BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DATE OF BUDGET—CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): In response to questions on various occasions from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and other hon. members, I am now in a position to state that I expect to be able to bring down the budget on Thursday next, February 25.

It is the hope and expectation of the government that the new trade agreement with Great Britain will be signed before that time, and if it is, the trade agreement will form part of the budget.

SUPPLY—NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning that the house go into committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. MacNeil.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, continuing my remarks of last evening, let me declare that I personally long for peace. The social credit movement is a movement designed to obtain peace. Many ardent social crediters are so strongly imbued with the doctrines of peace that they feel that my stand in support of defence is contrary to the ideals of social credit. It is largely because I see in social credit the means of so reorganizing the economic systems of men that peace can become a permanent reality on the earth that I have espoused so fervently the cause of social credit. We are earnestly striving toward a great and glorious ideal; but we must not forget, while looking to the future, that the present has its urgent needs. One of our most urgent needs for the immediate present is more adequate means of defence.

I deplore the misdeeds of the past that have forced us into this situation. In so far as the present government is neglecting its duty in the matter of economic and social reform, I cannot and will not condone its errors. But now that we are in this exigency we must, I feel, comport ourselves wisely.

I appeal to the present government with all the earnestness of which I am capable that they set about reforming the present system. The disgraceful suffering, as inexcusable as it is distressing, which obtains throughout this land should not be allowed to continue. If one year from now I do not see distinct evidence of redress, and if at that time the present government is not showing signs of adopting policies more modern than the outgrown and discredited devices which thus far they appear to have depended upon, then I must say they will have made it extremely difficult, if not intolerable, for me to continue to support them. I believe they want to do the right thing, but they are trying to do the right thing in the wrong way.

For this year, however, because I consider it to be in the interests of Canada to have greater defence, and because I feel it my duty as a member of the parliament of Canada to help the government in its efforts toward defence, I intend to support the government and to oppose the amendment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last in order that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) might present to the house the defence estimates for the coming year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) moved that the house go into committee of supply. That motion was met by an amendment moved by the member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). Although hon. members are already familiar with the terms of the amendment, its true significance should once more be pointed out. The amendment of the hon. member is in the following words:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for the purpose of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people."

In the form in which it has been moved, the amendment expresses want of confidence in the government. From an examination of its wording, it would appear that hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had had some difficulty among themselves in agreeing upon something they would all be able to support, something which would appear to condemn the expenditures on defence but which at a later time, should the occasion render it advisable, would enable them to shelter themselves under the statement that they had not in fact opposed the defence estimates as such.

Let me again draw attention to the wording of the amendment:

> This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

Note the words "views with grave concern" the increase in the estimates. Mr. Speaker, we all view with grave concern increases in expenditures for purposes of defence, but that is only a reflection of the concern which world conditions have created in the minds of people in all countries throughout the world. It is not singular that this house should feel concerned at the necessity at this time of adding more by way of defence. When one realizes what the conditions in Europe have been during the last four or five years; when one views the present situation in Spain; when one sees the nations of Europe doing their utmost to prevent what is now a terrible civil war becoming part of a great international conflict, there is reason for concern. But that concern is something which all of us feel quite as much as the hon. members who have moved and seconded the amendment.

Note, however, that the concern the amendment expresses is not with the increase in the estimates. I desire particularly to draw the attention of hon. members to that fact. There is nothing in the amendment which says that hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation oppose the estimates to be presented to the house. The concern is over the contrast between the amount to be voted for defence and that to be voted, as they say, for purposes of social security.

May I make one observation in regard to social security. I should be inclined to believe that the security of one's country would rank as the first among all social securities. If through invasion, or aggression in some other form, anything should happen to Canada, I am afraid that what else we may have in the way of social security would, at least for the time being, go pretty well by the board. It is an entirely erroneous conception of the meaning of words to say that social security should be confined only to certain social services some hon. members may have in mind and which could not be carried on at all unless there were social security for the country as a whole.

Let me now speak more specifically about the contrast. I wonder if hon. members responsible for the amendment have ever made a comparison between what is spent in other countries for purposes of social security and for defence and the corresponding sets of expenditures in Canada. If they have, they will have found that in comparison with what Canada is spending for social security, she is spending relatively much less for purposes of defence than is the case with any other country of importance in the world.

Hon. members are most unfair when they draw comparisons between expenditures voted for purposes of defence by this house, and the amount that is being voted for social services by this house. I say "by this house" because of the money of the taxpayers of this country they are taking account only of what is being voted by this house. But hon. members know very well that while there are certain obligations which rest upon the federal treasury, there are also some which rest upon the provinces and upon the municipalities. They have carefully avoided making any mention of what comes out of the taxes of the people of Canada for social services in the provinces and in the municipalities. They touch as respects social services, only upon what comes out of the people's pockets through amounts voted by this chamber.

They have not been fair in a further particular. While ignoring altogether amounts paid out on social services by provinces and municipalities in addition to expenditures from the federal treasury, they have not pointed out that the burden of defence for the whole of Canada must be borne by the federal treasury alone. That portion of the public expenditure is not divided between the provinces, the municipalities and the dominion; it is an exclusive charge upon the Dominion of Canada. That is a very important fact to be kept in mind, because it was one of the considerations in the minds of those who framed the constitution of our country when they assigned certain social services to the provinces and to the municipalities, largely freeing the dominion from payments on that account, but charging the dominion exclusively with the obligation of expenditures for the purpose of defence.

May I point out that the amounts being asked for to meet the defence needs of Canada are not merely for the protection of our shores and harbours; they are for the protection of all of Canada, of all the provinces and of all the municipalities. With respect to what may happen in a time of actual or apprehended danger of war, this federal government is expected to have responsibility for the defence of the entire dominion. The provinces are not being looked to to make any special expenditure to protect their harbours, their bridges or their highways; that is all part of the federal obligation in time of war, in time of possible invasion or emergency. There is no specified obligation upon the municipalities with regard to protecting their water mains, their sewers, their gas mains and the like; all this obligation so far as it arises out of a condition of war falls upon the federal treasury. With warfare what it is likely to be in the future, with possible air and submarine raids and all else that is to be feared, the protection of our great municipalities against the dropping of bombs or the sowing of mines which might disrupt the whole life of a municipality, becomes one of the most serious obligations under the heading of present day defence.

The amendment in other particulars is unfair. Is it a fact that relatively little is being spent by the federal government for purposes of social security? I have had prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Finance a comparison of the estimates of expenditures for social services and national defence during the last five years. During that period much was expended for social services, to the neglect of what should have been expended for the purpose of keeping the defences of our country up to the standard to which they should have been kept. We get a much better view of the entire picture by taking a period of five years than by confining the comparison to any one. I shall, however give as well the average yearly expenditures

The estimate of expenditures by the dominion government on social services for the five year period, 1932-33 to 1936-37, totals $681,000,000. The average yearly expenditure amounts to $136,200,000. The estimate of expenditures by all provincial governments on public welfare and education for the five year period 1932 to 1936 amounts to $506,000,000 with the yearly average amounting to $101,200,000. The estimate of expenditures by municipalities on public welfare and by school boards for the five year period 1931 to 1935 totals $612,000,000, with a yearly average of $122,400,000. The total expenditure for five years on social services by the three governing entities mentioned amounted to $1,799,000,000 or a yearly average of $359,800,000. Let us now consider the total expenditures by Canada for national defence purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we to assume that these figures include expenditures in the dried-out areas for relief and so on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my hon. friend the details if he wishes them. The total expenditure by Canada for defence services during the five year period, the fiscal years 1932-33 to 1936-37, amounted to $76,000,000, or a yearly average of $15,200,000. In other words the total expenditures in Canada for social security purposes amounted to $1,799,000,000 odd as against $76,000,000 odd for defence purposes during the past five year period, or a yearly average of $359,000,000 odd as against $15,000,000 odd. I submit that that is the only fair comparison to make when one is estimating what is being spent on social services in comparison with defence. All of these amounts came out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers.

May I point out that the provinces would not have been able to carry on their social services but for the grants and subsidies which have been paid to them out of the federal treasury and the money lent to them by the federal government. That is what enabled the municipalities to carry on their social services. I wish also to repeat that while the federal treasury has been drawn upon for loans and grants and subsidies to the provinces to enable them to carry on their social services and for much in addition in the way of special contributions for relief, the dominion has not been able to look to the provinces or to the municipalities for any contribution to help it in its work of defence.

The figures in tabular form are as follows:

Comparison of Estimates of Expenditures for "Social Services" and National Defence
(Prepared by Dominion Bureau of Statistics and Department of Finance)

	Total for five years	Average for one year
Estimate of expenditure by Dominion government on social services for five-year period, fiscal years 1932-33 to 1936-37..	$681,000,000	$136,200,000
Estimate of expenditure by all provincial governments on public welfare and education for five-year period 1932-36..	506,000,000	101,200,000
Estimate of expenditure by municipalities on public welfare and by school boards for five-year period 1931-35..	612,000,000	122,400,000
Total..	$1,799,000,000	$359,800,000
Total expenditure of Canada for National Defence services for five-year period fiscal years 1932-33 to 1936-37..	$76,000,000	$15,200,000

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) seemed to be anxious to have details. I shall give him some. The expenditures by the dominion government during the last five years on account of unemployment relief, which is a social service—I want hon. members to keep in mind that during the same period the dominion spent only $76,000,000 on defence—amounted to $254,871,231. For special public works and undertakings for the relief of unemployment, the dominion government expended $38,253,127. For old age pensions the total expenditure during the five years period amounted to $78,033,081. During the last five years more money was spent out of the federal treasury to provide old age pensions than was spent for the purposes of the defence of Canada. A total of $620,251 was spent on technical education while $750,000 was spent in the administration of the Employment Offices Coordination Act. A total of $2,381,922 was spent in the administration of the Annuities Act, the Conciliation and Labour Act, the Fair Wages and Inspection Act, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and the Limitation of Hours of Work Act. On national health we spent $3,752,895 and a total of $468,950 was paid out by way of grants to private institutions for social purposes. In the administration of the Employment and Social Insurance Act a total of $93,862 was expended. In the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act a total of $1,532,266 was expended. A total of $22,691 has been expended in connection with the Dominion Housing Act. In connection with the social services I have enumerated there has been a total expenditure of $380,780,276 during the last five years.

In addition to these outlays which will be quickly recognized as for social services there have been other outlays assumed by this government which were also in the nature of social service contributions. I might begin by directing attention to the fact that after the great war the dominion assumed the whole obligation of expenditures arising out of the war with respect to the treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, the total of the European war pensions and other like outlays. The question was never raised as to whether or not the provinces should carry a part of that load. The load was assumed at once and in its entirety by the federal government notwithstanding that theretofore the provinces had been regarded as the appropriate authorities to assume responsibility on account of social services. Here are some of the additional figures: Treatment and after-care of returned soldiers, $51,450,929.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the Prime Minister putting that in with social services?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am putting it in as an additional outlay on account of social services. If the after-care of a returned soldier is not a social service, I would like to know what is.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that the after-care of a returned soldier is a social service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I most certainly say so, and I not only say that, but I say it is one of the very first of the social services that ought to be performed. It is a social service which has been undertaken by this federal government. The provinces or the municipalities have not had a corresponding obligation.

Miss MACPHAIL: Would the Prime Minister not call it a war obligation rather than a social service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A war obligation? Most of our social services to-day have arisen out of war obligations.

Miss MACPHAIL: Thank you. That is very good.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the fact that our social services have become so vastly increased on account of war is an added reason why this parliament, which is responsible for defence, should do its utmost to prevent another war arising with the additional social service obligation certain to grow out of it. The fact that we know what war costs a nation in life and limb, and health, is the strongest of reasons why a nation should do everything it can to prevent anything of the kind occurring again. That is the whole purpose of our defence estimates, to assist in preventing aggression on the part of other nations.

Here is the next item: European war pensions, $210,105,583. I say that every dollar that has been spent out of the federal treasury as a war pension is money which has gone to serve the needs of those whose needs have arisen out of the services which they have rendered to the state.

Then there are these items: The writing down of soldier and general land settlement loans, $3,223,413; payments re 1930 wheat crop, $22,456,645; payments re loss on 1930 oats pool under guarantee, $174,383; wheat bonus, 1931-32 and 1932-33, $12,719,900; or a sum in addition to the total I gave a moment ago of $300,130,853.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the Prime Minister include interest on war debts?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I have not included interest on war debts but I think it ought to be included. That is another obligation which falls on this federal treasury which does not fall on the provinces, which does not fall on the municipalities, but which nevertheless makes it more difficult for the federal treasury to meet what it otherwise might be in a position to meet on many services. The justice of the situation demands that we view what are the obligations which this government has to meet. There is no escaping any of these obligations. Before we can begin to vote a dollar for other purposes, obligations of the character I have just mentioned, European war pensions and the like, have to be met.

