price of eggs. To me there are many indications that Britain is going to require many more eggs in the future than she has taken in the past. I doubt if there is any place in the British empire more admirably adapted to the production of eggs than the area in which the hon. member for Fraser Valley lives. I do not see any reason why the minister should not set a minimum price for eggs, something like the price of twenty-two cents which was guaranteed in the United States until, I believe, 1942. If the minister does not feel it is wise to set a flat price of twenty-two cents, I do not see why he should not recommend subsidizing freight rates on wheat moving to British Columbia or subsidizing freight rates on eggs coming east.

Surely something should be done about eggs so that we may be sure of a production that will be equal to the demand which may be made upon us at any time. To-day we are in this position: If Britain should need greatly increased importations of eggs, naturally we are going to let her have the eggs, but why should we not now prepare to supply Great Britain with all she needs and still have sufficient for our own needs? In these days, eggs can easily be stored, and it seems to me a short-sighted policy to neglect production which would be stimulated by setting a minimum price. I should like to hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley tell us what he thinks would be a just minimum price for eggs. He asked whether sixteen to twenty cents would be—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is out of order for an hon. member to cross-examine another, so to speak, or to question him. The hon. member must address himself to the Chair and direct his remarks to the item under consideration by the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I am going to ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley through you, Mr. Chairman, if he will tell the committee what he considers would be a fair minimum price for eggs.

The CHAIRMAN: That is out of order.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): It is apparently becoming an indoor pastime in this chamber to break the rules of the house and be out of order, and therefore I wish to take about three minutes to be strictly out of order. Every time the group in the far corner talk for sixty minutes, Hitler is turning out in the Skoda works a sixty-ton tank. Whether some of us in this house know it or not, the people of Canada realize that we are wasting time in discussing matters of infinitesimal importance at a time when Canada and the rest of the empire are facing the greatest crisis in their existence. When the Suez canal is being bombed to-night, when Alexandria, Egypt, Malta, and Cyprus are in jeopardy, here we are, paid by the taxpayers, out of the money of the people of Canada, talking piffle, absolutely unadulterated piffle, in view of the crisis we are facing. These questions which hon. gentlemen are raising to-night can easily be discussed and settled in a democracy after the war is over. Just look at the headlines in the papers to-night. The one thing we need—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I called "order" before I rose in my place, and I repeat "order" to you. If you can add anything to what I say, you can follow me. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the duty of every member of this House of Commons is to do what he can to educate the people of Canada to war-mindedness, to the fact that it is not wheat and it is not marketing that is the one big question before us to-day. It is the very life of Canada and of the empire that is at stake to-day.

Mr. QUELCH: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Sit down until I finish. I have the floor. You sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): My hon. friend has had his chance.

Mr. QUELCH: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, what have the hon. members remarks to do with item 28?

The CHAIRMAN: The question before the committee is item 28 of the agriculture estimates. I have already drawn hon. members' attention to the necessity of adhering strictly to the rules in discussing the estimates. There is a certain difficulty in deciding whether the questions which have been put fall under the item under review, but there is a great deal of truth in what the hon. gentleman has just said, that unless we carry on our proceedings in orderly fashion, our preceedings will fall into disrepute and the house itself will fall into direpute with the public. We are gathered here to discuss the legislation which has been brought down for the consideration of members of parliament. I would, therefore, draw the attention of hon. members to the necessity of proceeding in an orderly manner. To do so, speeches must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Another rule of the house forbids the tedious repetition of the same question. The Minister of Agriculture has answered one question at least ten times. Repetition is out of order. When a minister has replied to a question, if his reply is not to the satisfaction of hon. members they have their remedy; they may vote against the item. But it is contrary to the rules continually to repeat the same question, because we must expedite within reason the work of the house. I am trying to do that. As Chairman, I am the servant of the committee. The House of Commons has passed rules and standing orders. It is my duty to apply them, and it is the duty of all hon. members to try to carry on discussions according to the rules and standing orders of the house.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): In view of the fact that I had the floor when you called me to order, Mr. Chairman, I wish to adhere strictly to the item of marketing, and I desire to say to my hon. friends that if they could market at a nickel a word the verbiage they have perpetrated on this house, they would pay off the national debt of the dominion without any difficulty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion it is out of order to cast any reflections on the manner in which any hon. member has behaved in this chamber in a debate. If any hon. member is out of order, it is the privilege of another hon. member to raise a point of order, but it is not in order to make a general reflection upon the procedure or upon the manner in which any hon. member behaves in this house.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I did not make a general condemnation. I made a direct reflection upon and condemnation of the time which is wasted in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Listen to me. Whether I am wasting time or not, I have the right to rise in my place here and say what I think.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. This is entirely beyond endurance. Some of us have been in this house practically all the time, but I have not seen the hon. member very frequently in his place. I suggest that we try to follow the rules.

The CHAIRMAN: May we say that the incident is closed, and that we are now on item 28 of the estimates.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest to hon. members that we proceed in an expeditious and orderly manner so that we may have the business of this house dispatched. I know nothing about agriculture; I admit that at once. Hon. members have some rights; but I submit there has been a great deal of repetition, which ought not to have occurred. Let us get on with the business.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, are we to understand that it is no longer in order to discuss the question of eggs? If so, we just want to know about it.

Mr. GARDINER: May I say that there is one rule which has not been referred to up to the moment? There is an orderly way of doing everything in the house. If we have passed an item which someone thinks ought to be discussed further, he can always move to revert to it. But so long as the item has been passed, and we have not reverted to it, I do not think anyone should bring the matter up and discuss it further. I might say that we stopped voting items last night because the hon. member for Lethbridge requested the right to discuss eggs, and he was to have discussed eggs on item 27. I do not know whether he was in the house when item 27 was under discussion, but that item was held last night to permit a discussion of eggs. We have now discussed eggs and have passed item 27, and are now at item 28. We discussed eggs last evening for about an hour; we have discussed them again to-night for about half an hour, and I think we should go on with the discussion of the items, seeing that the hon. members who were here did pass item 27.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is one thing which I think I should have the right to say, namely, that all day yesterday I had nothing to say on the items under consideration. Last night when I started to speak I was ruled out of order, and to-night, when we wish to discuss this matter, the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., has the effrontery to rise and point to us over here as though we were the people who were causing the delay. All hon. members are discussing these matters; we are entitled to discuss them. While we are on the question of wasting time, I should like to know why we are here in this chamber, if it is not to talk, and whether there is anything more important to discuss than the matter of agricultural prices. I have now said my say.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since this is the marketing item, may I say something which is not strictly in order. It is this, that those of us who knew Doctor William Allen, who was in charge of our marketing services in Great Britain, would like to record our appreciation of the work he did for this country and our regret at the loss of a faithful civil servant. To his widow and family we would express our deepest sympathy. Those of us who knew Doctor Allen in Saskatchewan and the pioneering he did in agricultural economics feel that at some point, at least, in the discussion of the branch to which he was attached, some of us from that province—probably had the minister thought of it, he would have taken the initiative himself—may appropriately give public expression to the regret we feel that this valuable civil servant was lost at sea on his way to resume his duties in Great Britain.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not wish to ask the minister any questions about eggs. I was here last night and purposely refrained from discussion. I wish, however, to make an observation and bring it to the minister's attention, it has to do with marketing eggs in Great Britain. Last fall, when eggs were selling in Canada for fifteen cents a dozen, people in Great Britain were paying eight cents each for the same kind of eggs. That cannot be helped now, but certainly the people in Britain who are being taxed to the limit, and particularly old people of scanty means, who may be on the old age pension, should not have to pay eight cents apiece for eggs which our farmers have sold for fifteen cents a dozen. I suggest that if there is any way to overcome a condition of that sort, it should be remedied.

Mr. CORMAN: Could the minister give the committee any information regarding the possibility of sales of canned tomatoes to Britain in the coming year?

Mr. GARDINER: At the present time a deal is being negotiated with Britain for 20,000 long tons of tomatoes.

In so far as the shipment of eggs to Great Britain is concerned—answering the suggestion made by the hon. member for Macleod—we have been discussing within the last twenty-four hours with representatives of the British government the marketing of eggs in Great Britain. As a matter of fact, those representatives were sitting in the gallery of this chamber last evening, listening to the discussions which were going on, and probably gathering considerable information. The representatives who are here have intimated to us that there is a reason why they cannot take Canadian eggs. It has nothing to do with price except that we have not suggested to them that they should pay more for the eggs than they are paying in some other places from which they get eggs. The real reason why they cannot take as many of our eggs as we should like them to take, or as they would like to take, is the question of shipping space. They have obtained eggs for a long term of years from China, and those eggs have come in dried form. But they are not able to get dried eggs from that source now. If we had drying plants in Canada to dry all the eggs we have, we could dispose of all the eggs we have in Canada as dried eggs which we are not eating ourselves, but we could not get a sufficient price for eggs in the dried form to equal that paid now.

Obviously there are problems of all sorts. They can take almost any quantity in the shipping space if they are dried, but in the form of fresh eggs which have to be put in cases and packed in the space required for shipping eggs in that form, there is a question in their minds whether they will take eggs at all for any considerable period of time. They bought 180,000 cases in May and contracted for another 230,000—and that means millions of eggs—but they did not say to us that they would like to contract for very many more at the moment. They are not sure whether their shipping space will be available, and if they contract for them they wish to take them. That all brings about difficulties in dealing with eggs at the present time.

I simply wish to add, to what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the statement that this is the item under which Doctor Allen was paid for his services during the time he was in the employ of the government. As hon. members know, he was a veteran of the last war. He had been seriously wounded in that war, and he accompanied the group which went to Britain last fall to make agreements with the British government. He returned to Canada and explained these agreements to the farmers throughout the country. When he was on his way back to his post in London the boat on which he was travelling was sunk and he lost his life. I wish to add to the tribute paid him by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar by stating that he was one of the most faithful and most experienced servants the department has had. He was born in England; he homesteaded in this country, lived on a farm, went overseas in the last war, came back from overseas and took a university course to qualify himself for agricultural work, went to the United States and took a post-graduate course, came back to Canada and served the farmers of Canada with that experience. There was no one in the service of the department whom it would have cost us more to spare at this time than Doctor Allen, and I regret very much the loss the department has sustained.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will any of this money be used in the marketing of maritime potatoes in central and south America and in south Africa?

Mr. GARDINER: Under the Minister of Trade and Commerce there was a mission to the West Indies and south America. It was under way earlier in the year, but, as we all know, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to return to Canada earlier than he expected. I understand he intends to go back, but the expense of those negotiations will not be under these estimates but under the estimates of trade and commerce.

Item agreed to.

29. Special. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $2,500,000.

Mr. PERLEY: There is no increase in this item. The item is a large amount, but there are no details. There is no page in the estimates to which we are directed for details. The minister might be well advised to give an outline of the work under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. He might tell the committee the programme for the coming season. I went to the auditor general's report in order to obtain a few details with regard to the operations of the last year, but I am sure the minister would not care to have me read all the comments in the report in connection with the work that has been done. I must leave it there because I do not want to take up the time of the committee. I will say, however, that a great deal could be said by way of criticism.

Yesterday the minister had a bill passed through the house in short order, and at his suggestion there was no particular discussion on it, because he said we might ask questions with respect to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act when we came to the item for that act. We refrained from discussion yesterday. The act gives the minister considerable power to undertake small projects up to $5,000, and I should like him to give an outline of what it is proposed to carry out this year and what he proposes to undertake under the act passed yesterday.

May I refer to another matter. Will he make a statement with regard to community pastures. I have a clipping from the Leader-Post in which it is said that there was to be a conference of community pasture managers. In the auditor general's report the statement is made that there are thirty or forty managers of community pastures, and there are only fifty-four community pastures in the west. That is out of proportion to the number of managers that could do the work. As the minister said on a previous item, the reason for a reduction of $75,000 this year was the war. We might take that to heart with regard to this work. We have a war on our hands, and it should be the minister's endeavour to curtail in every possible way expenditures on this work. It has been going on for the last six years, and I notice in the auditor general's report that there are thirty-one employees in the work drawing over $2,400 or more each, some as high as $4,000, one or two in the neighbourhood of $6,000, and their expense accounts run from $200 to $1,500 and, in one instance, to nearly $2,000. That is one thing I should like to impress upon the minister; we have a war on, and while this work may be essential in some respects, I think he could curtail to a great extent and save, I would suggest, maybe half a million or a million dollars this year on this work without doing any injustice to those interested or to the west generally. Would the minister give us a statement with respect to what projects he proposes to undertake during the coming season?

Mr. GARDINER: Regarding the statement that we might save on the total amount this year, I might say that we were spending about $3,500,000 a year before the war. Last year that was cut down by a million dollars, and this year we have voted the same amount as last. While we are not lowering the amount below what it was last year, we are cutting it by a million dollars a year during the war period to date.

The appropriation on water development for 1941-42 is $1,270,000. Out of that there is for administration, namely, salaries, travelling expenses, wages, rent, freight, express, communication, supplies, miscellaneous and equipment, $178,200. For small projects the amount is $301,800.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that smaller or larger than last year?

Mr. GARDINER: It is approximately the same, a little less.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does that include the community dam, small dams and dug-outs?

Mr. PERLEY: Water projects only?

Mr. GARDINER: Small water projects only. Then, in connection with larger projects, there is $58,000, covered in practically the same items as were covered for administration in connection with small projects. There is a total of $475,000 to be spent for the larger projects. For maintenance there is a total of $27,000. In connection with water storage there is $70,000 for administration and $30,000 for maintenance.

Mr. PERLEY: In giving these, will the minister state where the projects are?

Mr. GARDINER: These projects are at present only in the stage of being studied. I would rather not list them as absolutely authorized at present, because I am afraid that if they were published to-night as the names of projects we had undertaken to do, we might have to go ahead and do them, and some we might not wish to do after our examination is complete.

Mr. PERLEY: We are all going home next week—

Mr. GARDINER: I would not mind letting the hon. member look at the list, but I should not like to have names of projects published as having been authorized. There might be some that would not be proceeded with.

For surveys there is $60,000, making a grand total of $1,270,000 in connection with water.

The amount voted for land utilization for 1941-42 is $750,000. That vote has been increased, the vote for 1940-41 being $500,000. Land utilization administration amounts to $33,840; construction of community pastures and reserved grazing areas, fencing, irrigation and so forth, $320,660. Management and operation of community pastures amounts to $104,500. This is the item to which I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was referring in connection with costs of management. These pastures are operated under grazing boards that are set up in the community. The manager is appointed by the government, and is the secretary of the board. But fees are collected in those pastures for the placing of live stock in them, and although this is not true of each one of them individually, taking all the pastures there has been a surplus of fees over the costs of management.

Mr. PERLEY: How many pastures are there?

Mr. GARDINER: I think fifty-four at present. The policy in connection with the larger pastures is that a manager is in charge of each one. He has charge of the cattle or live stock in the pasture; he is charged with the breeding policy, and in the case of some, there is a marketing policy associated with the organization which he also conducts for them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is his salary?

Mr. GARDINER: The salaries range around $25 to $35 a month; they are not all the same. Just as there has to be a man to run a farm, there has to be one man at each of these pastures who has charge of the live stock for the year.

Mr. PERLEY: Employed by the year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He is paid by the government?

Mr. GARDINER: He is paid out of the fees, but if there were a deficit it would be paid by the government. There is, however, usually a surplus.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The pastures are used by the people of the district?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; we take first the group of farmers in the first row of the section, add those in the second row and so forth until we get enough owning sufficient stock to occupy the pasture. Those men form themselves into an association and determine among themselves how many stock each one is allowed to place in the pasture.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The control of the pasture is in the hands of the association?

Mr. GARDINER: Except that the government pays the manager. He is the secretary of the board, and he really is an official of the government, and keeps a check on what is going on.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is he chosen by the association or appointed by the government?

Mr. GARDINER: He is appointed by the government.

Mr. PERLEY: How does the percentage of cattle in the pastures last year compare with the percentage the year before? Was there an increase or a decrease?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the comparative lists. In any event, I am afraid they would not be useful because the number of pastures last year was much greater than the number the year before. The total number of live stock pastured last year was: cattle, 15,549; horses, 7,109; sheep, 646; or a total of 23,304.

I find I have the figures. The increase over last year was 11,382. That is, the number was about doubled.

Mr. PERLEY: What percentage of increase in the number of community pastures?

Mr. GARDINER: From thirty-eight to fifty-four.

Mr. PERLEY: It just ran about the same, then?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, about the same. As a matter of fact, when we set up the pastures there was a regulation to the effect that only a certain number of farmers would be allowed in, until there was enough live stock to take up two-thirds of the capacity of the pasture; then, before more cattle, horses or other live stock could be added to that number, the committee had to agree to the increase, and also had to agree on how the distribution of that increase should be made. In the beginning we insisted that only enough farmers to supply two-thirds of the live stock that could be maintained by the pasture would be allowed in, in order that the people coming along later, after the scheme was under way, could increase the live stock on the different farms in the community; and there would be some increases at some points as a result of action being taken to make that possible.

The next item is the purchase of land, land sales and records, $75,000. That is a decrease from the previous year, when the figure was $110,000. Then we supplied bulls to these pastures, in the same way that we supplied them to clubs under other policies, and the amount allotted for this item is $15,000. Reestablishment of farmers amounts to $50,000. There is no provision for federal relief this year, nor was there any provision last year. Previously we had to pay some relief in connection with persons whom we were moving out of sub-marginal areas into other districts.

Then seed purchase and preparation, cultivation and harvesting operations on lands being irrigated by large projects, amounts to $100,000. That is, when these irrigation projects are started we have followed the practice of operating some of these lands during the first year and seeding them down to alfalfa, so that this land could be used by farmers as pasture land as soon as they took over the property. We have also seeded grain crops on some of the land, harvested them and, in some instances sold the grain. These lands are always sold to farmers on the basis of $10 an acre, under agreements which really never come to a final conclusion. In other words, the government always owns the land; the last payment is never made, and consequently the government is always in a position to prevent persons from getting control of all the lands and giving them a speculative value. Then there is grass seeding of community pastures; $20,000 in the Swift Current experimental farm district; $20,000 in the Scott district; $10,000 in the Indian Head district and $1,000 in the Brandon district, making a total of $51,000.

The headquarters administration item of $105,000 is made up as follows: administration of the Ottawa office, $9,500; administration at Regina, $45,000. This year there is nothing provided for the expenses of advisory committees; if they are called in, we shall have to make provision for those expenses out of the money that is not allocated. Aerial surveys amount to $500; last year the amount was $3,000. Economic surveys amount to $44,000; entomological surveys, $6,000.

Then come the cultural activities, namely experiments in research, including cooperative assistance to the prairie provinces in soil surveys and research, assistance to agricutural improvement associations, soil moisture and soil drifting, conservation projects, grazing surveys, the publication of experimental data and so forth, made up as follows: cultural publications and administration; publication of farmers' circulars, bulletins, and so forth, $29,300; district experiment sub-stations and reclamation stations, $130,125; grass investigations and coverage and range surveys, $30,645; tree planting, $39,065; soil research and soil survey, $68,155; agricultural improvement associations and soil drifting control, $54,000; cultural work on irrigation projects, $17,110; live stock surveys and sheep development, $6,600. We have nothing allotted for reestablishing centres for pure seed grain production this year. That gives a total of $375,000, and this makes up the total expenditure.

Mr. DONNELLY: This act applies particularly to the district from which I come. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was instituted primarily for the purpose of assisting the people in the dried-out sections of western Canada. After four or five dry years, many people throughout the country, including many members of this house, said, "Well, that part of the country never should have been farmed; the people never should have been settled there at all, because it is not fit for farming." Even in that district we had people saying, "Probably the government made a mistake in asking us to come into this country and farm." Speaking in this house towards the end of the session of 1933-34, when the Conservative government was in power, I mentioned this situation and advised the government to make a thorough survey of that section of the country in order once and for all to settle the question of whether or not that area was fit for farming. If it was found to be unfit for farming, I suggested that they should move the people out of that district to some other part of the west. On the other hand, I said, that if that area was suitable for farming, then the government should go there and show the people how they should farm it.

I was, and still am, one of those who believe that that area should be farmed, that it was a good farming country. It is bound to have dry years; it has had them in the past and will have them again, but I was in that district for twenty years and had better crops there than I had in other parts of the west. It is true that for the last ten years we have had crop failures there, and we shall probably have them again, but I advised the former government that if this area was found suitable for farming, they should save every bit of water so that not a drop from that dried-out area would flow into Hudson bay or the gulf of Mexico. I said that we should keep all the water there, in order that we might have crops, because there is nothing wrong with that part of the country except lack of water. I said that we should dig dams and build reservoirs; that we should put in dug-outs and commence irrigation. Then I said that we should prevent soil drifting by strip-farming; that we should conserve the snow, and gather it together. We should plant trees so that the snow may drift round them. We should put fibre back into the soil by having our people sow grass in different sections.

The result of this was that in the next year, 1935, Mr. Bennett put into effect the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He procured a site for a dam at Valmarie, and one at Eastend, and began operations there. Operations under the act have been continued ever since. It has been a great work and has done a great deal of good. We have learned many things, and particularly with regard to water. I claim that the great thing in connection with the holding of water is, in fact, the small thing. That is to say, the small dam, the little dug-out on the individual farm does more good than anything else. Anyone who has lived on a farm and who has hauled water four or five miles to water his stock knows what a great benefit it is to have water right at hand. These little dams and dug-outs give the farmer that water. They also enable him to irrigate a small piece of land, even if it is only a quarter of an acre, so that he may have a garden and grow a few vegetables. That does more good than anything else—more good, even, than the big dams.

We know that we have big irrigation schemes, but my opinion is that they are good only for purposes of show-window display. They show the farmer what can be done by irrigation. But if western Canada is going to depend upon irrigation, then the future of western Canada will not be very bright. That is all I have to say about the matter. All that the big dams and big irrigation schemes do is to show the farmer what can be done by irrigation. It shows them how to go to work in the making of small dams and small irrigation projects on individual farms. Those small dams are good things; they are the things which are of great benefit to the farmer. I heard someone say in the house the other night that the building of community dams, and that sort of thing, had developed into a racket. So far as my district is concerned, it was not a racket. I do not know whether I have an honest electorate or an intelligent electorate, but I know that we had no racket in this connection; nor have we had any of the bigger community affairs.

We have no big irrigation schemes. My district is in the very centre of the dried-out area, and yet we have not had those big schemes. We have no big dams. We have small irrigation schemes put in by the individual farmers. We have many small dams and dug-outs, but they have all been constructed by the farmers themselves. They are not drag-line propositions at all. None of them had cats and tumble-bugs to pull stuff out of the bottom of the dug-out. This was all done by the farmer with horses.

I should like to see more of these small systems. Then, practically all the better farmers in the district are doing strip-farming. Fifty per cent of our land is under cultivation and is sown to seed, and 50 per cent of it is summer-fallowed.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member will not be in on the bonus this year.

Mr. DONNELLY: No. I might say that most of our farmers are sowing their grain, much the same as they did in other years. They are not reducing their acreage. They believe it is better to have wheat stored on their farms than to have nothing growing. They would rather have three or four thousand bushels in their granaries, in case we have another dry year.

Next we come to the matter of tree planting. All hon. members will realize that tree planting is of great importance. We have many men in western Canada who are familiar with the subject. I still believe, however, that a great mistake has been made in connection with the planting of trees on the bald prairies from which I come. In the first place, the wrong kind of trees have been planted, and, in the second place, they have been planted in the wrong places. When a farmer in western Canada builds his house he builds it on the highest part of his farm, but that is the very worst place to plant trees. Invariably, however, the farmer plants the trees round his house, so that they may serve as a wind-break. He should, in my opinion, plant his trees in the lowest spot on his farm. He should plant them down in a draw, so that the trees could catch and hold the snow, and thereby develop a place where he could have a garden. The farmer, however, plants his trees on the top of a hill, where it is more difficult to catch the snow because of the action of the wind. The snow is blown away and does very little good and, in that position, the trees can do very little to hold the snow. They are only something to look at.

I say, too, that the kind of tree which has been planted is wrong. Invariably the farmers plant trees which grow quickly, and they have shown a preference for Manitoba maples and poplars. Those trees grow their roots close to the top of the ground, they do not develop a tap root. The result is that in the event of an early spring, and a spell of fine weather, the snow melts; the trees—possibly because of tree instinct—imagine that the summer has come, and the sap goes up into the branches. Then, during the night cold weather may come back; the thermometer may drop, and the tree is frozen, splits and dies.

Not only that, but trees of that kind take moisture from the top soil, and in dry years many of them die. I have seen dozens and dozens of beautiful hedges die out in dry weather on account of lack of moisture. If we would plant trees with tap roots, roots that go down straight into the ground, we would find that they would not be so quickly affected by the fine weather. The few warm days would not get down to the depth reached by the tap root. The result is that the sap would not come up until later; the tree would not be frozen and would not split. If we planted trees like the caragana, we would have much better results, because we know how well it grows, and the manner in which it develops its tap root. The same applies to the elm. It grows well in my section of the country. We need trees with tap roots which would go down into the ground, and live there even in dry weather, when trees living nearer the surface would be dried up and would die.

Then we have the other proposition, namely, the planting of grass, with the object of putting fibre back into the soil, and thereby preventing soil drift. Added to all that, we have had the project for the development of pastures. That is a good work. It has taken out of cultivation land which should never have been cultivated, and put it back into pasture. I commend the government for the work it is doing along these lines, although it requires some supervision. I hope to see the work continued, despite the fact that we are in the midst of a war. This is a development which is helping the farmer, and which has brought about a great change in the country. I hope it will be continued.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member who just resumed his seat has expressed my sentiments, although I would not agree with him in all he has said respecting irrigation. Possibly he has not had enough experience in that regard to appreciate its value. May I express my warmest approval of the minister's ideals in connection with rehabilitation work. So far as I have seen, I believe that his work has been well done, and that it will stand for generations after we are gone. Certainly it will greatly benefit western Canada.

Like the hon. member for Willow Bunch, I have great faith in the west, but it must be borne in mind that much of that land is in what is known as the Palliser triangle and probably should never have been settled. But now that it is settled, I do not believe in quitting. I believe that if we go forward with faith and put forward the amount of effort we need to put forth, we can make of that area one grand asset to the Dominion of Canada. The amount of money which is being voted here is not enough. I should have been glad to see the minister bring down an appropriation of $4,000,000, and I would gladly have supported such a vote.

May I go on to urge that the minister continue to develop the larger areas of irrigation too? The dug-outs are suitable for certain areas. Indeed, I believe that each of the other activities in which the department is engaging and spending money are all good for the areas where they are. But there are some areas where it is not difficult to put a quantity of water out on land, which is fertile, and with a climate that is excellent, to develop a region where fine homes can be built which will be a joy and satisfaction to the minister and those associated with him as long as they live to see that good thing.

I wish once more to express my entire approval of the minister's plans and of the way he has worked them out, and to urge him not to be influenced by those who are talking too much economy. After all, let us remember that this war is perhaps only in its beginning. If so, we are going to need all the production that Canada can muster, perhaps long before this war is over. If it so be that we shall be blessed with an early termination of the war, we shall have these projects there; they will be good, and we shall manage somehow to raise the money to do the other things that are necessary.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the condition of Long lake within my constituency. It is not for the reason that it is so situated that I bring it to his attention. It is one of the largest lakes in southern Saskatchewan and it is of importance to the people of the province as a whole. It has located on its shores several fine summer resorts. Its fishing industry is of considerable importance. It is a reservoir of many hundreds of square miles. It has been receding over a period of years, and in the last year or so, in an alarming degree. This is one place where expenditures could well be made in order to ensure that that lake shall not dry out and that moisture shall be conserved. I would ask the minister to let the committee know just what is being done in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: Long lake is situated, as many members of the committee know, almost directly north of the city of Regina, perhaps thirty miles north, and there are on that lake a number of summer resorts as the hon. member for Lake Centre has indicated. The lake is about seventy miles long and varies in width. It is one of the largest storage basins in the settled section of Saskatchewan and has been under consideration in this house on quite a number of occasions. Many years ago it was used for navigation. A boat ran the seventy miles north, carrying passengers and freight up and down the lake. At that time there was a dam built on the Qu'Appelle river just to the south and east of the lake. That dam was constructed in such a manner as to catch the water when it came down in the spring of the year and force it into Long lake. Then, during the summer months, for a considerable part of the time the water was allowed to run out of the lake again and down through the valley. The government of Canada has had one or two lawsuits as a result of having changed the course of the water and raised the water levels—

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask if the Qu'Appelle river had a branch flowing into Long lake?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; the natural flow of water did take that course. It ran into the lake in the early part of the season, and, as well, water was fed into the lake from all round. When the water reaches a certain level it starts to run out again down the Qu'Appelle. But the dam which was put in made that operation more effective than it was before. The dam has raised the water approximately six feet above the original level through forcing the water in.

There was a lawsuit many years ago by reason of the flooding of lands at the end of the lake for the purpose of making it possible to run the boat to which I referred, and the government as a result of the lawsuit had to pay $50,000. Later on, there was another lawsuit because the people below were not able to get water on to their hay lands at the proper time of the year. The water came down in June and, instead of helping to produce hay, helped to produce foxtail. The operation of the dam was accordingly changed to let the water come down in greater volume in the spring of the year, and ever since that change in the operation of the dam, the level of the lake has gradually been going down. During the drought years it has gone down to six feet below the level of the stream itself from the Qu'Appelle river into the lake, from which the water comes in, part of the time. An effort is being made so to operate the dam as to raise the level to some extent, but I am afraid that as a result of our experience, the effort may not be successful until we have years of greater precipitation than we have had in the last three or four or even ten years, during which period there has been a receding of these waters. Nevertheless the water has been running into that lake.

There have been some other things done on the river which affected the amount of water which comes in at least in the early part of the year, after these works were constructed. A dam was put across the Qu'Appelle river up where Moose Jaw creek enters the Qu'Appelle, directly north of the city of Moose Jaw. The water from Moose Jaw creek, if I understand the location of the dam, remains in that lake. That is what is known as Buffalo lake, and the drainage from the west that comes down the Qu'Appelle and down from the north from all the streams in that area also runs into that lake. Up to the present time this year there has not been the volume of water come down from Buffalo lake which came down before, and probably that has had some effect on the amount of water which has gone into Long lake this spring.

My view is that the amount of water which passes Buffalo lake this year and perhaps for some succeeding years will not affect greatly the level of Long lake. But we shall have to have a few years experience to learn to what extent that is true. It is not impossible to let the amount of water come down which would have naturally come down, and to let it come down over a longer period of time, because the dam can be so operated at the end of Buffalo lake as to make it possible for that water to come down the Qu'Appelle and be run into Long lake through the operation of the dam at Craven.

That is the position at the moment. The committee which has been appointed by the summer resorts on the lake has been working on the problem, and I am to meet them when I go west after the session, discuss the matter further, and decide on any works that may be necessary to control the water in the interests of all the people living in that area.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister outline briefly his programme with regard to the building of small dams? I understand that the department has a number of old applications before it to be dealt with. Is it the intention to accept new applications, and what will be the price paid? The minister will appreciate the fact that under the new agricultural policy there will be a swing back to the raising of stock. A great deal of new land will be used for pasture, land which to-day has no access to water, and it will be necessary that provision be made for the construction of dugouts on this new pasture land.

Mr. GARDINER: In so far as the dug-outs for which there has been application in the past are concerned, our present intention is to make a survey of those which have been actually passed and arrangements for the digging of which have been made, and to have those passed first; and if they take up the amount of money which is available, that will be all that will be proceeded with this year. I am, however, under the impression that a considerable amount of the appropriation will be left after we have dealt with these, and then we shall take the applications in the order that they come in from that time on, in order to have dug-outs constructed on the different farms. I may say that it is the intention, unless we are otherwise advised or convinced by the advisory committee, to insist upon getting back to the method which was outlined by the hon. member for Wood Mountain, and which he says has been followed largely in his constituency, namely, of having these dug-outs constructed as far as possible by the farmers themselves.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it possible to obtain the services of the inspectors or engineers to advise as to the construction of these dug-outs in the event of its not being possible to get financial help in the digging of them? Can a farmer get this expert advice and go ahead with the work even though he is not paid for it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. When farmers make application for engineering advice with regard to the building of dams or the construction of dug-outs on their land, we give that engineering advice free. We prefer, of course, that the farmer should do the work without assistance from the government. In most instances—I would say in 90 per cent—the farmer, because others are getting assistance, insists on having it too, and assistance for construction to the extent of four and a half cents a yard on the moving of earth is given in those instances.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask the minister a question about another phase of prairie farm rehabilitation work. I refer to the soil surveys. I believe that that work should be continued and extended into the northern area of Saskatchewan, and, perhaps, some re-surveys should be made. Probably one of the most valuable services which has been done to western Canada is the soil survey. Had we had information available earlier as to types and locations of various soils, we might have avoided many of the errors which were made in settlement in past days.

I mentioned this evening Doctor William Allen, who together with Doctor Hope made an economic survey of parts of Saskatchewan. I believe that an attempt is now being made to relate the surveys of these gentlemen to the soil surveys which were largely supervised by Doctor Mitchell. I am wondering to what extent the work is proceeding and to what degree the officials who are undertaking this work in the capacity of soil scientists are within the department. Are they yet temporary employees, or are they now a part of the civil service? I believe they are doing a very valuable work not only for our province but for the entire west. I should like to see the soil survey made a definite branch of the service and every encouragement given to continue and extend these surveys. I have in mind at the moment the possibility that after the war other people will desire to go on the land. We have not, so far as we know, a great deal of good land now available for settlement; but we have a great deal of land, and if it were classified, and analyses made so that we would know for what it is best suited, we might be able to find homes for people who might not be able to find them for themselves.

One of the finest services performed for the province of Saskatchewan and for western Canada, has been done under the supervision of Doctor Mitchell, of the university of Saskatchewan. I should like the minister to say a word about this matter, if he would.

Mr. GARDINER: Soil survey work has been going on in western Canada, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar knows, for quite a number of years. It has been a cooperative effort as between the federal government and the provincial governments. Mr. Wyatt in Alberta and Mr. Ellis in Manitoba have charge of the work there, operating through the universities. In Saskatchewan the system has been worked on a rather different basis from that in the other two provinces. After the last war we had a considerable amount of money derived from overages from wheat. The overage fund was turned over to the three provinces. Saskatchewan set aside from its share of the fund about a quarter of a million dollars, and ever since 1926 they have been using the interest derived from that fund for soil survey work. All the province has been covered by that survey, and, in addition, there has been a survey of precipitation over the whole province. A map has been made covering the soil survey; a new map is in process of being made in which the moisture condition as related to the soil condition is mapped as well, and one can get a very full knowledge of the condition of any area by examining that map.

As a result of these surveys, there has been set up in the various provinces systems under which an attempt has been made to get people off sub-marginal lands. In Alberta they have their special areas. They have been working at this scheme since 1922, and probably more people have been moved off sub-marginal lands in Alberta than in the other two provinces.

Since this particular plan has been put into effect, and since we have adopted the practice of setting up pastures on sub-marginal lands, we have taken approximately a million acres of land out of cultivation or out of the control of individual farmers and put it into these community pastures. By this means, about a million acres have been taken out of possible cultivation for the growing of grain. The position in relation to that is that we are spending about $68,000 out of this vote on that soil survey work. The provinces are going on with the work which they have been doing, as well. The universities are associated with us in this activity, and we are hopeful that within a comparatively short period we shall have a complete knowledge of the soil condition of all the settled portions of the three provinces.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before this item carries, may I observe that the discussion has been almost entirely from the point of view of western Canada. Those of us from the east have great sympathy for the west. We in Nova Scotia have special reasons to feel sympathetic because so many of our people went out west and helped to build up that section of the country. But we in the east, too, have farm problems, and to us it is staggering what sums of government money have gone into the west for the benefit of agriculture, in comparison with what has been expended in the east.

At the head of the bay of Fundy we have a problem as great or greater than any now facing the west, with regard to water control. Ours, however, is the problem of too much water, rather than that of conserving it. The figures I have secured indicate that under this heading of farm rehabilitation, there has been expended up to the end of the fiscal year, 1940, $9,794,597. There was appropriated for the fiscal year 1940-41, $2,500,000; I am not sure whether the minister made a statement as to what amount was actually expended.

This vote is for a further expenditure of $2,500,000. This programme provides for 31,089 smaller water-control projects, a few of which have not yet been undertaken, and, in addition, sixty-three large projects. There are extensive irrigation undertakings; there are community pastures, grass seeding, soil survey, pasture survey, prevention of soil drifting, tree planting, moving people from one section to another. Many, many millions of dollars have been expended in the west to assist the growers of grain. We have had before us this year an appropriation of $35,000,000 to restrict the growing of wheat, or to bonus people for not growing wheat.

In eastern Canada we have rich areas of alluvial soil at the head of the bay of Fundy, as rich as any in all Canada, soil that attracted our earliest settlers, three hundred years ago. Such land had a selling value up to $150 and $200 an acre fifty years ago. It was the most attractive possession a man or woman could have as an investment. This property is to-day hardly worth owning except to those who are able to use it in their farming operations and who work it with their own labour. That is due to the reduction in the value of the crops in relation to the cost of harvesting, the great reduction in yield and the quality of the crops.

