THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1851.

Important news.

In this "piping time" of political peace, we may be accused if we attempt to penetrate into the recesses of private life, and endeavor to draw out the idea of our yesterday's correspondent into more prominence, by stating plainly, not perhaps the fact, but at least the moral, relationally which exists, or ought to exist, between Masters and Servants.

It might have been—or it may be expected of us—that in advancing into such a subject as this, we should run into a violent vindication of the superior claims of Master or Mistress over the services and attentions of their stipendiary attendants, but we have no such intention; and with all deference to our political opponents of the what they call, Reform Press, who on all occasions pretend to vindicate the claims of the lower against the upper classes, we declare ourselves to be perfectly neutral, or if we have any bias at all, it leans towards the less protected and poorer part of the community.

These remarks have been prompted by the sentiments of our yesterday's correspondent, and though the subject is profane of exemplification in a domestic point of view, yet we confine ourselves to the single point we are referred to particularly by our correspondent, which generally closes the contract between Master and Servant, so far as character is concerned.

We are unable at the moment to reply to or answer satisfactorily of the queries of our correspondent, but perhaps some of our intelligent readers may be able to gratify him. Our columns are always open to this or any other matter of public concernment.—Ed. M. C.