The figures I have given make a total of expenditures by the dominion government during the last five years on account of social services amounting to $680,911,129. In addition to that, this dominion has made loans for relief purposes to the provinces, and the net amount outstanding on February 1 of this year was $102,150,000. Those loans have all helped the provinces to meet obligations in the nature of social services of one kind or another. I place on Hansard in tabular form the figures I have just given:

Estimate of Expenditures by Dominion Government during the last five fiscal years on account of Social Services

(Fiscal years 1932-33 to 1936-37)

Unemployment relief	$254,871,231
Special public works and undertakings for relief of unemployment	38,253,127
Old age pensions	78,033,081
Technical education	620,251
Employment offices, Co-ordination Act	750,000
Labour, including administration of: annuities, conciliation and labour, fair wages and inspection, industrial disputes investigation, employment offices, limitation of hours of work, etc., acts	2,381,922
National Health	3,752,895
Grants to various private institutions for social purposes	468,950
Employment and Social Insurance Act	93,862
Farmers Creditors' Arrangement Act (administrative costs)	1,532,266
Dominion Housing Act	22,691
	$380,780,276
Outlays re additional social services:
Treatment and after-care returned soldiers	$ 51,450,929
European war pensions	210,105,583
Write-down of soldiers and general land settlement loans	3,223,413
Payments re 1930 wheat crop	22,456,645
Payments re loss on 1930 Oats Pool under guarantee	174,383
Wheat bonus, 1931-32 and 1932-33	12,719,900
	$300,130,853
Total	$680,911,129
Loans to provinces for relief purposes, net amount outstanding February 1, 1937	$102,150,000

Let me now give some of the social services that the provinces have been carrying on, and carrying on in part out of loans and grants which have been made to them from the federal treasury. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimate of expenditure by all provincial governments for public welfare and education for the five-year period 1932-1936 is as follows:

Estimate of Expenditure by all Provincial Governments

(The Statistics for 1935 and 1936 are estimated)

	Total for Five Years, 1932-1936
Public Health.. .. .. Including boards of health, clinics, laboratories, grants to health associations, research and disease control.	$ 11,866,067
Public Institutions.. .. .. Including mental institutions, tuberculosis control, children's homes, homes for aged, incurables and rescue homes, reformatories, industrial farms, grants to blind institutions.	83,753,112
General Hospitals.. .. .. Government controlled (exclusive of mental hospitals).	1,385,007
General Hospitals.. .. .. (Exclusive of mental) Grants and assistance to.	23,606,773
Child Welfare and Maternal Assistance..	6,277,069
Old Age Pensions.. .. .. (Less dominion government and municipal contributions).	19,884,503
Mothers' and Deserted Wives' Allowances.. .. .. (Including municipal contributions).	20,769,300
Charities, Miscellaneous..	2,362,860
Labour.. .. .. Including employment bureaux, workmen's compensation, inspection of factories, boilers, public buildings, hotels and boarding houses, other labour regulations.	4,970,445
Interest, sinking fund and collection charges on public charities funds (Quebec only)..	9,161,252
Unemployment Relief.. .. .. (Less dominion government and municipal contributions and deductions from government employees' salaries).	173,743,777
Total Public Welfare . ..	$357,780,165

If I were to add education, which is a social service, the additional amount would be:

Education—Including grants to primary, secondary and technical schools, universities, colleges, normal and training schools, inspection, examinations, free school texts, libraries, deaf and dumb education, and other miscellaneous..	$148,564,113

Or a grand total for public welfare and education for the provinces of $506,344,278.

Let me now give some figures relating to the municipalities. Naturally they are only a partial amount, but are such figures as the bureau of statistics has been able to secure. I would ask the house to allow these tables to appear in Hansard in tabular form so that they may be more readily understood:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimate of expenditure of municipalities throughout Canada on public welfare for the five-year period 1931-1935, also expenditure by school boards five years 1931-1935:

	[1]Five Years 1931-1935
Health—Including sanitation and hygiene..	$ 36,631,467
Charities and recreations—Including grants and aids to benevolent institutions, hospitals, poor relief and social service..	118,235,836
Total welfare..	$154,867,303
School board current expenditure	[2]457,726,057
Total welfare and schools..	$612,593,360

[1]Health and charities arrived at by taking the total expenditure for years 1931, 1932 and 1933, and an average of these three years for 1934 and 1935.

[2]School expenditure arrived at by taking the total expenditure for years 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, and an average of these four years for 1935.

I have given these figures to the house, Mr. Speaker, because in estimating what we are spending in Canada for defence, and comparing that expenditure with what is being spent in Canada for social services, it is necessary to take in all that has been spent on each account; and the social service account includes, as I have indicated, moneys paid out by the provinces, moneys paid out by the municipalities, and moneys paid out by this federal government.

Anyone who wishes to be just and fair to the taxpayers of the country, to the country itself and to municipal administrations, the governments of the provinces, and the federal government ought to quote every one of the figures which I have quoted here to-day.

In the light of that comparison it would seem there was little to concern ourselves about as respects the inadequacy of amounts for social services in contrast with outlays for defence. Yet this is what the amendment asks the house to declare:

> This house views with grave concern the startling increases of expenditure proposed by the government for purposes of national armament in contrast with the inadequate provision for the social security of all sections of the Canadian people.

It is clear from its wording that the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver North, necessitates taking into account the social security of all sections of the Canadian people, which means of course what is being looked after by the provinces and the municipalities as well as by the dominion. In the light of the figures which have been given here to-day, there is not a member of the group responsible for this amendment who ought to think for one moment of supporting it; they all ought to ask to have it withdrawn.

Comparisons or contrasts of the kind are however beside the question. Either money is needed for purposes of defence or it is not. What we propose to spend on defence is not to be justified by comparison with anything else, it is to be justified with respect to the needs of defence alone. It could be justified in all these other ways if one wished to do so, but my point is that any criticism of the government in respect to the defence estimates must be made on the score of what we are spending for defence in the light of the world situation as we know it and of Canada's position as we know it in reference to dangers that may arise. I should like to ask hon. members of the group opposite if any one of them to-day will rise in his seat and say that in the light of the world situation, as he understands it, he thinks we are spending too much for defence in Canada at this time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the position we take. I do not need to reiterate it. I think it is simple nonsense to be spending as much as we are.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if that is the position my hon. friend takes, he has not had the courage to put it in his amendment. That is just the criticism I make of the amendment. I know very well what is going to happen as time slips along. Let the dangers increase to some extent, and what will hon. members say who support this amendment? "Oh, we never opposed the amount of money that the government was proposing to spend for defence."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You will see, when we come to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "All we did was to say that the contrast between what was being spent for defence and what was being spent for social services was a matter of concern."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are concerned about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me now come to what we are proposing to spend for purposes of defence, and why the amount is what it is. And just here may I say that governments are necessarily controlled, in the matters which they submit to parliament, by the actual conditions with which their countries may be faced at any particular time. When a government brings in its estimates it does not bring in just what it pleases or what pleases it most. It has regard to conditions as they exist, and must consider what is necessary, and what it believes the people of the country believe to be necessary properly to meet those conditions. If there were no dangers in the world at the present time, if there were no threat of international war, if there were no impending calamity on a scale such as everyone, who is reflecting on the world situation, realizes that there is, certainly it would be an extraordinary thing for the government to bring in increases in defence estimates. But when countries are facing an altogether new situation, a government which has responsibility for defence must assume that responsibility in the light of existing conditions.

To understand why the defence estimates contain the increases they do, it is necessary to take account not merely of what has happened within the last year or two, but to view the world situation as it has developed in the years since the war. Quickly reviewing conditions, as they are known to all, we can see the reason why, for a considerable period of time, defence estimates were kept at a very low figure, and also why, at the present time, estimates have had to be increased not only by Canada but by countries all over the world that are seeking to maintain their liberties and freedom and free institutions.

After the war, when the treaty of Versailles had been negotiated and signed, and there was brought into being the League of Nations, the world was war weary. There was not a nation which had not had enough of war —as sentiment was reflected in the minds of most of its people—for all time. The world looked for some other means of settling differences which might arise and saw in the League of Nations an institution that seemed to give promise of relieving nations from the necessity of competitive arming in the future. Here, they thought, was an institution that, by bringing into its membership all the nations of the world, would be in a position through the collective security it would ensure to avoid the necessity of any one nation arming against another. The vision was so compelling that it seemed to create the very conditions that were needed for its fulfilment. People did not stop to ask themselves very seriously whether this means of security upon which they were relying, which the league was to bring into being, would actually meet the situation; they were satisfied to accept it. The peoples of the different countries were ready to abandon old methods of settling disputes and to adopt the new and better ones symbolized in the league. It was a popular gospel to preach, this gospel of the league of nations and all that it stood for, and political parties rivalled each other in their support of the league. Up to a certain point they had very good reason for the ground they took. But as years went by new situations developed. I suppose that the League of Nations as the instrument of collective security was at the zenith of its influence around the year 1926, when, in addition to all that the league represented, the world witnessed the United States join with France in bringing into being the Kellogg-Briand pact, or the Pact of Paris, as it is better known, under the provisions of which the nations that were parties to that instrument agreed from that time on to renounce war as an instrument of national policy. I remember very well the scene in Paris at the time that the pact was signed, because I had the honour of signing it on behalf of Canada. It was a beautiful day, above the foreign office in Paris were flying the flags of the nations of the world. In front of the building were hundreds if not thousands of men, women and children for the most part still dressed in black, rejoicing in this new promise of salvation from aggression, but still having very vividly in their minds the ravages of the war not so many years before. Great were the expectations in those years of the new instruments framed for the purpose of maintaining peace.

Well, how have the hopes once entertained of the League of Nations been realized? The League of Nations first of all was based on the idea of universality of membership. It was brought into being by the United States, one of the greatest powers in the world, and a power, considered largely disinterested. Other countries felt that, with the United States one of the members, collective security among the league members was going to be great indeed. Unfortunately, the United States subsequently did not see its way to becoming a member of the institution which owed its origin to the inspiration of that country. That was the first great disappointment. That was the first great gap in universal membership. As time went on, nations began to withdraw from the league. Japan, one of the great powers, withdrew, and shortly afterwards Germany, another great power, did the same. Brazil withdrew from the league. At the last meeting of the assembly, Italy was not represented. Thus, at the last assembly of the great powers that were in the war, Japan, Germany and Italy were not at the league.

Now, that is a very different kind of league from anything which was thought of, or talked about, during the years in which so much emphasis was put upon the security which all nations were going to derive from the League of Nations. I shall a little later on have something to say about the position of the league and what is involved in membership at the present time. It is I think an open question whether, instead of being a security, it may not in the present situation be something of a liability to be under the obligations which the covenant of the league imposes on its members with its membership restricted in the manner in which it is. That is a factor which must be taken into account at the present time.

There was another disappointment. The war ended, new democracies it was believed would come into being, and the league was to further that end. Instead of democracies the world has seen growing up in Russia, in Germany and in Italy as well as in other European countries dictatorships of the most powerful character. Instead of the people controlling their institutions and parliaments we have seen in the last few years parliaments swept out of existence. The league's whole strength lay in the fact that it was the people who were going to have the say; the people were going to have the say in Germany, in Italy and elsewhere. Well, we have seen the suppression of parliaments in some of these countries.

Then there was disarmament. That was another of the disappointments. Disarmament was foremost among the objectives of the league. It cannot be said that many nations did not strive to effect that great end. It has, however, thus far failed of accomplishment, and competitive arming is taking its place.

The league was going to bring about a condition wherein peace would be maintained by the furtherance of conciliation and arbitration and by treaties. There were to be all kinds of agreements between the different countries, that belonged to the league. Peace was to be secured by contract, process of law, judicial settlement, a world order based upon contractual relationship; and a world that liked to believe in the sanctity of contracts saw in this extension of treaty obligations another great hope for the maintenance of peace. What is the position to-day with regard to treaties and contracts between nations? We have seen how far the treaty of Versailles has been respected. We have seen how Locarno has been violated. We have but to look at the pronouncements made from day to day by certain nations to discover that they put no faith at all in contracts and will not if it suits their purpose regard themselves as bound by any agreement or obligation. Some nations avowedly are placing their confidence in might not in right; in force not in reason. That is a very different situation from that with which the world was faced a little while ago. These circumstances have changed the whole position of security so far as the nations of the world are concerned.

The league was in existence at the time of aggression against a league member in Manchuria, and the league was found to be a helpless institution in preventing that aggression. The league was in existence at the time of the Chaco war in South America, and the league did not intervene there though nations which were members of the league were involved. More persons were killed in that war than in the Ethiopian war. The league has been seen to be essentially a European institution. The league was in existence when Italy invaded Ethiopia and an effort was made by the application of sanctions to enforce what the league had felt would be the most effective means of ending aggression and maintaining peace. But what was discovered at that time? It was discovered that economic sanctions if they were to be effective at all would lead inevitably to military sanctions, and that military sanctions meant war. That is a very different condition from what most people had thought was likely to be the case when they were advocating membership in the League of Nations.

The result of all this has been that the attitude of nations generally has changed very materially towards the league viewed as an instrument for maintaining peace. Collective security under some of the league's provisions is none other than a reliance upon force. I am not saying that the League of Nations cannot fulfil a useful purpose and that it is not absolutely necessary; I believe it is. But the league in some of its provisions is based too much on a war mentality. The league, as its covenant is drafted, puts far too much reliance upon what force may be expected to accomplish. At any rate that is so to my way of thinking. There may be others who hold a different view. I believe that the league as an instrument to further peace by peaceful means, by constructive peace policies, by reliance upon conciliation, investigation and the power of public opinion by the formulation of world opinion and methods of that kind can be of very great service to mankind and can be made a universal league and a league which will be effective in bringing injustices to light and having them ultimately remedied. But a league which in the light of the developments of the last few years continues to place its reliance on force is going to be a very different institution from that which most of us have conceived the League of Nations to be. And those who are going to put their faith in a league which relies upon force as its means of effecting collective security will have to consider anew what force they are going to be prepared to contribute from the country to which they themselves belong. The change in the position of the league, and in the possibility of its being able to serve the ends it was intended to serve, is another factor which has greatly affected world conditions.

But there is something else which has had a far-reaching effect and it is this. The old struggles, which were in the minds of people in the days when the league was formed, were struggles between nations; the league was formed to prevent one nation flying at the throat of another. But what is the nature of the struggle that is going on in Europe at the present time? What we see is a new kind of struggle, a conflict spreading throughout the world, a class struggle which sweeps right across the frontiers of nations without regard to boundaries—a class struggle on a scale scarcely contemplated by the mind of man. We see violent conflicts of classes and social systems, forms of social and political organization; the peoples beginning to fight among themselves—fighting for their social philosophies with a zeal akin to that of the days of the old religious wars. In other words, it is no longer a matter of nation protecting itself against nation; it has come to be a question of conflicting ideologies, to use an expression that covers the ground better than any other, and as to which of the contending forces is to prevail. All this has been accompanied by new and increasingly terrible weapons and methods of warfare, the wider range of aircraft and submarine and the use of deadly bombs and poisonous germs.