The tides are up to sixty feet in height at the head of the bay of Fundy. Many of the dykes built by pioneer settlers to protect these rich lands have broken down, and the lands are flooded. They have not been re-built because the owners of the property have not received returns of sufficient value to enable them to keep these dykes in repair. They have not been able to keep the canals open and ditch the marshes, with the result that tens of thousands of acres of our richest lands are becoming valueless. There are dykes broken down, aboideaux washed away, water courses filled up, and large areas flooded. That is the condition in the east, at the head of the bay of Fundy in the constituency of the Minister of Finance, in Colchester, in Hants, in my own constituency of Cumberland, in Westmorland, in Albert county. If the government is spending $15,000,000 on farm rehabilitation and the construction of more than 31,000 water-control projects, irrigation works and so forth in the west, something should be done for eastern Canada, and there should be an appropriation to assist owners of marsh lands in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I appeal to the minister and ask him if a small portion of the vote now before the committee could not be appropriated for assistance in controlling water, protecting and draining these very rich marsh lands at the head of the bay of Fundy in eastern Canada.

I am not objecting to what is being done for western Canada, but what the farmers and farm owners in eastern Canada have been receiving is not a drop in the bucket compared with the moneys that have been provided by parliament to assist owners of land and growers of grain in western Canada.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. GARDINER: I would not wish to get into a discussion to-night on the amount of money spent east or west in connection with agriculture, but I have seen the dykes in the bay of Fundy, and I know they must have served a good purpose at one time. In some instances they still serve a good purpose, but there are others which I have seen in a state of disrepair which would make it necessary to do something about them. I do not know whether the responsibility lies here or elsewhere; I have not acquainted myself fully with the facts. I am informed that at least some of the money which was put into the construction of dykes in the early years was put up by the federal authorities. I have not looked into the facts in that regard, but I know there are many works along the streams and inlets in the eastern part of Canada upon which expenditure is being made, not by this department but by the Department of Public Works and other departments.

So far as expenditures in western Canada are concerned, they do not apply to all the west, but apply only to what is generally known as the drought area. Roughly speaking, a line is drawn about that dried-out area, and expenditures are made south of that line. For example, we do not make expenditures up in the Peace River country or in the northeastern part of Manitoba or in the extreme north of Saskatchewan. The line starts down in the neighbourhood of Winnipeg and runs in a northerly direction. It crosses the Alberta boundary where the Saskatchewan river crosses and then runs in a southerly direction to the Rocky mountains through Alberta. Therefore this is not an expenditure which is made throughout western Canada but is only in the area where the people have been suffering greatly from drought. As a matter of fact, it is made largely in the area which we did not throw open to settlement until after 1908.

Many of the lands in that area were used by the federal government until 1931 when they were turned back to the western provinces. During the regime of the previous government a commission was set up to investigate the matter, and it was reported at that time that somewhere in the neighbourhood of a figure which has been submitted to-night as having been spent on these activities—$10,000,000, if I remember rightly—was devoted to the purpose. The commission decided that about $6,000,000 is due to Saskatchewan and a similar amount to Alberta. Four million dollars has already been paid to Manitoba as a result of investigations made. These amounts were considered to be due to these sections because of the balance between expenditures made by the federal government and amounts obtained by the federal government out of the sale of land and the disposal of land generally in the west. Consequently the balance is not all against the area in which these activities have taken place. Lands of the west were partly homesteaded, partly given to the railways to get them constructed across Canada, and sold in part to settlers who went in. That was not done in any other part of Canada. There is, therefore, in connection with the whole matter a problem involving many questions which I would not wish to discuss under this item.

We have been doing something to assist in connection with soil surveys in the eastern provinces on much the same basis as we have done in the west.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): In conjunction with the provincial department?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, in cooperation with the provinces and the university staffs, by the making of grants. The other part of the work we have not done. We have not done it either in the east or in British Columbia or in the northern sections of the three western provinces. It is confined largely to what are known as the drought areas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to say a word in commendation of the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Cumberland. The locality to which he refers is not in my part of the province, but I spent five years in the immediate vicinity when I was going to school and am thoroughly familiar with it. In the last decade of last century, the nineties, there was no more prosperous part of eastern Canada, from the point of view of agriculture, than that part known as the Tantramar marshes. That statement is also true with respect to Grand Pré and other places in the counties of Kings and Annapolis in Nova Scotia. Their wealth was due to their productivity in hay and coarse grains. The lands have been protected over many years by these artificial barriers against the sea which were maintained under statutory authority by elected commissioners, I think in most instances under the control of the property owners themselves.

I well remember when I was going to school at Sackville marvelling at the number of carloads of beef cattle annually sent to the Halifax and Saint John markets from that community, many of them for the export trade to England. That has now to a large extent disappeared; just why, I have often wondered. I have made inquiry from landowners with regard to it, and they tell me that one of the great blows to the prosperity of the country was the advent of the internal combustion engine, the loss of the market for the hay that came from the cultivated parts of those marshes, and the gradual loss of profit in the production of beef cattle. The result has been exactly as the hon. member for Cumberland stated.

We have in our community in the county of Sunbury and the county of Queens on the east side of the river St. John a comparable situation. We have the large plains of the St. John valley, the big alluvial deposits there and a large island section in the river. I remember that one of the first investments I ever made was in an island lot in the river St. John, from which I annually sold the standing grasses, and which fortunately for me I disposed of before the deluge came.

There is no doubt that there has been a great depreciation in the capital values of those lands nearly all of which were owned by the farmers. The minister has stated, mostly fairly I think, the situation of the west, and I sympathize with the condition he has delineated there. I am going to make a suggestion to the minister. Would he, and could he out of this vote or some vote in these estimates, send some scientific man or engineer to look over the whole position in the counties of Albert and Westmorland in New Brunswick and Kings, Cumberland, Annapolis and Colchester in Nova Scotia, with a view to establishing perhaps a policy in conjunction with the provinces—because I believe the provinces have an obligation also to do something to reestablish the fertility and wealth of a very large acreage of land which is unquestionably productive but which needs this protection from the sea water? It requires the rebuilding of dykes in certain places and drainage in and out of the sea. I do not think the amount of money required would be so very large The reason why it has not been done is the loss of profit from the product of these areas. Therefore the suggestion that occurs to me on the spur of the moment is that the minister's department interest themselves to the extent of sending a man this summer to make a survey of the whole position with a view to evolving some plan whereby the land would be reclaimed to a degree at all events, not only for the present owners but for future generations. I think something could be done. At all events, it would be a splendid gesture to the people of those counties. If the minister could see his way to divert even a few hundred dollars for a survey, then the whole situation could be considered at a later date. I am sure the hon. member for Cumberland, the hon. member for St. John-Albert, the minister who represents a very large area, and the hon. member for Colchester-Hants, would lend all the assistance they could in the way of showing the locality, perhaps driving the engineer round and interesting him in the problem, because it is a very real one.

All I would venture to ask of the minister to-night is that he take some money out of one of these votes and have a preliminary survey made. Then the whole problem could be considered and, if possible, some plan evolved which would save the situation. Time is, I think, somewhat of the essence. Unless something is done to protect these dykes, the whole country will sooner or later be inundated. I invite the minister to give his serious consideration, after the close of the session, to the suggestion I have made.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the former government and, I am sure, the present government have guarded jealously the expenditure of this money as to the areas in which it is to be expended. It is most difficult even to propose getting outside that area, and I quite understand why that should be the situation. The federal government naturally did not wish to expend moneys on lands which are largely under the control of the provinces, apart from the areas where they felt some responsibility for having induced people to go in during a time when it was questionable whether it should have been settled.

I question whether we should or can do anything with this other problem. We have experimental farms at Fredericton and Nappan, and the staffs there worked along with the provincial authorities in making a survey of the very problem which has been raised here. We have had a committee working on it; a preliminary report has been made, and the report so far as it has been made would indicate that there are certain difficulties, which will be understood by both hon. members who have spoken. One of the difficulties is an economic one arising out of the change in conditions. The time when these marshes were giving the greatest returns was when cattle were being produced in much greater numbers than now. There are two problems: one, that of reconstructing and maintaining the dykes, and the other, that of what would be done with the land as against what was done with it in days when it was most profitable, namely, the growing of hay and grasses for cattle. Whether we can get back to that or develop some other kind of agriculture upon these lands is one question. I may be wrong in this. I have not discussed it with any of the authorities; I only say it because of what was said to me when I was there looking it over a few years ago. My understanding is that there is a condition in that soil which makes it peculiarly suited to growing certain kinds of grasses, and the fact that it has been flooded periodically over a long period of time by salt water has created a condition which requires a peculiar kind of cultivation in order to grow other crops than those grasses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, I think, would apply only to a very much limited part.

Mr. GARDINER: That is part of the problem. All these matters are being surveyed, and reports are being made. To-night all I can say is that when we have a final report I think it will be found that the federal government and this department will sympathetically consider anything that can be done, and will assist as far as may be possible.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not wish to detain the committee any longer than is necessary, but this work is being carried on under three or four distinct branches. For instance, there is water development and conservation, land utilization, community pastures and seeding down to permanent pastures, and soil drifting. Would the minister tell us briefly what, in his opinion, is the branch from which he is getting the best results in connection with the rehabilitation of western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course they are all related, and it would be difficult to name the one from which we are getting the greatest benefit. Water, in the form in which we are providing it, in most instances is only valuable if live stock can be maintained; and live stock can be maintained only if water and grass are available. Therefore the reseeding of land to grass is associated with the question of having water. Perhaps the work that has been done might be described in the shortest possible way by reading a letter I have before me I wrote to ask this lady for the privilege of using this letter on some occasion, and I do not know of any better time than right now, because I think it illustrates better than anything I could say the great benefit that is being obtained by our people on western farms from this work. I do not know this lady at all, but the letter is written by Mrs. George Calder, Junior, of Bow Island, Alberta, addressed to Mr. Cavan, one of our officials, and it illustrates many of the things I have seen personally in the west:

Bow Island, Alberta,
October 29, 1940.

Dear Mr. Cavan:

I am writing to let you know how much my husband and myself appreciate the work of the P.F.R.A.

Although we have been farming here for the past twelve years, this is the first year we have ever had a real garden. Thanks to the P.F.R.A. and its personnel whose assistance made this possible.

To those who live in areas where moisture is plentiful, a garden is taken as a matter of course, but to those of us in the drier areas who have struggled year after year only to see our garden dry out, to be able to grow a real garden and see it mature under the spell of plenty of moisture seems almost a miracle.

In spite of a constant fight against grasshoppers, we were able, by means of a small dug-out, a pump and an engine, to raise more than enough vegetables for our own use for the next year. I have canned over 125 quarts of beans, peas, corn, tomatoes and cauliflower, besides pickles galore. The cellar is full of potatoes, squash, beets, turnips, parsnips and citron. Besides, we had actually hundreds of watermelon and muskmelon. We had so many fresh vegetables during the summer that our grocery bill was $30 less than usual. The cash value of the garden for this year alone would be double the cost of construction, but to estimate the cash value of such a garden would cover only a small part of its real value. After seeing dried-out fields and lawns, to walk through or work in an oasis of thick green vegetables does something to one's morale and makes you feel as if life is worth living after all.

It gives one such a feeling of security to know that your cellar is full of vegetables, and every one knows that to maintain health we must eat vegetables. How much better to be able to grow them at home than to have to buy them in cans or depend on what the local store might have on hand!

We hope to be able to add fruits to our garden in another year. This will make the farm almost self-supporting, at a time when, due to the wheat situation, it may be needed most.

We sincerely hope that the dominion government will be able, in spite of the war, to carry on this wonderful work, so that many others will benefit as we have done.

Thanking you for your assistance, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,
Viola E. Calder
(Mrs. Geo. Calder, Jr.)

This letter describes better than I possibly could just what the construction of these dug-outs by the hundreds all over western Canada is doing not only for the economy of the west but also for the morale of the people; and, after all, I think the effect it has had on this woman, multiplied by a great number of families, is the most significant result we have had from the whole programme.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say that the post office address of the writer of that letter was Bow Island, Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then do I understand that this farm is on an island in the Bow river?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; Bow Island is not on or in any body of water. It is an inland post.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then why is it called Bow Island?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not just sure at the moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: An island is something that is surrounded by water, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: A great many towns in western Canada have names that are hard to explain or understand. This may have been called an island because it is a dry section of the country surrounded by different areas. If I may judge from this letter, that might be the situation.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to add my voice to those who have spoken in commendation of the work which has been carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which I think is one of the most constructive measures that has been applied to western Canada in a long time. The work done in connection with soil surveys has been especi ally advantageous. In the early days of th drought area many settlers moved volun tarily to the north, while others were moved by the government. Some of these settlers were placed on land which was not suitable for agricultural purposes. After a soil survey was carried out some years ago, many of these families had to be moved once more and placed on new blocks, the last of which was established some two or three years ago. When these people left the south they were assured by the government that they would be properly reestablished in the north. Therefore I should like to ask the minister if any part of this money is to be used to complete that reestablishment. I know some of the people have not been satisfactorily reestablished, and I have particular reference to one block south of the Canadian National line from Prince Albert to Hudson Bay junction. This block was established only two years ago, and as yet these people have not enough land under cultivation to be self-supporting.

I believe the government should do something to help to reestablish these families. Will any of this money be used for this purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: No. Until this year we did have a fund, although not under this vote, which was used to help to take care of people who had been moved north. In 1932 the federal government undertook to pay one-third of the cost of moving a group of people from the southern parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta to the northern sections. I am not so familiar with what took place in Alberta; but, if I am not mistaken under this scheme about eight thousand people were moved to that area from the southern part of Saskatchewan. Many of those people got into difficulty, and we undertook to assist the provinces to take care of those people until they became sufficiently well established on the land to be able to take care of themselves. Since that time, the provinces have moved other people to that district, but that was entirely a provincial problem, and we did not spend any money to assist them. The fund which was in existence prior to last year has not been voted this year; the provinces are taking care of the problem themselves.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yesterday I inquired with regard to a proposed project on the Assiniboine river near Preeceville. I mentioned the fact that a great many dug-outs had been provided in northeastern Saskatchewan, which are very much appreciated by the farmers who are trying to get into mixed farming. What is the policy with regard to larger commitments in connection with projects such as the one on the Assiniboine? Is it proposed to complete that project this year, and what will be the cost?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a site at which the building of a dam would cost about $20,000. That is under consideration, but is not yet definitely passed. I believe it is in the vicinity of Kamsack. I would not be too sure about the exact location of it, but it is on the Assiniboine river. A number of dams have been under discussion, but the only one being considered for possible construction this year is one which would cost about $20,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that the only benefit which would result from the construction of this dam would go to the town of Kamsack. I was wondering if this money could be used for the benefit of towns and cities; I understood that it was to be used for the rehabilitation of agricultural areas. I know that the town of Kamsack is short of water, and that the building of this dam would help. I do not, however, believe that it would benefit any farmer in that area.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two dams listed here. I believe neither of them is in the mind of the hon. member. One is in the vicinity of Canora, on the White Sand river, and the other is in the vicinity of Preeceville. The engineer's description of the Preeceville dam is that it consists of storage works to be constructed on the Assiniboine river a short distance above the town of Preeceville, for the purpose of storing flood water in lakes Lomond and Annie Laurie—both Scotch. This water would be released at low-flow periods for domestic stock watering and for irrigation purposes for farmers in communities located adjacent to the Assiniboine river valley between Preeceville and Brandon.

The intention of building there is not just that of helping the town, although it may have that effect. The main object is, however, to provide water during the summer months in greater volume by storing it in the spring. At one time the headlands of the Assiniboine were clothed with poplar trees which held the snow in the spring. The intention of this kind of work is to bring about a similar effect by the artificial storage of water in lakes, and permitting it to go down during the summer months, thus avoiding a rush in the early spring. That is the intention; it is not that of helping any particular town, but rather of helping many areas all the way along.

30. Special. Prairie Farm Assistance Act, $500,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To-day we had presented to us an amendment in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There is no act, the administration of which causes members representing rural constituencies more trouble than does this one. That arises because the administration of the act, in so far as the regulations are concerned, has departed from its intention. There are also certain anomalies in connection with the administration of the act which I should like to bring to the attention of the committee, and particularly to the attention of the minister, so that, if he sees fit so to do, he will cause the act to be amended accordingly.

In the first place let me point out that under the act "farmer" is defined as a person engaged in farming in the spring wheat area.

Mr. GARDINER: May I suggest that a bill amending the act is now on the order paper, and I had expected it would be before the house to-night. If the hon. member does not object, I would ask that he defer what he has to say until the bill is before the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall not discuss the bill. If I may, I should like to discuss certain suggested amendments not covered by the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: That could be done when the bill is before the house. I do not believe this is the time to discuss amendments to the act, when a bill amending it is on the order paper.

The CHAIRMAN: It would be out of order to speak about anything but the item before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to deal with expenditures made under the act, and the unfairness which, in many instances, has arisen in connection with its administration.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may discuss the manner in which expenditures voted last year were expended, when we are discussing the expediency of voting $500,000 this year. That, of course, would be in order. But to discuss the general scope of the act, or the general policy underlying it when it was first introduced, would be out of order, because that subject is not before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thank you. What I intend to discuss is the manner in which last year's vote was disbursed.

Mr. GARDINER: In that event may I make a suggestion? There are only three items left in the estimates for my department. It would appear that the discussion of this item may take some time, and we have only a few minutes left. Could we not call the other items, and leave this one until we have passed the other two? This could be left for discussion until a later occasion. The other two items are to provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, and to provide for assistance for replacement of maple production equipment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not wasted the time of the committee, as someone has suggested.

Mr. GARDINER: Then I move that this item be allowed to stand.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We were advised that the bill would be proceeded with this afternoon. I have waited here throughout the evening for this item to come up. But now that there is an opportunity to discuss it—

Mr. GARDINER: But there is not; we have only ten minutes left. My proposal is that we proceed with the other items, and then return to this one.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not feel disposed to give up the floor on this occasion.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Gardiner has moved that item 30 stand; is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a point of order, when I have the floor is it permissible for the minister to make a motion, in order to deprive me of the floor?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not suggesting that we want to deprive the hon. member of the floor. He must realize, however, that he cannot discuss in ten minutes the subject he intends to cover. Certainly I cannot possibly reply to-night. I do not imagine the other two items would take much time; possibly we could deal with them in ten minutes. I am sorry the committee has taken so long to pass the other items. I had hoped we would have passed the bill, as well as the estimates. Since, however, we have taken so long, I am simply asking as a matter of convenience that we take the other items first.

The CHAIRMAN: When estimates are before the committee it has always been customary to accede to the wishes of the minister in charge, and to allow an item to stand if he so indicates. Generally speaking, the minister in charge of a bill will say that a certain section should stand, and the committee then proceeds to examine the other sections.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, the minister called this item.

Mr. GARDINER: No, "the minister" did not; the Chairman called it.

The CHAIRMAN: Strictly speaking, the hon. member is right. An item being called, and an hon. member having risen in his place, if we are to follow the rules strictly we must rule that he is not obliged to yield. The minister in charge of his estimates has pointed out that the discussion of the item in question would certainly take more than ten minutes, so that the hon. member will necessarily have to come back to-morrow if he wishes to take part in a further discussion of this item.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the assurance I should like from the minister, that this item will be called to-morrow. I have been here all day waiting for it to come up.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot give the assurance that it will be called to-morrow. I shall not be here to-morrow. I have to catch a train in a few minutes, and that is why I was anxious to get the other two items cleaned up. But the item will, I imagine, be called next week.

Motion agreed to.

Item stands.

31. Special. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvment of cheese and cheese factories, $1,250,000.

Mr. HATFIELD: How will this money be spent, and in what provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: It may be spent in any province of Canada, but it will be spent in order to improve cheese factories, and since most of the cheese factories are located in Ontario and Quebec, a greater part of this will be spent in those two provinces. But it can be spent in any province in which there is a cheese factory.

Mr. HATFIELD: May it be spent in New Brunswick?

Mr. GARDINER: It may be if application is made from New Brunswick, or in any other province from which application is made.

Mr. HATFIELD: It will be spent to encourage the building of new cheese factories?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it is spent for consolidation, where it is desired to bring two or more cheese factories under one construction in order to eliminate the number of factories and bring about more efficient production. It is not for the building of entirely new factories.

Mr. STOKES: What percentage approximately of the cheese factories in Ontario have been equipped with modern refrigeration plants?

Mr. GARDINER: There have been fifty-four assisted this year, and I understand that there are about 600 cheese factories in Ontario. It was about the same number the year before. It varies from year to year.

Mr. STOKES: Then I take it that the greater number of cheese factories are not equipped with modern refrigeration plants?

Mr. GARDINER: Some may have been equipped before this policy was introduced. Our intention was to encourage factories to put in equipment to produce the type of cheese form which they desire to have in Britain. Another reason was that we wished to encourage the putting in of storage equipment which would keep the cheese in good shape. Those two activities have been carried on in the different factories. Some had the equipment before, and others we have assisted.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to know what position a cheese company is in which had already got equipment and received a bonus from the department, then lost its building and outfit by fire. Will it be reimbursed? Will it get a subsidy towards a new building?

Mr. GARDINER: The way that has been handled to date is that they get half of the difference between the cost of reconstruction and the insurance they collect as a result of the fire.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the reason for the increase of a quarter million dollars in this item?

Mr. GARDINER: This includes premiums as well as what we have been discussing, the improvements in factories. There is a premium of one cent on cheese that scores 93 and two cents on cheese scoring 94. The amount of cheese which gets into these two grades is increasing year by year, and, in addition, there is an increased quantity of cheese manufactured. Cheese production has risen since this policy was started, from 120,000,000 pounds to 140,000,000 pounds, and we hope it will be higher this year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does this vote take care of the extra cent which the minister announced the other day?

Mr. GARDINER: No; that comes under war measures.

Item agreed to.

32. Special. To provide for assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $75,000.

Mr. HATFIELD: Where will this be spent?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be spent in the province of Quebec. We had an agreement with them prior to the war under which we were to spend $300,000 a year, the Quebec government a similar amount, and those who had the equipment undertook to spend a similar amount to change over from the equipment used for making maple sugar and maple syrup. Lead poisoning got into the maple sugar and maple syrup from the equipment which had been used. It had a lead cover on it to prevent rust, and the Americans were refusing to take this product unless we undertook to change the equipment. Accordingly we made this agreement with the Quebec government, we paying one-third, they paying one-third, and the persons interested, one-third. This year they did not wish to spend the amount that we were providing, and we cut it down to $75,000.

Item agreed to.

VICTORY LOAN

OTTAWA TORCH DAY CEREMONY ON PARLIAMENT HILL ON WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Office of the Mayor
Ottawa, Canada
4th June, 1941.

Hon. J. A. Glen,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Victory Loan 1941

Dear Mr. Glen:

The torch and scroll being carried by air force bomber from Victoria to Halifax and thence to England to be presented to the Right Hon. Winston Churchill will arrive in Ottawa on the 11th June. The Ottawa torch day ceremony will take place on that day on parliament hill at 5 o'clock.

At the ceremony the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King will be the speaker and arrangements are being made for His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and myself to sign the scroll.

On behalf of the committee I have the honour to invite you to attend this ceremony. I beg to request also that you will extend an invitation to the members of the House of Commons to be present.

Sincerely yours,
J. E. S. Lewis,
Mayor.

DIVORCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1930—JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE IN WHICH MARRIED WOMAN RESIDES

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE WAR

PROPOSAL OF ONTARIO PREMIER FOR CONFERENCE OF PROVINCES ON CANADA'S PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given by the government to the proposal of the Premier of Ontario as announced in the press, that the Prime Minister call the premiers and representatives of the provinces to a conference devoted exclusively to an open and impartial discussion of the problems to be solved in order to ensure the maximum war effort. If so, has any decision been reached? It will be recalled that I myself this week expressed approval of a conference being called with respect to the fifteen per cent tax on interest on provincial government issues. The present proposal, as I understand it, covers a much wider field.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I received the telegram to which he has referred only after six o'clock last night. It has not been possible to meet with my colleagues in cabinet council since its receipt, therefore the telegram has not thus far been considered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—STRIKES IN DAVENPORT CONSTITUENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): The press yesterday and again to-day refers to certain strikes in several large plants in the riding I have the honour to represent. Each of those plants is engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. I know many of the men who are probably now on strike. They are all British, and I know they would not willingly be on strike; they would prefer to be at their jobs. I also know many of those connected with the management. I am convinced that the Minister of Labour has the matter in hand and is just as anxious as each and all of us to have the strikes settled amicably. I should be pleased if he would give us a statement as to the progress of settlement.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): I was advised this morning that a delegation has arrived here for the purpose of interviewing me in connection with the matter which the hon. member for Davenport mentions. I think it would be well to delay any statement until after I have heard the representations which the delegation have to make. I can assure him that I am as anxious as he is that strikes should not continue.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

NATURAL GAS IN WESTERN ONTARIO—QUESTION AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE IN PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply with regard to a report that appeared in the Brantford Expositor and the Galt Reporter as to the natural gas situation in western Ontario. The report refers to a meeting of representatives from municipal councils in the area in western Ontario, which is supplied with natural gas, held in Toronto in the office of the commissioner of natural gas, with the acting commissioner, Mr. A. R. Crozier, presiding. Referring to a proposal of the Dominion Natural Gas company to construct a plant at Brantford to manufacture artificial gas from propane to supplement the supply of natural gas, the report says:

> The power controller has issued an order that there shall be no profits on the sale of gas manufactured from propane. The company will absorb twenty per cent of the cost of this plant and be permitted to charge depreciation and replacement cost on the basis of eighty per cent depreciation over a period of seven years. Under this arrangement it is estimated that the additional cost on all gas used by the consumer will be approximately five per cent or four to five cents per thousand cubic feet.

There is a general feeling throughout western Ontario that the threatened increase in the price is unwarranted. If the minister would read the report and give the house a statement on it next week, it would assure the people that the power controller is going to protect the interests of the consumers in western Ontario. I realize that the minister cannot give an answer to-day.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I associate myself with what was said by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) and ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply to be good enough to make his statement sufficiently comprehensive to cover the whole Niagara peninsula. They are very much concerned about the same matter.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out that the federal government is not the governing body charged with the distribution and price regulation of gas. It is entirely a provincial matter. The federal government has interested itself in supplementing the supply of gas. We have no power of regulating gas—certainly not in the Department of Munitions and Supply, or, I think, in any other department of government.

Mr. LOCKHART: So long as the situation is clarified, and the public know.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to look into it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I ask the Prime Minister whether we are to sit to-night and/or to-morrow? If we are to sit to-night, why not to-morrow, and if we are not to sit to-morrow, why sit to-night?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall try to answer my hon. friend as logically as I can. First of all we are sitting in the mornings in order to get through the business of this part of the session as soon as possible. For that reason we are sitting afternoons and evenings as well. Therefore I think it would be well for the house to continue sitting this afternoon and this evening.

In regard to to-morrow, the reason we do not propose to sit this Saturday is that it has been thought by the government, and was so stated in the house some weeks ago, that it would be eminently fitting that the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Sir John A. Macdonald should be made the occasion of a national recognition of the memory of Sir John A. Macdonald. To-day is the fiftieth anniversary of Sir John's death. The special services in commemoration of the anniversary have been arranged to take place at Kingston to-morrow at which the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and myself, and I hope many of his colleagues and of mine and members of the house generally, will be present. For that reason the house will not be sitting to-morrow.

I do not know whether my hon. friend said anything about Monday, but I think it continues to be the wish of hon. members to conclude as early as possible this part of the session; therefore I would think we should continue sitting on Monday morning, afternoon and night.

WHEAT

REPRESENTATIONS OF SASKATCHEWAN FLOUR MILLERS' ASSOCIATION AS TO GRISTED WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I have a question I should like to address to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of which I gave him notice. It arises out of a telegram I have received from the Saskatchewan Flour Millers' Association in reference to the wheat policy of the government. The telegram reads as follows:

The wheat policy tabled in the house on Friday by Trade Minister Hon. Mr. MacKinnon compels the farmers gristing their wheat for their own family use to take same out of their wheat quota which will be very small to start with and will not give most of them enough cash to buy the necessities required for their families. If they have to take the wheat from their quota that will cut in further to their small cash allowance if they are allowed to grist their year's supply of flour it will be wonderful help to them as they will get their flour and feed much cheaper than if they had to buy. Most of the small mills are depending mostly on the gristing trade for their business and if the farmers are discouraged in their gristing that means that most of the small mills will have to shut down their plants. We are sorry it has been said that some of the small millers did bootlegging on gristing and flour sales to avoid the processing tax. If the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon will instruct the wheat board to consult with our executive when making their rules and regulations for 41-42 crop we will make watertight suggestions.

D. G. McLean,
Executive Member,
Saskatchewan Flour Millers' Association.

Is the minister prepared to consider the changes suggested by the millers' association, and what assurances will he give in that regard?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Lake Centre gave me ample notice of his intention to ask this question and gave me the opportunity to discuss the matter with my officials who are in Ottawa at the present time.

The quantity of wheat which can be delivered by the producer in the whole of Canada this coming crop year has been limited to 230,000,000 bushels. This figure has been made up of approximately 50,000,000 bushels for human consumption in Canada and approximately 180,000,000 bushels for export. It will be necessary that on any wheat gristed the amount gristed will have to be taken out of the farmers' wheat quota, because to the extent that this was not done, the 50,000,000 bushels for domestic consumption would have to be reduced. In other words all of the wheat gristed for human use is a part of the 50,000,000 bushels, and if it was not deducted from his quota, the producer who had his wheat gristed would have an advantage over those who were not able to have their wheat gristed and would be able to deliver a relatively higher proportion than his neighbouring farmer. There would be discrimination between farmers.

Any amount of wheat gristed in this way would be a deduction from the 50,000,000 bushels and would increase the carryover to the same extent, which is contrary to the intention of the order in council.

I may say that I have arranged this morning with the wheat board to meet with the Saskatchewan Flour Millers' association immediately on their return to the west, when these matters can be discussed. Further consideration is also being given.

EXPORT OF GAME

PROHIBITION OF SHIPMENTS OUT OF PROVINCE WITHOUT PROPER PROVINCIAL AUTHORIZATION —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 16, to control the export of game.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 98, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1941, to provide for the refunding of financial obligations and to authorize the guarantee by his majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have not the bill. We can hardly consider it without having it. So far as I know it has not yet been distributed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, it will have to stand. I did not know that it had not been distributed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It can be taken up later.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to take it up later in the day.

LABOUR DEPARTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF AN ASSOCIATE DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Labour Department Act to provide for the appointment of an associate deputy minister of Labour.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we should have from the minister a complete statement, although not necessarily a long one, as to the necessity of the appointment of an additional deputy minister. I appreciate the fact that with the increased business and present unsettled state of things another deputy minister may be necessary. I would point out, however, having been around here for twenty years, that if you create a new position like this, carrying with it a substantial salary, the probabilities are that it will be a permanent one. There is never any going back when public offices of the kind are created; it is claimed thereafter as a matter of right. The minister should justify the appointment, and if it is of a temporary nature, it should be so stated. We have had a number of new deputy ministers in the defence portfolio. Of course we agree that they are necessary under the circumstances. But in this case there should be some undertaking on the part of the government that hereafter and for all time to come we are not to be burdened with two deputy ministers of labour.

Mr. McLARTY: The work of the Department of Labour has been very greatly increased in the last two years. In the first place the purpose of this bill—because the present associate deputy minister has been appointed—is to make his appointment permanent rather than temporary.

The work of the department has been greatly expanded in three directions: in the first place, in the wide extension of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act; in the second place, in the passing of the Unemployment Insurance Act; in the third place, through the war emergency training plan.

The Department of Labour has, I believe, always had a minimum of help for the wide work it has to do. We have appointed as associate deputy minister Mr. MacNamara, former deputy minister of labour and public works in the province of Manitoba. He has been acting since the regrettable death of Doctor Sirois as acting chief commissioner of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The salary which the leader of the opposition refers to as being large is not really large when you consider the administrative ability which the present incumbent as Associate Deputy Minister of Labour has brought to bear in the organization of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is because of this wide extension of the definite functions of the Department of Labour that the appointment of an associate deputy minister is necessary and desirable. I need hardly say that Mr. MacNamara is carrying on his task in an excellent way and doing splendid work in promoting the early introduction of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the salary?

Mr. McLARTY: $9,000. I do not believe it is excessive. In my opinion it is justified by the added responsibilities placed upon the Department of Labour; and may I suggest that there will be even greater responsibilities after the war is over. In view of all these considerations I believe it will be agreed that the appointment of an associate deputy minister is desirable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with what the minister has said respecting the administrative ability of Mr. MacNamara. He is a man who had wide experience in another field when he came here to head the dependents' allowance board. I am satisfied he did excellent work when he was promoted, if that is the proper expression, to the office of acting head of the unemployment insurance commission. I had hoped the minister and the government would see their way clear to appoint him permanently to that position in place of Mr. Sirois. Apparently, however, that is not now the proposal, and the position is to be filled otherwise.

Let us for a moment examine the bases of the minister's proposal. He has given as a first reason the wide extension of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. What I believe he meant was the wide extension of the operations of that act, because so far as I know there is to be no wide extension of the principles underlying the act. Certainly it is not indicated in the bill the minister is to bring before the house. I had hoped that the wide extension in the operation of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act would be purely temporary. It is hoped by everyone that these labour troubles which from day to day have been looming up on the horizon, and growing more extensive, will by the exercise of good-will and judgment, and by conference, be reduced to a minimum. That, I suggest, is a temporary position only. Surely it is not sufficient reason for appointing a new permanent associate deputy minister, who would be here for all time in that capacity.

The second ground upon which the minister has based the decision to appoint this new officer is the establishment of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The organization operating under that measure will of course be a permanent institution. I should have hoped that in the operation of the act the commission would be the responsible body, and that they could report through ordinary channels, namely, to the deputy minister of labour, and through the deputy minister to the minister and the house. That in itself would not necessitate any great increase in the burden of work devolving upon the Department of Labour. Surely this commission is in large measure to be independent of the Department of Labour. The administrative sections of the act contemplate independence. It is to be a commission, not a bureau of the Department of Labour and, so far as possible, it is to act independently of that department, only reporting through it to the government. So that the second ground upon which the minister justifies the appointment falls down.

His third ground, namely, the setting up of a trade training plan, is in my view the least substantial of all. Surely that is a war measure —at least I so understand it. That is the basis upon which it was introduced and upon which it has been so far operated. It is not contemplated, I hope, that the federal government will permanently go into what is primarily a provincial field, namely that of education. As I understand it, this plan has been adopted on the theory that we have not enough mechanics for our war effort. That is a reasonable view to take, but it is an ephemeral thing; it is not to last forever. I suggest the minister will have to justify the creation of this new position on some higher ground.

What is to be done with the chairmanship of the unemployment insurance commission? Is somebody else to be appointed to do that work? So far as I know Mr. MacNamara is performing very satisfactorily the duties of that office, and unless there is some objection to his appointment as chairman of the commission, he should be confirmed in that position. In my view the minister has not justified the creation of a second deputy minister of labour, who would be a permanent official of the government. If we are to have two deputy ministers, which is to be the senior? Which is to have overriding jurisdiction? Are they to be on equal planes? What is to happen if they disagree? Or is it desired not to appoint Mr. MacNamara to the chairmanship of the unemployment insurance commission, but to obtain his very valuable services in some high executive capacity? Does this resolution contain that principle? At the moment I must conclude the minister has not justified his proposal.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are a few observations which I should like to make on this resolution and also in respect of the other bill on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Labour. Most of what I wish to say I shall reserve until second reading.

Certainly this group will not oppose a resolution which has for its purpose the strengthening of the administration of the Department of Labour. About two months ago I drew the attention of the house to the serious conditions developing in industry throughout the country, and I insisted at that time that something should be done about it. On that occasion the Minister of Labour took exception to my remarks and indicated that everything was quiet on the industrial front. In view of certain actions he has taken in the last few days, and in view of questions which have been asked in the house and reports appearing in the press, I suggest he would have been well advised to accept my opinion and become more active at that time. However, better late than never.

I am always amazed when, on almost every question brought up in the house, the leader of the opposition asks, "Is this just for the duration?" His question seems to me to indicate a lack of understanding of what is happening in the world to-day. When I hear him speak in that way I am reminded of two legendary characters which I liked to read about in my youth. One was in the biblical story of the patriarch Lot. We remember that in the flight from Sodom, at the time of that city's destruction, Lot's wife insisted on looking back, with the result that she was turned into a pillar of salt. Again, I am reminded of Rip Van Winkle, in Washington Irving's classic "Sleepy Hollow," who slept for twenty years. I am convinced, however, that the leader of the opposition reminds me more of Lot's wife, because Rip Van Winkle did eventually wake up.

There are certain developments taking place to-day which we cannot ignore even if we would. We cannot ignore the fact that we have fewer and larger industries in this country under the control of fewer people and employing a greater number of wage-earners. This creates an industrial problem which the government will have to prepare to meet in the same way as it has organized to meet its foreign problem, its trade and commerce problem, and in fact its war problem or any other problems that may confront us. Unless we can find some way to turn the clock back to the primitive production which existed in this country in 1867, the Department of Labour will have to be strengthened. Its administrative functions will increase to meet increasing demands, and wisdom would indicate that we should organize to meet these increased demands.