On different occasions I have quoted a passage which I should like to quote again because of its evident application to the present world situation. It is a quotation from one who was not a jingo, but a great scientist, a great humanitarian, one of the benefactors of mankind, one who knew a great deal more about human beings and human nature than most men of his own or any other day—the great scientist Louis Pasteur. In 1888 when Pasteur was being honoured by his country in the opening of the great institute which bears his name he was so overcome by the reception accorded him by the statesmen and scholars of France that he was unable to read from the manuscript he had prepared. He handed it to his son who read from its pages the following memorable words:

Two contrary laws seem to be wrestling with each other nowadays; the one, a law of blood and of death, ever imagining new means of destruction, and forcing nations to be constantly ready for the battlefield, the other, a law of peace, work and health, ever evolving new means for delivering man from the scourges which beset him. The one seeks violent conquests, the other the relief of humanity. The latter places one human life above any victory; while the former would sacrifice hundreds of thousands of lives to the ambition of one. Which of these two laws shall ultimately prevail God alone knows.

Now that is a statement of actual truth never more clearly demonstrated than in our own day. It is a truth we witnessed at the time of the great war, that we are witnessing again to a degree that no one hitherto could have dreamed of. We see in the world forces that are working for destruction and for death. We see forces that are working for peace, health and work. What I want to say to my hon. friends who seem to claim a monopoly of belonging to those forces that are working for peace, health and work is this, that you cannot go on with that work unless you protect yourself from the other forces. That is something to be kept in mind. When some of us to protect ourselves and our country against the forces of blood and of death ask parliament to vote money for purposes of defence, that we may continue to further the law of peace and work and health we are told that we are preparing for and promoting war. We are doing nothing of the kind. We are trying to make the national position secure to enable the law of peace, work and health to prevail and progress. This we believe is only possible as we keep at bay those forces that are making for death and destruction. No one can deny that there is coming over the face of Europe, if not of other parts of the world as well, something in the nature of an alignment of forces which are wrestling with each other, forces which do not confine themselves to any one country and which are operating in ways that are exceedingly dangerous. All that is changing the situation from what it was a few years ago with respect to the need of defence in different countries.

But more than that. We have at the present time and have had since July of last year a great civil war waging in Spain, one of the great countries of Europe. We have seen how difficult it is for other nations to keep their own nationals out of that war. That is something to be considered and to be reckoned with. The fact that in these many months we have seen coming from all parts of Europe men who are prepared to throw their lives into that ghastly furnace, fighting on one side or the other makes pretty clear what we may expect if war ever gets beyond the boundaries of that country to a greater extent than it has at the present time. It has required all the ingenuity and skill that the statesmen of Britain and other countries in Europe could command to confine that conflict within the boundaries of that single unfortunate country. Who will say that those of us who are sitting here may not before the end of this present parliament witness some terrible expansion of that conflict, unless it is totally ended within that period of time. If the conflict spreads, if a conflict of that character becomes international, is it likely that any part of the world is going to escape its terrors? Facing such a possibility, not to speak of others scarcely less evident, can a government which has the responsibility of looking after the defence of its own country, ignore altogether what is necessary for the protection of its coasts, its harbours, its great cities, its people wherever they are, in contingencies that may arise.

These are things which the present administration have had to consider. The situation would be appalling and hopeless if there were not other factors which help greatly to relieve it. It would not be fair to leave the house or the country with the impression that the existing situation menacing as it may be is one that cannot be met. It is a condition that has been continuous more or less for the past five or six years. Europe has been in a very unsettled state. But some way or another, by the working together of men of good will, the nations have been able to maintain peace to a very considerable extent, and we hope and pray that they may be able to continue so to do. And there are many reasons to believe that perhaps they will. I do not suppose that Germany wants to go to war, I do not suppose she is ready to go to war at the present time. I imagine Italy has had enough of war for a while. I imagine Russia knows what it would mean to have to carry on a war in any country other than her own. So far as Japan is concerned there is evidence that the power of the people there who desire peace is very strong. We know whatever the ambitions of their rulers may be that throughout the world the peoples as a whole are anxious to preserve peace. On the whole there has been some improvement, a less tense strain in the international situation, a balancing of forces, a growing recognition on the part of every government of the uncertainties of success and the penalties of failure, a growing readiness too to seek to remove the causes of conflict, the sources of friction and to realize that in the end war settles nothing even for the victor. But one thing is certain, and that is that this competitive arming cannot continue indefinitely without some terrible crash coming. If what hon. members of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group say is true, that competitive arming means war, then war on a colossal scale is inevitable, and it is surely time that we begin to see that our country should be in a position to protect itself against possible contingencies arising out of such a situation.

Do they say, holding the convictions they do, that we should sit by and do nothing to defend our shores, our harbours, our shipping terminals, our great centres against contingencies of a kind that may arise?

Let me read what one gentleman who is not an alarmist and who has had a very strong faith in the League of Nations feels about the world situation to-day. I quote from Mr. John W. Dafoe, president and editor of the Winnipeg Free Press. I imagine Mr. Dafoe has been as strong a supporter of the league as any man in Canada and that he is as little given to exaggeration as any student of international affairs. Speaking in Toronto only a few days ago Mr. Dafoe said:

> It is not possible to be optimistic. If the piling up of armaments, the regimentation of people and the constant interchange of threats between nations must continue, war is inevitable, given time, and perhaps it will come sooner rather than later. Why is the world in its present condition? Because we have reverted to the pre-war conception of relationships between nations. The post-war idea of the keeping of peace being an obligation upon all nations has been submerged. It may return of course but for the time being that great idea has vanished from the world and we are back to a conception that excludes all considerations of morality in international relationships.

There is one Canadian speaking out of his knowledge of conditions and careful study over many years. Let me read—and it is the only other quotation I shall give in this connection—what another public man of great experience in world affairs has been saying about the situation as he sees it. Mr. Lloyd George gave an interview before he left the West Indies in which he stated his view of the present situation and where it was likely to lead. This was on February 5:

> The world is going mad. At the present moment we are spending $1,500,000,000 on armaments. Ten years ago the entire world spent $3,500,000,000 for armaments, now it is spending $12,500,000,000. They have almost quadrupled it in the past ten years and it is still going up. You must have followed what is happening in Europe to-day, nations are arming again. Within ten years the world armaments have trebled and are on the way to be quadrupled all within ten years. It is going on at an accelerating pace, Europe is thoroughly scared, they are frightened of war, all the prayers for peace which you hear everywhere are drowned by the ring of the anvil, countless anvils hammering out the most terrible machinery of war that has ever been invented.

I give these quotations not to alarm the country but to bring home to hon. members some appreciation of the obligation that rests on the government of this country at this time. I ask any hon. member of this house, no matter from what part of the country he comes, if you were in the position of responsibility that I am in to-day, would you do nothing? Would you stand here and tell your fellow countrymen that in the light of statements such as these and in the light of the situation as we all know it, there was no need to do anything in preparation for what may take place later on, I ask this, particularly after having heard the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) as to the present position of Canada's defences. I must say that I regret very much that the Minister of National Defence found it necessary to tell the house the condition in which the defence forces of this country find themselves at the present time. It does not strengthen our country to have the weak spots in its armour known all over the world. But apparently something of the kind was necessary to persuade hon. members generally that there was need for replacement of obsolete armaments and equipment, that there was need for making good necessary stores and inadequate supplies, that there was need for something being done to cope with new methods of warfare from the air as well as on land and sea.

Let me answer one question at once. We are asked: What good is the little you are doing, in the teeth of a threatening world situation such as you have described? Why waste the money? If we were without friends, if we were not part of a world seeking to preserve its liberties, I would say it would be quite useless to do anything. But fortunately there are many countries that still love liberty; fortunately there are still many democracies in the world, and I believe we can rely upon many other countries doing their part, if we are prepared to do ours, in meeting the dangers of any situation which may affect this part of the world.

May I point out that undoubtedly Canada is the most secure of all countries. Fortunately, geographically we are better situated than most countries. Fortunately, by nature perhaps we are richer in resources than any other country of comparable size. Fortunately, we have no neighbours to the north, and to the south of us we have the best of neighbours. Fortunately we are separated by vast oceans from Europe and Asia. Fortunately, there are no countries which could be described as our enemies, or which can be said to be arming directly against us. All of these circumstances are fortunate indeed. Then, fortunately, above all else, we are a part of a great commonwealth of nations which has stood for freedom, and which is in a position to defend its freedom. It is because we are so fortunate that we are able to keep our defence expenditures down to a very small point. That is what I want hon. members to realize.

Miss MACPHAIL: We do realize it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member may, but I am afraid many about her do not, because we have been told that even these comparatively small expenditures are unnecessary. I want to bring home to the house the fact that the government would not be justified in asking parliament for such a small amount by way of increase, were it not for all the other factors which time in and time out have been mentioned here as reasons why we should do nothing.

By all means, let us make the most of our friendship with the United States. By all means, let us make the most of our friendship and kinship with Great Britain and with every other part of the British empire. By all means let us continue to be friends with every other nation, because in that direction, more perhaps than in any other, security lies. But let us realize that unless we do something to help ourselves these countries cannot be expected to help at a time of world crisis, or great peril. It is not contended that that danger is great for us. There is a danger but so far as Canada is concerned, it is, as I have already pointed out, an incidental contingency. Relatively our danger is small. Another great war, however, might lead to exposure to dangers, which might be great indeed.

I was explaining why the increases have to be made at this particular time. They are necessary because of the changed conditions I have described and the consequent dangers which beset all countries. But there are more immediate reasons, and they are these: During the last few years we have not been spending on defence the amount which normally we ought to have been spending. We have neglected our defence forces. I am not going to criticize my predecessors in office because of the extent to which economies were effected in the Department of National Defence. I am prepared to write those economies down to the depression. The fact is, through years of depression, while there were large expenditures in some directions there were economies in others. It was perhaps natural that the Department of National Defence should have been considered a department in which economies could be effected. Let us not forget, however, that the depression has operated in two ways: It occasioned economies in defence so far as Canada was concerned, but it operated in other ways to make nations excessively restless. The depression has been responsible for much of the feeling which to-day is asserting itself in violence of one form or another. The fact that we tried to meet the depression as we did has only added to our immediate necessities as respects defence.

When the present government assumed office we naturally at once made a survey of all departments of government. The Minister of National Defence reported to his colleagues the condition as he found it in the department of defence. As he said the other day, discovering the condition he did as respects the lack of defence equipment and supplies, he would have been guilty of treason had he not in an emphatic manner reported upon it to his colleagues and in particular to myself as Prime Minister. Had the Minister of National Defence been able to carry out his wishes and what he believed to be his duty, most of the present estimates would have been submitted last year instead of this year, because even at that time the world was facing a critical situation and the need for precautions was apparent. But there was a special reason why it seemed unwise to present increased estimates for national defence at that time. I think hon. members can surmise the reason.

When we assumed office the Italo-Ethiopian war was already in progress and we found the League of Nations had already asked that economic sanctions against Italy be imposed by its several members. Almost the first obligation which fell upon the new administration was that of imposing economic sanctions against Italy because of Canada's membership in the league. Then we were faced with the report that Canada was urging that oil sanctions should be added to the others. Those of us who had responsibility realized what the consequence of the imposition of oil sanctions might have been. We were questioned about it at the time, but since then more than one public man with knowledge of the situation has made it pretty clear that, had oil sanctions been imposed at the time by the league, the world might have seen the whole of Europe in flames last year. With the European situation as it stood at the time, as a government we felt it would be unwise to arouse discussion in this house on matters of defence, especially when there was the possibility that our action would have been entirely misunderstood by other countries as well as our own. We urged the Minister of National Defence not to press for moneys to make good the depletions and deficiencies in defence to the extent he deemed necessary until the European situation, as it related to the war between Italy and Ethiopia, had somewhat cleared. The understanding was that we would come to parliament with a full statement of the situation at a time when such a statement was not likely to add to the difficulties of those who were dealing with affairs in Europe.

We wished moreover for further opportunity to see that the expenditures requested were absolutely essential, and that whatever it might be necessary to have done would be effective. I have listened to much of what has been said about the Department of National Defence. I know it is a popular pastime to make fun of the brass hats, as they are termed, and to ridicule those who wear gold braid, as it it termed. May I say however—and I say this as the Prime Minister of Canada—that the defence forces of Canada are part of the public service. Persons in those branches of government are not free to defend themselves on the floors of parliament. They are not supposed even to defend themselves in the press of the country, and I think it is most unchivalrous for members of parliament to belittle men who have served their country at the risk of their lives in the past, and who, in the face of a world situation such as we have to-day, are prepared, if necessary, to offer their lives in its service again.

I observed that the group opposite seemed to be greatly amused when one member read from a regulation stating the size of ties that were to be worn in relation to the size of collars and how they were to be made up. I have noticed among men who have had a military training, that one finds at their homes, both in and out of doors, evidences of order and system, which frequently are not to be found in other homes. The continuous attention paid to little things and the discipline necessary to cause a man to pay attention to such things often goes a long way towards ensuring that in a moment of action one who may be called upon to place a gun in position, will do so with accuracy; or one whose duty it is to direct a beam of light will do so with exactness and precision. Hon. members may ridicule these little things but they are a part of the training and discipline which help to make men efficient in times of need.