I am pleased that the minister has taken this step at this time. While we may have some detailed criticism to make later, we are not opposing the measure; in fact we approve this resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am quite opposed to the suggestion attributed to me by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The Department of Labour should be strengthened, but it should not be made top-heavy. What is the position to-day? We have the minister with a salary of $10,000; up to this year we had a deputy minister with a salary of $8,000, and we had an assistant with a salary of $5,220. That was the set-up until Mr. Stewart was introduced as deputy minister. My understanding is that he is a high-class man who came into the department, perhaps against his will, and insisted upon a salary of $10,000.

An hon. MEMBER: At some sacrifice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At some sacrifice, I believe. It is not known definitely whether he will make this his permanent vocation. That made a total of $23,220 for the three executive heads. But what have we to-day? We have the minister at $10,000, the deputy minister at $10,000, an associate deputy minister at $9,000, an assistant deputy minister at $5,220, and an executive assistant to the minister, whatever that may be, at $4,200. The total salary cost is $38,420, as opposed to the previous establishment which cost $23,220.

I want to elucidate these facts for the benefit of the taxpayers. Here is a non-war portfolio, which may be associated with the war effort along certain lines. It is agreed that there are temporary added responsibilities, but after this war is over, unless somebody gives consideration to this position, we will have for all time executives at the head of the Department of Labour costing $38,000. In addition a man is to be appointed to head the unemployment insurance commission at a salary of $12,000. I am calling attention to what has taken place in order that the people of Canada may know. We are being asked to tighten our belts, to give and lend to the government, and at the same time we are running away with executive expenditures.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

That is all I have to say about this matter. I cannot stop it, because the appointment is an accomplished fact. This appointee is already in the department, and, as the minister has said, this is simply to legalize what has been done already by executive action. I think the appointment is a good one; this gentleman will do excellent work, but let us understand the proposal and what it means. Hereafter the Department of Labour is to have five executive heads instead of three.

Mr. McIVOR: It is difficult to come to one's feet after the leader of the opposition has spoken, but I cannot but think of the Department of Labour to-day and the Department of Labour when the present Prime Minister was its deputy minister. I cannot but think of the Department of Labour under the late Hon. Norman Rogers. I have been surprised that another deputy minister has not been appointed before this. I ask the leader of the opposition how much the Department of National Defence is costing to-day as compared with what it cost before the war. I am one of those who take the stand that this government must wake up. It must keep alive the work that was started by the late Hon. Norman Rogers, something which I think the Minister of Labour is doing. The appointment of an associate deputy minister is long overdue, but I suggest that this deputy minister be a man who understands labour, who has come up from the ranks of labour and knows what a hard day's work at no great pay feels like. I think of the time I spent helping the late Hon. Norman Rogers with the youth training work. I could see then the magnitude of the task. This is one side of labour to which a man could devote his whole time. This type of work may not be needed to-day as much as it was during the years of the depression, and as it will be after the war, but it is still important. I hope to see the dominion government take over the whole problem of relief. If that is done, the work of this department will be increased and additional experts will be needed.

I repeat that this deputy minister should know labour. While the heads of our government departments may know something about these matters, I am afraid the public at large do not appreciate the problems of labour. If labour is happy, the country will be happy. I do not agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that there will be a great depression after this war. I believe that if this country can raise $5,000,000 a day for war, we can raise enough to cure unemployment and develop our resources. If the Department of Labour can lead in this endeavour, then we say, "Go to it and we will give you our support."

Mr. POULIOT: Mention has been made of a salary of $12,000 per annum, but I would direct attention to resolution No. 12 which stands on the order paper in my name, and which suggests that for the duration of the war any government salary which exceeds $10,000 should be reduced to one dollar per annum plus $10 per day for living expenses. The suggestion is made to appoint an associate deputy minister of labour. In the Department of Labour as at present constituted there are three competent persons, the minister, his private secretary and the young lady who works in his office—the rest is nil. It is pitiful, and I mentioned this to the late Hon. Norman Rogers when he was alive. I am not discussing the excellent work done by my chief when he was deputy minister of labour and minister of labour. But he ceased to be Minister of Labour in 1911, and since then there have been many other ministers of labour whom I do not discuss. Some have been good, some bad, and some have been nonentities. The present minister is a good one. But I am strongly opposed to any salary in excess of $10,000 being paid. I think that that amount is enough, and when one man in the department receives $10,000 I do not see why another one should be paid as much as that. I think it is a scandal to appoint a man at over $10,000. There is not a man who is worth more than that in these hard times—unless he strikes a gold mine.

The suggestion has been made to take someone from the ranks of labour for this position. The suggestion has come from our reverend and very dear colleague from Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who is perhaps one of the most popular members of the House of Commons. My experience with labour is that there are two kinds of labour men, those who work and those who do not.

Mr. McIVOR: Like members of parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly, but that is true of very walk of life. Those who call themselves labour are those who do nothing and receive big salaries, and who are not working for labour men—they are company men. I have demonstrated that very often in this house, and I warn the minister against the appointment of any impostor of the kind, any lobbyist who calls himself labour to get a fat job and a salary ten times what he could earn with his own hands. Some people are under the impression that if we have no strikes in this country it is due to one man alone, a man you must see eating if you want to see him at work because that is the only work he does, with a knife and fork and spoon. There was a rumour at one time that he was to be put on the purchasing board. I asked the minister for air and the minister for health, is this man going to be on the board? They looked embarrassed, and I knew then that it was only a rumour and that this man had not been asked. He has been mentioned as a possibility as minister, and here again when I occupied the seat in this chamber in which the Minister of Labour now sits I warned the government against his appointment, at the same time acknowledging that the Prime Minister had the right to choose anyone he liked, but stating that I could not support as one of my chiefs a man like that. He was not appointed. My friend who was the Postmaster General was appointed in his stead.

I am after this man because I think he is a fake, that he has betrayed labour, that he is an impostor, that he is a "Purvis" man in labour. Everybody knows him. I strongly object to his appointment. He has betrayed labour. He is only a lobbyist, an intriguer of the worst type.

Mr. HOMUTH: May we know to whom the hon. member is referring?

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend does not know he is not well informed.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not know.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend listened to my speeches he would know. If instead of making a noise when I speak he would listen to what I say he would be better informed.

Here we are, $12,000 for that man. It is a scandal. I denounce it because the man is an impostor, because the man calls himself labour when he has no right to call himself labour, when he has cost the country thousands and thousands, scores of thousands of dollars, to travel to places like Geneva where he has done nothing. He did not say anything, no more than a fish could say in water. He had nothing to say, and here is the man who represents labour. If I were a labour man I would be ashamed to be represented by an impostor of that kind—and when a man is successful enough to reach his post through intrigue he must be exposed as is and must be hanged on the next post. What I say I know. I warn the house about him all the time, but it is of no use. I remember that one of the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party who holds a big job in that department got it through him because every time I denounced that impostor he was defended by that Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member in the house, and that man rewarded the member by getting him a fat job. Everybody knows he is an impostor as I have described.

I do not want to say any more because then he would pose as a martyr. He will say I am crucifying a labour man, that I have no respect for labour. I know the labour men perhaps as well as any man in this house, if not better, and labour men are not afraid to speak to me or to come to me and ask me to defend their rights. When I have a big fat obstacle of the kind in my way I want to get rid of it, and I do the same as a man would who is driving along the road and sees a dead log blocking his path. He takes it away and throws it in the ditch so that he can proceed.

These are my humble views, and I warn the Minister of Labour, who is my friend, and tell him that if this appointment is made—he knows my reasons—it will be a bad appointment, and he will have to establish a cafeteria next to the man's office—

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, but I must say that I do not think he is referring to the associate deputy minister of labour. I am not sure whom he is referring to and I wonder if he would make that clear.

Mr. POULIOT: The best way to conclude is to tell the minister immediately whom I have in view and then he will know if my remarks apply to that man. I do not want the labour men of this country to be betrayed. I want them to be defended by someone who is true to them and who has not changed his mind to get a big salary.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I always listen with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) says, but this morning we have listened to a speech made in a very general way about an unnamed person. In my opinion if an attack is going to be made on an individual connected with any labour organization, it should be made on a particular individual and reasons should be advanced for the attack. I think I know perfectly well the gentleman to whom the hon. member intended to refer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is he?

Mr. COLDWELL: I want simply to say this, that the man who has been attacked without being named is one who has held for a number of years the highest office in the larger of our two national labour organizations. I refer to Mr. Tom Moore. I would say this, that a man who has held the trust of such a large section of organized labour cannot by any stretch of the imagination be an impostor of the type the hon. member for Témiscouata would have us believe he is.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out that I thought the hon. member for Témiscouata would come to naming the man to whom he was referring. The Minister of Labour, when discussing this position, stated that the man intended for it was Mr. MacNamara, at present acting chairman of the unemployment insurance commission. Therefore I think it would be quite improper and out of order to continue the discussion on the merits or demerits of a man who had not been named for the position. I would have stopped the hon. member for Témiscouata had I not thought that he would name the man, because the committee must realize that there can be no discussion about some one who is not named.

Mr. COLDWELL: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think it is the right or the privilege of any member to make an assumption and arrive at a conclusion as to what the minister intends to do, nor do I believe it is the prerogative of any member to throw down the gage of battle with a minister of the crown and to tell him that if he does certain things, then something unpleasant may happen either here or elsewhere. It was with that thought in mind that I rose. I am quite sure that in these difficult times when the Minister of Labour makes an appointment, no matter who the appointee may be, he will choose some one who will have the confidence of organized labour, in spite of anything that any member of this house may think privately of the person so appointed. I have no doubt that when he appoints an assistant deputy minister of labour he will look round the country and choose someone who is known to have the confidence of organized labour. Every member of this house, I believe, was aware of the identity of the gentleman at whom the remarks were directed, because he has been named by the member for Témiscouata before. I felt I could not allow this occasion to pass without expressing the opinion that the attack was most unfair and unjustified.

Mr. POULIOT: One word on a question of principle. I find the doctrine expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar absurd. A member of parliament has the right not only to criticize what the government has done, but to give warning, and my hon. friend knows that. If he who is an advocate of free speech says that I cannot give a warning to the minister just to help him, perhaps he would like the minister to make a bad appointment so as to have other opportunities to criticize him afterwards. I give the minister an opportunity to think before something is done, and I express my views and tell the government what I think. I have a right to do so and the member for Rosetown-Biggar will not deny it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I don't.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all I want. If the minister mentioned Mr. MacNamara, I did not have him in view in what I said.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in the few remarks he made, stated the position of this group. I am not going to say anything with regard to the remarks of the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I know not to whom he refers, but I do think it is absolutely unfair to make insinuations and to accuse someone in a general way, which might very well be construed as meaning someone connected with the labour movement. I feel as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does. If a man is to be attacked he should be named, the charge made, and the cards laid on the table face up, so that he may be in a position to defend himself. That is all I have to say in that regard.

I am concerned about the attitude of the leader of the opposition. He classifies the Department of Labour as a non-war department. I have exactly the opposite view. I believe that many of the troubles we are confronted with to-day in regard to strikes, and all the general confusion resulting, are due to the fact that the Department of Labour, constituted as it is, is totally inadequate to handle a situation which it was not organized to deal with on a peace-time basis. It is the most essential war department in the government. I am altogether in accord with the steps taken by the minister to strengthen the department. The discussion with regard to salaries and such matters might very well be dispensed with at this time. Certainly it is not good war propaganda to have members stand up and talk about salaries of $10,000 and $20,000, when we realize that perhaps 95 per cent of the men we are calling to take up a gun and defend the country might compare income tax brackets. This sort of thing is all bad propaganda and should be discontinued. I am saying nothing about salaries. I have always been of the opinion that they are absolutely out of proportion to the earnings or wages of the people who, when all is said, produce the wealth of the country.

I think our whole set-up of war departments has been handled in the wrong way. In the first place, the hon. member objects to an additional deputy minister in the Department of Labour where the work has increased a hundredfold since the outbreak of war. He fails to realize that the country has been transformed and is now on a war-time basis. The department must therefore be prepared to meet the crisis. We have established additional branches in the Department of National Defence. For instance, we have the ministry for naval services. That is not necessary in peace time but it is indispensable to-day. We have a ministry for air, with a personnel scattered across the country. All this involves expenditures, but these branches are absolutely necessary.

The Department of Labour is the most important war department of the government, because it deals exclusively with the men and women necessary to produce the sinews of war. The army and the navy are worth nothing unless our industries are so organized and planned that they will turn out the necessary machinery for these forces to enable them to fight the battle we are engaged in. In the organization of some 35 or 40 boards the personnel in each case has been drawn from one class. These people have but one outlook, and the point of view of labour is given no consideration in any of the organizations that function behind the government in organizing the war effort. The result is that the whole establishment is influenced by a single point of view. This has its repercussions throughout the country in the turmoil and unrest we are having. The Minister of Labour would do well to bring into the department men who have knowledge of both sides of the picture. men who are qualified to sit in, and whose advice would tend to alleviate some of the disturbance we have to-day simply because of the fact that only one point of view prevails.

I am absolutely in agreement with what the minister is doing. I have no jurisdiction over salaries and I am not going to talk about them. That is a departmental matter, and if the government think it good business I recognize my limitations. I think we on this side of the house should withhold any statements in the house which might have a reaction outside that would not be in the best interests of the country.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East stated, later we may have something more to say with respect to matters concerning the Department of Labour. But that is my feeling at the present time. We have to have both points of view represented on the inside in all these matters, because I regard the Department of Labour as the most important war organization we have. I sympathize with the minister in respect of the many problems with which he has to deal; they have increased from day to day. It should be our duty to assist him to strengthen the department in every way possible, and I am prepared to do that.

Mr. O'NEILL: This debate has taken a rather wide range; we have been discussing salaries and more or less personalities. As a labour man I have never been one to question salaries, but it seems to me that there could be a redistribution of the amount of money that is paid in any one department. If it is not possible to raise the salaries of those who are getting less than a living wage without taking something off the $10,000 man, then probably something of the kind should be done. That, however, is not what I wish to discuss at present.

It seems to me that this measure for the appointment of an additional deputy minister in the Department of Labour is looked upon by some hon. members from the point of view that it should be a war time measure only. The Department of Agriculture is probably the most important department in the government and I think next in importance is the Department of Labour. I am entirely in agreement with this resolution. It is my view that an associate deputy minister of labour should be appointed and that he should be retained after the war, because then we shall have problems arising in the labour world that will require a great deal of attention, and these men should be in the department now making provision to meet the troubles that will come upon us when the war is over.

Another thing that perhaps has not been given the consideration by the government that it should have is with respect to the appointment of the men to fill these positions. If the government wish to use the democratic method in appointing men to positions in the Department of Labour—and take note that I do not wish to be misconstrued as having anything against Mr. MacNamara; I have nothing whatsoever against him—it should have in mind the fact that a deputy minister or associate deputy minister of labour should have the respect and confidence of labour. We have labour organizations in this country. We have the standard labour organizations on the railways, about eighteen of them holding contracts with the railways. We have the trades and labour congress, the Canadian congress of labour, the Canadian federation of labour, the Catholic workers of Quebec, and so on. All these labour organizations have their heads. If it is desired to have a man who has the respect and confidence of labour, beyond any question or doubt it should be left to the heads of these labour organizations to suggest to the government who in their opinion would be the right man to fill the position. If a system such as this were adopted I believe you would not have the trouble you are having with labour to-day. It is impossible for a man who has not had actual connection with labour to understand the problems of labour. If you have such men in the Department of Labour to advise the department you will have much less trouble than you are having at present.

I am, as I say, in complete agreement with this resolution, and I wish it distinctly understood that I am not saying anything whatsoever against Mr. MacNamara. He is probably as good a man as could be chosen by the department for the position, unless the system were adopted of having the labour men themselves suggest to the government the man to fill the position.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not intend to deal fully with all the remarks that have been made, because there has been unanimity as to the qualifications of the appointee as associate deputy minister of labour. I understand that the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) did not apply to the proposed appointee. I refuse to speculate as to the person against whom he was directing his remarks—

Mr. HOMUTH: It was perfectly obvious.

Mr. McLARTY: —but I would say that since I have been Minister of Labour I have received excellent cooperation from every head of every major labour organization in Canada. I do not propose to go farther than that.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) as to the necessity of strengthening the Department of Labour. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was kind enough to suggest that he had nothing against the individual appointee, but he thought we were unnecessarily increasing the expenditure in this appointment. I suppose everything is relative, and from my observation I believe it to be true that the Department of Labour has for some considerable time been understaffed and undermanned. Irrespective of the additional work involved in connection with unemployment insurance—the leader of the opposition suggests that that is the duty of a commission, but still the department will have some functions—irrespective of war emergency training; irrespective of the fact that during the war we are carrying the additional burden of these boards that we are appointing under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, I believe the appointment can be justified outside of the particular war measures. But we are at war.

In connection with the permanency of the appointment something was said about salary. I believe we were peculiarly fortunate in obtaining the services of Doctor Stewart as deputy minister of labour. He has had wide experience. Let me tell the committee something. The salary he is accepting now—and there is no permanency about it; he took it because Canada is at war—the salary he is receiving, with the tax he is paying on it, is only half of the salary he ordinarily receives. In other words it is not a great and generous emolument, but he is doing this work because he is a Canadian and wants to help this country in time of war. I pay that tribute to him.

What will happen after the war is another matter. But certainly I think no member of this committee would suggest that we are not going to have any labour problems after the war. I believe that in the appointment of Mr. MacNamara as associate deputy minister we are making an appointment that will be for the general benefit of this country. I might go farther; but I believe that the appointment is sound. It is made for the reason that I suggested, so that the appointment may be permanent; and I wish to express appreciation in this committee for the almost unanimous support which it has received.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think that there will be any opposition to this resolution on the part of the group with which I am associated. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said, it involves some additional burden upon the taxpayer to foot the bill for highly paid executives. On the other hand, living in such times as these, with the problems faced by a nation fighting in this tremendous war, the function of labour is exceedingly important. While I do not know the specific duties assigned to this new appointment, I will say that if the department can keep labour and management functioning smoothly, the money will be well spent. If there is anything we do not want to happen, it is any retardation of our industrial war effort, the responsibility for which comes upon labour and management alike.

During the course of the debate the post-war effect has been brought into the discussion. Personally I deplore the mention of such things as relief after the war is over. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) referred to the tremendous burden upon the Department of Labour under the predecessor of the present minister, in connection with the administration of relief, and its activities in the matter of youth training. Let us so manage the affairs of this country now that when the war is over, management and labour will work together to bring about a better country, a more populous country, a country industrialized not only in one part but throughout. Let us not wait until after the war before we do this, because if we have to go through ten years of post-war depression we shall be headed for another war worse than the present one. Let us look forward to a great and glorious Canada after this war has been won.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. McLarty thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 100, to amend the Labour Department Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE THAT MEMBERS OF CONCILIATION BOARDS SHALL NOT HAVE PECUNIARY OR OTHER INTEREST

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 96, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Members not to have pecuniary or other interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The bill at present before the committee is confined to one principle. The present law reads that—

> No person shall act as a member of a board who has any pecuniary interest in the issue of a dispute referred to such board.

I do not know how the department interpreted the section as it now stands, but it would, I assume—and it should, I think—debar any party in interest from becoming a member of a board. The suggestion in that regard is to change the law from what I have read to this, that:

> No person shall act as a member of a board who has any pecuniary interest, direct or otherwise,—

Which would make it more exclusive.

> —in the issue of a dispute referred to such board.

The scope of the prohibition is intended, I think, to be practically all-exclusive. But it goes further and definitely bars anyone who—> —has so acted within a period of six months preceding the date of the application for a board in the capacity of solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent of either of the parties to the dispute.

If I apprehend aright the minister's proposal in this regard, it is this. The theory of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is based on the principle of conciliation, which, of course, is very proper. If, as has frequently happened in cases of boards of arbitration, with which I am quite familiar, the interested parties name representatives who in turn agree on an umpire or referee, those interested parties are by the very nature of their employment advocates of the particular interest which has appointed them. The judicial aspect is very largely lost sight of. I have not had very much experience with conciliation boards, but on one occasion a good many years ago I did act on a board as a representative of one of the interested parties. I was counsel to the party, at the same time. I soon found my position to be almost impossible, because I had to choose between taking dictation from my client, on the one hand, and endeavouring to act independently, and thereby losing my client, on the other. I had to have the thing out, there and then, and assert the principle that a member of a conciliation board was acting in a judicial capacity, and not as an advocate. Therefore I am in accord with the principle that members of the boards of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act should be in the position of judicial officers, acting independently, with a primary objective of conciliation, and not of acting as advocates.

I should like to hear anyone who holds a contrary view discuss the other side of the argument, if there be another side. I do not believe this measure is aimed at any particular individual. I have no knowledge of anything of the sort, but I do suggest that the extension of the original principle, namely, that a member of a conciliation board should not be a party either directly or indirectly interested in the result, is a sound one. Whether or not the language of the proposed section is sufficient, I cannot at the moment say. I have not had time to study the drafting of it, but with the underlying principle I can agree. I would commend the minister upon the proposal. It may be that we can improve upon the suggestion made.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not make comment on the legal side of the question, or that part of the measure which refers to legal advisers, counsel or paid agents. But I am wondering who is going to represent the strikers in the event of a dispute. For instance, we will suppose that the steamfitters' union in a city are called out on strike. They do not go out unless they are advised by their representatives that they have ample reasons for striking. It may be that they have not come to an agreement with their employers. In my time I have seen quite a number of steamfitters' strikes, because steamfitters' associations were associated with the line of business in which I was engaged. The same would apply to plumbers; I have seen a number of plumbers' strikes, and strikes of machinists. With them, too, I was directly associated. The same observation would apply to moulders; with them, too, I was associated. In fact, in my early days I was engaged in these lines of trade, therefore I have before me the point of view of the worker. On the other hand, I am not opposed to the industrialist, because in due course I became an executive of a large industrial corporation.

I do not believe that the worker goes on strike unless he feels he has some reason for so doing. Conciliation is by far the best course to follow. There should be give and and take on both sides. In the event of a dispute between a machinists' union, or unions of plumbers, moulders or steamfitters, and their employers, and in the further event of the setting up of a board to settle the dispute, I am wondering if paid representatives of the workers would be barred from presenting their case. Who will present the case for them? Certainly the men themselves would be best qualified through their agents to state what their troubles are. Do I understand that under the bill the agent of a steamfitters' union, a machinists' union or a moulders' union, because he is a paid agent of such union, is barred from appearing before the board?

Mr. McLARTY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: If so, who will present the case for the workers?

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member for Davenport has mentioned cases where men may be out on strike. If they are doing war work, and go out on strike before a board is appointed, they are striking illegally. But the provisions of this amendment do not apply to those who will present the case. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, this is designed against anyone sitting on the board who may be partially inclined. In other words, the agent of the steamfitters' union or any other union may present his case to the board. The only limitation prescribed in the amendment is that, if they are paid agents, they shall not sit on the board.

Mr. GILLIS: The bill presented by the minister, as I read it, seeks to bring about impartiality in the men comprising the personnel of a board. Reading the bill, however, as it is now worded, I take the view which has been indicated by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I do not know where the minister would find men of that mind. In fact, I view this bill in very much the same light as I viewed a story I heard which concerned two Irishmen who were discussing the question of neutrality. The first Irishman wanted to know where his friend, from the south, stood in reference to the war. "Well," was the reply, "I am neutral." "Yes," said the first Irishman, "I can well understand that you are neutral, but who are you neutral for?" That is just about the situation we would have if this bill were passed in its present form.

In my view this is not the proper approach to the problem. Many other things are necessary to clarify the present situation so far as labour is concerned. This measure would apply to men who are handling cases for labour before conciliation boards. Officials of unions are not allowed to sit on boards, nor are the paid agents of the operators. There are a few lawyers in Canada who have specialized in labour legislation and who, in connection with labour disputes, have made themselves the servants of labour. If this bill were to pass in its present form it would mean that labour's side of the case would not be represented on boards. Only a few of the men to whom I have referred have specialized in labour law. If this bill goes through practically everyone who is connected with labour or who has made a specialty of labour problems will be excluded. You will have full representation of the management and you will have a board with that point of view. You will not have an impartial board, or one that will take an unbiased view of the problems with which the department may be faced. The Department of Labour must recognize the problems that it has to contend with, and an attempt must be made to cure them. There is no use trying to treat the effect; you must treat the cause if you are to have any satisfactory adjustment of the labour situation in Canada at the present time.

I have been connected with organized labour for the past thirty years. I have seen these disputes developing and I have seen partial cures effected. I feel quite sure that the solution to this problem lies in organization. Giving the workers the right to organize is the key to the whole situation. Where the workers are organized in an industry, committees are appointed which meet with the management; collective agreements are signed which set out wages and working conditions; the operators meet with the men and understand their problems, while the men gain a fairly good idea of the problems faced by the management. It is often found that disputes arise where the workers are unorganized. The government should live up to its own regulations and attempt to allay the unrest which is developing. I do not care what the personnel of this board is to be, it will not be able to cure this situation.

We are supposed to be fighting a war for democracy, a war to overcome Hitler. Spokesmen for the government have emphasized the fact that Hitler destroyed the trade unions of that country and therefore the workers of this country should be ready to give their all for victory. With that we agree wholeheartedly. I think Sir Walter Citrine expressed this very well. His remarks are quoted in the Canadian Congress Journal of December 1940. Here is what he said:

> Trade unionism is both a cause and a product of democracy. It can only function in an atmosphere of free expression. It cannot function in cellars or behind closed doors. It must impress the public mind, and it must be given facilities to do that. Trade unionism basically is the assertion of the rights of the common man, of the principle that it is not ordained by God that any community should be ruled by aristocracies, whether those aristocracies are of birth or wealth. In pursuit of that principle of voluntary organization, you will find that organizations and groups of people have developed in every corner of the land, meeting to promote some laudable purpose.

That statement is followed up in the January 1941 issue.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot see any connection between the bill before the committee and what the hon. gentleman is now reading.

Mr. GILLIS: The Department of Labour is seeking to establish a board consisting of certain men who will attempt to settle these disputes, and I am endeavouring to show that the approach to this problem is not the proper one, that the matter should be handled in another way. I believe the minister has only good intentions, but I feel sure that this bill will make a condition that is already bad, much worse. The minister would be well advised to withdraw the bill and give the whole matter further consideration. The proper approach to the problem is by way of consultation with the men.

The CHAIRMAN: The rules state that in committee hon. members must confine themselves strictly to the matter before the committee. The object of the section now before us is to assure the independence of the men to be appointed on the board, and it is to that point only that hon. members should address their remarks.

Mr. GILLIS: You are quite right, Mr. Chairman, but I am endeavouring to show—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member does not think the bill goes far enough, his remedy is by way of amendment that would cover what he has in mind, and of any such amendment he would have to give notice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): His remarks would be quite in order on the second reading.

The CHAIRMAN: As the leader of the opposition points out, it would be quite in order on the second reading.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or on the third reading.

Mr. GILLIS: I could have concluded in ten or fifteen minutes and saved considerable time. If I am to be restricted at the present time I shall reserve my remarks until another stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure that if the hon. member had understood his rights he would have made his speech on the second reading. That stage has passed, and as he has partly completed his remarks, I think we could agree to allow him to proceed and say now what he would have said on second reading. I am interested because I want to hear his development of the point of view he is now expressing.

Mr. McLARTY: I think we should agree to allow the hon. member to proceed. His remarks are quite constructive, and I have no objection to his proceeding.

Mr. COLDWELL: The manner of making this presentation was decided upon by the hon. member in order to facilitate matters. It was thought it would be better for him to say this in committee rather than on second or third reading.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee has the power to suspend the rule. I am in the hands of the committee. But before that is done I would point out that we should not be doing it in one case and not in another. a precedent will be established. As I say, I am in the hands of the committee and it will be quite in order for the committee to suspend the rule by unanimous consent.

Mr. McLARTY: I think unanimous consent should be given. There is nothing in this discussion that is at all acrimonious. The hon. member is trying to be helpful. While I appreciate the fact that a precedent may be established, if this course is taken by unanimous consent I do not think the precedent will be unduly embarrassing. I would so move.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the hon. member ought to be allowed to proceed. He is giving a very constructive talk.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. McLarty moves that the rule be suspended and that the hon. gentlemen have leave to speak to the point.

Mr. MacINNIS: While in a sense I have no objection to the suspension of the rule, its suspension might be unduly restricted. It might be suspended to allow the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) to speak, and that might be the end of it, with objection raised by the chair to other hon. members being allowed to speak. Under the circumstances, since we have allowed the second reading to pass without saying what we wanted to say, I think we shall have to leave it now until the third reading.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask if the bill prohibits any counsel or agent being appointed to a board who in the previous six months represented any association or industry which was one of the parties in a dispute? All the unions have paid agents who are most familiar with their particular problems, but as I understand this amendment the paid agents of the unions, men who have been chosen by the unions for their ability to present their case, will be barred from appointment to the board if they have so acted within a period of six months preceding. The same applies to counsel. I know different counsel who are thoroughly familiar with disputes of this kind, and under this amendment they will be barred if within the six months preceding they have appeared in the capacity of counsel for either of the parties to the dispute. I know a prominent counsel for labour, Mr. Bernard Rose, K.C., of Montreal, perhaps one of the best posted on labour disputes of any counsel I know, and if he has acted for any labour organization during the preceding six months he could not be named to the board. I mention his name only as one I know of; there may be many others. What I say would apply to all counsel who in the preceding six months had presented to a board the case of some union or industry for which he acted. Under this provision I am afraid that quite a large number of counsel and a number of paid union agents will be barred from appointment to a board. Yet the minister, I know, wants to have on these boards the most capable men he can find.

Mr. McLARTY: I think perhaps the hon. member for Davenport is not making the distinction that applies, at least in my own mind, in this case. He mentions the name of Mr. Bernard Rose of Montreal, a very estimable man, by way of example. There is no reason why he cannot present a case before a board, and probably, because of his particular qualifications, why he should not sit on a board. Anyone can present a case subject to section 42 of the act. The original intent of the act was to devoid it, so far as possible, of all legal technicalities. Counsel would appear only in the event of unanimous consent on the part of the board. The legal restriction which this amendment imposes is not on the presentation of a particular case by labour on the one hand or by industry on the other. It is merely a question of who shall constitute the board, and, as the leader of the opposition has suggested, the whole purpose is to secure a board in which there will not be advocates of one side and advocates of another. The reason for that I think is obvious.

Incidentally this proposed legislation has secured the approval of the national labour supply council, on which both labour and industry are represented. The purpose of the amendment is to secure so far as possible more unanimous reports from a board. It was pointed out to me that in one case one of the members of the board prepared the brief for one of the parties appearing before it, and if you get that definite advocacy it is pretty nearly impossible to get a unanimous report. It is with a view to endeavouring to secure more unanimity in the board's reports that this legislation is introduced.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not think the minister quite caught my point. This amendment imposes a restriction and would bar a very large number of capable counsel and agents of labour organizations from being appointed to a board. I have no doubt that a counsel or labour agent, once he is appointed to a board, would very quickly assume the impartiality of an arbitrator or judge and try to be fair. But this six months' limitation would bar from appointment to the board a considerable number of men who would be well qualified to exercise good judgment in these disputes.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps the hon. member is giving it too wide an application. It means that those who have acted within six months preceding for a particular company—not other companies in general—or for a particular union—not unions in general—would be debarred from membership on a board that was hearing a dispute in which that company or union appeared. He would be qualified to act with respect to other companies or unions.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister said that the national labour supply council had given its approval to this bill. Has this council its full personnel at the present time? If it has given its approval, is that really not approval by only a partial membership of the board?

Mr. McLARTY: I think the board is full. The hon. gentleman will have to be more specific. I have a letter signed either by the chairman or the secretary of the national labour supply council stating that this measure has its approval.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have it from one of the members who was on the board at the beginning and the minister says he is still on the board, that so far from approving this bill he is opposed to it.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member for Vancouver East allow me the privilege of dealing very briefly with a remark he made before the committee took recess? It was in connection with the recommendation of the national labour supply council. In the intervening time I have had an opportunity of taking it up with the secretary of the council, and he advises me that there was no recorded opposition to the resolution approving this proposed legislation.

Mr. MacINNIS: In saying a few words on this section I wish to assure the minister that it is my desire to be helpful. Since he has had the honour of holding his present office I have tried on every possible occasion to assist him in this house, so much so that on one occasion I was accused by some of his followers of looking for some preferment. However, I forgave them. I have even tried to help the minister outside the house, so far as I could do so with propriety. I wish to offer him some advice now, and I think he would be wise to accept it.

It is strange that this act, which stands so much in need of overhauling, should be amended at this time only to the extent of this one section. I do not think there is a more dangerous section for him to amend, particularly in the way he is now asking parliament to amend it. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was passed in 1907, and for thirty-four years this section has stood the test. So far as I know, there has never been any objection to it until now. Why is there objection now? If I were to take the time of the committee at this stage to tell why, I rather think the chairman would stop me, and perhaps rightly. On some other occasion I will discuss the matter from that point of view. Let me read the old section 12:

No person shall act as a member of a board who has any direct pecuniary interest in the issue of a dispute referred to such board.

This is direct and simple. We know what it means. It means that no one connected with the management on one side or, on the other side, with the employees who would stand to gain or lose by a decision in the dispute, can be a member of a board. The amendment departs from that simple, direct stipulation. Let me read the section as amended:

No person shall act as a member of a board who has any pecuniary interest, direct or otherwise, in the issue of a dispute referred to such board or who is then acting or has so acted within a period of six months preceding the date of the application for a board in the capacity of solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent of either of the parties to the dispute.

Let us take the first word that is new—direct or "otherwise". What does "otherwise" mean? Who could not be excluded by the word "otherwise"? Every member of society to-day has a pecuniary interest in almost any labour dispute. Suppose there is a labour dispute in a public utility providing light, heat and power or perhaps transportation. If an increase in wages would affect the rates, or if an increase in wages were denied, rates not being affected, then every member in that community would be affected by the dispute because he would have an interest either direct or "otherwise". So that when you use this word you do not know what it means, or whom it excludes.

Take the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), who so valiantly protects capital here. If he has shares in a company no one knows whether he has those shares or not. How do you find out? Having a pecuniary interest, he may be affected indirectly in the dispute.

In this amendment the minister is going into a field the limits of which neither he nor anyone else can define. However, I am not sure that that is what the amendment really contemplates. In my opinion it is directed at the representatives of labour who appear on these boards.

Mr. McLARTY: And industry.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, because industry has the same representatives on these boards as it has always had. Quite recently, however, certain solicitors have specialized in this kind of work, and I am satisfied that it is at these the amendment is directed, and it is at these that it will be directed. That is why it is so dangerous, particularly at this time. Take a paid agent. To whom does that apply? Where does it get us? I am a member of the amalgamated association of street railway employees in Vancouver. A paid agent of a local of some organization, say in Toronto or Regina or Calgary, would be prevented by this proposal from sitting on a board for the employees of the street railway men in Vancouver, though he would not be directly affected by any decision that might be made in the dispute.

I suggest to the minister in all earnestness that he should consider the matter carefully before pressing this amendment as it stands. It was never intended that a board under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act should be impartial. It has always been impossible to have an impartial board, and it will still be impossible after this amendment is passed. Every member sitting on the board has an opinion one way or another. He is prejudiced, no matter how much or how little, in favour of one side or the other. We try to get over that by getting a judge as chairman—not always, but quite often. While a judge is not necessarily more impartial than some one else, yet because of his position and his training in weighing evidence, he may as chairman of such a board take perhaps a more impartial attitude than the ordinary business or professional man.

Let me read from the act how the board is set up:

9. For the purposes of appointment of the members of the board, the following provisions shall apply:—

(a) each party to the dispute may, at the time of making application or within five days after being requested so to do by the minister, recommend the name of one person who is willing and ready to act as a member of the board, and the minister shall appoint such person a member of the board.

Now, what happens? The employees will select a man who, they consider, has the viewpoint and the interest of the employees or workers. The employers, on the other hand, will select a man who has the interest of the employers and the point of view of employers. No matter how you deal with it you are not going to get a more impartial board than you had before.

Then we come to the appointment of the chairman. The minister, after the appointment of the other two members, instructs them to get together and select a chairman. If they fail to do so, the minister appoints the chairman. Usually, and I think for very good reasons, the minister appoints a supreme court judge or some other high court judge. Generally speaking I believe the minister's appointments give satisfaction. They give satisfaction that would not be given if someone other than a judge were appointed.

Yesterday in introducing the bill the minister said that the purpose was to get a more impartial board. You cannot get a more impartial board, because in spite of what you do the employees will select a person who favours their position, and the employers will select a person who favours their's. You are then as you were—but with this difference, with this amendment the workers will be limited to a very small number of trained people from whom they can select, while the employers will not be limited at all. There are dozens of corporation lawyers in Canada who are well able to present the case for the employers, but the lawyers who are able to present the case for labour are very few, because labour is not able to afford high-priced lawyers. If this amendment is passed it will prevent labour from taking advantage of any wide choice, and instead of bettering the situation the minister is going to have trouble which I am sure he does not contemplate at the present time.

I said I was going to offer advice to the minister, and I do so with the greatest sincerity. My advice to him is to withdraw the bill.

Mr. McLARTY: I am sure the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) are sincerely intended and well meant, and deserve a reply. In the first place I should like to clear up a statement which he apparently believes to be correct but which is not correct, that this amendment is directed at certain particular counsel who are acting for labour. I could give him a number of illustrations that I think would reveal to him that the whole purpose and function of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was being thwarted by corporation counsel, counsel acting for corporations, who sat on boards. He points out quite truly that although the act was introduced in 1907 it is being used in a very much wider field and given a wider application by reason of its extension on November 7, 1939, to all war industries.

The hon. member said it will be impossible to get a man who is perfectly impartial. Probably I must agree with that. But if representations are to be made to a board I suggest they can be made by representatives before a board, and let us try to make that board as impartial as we possibly can. That is the whole purpose of this amendment. There is no change in the right of representation of either labour or industry before a board. But let me ask this committee this question: How are you going to get a unanimous report from any board where the representative on the one hand is counsel for a corporation and the representative on the other hand is counsel for a labour body?

I am not oblivious to the fact that it will be difficult to get complete impartiality. The amendment cannot guarantee that. But what it can do is it can take a step toward securing that impartiality. There will have to be, of course, some definite application to determine the mode of procedure which will be adopted to ensure impartiality. But I believe this is a step in the right direction. While it does not guarantee that every board will be impartial, at least it is a move in that direction, and for that reason I think should commend itself to the committee.

As the hon. member has stated, in cases where the power of appointment has fallen to me I have generally appointed a judge. There are two reasons for so doing. First, it is some assurance of impartiality; at least you are not open to any suggestion that you are trying to be partial to either side. And second, a judge should be most competent to weigh, consider and adjudicate upon the evidence given.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): I agree with the principle of this bill, but I believe a great deal of difficulty will be involved in the way it will work out. In the first place it will be found that both sides will be devoting considerable time to investigating the representative of the other side to be sure that he is not either directly or indirectly interested in the dispute. As the minister has pointed out, both sides will have the opportunity of being represented at the hearing by their solicitor or representative, whichever they prefer. It has been the practice of labour organizations down through the years to have, if possible, their paid agents, men who have been following the case, arguing the case and debating it with these various boards. They know that these men have at heart the interests of the people they represent and have a definite knowledge of the problems to be debated, and in that respect will be in the best position to put forward the claims of the people who are before the board.

In the three or four years that this act has been in effect there have been at different times many complaints; in fact, if my memory serves me aright, not long ago there was quite a discussion over the fact that the chairman of a board was found to have a direct interest in a dispute which was under investigation. But I understand that the various ministers of labour have had a list of men across Canada who it is considered would be suitable chairmen of the various boards. While there have been mistakes in the past in the selection of chairmen, on the whole the system has worked out very satisfactorily. In the vast majority of cases impartial decisions have been rendered by the chairmen on the evidence as it was placed before them. I am sure that every hon. member wishes to see these cases decided as impartially as it is possible to decide them. As one of the previous speakers stated, it is impossible to find any person who is entirely impartial, but so long as we can find people who are willing to be fair to both points of view, that is about all we can expect from the normal human being.

Again I must say that I agree with and approve heartily the principle of the bill; nevertheless I have grave doubts as to its success in actual practice.

Mr. CHURCH: The principle of appointing arbitrators and the constitution of the board as embodied in the bill are copied from the arbitration acts of the various provinces. In some cases, it is true, members of boards do not know very much about the work. When labour saw fit to nominate a member of the board, the principle was adopted of having each party to a dispute nominate a member, and the chairman of the board was chosen by agreement, failing which the Minister of Labour made the appointment. On some occasions it has been difficult to obtain a labour man to act without remuneration. When I speak of labour men I have not in mind the agitator type. I have had a great deal to do with the appointment of some of these boards, and it has not always been easy to get a labour man to act unless he could be assured of some compensation. I am not speaking of the sort of labour man who goes around stirring up strife. That sort of thing is bad enough in our industrial life in time of peace; it is far worse in war time.

I should not like to see the minister, unless he finds it necessary as a war measure, keep off the boards some of our reasonable, bona fide labour men who have given a great deal of help to the trade union movement in this country. Not a few disputes have arisen with respect to public utilities connected with the municipalities, operating at cost. In such cases they generally secured pretty good boards, nominated by each side. In some cases the minister chose the chairman, in others the senior judge of the county was appointed. However, with due respect to the bench, a number of the judges who have functioned on these commissions knew very little about the practical matters connected with mechanization which arise in the very involved industrial disputes of the present day. But let me repeat, from my observation, the minister has chosen very good men to act on these boards.

[Mr. H. B. McKinnon.]

I do not agree with the practice of some members of the legal profession going all over the country to participate in every petty dispute which arises here, there and everywhere. Although I am a member of the legal profession, I have not a great deal of sympathy with that type of professional man. There are some good men among them, but I know others who are not in favour of the thorough prosecution of this war, and after all, industrial disputes—as is evident from the experience of the United States—will be a menace to the war effort unless the government lays down some policy with respect to such issues when they arise. We are now away behind with our war effort, and there is not a day to be lost.

Some time ago in the case of Snyder vs the Toronto Electric commission, I was associated with an appeal to the privy council to determine whether sections of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act were intra vires of the parliament of Canada in regard to public utilities as certain sections of that act of that day were involved in a labour dispute with the system's employees; and after all Canadian courts it came before decided it was, the privy council gave a very important judgment on the matter of property and civil rights in the province, the law of contracts and that of employers and employees. The late Lord Haldane delivered the judgment of the court, which was a very good one, and dealt with the constitution of the board and the duties of its members.

I have been all my life a supporter of labour, especially the trade union movement. When properly administered, without the intrusion of agitators, it has been in many ways a blessing to this country. In my opinion some good labour men can be engaged as members of boards, but they cannot afford to lay off work without remuneration for one, two or three months. I know of one involved arbitration which lasted fifteen months. It arose out of the taking over of the street railway by the city of Toronto, and cost nearly a million and a half dollars.

I am sorry that I was not in the chamber this morning. Has the minister any information from the old country as to a change, under war-time conditions, in the constitution of the British boards? Is it now the law of England that they are not to be paid?

Mr. McLARTY: Not as far as I know.

Mr. CHURCH: County court judges receive, I believe, $25 a day. They are allowed by the tariff $15 a day, but when they relinquish their other judicial duties it is our practice to give them $25 a day and expenses.

As I have said, there are some very good labour men. I might mention Mr. Joseph Gibbons, who has served on one or two commissions. I am sorry that his services are not more frequently utilized.

I will support this measure if the government thinks it is necessary in connection with the war effort, although it seems to me rather dangerous to upset in times of war an arrangement which has worked well in times of peace.

Mr. McLARTY: There is one matter mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview as to which I might make a correction. Nothing in this bill prevents any labour man or any representative of industry from receiving the fees prescribed by the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. In other words, the mere fact that he is a member of the board will not constitute him a counsel or paid agent of either employer or employee. The fees may not be very large, but we have had no difficulty in finding people to serve for them. Consequently labour will not be in a prejudicial position in that regard.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rose to ask the minister a question a few moments ago. I understood him to say that certain regulations would be made as a result of this amendment. Those regulations, I suppose, will specify just what classification a man will come under who has some pecuniary interest in a dispute. Not only will the Department of Labour get into more and more difficulty as a result of this amendment but, as was suggested by the hon. members for Vancouver East and Davenport, I believe the government is taking away the type of arbitration board formerly intended. It is taking away from labour some of the rights they formerly enjoyed.

It is not always that a question of wages is involved. Sometimes questions of working conditions have to be considered. A dozen and one different questions may be involved in a labour dispute, questions which have nothing whatever to do with wages. Therefore in order to have its case properly placed before other members of the board, it is necessary that labour have someone there who has a practical knowledge of the situation.

The minister has pointed out that labour may submit evidence to the board. But, in choosing the member of a board, labour is not going out to choose one who is not conversant with labour conditions. The attitude of labour on various questions has been one of desire and hope of bettering their conditions. How far-reaching, then, is this amendment going to be? If a person is a member of a trade union, a member of a trade congress or of the Canadian congress of labour, and a matter of vital importance to the whole set-up of unions in Canada is involved, that person would have a pecuniary interest and would be debarred. In any matter which is going to benefit his union, even though it may be a dispute with another union, he is bound to have a pecuniary interest.

The minister is the one who will have to say whether or not a man has that interest. Should the minister refuse to accept a nominee of labour on the ground that he may have some interest, the minister would be in very serious difficulty, and would immediately have all the labour organizations in the country on his neck.

I feel very much as did the hon. members for Vancouver East and Davenport. I do not see how we can gain anything from this amendment, and I feel that we are going to have more difficulties in the Department of Labour in designating who is or who is not interested. If the minister is anxious to have a non-partisan board to deal with labour disputes, a board before which labour and industry, and whoever else may be involved, may state their positions, then rather than curb the type of representation one can have on the board, I suggest that labour and all other parties concerned would be much better off if the minister would say, "We will appoint a board of judges in every province who will sit on these disputes, and to which evidence may be submitted under oath." This bill is unfair to labour; under its provisions labour is the group whose representations will be curbed.

Mr. NEILL: At first glance I did not see anything objectionable in the bill, but after hearing the hon. member for Vancouver East I have somewhat altered my opinion. I did not hear everything he said, but I gathered from what I did hear that he was voicing the opinions of labour unionism, and stating their opposition to this bill. He may not have had direct authority—and I do not see how he could have had, because the bill was introduced only a few hours ago—to speak for labour. But if any hon. members can lay claim to representing labour, then I should think the hon. member for Vancouver East must be one of them. So far as I can gather he appears to make strong objection to this bill.

The very essence of the bill, as in respect to similar legislation, appears to me to be framed on cooperation, on the getting together of labour and capital, in order to come to some reasonable arrangement. Any suggestion of doing so by way of legislation which has the appearance of having been forced on one or other of these bodies would be bound to react unfavourably against any prospects of cooperation in any dispute.

As it has been opposed—and it has been strongly opposed—by people representing labour, I suggest that we might accept the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Vancouver East, namely, that of withdrawing the bill; or it might be stood over until the next session. It is rumoured that we will meet in a couple of months—not likely more than three months. By that time publicity will be given to the purpose of the amendment, and it would be possible to have a better idea as to the way in which it would be accepted by labour.

There is one other point I would mention to the minister. In the bill we find the expression "No person . . . who has any pecuniary interest, direct or otherwise". It might be possible in high places—and I do not at all suggest that it could happen under the present minister—that under some circumstances there might come a time when it would be desirable to favour one party's interests rather than those of another. It would be possible for whoever had the deciding of the issue to regard the recommendation of the labour group as undesirable. That group might select, we will say, Tom Jones, a prominent labour sympathizer, but a person not essentially connected with the dispute. It might be possible to say, "No, we will not accept that man, because he has an 'otherwise' interest." In other words he may have an indirect interest in the dispute.

We will suppose that it would be a dispute between the employees and the management of a street railway company. It would be possible to refuse the appointment of a man not directly connected with labour, but one who is perhaps known to be a sympathizer. The argument might be used that as he was a potential passenger on the street car it would be possible, if the demands of the labour element were accepted, that the price of street car tickets would be increased. Therefore it would always be possible to turn down nominee after nominee until a man was secured who was more or less favourable to the other side of the argument. It is going too far to prevent a man from acting as a representative in a dispute because he might have an "otherwise", in other words an indirect, interest in such dispute.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In connection with this matter I believe I fall in line with the observations of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). At first I did not see very much that was wrong in the bill, and I thought the word "otherwise" might tend to make the conciliation board more impartial. I believe now, however, that it will deprive labour of its chance of being represented by people who in other ways might not be objectionable.

I suggest that what the government ought to do is to stop strikes before they start. Do not let them get started. Do not let us have any of these stoppages in war work. The government should do everything possible to see that such stoppages are prevented. There must be no suspicion of injustice in the minds of the people of Canada, and particularly in the minds of labour. I believe if the word "otherwise" is left in the bill it will be just one more small thing which might cause a good deal of trouble. It would develop suspicion, and thereby render it more difficult to prevent stoppages of work.

We must remember that a great many people in Canada, and practically all people in Great Britain, have given up many privileges. We are going to have those privileges back after the war; in the meantime I think we are all satisfied to be deprived of them. In my opinion the government should make it very clear that in the matter of dealing with labour disputes there will be no injustice, and that they are not going to take a dictatorial attitude on behalf either of labour or of capital in connection with war work in Canada. In other words the government must take a firm stand. The very fact of having the word "otherwise" in the bill will mean that there will be suspicion, and just another small cause for discontent with the board. I believe the minister would be wise in removing that word and thereby removing suspicion.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument that has been put forward on this bill. I am not always in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), nor am I always in agreement with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I have been directly connected with labour for thirty-five years, but I have not been delegated to speak for labour at this time. I believe the minister is sincerely trying to make these boards of conciliation more impartial, but I am in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver East when he says that that is almost impossible. As the hon. member said, labour will appoint a man who has the labour viewpoint, and the employer will appoint a man with the employer viewpoint. This bill will restrict the field from which labour can draw. Right now we have a board of conciliation and it may be necessary in three months' time to have another board. Will this legislation not prevent either capital or labour from continuing to have as their representatives the men who are now sitting on the board?

Mr. McLARTY: That is not the intention.

Mr. O'NEILL: It says "counsel or paid agent."

Mr. McLARTY: They would receive their pay under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and would not come within the purview of this amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL: I am glad to have that explanation, but the language of this bill may be construed differently to-morrow by a lawyer. It is not what the minister's opinion may be, it is the interpretation that will be placed upon the law. With all due respect to the minister, I must say I am afraid that this bill will prove detrimental to labour, and I suggest that he withdraw it at this time.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I could say a few words as one who has been watching the situation for a considerable length of time. We have had boards which were quite successful in settling disputes to the satisfaction of all concerned, and which brought down findings which had a fairly binding effect. We have had other boards which reached divided decisions and where it was found that the settlements arrived at were temporary indeed. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act provides for the setting up of what is in effect a judicial board, but recently a practice has crept in under which you have practically a board of arbitration. One side appoints an agent to represent it, the other side appoints another agent to represent it, and the Department of Labour appoints a judge or someone else as the third and only neutral member of the board. The findings rendered by many of these boards have not been beneficial to the settlement of disputes.

Perhaps we could take a specific case which has been referred to quite often in this house, the Peck rolling mills dispute. In that case an agent of the union was appointed as a member of the board along with the paid solicitor of the Peck rolling mills. A member of the judiciary was the third member. I suggest that that was not a conciliation board. In my opinion such a board could never agree. If the paid representative of the union and the representative of the employer could agree, the board would not have been necessary. The Minister of Labour is attempting to set up a tribunal which will assess the facts submitted to it and attempt to arrive at a mutual agreement based upon the facts presented by the two sides.

The government has no intention of barring the representatives of either side from appearing before the board. The representative of the union is entitled to appear and state his case as ably as he possibly can. Similarly, the company may send its paid solicitor before the board to represent the case for the company. But after that has been done, a decision is rendered by three men who have open minds on the subject. One man would have the view of labour, because we would assume that labour would choose a man who held such views. Another man would have the view of the owner, because we would assume that the company would choose a man of that type. Then we know that the Minister of Labour would choose a man with a judicial mind, one without any particular views on either side. We believe that that would be a board which would reconcile the facts brought before it and bring down a finding which both sides could accept as a reasonable settlement of the dispute.

Hon. gentlemen know that the success of the Department of Munitions and Supply depends almost entirely on the continuance of good relations between capital and labour. The highest objective I have in conducting the department is that those relations shall obtain. I discussed this matter with several labour leaders representing different occupational groups and I did not hear one dissenting voice to my suggestion that a completely impartial board of three would be more effective in solving labour disputes than the practice that has lately cropped up of appointing special advocates and special pleaders for each party with only one neutral arbitrator.

Mr. HOMUTH: I quite agree with what the Minister of Munitions and Supply has said, but to my mind it does not clear the situation. He has said that labour will name someone who is partial to labour and that industry will name someone partial to industry, while the Department of Labour will name the third member. Such a man may not be a professional or legal advocate of labour, but he will be a man possessing labour's viewpoint. When sitting on the board he is going to fight for the people who have named him to the board. If we could get what the Minister of Munitions and Supply has suggested we might get it would be a perfect set-up, but I do not think this bill is going to do it. In fact I think this bill is going to make things more difficult for the Department of Labour. I would far rather have the Department of Labour say that impartial boards are to be set up in Ontario and the other provinces to deal with these matters. The time has come when the Department of Labour must show courage in handling a situation of this kind, not only courage in handling labour, but courage in handling the industrial end. We dare not allow either industry or labour to interfere with our war effort. So far there has been too much of it.

The Department of Labour in bringing in this amendment is just bringing upon itself more difficulties. It is giving itself the responsibility of saying to one side or the other in a dispute: We cannot accept your nominee because he has some pecuniary interest in this dispute. If you deny the right to labour to choose its own representative, labour is going to say that you are unfair, and if you deny that right to industry, industry is going to say the same. Yet labour will be the greatest loser.

The minister would be well advised to withdraw this bill and to make up his mind that the Department of Labour will handle these disputes with only one end in view. Being fair, yes, but seeing that nothing shall interfere with the production of the essential raw materials required by this country. There could very well be set up in every province an impartial board, even to the extent of appointing to these boards judges who will sit and hear all disputes between labour and industry. It is a big job, and I sympathize with the minister because I know some of the responsibility that is his. It is a job that has to be handled with courage and yet with great diplomacy. I do think that the minister could work out some better way of dealing with these disputes than the method this bill provides.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to say a word in reply to the remarks of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He would be right and I could agree with him if all these disputes were disputes involving wages and conditions. His conclusion was based on the assumption that labour has bargaining powers with the employer, because he said that if an agreement could be arrived at by a board as constituted at the present time, the same understanding could have been arrived at between the employer and the employee.

Mr. HOWE: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, what I said was that if the appointees, the paid representative of the labour union and the paid representative of the employer, could ever hope to agree, a board would not have been necessary in the first place. When you add a third party, you get a decision of the board which is a majority decision. But the chance of getting a unanimous decision of the board, where you have a paid representative of one party and a paid representative of the other, is very unlikely unless the employer and the union could have arrived at such an agreement without the intervention of the board.

Mr. GILLIS: In any case, and under any arrangements, you will have a paid representative of the employer and a paid representative of the employees, because I presume none of these people is going to work for nothing.

Mr. HOWE: But paid by the crown.

Mr. McLARTY: Paid under the act.

Mr. GILLIS: In those circumstances the employer would be represented 100 per cent. That is my honest conviction.

I may have an opportunity later to express what I had in mind earlier when I was ruled out of order, with respect to a proper solution of the problem. I am convinced that the employer and the employee can iron out their difficulties without boards of conciliation, provided that some of the legal barriers set up by order in council are removed so as to give labour and industry an opportunity of coming together and having their own tribunals through the medium of organization. I think the Minister of Labour will agree that at least 85 per cent of the disputes that have arisen since the outbreak of the war have not been over wages and working conditions but rather over the demand by the employees of recognition of their right to set up a collective bargaining agency. In addition to that phase of the question, which must be thoroughly examined if we are desirous of arriving at a solution, we must remember that the final decision of the board, after it has been set up and has taken evidence from employer and employee, is made as a result of examination of that evidence. If the representative of labour on the board is not qualified, has not the technical training which will enable him to make an examination of the evidence so that a proper report can be brought in with due regard to the people he represents, you are not going to have any solution of the problem.

I will not say any more just now, except that I think the Minister of Munitions and Supply was labouring under a misapprehension, or else I misunderstood him. I feel that he would be right in his contention if labour was organized. I believe that 75 per cent of the boards which have been set up and 75 per cent of the money that is being wasted on them could be eliminated, and then we could get down to business.

Mr. O'NEILL: In my experience I can recall only one conciliation board in a period of thirty-five years which brought in a unanimous report. If that is so, it seems to me that the men who comprise these conciliation boards must be pretty well biased, if I may put it in that way, when they go in there to sit on a board. The representative of labour will have the labour class viewpoint, and that viewpoint only. He is there for that very reason. Similarly with the man who goes in there to represent the employer; he is there because he has the employer's viewpoint on the subject. I can recall only one case, I say, in thirty-five years where a board brought in a unanimous decision.

An hon. MEMBER: Was that a railwaymen's case?

Mr. O'NEILL: The case I refer to was not in connection with operating railway men.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon) stated a few minutes ago that if this bill carries it will be possible for either party to be represented at the hearing by its counsel or solicitor even if he had been occupied as counsel for the party within the preceding six months. From my recollection of the act that statement is not correct. Counsel or solicitors may appear for either party at a hearing under this act only by consent of the parties, and even in cases where such consent is given it is still within the power of the board to refuse to allow counsel or solicitors to appear at a hearing. I think that is the provision, and in order to meet the case my hon. friend has in mind, it might be necessary to amend one or two other sections of the act to make it perfectly clear that if the bill carries in its present form counsel would have the right to appear at the call of the party whom they represent.

There is no doubt that the principle as stated by the leader of the opposition this morning is the one which should be applicable to judicial bodies, and if possible to boards of this kind. However, the board set up under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is not a judicial body. It is a conciliation and investigation board. During the many years in which the act has been administered it has, I know, been the practice for parties to the dispute to cover a very wide range in the selection of the men who are to represent them on the board. There is high authority for the statement that no man can serve two masters. At first blush, it might be said that a solicitor who within a short period prior to a hearing had been representing one of the parties could be regarded as holding a brief for that party, but I suggest that it has not always worked out in that way. Obviously, too, in the setting up of a board of this kind, the parties to the dispute will select their own representatives, and those representatives will reflect the general views of the respective parties. It is not possible in the circumstances to set up a board that could be wholly free from the charge of partiality, or so long as both parties have the right to choose their own representatives. The amendment reads:

> No person shall act as a member of a board who has any pecuniary interest, direct or otherwise, in the issue of a dispute referred to such board or who is then acting or has so acted within a period of six months preceding the date of the application for a board in the capacity of solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent of either of the parties to the dispute.

If this goes through it will be quite permissible in the case mentioned by the minister or in any similar case to have one of the representatives proposed by the employees turned down on the ground that he had some interest, direct or otherwise, in the subject matter of the dispute, while another person appointed for the employers might be counsel not for one of the parties but for a corporation controlling shares belonging to such party if it happened to be an incorporated company. If one wanted to exhaust all possible anomalies that might arise in dealing with the question of indirect interest one would have to frame a much wider section than this. I am not sure whether it is intended that this legislation should be retroactive or at least whether it is to come into effect at once and be applicable to boards now in existence, but if it is I see no reason why the effect of it might not be to disqualify in some particular case a member of an existing board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister read the section of the act with regard to the presence of counsel before the boards, and also clarify the words "direct or otherwise"? I have been thinking this over since we were here this morning. Its implications are numerous.

Mr. McLARTY: The section to which the leader of the opposition refers is section 42 of the act:

> No counsel or solicitor shall be entitled to appear or be heard before the board, except with the consent of the parties to the dispute, and notwithstanding such consent the board may decline to allow counsel or solicitors to appear.

With regard to some of the observations that have been made, I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) say that in thirty-five years he had never known of a unanimous board award.

Mr. O'NEILL: I know of only one.

Mr. McLARTY: I can assure him that during the time I have been Minister of Labour, until recently when this technique has developed, there have been a great many unanimous reports, which were extremely helpful. In fact, I would say that the majority of them were unanimous in the first year, but this technique has come about and it almost makes it impossible to have unanimous approval because of the interests of either of the parties. I admit frankly that I do not think we shall ever come to the point where we shall have complete impartiality. The fact that a man is appointed either by labour or by industry almost naturally indicates his inclination, and that is all right; but we are not helping to get paid counsel sitting on the boards. This bill was considered by the national labour supply council, on which are the heads of four leading national labour organizations in Canada. They have all approved it.

Mr. MARTIN: Is Mr. Tom Moore on that?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think there is anything in the bill that would be prejudicial to labour. The suggestion has been made that we are restricting labour. We are not for a moment taking away from labour or industry the right to appoint its member of the board. We are simply saying to labour, as to industry, that there is a very small class that should not be appointed because it would prejudicially affect the impartiality of the board. That is the whole effect of this. Personally I have no objection to deleting the words "direct or otherwise".

Mr. O'NEILL: Let me submit a hypothetical case. Suppose there is an accident just outside the city. A train and an automobile are both racing for the crossing. The automobile is hit, the driver is killed and the engineer is up for manslaughter. Naturally the labour organization will employ the best legal talent they can to protect that man. The case is disposed of, and two months afterwards the engineers become involved with the railway company in a dispute. A conciliation board is appointed. Could the engineers in that case appoint as their representative on the board the lawyer who had defended them in the court action?

Mr. McLARTY: I think the answer would be in the negative if he had acted as counsel on behalf of a union within a period of six months.

Mr. O'NEILL: That is the point I am making. You are narrowing the field of those upon whom the labour organizations may call to act as their agents on a conciliation board.

Mr. McLARTY: The same applies to industry. The same situation might arise there.

Mr. O'NEILL: But they have more to draw from than labour.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Mr. MacINNIS: The bill will be improved slightly by the amendment. I think it will be helpful to the Department of Labour, because they would find it very difficult to define who was or was not affected by having a pecuniary interest in the dispute. But my objection to the section still stands. I am going to propose an amendment that will limit the prohibition not to solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent who acted for either of the parties, but to one who acted in respect of the dispute then before the board. I therefore move:

That the section be amended by striking out all the words after the word "agent" in the thirteenth line, and that the following be substituted therefor:

"in respect to such dispute or any matter involved therewith."

Mr. McLARTY: The effect of this proposed amendment would be to eliminate completely the benefit we hope to derive from the general amendment. It means that they may not have been employed as counsel in the particular dispute which is being heard by the board. The purpose of the general amendment is that they shall not have had the pecuniary interest of being employed by a company or of receiving financial remuneration from a union for six months. The hon. member's amendment would simply destroy the effect of the bill, since the limitation would be only in respect to the particular dispute involved. It would render the general amendment useless and prevent us from obtaining what we hope will be an impartial board. Before a dispute arises it is unlikely that there would be consultation with counsel, and the only limitation effected by the amendment of the hon. member would be that they had not been consulted in the particular dispute under review.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has referred on several occasions to the impartiality of the board, yet I think that both he and the Minister of Munitions and Supply admitted that you could not have an impartial board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But should that not be the aim?

Mr. MacINNIS: It cannot be the aim as long as you allow each side to select its representative. It is pure nonsense to talk about an impartial board as long as you say: This man will represent me and that man will represent you and the third man is the umpire. The third man may be impartial or he may not. My own opinion is that he can be impartial only to a certain degree. But counsel may present arguments and help the union or the employees or the employer to place the evidence before the board. What you are doing with this measure so far as the employees are concerned is limiting them as to the number of qualified experienced persons from whom they can draw who are able to analyse the evidence and stand up against a judge and another trained representative of the employers.

Mr. McLARTY: Does the hon. member think that the majority of employees' representatives on boards are as a matter of fact paid by some union in connection with that service?

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Mr. McLARTY: I think not.

Mr. MacINNIS: If they are not, why this section, if it is not aimed at someone? What is the section aimed at if the representative of the employees—

Mr. McLARTY: Let me admit that there are some.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then the purpose of this is to prevent these few or this particular one or two from appearing on boards. The minister should be careful what questions he asks.

Mr. McLARTY: I think it would be fair to my hon. friend if I suggested that more lawyers have been employed by employers appearing on boards than by employees.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course, because lawyers do not work for nothing.

Mr. MARTIN: No one does except members of parliament.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, some members of parliament do not work. However, getting back to the point, the minister withdrew the words "or otherwise" because he found himself unable to define what they would mean. Can he define the words "of the parties to the dispute"? To whom will they apply? For instance, take my own organization that I mentioned this morning, the amalgamated association of street railway employees in America. If they have as counsel a man who appeared in a case in Toronto for division 113 of the association, would that man be debarred from appointment as representative of division 101 in Vancouver on a similar board? He is possibly a party to the dispute. Does this apply to national organizations, to provincial organizations or to local units?

Mr. MAYBANK: I do not believe that the amendment would in any wise help, but I do not believe that the bill itself will accomplish what is expected of it. I think we shall find that after passing this bill we shall not have got any nearer to impartiality, for reasons which have been stated by several hon. members. They are simply to this end, that when a person is chosen by either side to the dispute he is chosen because he is a partisan, and we do not change that except to say certain types of partisans may not be chosen. If you cannot have men on the board who are regular counsel or have been regular counsel for the disputants, it seems to me you have to leave it open to the disputants to have their counsel before the board, which sometimes they have and sometimes have not. But I cannot believe that we shall accomplish anything by this legislation. I am in favour of it as it is written, in favour of the idea of getting an impartial board, but in voting for this bill I do not believe we shall really be accomplishing what we are aiming at. It may be well enough to try it for perhaps a year or two, and experience will show whether it has any value or has been a detriment, more particularly in the labour world. Would it not be a good idea, if the bill is passed, to withhold the application of it for a time in order to see what further reactions there may be, more particularly in the labour world, with regard to it? Very often it happens that central labour organizations, such as the advisory body mentioned by the minister, are not thoroughly representative of their membership on the particular issue upon which they are expressing their views. It might be well to hold up the application of the measure for a while.

To sum up, while I shall vote for the legislation, and while I should like to see impartiality achieved, I cannot bring myself to the conviction that we are going to get it as a result of this measure.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is one interesting feature of the discussion. I would point out to the minister that hon. members who have opposed this legislation are representative of all three of our groups in the house, and have been intimately associated with labour organization. I refer to the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre, Kamloops, Kenora-Rainy River, Waterloo South, Cape Breton South, and Vancouver East. Under these circumstances it is fairly evident that there is an uneasy feeling among those who are intimately connected with labour organizations and understand the working of these disputes and of the conciliation boards. I believe that feeling will be in the minds of labour at the present time, and if there is one thing all of us should try to avoid, it is giving those elements in our country that are trying to subvert our war effort any opportunity of using anything we do in this house to promote dissatisfaction in the labour field at this time.

I join with others in urging that the bill be withdrawn for the present and that, perhaps, the reaction of organized labour be obtained in order that we may arrive at some conclusion upon the subject.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has organized labour not approved the principle of this bill?

Mr. McLARTY: Oh, yes. So far as organized labour is concerned, the notification I had from the national labour supply council, which is representative—very representative—of organized labour, was that the matter was unanimously approved, without any recorded dissent in connection with it.

The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that in agreeing to the withdrawal of the words "direct or otherwise," I did so because I could not explain what it meant. I can assure him that that was not the purpose. I was impressed with the argument that the term might be difficult to apply in the matter of administration, and for that reason I am quite prepared to have it withdrawn.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister allow me just one word? I was speaking the day before yesterday to the president of one of the national labour organizations who is or was a member of the national supply board. He told me that he was opposed to this amendment. I did not speak with other representatives of labour here, and consequently I do not know the views of all of them, but that is the position so far as this man is concerned.

Mr. McLARTY: All I can assure this committee of, Mr. Chairman, is that he did not record in any way his dissent from the recommendation that this legislation be passed.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister has stated on two occasions, confirming it in his answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East, that labour as represented on the national labour supply council were unanimous in their approval of this legislation. Is the Canadian congress of labour represented on the supply council at this time?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, they are, but I did not use the word "unanimous" as regards their approval. What I said was that there was no dissent recorded. I took it that the council approved; it was without recorded dissent.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the minister said in reply to the leader of the opposition that the vote was unanimous.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. McLARTY: No. Well, I wish to be fair. If I did state that, I was in error. I said that there was no recorded vote to the contrary.

Mr. EDWARDS: As a matter of information, may I ask the minister how the provisions of this section will be implemented? How is he going to ensure that the board is impartial within the meaning of this section; and what would be the effect of an award made by the board if it were discovered that one member was not in fact impartial within the meaning of the section?

Mr. McLARTY: That is, perhaps, going pretty far. I suppose that, once the board is established, it will have to be assumed that it is qualified to act, and that a subsequent discovery that the information is wrong should not be allowed to upset the award of the board.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Probably the minister can clear up a difficulty which has occurred to me. Heretofore, both sides have been appointing their representatives—you can call them legal representatives or agents—on this conciliation board to represent the views of the contending parties. Under section 42 of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, an agent or legal representative is prevented from appearing before the board without the consent of both parties to the dispute. How will employees get their case before this board if they are not allowed to have a solicitor or an agent there to present it?

Mr. McLARTY: There is no prohibition of an agent appearing before the board. Section 42 does not provide that. It says that counsel shall be allowed to appear before the board only with the consent of the board. There is no reason why agents should not be allowed to appear. Of course they will. This will not affect in any way section 42.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do the words "solicitor, legal adviser, counsel or paid agent" apply to a legal firm or to an individual? If Smith, of the firm of Jones, Jones, Jones, and Smith, has acted for one of these organizations within the six months, will this section prevent him from acting in that capacity, while it would not prevent one of the other partners?

Mr. McLARTY: I think we shall have to be consistent and say, where Jones and Smith are partners, and Smith has had a retainer and has acted for the company within six months, any member of his firm would be precluded from acting.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister did not answer my other question, asked a moment ago, as to whether the solicitor for the national organization of any of the many local unions throughout the dominion—remember, it is the local unions which have the disputes—will be debarred from acting for the local union in another city?

Mr. McLARTY: The answer is, yes, in the same way as a solicitor for the Canadian Pacific Railway company might have a dispute at one point or another. I would say that the national solicitor for a union could not under this provision sit upon a board, because he would be drawing direct remuneration.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the Minister of Munitions and Supply:

That the words "direct or otherwise" in the sixth line of section 1 be deleted.

Mr. NEILL: If this amendment passes, we shall be very little, if any, better off than we were before. We appreciate the minister's giving way to the argument that these words made the section too restrictive, but let me turn to the wording of the section as it appeared in the act originally:

No person shall act as a member of a board who has any direct pecuniary interest in the issue of a dispute referred to such board.

That is now changed in the bill to "any pecuniary interest, direct or otherwise." It is now proposed to strike out the words "direct or otherwise," so that the section will now read "who has any pecuniary interest in the issue of a dispute." That, Mr. Chairman, is exactly as it was before, although expressed in somewhat different words. The inference would be to a pecuniary interest, however small. The argument could be used about which I spoke an hour or two ago, to the effect that the section might be applied to a man who rode on a street-car.

If the minister is going to give effect to what he offered to do, then he should put the section back as it was before, and insert the word "direct" so that it will read, as it did for many years, "who has any direct pecuniary interest."

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member must realize that the last five lines in the amended section constitute a difference between the original section, and the suggested one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those are alternative.

Mr. NEILL: I cannot see that the following five lines have any bearing on the matter. If we are going to put the section back as it was before by striking out the words "direct or otherwise," then it certainly should read "any direct pecuniary interest in the issue of a dispute." Anything else is promising us bread and giving us a stone.

Amendment (Mr. Howe) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. MacInnis:

That the section be amended by striking out all the words after the word "agent" in the thirteenth line, and that the following be substituted therefor:

"In respect to such dispute or any matter involved therewith."

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment negatived.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. McLARTY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I endeavoured to make a few observations when this measure was before the committee, and I was told that they were not relevant at that time. At this time, therefore, I desire to make a general summary of the measure, as I see it. The bill brought before the house by the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) is one through which ways and means are sought to improve conciliation machinery. In my opinion, however, this bill absolutely restricts and definitely rules out any opportunity labour may have had of having adequate representation on conciliation boards.

I am endeavouring to point out to the minister that the amendment proposed in the bill will serve to make more confusing an already badly confused situation. I believe that the present state of unrest in labour is attributable to at least some of the measures enacted by order in council, but never implemented.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are they?

Mr. GILLIS: I refer first to order in council P.C. 2685, which gives the workers the right to organize. The principle of the right to recognition of trade unions is set out in no uncertain terms right through that order in council. Industry is strongly advised to meet employees, to give them the right to organize, and to sign collective agreements.

That order in council was well worded, but it has never been given legal status. So far as labour in Canada is concerned, order in Council P.C. 2685 is not to-day worth the paper on which it is written. It is advice to those who, in my opinion, are to a great extent responsible for the present situation, but that advice was never followed by action, nor was it given any legal interpretation. The failure of the Department of Labour to follow up that order in council and to see to its enforcement, as the department follows up and sees to the enforcement of legislation which has for its purpose the restriction of the rights of labour in war time, cannot be excused. Practically every piece of legislation in which the rights of labour are restricted has been enforced, but order in council P.C. 2685 has not been. The bill before the house will only make greater the confusion which at present exists. As I tried to point out this morning, to cure a disease one must get at the cause. The government cannot cure the disease of industrial unrest by operating from the top, through conciliation boards. It must get to the bottom, to the base of the trouble. At the present time that struggle has its basis in the efforts of the workers to form collective organizations through which they may have a say in the management of industry. That is the point from which the government, if it wishes to effect a cure, must work.