Knowing that there would be the criticism that officers of the Department of National Defence were seeking to increase their own importance and to enlarge unduly the scope of the defence forces, after prorogation last year I suggested to my colleagues with the approval of the Minister of National Defence that we should have a special committee of the cabinet to take up with the Minister and the officials of his department the whole question of the defence estimates, and that we form from among members of the cabinet a Canadian defence committee. I did that for the reason I have mentioned, but even more for the reason that having regard to the world situation, I thought it important that members of the cabinet should have the fullest possible information with respect to the general defence services. I asked the Minister of National Defence to give to every member of the cabinet a secret memorandum setting forth in detail what was being proposed, what needs were likely to be served, and at what cost they would be met, in order that the defence committee of the cabinet might be in a position to take up with the heads of the branches of the defence department any points of criticism that might occur to any of them after the information had been placed before and considered by the cabinet as a whole.

I shall read the minute of His Excellency in Council of August 20, 1936, which established the defence committee:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 19th August, 1936, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, submitting that he is of the opinion that a subcommittee of council should be constituted to consider problems respecting defence.
> The Prime Minister therefore recommends that a subcommittee of council, to be known as the "Canadian Defence Committee" and to consist of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Honourables the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence, be appointed, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to be chairman of the said committee.
> The Prime Minister further recommends that the said committee shall have power to call before it any official or employee of the government and any officer of the naval, military or air force of Canada, whose duty it shall be to afford the committee every assistance and all information in connection with any subject in regard to which the committee may desire to be informed.
> The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

After it was formed, the committee had three important meetings with officers of the defence department in addition to other conferences. Before this committee of the cabinet the chief of the naval forces, the chief of the air forces and the chief of the militia appeared with other members of the staff. A considerable part of a day was spent going over item by item every recommendation that was made. The estimates were then further considered by the cabinet as a whole.

Let me now say a word as to the extent of the increases in the estimates being submitted. In the light of all that I have said, what are we asking this house to do? What items account for the increases? First of all, we are asking parliament to enable us to replace two destroyers which had become obsolete with two destroyers which will be up to date and effective. For a good many years past we have had four destroyers, two of which had been obtained on loan from the British government. Those two had become obsolete and we had to ask ourselves whether we would approach the British government at a time when they were being hard pressed themselves, and ask them in the name of Canada to lend us two more destroyers or whether we would ask them if they could spare us out of their number two destroyers at a reasonable figure. Is there any hon. member who thinks that we should have allowed the two destroyers which had become obsolete not to be replaced? Is there any hon. member who thinks that we should have sought to borrow two destroyers instead of purchasing them? Is there any member of the group opposite who have been criticizing the estimates who will say that we ought to have left these two obsolete destroyers unreplaced in the little service that we provide for our coasts?

We are asking this house to enable us to purchase four mine sweepers, which will be built in Canada. A few years ago we had four mine sweepers regularly in commission. One is still in existence but is ready for scrapping, one was sunk and the other two have been out of commission for some time. We are simply replacing what we had as a part of the regular service a few years ago. I am told that during the war there were 125 mine sweepers between Halifax and Sydney to protect that portion of the shores of Canada. I ask my hon. friends opposite who are criticizing these estimates if they will say that we should not purchase four mine sweepers, when we have only one in Canada to-day? They do not reply. Why then do they criticize these estimates, why do they bring in a vote of want of confidence in the administration because we ask for the small increases we are asking for in order to begin to undertake some sort of defence around our coasts? We propose to have these mine sweepers constructed in Canada. During the war twelve were constructed in this country so that we will be able to do the work ourselves. That covers the naval equipment with the exception of one training ship. We were told that a training ship was essential and we are providing for this ship which also will be constructed in Canada.

Come next to the air forces. I think everyone recognizes that an air force will be a very necessary form of protection from now on. Part of the necessity for this expenditure is due to the change in the nature of present day warfare. Air forces did not exist before the last war and submarines came into general use during that war. Air fighting has become the most significant feature of modern warfare. Well do we know how air forces are being developed in other countries of the world. When the Liberal administration was in office some years ago we felt that everyone would recognize of what great advantage extensive air navigation would be in a country the size of Canada. We thought that we ought to encourage civil aviation and at the same time develop an air force for defence purposes. We made a beginning in that direction, indeed we went quite a way. No exception was taken and this parliament voted the money necessary for the air forces. The expenditures for air defence purposes reached a point just about equal to that which is now being proposed. When my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition came into office in 1930 and encountered years of depression his government thought it advisable to cut down the air force. We criticized him at the time very strongly for that; the Liberal party in Canada, the Liberal members of this House of Commons, criticized the then government for cutting down the air force. All we are doing at the present time is continuing our policy as it was then by restoring the air force to a point where it will be effective and of some real service.

How were the expenditures cut down? In 1930-31, the year we went out of office, the total expenditure for defence purposes was $21,700,000. When my right hon. friend came into office he had by 1932-33 cut that $21,700,000 to $12,600,000. An increase of five million dollars in the present estimates which are required for the air force is accounted for by the extent to which the air force was depleted during the time we were out of office. The entire air force appropriation may be considered as replacement. Does anyone say we should not spend that five million dollars to bring back the air force to where it was at that time? Will anyone in the group opposite who have been criticizing the government say that? I do not hear anyone say so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Prime Minister if he will be fair enough to allow us to speak when we have the opportunity when the estimates are under discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has had the opportunity to speak, and he has spoken many times. I am asking him a question now, which I am asking any of those opposite who have been criticizing the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say to the Prime Minister that I do not propose to answer under these circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all I want. I want to make it clear to the country as well as to the house that while hon. gentlemen opposite are taking refuge behind the amendment which has been brought into this house—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must not interrupt without permission.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I ask that no rhetorical question be put to us across the floor when we have no opportunity of replying. We shall speak when we have a proper opportunity.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not ask any rhetorical questions but I shall make this positive assertion. There is not a member of the group that has moved this amendment who has stood up in his place and said that he would not support what the government is proposing to do, although supporting an amendment which purports to criticize what the government is doing.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am prepared to do that when the Prime Minister is through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now I come to further expenditures, the expenditures for militia purposes. The Minister of National Defence made very clear wherein the provision that is being made for the militia is required. It was pointed out that so far as the equipment which exists at the present time is concerned, much of it is obsolete. It is totally inadequate, and so far as the supplies of munitions are concerned they too are wholly inadequate. Does any hon. member take the view that we should not make good supplies which are deficient? Will anyone say that at a time like this we should expect members of the militia to be prepared to defend our coasts, our harbours, terminals, to support the naval and air forces and not give them the necessary ammunition, not provide them with the necessary guns, not provide them with the anti-aircraft, and other essential equipment? The Minister of National Defence has made perfectly clear what equipment and armaments are necessary if we are to make our militia effective at all.

The view that the government has taken is that we need certain defence forces and needing these forces we should see to it that they are made efficient.

Just to give an idea how Canada stands as compared with other countries in outlays on defence, let me give the amount that was spent per capita on defence by the leading countries of the world for the year 1935-36:

Mexico, $1.12.
Peru, $1.30.
Brazil, $1.31.
Canada, $1.41.
New Zealand, $2.38.
Venezuela, $2.39.
Denmark, $2.50.
Norway, $3.31.
Argentina, $3.72.
Chile, $4.01.
Finland, $4.12.
Japan, $4.30.
Australia, $4.37.
South Africa, $4.53.
Belgium, $4.59.
Sweden, $4.95.
United States, $7.11.
Switzerland, $7.56.
Italy, $8.11—not including extraordinary expenses for the Ethiopian war.
Russia, $9.77.
Great Britain, $14.14.
France, $16.79.

I think, Mr. Speaker, in the light of those figures, that the small amount we are asking by way of provision for defence should not be taken exception to by any hon. member of the house.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said that he hoped some statement would be made of the government's foreign policy. He thought it was important that such a statement should be made in dealing with these estimates. May I say to my hon. friend that I think the government's foreign policy has been put before the house pretty clearly this session and last session. Last session I made a very clear and extensive statement, and this session I have spoken several times on foreign policy.

My hon. friend says that foreign policy and defence are necessarily bound together. I think he makes a mistake in assuming that foreign policy has to do mostly with war.

Foreign policy has to do with maintaining peace, and I have indicated over and over again that so far as this government is concerned, its policy is to follow after the things that make for peace with all the nations of the world, and to do the utmost that it possibly can towards that end. Our whole fiscal policy is based on that view. It is a part of our foreign policy, part of our relations with other countries. We believe that getting rid of trade restrictions, quotas, and other barriers, doing what we can to break down economic nationalism, helps to make for peace. Having regard to the extent of its trade, this government has gone further, I believe, than any other government in existence to-day towards promoting trade with other countries by reducing tariff barriers and getting rid of trade restrictions of one kind and another. When we did away with the embargo against Russia, we were making it clear that we did not wish to maintain an attitude of unfriendliness towards a single country. My hon. friend knows what are the relations between this country and the United States, the relations between this country and France and our relations with Japan, and how they have been promoted in a friendly way. All of that is part of our foreign policy. Interested persons outside this house have not had much difficulty in discovering what are the essential features of Canada's foreign policy. There have been many articles and many debates of late, in which features of our policy have been very fully discussed. Let me quote as a sample from an article which appeared in the University of Toronto Quarterly of last month; it is written by Mr. Escott Reid. It deals with Canada's foreign policy. I cite it because it gives in a concise form certain phases of that policy. Mr. Reid has based what he has written very largely upon what has been said in this House of Commons and which should be as familiar to my hon. friend as it is to any writer beyond these walls. He says:

> Mr. King's foreign policy, as declared from his statements and actions since his reassuming office on October 23, 1935, can be summarized as follows:
> 1. The guiding principle in the formulation of Canada's foreign policy should be the maintenance of the unity of Canada as a nation.
> 2. Canada's foreign policy is, in the main, not a matter of Canada's relations to the league, but of Canada's relations to the United Kingdom and the United States.
> 3. Canada should, as a general rule, occupy a back seat at Geneva or elsewhere when European or Asiatic problems are being discussed.
> 4. Canada is under no obligation to participate in the military sanctions of the league or in the defence of any other part of the commonwealth.
> 5. Canada is under no obligation to participate in the economic sanctions of the league.
> 6. Before the Canadian government agrees in future to participate in military or economic sanctions or in war, the approval of the parliament or people of Canada will be secured.
> 7. Canada is willing to participate in international inquiries into international economic grievances.

That, I think, is a very good statement of some of the features of Canada's foreign policy. Possibly it stresses too much what has to do with possible wars and participation in war, and it does not emphasize enough, in my opinion, what has been done in the way of trade policies and removal of causes of friction between this and other countries. But it does point out certain features that have a direct bearing on these estimates.

Take, for example, the very first statement, that "the guiding principle in the formulation of Canada's foreign policy should be the maintenance of the unity of Canada as a nation." That bears immediately upon these very estimates. If this government, faced with the situation that I have described, had done nothing with respect to Canadian defences, does my hon. friend imagine, does anyone imagine that we would have had unity in this country? We should have had from all over Canada very strong demands that the government pay attention to the world situation and see to it that Canada's defences were properly taken care of. On the other hand, if we had taken extreme measures, if we had become jingoistic in our attitude and had asked this parliament for huge appropriations for purposes of defence, we should have met with decided protests the other way. What we have sought to do is to bring down estimates which would commend themselves generally as reasonable to the Canadian people from one end of this country to the other. In that I believe we have succeeded. Not only the people of Canada generally, but the people of each province of Canada are, I believe, behind us in what we are doing at this time. We have sought before all else, as I have said, to maintain the unity of our country in what we have been proposing. If we have not proposed more, if we have not proposed less, it is because of that guiding principle, we have sought to keep the country united.

I should like to put on record one statement which I regard as important in this discussion of defence, related as it is to foreign policy. It comes from a source which I believe should be considered at all times by hon. members of this house. It is from the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, through the executive of that body. Before I read it, may I say further to my hon. friend that while it is true our own foreign policy does not include any consideration of objects to be attained beyond Canada in the way of territories to be acquired, or resources to be obtained, or colonies to be restored, the foreign policies of other countries in some of these particulars have a bearing upon the estimates which are now before this house. The statement I am about to read will indicate wherein a consideration of such matters by the government has been deemed necessary by those who served their country in the great war. This communication was sent to me on January 30 of this year by General Alex. Ross, the Dominion president. General Ross' letter states:

At a meeting of the Dominion Executive Council of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, held in Ottawa this week, consideration was given to the question of national defence, and as a result a resolution was adopted which I think may be taken to correctly represent the views of our membership as a whole on this very important question. A copy of the resolution is enclosed herewith.

This is the view of the Canadian Legion:

The Dominion Executive Council of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League being of the opinion that, in view of the international situation, it is desirable to define the position of the Canadian Legion of the B.E.S.L. on matters of national defence, resolves as follows:

(1) That the Canadian Legion believes that the first essential toward the promotion of world peace is universal disarmament to a point consistent with preservation of order within national territorial limits, and the efficient policing of the seas.

(2) But in view of the fact that efforts made since the war towards procuring universal disarmament have, thus far, been unsuccessful, and that as a result the nations of the world are now rearming to a greater degree than ever before and, in view of the fact that certain of the great powers do not adhere to the League of Nations, and that others, on occasion, have flaunted its decisions, the Canadian Legion believes that the time has now come when the people of Canada should give consideration to the problem of national defence.

(3) That in view of the fact that since the passage of the Statute of Westminster Canada is now an independent nation within the commonwealth of the British Empire, it is necessary that Canada should assume the responsibilities of nationhood, and that we should not rely upon the United Kingdom for our defence by sea or land.

(4) That we, therefore, believe that it is essential that Canada should, forthwith, develop a defence policy which, in the first place, would be designed to enable us to effectively defend our neutrality in case of war and protect our trade and commerce, and ultimately enable us to defend our eastern and western coasts from aggression by enemy forces.

(5) That in so declaring we definitely exclude a policy of arming for purposes of aggression; that we regard our frontier with the United States as one which does not require protection, but we feel that if Canada is to retain her place as an independent nation in the world, she must be able to defend herself from threats of aggression from overseas, which in the present state of world politics cannot be regarded as idle.

(6) That accordingly, we endorse the proposals of the government to increase our national defences and trust that such defences may be developed along the lines suggested, to make our coast secure from attack by sea, land and air, and to preserve our position as an independent nation which does not seek to interfere with the rights of any other nation but only to develop its national life in a world where peace should prevail.

That declaration of the legion sets forth in, I think, as concrete language as could be expressed, very much the views of the present administration. I endorse every paragraph in that communication.

I have spoken longer than I intended, but there are one or two matters to which I should like to refer before I conclude as they have been touched on in the course of the debate.

The first is the suggestion that we need not defend ourselves because we have the Monroe doctrine to rely upon and also because we have Great Britain, to protect us.

So far as the Monroe doctrine is concerned, that doctrine itself in its application has been undergoing of late a certain amount of change. The visit of President Roosevelt to the South American republics made it clear that in so far as the Monroe doctrine was to apply to them, they in turn were to be prepared to consult with the United States upon what should be done to help to maintain peace on this continent. Far from interpreting the doctrine as obliging the United States to undertake the policing of the whole of the western hemisphere, its meaning has come to be that where the United States undertakes an obligation of the kind she expects to do so in consultation with the other countries that may be affected, and consultation, I take it means something in the way of co-operation as well. But as far as the Monroe doctrine is concerned, may I ask this house whether, having regard to our relations with the United States and our desire to maintain the friendliest possible relations with that country, we are prepared to surrender to that country the whole of our obligation in the matter of protection against foreign aggression? Is it likely that we shall be able to maintain friendly relations with the United States if we do nothing to defend our own coasts but simply take the attitude that we shall look to them for our defence? Similarly with regard to England. Are members of this government who are to represent Canada at the imperial conference to be asked to assert Canada's equality of status with all the nations of the British commonwealth and at the same time to tell the British government that we are relying upon Great Britain to protect our coasts, and will do nothing to help ourselves because we have their protection? In a word, so far as looking to either the United States or Great Britain for the defence of our coasts or of any part of the dominion, while naturally we are glad to know that we can count on that additional safeguard in any great emergency, to suggest that we should depend upon it entirely and do absolutely nothing for ourselves is simply to be lacking in self-respect as a nation; it is simply sponging. I submit that sponging by a nation is, in the eyes of other nations, exactly the same as it is in the case of individuals. An individual who is prepared to look to his neighbours to guard his own home and is not prepared to do anything himself for its defence lacks that kind of manliness and self-respect which entitles him to be classed as a citizen of his country. While we may congratulate ourselves that we are fortunate in our proximity to the United States, while we may be glad of the Monroe doctrine, while it is our good fortune to have both the United States and Great Britain as close friends ready to come and help us should we ever be the victims of aggression, let us realize that if we are to look to them for help all the more we must be prepared to lend a hand ourselves, and that certainly in the defence of our own country.

With respect to neutrality, if we are to look to the United States for assistance, that is all the more reason why we must be prepared to see that the United States at least is not embarrassed by reason of any failure on our part to safeguard our own neutrality. I will not go into the question of neutrality this afternoon beyond observing that any nation that does not wish to become a belligerent in a war must at least be able to see that the waters adjacent to its own coasts are so patrolled by its own vessels that no belligerent can come and operate from that base against some other country with which it may be at war. As was ably pointed out the other evening, a ship coming from overseas from some country at war and entering our waters might immediately involve us in conflict. Unless we are in a position to safeguard our own commerce within our harbours and rivers we cannot expect to be able to maintain neutrality even if we have decided so to do.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I have spoken already of the support of the league and I will not discuss that point further at the moment, though I hope at some other time to have an opportunity to make an additional reference to it. Let me conclude with a word in reference to the imperial conference and imperial defence. I have already, I believe, made clear that so far as participation in any war is concerned the position of the present government, and indeed of all governments in Canada, is that there will be no participation by Canada in a war overseas except by the consent of our own parliament. As long as that is understood, hon. members should have sufficient confidence in themselves to believe that the right course will be followed with respect to any possible participation by Canada in foreign wars.

A good deal has been said in the course of this discussion about the danger of attending imperial conferences and of what may take place at such conferences. May I point out, first of all, that an imperial conference is only a conference; it is not a cabinet. An imperial conference is not a body that exists for the purpose of making policies for the empire and with authority to make such policies and to carry them out. An imperial conference is simply a meeting of representatives of different parts of the empire for the purpose of conferring together on matters of great common concern. Undoubtedly at conferences efforts may be made to introduce imperial policies and gain acceptance for them; but every government is responsible for the attitude that it takes at an imperial conference and I wish to say, here and now, that the attitude which this present administration will take at the forthcoming imperial conference is that which it has taken at every other conference, namely, that it is not in a position to bind Canada to anything. We shall be glad to get and to give as much information as we can on matters of common concern, on matters of trade, of defence, on constitutional problems and the like; but we shall be as free to take our own action with regard to these matters as we are at the present time. Unless its government permits it, there is nothing that an imperial conference can do which can in any way bind this country without the knowledge and consent of its parliament. Therefore I do not think that there need be much fear concerning what will take place by way of commitments at the conference.

Resolutions have been adopted at previous imperial conferences. I should like to read those concerning defence which were adopted at the conferences of 1923 and 1926 so that the house may see how far they committed this country to anything which this parliament would be likely to take exception. At the imperial conference of 1923 a resolution was passed—and was reaffirmed in 1926—to the effect that, while it was for the parliaments of the different parts of the empire to decide the nature and extent of defence,

> The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire was for its own local defence.

This was based upon a finding of the chiefs of staff subcommittee of the committee of imperial defence in 1923 as follows:

> His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom is mainly responsible for the security of communications between the several parts of the commonwealth.

And:

> Each of the several dominions is responsible for protecting its territory and coastal trade against aggression, until support comes from the outside.

Is there in that resolution anything to which hon. members would take exception? The imperial conference of 1926 laid down the following formula:

> It was frankly recognized that in this sphere (i.e. foreign policy), as in the sphere of defence, the larger share of responsibility rests now, and must for some time rest, with His Majesty's government in Great Britain. Nevertheless all the dominions engage to some extent, and some to considerable extent, in the conduct of foreign relationships, particularly those with foreign countries on their borders. . . . the governing consideration underlying all discussions of this problem must be that neither Great Britain nor the dominions could be committed to the acceptance of active obligations, except with the definite assent of their own governments.

Can any exception be taken to these resolutions? I will guarantee that there shall be no resolution that will go further than either of these with respect to any demand on Canada at the forthcoming imperial conference.

Much has been said about a recent speech made by Sir Samuel Hoare. Does a speech made by a member of the parliament of the old country bind this parliament? It is a mighty fortunate thing for the old country that some of the speeches made here do not bind government there. That is equally true of all parliaments no matter where speeches happen to be made. Fortunately the British community of nations is one in which we are all free to say pretty much what we like, but none of us is bound by what the other fellow says. An imperial conference in London is no different from a dominion-provincial conference here in what it involves in the way of commitments by governments participating. We have had some speeches by members of this parliament, in relation to what might take place at a dominion conference, which have not altogether pleased some of the provincial governments and provincial premiers. But they have not found themselves in any way bound by what was said. They have taken exception to what was said if they wished so to do, and they have acquiesced if they so wished. That is exactly the position this government will be in when it meets with other governments at the forthcoming imperial conference. However, it is quite clear that the concern and doubts of some hon. members have reached the ears of members of the government in the old country and that its members have seen there were those in this parliament who fear that in some way Canada is being committed at the present time with respect to what is being done for purposes of defence in Great Britain, or may be committed later on. Ministers of the crown have lost no time in making very clear that, as far as the defence of the different countries of the British Empire is concerned, it is for each part of the empire to decide for itself what it is going to do.

The first of these ministerial statements is one made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain. It leaves no room for doubt. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in the British house of Commons on February 17, after referring to the fact that the United Kingdom was dependent for supplies upon overseas countries, which laid an especial responsibility upon the British forces, especially the navy, to preserve freedom of communications, said:

> It is perfectly true we are dependent largely for supplies of essential materials upon the dominions and in that sense therefore the dispersal of the dominions over the world does lay this special duty upon the navy.
> As far as the dominions are concerned it is not the intention to call upon the dominions to make any contributions to a common fund. The dominions as a matter of fact have spent a great deal of money upon perfecting or improving their own defences and that is their contribution to the common fund but there is no other form of contribution of which I am aware under discussion at the present time.

Even that statement was too much for the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). Speaking yesterday in the house he quoted this statement, and said: "So you see after all there is a common fund."

The hon. member quoted Mr. Chamberlain's statement:

> So far as the dominions are concerned, it is not the intention to call upon the dominions to make any contribution to a common fund. The dominions, as a matter of fact, have spent a great deal of money—

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. MacInnis: May I finish reading this?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, let the hon. member finish.

Mr. MacInnis: I shall continue:

The dominions, as a matter of fact, have spent a great deal of money upon perfecting or improving their own defences, and that is their contribution to the common fund, but there is no other form of contribution, of which I am aware, under discussion at the present time.

And then the hon. member said:

So, you see there is a common fund to which the dominions contribute.

Now what did Mr. Chamberlain mean when he spoke about a common fund? He meant common security. At last the hon. member has discovered that after all there is a common security, towards which we may perhaps be contributing something. I ask hon. members whether they think it is inadvisable to contribute to common security, to a common fund in the nature of security against aggression, against invasion, by making some effort to maintain peace and this in the present instance by defending our own coasts, in our own country, and nothing more.

But Mr. Chamberlain's statement, possibly because it referred to a common fund, was apparently not regarded as sufficient on the part of British statesmen to relieve the fears of some hon. members, because the next day another minister spoke, this time Sir Thomas Inskip, minister for defence coordination. Sir Thomas only yesterday made the following statement in the House of Commons, which is equally emphatic. I read from the Associated Press report in the evening papers of yesterday:

So far as the dominions have opinions on our foreign policy let them be expressed by them, not by persons in this house. We shall this year enjoy the full measure of a conference with dominions' representatives. Let us not embroil them in our commitments.

The defence coordination minister also repeated previous assertions that the dominions will not be asked to share the bill.

"We ask this country to pay for the colonies and dependencies in those parts of the empire for which we are responsible, on which we depend for much of our raw materials," Sir Thomas Inskip declared.

"The dominions, of course, are conscious of the value of their associations with this country and they are making their own preparations at their own expense for their own defence."

As if that were not enough the Prime Minister of England also felt that he should make clear the position that in no way was Canada, or any other dominion, in connection with what it is doing for defence, necessarily committing itself to expenditures for some scheme of imperial defence. The Canadian Press report in last night's Ottawa papers contained the following:

Geoffrey Mander, Liberal, asked for a statement concerning proposals that the government lay before the imperial conference suggestions that a greater share in the cost of imperial defence be borne by the dominions.

Mr. Baldwin: "While welcoming the opportunity afforded by the imperial conference for discussion of defence and other problems, I may remind the hon. gentleman that the defence expenditure of the dominions is entirely a matter for His Majesty's governments in their respective dominions."

Could anything be clearer than that? That statement by the Prime Minister of Great Britain should remove all possibility of doubt as to defence commitments not sanctioned by our own parliament.

In the course of this debate it has been necessary at different times from this side of the house to repeat that what we are doing we are doing for Canada and for Canada alone. That has been necessary for the reason that an impression had been created that what we were doing had relation to some expeditionary force which would be sent overseas. When we say that what we are doing we are doing for Canada alone, we mean that what we are doing is for the defence of our country within the territorial waters of the coasts of our country, and within Canada itself for the defence of Canada. But I hope it will not be thought that because we have laid emphasis on the fact that what we are doing we are doing for Canada, we are not thereby making some contribution towards the defence of the British commonwealth of nations as a whole, or that we are not making some contribution towards the defence of all English-speaking communities, that we are not making some contribution towards the defence of all democracies, that we are not making some contribution towards the defence of all those countries that may some day necessarily associate themselves together for the purpose of preserving their liberties and freedom against an aggressor, come from wherever he may. I say that while we are doing what we are doing for Canada we believe that in this way we can make the most effective contribution towards the security of all countries that may have like institutions, like ideals, and principles of freedom similar to our own.

May I say this word in conclusion. We have heard in this debate that we ought to look to the United States, that we ought to become members of some pan-American conference, that we ought to take up with new friends, that we ought to seek our security in the league, that we ought not to incur expenditures for defence because there are others upon whom we may lean, that we ought to borrow our ships, that it is unnecessary to look after ourselves. A nation is not unlike an individual. A nation has many attributes that the individual has. A nation has character. A nation has duties and responsibilities. A nation has moral as well as other obligations. And a nation which is going to be worthy of the name will seek to discharge all its obligations and its duties in a way befitting a nation among the nations of the world.

I have in my hand a little volume of Shakespeare's Hamlet, a play the key to which will be found in the following words:

> The time is out of joint; O, cursed spite,
> That ever I was born to set it right!

That is the frame of mind that a good many people are in to-day. The time is out of joint, and, each, for himself, has to decide whether he is going to help shoulder the burden, help put things right, or do as Hamlet did, because the burden of the obligation is a great one, fail either to bear it or to throw it off and so confess his soul unequal to the performance of the great deed laid upon it.

I say to those who fail to realize the stature to which Canada has thus far advanced, and what is expected of her as a nation, that they will do well to heed and to apply to our country the words of profound wisdom addressed by Polonius to his son Laertes, as Laertes set out upon his own:

> My blessing with thee!
> And these few precepts in thy memory
> Look thou character. Give thy thoughts no tongue,
> Nor any unproportion'd thought his act.
> Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar;
> Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
> Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel,
> But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
> Of each new-hatch'd unfledged comrade. Beware
> Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,
> Bear't, that the opposed may beware of thee.
> Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice.
> Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment....
> Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
> For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
> And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
> This above all: to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and my deskmate, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I wish first of all to deal with some of the statements made by previous speakers in the debate.