The minister must first give some consideration to the enforcement of order in council P.C. 2685. Second, order in council P.C. 7440 was another move which badly confused not only the average workingman but those men who sat in on conciliation boards. They have not been able to interpret it. Perhaps that suggestion is best exemplified in the dispute which has taken place in the rubber industry. The personnel of conciliation boards have not been able to obtain a proper interpretation, or a correct understanding of order in council P.C. 7440. The Minister of Labour will remember that the Bowmanville rubber workers put in motion all the legal machinery of conciliation. A board was set up and made an award of increased wages which was satisfactory to both employer and employees. After that report had been made, the Minister of Labour wrote to the rubber workers' organization in Bowmanville and stated that the conciliation board had erred in its award which had been accepted by employer and employees. It was stated that the decision was over and above what was called for by order in council P.C. 7440, and it was stated that at some future time this organization would be called upon to defer their right to further increases on account of increased costs of living until such time as the overpayment had been made up. I think in that case the board understood its duties and took the real meaning out of the order in council.

This situation is illustrated by what has occurred at the Peck rolling mill. They put into force all the legal machinery as stipulated by the government. A vote was taken, and an examination of the situation was made. In their Trenton, Nova Scotia, plant, Dominion Iron and Steel pay a base wage of forty-five cents an hour, and the same rate is paid in the Sydney plant. Yet in Quebec they pay only 30·7 cents an hour. The conciliation board split, the majority holding that their interpretation of order in council P.C. 7440 was that the wages paid in 1926 and 1929 should be the basis of the award, and their award was made accordingly. The union representative presented a minority report, which was based upon his interpretation of order in council P.C. 7440, to the effect that in areas where wage levels had been depressed during normal periods, the board had jurisdiction to level up.

As a result of all this, a strike has been in progress in the Peck Rolling Mills for the past month. Employees are suffering, and an organization which should be producing war materials is shut down. Confusion exists because order in council P.C. 7440 beclouds the issue. The interpretation has been given by the Department of Labour that wages must conform to the 1926 and 1929 level irrespective of whether they have been depressed. My information is that not very much is being done to cope with this situation. In my opinion an examination should be made of this entire industry which controls twenty-six subsidiaries from Sydney west into Ontario. The industrial rates of wages should be the same for all plants. If the basic rate in one plant is forty-five cents an hour, then that rate should apply to the entire industry. Instead of this strike being prolonged for a month, instead of the people having to suffer and production being curtailed, the board should have been reinstructed. The wages at the Peck Rolling Mills in Montreal should be levelled up to the rates prevailing throughout the rest of the industry.

The National Steel Car corporation established a plant in Montreal. They pay forty-five cents an hour in Hamilton and 30·7 cents an hour in Montreal. Quebec is a low-wage province. We hear much about national unity, and yet wages in Quebec are much below those in other parts of Canada. This tends to create in the minds of the people of that province the thought that they are not being treated exactly the same as the rest of Canada.

This is, in my opinion, one of the reasons for any disunity which may exist among certain sections of the French-speaking people. I could discuss this question for perhaps a week if I examined into all the problems. I shall, however, deal only with contentious matters.

A few months ago the hosiery workers in Oshawa went out on strike in an effort to have redressed what I consider were legitimate complaints. The wage rates ran from sixteen to thirty-seven cents an hour. These people did not understand the working of the conciliation machinery—one must have some legal understanding in order to interpret these orders in council—and for that reason they perhaps got away on the wrong foot. They went out on strike, and the minister instructed them as to the necessary road to travel. The result was that they returned to work and applied for a conciliation board in the ordinary way. Since the board was set up, something else has been done to antagonize them. A commissioner was appointed to examine into why the trouble developed. He is investigating the officials who are making an attempt to present the facts in a reasonable way to the board. This only leads to confusion.

This is why strikes occur. As I said before, 75 per cent of these disputes are in the unorganized sections of industry. In the final analysis, what is a strike? It is simply the result of the accumulation of grievances over a period of years. Restrictive legislation and other matters place the employees in a position where they cannot exercise their rights as citizens and express their opinions. I have never found a member of a labour union who was not ready to recognize a problem that really existed. These grievances pile up, and finally someone comes along and gives the needed leadership. I do not think any of these people want to break the law; it merely happens that someone comes along who is prepared to take responsibility and a strike develops.

We have a situation like this at the present time in Toronto. Only this morning the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked the minister about a strike in the General Electric plant at Toronto. These people have not union recognition, and they do not know the rules. Many of us who have made a study of these matters are not as clear on them as we should be. As a result, confusion now exists at that plant. I believe the minister stated that a delegation was in Ottawa at the present time to see him in connection with this problem. Some people are going to get into trouble because they accepted leadership in order to bring their grievance to the attention of those in authority. There are perhaps three or four hundred who have grievances which they want to discuss. In my opinion the way to handle this whole situation is not by bringing in a bill like this which merely restricts the right of the working people to have proper representation upon these boards.

The Department of Labour is one of the most important war departments because it has jurisdiction over the hundreds of thousands of workers in this country who are turning out the raw materials necessary for the proper prosecution of the war, and what the Minister of Labour has to do, as an hon. member said this morning, is to accept responsibility for the administration of his department, stand on his own feet, and keep as closely in touch as possible with those who represent organized labour in Canada to-day. I know that they are reasonable and want to travel the right road. Take, for instance, the Congress Journal or the Canadian Unionist, the two official organs of the two major unions in Canada, and you will find that they have mapped out a constructive programme of advice to those who are attempting to handle the affairs of labour through the department. If the road mapped out by them were put in order of council form or in a bill, and brought before this house and the Minister of Labour were given complete jurisdiction over his department and told to go ahead and cooperate with the workers in order to get the best effort possible at this time, this would go a long way towards clearing up our present difficulties.

As I view the situation, however, there are things holding back the Minister of Labour. There are advising him people who have the wrong viewpoint, and a lack of knowledge of the particular problems which the minister must have if he is to find a solution which will put the relations of labour and industry on a sound basis in Canada as they are in England. I think Ernest Bevin in England is the most important man in the British government because he has the confidence of the organized union movement 100 per cent, and the workers in England are prepared to relinquish many of the rights which they have fought over a long period of years to gain, and to place them in the hands of Mr. Bevin on the assurance that, after the war, a new England, and perhaps a new Canada, will be built and that what they relinquish will then be handed back to them. They are relinquishing those rights because they have confidence in him.

We should do that with the Minister of Labour at Ottawa, but the way to do it is not to tie him up with restrictive legislation such as we have here. I could cite case after case, and I bring these matters to the minister's attention only in order that we may get down to basic principles and endeavour to set up an organization through which the working people will be given an opportunity to express themselves. I believe that 90 per cent of the trouble in all our industries across Canada to-day is on account of the fact that the working people are denied the right of sitting in with the management. I know from my own experience of thirty years in unions that the employees will always be reasonable if the case of the employer is properly understood. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company in the Sydney Mines section—and if the hon. member for the district were here he would corroborate what I say—when it went into liquidation in 1932 called in the union membership and said: "You have to take a 25 per cent reduction in wages if this industry is to continue".

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the hon. member in mind that a great number of plants have shop committees of the employees, and is it not a fact that the companies receive advice from these shop committees and consult with them, as I think they should?

Mr. GILLIS: I am speaking, not about company unions but about legitimate union movements.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking about workers' associations in the shops.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. As I was proceeding to point out to the minister, when it was shown that a section of that industry was insolvent, the workers took a 25 per cent reduction in their wages. I think they were more reasonable than they should have been because the bondholders' holdings were made good, and the workers worked at reduced wages for two years, to put the industry back on its feet, and are still slowly climbing back to the wages they received in 1932.

The same thing was true in Pictou county, where the workers had $125,000 taken directly out of their pay envelopes to put that industry back on its feet. That could never have occurred were it not for the fact that there was a recognized union whose representatives could sit round the conference table with the employer and take back a message to the employees.

What is happening in the General Electric company's plant at Toronto to-day? The workers have nowhere to go, no organization through which to present their case, and as a result they are out on the street trying to find a solution. Their wages and working conditions are not what they should be, but they have no way of bringing the matter to the attention of those in authority.

[Mr. Gillis.]

In the final analysis, those in industry are largely responsible on account of the anti-union attitude they take. They fail to recognize the fact that the very democracy which they exercise so freely themselves they deny to their employees. The mining industry of Ontario is solidly organized and represented by a general mining association. Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal is organized for the three maritime provinces one hundred per cent through their associations. The general merchant is represented through merchants' associations. The boards of trade represent commercial enterprises. There is a bankers' association. Every phase of our economic life is organized with the exception of the industrial and agricultural workers, and every stop-block that can be put in the way to deprive them of that right is used.

I should like to warn the operator. While he may be afraid that if the workers are organized and start to bargain collectively, they may cut into his profits 5 or 10 per cent, yet if the operators continue to travel the road they are travelling at the present time and to terminate democracy, then before this war is over they may lose much more than they would lose by recognizing the rights of the organized workers. That is something which they must face at the present time, and my advice to the minister, if he wants to do something, is very simple.

First, I think the conciliation machinery should be speeded up. A board is applied for, and months go by before it makes its report. That makes the workers a prey for any subversive elements that wish to exploit their unrest. I have no hesitation in saying that 90 per cent of the workers who go on strike do not do so because they want to strike and be idle. They have many troubles; when they do go out on strike, the subversive elements are apt to play on the men and exploit their unrest and the next thing one finds is that a bad situation has arisen. All that could be cured by setting up legitimate unions. Therefore I say that, first of all, the conciliation machinery must be speeded up. There is no reason why a board should take months to get down to the facts of the case and make its report.

Second, there is order in council P.C. 2685. Those regulations have been passed, and it is simply a matter of putting teeth into them. The Minister of Labour would be one of the biggest men in Canada if he rose in his place, accepted responsibility one hundred per cent and, in cooperation with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), said that that order in council is going to have legal status from now on, and a proclamation was issued that industry shall recognize the right of the workers to organize and from this date on accept committees of its employees through their legitimate representatives.

I think order in council P.C. 7440 must be clarified. It should really be repealed, but, if not repealed, it should at least be amended and a new start be made. It has many drawbacks.

I should like in closing to leave this thought with the minister and to make this plea. All our outstanding disputes could easily be cleared up. The situation at the Peck Rolling mills could be cured very easily. The workers in Quebec should be assured that their right to the same wage levels as prevail throughout the rest of Canada is recognized. Stop the situation in Toronto at the General Electric plant before it spreads to many other industries in that city where the workers are endeavouring to do the same thing. In the Chrysler plant at Windsor many men lost their jobs, and some of them have not yet been reinstated. These little odds and ends should be cleared up and a new start made. I know that the workers will go down the line with any man who they think is honestly interested in their welfare. The workers are reasonable, and they will assist the Minister of Labour in doing what should be done, provided he accepts responsibility.

I regret having to take up the time of the house; but in view of the fact that I am closely associated with the unions, know their point of view, and understand what they want, I wished to make a general statement in order to sum up the situation so that the Minister of Labour or any members of the government who might be labouring under the delusion that certain palliatives of the kind proposed in the bill will remedy matters might have their minds disabused of that idea. Every time you patch the thing you make it worse. A new start must be made on the basis I have indicated. We must do a good job once for all, so that we shall forget all the sectional difficulties and quarrels that beset us and put our minds to the main issue of producing machines and placing them in the field in order that we may defeat those whose intention it is to regiment us and deprive us of those rights that we have now, including the right of every one of us to rise in his place in this house and discuss matters with the rest of the members.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have given some study to this matter, and I should be glad if the hon. member would elaborate a little. What is the clarification which he thinks desirable and necessary in connection with order in council P.C. 7440? He ought to be specific about that, because it has troubled me a good deal to know what the point at issue is. I know the trouble in the rolling mill case. The minimum wage is too low.

Mr. GILLIS: Order in council P.C. 7440 fixed the wage rates at the 1926-29 level, and every conciliation board that has sat so far has applied that literally. The order in council states that in areas where wages were depressed at that time, the rates could be levelled up, but there never has been any levelling up. A rate of 30·7 cents an hour in the steel industry is a depressed wage, and a strike has been in progress now for a month, an endeavour being made to iron out that situation. In my opinion the board should be instructed definitely that the wages prevailing in the steel industry, in Dominion Iron and Steel, should apply in every province. That would be a clarification. Moreover, the basis for the awards of the board in fixing rates is the cost of living as set out in government statistics. But the order in council also states that any sections which may be exceptional should be taken into consideration and that increases in the cost of living might be applied.

There is unrest at the present time in Nova Scotia, and I have particular reference to the eastern end of the province. The reason I know; and a conciliation board has been sitting there. They took as a basis in fixing the wage rate the fact that the cost of living had risen 7·2 per cent since the outbreak of the war. I know that the union in cooperation with the merchants' association made a cost of living examination embracing practically the whole island of Cape Breton, particularly the area in which about 7,000 organized workers are centred, and in that examination they proved to their own satisfaction that there had been an increase of 26·1 per cent in the cost of living in that district. That figure was not their own, because the merchants' association participated in that examination.

If you expect to compensate these people for the increased cost of living by giving them thirty cents a week as a war bonus to offset an increase of 26 per cent in the cost of living, you are bound to have antagonism, and there will be a tendency to fight back. In addition to that, there is the national defence tax, and there are all the other ingredients that go to produce unrest, turmoil and misunderstanding. When a board sits, if the increase in the cost of living is to be made the basis of settlement, that board should make an examination and adjust wages to the increased cost of living. That would be a clarification.

The boards proceed on the assumption that if you were paid twenty cents an hour in 1926-29, that is the prevailing rate in that section, and they go no further. If an understanding were arrived at on these matters, it would in some degree help order in council P.C. 7440.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the case in connection with the Peck Rolling mills.

Mr. GILLIS: That is pretty general throughout.

Mr. McLARTY: So far as I know, no board is prohibited from going into local cost of living conditions if it so desires. That is a matter which is in the discretion of the board.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; but that has not been done. It will be observed that on the board held in Halifax, one of the first things that the representatives of the men were told, when they sat in, was that order in council P.C. 7440 fixed wages on the cost of living basis of 7·2 per cent, and the board took that for granted. No sectional examination has ever been made.

Again, there is the question of the right of workers to organize. I did think that order in council P.C. 7440 had some merit in those sections where the workers were not organized, in that it instructed conciliation boards to recommend union recognition. I think they gave some legal status to the order in council. That has never been done. There is no recognition in the Peck Rolling mills; the operator is not dealing with them. In the Hamilton situation, where the head of the Hamilton steel company was displaced, there was turmoil. There is no union recognition. The controller placed there by the government still refuses to do business with the union. The government is managing that plant through a controller, but who is controlling the controller? He still refuses to carry out the provisions of the order in council P.C. 7440. There is room for clarification there. Someone must accept the responsibility of coming to an understanding of what these things mean, and so declare.

Mr. McLARTY: There is nothing in order in council P.C. 7440 or P.C. 2685 compelling recognition of the right of collective bargaining. It is purely a matter of giving freedom, as they have done in England.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a recommendation.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; it is a recommendation, and, in the opinion of the government, if that is done, labour relations will be improved. I believe they will.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): It is to be regretted that the Minister of Labour did not introduce this legislation earlier in the session. Here we are in the last days of the session having had hardly anything to discuss with regard to labour or the labour department, not even estimates. I think this is the most serious question facing Canada to-day. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) asked last week about a strike, I think in Toronto, and when he sat down I asked the minister if the plant was organized or unorganized. At the conclusion of the sitting he came over and asked me what the purpose of my question was. I told him that the purpose was to draw to the attention of the industrialists or the employers of Canada that if they were not prepared to recognize and assist legitimate labour organizations, they were going to have illegal action of that kind. It is the people of Canada, and the war effort of Canada, that will suffer. I hope the Minister of Labour and many other hon. members will to-morrow take the speech that was made just now by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and read it carefully. If they do, I think they will gather from it some idea of what must be done if we are going to be free of labour unrest in this country.

I mentioned during a brief discussion of the bill in committee that if it were not for the fact that I might be ruled out of order, I would draw attention to where I believe this bill had its genesis. Undoubtedly, in my opinion the idea behind the bill is to take from labour some of the advantages it now has on conciliation boards. A month or so ago, speaking in this house, I made reference to remarks made by Mr. Justice McTague in connection with a conciliation board of which he was chairman and commended his statement warmly. Someone sent me a copy of the Windsor Daily Star of May 28 last in which a speech made by Mr. Justice McTague on labour was reported in full. I wish to quote briefly from that speech. Having read the speech, I am satisfied that Mr. Justice McTague's usefulness in conciliation disputes is at an end. He was speaking at the Assumption college alumni dinner, I suppose it was on May 27. I shall give his position with the government so that I shall not be accused of attacking a judge.

He said:

> Labour in Canada needs leadership, responsible leadership, declared Hon. Charles P. McTague, justice of the supreme court, appellate division, and chairman of the war contracts depreciation board, Ottawa. . . .

I also think he is conciliation adviser to the Minister of Labour.

In these first words in this report of his speech, "Labour in Canada needs leadership, responsible leadership," there is the implication that to-day labour has not that responsible leadership. That is a libel on labour leadership in Canada. Mr. Justice McTague, in making a facade for his attack on labour, said this:

I am, however, in view of an attitude of mind I have observed on the part of various employers when I have been engaged on work as chairman of conciliation boards, going to make one or two historical observations. The attitude of mind I have reference to, and with some employers it persists in this year of our Lord 1941, is that they refuse to recognize the right of the workmen to band together for the purpose of collective bargaining in a union.

Then he went on to give a historical review of how the right of collective bargaining was won in Great Britain. He said:

The right of collective bargaining was expressly established by statute of parliament in 1825, and collective bargaining with all its necessary accompaniments as we understand them to-day became finally recognized as the law of the land in England by act of parliament in 1875.

He said:

Sometimes I wonder if they—

That is, the employers.

—have any realization of how old-fashioned and reactionary they are. Trade unionism has existed as such in England for two and one-half centuries. When I say that I mean trade unionism as it is to-day, not to be confused with the mediaeval guilds composed of employers and employees which existed centuries before that.

And he continued:

In the face of historical facts like these it is certainly difficult to understand some employers' attitudes to trade unionism. It is like saying the American revolution never took place, or that at least it should not have taken place.

Then, after saying those words in connection with employers, he went on to show what the ordinary wage worker was entitled to, quoting from Pope Pius XI, Quadragesimo Anno:

The wages the worker is entitled to should be sufficient to enable him to live in frugal comfort, but this is subject to the ability of a particular industry to pay that wage and also subject to the economic welfare of the nation as a whole.

A man with a point of view like that cannot be acceptable to labour as a conciliator, because labour will no longer accept the position that they are entitled only to a wage sufficient to give a frugal comfortable living. They are not going to accept that so long as they see an enormous ability to produce lying idle in this country, sabotaged because employers curtail production in the interest of profit. Then, again, labour cannot be content to be tied down to what industry is able to pay, because labour has no say in the management of industry, and what industry may be able to pay may be due to the management of industry. Then he went on to say:

If wages were to go up it would not be at the expense of the employer but to a very small extent; it would be at the expense of the national revenue. What does labour say to that as a partner? Again, there is a choice—partnership or sabotage. What does the labour leader and the union executive choose? Will it be leadership or sabotage? I have confidence enough that, when the situation is really understood and analysed, it will be partnership and leadership and not sabotage.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. But note the implication of that, the clear implication is that it is sabotage now, because the situation has not been clearly put and clearly analysed. I say again that that is a libel on labour leadership in this country.

Mr. MARTIN: If that is what it means, certainly it is.

Mr. MacINNIS: That—definitely—is what it means. It cannot mean anything else. I am coming to the basis for the amendment with which we are now dealing. The minister used this afternoon the word "technique". It occurred to me that I had seen that word somewhere before, quite recently. In his speech Mr. Justice McTague said:

You often hear of what is commonly called a technique. You all know what I mean. In the last few weeks I think I have been able to detect a new technique in labour conciliation machinery. A certain union applies to the Minister of Labour for a board of conciliation. It represents that it is the accredited bargaining agency for the employees in a certain plant. The fact may be that it does not represent the majority at all.

This is the beginning of the technique. The next step—

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, might I interrupt? I did not use the word "technique" in relation to that at all. My reference was to technique in the matter of members of boards, and in the sense that I used it, it had nothing to do with the application for a board.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just wait a minute. We shall reach, in due time, the matter of the technique with regard to the board. I was dealing only with the first step.

The next step is that the parties appear before the conciliation board and then the question arises as to whether the union represents the men or not.

The union would not raise that question. That question will always be raised by the employer. But here it says that it is the union that raises it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Would that not be a fair question to raise before the conciliation board by either of the parties concerned?

Mr. MacINNIS: But why accuse union leaders of using this as a part of their technique?

The union executive then suggests that a vote be taken.

Note this.

The conciliator appointed by the union mildly and subtly suggests that the only fair way to ascertain the disputed fact is for the conciliation board to order a vote.

And then we have this gem:

The chairman and the other conciliator who usually have not the necessary experience to recognize the technique agree and a vote is authorized and held at the expense of the Department of Labour.

Here we get the full basis for the amendment to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act which we have now before us. The other poor representatives—a judge of a superior court and a well-paid, highly-trained corporation lawyer—these poor innocents do not know what to do when this union conciliator subtly and mildly suggests what should be done; and lo, the vote is taken, and the result is, although the judge does not say so, the employees agree that they want to be represented by the union.

I did not wish to bring this out, but there is the reason for the amendment which is now before us.

Then he has something to say about order in council 7440:

To-day government policy as to labour is illustrated by order in council 7440. As a part of the national economy against rising inflationary costs of living, wages are stabilized at the 1926-1929 level or higher thereafter to the date of the order in council. Labour is to be entitled to a flat bonus against rising costs of living—again consistent with the ability of the industry to pay.

I do not think that is in order in council 7440.

In principle, there can be nothing unfair about that in time of war provided the levels in any particular industry were not unfair—and that can be only the rare case. Yet, sometimes, one gets the impression from their conduct that leaders of certain unions are encouraging a deliberate attack on the order in council.

The other day I got a return from the Department of Labour, in which there was a letter written by Mr. Justice McTague to the Minister of Labour. I wish to read that letter. I do not know that the material tabled is all the information I asked for, but undoubtedly it is all the information the minister could give me. The letter is as follows:

Toronto, April 7, 1941.

My dear Mr. Minister:

Dr. Stewart has forwarded to me various documents in connection with the Peck Rolling Mills dispute in Montreal for my formal opinion to you.

The report of the majority of the board is, I think, sufficiently within the terms of P.C. 7440 as now framed that it should not be referred back.

Then there is this paragraph:

However the report confirms me in a view which I have held for some time that it might be advisable to amend the order in council so as to bring it better in line with what I conceive to be general departmental policy.

The last few sentences of the letter are:

As this is a subject having to do with policy I feel that I should do no more than write you personally and confidentially as to the views which I have. Accordingly I am writing you a personal letter on the subject.

Therefore I imagine, there is another letter, personal and confidential. This one is not so marked; if it were, the minister would be within his right in refusing to table it.

It is regrettable that such things should happen in our country to-day. At the conclusion of his speech Mr. Justice McTague said:

Presently a lot of people are treading dangerous ground. They should be leading in the direction of preparing the way for the aftermath, not sabotaging the present. Canadian labour leaders must handle the situation so that they can look a Bevin or a Morrison or a Greenwood or a Citrine in the face, and Canadian labour must behave so that it can meet khaki, navy blue or air force blue without the blush of shame. Techniques must be abolished and honest and constructive estimation of facts must take their place.

When I was a young fellow there was a saying that distant fields looked green. I would point out that even to-day there are in Great Britain people who are suspicious of Bevin, Morrison, Citrine, Attlee and Greenwood, and who really fear what may happen if Bevin, Morrison, Citrine, Attlee and Greenwood come to power. They fear that more than if Hitler crosses the channel. I wish to say to this house that there are people in this country who are of the same opinion. There are some who are so afraid of social change that they are willing to take a chance with nazism. They must take their choice, but they cannot avoid both.

Having mentioned Mr. Bevin's name, I should like to quote something he said quite recently:

You can easily recreate wealth. You can't recreate liberty once it is gone, nor can you recreate confidence, the spirit of cooperation and contentment in the heart of the worker after class-hatred once is implanted.

I should like to assist the minister and the government in dealing with the labour questions confronting us to-day, because I believe I know as well as any man in Canada the forces working to subvert labour.

On March 10, I discussed in the house the Hamilton Steel Car situation. I drew attention to the fact that an application for a board had been made on February 3. That situation has not yet been settled. What a field for those who wish to carry on subversive activities! How well is the field prepared for implanting doubt as to the sincerity of the intentions of the government, and the people in industry! Yet, we must deal with those things adequately and quickly, or we shall have more trouble.

There was one other difficulty in connection with the Hamilton Steel Car affair. The board took a vote of all employees in the plant with the consent of the company; yet the company refuses to allow the board to deal with any matters except in those particular departments in which the conciliation board was applied for. But there is a conciliation board sitting in connection with a strike at Kitchener. I have in my hand a copy of a letter from the Minister of Labour to the chairman of that board. It is dated at Ottawa, May 29, 1941, and states:

Dear Judge McGibbon:

Re Kitchener strikes

During the course of the day I have been interviewed by several of the Kitchener manufacturers in regard to the labour conditions existing in Kitchener and I am addressing my remarks to you as chairman of the board of conciliation and investigation.

As Minister of Labour I would like to know the reasons behind the trouble in Kitchener and I hereby authorize you to widen the scope of your board into one of investigation and a fact-finding board, so that myself and my department will be fully informed as to the reasons for the existing situation in Kitchener.

I would be glad, therefore, if you would extend the scope of your board to one of a board of inquiry or fact-finding, and report to me the reasons of all the strikes in this industrial centre.

In my opinion, that is a misuse of a board of conciliation. I have no doubt in the world that a fact-finding board in that area, and all over Canada, is needed at the present time. But I doubt very much if Judge McGibbon is the man to undertake it. It should not be undertaken without consultation with labour and employers. Such a commission would be along the lines of the one known as the Mathers commission, which went across Canada in 1919.

The point which I wish to draw to the attention of the house in reading this letter, is that in one plant in Hamilton, where the government has appointed a controller, the employees have asked that the conciliation board investigate the whole of the plant. That request was refused. On the other hand, we have the request of a few manufacturers from Kitchener, and a conciliation board is set up—

Mr. McLARTY: That request was not refused.

Mr. MacINNIS: —giving a wide field to find out the cause of the strike.

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member is incorrect in his statement. It has not been refused.

Mr. MacINNIS: But it has not been granted; is that not correct?

Mr. McLARTY: The last application has not been granted.

Mr. MacINNIS: "The last application." Then I take it that the first application, or the previous applications were refused?

Mr. McLARTY: No; there has been no refusal. But the fact is that the application has not yet been dealt with, because the present chairman of the board, Judge Dowler, has been in communication with my department for some time in connection with the matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whether the last application has been accepted or not, the fact remains that when the workers asked for something, it was not done; but when a few employers asked for something much wider in scope, their request was granted, right on the spot. I say that is not the way to obtain the confidence and cooperation of labour.

Mr. McLARTY: I think I must correct what the hon. member has said. What was done was done on the recommendation of the chairman of the board, Judge McGibbon.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have just read the letter—

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS:—in which the minister authorizes and instructs the chairman of the board to do certain things that the chairman would not take it upon himself to do.

Mr. McLARTY: He recommended it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to say anything more in this connection. I am sorry that, after all the objections raised to-day, the minister has not seen fit to defer the third reading of the bill until the beginning of next week, thereby affording himself an opportunity of thinking it over during the week-end. Here are problems which are going to require the best thought all of us can give. Leaving such a matter over for one or two days, or until such time as he might be able to judge the reactions from various parts of Canada, would not jeopardize the effectiveness of the measure.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was going to make a brief answer to certain points which have been raised. If it is desired, I could do so when my estimates are before the committee of supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: It would be better to have the reply in this discussion on the bill.

Mr. McLARTY: Then, Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection I shall make my remarks now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. McLARTY: The debate has covered a wide range of matters, and I do not think I should attempt to deal with each individual case which has been investigated by an industrial disputes investigation board. There are quite a number of them, and possibly I could take up one or two now and leave the rest until we are considering the estimates of the department.

I consider that the decision in the Peck Rolling mills case was an unfortunate one, it being based more upon the company's capacity to pay than upon any other basis. The result was that we amended the minimum wage section and raised the rates of pay for those employed in war work throughout Canada. I would point out that the matter of minimum wages is primarily and essentially a provincial one. In other words, the province is responsible for wages.

Reference was made to Kitchener. I may say that the chairman of the board came to see me, and I discussed the matter with him. He told me that he thought the reference was a little limited. He was not referring to it on behalf of industry or on behalf of labour; it was simply as chairman of the board. He asked me if I could widen the scope of the investigation. It so happened that I saw the manufacturers that day, but no suggestion came from them. I deemed it a reasonable request that the board should be permitted to go into not only the petty issue, but any other issues which might be cause for trouble.

The suggestion has been made that the government should make the provisions of order in council P.C. 2865 coercive, that we should compel collective bargaining. The provisions of that order in council are not mandatory; they are simply a recognition that in the opinion of the government this would be the best way to produce satisfactory labour relations in war time. If you enter into the field of compulsion on the one side, you have to enter it on the other, and then you stir up inevitable difficulty. One trouble leads to another. If you have compulsory recognition, then you must have compulsory arbitration, and I believe that the labour organizations of this country are not in favour of that.

There are a number of other matters. Reference was made to the address of Mr. Justice McTague, and I am sorry it was thought necessary to bring that up. Mr. Justice McTague enjoys a high reputation as a judge in the province of Ontario and I believe he has proven consistently that he is a friend of labour. I think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will agree with that. It is a little unfair to extract one sentence from his speech—

Mr. MacINNIS: Not one sentence, the whole speech.

Mr. McLARTY: The sentence to which the hon. member paid the most attention was a very brief one. I rather doubt that Mr. Justice McTague meant exactly what the words convey in connection with the lot of workers in Canada. The fact is that his actions do not correspond with those words. I do not believe there has been an occasion where Mr. Justice McTague has not secured the support of the workers in connection with the work of any conciliation board of which he has been a member, and he has been a member of quite a number. He has a wonderful record, and I think in fairness to him I should state definitely that some misconstruction has been placed upon the words he used, perhaps unintentionally. A number of labour leaders have come to me and have told me what a splendid chairman Mr. Justice McTague has made.

I think an almost unfair attempt is being made to give the impression that this bill is directed against labour. It is not. I can state quite frankly that one of the reasons which prompted its introduction was what happened in the Peck Rolling mills case. This bill is not directed against labour in any way, shape or form. The fees paid under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, while perhaps not large, have made it easy for labour to get representation upon these boards. They are not doing it merely for the sake of the money but in order to try to produce peace and harmony. The only purpose of the bill is to see if we cannot rehabilitate the impartiality of the boards and get unanimous reports. That is not militating against the interests of labour in any way, and it is not designed that it should.

There are a number of incidental matters which have been brought up, but I think it will be well to let them stand while we are on the third reading and take them up when the departmental estimates are under consideration.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 98, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National railways system during the calendar year 1941, to provide for the refunding of financial obligations and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for refunding and capital expenditures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far as I can observe, this bill follows the resolution. Is it the bill usually presented on such occasions, or does it contain any new provisions?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): It is the usual bill except that there is a provision relating to pension funds.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Power to aid other companies.

Mr. MacINNIS: I assume that this is restricted to assisting other companies controlled by or a part of the Canadian National railway system?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the same as the section in the act of last year. It is to enable the Canadian National Railway company to assist companies in which it is interested, in which it owns all or part of the stock. I think the term "said companies" refers to the companies mentioned in section 3 of the bill. That is "any one or more of the companies or railways comprised in the said national railway system." Section 6 uses the words "any other or others of the said companies and railways." I think this refers to the companies or railways comprised in the said national railway system. Where the words are used in section 3, there is no doubt that that is the meaning of the reference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think anybody could possibly give it any other interpretation.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Guarantee.

Mr. COLDWELL: These clauses more or less deal with financing. Has the minister any idea as to the rate of interest to be paid on these securities? I suppose they are government guaranteed bonds and will be issued at practically the same rate of interest as government bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot speak accurately on that. The rates vary with the terms of the bonds. It would be the market rate. My recollection is that the return on government guaranteed securities is usually slightly greater than the return on government securities, but only slightly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is quite right.

Mr. COLDWELL: What will be the terms of these bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: They will be issued from time to time.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is left to their discretion, and the term will govern to some extent the rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Proceeds paid to credit of Minister of Finance in trust.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are the terms under which the proceeds are released? What evidence is supplied to the minister? I was familiar with it once; I do not know now. Is it just a resolution of the board of directors? While the minister is looking that up, may I call attention to the fact that subsection 1 provides that the proceeds of the sale of these securities are to be paid to the Minister of Finance in trust. Subsection 2 provides for the application for the release of any part of the proceeds. But on what evidence are the proceeds released? Is it the mere resolution of the board of directors?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not familiar with exactly what is done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what this section says, and I wondered whether a mere resolution was sufficient?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are safeguards. The board of directors would proceed by way of resolution to authorize a capital expenditure, and it is also authorized by the governor in council. The method of application is set out in subsection 2 of section 9.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That only means a resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: But that does not mean that they can move behind the back of the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that.

Mr. ILSLEY: They must comply with the law about their expenditures. This section merely relates to the method of getting release of the funds. The railway goes to the Minister of Transport, and the Minister of Transport goes to the Minister of Finance, who releases the funds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I am suggesting is this, that a mere resolution of the board is all that is indicated in the section. My understanding of the position is that in the finance department there is an officer whose duties involve—I will not say the complete control—following these guaranteed operations very closely. He is the man who has to be satisfied before the minister authorizes the release of any of these moneys. Mr. Roberts used to have that position, I think, some years ago before he was transferred. I have no doubt as to the regularity of the proceedings. I do not think the railway will get any of this money unless it conforms with the intentions of parliament, but I was just wondering whether some other evidence more than a mere resolution of the board of directors should not be required. In the case of trust deeds, before you can get moneys of this kind released, you have to go a long way further than this. You have to acquire the new security upon which the bonds are to be issued. I quite agree that the government in railway financing would not need all that, but a mere resolution does not seem to be enough. There ought to be some evidence that would set out the whole position so that, if there was error, it could be checked, instead of leaving it all to just a resolution of the board of directors. These matters soon become routine unless you require more than that.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The expenditures must be authorized.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What evidence of the expenditures is required other than the passing of a resolution? That is one of the things about which I am thinking.

Mr. MULOCK: It is in the discretion of the Minister of Transport, by lines 30 and 31 on page 3 of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know, but that is just a matter of his approval. What evidence is supplied to him?

Mr. MULOCK: The Minister of Transport may in his discretion approve.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): His discretion does not mean anything. I do not wish to be abrupt, but I do not think the hon. member who has interrupted knows anything about the matter. I should be quite surprised if he did. What I am suggesting is that this money is paid out on the basis of a resolution of the board of directors and on that alone, and that would not be enough for other corporate financing. It may be enough for the government-owned railways.

Mr. ILSLEY: I presume that the comptroller of the treasury has control of this, and the finance department would be careful that money did not go out that was not for an authorized expenditure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So long as it was within the terms of the statute.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Contribution to Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways employees' provident fund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just what is contemplated under this?

Mr. COLDWELL: If we are going to have a discussion of this clause, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that it is six o'clock, although I would be quite willing to continue sitting for a few minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask one question now because I cannot be here at eight o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is all right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is contemplated to be paid into the provident fund this year? I recognize this fund as an old friend, and I have no doubt that these supplementary contributions are necessary. I am not opposing them because the fund is not adequate to take care of what is to be paid under it. Some of the older employees come under this fund, and they think they should be treated the same as the men they work alongside who come under the new fund. How much is intended to be paid into the fund this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two funds here. One is the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways employees' provident fund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; that is the old one.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other is the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund. The amounts that have been paid by the railway into the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund, in the years from 1936 to 1940 inclusive, have been $100,000 a year. I can give the reason why these payments had to be made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not asking that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other fund is the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways employees provident fund. Regulation 4 provides that his majesty shall contribute annually to the fund out of gross earnings of the railway an amount at least equal to the total monthly contributions by employees, but not exceeding in any one year $100,000, in such sum or sums as the governor in council from time to time determines to be necessary for the maintenance of the fund. In 1940 the railway paid, as a special contribution to offset the deficit in this fund, the sum of $1,443,511.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many employees are covered?

Mr. ILSLEY: The number of contributors in 1940-41 was 7,972. The number in receipt of pension in 1940-41 was 2,044.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSOLIDATED FIRE AND CASUALTY INSURANCE COMPANY

On the order:

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. I submit that this process will not be legalized unless whoever is leading the house moves that we suspend the resolution passed February 17. We can pass that by unanimous consent, otherwise this procedure is not in order.

Mr. MULOCK: It was so stated last night, and I move to that effect.

Motion agreed to.