At the outset may I say a word about the amendment. A number of hon. members have endeavoured to interpret it in such a way as to give them a reasonable excuse for voting against it, on the ground that to vote for the amendment is to vote for socialism and to endorse the philosophy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The first person to advance that point of view was the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and others have taken refuge in the same interpretation. Well, if giving people jobs; if taking care of them when they are out of work, through no fault of their own; if looking after the aged, widows and orphans and giving medical and hospital assistance to people who cannot pay for it, are associated in the mind of the Minister of National Defence with the principles of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, I have no objection. But that is not what is intended by the amendment. It states two things clearly, first that this group is opposed to increased expenditure for military purposes.

Let me say here to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that while we did not choose to sit like a group of school children saying Yes, Yes, Yes, while he asked rhetorical questions, I speak for my colleagues and myself when I say most categorically that we are opposed to the increases in the defence estimates. Second, the amendment states that not only are we opposed to the estimates, but we oppose them especially in view of the lack of economic security to be found throughout the dominion. We are saying that we believe bread is more important than bullets, that homes are more important than aeroplanes, that giving people the means to attain physical well-being is more important than building up a military clique within the dominion. When the Minister of National Defence seeks to interpret our stand as one asking for an endorsation of socialism, may I say to him that there are many people across Canada who have taken exactly the same stand as we have, and who could not by any manner of means be called socialists.

The Prime Minister read a press report of Mr. Lloyd George's interview at Jamaica, but may I point out that he did not read all of it. He may have had reasons of his own for not doing so. I shall be pleased to read the rest of it, which runs as follows:

> The veteran British Liberal leader was bitter about the huge sums the mother country was spending on rearmament while we have found it very difficult to get a few millions for the relief of suffering in the distressed areas. For a very small proportion of that sum of money we could have had unbelievable empire development, but, no, the whole of the money is to go to the dogs of war.

That is the part of Mr. Lloyd George's statement which the Prime Minister did not see fit to read. May I point out that there are other people in Canada who feel as we do in the matter. The city council of Montreal could not by any stretch of the imagination be considered a socialist body. Yet I have before me, from the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, February 3, a report of the following resolution:

Whereas our country, in the last few years, has gone through an unprecedented crisis and unemployment is still in the acute stage;

Whereas this council, on numerous occasions, has declared itself favourable to the carrying out of public works in preference to the granting of direct relief;

Whereas the precarious state of public treasuries has often been used as an argument against our requests in this connection;

Whereas it is now intended to increase considerably the appropriations for national defence;

Whereas there is no indication that Canada will soon be called upon to defend its territory;

Whereas this council is of the opinion that it would be more appropriate to apply the millions which it is proposed to spend for armaments to the carrying out of works which, while improving and beautifying the municipalities where they would be carried out, would give employment to a large number of persons and would reduce proportionately the list of assisted unemployed;

Moved by Alderman Bray, seconded by Alderman L'Archeveque,

That this council declare itself strongly opposed to the proposed increase in the appropriations for national defence purposes and request the federal authorities to consider the possibility of spending in public works the sums specified in the dominion budget now under consideration for the purpose of armaments.

May I refer to another public body which, I am sure, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), were he here, would not describe as a socialist group. The city council of Kitchener, Ontario, with only one dissenting voice passed the following resolution:

Whereas our country, in the last few years, has gone through an unprecedented crisis and unemployment is still in the acute stage;

Whereas this council, on numerous occasions, has declared itself favourable to the carrying out of federally-directed public works in preference to the present granting of demoralizing direct relief;

Whereas the precarious state of public treasuries has often been used as an argument against our requests in this connection;

Whereas it is now intended to increase considerably the appropriations for national defence;

Whereas this council is of the opinion that it would be more appropriate to apply the millions which it is proposed to spend for armaments to the carrying out of works, which, while improving and beautifying the municipalities where they would be carried out, would give employment and wages to a large number of persons and would reduce proportionately the list of assisted unemployed;

Whereas our federal representative was admittedly originally elected because of his anti-conscription and anti-war representations;

Whereas a large section of the people of our community have conscientious and religious objections to war, and the preparation thereof;

Be it therefore resolved to petition the federal government by forwarding the above preamble and the following motion to the federal authorities and leaders of the three political groups:—

"That this council declare itself opposed to the proposed increase in the appropriations for national defence purposes, and request the federal authorities to consider the advisability of spending in public works the sums specified in the dominion budget now under consideration for the purpose of armaments."

This resolution, in company with other resolutions from returned soldier bodies and church organizations, and letters which, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) said the other evening, have been pouring into him and no doubt to many other hon. members in this chamber, points conclusively to the fact that this point of view is not confined to any political party or to any political philosophy, that it is a point of view held by many thousands of people across the dominion.

I should like to turn now to a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his speech the other evening. As an exponent of international affairs, the hon. gentleman is a splendid Minister of Agriculture. The picture he drew of our navy giving protection to our shipping out to the three mile limit seemed almost ironical. The minister did not say whether he was going to build piers there in order to enable these ships to transfer their cargoes. However, he did say that the root causes of war were twofold, namely, the restriction of trade and the congestion of population. I think many hon. members will agree with me when I say there are other factors, such as the race for markets and raw materials and the struggle for economic control. The minister's suggested solution was unique. He said that we must be prepared either to distribute our foodstuffs or to bring people to this country to enjoy them. I should like to suggest to him that right at this moment we have over a million people in Canada who would like to enjoy some of our foodstuffs but who have not the purchasing power to buy them.

He said that the group in this corner of the chamber had refused to have anything to do with immigration, the one thing that would solve the problem of war. This group has not opposed immigration. What we have opposed is the idea of bringing men and women out to this country when we already have over a million people who are not able to get along without government assistance. The minister told us that western Canada was able to support 30,000,000 people while it had only 3,000,000 at the present time. Is it proposed that these 30,000,000 people will all produce more wheat and cattle which we cannot sell? Is it proposed that they are to dwell in the drought areas and be assisted by the federal and provincial governments?

The Canada Year Book shows that since 1931 a total of 150,000 people have left the prairies, and that since 1921, leaving out the natural increase, more people have left Canada than have migrated to Canada. When immigration is suggested to this house as a solution for the problem of war, it seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture is talking very much like the president of a certain railway company.

I should like to say just a word with reference to the speech made by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and other odds and ends. He chided the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with not being exactly honest, in that he had failed to call the party of which he is the leader the socialist party. The minister said we were flying false colours. He ought to know that the term "socialism," like the term "Christianity," covers a great variety of points of view. The term "socialism" covers many fields of economic doctrine and the term "Cooperative Commonwealth Federation" denotes a particular form of socialism as distinct from Marxian socialism or guild socialism, from Fabian socialism or syndicalist socialism. When the minister suggests that we ought to call ourselves the socialist party, he should go to the Presbyterian church and the Anglican church and suggest that they call themselves the Christian church.

I am not very old but I can remember that another party came to this house fifteen years ago. It seems to me that that party had a false name as they called themselves the Progressive party. Many felt that it should have been called the Liberal party since that is where it ended. Instead of being a progressive party, it turned out to be a retrogressive party.

Miss MACPHAIL: Which showed it was truly Liberal.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I should like to say a few words with reference to the speech of the Minister of National Defence. I am always a little suspicious when an eloquent debater like the minister has to resort to poetry. To me that would indicate he was running out of facts. On page 897 of Hansard the minister is reported as having said that the mover of the amendment (Mr. MacNeil) was purely academic in talking about the nationalization of industry in the event of war, but then on page 904 the minister is reported as saying that his department has spent eight or nine months in surveying this whole field. These two statements are rather inconsistent. If this matter were purely academic, I hardly think his department would waste time on it. If his department is spending time on it, then, it must be a live issue.

What has his department done with reference to this all-important question? The minister says that they have made a survey. The government seems to be constantly confusing diagnosis with cure, and the means with the end. They are like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) who thinks that when he has made a survey of the unemployed he has cured unemployment. The minister thinks that when he has made a survey of the possibilities of nationalizing industry, the problem has been dealt with. He believes that if you appoint a committee, a commission or a board of inquiry, then the problem can be shelved. This problem has not yet been dealt with. The minister has made no statement as to what he proposes to do with respect to this matter of preventing the making of millions in profits out of a country engaged in war. He says that a survey has been made, but he has not suggested any legislation. He has given no indication that legislation will be introduced or what the nature of that legislation will be. He reminds me of that character in Dickens, Mr. Micawber, who kept thinking that something would eventually turn up.

The time for dealing with this important question of taking the profit out of war is the present. I need hardly remind hon. members that great financial concerns on the North American continent made fortunes during the last war while men were laying down their lives for a mere pittance. I have Engelbrecht and Hanighen's Merchants of Death before me. On page 179 appears a list of the average annual profits made by certain corporations in the four years before the war and in the four years during the war. I shall give only one or two instances. The average annual profits of the United States Steel Corporation in the period prior to the war was $105,331,000, and during the war, $239,653,000. The average annual profits of du Ponts before the war was $6,092,000, and during the war, $58,076,000. Bethlehem Steel made $6,840,000 a year before the war and $49,427,000 a year during the war. We find that the Canadian Car and Foundry made an average of $1,335,000 a year before the war and $2,201,000 a year during the war. General Motors made $6,954,000 annually before the war and $21,700,000 annually during the war. I have before me statistics in connection with certain British and European firms, but I do not think it is necessary for me to give them as hon. members know just what went on during the last war. I should like to refer to a statement made on April 1, 1935, by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, as reported on page 2307 of Hansard of that date.

He said:

I would like, however, to say with regard to disarmament, that I do not think it is sufficient for this country simply to say that it supports the League of Nations in its policy of disarmament. I think we ought to name a concrete policy in that regard. Having observed what has taken place in investigations in the United States, where beyond all question it has been shown that there are those who are prepared to traffic in the manufacture and sale of munitions and armaments for the sake of gain, that there are large interests that are even selling simultaneously to countries that are at enmity with each other, it behooves this country, and I believe all nations, to begin immediately to investigate the whole business of armament manufacture and sale. I should like to see a beginning made in this country of a thorough investigation into the whole business of the manufacture and sale and distribution of munitions of war and armaments, and that step put forward as part of a policy to govern British countries, a policy that we would hope might be followed in all parts of the British Empire.

That was the statement made by the present Prime Minister. Recognizing the need for further investigation and action along this line he suggested that this should be the policy not only of Canada but of all parts of the British Empire. I hope the Prime Minister will not forget his own statement when he goes to the imperial conference at London this year for, while the Minister of National Defence and his department are making surveys, profits are being made even now out of preparations for war.

I have before me two very significant tables. The first one shows the amounts of nickel exported prior to the last war. I take these figures from the report of the Royal Ontario Nickel Commission, 1917:

Shipments of Metallic Nickel for ten years before the war
(in pounds)

Date	Shipments	To Great Britain	To Germany
1908..	11,965,948	1,916,492	4,826,439
1909..	19,668,665	2,299,410	7,168,097
1910..	24,138,588	2,841,184	8,182,525
1911..	26,714,205	4,366,640	7,957,469
1912..	33,624,982	7,258,813	8,519,222
1913..	33,876,214..	8,399,827	10,869,260
1914*.	20,468,602	5,740,685	4,949,750

* January to July inclusive.

I shall not read the figures for the other countries, but the increase in shipments is in about the same proportion. What I am interested in reading to the house is a statement of the exports of nickel for the last few years as given by the external trade branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I would like the house to notice that the proportionate increase in shipments of nickel from 1908 to 1913 coincides very closely with the increase in shipments of nickel from 1933 to the present time. The figures are as follows:

Dominion Bureau of Statistics — External Trade Branch
Exports of Nickel and Products from Canada, by Countries
(Calendar Years, 1929-1936)

I have read these figures to the house, Mr. Speaker, first of all to show that since 1933, coinciding with the tremendous preparations for war in every part of the world, there has been a proportionate increase in shipments of nickel to those countries which are most likely to be the aggressor nations. As to whether or not profits are being made, it has already been suggested in this debate that for the first nine months of 1936 the profits of the International Nickel Company were $23,000,000; profits are being made out of this country's shipments of copper and shipments of nitrate for high explosives. If any move is going to be made by the Department of National Defence to take the profit out of war, this is the time to be doing it. The minister says that a survey is being made. A few nights ago I moved in the house a motion asking the government in the event of war to bring down the necessary legislation to conscript automatically all the industrial, financial and natural resources of the nation to meet the event of war. The government took no steps to accept that resolution; it was talked out. If the government is perfectly sincere, it has a great deal more to do than merely make a survey. It ought to take steps now to see to it that in the event of war we shall go out and not conscript men only but the materials with which to equip the men who go out to do their duty.

May I now state the three reasons why I cannot vote for the increase in armaments. First, I do not feel that the government has shown that we are in any way more menaced this year than we were last year. This group has not said that it is not in favour of defence, but we are opposed to an increase in the defence estimates because it has not yet been demonstrated that the danger has become any greater now than it was twelve months or twenty-four months ago.

Against whom are we arming? What potential aggressor is more aggressive to-day? Oh, I know that bogeymen have been trotted out in this chamber. It has been suggested that it might be Italy, it might be Germany, it might be Japan. I cannot suppose that the government has any real fear of the intentions of these nations, for I noticed in the figures I have just read that Canada is shipping nickel to them. Knowing that we control the major part of the world's nickel supplies, I cannot believe that we would ship to them material which we feared would be returned to us in the form of high explosives. Surely those who talked about the Italians bombing this House of Commons did not imagine that the government of the day would allow us to send them the nickel with which to make those bombs, or did they?

The second reason why I cannot support these increased expenditures is that I am convinced they will not be used purely for national defence but will inevitably lead us to participation in war. I know this has been categorically denied by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. I am sure that they are sincere. But may I point out that, no matter how sincere governments may be, there are understandings and obligations which are very difficult to avoid when a country once starts on a program of armaments. On April 1, 1935, at page 2307 of Hansard, I find the following statement:

> It is quite easy to say that we would stay out of the war, that we would not send men to fight in Europe, but after the experience I had of the pressure which was exerted at the time of the Chanak incident,...I have very grave doubts as to what might happen in Canada if war were to break out again in any part of the world.

That is the statement of the present Prime Minister of Canada, then the leader of the opposition. He then doubted if in the event of a world war Canada could stay out. I wonder whether he has changed his mind to-day? Those who have read the memoirs of Viscount Grey of Fallodon, who was Sir Edward Grey, foreign secretary of Great Britain, at the outbreak of the war, will remember that he says that, unknown to the cabinet, understandings had been made between the British and French naval staffs, with the result that Mr. Asquith seriously thought of resigning because commitments had been made without the knowledge either of the cabinet or of parliament. The Prime Minister says that Canada will pursue at the imperial conference the same policy it has pursued in days gone by. I hope that is true. I am sure that hon. members on this side of the house were very glad to hear that statement. But the fact remains that the statements of Sir Samuel Hoare, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, and the minister for co-ordination of defence show that a great rearmament program is going on in Great Britain. To me it seems no accident that coincident with the increased armament program in other parts of the British Empire there is an increased expenditure for armaments in Canada. It seems to me we are preparing a program that will fit neatly into the great jigsaw of imperial defence.

The third reason why I cannot support these increased estimates is that I feel they are the price the Canadian people are being called upon to pay for the weakness and spinelessness of those who have been responsible for Canada's foreign policy, particularly during the past eighteen months. A great deal has been said about bogeymen in Europe and the rearmament that is going on. Why is it going on? Because every country to-day has lost confidence in collective action based upon collective security. Why? Because the whole ideal of collective security has been sabotaged. It started when Japan was allowed with impunity to ravish Manchukuo. At that time Sir John Simon, British foreign secretary, made an impassioned defence of Japan's action at the Assembly of the League of Nations. In 1935 Italy embarked on a similar program in Ethiopia.

The Minister of Justice tells the house that the reason why Canada would not support oil sanctions was that she was afraid this might lead to war; that seems to me a flight from reality. As a matter of fact we had imposed other sanctions, and if sanctions lead to war why did we impose the first sanctions? If we were afraid of war why did we impose any sanctions? Why did we impose some and not others? The Prime Minister says that all he intended doing was to clear up a misunderstanding that Canada was leading in the demand for oil sanctions. That was not the impression which went around the world. I remember the shock to world opinion which resulted from that action. People who believed in collective security were stunned by the statement which came from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who was acting Prime Minister at the time. And now, when we see the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister shedding crocodile tears over the demise of the League of Nations, I feel that the situation is ironic indeed. At that time the interpretation by most people in Canada, and the world at large, was that Canada would not participate in oil sanctions, and no attempt was made to give a contrary impression until this parliament met and it was too late then to remedy this situation. It seems to me that both this government and the British National government are in the position of Frankenstein; they are seeking to defend themselves from a monster of their own creation. We have created this situation and now we are proceeding to ask the Canadian people to pay with their money for the folly and the weaknesses of the foreign policy of this government and the British National government. In the same speech to which I have referred, on April 1, 1935, the present Prime Minister used these words:

> Our country, small as it is, might well lay down a definite policy in that regard as expressing Canada's attitude toward any country which, upon the facts being disclosed, was found to be guilty of attempting to destroy what otherwise might be collective security. If that example were followed by other parts of the British empire, as I believe it would be, it would soon be followed by other parts of the world.

That is a fine statement. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is prepared to reaffirm it to-day? I wonder whether he still believes that? Certainly the foreign policy of the present government has not shown it; and if, as one of the London papers has said, nothing but rags and tatters is left of collective security, much of the responsibility can be attributed to the action of the present government in the Ethiopian affair, plus the speech which was made by the Prime Minister at the League of Nations last September, when he announced to the world that Canada would not participate in economic sanctions.

I object to increased armaments. If they were a contribution to some collective security system, it would be an entirely different matter. What this house is being asked to do is to pay for the weak and vacillating attitude that has been taken by the government in connection with international affairs. I, for one, will never give either my voice or my vote to send young men out to lay down their lives because of the incompetency and, in many cases, the stupidity of those who have directed the foreign policy of this country.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I had it in mind to give a somewhat extensive speech on the subject of this amendment, but time is passing, a good deal has already been said about the matter, and, I may add, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has in part expressed my sentiments concerning it. Only a few minutes remain between now and recess, and I think what I have to say can be said in that time. I wish to say simply a word. As the previous speaker has said, the intention of the amendment is to express the sentiment of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, that they are opposed to the house going into committee and passing estimates for defence.

Mr. COLDWELL: Increased estimates.

Mr. HANSELL: Increased estimates for defence—very well. I must say I have little confidence in the present government's economic administration. I do not believe that they can bring us economic security while we remain within the confines of the present financial system. But even though that is my attitude, there are certain facts that I cannot disregard in a world of unrest such as this. We can say what we like about it, but Canada is an integral part of the British Empire; the British Empire might become involved in any international struggle, and once the British Empire is involved, whether we like to think so or not, Canada itself becomes involved. I cannot, therefore, bring myself to believe that we should not make provision for a moderate defence program. While, therefore, I do not agree with the government in their policy with respect to economics, I cannot vote for the amendment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry not to be able to be in the house during the past week; it was my bad luck but certainly not my responsibility. I would have been very much interested to hear all the speeches made on this question of increased armaments. I was not able even to read all the speeches in Hansard, but I was able to follow the reports in the daily press; which is possibly not the best medium, but at any rate is better than nothing. I would particularly like to have heard the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I would like to have heard his justification for the increase in the estimates, and I would like to have heard him quoting poetry. Of course I can read it, but poetry never is quite so enjoyable when read. I would like to have known from his speech just when it was that Canada arrived at the present very dangerous position. When did he come to the conclusion, and what brought him to that conclusion, that this country and this government, which had no money for many things which it seemed necessary to find money for, suddenly had thirteen and a half million dollars with which apparently they could find nothing better to do than submit increased military estimates? I fear I really shall have to read his speeches to find out what it was that brought him to that conclusion.

Then too, I wanted so much to know against whom we are arming. It is only sixteen months or so since we had a general election, and although I read the press diligently I do not recall any speeches by the Minister of National Defence at that time, or indeed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), telling Canada of her great danger, of the bombs that were to drop on the elevators in western Canada. About eighteen or twenty months ago people were wishing that would happen; it would have been one way of getting rid of the wheat. Someone says, "Drop them on the grain exchange," but the worst thing about bombs is that they are often dropped in the wrong places. Some member was greatly worried about one dropping on the House of Commons. I am sure the country listening to this debate would not think it such a calamity, certainly not this week when I was home in bed. If the Prime Minister during the election campaign had made such eloquent speeches as the one he made this afternoon—because it was an eloquent speech; I did not like it, but it was eloquent—if he had made such eloquent speeches on this subject from coast to coast throughout Canada, these coasts which now stand in such need of defence, would there have been the same deadening monotony of Liberals in the house as there is now? I doubt it. Therefore I wish he had made the speeches. The speech he made to-day was a very different one from those he made during the campaign on the same subject or similar ones. I am not clear as to how many cruisers we are to have. We are to have four mine sweepers, but if we spelled "mine sweeper" differently, changing the "e" in "mine" to "d," it might not be bad to have half a dozen.

It is said that all this increase of expenditure is to be for the defence of Canada. My first fear is that if we increase our military estimates, if we increase our fighting forces, they will not be used for the defence of Canada but will make us much more liable to be drawn at the heels of Great Britain into a European or world war. There are very good reasons for thinking that. I admire the dexterity with which the Prime Minister explained away Sir Samuel Hoare's speech, but I believe even the right hon. gentleman would admit that it was to him an embarrassing speech and took quite a lot of explaining. We have had in Canada in the last year a good many imperialists, most of them from Great Britain but some of them Canadians, making throughout the country speeches which lead me to believe that there is a very real danger that an increase in military estimates will make it more likely that we shall be drawn into a European war. Then, too, I noticed the Prime Minister's anxiety that he should not turn up at the imperial conference with empty hands. He does not appear to be going to. And apparently he is not the only person going to the coronation, which brings me to my second worry. We are going to send to the coronation and to the imperial conference—it is hard to distinguish one from the other—334 officers and men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, I am quoting from the paper, with a picture of Assistant Commissioner S. T. Wood.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is incorrect. The total for the mounted police is thirty-four.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, that is another indication that we should not rely too much on the papers. But 364 officers and men from the military forces—are those figures correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total is 334—air force, militia and mounted police.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, 334 officers—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; all ranks.

Miss MACPHAIL: I was going to say "and men" if the hon. member had waited a moment. It is surprising that there are some men going; that is better than all officers. Three hundred and thirty-four officers and men—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And two nursing sisters.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then I am sure the men and officers will be well taken care of. It is a large number of people to go, and I suppose there will also be a number from the House of Commons and from the cabinet, and it may be from the opposition as well. If all these people then are going over to the imperial conference and the coronation, one is not unduly pessimistic or alarmist if one thinks, as I do, that when they return there will be an agitation, a further agitation shall we say, for an increase in military estimates, and that the increase which we have this year will be but the beginning.

We have been reading statements made by Sir Samuel Hoare, and I notice it took about four different statements in the British House of Commons to make it clear that he did not mean what he said. That of course is not quite so remarkable; we get used to that. At any rate there was quite a lot of explaining.

I think too there has been some talk, if my reading this week has been correct, about subversive elements in Canada, and that one needs a bit of an army to take care of these elements. If there is anything which will cause revolt in the minds of the Canadian people it is that this great number of people are going overseas, at government expense, for the coronation and the ceremonies connected therewith, and millions being spent for defence. I have—and so has every hon. member—letters coming to my desk day after day telling about awful conditions in my constituency, conditions that on many occasions are found in the families of the men who fought in the last war.

Just before I came to Ottawa I called at the home of a veteran in my constituency, a man who had won military honours, but who is now totally incapacitated and will never work again. He has six children, and was living in a house not fit for anyone to live in. In connection with the house was a miserable little yard, around which was a picket fence with only one picket here and there. It was a place in which no one should live, much less anyone who served in the last war and won decorations. I am sure that man will be extremely interested to hear that these 334—or whatever the number is—officers, men and nursing sisters are going to the coronation. I am sure he will be extremely interested to learn that Canada is to be saved by an expenditure of $13,500,000 to keep the mines swept—if you sweep mines—off the St. Lawrence waterways, and to keep bombs from dropping on elevators. The veteran gets no pension or allowance.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is a man whom I have always respected and admired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yet only the other day he pulled the old boner about the defence of women and children. I know only one worse, and that is the one about the protection of widows and orphans. He talked about the need to protect the women and children. Well, let me tell the house about families in Ottawa who might need some defence—and it won't be accomplished with mine sweepers on the St. Lawrence river, either. There are 390 families on relief in Ottawa, each living in one room; there are 687 families on relief in Ottawa, each living in two rooms. Just think of the agony of a woman with an unemployed husband trying to raise a family in one room and at the same time remain sane! It actually makes me feel ill, when I listen to the oratory to which we have been treated in this week in view of such conditions at our very door.

In Canada we still have a million people on relief. We hear a great deal of talk about Canada as the plum for which all nations are looking—all ready to pick it off. It is a plum, all right, with a million people still on relief.

Mr. DOUGLAS: A sour plum.

Miss MACPHAIL: I believe the Montreal Gazette would not, by any stretch of the imagination, be called a socialist paper, and yet only on Tuesday of this week, February 16, I found this heading in the middle of the front page: "Shattered health and morale found among city's unemployed." The article goes on to contradict the claim that "Low economic standards" do not involve "low health standards." It would take a good deal of reading to place the whole article before the house, but briefly they have done research work in 173 cases and have found that out of that number, in 97 cases unemployment was the major problem. The article states:

Included in the total were 112 "out-of-works" —83 heads of families and 29 single men and women... Out of this comparatively representative group, social workers found 50 cases of "serious and more or less permanent illness." Ten families so lacked clothing that children could not attend school and adults were prevented from going to clinics to get necessary treatment.

This is in the city of Montreal; of course mine sweepers on the St. Lawrence might help!

Many families were living in houses condemned by the board of health, and in 11 cases overcrowding was reported as "acute."

That is only one paragraph. There is no common sense in talking about military defence for women and children who are living under conditions such as that. I would not want the Minister of Justice to think that men die more bravely than women. The history of the world, right from the beginning, shows that women die bravely and very many times under conditions which could have been improved to such a degree as to avoid death. We have such conditions throughout Canada.

In my opinion the $13,500,000 we are going to spend to increase our defence could be better spent. I suppose we would not have got even the little bit for the blind this year, but the government would not have nerve enough to bring down $13,500,000 for increased defence, and not do something for the blind. We still have throughout Canada people who are totally incapacitated. On the same day to which I referred previously I called to see a young man who has been completely bedridden since his eleventh year. He is brave; he is intelligent and he is poverty stricken. There is nothing I can do except help him personally. Every hon. member knows of cases of that kind. But we have not the money to help people who are totally incapacitated, because we are so busy defending the women and children by increasing defence expenditure.

Then, the expenditure is useless. Thirteen and a half million dollars extra to defend Canada—why, if all the people in Canada stood along each coast and had all those finely decorated fellows with their thirteen-inch ties—and I will come to that in a minute—and their brass hats and the bagpipes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Miss MACPHAIL: I admit the bagpipes would do more than anything else to drive an enemy away.

Mr. REID: I object very strenuously to the last statement.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Speaker, I did not say who was playing the bagpipes. But I do say that if all the armed forces of Canada stood along our coasts, despite the increased military expenditures we would not be able to defend this country against any enemy who wished to attack us. When we have eleven million people in a country the size of this, we must rely upon good will—and upon good will I do rely. So, that is one person who has answered the Prime Minister's question.