The house in committee on Bill No. 62, respecting Consolidated Fire and Casualty Insurance Company—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Classes of insurance authorized.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the sponsor of the bill give a short statement explaining its purport?

Mr. McILRAITH: This company was incorporated in 1930 to carry on a general insurance business. It was authorized by section 6 of the act of incorporation to carry on several different classes of insurance, but the main business was fire insurance. Since that year, insurance practice has changed considerably, and it is now customary to include in a fire insurance policy classes of insurance that were not included at that time. In addition to that, this year the regulations defining the classes of insurance have been amended. These regulations may be found in the Canada Gazette, volume LXXIV, page 3072. The changes in the definition of the various classes of insurance have also made it necessary that the new classes be authorized. Therefore, while certain new classes of insurance appear to be authorized by section 1 of the bill, it is not quite fair to say that those classes are entirely new; part of them are merely covered by the change in definition and by the change in insurance practice. It is impossible to be precise about the extent to which the classes of insurance authorized by the amending section 1 are new.

Section 2 of the bill merely deals with the amount of capital required before the company may engage in any particular class of business. That is made necessary by reason of the changes in the previous section. There is no substantial change; it is a change in form rather than in substance, in order to bring the section dealing with authorized capital into line with the object section of the act.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF JAMES BAY

The house in committee on Bill No. 63, to incorporate the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of James Bay—Mr. McIlraith (for Mr. Chevrier)—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Property of corporation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much land is covered by this diocese?

Mr. McILRAITH: Possibly I might be able to give some information on that point. The sponsor of the bill is not in the chamber, and I happen to have some knowledge of it from memory and familiarity with the bill in the committee stage.

The area covered is very large, but the actual population in the area is very small. The population is, I understand, some 5,300 Indians, about 120 white people and a few Eskimo. I am sorry I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question as to the exact area.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think in committee they mentioned that there were something over 500 square miles of territory covered, and section 2 reads:

All lands, tenements, hereditaments and property, real and personal, now or hereafter belonging to and used, held, occupied and possessed or enjoyed by the said Right Reverend Henri Belleau or his church, in communion with the Roman Catholic Church, or by the corporation, and which are situate within the said vicariate apostolic of James Bay, are declared to be vested in the corporation.

This means that any property which may now or in future come into the possession of this reverend gentleman will also become the property of the corporation. Therefore I thought it would be well for the committee to know how much territory was covered.

Mr. MARTIN: It is the diocese.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wanted to know where the diocese was situated.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the area surrounding James bay. It does not cover the whole territory, but it covers the property.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the bishop wishes he had less territory.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): To be owned by the reverend bishop, but instead of his owning it personally it will be a corporation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any limitation to the property owned?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No. Why should there be?

Mr. COLDWELL: It might be one church and one rectory.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I can throw some light on that also. It is largely what they describe as mission territory, and the church property is now held by the Right Reverend Henri Belleau in his own name. It is intended that this property shall be put in the name of the corporation now being created by this bill. Practically all the property now held is in the name of the Right Reverend Henri Belleau, and very little of it is held otherwise.

VIVIENNE RHODES WHITAKER STOREY

The house in committee on Bill No. 66, for the relief of Vivienne Rhodes Whitaker Storey—Mr. Emmerson—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Right to marry again.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask if the sponsor of the bill, or anyone else who knows, can explain to me the inconsistency between sections one and two, and which is found in all these divorce bills. The first section reads:

The said marriage between . . .

I will not give the names; there is no use in embalming the names of these unhappy people in Hansard. The said marriage between this woman and her husband—

. . . is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

That seems final and definite. The second section reads:

The said . . .

Giving the lady's name.

. . . may at any time hereafter marry any man whom she might lawfully marry if the said marriage with the said (man) had not been solemnized.

Either that is unnecessary, or else it should have gone further and conferred the same right on the man. If section one is correct when it says that the marriage is null and void, there is nothing more to it; nothing more is needed; but if it is not enough, and it is necessary to confer the right of remarriage on the woman, the petitioner in this case, it is also necessary and advisable to confer it on the other party. I would suggest that the form be changed. I do not wish to hold up the bill and have it stopped, but certainly there is an inconsistency.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Unfortunately the other party is able to marry again, too. I have already advocated that there should be a clause that the party against whom the divorce is granted should not be entitled to marry again, but it was not accepted by parliament. Both parties have the same freedom.

Mr. NEILL: At any rate, the bill should read one way or the other. Now, it seems to throw a doubt: it says that one party may remarry, but it does not say the other may.

Mr. HOMUTH: The divorce law provides it.

ANN ELSIE BUCKLEY

The house in committee on Bill No. 89, an act for the relief of Ann Elsie Buckley—Mr. Bercovitch—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. NEILL: I want to say a few words on this. I am using it only as an illustration to show what a burlesque this procedure is. I have no objection to this particular bill, and I shall not long detain the committee.

The other night the leader of the opposition—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I have to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the present procedure is the procedure which must be followed in connection with the adoption of these bills. There is an inquiry into these bills in the senate, and they go before the private bills committee before they come here. I do not think the word "burlesque" should be applied.

Mr. NEILL: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman. I will withdraw the word "burlesque". If I can think of a suitable substitute, I shall supply it later on. For the time being we shall call it "the proceedings". I do not believe that the word "burlesque" would be any worse characterization than this language:

> The action of this house in respect of the measure was much more governed by reason and common sense than was the action of the other house.

That was an expression used in the senate about a bill we passed two or three days ago. However, we shall let that go.

The other day the leader of the opposition made the comment that it would be a good thing for the public life of Canada if we had an official equivalent to what is known in the old country as the king's proctor. To those who may not be familiar with that term, I would explain that he was an eminent lawyer appointed to keep a watchful eye on lawsuits, in the public interest, and if he saw a palpable miscarriage of justice he was supposed to intervene. Very often he did so in connection with divorce bills, where he had reason to suspect collusion.

Three things are required in connection with the passage of a divorce bill. These three things must be proved. The first is the matter of domicile. The second is the question of non-collusion between the parties. That is, it must not be a frame-up. The third is that adultery has been committed. Whatever our feelings about divorce may be, that is the law. The law requires these things. It must be proved that there was no collusion. This is generally done by getting the petitioner to make an affidavit. In this particular case this is the affidavit, the statement made under oath:

> Q. Is there any collusion between you and your husband with respect to this divorce?
> A. No.
> Q. Is there any connivance—connivance means consent or acquiescence—in respect of this divorce?
> A. No.

That, of course, was made under oath. Let us look at these facts. I shall recite them briefly, and if hon. members think there has not been collusion—well, then, of course, I am wrong. We find in the evidence that the lady visited her husband some weeks before these proceedings started, and slept in the same bedroom with him. Of course there was no suggestion of arranging a divorce, at all! However, they had a discussion, and she said she was not going to have anything more to do with him. Still, they were quite friendly, apparently—at any rate they slept in the same bedroom.

All this happened at Kingston. I have always understood that Kingston is a place where there are things like hotels, and where they have plenty of accommodation. It was not a case of going out into the bush, and having to occupy the same place. At that time she was drawing an allowance from her husband from the Department of National Defence, because of his being a soldier. She was still drawing it at the time of these proceedings.

The next thing to which I would call the attention of hon. members is the evidence of the detectives. They must have been rank amateurs, from the way they went about their business. Perhaps it is because of my mean disposition that I come to this conclusion, but if there is not a thread of collusion running through this whole thing, then I am badly mistaken. The detectives, or the snoopers as they are sometimes called, consisted of a father and his son. They were of Jewish persuasion, and evidently did not believe in working on Saturday. It will be noted from the evidence that, curiously enough, these things always happened on Fridays. They spotted this man on August 9, again on August 16, again on August 23 and again on September 6—and again, curiously enough, it was always about the same time, namely, a little before six o'clock, or about that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just before sundown.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. In the other chamber somebody has curiosity enough to ask the question as to where this man had been, owing to the fact of his being a soldier. The answer was that he was at Petawawa on the dates mentioned. It was said that he was not on leave on the days in question, with one exception, but that he might have got leave from his commanding officer after the day's work was done. Petawawa is 120 miles from here, and I should think he would have quite a job to get through his work, and get down to Hull, where these things are supposed to have happened—and always to be there around six o'clock. However, the two witnesses agreed that he was there.

When a man goes out to be unfaithful to his wife, he does not generally advertise it. He does not herald it from the housetops. He generally chooses secrecy. This gentleman on the other hand seemed to be almost ostentatious in his infidelity.

Mr. MacNICOL: Bragging about it.

Mr. NEILL: Finally, in the evidence which is really to the point—and again this is on Friday, the 6th, at 6 p.m.—the detective saw this man, as he put it, go into the hotel and sign the sheet. He does not say what kind of sheet it was. Then they watched. There was the usual performance—I might be reciting the facts of any one of fifty divorces; they all read the same. A man stands to the left of the man who signs the register, and then he is able a few weeks later to swear to it. It is almost phenomenal that they should be right beside the man who signs, and just at the right time—or the wrong time.

Well, at eleven o'clock these two gentlemen went to the door and knocked. I have read some of these divorce cases, and in most of them the gentleman concerned usually chose to be snappy, or had some objection. Sometimes they even went so far as to tell the other person to get out, sometimes to mention where he could go to, or ask what he was doing there. But that was not the situation here, at all! What happened was this: He went there, and he was received almost with open arms. He knocked at the door and said, "What time are you going back to camp?" And then the evidence continues:

So before I had finished speaking the door was opened by—

Lieutenant So-and-so.

—and when he opened the door I told him I had been watching him on behalf of his wife's solicitor. He said, "What for?" I said, "Divorce proceedings." So we got talking. He said, "You are not going to the camp?" I said, "No." Meantime someone was coming along the corridor, so he opened the door wider and we went inside.

Just a nice, friendly get-together meeting!

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A party.

Mr. NEILL: There was no objection, at all. "Come inside", he said, "there is somebody coming down the passageway." Then he was asked to tell the lady's name who was lying there. The answer was that she was Miss somebody—I will not drag her name into it, because I think she is the most respectable of the whole lot.

The proceedings more or less terminated at that point. Does all this not suggest collusion? Read the whole thing through. Apart from all that, I would call attention to the sloppy way—I believe the Chairman will permit me to use that word; we will call it "sloppy"—in which this evidence was collected.

Thus, when these snoopers were watching they saw the corespondent and the respondent meet together, and "they both shook hands." What kind of lay-out would it have been if only one of them had shaken hands? But all this is solemnly recorded as part of the evidence, as to why this woman should get a divorce. The evidence states that:

. . . they both shook hands and went into the dining room.

They stayed there no less than two hours. Then, we find this later on, regarding the lady, one of them having discovered her as follows—and I would not shock your feelings, even if the house were full of ladies, because she is described in this way:

Her face was bare, and her shoulders were bare.

Well, you can go to the governor general's assembly in this building and find ladies much more bare than only their shoulders and faces. But, in this case, "Her face was bare"— perish the thought! Yes, "Her face was bare" —what kind of stuff is that? Does that comply with reason and with common sense?

I do not suggest that we should reject this bill, because it was not properly established. We are following the usual sloppy, inefficient, unfair, non-legal way of doing it. But it does suggest a definite need either for a king's proctor or, still better, for amending the laws so that these cases will be tried before courts, where matters of this kind should be taken care of.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend would make a good king's proctor.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not wish to give the Minister of Justice an extra job, but I suggest that if he could find some way of taking out of these proceedings provision for the right to marry again, he would find there would not be so many seeking divorces. I know one case of a lady who had been married twice and who wanted a divorce in order to get married again. Such procedure does not make for the upbuilding of Christian homes in the Dominion of Canada. I do not read through the evidence of these divorce bills, or very many of them; one is enough. We should throw out the whole procedure and bring in something more in keeping with the upbuilding of Christian homes in the Dominion of Canada, and then there would be fewer divorces.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with my hon. friend. If we were to eliminate the section giving the right to marry again. the number of divorces would be greatly decreased.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A number of the provinces grant divorces in the courts, not to make it easier but to make it cheaper. I call the attention of members of the House of Commons to the fact that it costs about $50 a minute to have the house sit here. I think it is too much to ask us as members of the House of Commons to spend time in debating this question of divorce when we have nothing at all to do with the manner in which the bills are brought before us. I protest against the whole procedure.

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 65, respecting United Grain Growers Limited—Mr. Thorson—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Characteristics of new shares.

Mr. PERLEY: Might we have an explanation of this section from the sponsor of the bill?

Mr. THORSON: This proposed division of the shares and the attaching of certain rights to the divided shares came before the annual meeting of the company in 1939, and the directors were authorized to work out an amendment and devise a plan. The proposed amendment came before a meeting of the delegates in November, 1940, and the request that parliament should be asked to sanction this division of the shares was approved unanimously by the delegates, 284 in number. Some of the details of the plan were objected to by two delegates, but otherwise the approval was unanimous. This division of the shares and the attaching of certain rights to the shares are made desirable on account of certain limitations imposed upon the shares at the present time. Shares can be owned only by farmers or their wives, and this means that when an owner dies or ceases to be a farmer, his shares cannot be transferred to anyone who is not a farmer. The whole scheme has been thoroughly discussed by the shareholders.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not wish to oppose the wishes of the majority of the shareholders as expressed at the annual meeting, but there are some observations which I think should be made at this time. This bill destroys the very principle upon which this company was founded in 1911. At that time the farmers wanted to protest against the accumulation of profits of the grain exchange going into the hands of persons other than farmers, and this company was formed for the purpose of having the profits which arose out of the operations of the farmers accrue back to the grain growers themselves. It was originally provided that all shares should be held by farmers and so forth. I have a copy of the minutes of the annual meeting, and an outline is given of the plan of capital stock organization. This is:

> For each share of capital stock (par value $25) there be issued one class "A" or investment share, par value $20, and one class "B" voting share, par value $5, subject to the following rights and limitations.
> In carrying out the division not more than four class "B" or voting shares will be allotted to any one shareholder. To the extent his present holdings of shares will permit and subject to the consent of the directors, a shareholder may elect to receive "A" (investment) shares only.

These are the qualifications with respect to class "A" or investment shares:

> Dividend—the right to a preferred dividend as earned (non-cumulative) of five per cent.

The bill does not contain that qualification; the rate of 5 per cent is not mentioned in the bill. There is no restriction on ownership, but the restriction on holdings is limited to 250 shares. They would have no voting rights and would be redeemable by purchase at market price, or, on call, at $24 a share. A preferred dividend of 5 per cent is paid upon the investment shares, apparently in lieu of their having the right to vote. Subsection 2 of section 2 is out of line with what the annual convention of last November demanded. I maintain that this bill does not express the wishes of these people. For the past week I have been trying to get in touch with some of the shareholders of United Grain Growers Limited, but, as was the situation with ten other companies to which I wrote, I could not get a list of the shareholders because they said it was not published. In view of the fact that this subsection is not in line with the resolution passed by the convention, I think we ought to postpone passing this bill until it has been completely ratified in its present form at an annual convention.

Mr. THORSON: The essential character of the company is preserved in every respect. With regard to the other points raised by the hon. member for Yorkton; first, with regard to the preferred dividend, it is true that the rate of the dividend is not specifically included in the bill; but if the hon. member will look at section 1, subsection 2, he will see that the powers which are to be exercised as a result of the passing of this bill must be exercised:

> . . . by the enactment by the directors of the company of a by-law in accordance with the terms of a resolution approved by at least two-thirds of the delegates present at a general or special meeting duly called for the purpose of considering such resolution and held either before or after the passing of this act.

That resolution was passed at the annual meeting in November, and therefore the resolution and the plan that was adopted at that annual meeting become the foundation for the whole bill. Therefore in that way the rate is fixed by implication.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Might I ask whether the resolution was passed by a vote of the delegates at the convention?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We were informed in the private bills committee as to the number of delegates present. Perhaps it might assist this committee to know the number of delegates who were at that meeting and whether they were unanimously in support of the resolution.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. THORSON: There were 284 delegates present at the annual meeting, and I think every local in the company, with the exception of three, was represented at the annual meeting.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: By voting delegates?

Mr. THORSON: By voting delegates. The resolution to divide the shares was passed unanimously without a dissenting voice. The resolution approving the plan was passed by all the delegates with only two dissenting votes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Shareholdings of delegates, etc.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think this bill should have been sent to the banking and commerce committee instead of to the private bills committee. I do not know why it was ever sent to the private bills committee.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask the sponsor if this bill will get over the difficulty that was faced on account of the fact that the shares are to be owned by farmers or lessees or farmers' wives or farm owners? Will the same difficulty not arise later on when some of the present owners of the shares die, or does the bill take care of that?

Mr. THORSON: I think the passing of this bill will bring the character of the company more in line with its essential purpose of being exclusively a farmer-owned company, because the shares to which voting rights are attached will be reduced in their value and can therefore be more easily sold to farmers than the present existing shares.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is quite true, that the farmers are going to have control, but the majority of the profits accruing from the operations of the company will go into the hands of those who are going to hold the preference shares, and they do not need to be farmers. One preference share valued at $20 and one common share at $5 are to be substituted for each old share. The information given to the private bills committee was to the effect that almost half the original shares had passed into other hands through farmers dying or retiring or willing these shares to someone else, and that they were not now in the hands of actual farmers. Those who hold or can get control of these shares, which are probably worth nothing if the holders are not farmers, will immediately have shares in their hands to the value of perhaps $25 or $30, and the information given to us in the committee was that within the past two years some of these shares have sold for as low as $6 and $6.50. The market for the shares of such a company is restricted to farmers, and the price of the shares is a reflection of what is happening to agriculture, in the west particularly. The farmers have no money to invest in anything. They are trying to keep alive. But if the shares do start paying dividends, say of $1.50 a share, there may be farmers who would be willing to pay $1.50 for them; and if the company is left as it is, the agricultural population will benefit from its operation as one of their own businesses. Is it not true that the largest share of the profits of the company will be in the form of preferred dividends to the people who own the preference or class A shares?

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member forgets that all the holders of these shares will receive, in return for the shares they now hold, two shares, one of which will be the voting share, and the other the investment share.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I stated that.

Mr. THORSON: That should answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not quite follow the argument of the hon. member for Yorkton when he says that this is going to restrict the number of shares held by farmers. I am not a western farmer, but I have followed this bill carefully through the private bills committee, and as I see it, this bill is going to result in a much wider distribution of these $5 shares. Farmers are not precluded from investing in the dividend shares, the preference shares, if they wish to invest in them. I think the hon. member ought to think the matter over a little more carefully.

Mr. PERLEY: How many shareholders are there at the present time, how many were there when the company was first incorporated, and what is the present value of the shares?

Mr. THORSON: The number of shareholders as at August 1, 1940, was 26,850, and the book value of the shares was approximately $40.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the hon. member tell us what dividends which have been paid in the last four or five years, going back, say, to 1936?

Mr. THORSON: With regard to the last four years, no dividends were paid in 1937, 1938 and 1939, but in 1940 five per cent was paid.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member said that the book value of the shares was $40. What is the market value?

Mr. THORSON: The market value prior to 1929 ranged from $25 to $30, but since then the market value has gone to as low as $6.50 a share, and they are currently selling at around $9.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the sponsor of the bill any idea of what the value of these shares will be after this legislation is passed?

Mr. THORSON: No one can foretell the future value of shares.

Mr. CRERAR: I may be pardoned for intervening in the discussion since for twenty-two and a half years I was president and general manager of this company. The hon. member for Yorkton is, I am afraid, not very well informed either upon the history of the company or upon the provisions of this measure.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was merely trying to get some information.

Mr. CRERAR: The company was incorporated, not in 1911, but in 1906, by letters patent issued in the province of Manitoba. It then sought dominion incorporation by special act of parliament in 1911, and that act of parliament was, as I recall it, further amended in 1916.

This company started as a farmers' company. There were definite and strict limitations in the matter of qualifications for the holding of stock. Only farmers and farmers' wives were eligible to be shareholders, and the par value of the shares was $25. In the early years from 1907 to 1917 or 1918 the company secured by far the greater number of its shareholders. The hon. member for Selkirk has given the number at the present time. Consequently we had in the early years of the company thousands of shareholders scattered over the prairies, all farmers, since only farmers could qualify as shareholders. Many, however, did not remain farmers. Some left the farm and went into business, becoming merchants or implement dealers or preachers or school teachers or something else, and so passed from the rigid qualification of farmer into some other class.

As time went on, many of the shareholders died, and there arose the problem of the disposal of shares by their estates. That accounts for the remarkably low value which the shares reached a few years ago. On any reasonable valuation of the assets at the present time, the shares are worth from $35 to $40. Why then does the farmer who wants to sell his shares not receive that amount? He cannot on account of the limited market there is for them. It may be that the depressed conditions of agriculture have militated against the ability of executors of estates to find a market for the shares among those qualified to hold them.

It is that very condition which this bill proposes to cure, as I understand it. At the same time, it retains the essential principle whereby the farmers continue to hold control of the management and direction of the company. Shares of a new class are created which may be held by merchant or preacher or anyone else, but the return which they can get on those shares is limited to 5 per cent. That is not an unreasonable return to people who have invested their money, having supplied the capital that went into equipment, buildings and other necessities which the company required.

I may tell the hon. member for Yorkton, if he has studied the history and practice of the large cooperative organizations in Great Britain, where they have carried the cooperative idea to a greater extent than we have in Canada, he will find that one of the essential provisions in their charter to do business is that the first charge on profits is a return on capital invested; and a few years ago, and I presume it is still the situation, this provided a return of 6 per cent. In this case the company proposes to give to those who supplied capital, under this new arrangement with regard to shares, a return of 5 per cent, and I do not think that can be regarded as unreasonable. Thus the limitation is 5 per cent return to those who may hold shares of the class described in the bill, and the essential principle is retained that the control and direction of the company remain in the hands of farmers and cannot be taken away from them.

The bill is a necessary measure to meet the changed conditions that have arisen through the change in the ownership of the stock and the movement away from the essential provisions in the charter of incorporation, that only farmers should hold stock. It simply provides a means of rearranging that, retaining the vital principle of control.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I thank the minister for his explanation. I did use the word "organized", and I suppose I should have said "constituted", in 1911. I believe the minister left out two other dates. There were amendments in 1915 and 1918.

Mr. THORSON: In 1917.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And in 1918 as well. The point is that the profits accruing out of the operation of United Grain Growers Limited, through this bill, can now go to persons who are not farmers. Like the minister, a good many farmers who were originally in the business have gone into some other occupation, being no longer engaged in agriculture. I should like to have a statement of what percentage of the shares—are there not 26,000 shareholders?—are in the hands of farmers, and the number that are not.

Mr. THORSON: I do not know that I can give the exact percentages, but the number of shares that are not in the hands of farmers is only a very small fraction of the total.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Approximately what?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think I can give the figures. I believe there are only one or two thousand.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is, at present?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What will it be after the bill goes through?

Mr. THORSON: The reason why these shares are not in the hands of farmers is that, in most instances, they belong to estates, and the beneficiaries of the deceased holder of the shares cannot be registered as shareholders because they are not farmers. I think I can safely say that the number of shares which are not held by farmers is very small. After this bill passes, for each share that now exists there will be two—one which will be the voting share, which cannot be held by anyone except a farmer, and the other which is the investment share and which may be disposed of. What will happen in the course of time with regard to that, no one can tell.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member says that a number of these shares are now in the hands of estates. What has happened to the dividends which were payable on those shares?

Mr. THORSON: Any dividends applicable to those shares cannot be paid to anyone, because in respect of those shares where the owners are not farmers they cannot be registered as transferees.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then I take it that the profits which have accrued for the past few years have been distributed among the shareholders who are real farmers?

Mr. COLDWELL: Or are they in a trust fund?

Mr. THORSON: I am not sure on that point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If they are not paid they would be held as unpaid dividends.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Acquisition of shares.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have read this bill with a good deal of care, and I understand there is real necessity for the passing of the bill. The only clause in it that I queried in my mind was this one. This, of course, is a real departure from the principle governing joint stock companies, because it provides that shares in the company "to the ownership of which there is attached the right to take part in the selection of delegates or the right to act as delegate shall not by devolution or otherwise become vested in persons disentitled to exercise the rights aforesaid". Then it goes on to provide that the company may purchase those shares under certain limitations. Provision is made for resale by the directors of any shares acquired under subsections 1 and 2. The fourth subsection provides for a limitation of purchases so that:

> No shares shall be acquired under this section so as to increase the number of shares acquired and not resold hereunder beyond one-tenth of all the outstanding shares of the same class.

That, of course, is a distinct departure from the ordinary principle governing joint stock companies whereby a company cannot purchase its own shares.

I mentioned this to the counsel whom I queried about it, and he was very frank and told me that it was not absolutely essential to the immediate objective of the company, and that he was fully appreciative of the danger of the clause in ordinary joint stock company organization. But he pointed this out, and this is a consideration which I should like to pass on to the committee; that the fundamental conception of the company was that it should be controlled by farmers, with voting rights limited to one man one vote, regardless of the share holdings, with the distinct limitation on the number of voting shares which one person might hold; and that this removed any temptation to manipulate the market either to secure control or for speculative purposes. Of course that is true; it would be an effective deterrent from attempting to get control or to manipulate. He further asserted to me that the company is cooperative in nature, organized to serve the western farmer, and it is a principle of legislation affecting cooperatives that they can cancel the membership of any member if he ceases to be one of that class. They are not, however, asking for any such power as that of cancellation. This is the method they have adopted, under advice of counsel I understand, whereby a market may be provided for the shares of deceased persons which cannot be transferred to or registered in the name of other than a farmer.

The market for these shares must be more or less limited. Therefore they have asked for this right. I am informed that in the committee of the other house where this bill was examined with considerable care, perhaps a good deal more than we can give here in this committee, the suggestion was made that the company should have even wider powers than those provided by the bill, as a means of getting rid of members who are no longer active farmers, so that the company would be definitely owned and controlled by active farmers.

I am not opposing the bill; from the explanation given me I think it is necessary; but I thought it right that the committee should understand just what the underlying principles of section 7 are. It is a very unusual power; I never saw it in a bill before; it is expressly prohibited by the Companies Act. With that explanation, however, I think it might go through.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the sponsor of the bill inform the committee as to the number of directors and who they are?

Mr. THORSON: I have not that information at the moment. I wonder whether that is relevant to this section. I shall be glad to obtain it for the hon. member.

Mr. PERLEY: Do they draw a salary?

Mr. THORSON: I do not know whether they do as directors. The officers of the company do.

Mr. PERLEY: What salary do they draw?

Mr. THORSON: I do not know that I can give that information either, but I shall obtain it for the hon. member.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member has not very much information about the matter. Maybe he can inform the committee how many terminal elevators they operate; if they lease one in Vancouver from the dominion government, and if so, what the terms of the lease are.

Mr. THORSON: I shall have to obtain that information also. I shall be glad to do so. But it does not really touch the section.

Mr. CRERAR: They have two terminal elevators, one at Port Arthur and one at Vancouver.

Mr. PERLEY: The one at Vancouver is, I think, under lease.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the company own it.

Mr. PERLEY: We wish to know.

Mr. CRERAR: It may be under lease.

Mr. PERLEY: We should like to have the terms of the lease.

Mr. THORSON: What is the relevancy of these questions to the section under discussion, dealing with the acquisition of shares?

Mr. PERLEY: It is relevant to every section of the bill. If, however, no one knows, I do not wish to detain the committee. I think we can get the information.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

246. Audit of revenue, money order, postal note and savings bank business; issue of postage stamps and postal notes, including amounts required to pay allowances to office appliance operators grade 2, in accordance with regulations approved by order in council, $1,408,700.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister explain the increase?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Yes. According to the estimates, an increase of $126,795 is shown in this item. Actually there were supplementary items last year; and when the supplementaries are added to the estimates of last year, the actual increase for this year is $87,195. The increases are these: First of all, the salary item, $16,230, which includes statutory increases amounting to $13,770; one additional clerk, grade 1, $720, and a postal clerk, $1,740. There are two positions dropped, so that this represents, in the total salary account, a net increase, on that item, of $13,195. The next one is printing and stationery, showing an increase in the estimates, but, if the supplementary estimates of last year are included, a decrease of $2,250. In equipment and maintenance there is an increase of $45,000. The particulars are available; would the leader of the opposition like to have them?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MULOCK: Other increases are: in sundries, $850; in the manufacture of postage stamps, $23,400; in printing of postal notes, $7,000. In all these figures there is taken into consideration the fact that the supplementary estimates are added to the estimates—which really gives the true position so far as the increases are concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the supplementary estimates show there was an increase last year. I understand that this item was kept open because somebody might wish to ask a question on some other item. The only question I desire to ask with respect to the post office is, how the country is going to determine whether the post office is a losing or a paying proposition, having regard to the large sum of money which is expended by business and others in the purchase of stamps for excise purposes. This, I know, is an old story and an old question, but we shall never know whether the post office is on a sound and proper basis until we can have some estimate, even though an approximation, of how much money in revenue the post office gets from the purchase of stamps which should go to the excise branch. Many people use postage stamps when properly they should use the excise stamps. Occasionally I do so myself, although in business we always try to purchase the special excise stamps. In my view, as this amount may be very large, there is no knowing how the post office is breaking. I think we should have some check on that, in order to know exactly what the position is.

Mr. MULOCK: I know the leader of the opposition realizes the difficulty of obtaining any accurate statement on that point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MULOCK: If one tried to figure it out and keep track of each one of the transactions, the cost would be out of all reason. There is, however, some information available. First of all, 75 per cent of the business comes from city offices, and the banks and the merchants in general use excise stamps and not postage stamps in those centres.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think likely that is true.

Mr. MULOCK: The remaining 25 per cent comes from offices of lesser revenue where excise stamps are not so much in use. The use of postage stamps is a great convenience to the public in the rural districts, but the number used for excise purposes is not very great.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Not very great." Is that a statement of fact or an assumption?

Mr. MULOCK: That is the opinion of the officials.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an assumption.

Mr. MULOCK: So far as they can find out from a careful check-up on the situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it is just an assumption.

Mr. MULOCK: To get definite figures it would be necessary to establish a fairly complicated accounting system, and, when one got through, it would not be of any advantage to the public from a financial point of view. It would cost a good deal of money without bringing any additional revenue to the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Agreed.

Mr. MULOCK: The use of postage stamps as affecting revenue is relatively very small, but it is a great service to the public in many places since it facilitates the transaction of business. I understand the desire of the leader of the opposition to obtain an idea of the approximate amount, but I believe he also realizes that the cost would be out of all proportion to the benefit to be derived.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that general statement; and of course, the statements made by the Postmaster General are also general. Is there any approximation of the amount? Would it run to a million a year? Have the officials made some check on the city offices?

Mr. MULOCK: The officials say that they would not like to make any statement as to the actual amount. It might be possible for us to put on a check on the city offices, without too much expense—if we were to pick out different days on which to do it. But we could not do it over a period of time, because it would tie things up considerably.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We shall have to give it up.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe the minister is most anxious to expedite the delivery of mail, because the more quickly mail is carried, the more mail service will be used. I recently had occasion to go by train from Ottawa to Pembroke and return. In each case I travelled on a train which carried mail. From my experience that day I would say that the people of the Ottawa valley are most shockingly treated by the mail service—and of course that is not the responsibility of the Post Office Department. I refer to the mail service on the train. I am finding fault, not with the postal employees on the train, but rather with the train service itself.

The afternoon train leaves Pembroke at 1.45 p.m. and is supposed to leave Carleton Place at 4.15 p.m., having arrived there a half hour earlier. But for some time past, the train from Pembroke upon reaching Carleton Place must stand there waiting for the train to arrive from Toronto.

Mr. MARTIN: Three quarters of an hour.

Mr. MacNICOL: That train is frequently late. Four coaches, including a mail coach, are taken from the Toronto train. That train left Carleton Place at 5.20 p.m., and, I suppose, arrived in Ottawa about 6.30 p.m. A wayfreight would carry mail more quickly than this mail train, so-called, carries it. In my judgment the postal authorities should take note of these facts, because I am told by many people that it is a regular occurrence. The department should see that the people of the Ottawa valley receive more expeditious mail service than is now accorded them.

Mr. MULOCK: I believe the hon. member for Davenport will realize that this is really a transport matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; but the minister's department should make them speed up.

Mr. MULOCK: We make representations from time to time to the board of transport commissioners, asking them to speed up service, in so far as our mails are concerned. I thank the hon. member for having brought this matter to our attention, and I can assure him we shall be glad to make further representations.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was about to ask about the post office savings bank. How many depositors have we, and what would the average deposit amount to? Let us have some idea of what our savings bank business amounts to. I ask the question because I hold the opinion that a great deal could be done, and particularly in the country districts, to encourage the post office savings bank. Many of our towns have no banking facilities whatever, and I should think we might be able to extend the post office savings bank business, and develop it into something which would give service to people in communities where there are no banks.

Mr. MULOCK: The aggregate balance to the credit of depositors on March 31, 1941, was $22,176,632.54. The number of offices authorized to transact business was increased from 1,645 to 1,664.

Mr. HOMUTH: What interest is paid?

Mr. COLDWELL: What are the qualifications necessary to conduct an office?

Mr. MULOCK: If the hon. member wishes, I can place on record a short statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: That would be satisfactory.

Mr. MULOCK: The aggregate balance to the credit of depositors on March 31, 1941, was $22,176,632.54, a decrease, during the year, of $923,485.90. The average to the credit of each depositor was $225.96, compared with $246.90 on March 31, 1940.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

New accounts opened during the year numbered 11,189, and 6,606 accounts were closed, leaving the number open at the close of the year, 98,144, or an increase of 4,583.

The deposits were 81,532 in number, for a total amount of $3,998,091.16. The average amount of each deposit was $49.04 compared with $53.21 for the previous year.

Repayments numbered 102,447 and amounted to $5,355,477.82, of which 92,669 for a total of $2,383,030.82 were made in cash, and 9,778 amounting to $2,972,447.00 were made by cheque. The average cash repayment was $25.72 compared with $25.64 the year before, and the average withdrawal by cheque was $303.99, compared with $313.40 in the preceding year.

Mr. COLDWELL: What are the requirements by which a post office becomes a savings bank office?

Mr. MULOCK: Generally, where there are no other banking facilities, when application is made it is granted, provided, first of all, that the official at the point in question is able to carry on a savings bank business and capable of performing the duties of looking after it. The second consideration is that satisfactory premises are available at the point indicated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was wondering where these funds are invested. Presumably they are invested with the government, or are retained in one of the government funds; is that correct?

Mr. MULOCK: They are placed to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then they are accessible for use by the dominion?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that we have been looking round for ways of increasing our financial resources during war time; here is one way. When the Minister of Finance brought in his budget, and previously when we were discussing the unemployment insurance measure, one of the reasons given for the desirability of setting up that fund at this time was that it would enable the government to obtain more money during the war. Here we have a channel which, it seems to me, we are not using as we ought to be using it. The government of New Zealand —not the present Labour government, but the previous government—fostered the post office savings bank until it became an institution which was exceedingly worth while from the point of view of the government itself. I have often thought that here was a channel which might be used.

In some cities, hundreds of school children and students are encouraged to open savings accounts in their own names. These accounts are usually handled by one of the chartered banks, and the result is that these children become acquainted with the bank, and many of them continue to do business for the rest of their lives with the same bank. One of the ways of building up the post office savings bank would be to encourage the children now using these penny-banks to put their money in the post office savings bank. Ten or twelve years ago we had a superintendent of schools in Regina, who happened to come from this city and who instituted a penny-bank system. I do not know how much money they have in that bank at the present time, but when I left the teaching profession in 1934 there was some $50,000 in the savings accounts.

The teachers in these institutions are public servants who are performing a voluntary service, first, for the children and, second, for the private banking institutions. I have heard it stated on more than one occasion by the teachers that they would feel more enthusiastic if they were performing this service for the post office savings bank or some other public institution. I bring up this matter so that it may be considered by the department. We should encourage our children to open accounts in the post office savings bank in order that they may continue to be customers in future years.

Mr. MULOCK: The hon. member will notice that there was a drop of approximately $1,000,000 in the savings accounts, but that is due chiefly to the fact that people were withdrawing money to buy war savings certificates, war savings stamps and things of that kind. The rate of interest paid is 2 per cent, and it might be interesting to note that last year the interest amounted to $433,900.76, of which only $11,586.05 was paid out, the balance of $422,314.71 being added to principal by the different depositors.

Mr. COLDWELL: They were really saving the interest?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many postmasters were guillotined last year?

Mr. MULOCK: There were none guillotined, but if the leader of the opposition wishes any particular information, I shall see if I can get it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to pursue that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Following up the question asked by the leader of the opposition, I should like to make a complaint on behalf of the returned soldiers in my constituency. I have received a number of complaints from these men that they have not received consideration when new appointments or changes were made. It is true that announcements go out to the provincial command in Regina; but in a constituency such as the one I represent, where we have poor mail service and poor communication, some of the legion secretaries may be living eight or ten miles from town; they do not receive their mail regularly, and many of them have no telephone connection with the other officers of the legion. Even if a secretary is advised that a change is about to be made in a post office in the district, possibly twenty-five or thirty miles away, it is not always possible for him to notify veterans living in the community that a change is about to be made. Would the minister take greater pains to see that returned soldiers are notified more directly.

Just a year ago I appealed to the veterans in connection with the national registration, and they responded in a remarkable manner. At the present time they are cooperating in connection with the war loan. On every count these returned veterans are coming across, but there is keen resentment when appointments are made without their being notified. I do not expect the Postmaster General to recommend the appointment of returned soldiers when they do not possess the necessary requirements, but in many of these communities there are returned soldiers who have the necessary requirements and yet they do not seem to be given an opportunity of making an application until it is too late. A recent change has been proposed in one post office, and I am told that the suggested postmaster is not a returned soldier.

Mr. MULOCK: I shall be glad to look into the hon. member's statement and would be pleased to have him give me particulars of those places in his constituency where there is poor mail service. I should like to have that investigated to see who is to blame. I am advised by my officials that in every case a notice is sent to the provincial command of the Canadian Legion in advance of any appointment being made. In connection with the case referred to by the hon. member, the file shows that no returned soldier applied for the position, and so far as I have been able to ascertain, no representations were made on behalf of any returned soldier.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not complaining about the poor mail service. In many parts of my constituency there is a mixed train only three times a week. As I pointed out, some of these people live eight to ten miles from town and possibly go in only once a week for mail. While I realize that notice would be sent to the provincial command in Regina, the fact is that it might be a month before this information would reach the secretary and then go from him to the returned soldiers in the community. In the particular case I complained about, I do not suggest that word did not go to Regina; all I say is that the returned soldiers in that community are complaining that they had no knowledge that a change was being made. Naturally they resent having an appointment made without being given an opportunity to submit an application.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think every effort should be made during war time to get away from this pernicious patronage system. It is galling to a man who is qualified to take charge of a post office to be told by some petty village politician that he will never get it because he did not vote right. I know of a number of cases like that. We are being asked all the time to get our people to assist in salvage campaigns, recruiting campaigns, the sale of war savings certificates and so forth, and yet these things happen. I have had men say to me, "You asked me a year ago to give my services or my house for registration purposes, and I did so, but I see now that in other fields, the census, for example, or when a post office comes up, the same old gang round here profess to have the political patronage." We should get away from that.

Having given the department something like a kick perhaps, may I say that I appreciate the action taken in one instance I know of in my own constituency when tremendous pressure was brought to bear on the minister and the officials of his department to appoint a man who was not qualified. I refer to the town of Biggar. But the minister and his officials did the right thing. They took the recommendation that was made on the qualifications of a returned soldier and appointed him to the position. Having made the other observation, I think it is only fair that I should compliment the minister upon having stood firmly against what I know was tremendous pressure brought to bear by several people in that locality.

Mr. TRIPP: I hope the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not apply his implications to myself as probably he has done regarding every member on this side.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is that?

Mr. TRIPP: The implication of rottenness.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no. I was not dealing with members of the house at all. Of course, however, I cannot speak for the consciences of individual members.

Mr. MULOCK: The leader of the opposition asked about the number of dismissals. From July 9, 1940, to March 10, 1941, the total number dismissed was thirty-three, six for political partisanship and twenty-seven for other reasons.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would the Postmaster General be good enough to give us the gross revenues of the ten largest centres? And would he state beforehand just what the gross revenues include?

Mr. MULOCK: It includes postage on all mail matter, the sale of stamps, but not money orders. The revenue in 1939-40 at Calgary was $660,741; Edmonton, $673,242; Montreal, $5,212,180; Quebec, $806,198; Regina, $973,293; Saskatoon, $343,500; Toronto, $7,913,-357; Winnipeg, $3,092,225.

Mr. MARTIN: The Postmaster General will recall that last summer, along with his able deputy, he visited the city of Windsor and inaugurated an air mail service in that important city. There are now two services a day, one in the afternoon and one in the early evening. I know there are difficulties on account of the Chicago connections, but could not arrangements be made for a morning service, thereby providing added facilities for Windsor and all that area, and increasing the revenue of the department?

Mr. MULOCK: Now that the hon. member has drawn the matter to my attention, I will give it consideration.

Mr. MARTIN: The Postmaster General undoubtedly has forgotten that I have drawn it to his attention on no fewer than six occasions since last fall. I might refresh his memory by informing him that he told me one of the difficulties was not with his department but with the ministry of transport. Possibly he has had an opportunity of discussing the matter further with the ministry of transport so as to bring this necessary service to the important city of Windsor.

Mr. MULOCK: I can assure the hon. member that I have not forgotten his representations, but all I can say is that I will give the matter consideration. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the ruling still hold good that an applicant for the position of postmaster must have been a patron of that post office?

Mr. MULOCK: Generally speaking, yes. That is the general rule, but occasionally there have been exceptions.

Mr. QUELCH: Would a veteran living outside the district be given a preference over a man within the district who was not a veteran?

Mr. MULOCK: No. If there was no one within the district who was capable of performing this service, we would have to consider applications from outside, but that is not usual. Offhand I do not know of any case where it was impossible to find someone within the district who was capable of performing the duties.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is there any way of knowing whether the postal note division operates at a profit or a loss?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

349. Canada Grain Act — administration, $104,648.50.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, ordinarily in taking up my estimates I would have the first item on the list called and proceed in sequence, but to oblige members of the house and to fulfil an undertaking I gave earlier in the session, I am having this item called in order to give an opportunity to those who desire to speak on wheat and kindred subjects.

Mr. MacNICOL: That subject has not been discussed at all this session, has it?

Mr. PERLEY: As the minister has stated, he agreed to allow a general discussion on this item, the Canada Grain Act. I discussed this with him on one or two occasions, and he graciously agreed to accord us this opportunity. On one or two occasions since this session opened I have endeavoured to obtain additional information beyond that supplied in answer to casual questions. This house has been in session continually since November 7, except for a short recess at Christmas. We have had very little information with regard to the real operations of the wheat board and the grain situation generally. I have here a report dated January 11, 1941, in which there is given a partial record of the workings of the board to that date. Certain amendments to the wheat board act are set out and discussed, and we have had a number of orders in council, which are to all intents and purposes amendments. But we have not had any amending act, and I object to this way of dealing with the board's operations.

On March 12 we had what might be called a double-barrelled announcement from the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and thereafter we had an order in council tabled by the minister on May 14, and another one recently on May 30 setting out certain regulations to show how the board proposed to operate during the coming crop season. Apart from that, we have had very little information. The report to which I have referred mentions certain amendments of 1939 in which the price was fixed at 70 cents, and it also refers to the amendments of 1940 again setting the price at 70 cents. It then gives a general review of the operations of the board. It is not widely distributed, however, and very few farmers of western Canada have seen it. But even if they have seen it, they cannot get a detailed account of the board's operations.

We have a balance sheet which shows that the 1938 crop was disposed of, and finally there was a loss of $61,000,000. It deals further with the rest of the 1939 crop, showing that there was on hand on July 31, 1940, 182,095,733 bushels of that crop. But there was a deficit up to that time, in the handling of the 1939 crop, of $6,000,000 odd. Certain exhibits are set out in the report—A, B and C. Exhibit A, which appears on page 28, sets out the liabilities to the bank, with interest, amounting to $68,825,078. There is a liability to agents of the board for wheat purchased from producers but not yet delivered to the board, the amount being $28,927,925. There is, I presume, interest on that amount. I think we should have some further information with regard to these liabilities, particularly that to the agents of the board.

On page 21 of the report we have a statement to the effect that there are certain liabilities to the agents. It is stated that when wheat is delivered by the producers to the country elevators of the companies who are acting as agents for the board, the companies pay the producers for the wheat on the basis of the board's initial price. The liability continues to be carried by the companies until such time as the wheat is unloaded in deliverable position. These liabilities represent approximately 42,000,000 bushels of wheat carried in country elevators, in transit at the date of this balance sheet. I think we should have some particulars as to what the amount of this liability is.

This evening I am going to direct certain questions to the minister with a view to obtaining information. He has his two chief officials before him, and he can get the information. I do not intend to hurry. I should like his officers to take notes and give us the necessary information through the minister.

I will not take time to deal with the rest of the report. It is more or less confusing, however, to the ordinary individual. Coming back to some of the orders in council, and what I have called the double-barrelled announcement of March 12, when the minister made a statement with regard to what might happen in connection with the 1941 crop, I would point out that on several occasions I have tried to get information from the minister, but without avail. He was always taking certain things into consideration, and so far this session he has not given us a proper detailed report indicating the present position of the board and of the entire situation. I might refer to certain representations made to the minister before the announcement of March 12. The federation of agriculture and other interests in the west stated their position when they demanded a better price than 70 cents. They asked what might be called a parity price. We were disappointed that no results ensued from those representations, but that is water under the bridge. In the budget statement, however, reference was made to the present situation, and it was pointed out that the board's present carrying of wheat showed that they would have at the end of the crop year some 570,000,000 bushels of a carry-over. The minister also said that there was $400,000,000 invested in the business and that it was costing the country about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year to carry it.

The regulations which I have here provide for taking out of this year's crop a delivery of 230,000,000 bushels. The regulations are given with regard to deliveries and so forth, but I am not going to take time to-night to discuss them. The regulations have been distributed, and they are pretty well understood by those who will be delivering wheat—the producers—and those who will do the physical handling. Let me refer to the announcement made some time ago with regard to the sale of 120,000,000 bushels of futures to the United Kingdom. At that time it was stated that the sale was made considerably above the then market price, which would be 70 cents, but the minister did not say what the price was. I remember asking him if he would state the price, and he replied that for certain reasons he did not think it advisable nor did the British government wish to have the price announced.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the hon. gentleman has made a mistake there, if he will allow me to interrupt. On this occasion, according to my recollection, I did not say anything regarding the amount paid for the grain or the price at which the sale was made. I did not refer to it as being considerably above the market price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister did not give any information at all.

Mr. PERLEY: He said it was over the market price. Then I asked the price, and the minister said that it was not in the public interest to announce it, that the British government did not want the price announced.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is correct.

Mr. PERLEY: If it was 70 cents, it would not have been necessary for me to ask. The minister said that there was a request by the British authorities that the grain exchange remain open. I ask him to-night through his official to produce some evidence, real evidence, that that is the situation. I have here the monthly statement by his own department, dated May 23. On page 6 of this we find a statement or chart headed "Liverpool wheat offers", and it shows that for the month of May, the date his statement was made, the price they offered was 91 cents at the port of shipment. Therefore I cannot see why, if they were offering that price—and that is from a document put out by his department—we could not have the exact price. I do not suppose that if they were offering that, the wheat was sold at less.

I quote from a further statement, the weekly bulletin of his bureau, dated May 17:

> The export of wheat in April amounted to 20,322,400 bushels at a value of $17,393,126 or an average of 85·6 cents per bushel. This compared with 93·8 cents in April, 1940.

Then during the four months ending April there was an export of 46,284,793 bushels of a value of $39,017,774, or 84·3 cents a bushel. So why not divulge the price?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The hon. member is quoting seaboard prices there.

Mr. PERLEY: That is correct, but we know what the freight from Fort William is, and it figures back to much more than 70 cents. It is rather a joke for the minister to say that they cannot divulge this price when Liverpool is advertising it, as is also his own department.

I wish now to refer briefly to another document. Some hon. members may recall that when the budget resolutions were going through and the last item was reached, I asked the Minister of Finance if he would permit me to refer to the appendix in the budget resolutions, and I was refused an opportunity of asking the question. I am now going to refer to that and ask a question. On page 2389 of the ways and means resolutions under the heading "indirect liabilities", paragraph 53 reads as follows:

Guaranteed bank advances to the Canadian wheat board outstanding on March 31, 1941, amounted to $101,052,679. This amount constituted the board's gross liability to the banks and mainly related to the purchase of the 1939 and 1940 wheat crop at the fixed price of 70 cents per bushel No. 1 northern, Fort William. The guarantee of the dominion to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited, referred to in previous budgets, is still outstanding. No liability accrues from day to day in connection with this guarantee as margin deposits are made to the clearing association daily.

I ask the minister to tell us to-night what that guarantee to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing association is, why there is a guarantee, and if the government is guaranteeing the accounts of those brokers or grain firms that are operating for the board? Also we wish to know what margins the board has to put up in the clearing house. The $120,000,000 referred to a few minutes ago was futures, and we wish to know what margin the board has to put up daily, as referred to here. Also we wish to know what the margins in the clearing house are at the present time. Would it by any chance be that owing to the fact that the wheat board has a guaranteed liability in the Winnipeg clearing association, the government want the grain exchange to remain open? If their account were cleared up with the grain exchange or the clearing association, would they need the exchange to remain open? These are some of the things we desire to know. I wish to know the margins put up, and I think we should have some information with respect to how the board is now operating, whether the funds provided for the board are advances made by the finance department here. Does the board draw on the finance department here daily? I know how Mr. McFarland operated; I know the worry he caused that government on certain occasions. I think we should have the information as to how and why accounts are still outstanding, particularly whether these are guaranteed accounts of the brokers, the rate of interest paid to the grain companies on the grain for which they pay the producer, and also the interest paid to the brokers if they put up money on account of the board.

Coming to this question of closing the exchange, I have made some inquiry and investigation recently, and I find that statements have been made—this is more or less in reply to the minister when he says that the British government does not want the grain exchange closed. I have here a statement by David Muir, Glasgow manager of the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale, in which he says that there would be no difficulty if the Winnipeg futures market were closed. Another statement is from Mr. A. C. Bracey, buyer for the English Cooperative Wholesale society, Liverpool, in which he says the advantage would be to the western producer if the Winnipeg grain exchange were closed. Another is from the Glasgow Corn association, that if the Winnipeg futures market were closed, there would be one less to watch. Another is from the British National Millers association that they never deal there at all. Yet we have the statement that the exchange is necessary.

Mr. MAYBANK: I believe the hon. gentleman is quoting letters. I ask that he table all the correspondence from which he is quoting.

Mr. PERLEY: I am quoting from sworn evidence given before the royal grain inquiry commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That rule has no application; it is only a minister who has to do that.

Mr. PERLEY: I am going to make certain references to the board's operations on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and I make this statement, that any institution which is so important in the national life of the Canadian wheat producer and the marketing of Canadian grain, which has been the subject of seventeen inquiries in about thirty years, which is carried on under certain rules and regulations, which is subject to control by no outside body and not even by the government, which does not know the volume of trading each day in it and whether there is speculation and does not know who operates on that exchange, whether operating for the Canadian wheat board or the British government or who, and will not give that information—such an institution of such a character should be closed and taken over by the government for at least the duration of the war.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask the hon. member, simply for my own information, when was the evidence given to which he refers?

Mr. PERLEY: It was given before the Turgeon commission and tabled here in 1938.

I come to these orders in council. The one of May 14 gives directions with respect to the delivery of grain and the time for the producer to make application to the board. Two weeks later, on May 30, there was tabled the one I hold in my hand. It sets out certain rules and regulations, which to all intents and purposes are amendments to the Canada Wheat Board Act. I claim that at this late date we should not be operating in that fashion. This house has been in session long enough to enable amendments to have been introduced in good time. This whole problem has been on our doorstep since early last fall.

I cannot now read all these regulations, but there are some very important ones here. One sets out the powers of the board regarding the minimum quantity of the quota. The board may prescribe any other methods or means of delivery, and may lump the deliveries. It sets out that no railway company or other person engaged in transportation shall receive, transport, hold or deliver grain without a permit from the board. It states that no person acting for the producer shall sell or deliver to a mill or otherwise dispose of grain without a permit. No person shall deliver oats, barley, rye or flax to any country elevator, loading platform, mill or terminal elevator without a permit from the Canadian wheat board. That brings coarse grains under the operation of the board. A provision of that kind should have been dealt with as an amendment to the act. Any sale or delivery by the producer, including wheat taken to the mill and gristed for his own use, shall be entered in a permit book and shall not exceed the quota of his delivery. That was dealt with to-day by the hon. member for Lake Centre. There are other important regulations here. It is all most confusing.

A special committee of this house should have been set up earlier, with power to call witnesses and examine these rules and regulations, so that we could have obtained the necessary information. We should have had the chairman of the wheat board before the committee to give us more information with regard to the internal operations of the board.

The farmers should have a better price. I will not go into detail on this matter, but I wish to place on record what has happened over in the United States, namely, the policy which was approved by the United States department of agriculture, providing for loans on wheat carried in bins on the farms. Briefly, this is how they do it. Government inspectors go to the farms, measure the bins and the grain, and inspect the grain in the granaries. They put the government seal on the bins, and they issue the farmer what is termed a government warehouse receipt. The farmer takes the warehouse receipt to the elevator which is nearest his shipping point, and says to the operator, "Here is my government warehouse receipt, and I want the government advance"—which by the way is based on 85 per cent of the parity of price, and nets 85 cents to the producer basis Chicago market. That is considerably more than we are getting.

By the regulations, the elevator man is empowered to give a cheque for the amount stated in the warehouse receipt, be it $100, $500, $1,000, or whatever it may be. For this cheque the farmer surrenders his warehouse receipt to the elevator man, who in turn forwards the warehouse receipt to the bank with a draft attached, and the bank forwards it to the government. In this case it would be to the wheat board. The farmer delivers his wheat to the elevator when he is notified that they desire delivery, and the elevator man sees that the government gets the wheat. With the government's seal and the inspection of the bin, there is no more chance of the grain being stolen—and the same thing would apply in this country if the farmers' bins were properly constructed, under specification, which is the policy I think the government should have adopted—than there would be of a bank robbery. Probably there would be a few cases of theft, but not very many. The bins are supposed to be standard bins, built according to the government's specifications.

This government, through the Canadian wheat board, if they had adopted a system like that, could have paid the farmers an advance of 85 cents on the grain in their bins. This policy would have been sound. It could have been worked out if we had had a committee to study the whole matter in the proper time, instead of our being required to review all these matters and consider these orders in council at this late date. I would urge upon the government even yet to consider a policy of advancing money to the farmer on grain stored in a properly constructed bin on his own farm under government instruction and supervision. There would be no danger of a loss. Millions of dollars are invested in this business.

The whole wheat marketing system and the handling of it at this time, I claim, is a racket. We should have a thorough investigation. I believe that the operations of this board will not bear the light of day. I want a committee. When we come back here this fall—the time now is too short, perhaps, to have it before we leave—I want that committee set up, with proper authority to call witnesses and examine into this whole question. I recall that in 1935, hon. members, then on this side of the house, when the wheat board bill was up for discussion, made Mr. Bennett bring Mr. McFarland before the committee, and there was not half as much involved as now, and there was no charge of crooked work at all.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend if there is any charge of crooked work now—on behalf of the board?

Mr. PERLEY: There are certain things going on. I will read in a minute or two some of the—few—things that are going on, and you can judge.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member should not use that language.

Mr. CRERAR: I repeat that, that the hon. member should not use that language.

Mr. PERLEY: I will say this. The board is playing into the hands of certain interests in Winnipeg. Maybe the company of which the hon. member was vice-chairman—or president and manager for twenty-two years —might be one of them.

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. member will do me the courtesy of allowing me to make a remark, I should like to say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. member that he has no right whatever to make an imputation of the character he did, that there is crooked work in the administration of the wheat board; and I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw it.

Mr. PERLEY: I said that the whole thing is a racket.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, no; you used the words that it was crooked work.

Mr. PERLEY: I said that it would not bear the light of day, and that we wanted an investigation.

Mr. CRERAR: No; you used the words "crooked work".

Mr. PERLEY: I said that it would not bear the light of day, and that there were certain things—and I say it again—going on in the Winnipeg grain exchange, with which the board has something to do, which will not stand investigation.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the hon. member had better be specific.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well, now, what he has said so far is all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What he has said so far is all wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not all wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has used the words "crooked work". He has either to make good that allegation, or withdraw it, with regard to any official working in the government service.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member made no reference to crookedness with regard to the present grain board. What the hon. member said, Mr. Chairman, was that the members of the Liberal party sitting on this side of the house in 1935 demanded that Mr. Bennett bring Mr. McFarland here, and there was no question of crookedness at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, that was not it at all.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Waterloo South is certainly not helping the situation. He is not helping the hon. member for Qu'Appelle by the explanation he has just given. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle used the words "crooked work"—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order.

Mr. CRERAR: —and carried the imputation that it was being applied to the wheat board.

Mr. HOMUTH: Definitely not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Attention was immediately called by the Minister of Mines and Resources to the expression used by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. That expression was immediately challenged, and the hon. member must withdraw it, or prove it before this committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: What was the expression?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That the time had come when the crooked work of the officials of the wheat board should be exposed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he did not say that at all.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I was listening very attentively to the hon. member. He said that in 1935 the opposition party had forced Mr. Bennett to bring Mr. J. I. McFarland before the committee, and that there was nothing crooked then. The word "crooked" is not parliamentary, and I suggest that it be withdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To say that there was no suggestion of crooked work then is not objectionable.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not propose to have words put in my mouth. I said that Mr. McFarland was brought down here, but that there was no suggestion of crooked work. I said that the operations of the whole grain business was a racket, that it would not bear investigation, and that we wanted a committee when we came back next fall—it is too late now, of course. We want that committee.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think it would be satisfactory if the hon. member would state that he made no suggestion of a charge of crookedness against—

Mr. HOMUTH: He did not make any such suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I request that the official Hansard be produced.

Mr. PERLEY: To facilitate matters, and to get on, I made no suggestion of crooked work on the part of these officials. I said that the general grain business was a racket. We know the board has something to do with the operations; they cannot do otherwise. I said that they are dealing with it, and I said, further, that the whole thing would not bear the light of day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We shall see what the record says.

Mr. PERLEY: We shall just let that go. If you will give us a committee—yes, give us a committee; if you will give us a committee and we can call certain witnesses here, we shall see, then. If the Minister of Mines and Resources will not, then just let the Minister of Trade and Commerce say he will give us a committee. Will you give us a committee?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I see no objection whatever.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a promise.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I say that I see no objection whatsoever; but I am not speaking for the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a promise.

Mr. PERLEY: I have here a copy of a telegram. I have suggested on several occasions that, in the event of a war being in progress, the government should have taken things over last fall, and operated the grain trade for the duration of the war. I have a copy of a telegram directed to the chairman of the board, and signed by nine members of the grain exchange, namely, N. M. Paterson & Company Limited; McCabe Brothers Grain Company Limited; N. Bawlf Grain Company, Limited; Alberta Pacific Grain Company Limited; Canadian Consolidated Grain Company Limited; Pioneer Grain Company Limited; Western Grain Company Limited; Federal Grain Limited, and National Grain Company Limited. It is dated July 18, 1940. In the telegram they review the situation, stating that they know we are in a critical situation, that certain charges had been made in this house that there were exorbitant charges, or money being made unduly. These firms offered their services to the government to operate as agents of the board. They offered their whole systems for the duration of the war on the basis of a 6 per cent earning on capital invested. I have the reply before me of the chairman of the board; he may recall it. The question I wish to ask is: Why did the minister not accept that offer?

The chairman of the board replied:

> Answering telegram from your members as in the past terms of the handling contract for this coming season will be arrived after complete discussion between all companies and our board. Your proposal re operating as agents noted. This has been brought to the attention of the government.

I should like to know why this offer was not accepted? This is the chairman, one of the minister's advisers.

I am now going to review what the situation is at the present time on the grain exchange. If I am not right in what I say, then we shall hear from the minister. There are certain shippers, and grain interests and millers who cannot make delivery of their wheat that is stored in terminals or interior positions. Under their contracts they cannot make delivery, even if they so desired, because they are out of position. Then, there are futures contracts. A lot of it is held by the board, a great amount of it—at least a part of it, anyway, and cash wheat is the remainder. There is a limited capacity at Fort William. This wheat cannot be shipped there to make delivery on their contracts, because the wheat in Fort William is held as options.

Since the board owns most of this, in either options or cash wheat, they cannot take delivery. There is a situation arising there now where the options have to be changed from month to month, and I am informed—and if I am not correctly informed, we shall find out—that the grain firms are in the position similar to that in which they were in 1935, and that they are now negotiating with the wheat board to have their July futures changed into Octobers on a basis of 80 cents for the October. That, of course, would be taking the July as it is now, at about 77½ cents, plus storage. That would be about right.

This would commit the wheat board to take delivery of wheat in October at or around 80 cents, basis No. 1 northern. Here is what I wish to say, that if that deal is going on now, it should be confined to the 1941 crop, and there should be a price of 80 cents; the 70 cents should be increased to 80 cents. If the board is now making a settlement with the grain firms on a basis of 80 cents for October wheat, when the wheat is supposed to have been taken at 70 cents, then we, the producers, should receive 80 cents for the 1941 crop. If that arrangement is going on—and we can find out whether it is correct or not—and we know that the board controls all wheat, either by options or cash, then if they are making that settlement with the grain firms, I say that it should apply to the 1941 crop for the farmers. That is the situation. I say that we should have the price fixed higher.

Here is another point to which I should like briefly to refer. I may say that since yesterday—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I must remind the hon. gentleman that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I should be glad to have the hon. gentleman proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. PERLEY: I am going to refer to something mentioned yesterday by the leader of the opposition, the shipment of wheat to Japan. I want the minister to follow me, and perhaps he can give us some more information. I made inquiries about this, as well as about the situation to which I have just referred. In connection with the shipment of wheat to Japan I am informed that the Canadian exporters, James Richardson and Sons, the Reliance Grain company and three others would have nothing to do with this deal. This shipment was made by the Continental Grain company, the Dreyfus company and the Bunge company, three international Jew firms. The Dreyfus company has since been changed to the Leval company.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think I should correct the statement the hon. gentleman has just made. He has stated that this shipment was made by three companies.

Mr. PERLEY: International companies.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The Canada Grain company of Vancouver, a well known Canadian firm, handled this shipment of wheat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were they the agents or the principals?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They were the principals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the evidence of that? I have other evidence.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am giving the information asked for. This is a Canadian company headed by Mr. McKee, a prominent resident of Vancouver.

Mr. PERLEY: I have been informed on good authority that these three companies figured in this deal and that the two companies I have named refused to have anything to do with it. These other companies are international companies. I am informed also that grain is always shipped in bulk to Japan or China, and that the fact that this shipment was in bags is evidence that it was intended for Russia or for enemy hands, to be reached through Russia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have heard that before.

Mr. PERLEY: These international grain firms should not be permitted to do business with the grain board, and the grain board should not deliver a single bushel of wheat to them.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have just denied the transaction.

Mr. PERLEY: These are not loyal Canadian firms, and therefore the board should not deal with them in any way, shape or form. An investigation should be held into this sale in order to find out if these firms had anything to do with it. This investigation should also cover the taxes paid by these firms and just what their capital investment is. I understand that these firms cover up their tax returns by showing the business they are doing in other countries as well as in Canada. They are evading their taxes, and this should be investigated.

The policy adopted by the board for the coming season has not met with the approval of the western producer. When the proper time comes, the minister will have to answer other questions with respect to the board's operations. I think I have produced sufficient evidence to-night to warrant the government in taking over the whole business. If that is done there will be no possibility of the things I have mentioned happening in the future.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not intend to speak at any length, but there are one or two observations I should like to make in connection with our wheat marketing, coming as I do from a province where wheat has been king for a number of years. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) stated, there is dissatisfaction with the price and with the operations of the grain exchange.

I am going to ask the minister, first, to clear up a point which I raised the other evening with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). It has been stated in various parts of western Canada, as well as to myself, that the wheat board is assisting a number of grain operators on the grain exchange on a relief basis. The statement is made that the board is allowing these men sufficient business in the way of spreading options from month to month or from period to period to give them about $150 a month. If that statement is not true, this is the place where it should be cleared up. If it is true, the practice should be discontinued. With the situation as it is among our farming population, with low prices and no prospect of better conditions, the farmers feel that their industry should not be used to maintain operators who are part of an organization which they have fought for a good many years. I am referring to the Winnipeg grain exchange. As the minister knows, there is a widespread feeling among the farmers of western Canada that the grain exchange should be closed.

Then there is the other matter of storage referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. It is unnecessary to traverse the points he made because he presented them very clearly indeed. But our farmers are uneasy about the future; they wonder what the policy is going to be next year. They feel that if storage is required, they can build satisfactory weather-proof bins, and with the prices at their present depressed levels, they should be entitled to receive adequate storage charges. A return was brought down a short time ago showing that one grain company had rented a government terminal elevator at a rental of $51,000. On the basis of the minimum use of that elevator, the storage charges will give that company a revenue roughly five times that amount. Under certain circumstances, that revenue might be increased considerably, in which event the rent would be increased to some extent. But the revelation which was given wide publicity in western Canada has certainly not tended to give confidence to farmers of the west when they see a parliamentary return indicating a rental of that description and payment for storage in the neighbourhood of the figure I have mentioned. Some consideration should be given to that problem.

We as a group thoroughly endorse the request which was made early in the session and repeated in a few words to-night by the the hon. member for Qu'Appelle—I do not know whether he represents his entire party in that regard—that the whole elevator system in the country should be taken over under the War Measures Act at least for the duration of the war, and that there should be no private gain in connection with the elevator service. The hon. member for Wood Mountain last year discussed the amounts that were paid in storage. I was not sure that his figures were altogether correct, but even if they were not, his statement revealed a storage condition which is most alarming to those of us who wish to see the producers get from their industry all that it is possible for them to get, particularly at this time.

There are a number of questions which will come up under individual items of the estimates, and I do not propose to ask a series of questions now, particularly because some of our members have various questions to ask. I do, however, wish to place ourselves clearly on record that we think, first that the government of Canada under the circumstances which now exist, with vast accumulations of grain in our country, which are likely to remain in our country, should undertake to see that this tremendous accumulation of wheat is carried in the most economical way. The government has endeavoured this year to cut down the production of wheat, and incidentally the farmers responded better than I thought they would in reducing their acreage. But with the moisture conditions which now exist in western Canada, and with a good month in June and a few showers in July, we may actually, even with the reduced acreage, have a bigger crop this year than we had last year. With that possibility facing us, these tremendous accumulations of wheat, I repeat, should be carried in the most economical way possible and to the benefit of the producers rather than of the grain companies. I am certain that I speak for a very large number of people when I say that in order to do that, the entire elevator system in this country should be taken over by the government at least for the duration of the war, or, in the alternative, until we can dispose of these large accumulations. Then a further policy regarding the elevator and storage system of Canada can be decided upon through this parliament.

Second, I am of the very firm opinion that the grain exchange to-day performs no useful function. There was a time when we had long arguments here as to the advantages of spreading options month after month or period after period because it was suggested that was an economical way of carrying grain over. As Mr. McIvor's predecessor once suggested to the parliamentary committee on wheat in 1936, it was a way of spreading the speculative losses over the largest number of people. The little speculators in those days were the people who took the losses; that is the interpretation I placed on his remarks, and that I think is true. At the present time there is no considerable trading on our grain exchange, and there seems to be no good reason why the exchange should be kept open.

One other thing I would like to say, and this is an endorsement and perhaps a repetition. Our group for a number of years has protested against the sending of munitions and supplies to potential aggressor nations, and I certainly was surprised when, after the government had stated a policy last year of preventing supplies of various kinds going to a possible enemy—and Japan now certainly is that without a doubt—I learned that we have just lately loaded a very large shipment of wheat to go to Japan. Of course it is said that it is only on Japanese account, that the wheat is going to China. But it is going to Japanese-controlled China in any event, and there is a possibility that either the shipment itself, or by replacing some other supplies, may eventually benefit our principal enemy, Germany. I certainly think the time has arrived when we should ship nothing to a possible aggressor. We may be at war with Japan at any time. As we know, she is threatening the Dutch East Indies to-day, and if that threat is carried out there will be war with Japan in a very short time. One of the reasons why I was so critical of the policies of the governments leading up to this war, one of the reasons why I feared that the democratic nations which were continuing this policy were not interested in maintaining democracy but that they might even be found on the side of the aggressor nations eventually, was the fact that we continued all through the pre-war years to ship supplies to countries which were ultimately going to use them to destroy us. We are following that policy now when we ship supplies to Japan. We have a fairly good excuse for not doing so because we have no control over that part of China. We have not a friendly government in that part of China to which the wheat is being shipped. Therefore I wish to endorse the principle that the wheat ought not to have been allowed to be shipped, and I hope that certainly no further sales of that kind will be made.

There are other matters I wish to bring up on individual items of the estimates as we come to them, but with these general remarks I shall leave the matter to-night.

Mr. QUELCH: I shall confine myself to-night largely to general remarks. First of all, on behalf of this group I protest against the shipment of grain to Japan. I was amazed when I heard that that is being done. I do not see how we can expect a really united war effort in this country so long as transactions of that kind are being carried on. It would be bad enough if the real destination of this grain was Japan, but apparently it is being shipped to Japan in transit to other countries which, if not our actual enemies to-day, at least are potential enemies.

In the past we have laid down what we considered to be a sound policy in regard to wheat, and I shall not take much time to-night to refer to that. We have stressed the fact that we consider the price of 70 cents a bushel altogether too low. We have pointed out that that policy has been largely responsible for building up the great surpluses which we have because farmers have been compelled to increase their operations in an attempt to reduce their overhead. We have suggested that a price of $1 a bushel for a limited delivery, with a minimum of 1,500 bushels graded upwards, should have been put in operation.

We have also urged on many occasions that the grain exchange should be closed because we do not believe it is performing any useful or necessary function at this time.

We have urged the government to take over all grain-handling facilities in order to do away with the very heavy storage charges which have to be paid during the war.

Another point which I believe is important is that regarding an advance against grain in storage on the farm. The minister himself has admitted that it is possible we may only be able to have an initial quota of two or three bushels to the acre instead of five. If that is so, I am wondering how the farmers will be able to carry on this fall.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would not want the idea to go out to the country that either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government or the wheat board suggested that only two or three bushels would be taken on the first quota from the 1941 crop. The intention is that it will be five, but a great deal will depend upon the condition with regard to available space at the time.

Mr. QUELCH: I understand that, but the figure "five" was mentioned. The minister will agree, however, that under certain circumstances it may be possible to give only two or three, and even at five bushels to the acre, if a farmer has a crop of thirty or forty bushels, he will not be able to pay his threshing expenses if he can deliver only five bushels. It is essential that advances should be made against the grain in storage so that the farmer can at least pay the actual cash operating expenses. I have here, order in council P.C. 3849 containing what I presume are the latest regulations, and I confess I find it difficult to know just where we are, because there have been so many orders in council, one cancelling the other, that unless we have the very latest we are out of date. I thought all this time I knew what the regulations were, regarding acreage bonus, but I find another one has recently been passed which entirely changes the picture.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is just one in this case.

Mr. QUELCH: There is only one in so far as these regulations are concerned, and section 17 reads:

> Wherever a quota of the grain produced on any land becomes deliverable, any producer entitled to a definite share of the crop as landlord, vendor or mortgagee, shall be entitled to have delivered in his name a share of such quota proportionate to such person's said interest in the grain, and shall have equal rights of delivery accorded to producers under the act. . . .

Does that mean that out of his five bushels delivered the farmer will be able to get only a portion for himself, and that the mortgage company will have a portion and the landlord a portion? Surely it means that. I should like to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The farmer will have the permit. Let me quote:

> . . . for such purpose the permit holder shall make the permit available, but the enforcement of this provision shall be the direct concern and responsibility of the interested parties themselves and no legal obligation shall devolve on the board in respect thereto.

Mr. QUELCH: But that does not alter the situation. It merely means that the board itself is not taking legal responsibility for enforcing it. The fact remains that the provision is there which compels the farmer to divide his quota with certain interested parties.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The farmer will have the permit, and he will get delivery.

Mr. QUELCH: According to section 17, it is supposed to be divided among the various parties. The board will not assume the legal responsibility of enforcing the provisions, but through the courts these other people can insist upon a share of the quota being delivered to them.. According to section 17, the farmer can be compelled by law to deliver a certain portion of the five bushels to the mortgage company and the landlord, and I suggest that it will be hard enough for him to carry on with five bushels.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Has that not always been the law?

Mr. QUELCH: No, it has not always been the law. The farmer has not been compelled to deliver only five bushels to the acre.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am referring to the proportions that are delivered.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; but the farmer has not formerly been in the position where he has been able to deliver only five bushels, or possibly two or three. He has been able to deliver the whole crop. Out of the five bushels he will have to pay his threshing bill, so that if a man threshes forty bushels to the acre, five bushels will not cover that expenditure.

Mr. DONNELLY: How could he get by last year?

Mr. QUELCH: Last year he was allowed to keep the whole five bushels.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who allowed him?

Mr. QUELCH: He had a special permit, and the five was quickly increased in the heavy producing districts to ten to the acre. In the Morrin district, the five was increased to eight almost immediately.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who allowed the farmer to retain the five bushels to the acre?

Mr. QUELCH: The provincial government at that time took steps to guarantee the farmer's retention of the first quota.

An hon. MEMBER: And only the provincial government can do it.

Mr. QUELCH: The clause need not be in there in the first place, but it definitely states that the delivery shall be on that basis. That is what I object to. If it were not there, it would not be necessary for the provincial government to enter the picture. Can provincial governments over-rule the War Measures Act?

There is another point. Could the minister give us the basis for that quota? We have asked for it before, but a good deal of time has elapsed. Can the minister tell us whether or not the quota will be based upon the average yield of each district? Will there be a different quota for different shipping points?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have here a long statement which I intend to put on Hansard on another occasion with an accompanying explanation, but first I wish to deal with a large number of categorical questions that have been asked me to-night.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 9, 1941.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the celebration of the king's birthday—

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think we each had the same thought in our minds. As hon. members are aware, to-day has been fixed by proclamation for the observance in Canada of His Majesty's birthday. The anniversary of His Majesty's birthday does not actually come until December 14, but it is being celebrated in Great Britain on Thursday the 12th of this month. However, to-day being fixed for the observance in Canada, I take it it will be the wish of all hon. members that we begin to-day's proceedings with the singing of the national anthem. I suggest accordingly.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang God Save the King.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIER OF ONTARIO RESPECTING INCREASED TAX ON NON-RESIDENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I be permitted to add to the file partly tabled a day or two ago some additional correspondence which has passed between the premier of Ontario and myself.

WAR EXPENDITURES

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk) moved that the third report of the special committee on war expenditures presented to the house on June 4, be now concurred in.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I understood that there was to be some discussion on this. It is my understanding that the work of one of the subcommittees is not quite complete. If it would be agreeable to the chairman or the members it would be a matter of great convenience if this discussion could be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. THORSON: I am quite agreeable to that.

Motion stands.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved:

That the fourth and final report of a special committee on the defence of Canada regulations, presented to the house on the 4th instant, be now concurred in.

He said: Since very little of this report has been brought to the attention of the public it might be appropriate to say a few words by way of explanation.

As hon. members of this house know, the defence of Canada regulations are issued under the authority of the War Measures Act for the protection of the realm and the safety of the state, for the efficient prosecution of the war, and to protect Canada and her people from the activities of the enemy. The responsibility for administration of these regulations rests with the government and has been entrusted to the heads of various departments: the Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State, the Minister of National Defence, and, in some respects, the Minister of Transport. The regulations provide for protection against those who would give themselves to espionage activities or acts likely to assist the enemy.

The reasons for these regulations have been given to the public on many occasions; and of course, being rules passed during war time, in their nature and operation they are restrictive of the general liberties of the subject. Because of that fact, in some quarters they have not been altogether accepted, and in many instances have been criticized. The regulations were passed the day following the declaration of war, and have been in force ever since. During the last session a committee was appointed which studied the regulations and recommended certain amendments which were thought desirable in view of existing circumstances. Again this year, on March 4, the house appointed a committee to look further into the regulations and report to the house as to what it might be advisable to suggest to His Excellency the Governor General by way of amendment. The committee held twenty-four meetings; a subcommittee was appointed, and the final report of the committee was made on June 4, appearing in Votes and Proceedings of that date.

The principal recommendations contained in that report were made for the purpose of giving the assurance that the administration of such regulations would afford full protection to those who might be affected by them; but before the final report was made an interim report was presented on April 3, containing suggested amendments to rules 26A, 26B and 37A, which amendments were accepted immediately by his excellency and at once implemented. The effect of these amendments was that persons who are nationals of and who were born in Czechoslovakia should be excluded from the category of enemy aliens. The report was concurred in and adopted by the house.

During the course of its deliberations the committee was fortunate in having appear before it Mr. Alexander Patterson, his majesty's commissioner of prisons for Great Britain, who happened to be in Canada in connection with the internees sent to this country from Britain and who gave your committee valuable information as to the manner in which similar regulations were administered in Great Britain.

Your committee has recommended important amendments to regulation 15. If hon. members will refer to the defence of Canada regulations they will find that regulation 15 reads:

> The Secretary of State of Canada may make provision by order for preventing or restricting the publication in Canada of matters as to which he is satisfied that the publication, or, as the case may be, the unrestricted publication, thereof would or might be prejudicial to the safety of the state or the efficient prosecution of the war, and an order under this paragraph may contain such incidental and supplementary provisions as may appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient for the purposes of the order including provisions for securing that documents, pictorial representations, photographs or cinematograph films shall, before publication, be submitted or exhibited to such authority or person as may be specified in such order.

The Secretary of State is entrusted with the duty and obligation of prohibiting the publication of pamphlets or other documentary propaganda which may be subversive, and he has the responsibility of declaring that such publications or newspapers are carrying on subversive activities. Some people, however, think this power might be subject to abuse; that it is altogether too much power to be given to one person, and that there is danger that such power might be used—not by the present incumbent of the office, but by possible successors—to restrict the publication of documents which could not be considered subversive. Therefore the committee has considered it advisable to recommend that the Secretary of State be authorized to call in someone to pass upon his orders when those concerned felt justified in appealing from his decision.

If the report of the committee is adopted, the following will be added to regulation 15:

> (3) Any person against whom an order is made under this section may take objection to such order to a committee appointed by the Minister of Justice to consist of a person who holds or has held high judicial office.
> (4) When objection is taken, the functions of such committee shall be to consider and make recommendations to the Secretary of State with respect to any objections against such order which are duly made to the committee by the person to whom such order relates.
>
> (5) Notice of objection shall be made to the Secretary of State within fourteen days from the date of service of the order in question, which order shall contain a provision notifying the person of his right to make objection and shall refer to the publication or publications in respect of which the order has been made.
> (6) On receipt of any such notice of objection, the Secretary of State shall forthwith notify such committee who shall make arrangements for the hearing of such objection.

In the event of the adoption of these recommendations the person or persons affected by the suppression of publications would have the right to object to the order of the Secretary of State, such objection to be heard by a person occupying or having occupied high judicial office. His report would be made to the Secretary of State.

A further recommendation of some importance suggests the repeal of regulation 22, and the substitution of another section. Hon. members are no doubt aware that section 21 provides for the detention of persons who are believed to be carrying on subversive activities. This regulation applies to British subjects, and the onus is placed upon the Minister of Justice of dealing with the liberty of such persons. Strong exception has been taken to the procedure which has heretofore been followed in dealing with these persons. Some critics have gone so far as to say that no such person should be arrested, detained or interned, without first having been tried as to the justification for such detention. The committee has found that in the past, while there has been no abuse in the administration of these regulations, there might have been some justification in the minds of some people for apprehension as to the safety of persons who might have been detained without just cause. The committee recommends therefore slight changes in procedure, so that assurance may be given to the public that those who are detained will have full opportunity of appealing from the detention order made by the Minister of Justice. Under the amendment they may have their cases reviewed, and are given the opportunity to offer evidence in support of their contentions.

Heretofore an appeal from an order of detention was made to a committee of one, and it was stipulated that such person must hold high judicial office. It has been claimed that this provision is not wide enough, and that the tribunal hearing an appeal should consist of more than one person. The committee recommends therefore that it consist of three persons, the chairman being a person holding or having held high judicial office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the word "high" has been eliminated.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, that is correct. The expression "high judicial office" applies only to regulation 15. In regulation 22 the word "high" has been eliminated, and the chairman may now be a person holding judicial office.

Perhaps it would be well if I were to place on record the regulation suggested in substitution for the present regulation 22. The committee recommends:

That regulation 22 be repealed and that the following regulation, to be numbered 22, be substituted therefor:

22. (1) Any person aggrieved by the making of an order against him under the powers conferred by the last preceding regulation may make his objection to an advisory committee as provided in this regulation.

(2) For the purpose of this regulation the Minister of Justice shall appoint one or more advisory committees, each to consist of three persons, to consider and make recommendations to him with respect to any objections against an order made under the last preceding regulation. The number of committees appointed shall, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, be adequate to deal promptly with the cases arising in the different parts of Canada.

(3) The chairman of each committee shall be nominated by the Minister of Justice and shall be a person who holds or has held judicial office.

(4) As soon as possible after detention under an order made under the provisions of the last preceding regulations, the person against whom the order is made shall in every case be informed of the general grounds on which he is detained and notice of his detention shall, where possible and not contrary to the public interest, be given to his family or such person as he may request.

(5) It shall be the duty of the Minister of Justice to secure that every person detained as aforesaid is informed of his right to make an objection under this regulation.

(6) A person desiring to make an objection shall deliver to the person having his custody a written notice of objection, signed by the objector, within thirty days from the date of such detention or such further time as the Minister of Justice in his discretion may allow, and a true copy of such notice shall forthwith be forwarded by the person aforesaid to the Minister of Justice for transmission to the chairman of a committee.

(7) The chairman on receipt of such notice of objection shall give such directions as may be convenient and necessary for the prompt and just disposition of the objection.

(8) It shall be the duty of the chairman to inform the objector within a reasonable time before the hearing of the grounds on which the order has been made against him, and, in order to enable him to present his case, to furnish him with as full particulars of the reasons for such order as in the opinion of the chairman the circumstances permit, and such particulars shall be further supplemented by the committee at the hearing by giving the objector all such further particulars as it shall deem necessary and advisable.

(9) The objector may be represented by counsel, solicitor or agent.

(10) The hearing may take place at any place and it may be adjourned from time to time as the committee shall determine. The Minister of Justice shall cause to be put before the committee all the information about such person available to the minister except such as is not in the public interest to disclose.

(11) Where the Minister of Justice has referred a recommendation of an advisory committee to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order that the latter may have an opportunity of putting such further material as he may desire before the minister, the commissioner shall submit such material within a delay of fifteen days or such further time as the minister may allow.

(12) The chairman or any member of a committee may administer oaths, and a committee may receive and accept such evidence and information on oath, affidavit or otherwise as in its discretion it may deem fit and proper.

(13) A committee shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927.

(14) The Minister of Justice may make further rules as to the manner in which objections against an order as aforesaid may be made and disposed of.

(15) The committee shall consider and make recommendations on any matter arising under these regulations which may be referred to it by the Minister of Justice.

These are the main recommendations made to the house by the committee in connection with regulations 15 and 22.

A minor amendment is suggested to regulation 39, which has to do with the spreading of reports or the making of statements prejudicial to the public interest or the carrying on of the war. A recommendation is made in respect to persons who "act in a manner prejudicial" to his majesty or who interferes with the success of his majesty's forces. A recommendation is made in connection with regulation 58, covering the forfeiture of articles seized by the police and providing that forfeiture and destruction of such articles may be ordered by the Attorney General of Canada or the attorney general of any province.

A recommendation is made that internees be segregated according to their classification. A recommendation is made that internees be given the privilege of receiving visitors provided that it is not against the public interest. The committee also recommends that before a person is taken to a detention camp he should be detained in the gaol or other place of confinement nearest to his place of residence.

It is hoped that these recommendations will be accepted by the house. It is true that in some respects they would seem to change the condition of affairs which has hitherto existed. The committee recommends that the chairman of each committee shall be a person who holds or has held judicial office. It has been brought to our attention that in Great Britain all the members of the committees are laymen and that it might be possible that a superior court judge or a judge of the high court would find it difficult at times to preside permanently.

I move that the report of the committee be adopted.

Mr. GREEN: What did the committee find with regard to naturalization and deportation?

Mr. MICHAUD: The committee did not have much time to go into those matters, but studied them sufficiently to be able to report that it would appear that the naturalization and immigration laws would not need to be amended at the present time, because they are not being used to any considerable extent. Before the war is over, however, it is possible that they may have to be revised.

The committee recommends:

> Your committee has received some evidence and has investigated these two important subjects in part only and, notwithstanding the fact that your committee has held a great many meetings, including on occasions two meetings a day, the limited time at our command has made it impossible to devote the time to these subjects which they require in order to enable a proper report to be made to the house.

[Mr. Michaud.]

> Your committee therefore respectfully begs to recommend that at the next session of the house the law relating to naturalization and deportation and matters incidental thereto be the subject matter of a reference to a committee of the house.

The committee felt that the law with respect to naturalization will have to be amended, in respect to procedure if not in principle. The same is true with respect to the law having to do with immigration and deportation. In view of changing conditions and the possible influx of immigration after the war, the committee thought it might be well that a committee of the house should be set up at the next session, or later if necessary, to study these two subjects exclusively.

Mr. GREEN: That would be separate from any committee studying the defence of Canada regulations?

Mr. MICHAUD: The report recommended that another committee of the house be chosen to study these two subjects.

Mr. GREEN: You have in mind a committee to deal with naturalization and deportation alone?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, a separate committee.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the report which has just been presented by the chairman of the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations is the result of a careful and prolonged inquiry extending virtually over two sessions, because many of the members of the committee this year were members of the committee which sat in the previous session. During that time the committee held some fifty meetings, besides numerous sittings of its subcommittee; and incidentally I was a member of both the main committee and the subcommittee.

It appears to me that differences of opinion regarding the regulations and their administration are due to fundamental differences in approach. Some take the view that the regulations and final decisions should be administrative matters. Whilst the majority in both years took that view, a minority was of the opinion that the procedure should more nearly approximate a judicial procedure, and that at least the final decisions ought not to be left to the minister and his advisers. Because what I may call the administrative view prevailed, to that extent I was not able to approve the report.

But the main recommendations in the report do meet with my approval, and if carried out I believe they will do much to remove important objections to the present procedure. I strongly urge upon the government the adoption of the recommendation affecting regulations 21 and 22.

Since regulation 21 as it originally stood is a serious departure from the normal course of court procedure and traditional British justice, every effort should be made to minimize the dangers to justice inherent in the regulation. This becomes I think more important and necessary since the passage of orders in council such as the one which was announced last Friday, P.C. 4061, bringing the coal mining industry under the regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What section brings them under the regulations?

Mr. COLDWELL: Order in council 4061 brings the coal mining industry under the defence of Canada regulation section 2 (d) by declaring it to be an essential service. It seems to me that an order in council affecting an industry in which organization is going on and has in some respects been established might have been considered in the house when we were discussing labour questions, as we were last week, and should not have been brought before the public simply by order in council. The use of the regulations against men engaged in the organization of even illegal strikes will in my opinion play directly into the hands of some whose real purpose may be to cause internal strife.

I regret that the committee could not adopt the proposal for an inquiry by a committee of three persons before a detention order was actually made. I should say in fairness, however, that evidence furnished to the committee showed that with proper safeguards the powers of preventive detention conferred upon the government under section 21 are necessary for the safety of the state. But unfortunately cases have arisen which indicate that in some instances the powers may not have been wisely used. The detention of Doctor Levine of Toronto, for example, after he had served his gaol sentence, and the arrest of James A. Murphy whilst engaged in negotiations with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on behalf of a group of its employees, have given rise to suspicion and uneasiness, and at least these two cases should be referred at the earliest possible day, for immediate investigation, to the committee which is recommended under the new section 22. If this is done under the proposed new section, appeals will be heard under conditions which will in my opinion ensure a fairer hearing than has hitherto been possible under the practice which has prevailed. Consequently I am strongly in favour of the immediate adoption of regulation 22 as recommended by the committee. Advisory committees of three persons presided over by a judge, provided that they are sufficiently numerous to deal promptly with objections, are in line with suggestions that we have made in the House of Commons and which have been urged by many organizations all across the country.

The new regulations, it will be noted, also require the chairman of the committee to furnish the accused with as full particulars of the charge as circumstances permit, and further obligate the committee at the hearing to supplement the particulars by giving all such further information as the committee shall deem necessary and advisable. This, it seems to me, is an important step in advance of the regulations as they have stood up to the present time. The accused, as the chairman indicated, may be represented by counsel; the hearing may be adjourned to give further opportunity of the production of evidence, and the minister is obliged to give the committee all information available about the person which it is in the public interest to disclose. I do not like that proviso, for it seems to me that a committee of the type contemplated ought to be as carefully chosen and as trustworthy as the civil servants who have access to all the information and who advise the minister regarding these cases. I do not think that judges and other persons who have the confidence of the minister to a sufficient extent to be appointed to these committees, should be denied any information that may assist them in obtaining a comprehensive and accurate view of the case.

Section 22 is also improved by suggesting that when the minister refers the committee's recommendation to the commissioner of the mounted police he shall submit within a period of fifteen days any further material he desires to submit. I think this should do much to obviate the danger of delay in final decisions, which delays, of course, have been a cause of dissatisfaction and suspicion.

The committee, I am glad to say, also recommended improvements in the procedure under regulation 39, dealing with organizations, publications, and so forth, banned under the regulations by order in council. I wish the words "or likely" to do something were eliminated from the regulations where they appear. In my opinion the interpretation placed upon them in some cases, particularly in the early part of the war, caused suffering and hardship and gave rise to suspicion of the regulations and their purpose generally. Apart from that, the recommendation that publishers of banned publications be given a right of appeal to a committee consisting of a person who has held or holds high judicial office will tend to a better administration of that regulation.

I strongly urge the adoption by the government of section 7 and 8 of the report. It has seemed to me that regulations regarding the writing of letters to their families and receiving visits from them ought not to be the same for interned British subjects as for prisoners of war. Under proper supervision, there should be no difficulty in liberalizing present internment regulations for Canadian citizens.

I am glad in somewhat the same connection to support whole-heartedly the recommendation which was made, and adopted by the house, to remove citizens of Czechoslovakia from the category of enemy aliens. I think that that was a matter of justice which was somewhat delayed.

While, for reasons which I think I have indicated, I did not support the adoption of the report when it was before the committee, I believe that its adoption by the house is a step in the right direction, as a return to more democratic procedure; and I hope that next session a committee will recommend still further modifications towards the restoration of the rule of law. In any event the present report indicates a desire to maintain more of our elementary democratic rights than has been evidenced since the outbreak of war. In common with others of the democratic, faith, I believe that we must be vigilant to see that reactionary forces do not succeed in destroying democracy at home whilst we are engaged in a struggle for democracy abroad; and every step towards the suppression of legitimate labour organizations, of the publication of proper comment on the activities of the government, and so on, plays into the hands of those who have the same general fundamental point of view as Hitler and those who support him.

Nor, may I say, on the other hand, must we allow our vigilance for British freedom to be imposed upon and used by subversive elements who pay lip-service to democracy in order to destroy the very basis of freedom in this country. We must guard against the would-be Hitlers and the would-be Stalins in our midst, for in regard to democracy and freedom, their objective is the same—its destruction. The unholy alliance between the forces of nazism and communism must be recognized and opposed. A United States writer coined a neat and, it seems to me, an appropriate name for their activities, which he described as communazism. In that regard, I might add, the economic agreements between Hitler and Stalin make Russia the economic ally of nazi Germany. Thus, Russia now has a stake in a German victory, a fact clearly emphasized by Russia's non-aggression pact with a ruthless Japanese imperialism murderously invading China and threatening freedom in the far east.

In this country, communists and their sympathizers whisper that the masses of our people would be no worse off under Hitler; and that, of course, is dangerously false and subversive propaganda. Actually, people who believe in political and economic democracy have a tremendous stake in the outcome of this war; for upon it depend our economic progress and our freedom. Wherever Hitler has gone, people's cooperatives, trades unionism, religious freedom, and all the freedoms have disappeared. Conditions were and are bad in our democratic countries, but they are infinitely better than those in Germany and German-controlled territories, and I hope that our people who are being subjected to the type of propaganda I have just mentioned will bear constantly that fact in mind. Here, men and women of diverse views may organize and agitate to achieve their objectives, but in the communazi totalitarian countries those who oppose the dictators are slaughtered, or imprisoned without any trial or appeal, or are forced to flee for refuge to the democratic countries. The fate of social democrats, trade union leaders, and leaders in the cooperative movement in the countries overrun by Hitler bears tragic witness to this. The very fact that in this house we can discuss, criticize, and try to amend—yes, and succeed in amending—the defence of Canada regulations gives the lie to the communazi propaganda in favour of a peace which would be a Hitler victory.

To say, as some are doing, that this is another imperialist war fought for economic and financial reasons, just another attempt to fasten the chains of international finance upon the world which ought to be opposed, is of course also a propaganda to undermine our determination to see this thing through. If that were so, we in this group, at least, would be opposing this war as vigorously as we criticized preparations for such a war when powerful interests in our own commonwealth were building up Hitler and Mussolini and seeking an understanding with them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What interests?

Mr. COLDWELL: What interests?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What interests in this commonwealth?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say that Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier, representing certain economic and social interests in Great Britain and in France, endeavoured at all times, in the years prior to the war and right up to Munich, to come to an arrangement with Hitler. We need—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is quite a different proposition. It is a very strong statement the hon. gentleman has made, that we were building up Hitlerism.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say that those who were endeavouring to come to some arrangement with Hitler, were lending money to Hitler and were trying to promote an agreement with him, certainly were building up Hitler and Hitlerism throughout the world.

Mr. BRADETTE: Hoping for peace.

Mr. DUPUIS: Because Hitler said that he wanted to fight Russia.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member says, "because Hitler said he wanted to fight Russia." That, I think, is perfectly true. But now what do we find? We find that Hitler and Russia are in alliance and in agreement, and we face totalitarian powers both of whom would destroy our democratic institutions if ever they got the opportunity. That is what I meant when I said there were interests which were building up Hitler. May I say to the leader of the opposition that, but for the storm of protest that Munich caused, largely led by the labour and social democratic leaders in Great Britain and France, a firm stand would not have been taken later on against Germany and we might have been in a more serious situation than we are now. As to this present war being a war promoted for economic and imperialistic interests in the economic sense of the word "imperialistic", I would say that this is the first time in British history at least that the people of Britain forced a large portion of their government to take a stand in opposition to the interests which they, some members of the government themselves, favoured.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): What about the last great war?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not going into that, but anybody who knows the history of the last war, and particularly Mr. Lloyd George's own statements both prior to and after the war, knows well that the underlying causes of that war were not the same as the underlying causes of this war. And that, may I tell the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), is the reason why there are many thousands of people, almost millions of people, some of whom are now in the British government and in other governments of our commonwealth, who are supporting this war but who in the last war spent at least a portion of the war period in concentration camps. They recognized the fundamental difference between the causes of the great war and the causes of the present war. The vote last week of the British Labour party clearly indicates that, when 99 per cent of the membership of that great organization stood behind the war, whereas regarding the first great war that party was seriously split, split almost down the middle, as history clearly shows.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): May I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that we are dealing with the defence of Canada regulations. I do not think the house would be justified in entering now into a debate on the causes of the last war or this war.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry I transgressed the rules of the house, but I was invited to do so by certain questions that were asked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The questions were provoked by deliberate statements of the hon. gentleman, with which at least I am not in accord.

Mr. COLDWELL: The leader of the opposition is quite entitled to differ from any statements which I made. I am not expecting that he will be in accord with them.

In my opinion a great deal of educational work should be undertaken by the government and by members of this house in order to meet various sorts of propaganda that are now being carried on to undermine our war effort If this were done instead of having to use regulations of the type that we are now discussing I believe we should find that the people; understanding what this war is about and the motives of many of those—not all—who are opposing our war effort, would realize that their activities are not in the interests of Canada.

In this connection I would say that nothing would do more to increase courage and unity in this nation than a declaration by this parliament that when the war is over the country will use every power it possesses to see that every Canadian receives a square deal and has opportunity for a decent living. That would do more than the regulations which we are now discussing to unify this nation and to suppress subversive activities. Unless we do that, in spite of these regulations we shall find that discontent may grow and spread across our country. I know perfectly well that the communnazi organization of which I spoke is busy among our farmers in the west endeavouring to organize meetings with seemingly innocent names and innocent people in order that later they may control and dominate them and use them for their own purposes. The same thing applies in the ranks of labour.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member will allow me a question; if as he says he has knowledge of these activities, has he communicated that knowledge to the proper authorities in Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: The proper authorities know what is going on, although it is not—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point of my question. Has the hon. member communicated that knowledge to them?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is not my function as a member of parliament to act as a special agent for the government. But where I have direct knowledge of sabotage or anything of the kind I shall deem it my duty to inform the government.

The stirring up of discontent at this time could not be successful unless conditions were present which make for its success. So that in carrying out these regulations the government should endeavour to distinguish at all times between legitimate discontent with regard to bad conditions and the promotion of discontent for ulterior motives. That is why we have always contended that there should be a complete and fair hearing for every person accused under the defence of Canada regulations. Since the report of the committee does go some way towards giving a fair hearing and a proper trial, that recommendation in the committee's report is to be welcomed. We must during this war vindicate and glorify our democratic institutions; anything which tends to undermine the confidence in our democratic institutions is subversive, whether that undermining is done consciously or unconsciously, by those in power or by those who are suffering under depressed conditions.

The work of the committee was worth while. We had different points of view represented, but I think at all times every member of the committee gave the opposing point of view full and sympathetic consideration. I was glad to be a member of such a committee. While there were differences in our approach to the problem, which of course coloured the report—for a report must always be a majority decision—yet I am thoroughly convinced that if the main recommendations now made are put into effect something will be done to liberalize the administration of the defence of Canada regulations.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this committee I should like to say a few words in connection with the report, but first I want to express my appreciation of the fact that as one of the newer members of this house I was permitted to take part in the deliberations of a committee dealing with such an important matter as the liberty of the subject. I think I can safely say that all members of the committee approached this matter with one paramount consideration in mind, namely, that the safety of the state must come first, and that the ordinary processes of criminal law, whereby a man is deemed to be innocent until proved guilty beyond any reasonable doubt in the mind of the tribunal sitting on his case, must at least for the duration of the war in connection with these cases go by the board. We are dealing with a ruthless enemy. We cannot afford to take chances, and if there is any reasonable doubt as to the loyalty of an individual, it is up to him to dispel that doubt or be subject to imprisonment or at least close observation.

The safety of the state is the first consideration; yet we must not lose sight of the fact that we are tampering with the long-cherished and dearly-won rights and liberties of the subject, and with due regard to the safety of the state we must jealously and carefully guard those rights and liberties. The rights and liberties of the subject as we understand them in a properly constituted democracy must not be limited any more than is actually and militarily necessitated by the circumstances. Certain circumstances require drastic action; but when we do interfere with these democratic rights and liberties we must not do so lightly, and, as I say, we must curtail them only to the extent actually necessary for the safety of the state. I am fearful—and of course I am expressing my individual opinion only—lest we allow these rights and liberties to be taken away from us without proper thought and without a proper realization of what we are giving up; lest we should accept too readily statements that certain regulations are required for the safety of the state without carefully examining the underlying reasons for those assertions. I suggest that we must guard against any glossing over of the possibility of injustice with the thought that, after all, these regulations are only for the duration of the war; for I suggest that we in this house must realize that it is up to us to decide what is necessary and appropriate at this time. We cannot absolve ourselves of the responsibility that is ours when we introduce regulations such as these; we must accept that responsibility and realize that if any injustices result from the regulations we as members of the House of Commons are responsible for such injustices because we are the ones who are interfering with the rights and liberties of the subject.

In examining the effects of the regulations I sincerely suggest that each member of the house try to put himself in the position of one against whom an order has been made under the provisions of section 21, and consider the position he would be in and whether he would then believe that he had a reasonable chance of obtaining justice. In our consideration of this matter we may be inclined to be too easily influenced by the thought, "Oh, it cannot happen to us." That, Mr. Speaker, may have been just the thought that passed through the minds of some of those who are to-day in internment camps. I am not suggesting for a moment that we have not a fair-minded man in the person of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I believe he is eminently fair-minded. I am not suggesting for a moment that he has not fair-minded men as his advisers; but he might not always have them, and it is dangerous to adopt the principle that even though some of our laws do not protect the individual as completely as they might, we can depend upon the fair-mindedness of those in charge of the administration of those laws. I suggest to you, sir, that this is a dangerous principle to adopt because we must guard against even the ultra-loyal and over-zealous official, and against the possibility of a narrow-minded one. I am sorry to say that I believe there are persons in this country to-day who cannot help feeling that anyone who advocates a change in the status quo is a dangerous radical, and we must guard against the possibility of putting too much power into the hands of such individuals. I say, too, that we must be very careful to avoid the possibility of the public having ground for thinking that there is an avenue open for the introduction of political persuasion or influence. In a nutshell what I am trying to say is that we must, if we possibly can, avoid regulations which reveal bureaucratic or undemocratic tendencies.

Your committee spent a great deal of time considering these regulations; so much so, as was pointed out by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) whom we were privileged to have as chairman of the committee, that we were unable to pay very much attention to the questions of naturalization and deportation. Consequently it has been recommended that a special committee be authorized at the next session of parliament to deal with these subjects.

As to the details of the recommendations, I think I can say that there was fairly general agreement; but so far as the principles involved are concerned I for one could not agree to the retention of certain provisions of the regulations as they previously stood, and which, since they are not excluded by the amendments, are still there. I cannot concur in the policy of continuing to have the final and complete responsibility in the hands of the Minister of Justice and his advisers. Under the regulations as amended the internee is given the right to object to his internment. There is a certain time limit within which he must make his objection, and then he is given certain of the facts for the purpose of allowing him to prepare his case. Under the amendment these facts may be amplified at the hearing before the advisory committee, which is a tribunal of three under the amended regulations. The regulations provide certain other safeguards and procedure in connection with such hearings, which I need not discuss at the moment, but the suggested amendments contain a very significant provision, which I submit is fundamental, and which is contained in paragraph 10 of regulation 22, as amended by paragraph 2 of the report, which reads:

> The Minister of Justice shall cause to be put before the committee all the information about such person available to the minister except such as is not in the public interest to disclose.

In other words, this committee of three is not to have all the evidence available against an internee and, consequently what is likely to happen is this. The evidence will be passed upon by the committee. The committee will decide that there is not sufficient to have the man kept in an internment camp, and will recommend accordingly. The matter is then referred to the Minister of Justice through his advisers. Further evidence is furnished to him, and, as a result of that further evidence, he determines that the man should be kept incarcerated. To the bewilderment of those who do not know the man, despite the fact that the committee of three set up under the regulations has recommended his release, the minister, on information not available to that committee, determines that the person in question should be kept in an internment camp. I suggest therefore that even under these regulations as amended the committee has no responsibility.

I know it will be pointed out that in a recent report placed before the house the minister accepted all the recommendations of the committee. That is true. But it must be remembered that in a report tabled some time ago, out of twenty-five recommendations for release the minister refused to accept nine.

I suggest first of all that if the committee is going to deal with this matter in a responsible manner it is entitled to have all the evidence. It is a responsible committee and could hear evidence in secret. There would be no necessity to have the internee present when evidence which might be prejudicial, if it leaked out, was made available. I do suggest however that unless the committee has the whole of the evidence, the set-up is useless, because we would have built up a structure which turned out to be a hollow shell. The tribunal is not yet to have all the evidence, consequently it cannot possibly give a decision in accordance with all the facts.

In addition to placing before the committee all the evidence available, I suggest it should have the final responsibility, at least in respect of cases concerning which the committee makes a unanimous finding. It may be that where there is not unanimous opinion in the committee, and consequently a doubt, final decision should be made by the minister. I suggest however, always having in mind the thought that the committee would receive all the evidence, that in cases in which the committee is unanimous in respect of a man's release, its recommendation should be taken as mandatory.

In connection with the original internment under section 21, I suggest that more formal procedure should be adopted. There should be a committee of three, such as has been suggested this morning, which would examine the evidence and advise the minister before an order is actually made. We must realize that once a man has been interned under the provisions of section 21, despite his innocence and his subsequent release a stigma attaches to him which renders it very difficult for him to reestablish himself in civil life. I believe examples could be cited to substantiate the statement I make, namely, that a man has the greatest difficulty in reestablishing himself in civil life once he has spent any time at all in an internment camp. Many people, following such internment, are inclined to believe that if he served some time in such a camp, despite his subsequent release there must have been some good reason for his internment.

Generally speaking it may be true to say that we are following the procedure as laid down in England. We have often boasted of our own autonomy, and in this instance I suggest it is up to us to adopt our own procedure, and to do it on our own responsibility. It is not necessary for us blindly to accept the procedure as laid down in England, because the situation over there is entirely different. They are in the front line of battle. I believe it can be said with safety that the regulations in England to-day have engendered much unfavourable comment on the part of responsible persons. Injustices and inequities have arisen in great numbers, and I believe that before long—this is my personal reaction from what I have read—we shall find that the whole principle upon which the regulations in Great Britain are founded will be changed.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this year's committee on the defence of Canada regulations I should like to make one or two observations. May I say first that the work of the committee itself was an extreme pleasure. It was one of the most harmonious committees on which I have had the privilege of serving in the past few years. While there were some details concerning which hon. members differed, such differences were indicated in a happy spirit.

In passing may I pay tribute to the management of the committee under its worthy chairman, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud). If in Canada there has been any criticism of the defence of Canada regulations, I believe it may be said that at least some of such criticism has been based upon a lack of understanding. Serving on that committee I learned many things I had not known before, and it occurred to me that if the people of Canada were permitted to learn some of the points which were brought to my attention, it would be in the public interest. For instance, one of the criticisms levelled against the regulations is that there has been extreme delay between the picking up of a suspect and the taking of the examination. We had some reason to believe that at one time there was justification for that criticism. When the facts in that connection were known they set our minds at rest, at least to some extent. The public should recognize that perhaps for the most part the delay was due to the fact that when war broke out, and when later Italy entered the war, it was only natural to expect a general rounding up of suspects, and that many would be taken into custody for fear that they might be a danger to the state. When several hundred men have to be examined, of necessity there must be some delay. But this condition should not arise at the present time. Hordes of suspects are not now being picked up; it is only the occasional one now and again. During the past year and a half since the war broke out the public have periodically become extremely concerned about this or that situation. I can remember when Germany began to invade the lowlands, when she invaded Norway, when fifth column activities were brought to our attention as they had never been before. The natural impression the public got was that the same thing might happen here, and it might in some degree; but I do not think everyone with a foreign name should have been suspected. The result was almost tantamount to public hysteria. Complaints were made to the police, and I think the evidence will show that instead of having too many suspects, their biggest job was to weed out the complaints for which there was no foundation.

One particular case was brought to my attention. A young clergyman came from the United States to take over a charge in this country. He was of Dutch origin, some few generations back, and spelled his name with a "van". Because that was pronounced "von" and he happened to have a motion picture camera with him, the whole community became startled. This particular town happened to contain a number of grain elevators. The young clergyman had never seen such huge storage elevators before. He took some pictures, and it was soon noised around that he was carrying on fifth-column activities. Considerable damage was done to the reputation of the man, to the community and to the work he was carrying on.

The public should realize that it has some responsibility in this regard. It is all right for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to say, as he said a few moments ago to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that the authorities should be informed. I admit that if anyone is in possession of information he should inform the authorities, but I do not think people should run off to the police simply because they are suspicious. That is not the right spirit to have in a country. Instead of people being calmed, the tendency is to rouse them and that is not good.

We are taught from childhood that one of the axioms of British justice is that a man shall be deemed to be innocent until he has been proven guilty. I believe that is still the rule in the administration of our criminal law. It would be well for the public to realize that the picture changes a little bit when a nation finds itself in a state of war, and espionage or fifth-column activities are likely to be extant in the country. At such times men are picked up not necessarily because they are guilty of this or that, but because they are regarded as being dangerous to the state. The order becomes reversed; the procedure is not carried on through the ordinary judicial channels. The hearing which is held is not necessarily a trial; it is more in the nature of an examination—not to prove that a man did this or that or said this or that, but to satisfy the authorities that he is a safe man to be at large, that he is not a danger to the state. If he is regarded as a danger to the state, of necessity he must be confined. I think it would be well for the people of this country to recognize this.

Last year when I was speaking on this matter I said that it might be possible for those who are administering the defence of Canada regulations to make psychological mistakes. As someone has said, we are fighting a psychological war, and this principle enters into the administration of the defence of Canada regulations in a time of war. There is a very strong psychological principle of which the government must be aware. Personally I deplore the emphasis being placed upon the picking up of a suspect on some flimsy piece of would-be evidence while perhaps there are things taking place in the country which are far more dangerous to public thinking. I am not so sure that we did the right thing in outlawing Jehovah's Witnesses. I am not so sure that we did the right thing in outlawing Technocracy. I am not expressing my deliberate opinion, but I am saying that I am not so certain that these two organizations are a tremendous danger to the state. At lease the authorities should be very careful how they administer the defence of Canada regulations in respect to those two organizations. Perhaps I do not know all that I should know about them, but what I have in mind is this, that there are things happening in Canada, and I would go so far as to include perhaps certain policies which the government itself holds, which psychologically are a greater danger to public thinking than the distribution of perhaps some more or less harmless literature by these two organizations or even by others.

Perhaps one may wonder what I have in mind. Of course I know that the government has the answers to all these criticisms, but whether the answers are satisfactory to other members of the house or satisfactory to the public of Canada, I do not know. For instance, we had brought up in the house the other day the matter of the shipment of wheat in sacks from Canada in Japanese bottoms, the destination of which was supposed to be somewhere in China. The government may have its answer to that, but I am saying this, that whatever answer it gives I do not believe it has satisfied the people of Canada. If there is anything we desire to maintain in all of Canada it is complete unity and complete loyalty. Here we are carrying on a recruiting campaign and a campaign to raise the victory loan, and this thing coming into the picture right now is causing dissension.

You may say, what has this to do with the defence of Canada regulations. I answer just this. An individual may be picked up somewhere in Canada for distributing a pamphlet.

The whole community becomes aroused. Yet on that very same day they read in the press a report to the effect that Canadian wheat is perhaps being shipped to the axis powers. That is extremely bad. While I am on this point may I suggest that there are others besides members of parliament, and those who are administering the defence of Canada regulations who have a responsibility in the matter of the unity of Canada and the loyalty of its people.