Then the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was upset about the thirteen-inch tie. I was not in the house at the time so I do not know who first referred to it, but I do know that the Prime Minister stated that the homes in which the thirteen-inch ties were worn were tidier than other homes. Or was it as tidy? What about the farmers? I do not think any of them know how long their ties are; in fact not all of them have ties. Yet they are the people who produce the wealth of Canada. What about the men who come out of our mines all covered with grime; what about the people who work in our industrial plants—do they know the length of their ties? Are they less important or less loyal because of that? Did we rely upon the thirteen-inch tie boys between 1914 and 1918? I do not think so. What about the mothers of this country who are forced to remake threadbare clothing in order that their children may be clothed, who must wash and iron and scrimp and scrape in order to raise their families in tidy homes? Do they wear ties thirteen inches long? The Prime Minister was hurt that these men could not come into the house to defend themselves. Any hon. member who wants to make a speech in defence of thirteen-inch ties will have an opportunity to do so when I am finished. I have heard the leaders of both the old parties spend many hours talking about men who could not come into the house to defend themselves. Did not the leader of the silent party talk for two hours the other night about Mr. John Vallance, who cannot come into the house to defend himself?

I have always been glad I am not a member of either of the old parties because I could not vote for other than what I believe. The Prime Minister quoted some beautiful lines—"to thine own self be true." That is what I have tried to do in this house and I will continue to do it in connection with this vote. I believe, if party discipline were removed, the Prime Minister would be surprised at the number of his followers who would vote for this amendment and against an increase in the military estimates.

In my opinion the premise of all the speeches made in defence of this increase is absolutely false. Preparedness does not bring peace. Preparedness brings only preparedness and more preparedness. Everybody keeps prepared until finally the thing they have been preparing for comes, and that is not peace; it is war.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are some hon. members on the opposite side of the house who seem to think that an argument can be made by banging on their desks and boohing. On previous occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself has made appeals that order should be maintained in the house, and I trust that decorum will be maintained to-night.

In this debate we have had the fullest discussion of foreign policy that has taken place in this house in the fifteen years I have been a member. On the whole I think the debate has been carried on in a very good spirit.

May I say to the Prime Minister that our group has never made any pretensions to having a monopoly of any virtue, but we do claim to have equal rights in this house with other members. We contend that we should be able to state our convictions without having our motives impugned. I take it that we are all good Canadians in this house and although we may differ, and differ very radically, as to what the policy of this country should be, it is our responsibility to state our convictions as clearly and as strongly as we can.

I regret the nature of the very lengthy statement which the Prime Minister made in the earlier part of his address as it seems to me that he was guilty of a greater unfairness than could possibly be suggested in the wording of our resolution. I was glad to hear him practically identify social security with social services, although it seems to me that he carried the idea of social services to a rather extreme length. Certain French-speaking members tried to make out that social security had some hidden connection with communism or something else which they considered might be of a dangerous nature. Surely we are all familiar enough with the phrases that have become so common in this country, in the United States and throughout the world as not to link up social security or social services with a particular kind of political philosophy.

[Miss Macphail.]

The Prime Minister put in education as part of the social services and he included also the care of the unemployed and of the returned men. I think we must recognize that a very considerable part of the unemployment in this country was due to the after-effects of the war, and undoubtedly the disabilities of the returned men were directly due to the war. The amounts under these headings ought to be in the other column. The same thing could be said with regard to the enormous interest which we pay upon our public debt, the greater part of which was incurred because of the war. All these things should be in the war column.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that there are no estimates for war. These estimates are for defence against aggression; they are not for aggression.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was in so-called defence that the last war was fought. Everybody knows that sometimes attack is the best means of defence. We have been told by leading British statesmen that to-day the Rhine is the frontier of Great Britain. That is the way it is going to work out when another war comes.

We have had the unusual spectacle all through this debate of the great Conservative party being unrepresented in the discussion. I suppose they have the right to choose the time when they will put forward the representations of their party, but it is peculiar that on such an important matter as this they have remained silent. It is not very often that that is the case, and perhaps that gives point to this observation. Further, it is worth consideration that if certain members on the Liberal side carry out their professed intention, the government will get through its estimates only with the help of the Conservatives who are usually regarded as the imperialist party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have listened to the debates and we shall see how things work out. It is strange that in this matter the Conservatives should be so close to at least one section of the government. The Prime Minister's adroitness in making compromises may still be his undoing. Instead of pleasing everybody, he may succeed in satisfying no one.

This is undoubtedly a move in the direction of assuming our share in the defence of the empire. I suppose as such it will be for the moment satisfactory to the authorities at Westminster. At the same time, put in the form of the defence of our own Canadian shores, it may win the support of some of the people in Canada who hardly realize the serious implications of these estimates.

It is only a couple of weeks ago that the government rejected my neutrality motion. The Prime Minister said: We cannot decide in advance. Yet now we find that he is advocating a purely defence policy, with armaments sufficient only to protect our neutrality. I asked that we should remain neutral whoever the belligerents might be, and the Prime Minister only two weeks ago said that that would never do. But now he has come to the point of view that these are merely defence estimates, and that we must not do anything more than protect our neutrality. I hope this may be one of the gains of the debate.

But we are still left very much in the dark. If war should break out in Europe, will the Prime Minister state that he would not go to the help of the motherland? I think not. If he stands, therefore, for the solidarity of the empire, Canada's policy cannot remain a purely defence policy.

The Prime Minister despairs of the league as an alternative to national armaments. But let me ask, Why did the league fail? Why have we the world crisis to-day? In England they are not quite so fond of endorsing the policy of the government in power. I should like to read a very severe criticism of the Baldwin government which appeared recently in the London News Chronicle, which I believe is the London organ of Liberal opinion:

> Under a system of collective security of which Great Britain was the most powerful political member, the combined forces of peace-loving members of the league could have stayed the challenge of an aggressor.
> When the challenge came the British government broke away in an act of dramatic cowardice which brought upon Britain the contempt of the whole world and left her almost without a friend, stripped both of her political and moral prestige and weakened in her military security.
> That is why we must rearm now—and we should never cease to drive it home.

That is the voice of a considerable section of the Liberals in Great Britain. In this country the Liberals simply follow the lead of Mr. Baldwin, and are prepared to arm just as the British government is preparing to arm.

With regard to the situation in Great Britain may I read a sentence or two from the January number of Current History:

> Re-elected in 1935 upon a pacifist, strongly pro-league mandate, the cabinet was essentially interested in rearmament and the maintenance of British imperialistic interests. In one of the most amazing statements ever made by a democratic statesman, Mr. Baldwin described the dilemma in November:
> "Supposing I had gone to the country and said that Germany was rearming and that we must rearm, does anybody think that this pacific democracy would have rallied to that cry at that moment? I cannot think of anything that would have made the loss of the election, from my point of view, more certain."

An extraordinary confession! Mr. Baldwin kept silent in order to be elected, and then proceeded to put into operation a program which he knew had not been and would not be endorsed by the electorate. I am not accusing our Prime Minister of having done that, but I think my friend the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) is quite right when she asserted that had this been the issue in the last election the Liberals would not have been returned to power. And now that they are returned, they take advantage of their large majority to put over a military program of this kind.

Canada to-day is becoming defence conscious, thanks to the publicity campaign carried on by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). To-morrow Canada will become war conscious. Let me read a Canadian Press dispatch from Montreal which appeared in our papers of February 18:

> McGill University has received a communication from Colonel L. R. Lafleche, Deputy Minister of National Defence, asking that medical students be given instruction in methods of treatment of persons suffering from poison gas, Doctor A. Grant Fleming, dean of the faculty of medicine, said last night.
> The letter, containing an outline of modern methods of treatment, was referred to the medical faculty, Doctor Fleming said, and would be given due consideration.

We are now preparing bombs to drop on defenceless men, women and children, and undoubtedly we may well prepare to have bombs dropped upon us. It seems as if in absolute helplessness we just sit and watch a war come upon us. As I listened to this debate I could not but think of the situation that existed immediately prior to the last war. I looked up the Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier by Oscar Douglas Skelton. Let me read a paragraph or so which seems to be so true of the situation to-day:

> The mad rivalries of European empires and the struggles of oppressed and oppressing nationalities were bringing the world nearer the verge of war. Statesmanship appeared to be bankrupt; save for the feeble farce of the Hague and rare individual missions and mediations, the nations appeared unable to find or unwilling to seek any solution, other than the futile—

Listen:

> —futile attempt of each to make itself stronger than every other by shifting alliance and mounting armament.

Again:

For some years a vigorous press and organization campaign in the English-speaking provinces had endeavoured to convince Canadians that in leaving Britain to assume the whole burden of the empire's naval defence they were acting an ignoble part—

The very argument that we hear to-day with regard to defence in general—that if we failed to prepare we would be acting an ignoble part:

—inconsistent with either imperialist or nationalist ideals. Feeling in favour of action was growing, and now the crisis precipitated the vague sentiment. There had been little counter-propaganda. Here and there a nationalist critic had questioned the myth of British protection, or repeated Cartwright's epigram that "all that Canada owed England was Christian forgiveness," or insisted that the navy was an agency wholly of British policy. Still more rare had been the more fundamental criticism of the whole policy of armed rivalry; there was little first-hand knowledge in Canada of foreign affairs, or at least of the rivalries of European states which appropriated that title, and little likelihood that the cure would come before the disease. Sir Wilfrid had denounced the vortex of militarism.

The other day when I heard that prominent Liberals were laying a wreath on the monument of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I thought they might far better have tried to understand his position and follow his lead. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had denounced the vortex of militarism. Sir William Mulock in 1906 had declared:

This Canada of ours is the only country in the world worth living in that is not burdened with great military debts. Keep it on those lines.... Remember that this is the last spot of refuge on God's green earth where men can come and not pay tribute for the sins of their ancestors.

Already we are paying tribute for the sins of our ancestors, and if these estimates should go through we shall pile up a still greater debt and create a situation in which our children cannot inherit what we have inherited.

Let me quote a few words from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in which he spoke of the blandishments that one met with in going to London. I wish that Sir Wilfrid's protegé and successor could keep those words in mind as he goes to the imperial conference:

In this campaign, which no one could appreciate until he had been in the thick of it, social pressure is the subtlest and most effective force. In 1897 and 1902 it was Mr. Chamberlain's personal insistence that was strongest, but in 1907 and after, society pressure was the chief force. It is hard to stand up against the flattery of a gracious duchess. Weak men's heads are turned in an evening, and there are few who can resist long. We were dined and wined by royalty and aristocracy and plutocracy, and always the talk was of Empire, Empire, Empire.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I have been through a couple of rounds and came out all right. I hope to be able to do so again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The estimates do not seem to show that.

Our resolution has been characterized as a double-barrelled one. We are further told that unless we prepare to defend ourselves we are exhibiting a lack of self-respect; we are sponging on somebody else. We are told that we must fulfil our honourable obligations. I ask, what of our obligations to our own people here in Canada? We have a million people on relief; are we fulfilling our obligations to them? I think even the government cannot claim that. The best they can do is to invoke the British North America Act and hide behind constitutional difficulties. We have some 50,000 unemployed soldiers. Are we performing our obligations to them? I cannot think that we are. We have poor housing conditions. We have enormous debts that are crushing the lives out of a great many of our western farmers and making impossible recovery in many sections of this country. We can do nothing for these classes; yet no expenditure is too great and nothing is too good for those who wish to prepare for war.

A few days ago I received a very interesting copy of the Halifax Herald of January 28, in which there is a front page editorial dealing with the program of President Roosevelt. This is a quotation from the address of the president:

I see millions of families trying to live on incomes so meagre that the pall of family disaster hangs over them day by day.

I see millions whose daily lives in city and on farm continue under conditions labelled indecent by a so-called polite society half a century ago.

I see millions denied education, recreation and the opportunity to better their lot and the lot of their children.

I see millions lacking the means to buy products of farm and factory and by their poverty denying work and productiveness to many other millions.

I see one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished.

And he added:

It is not in despair that I paint you that picture. I paint it for you in hope—because the nation, seeing and understanding the injustice of it, proposes to paint it out.

The editorial comments:

What the president of the United States has said about his country applies with equal force to this country. Canada, with its population of around eleven million people, is in no better case proportionately than the neighbouring republic.

And what the president of the United States has demanded in social justice and social security for the people of his own country, is what is being demanded for the Canadian people.

I wish that this government, calling itself by the name of Liberal, would follow a lead of that kind instead of falling back on age-old methods which have in the past proved so futile.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member say how much was voted at Washington for national defence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not discussing what was voted.

Mr. DUPUIS: Oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They voted large sums. But let me say that side by side with those large sums they have also spent an enormous amount on social security—which this government does not propose to do.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yet they have unemployment in enormous numbers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The other day the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) referred to the position which I had taken during the great war, and that was one reason why I felt I could hardly let this debate close without stating my personal position. The minister himself, as he reminded us, was taken into the Union government, and that government brought conscription to this country. At that time the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was director general of war services in charge of the registration scheme. I myself at that time was the director of the bureau of social research for the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, all of which at that time happened to be Liberal. When the registration scheme was proposed, I felt that I could no longer remain silent, and I wrote this letter to the Winnipeg Free Press, under date of December 28, 1916:

Yesterday morning there came to me a circular letter asking my help in making the national service registration scheme a success. As I am opposed to that scheme, it would seem my duty as a citizen to state that opposition and the grounds on which it is based. For this end I would ask the courtesy of your columns in presenting the following considerations:

1. The citizens of Canada have been given no opportunity of expressing themselves with regard to the far-reaching principle involved in this matter.

2. Since "life is more than meat and the body more than raiment," conscription of material possessions should, in all justice, precede an attempt to force men to risk their lives and the welfare of their families.

3. It is not at all clear who is to decide whether or not a man's present work is of national importance. It is stated that the brewery workers in England are exempt. What guarantee have we that Canadian decisions will be any more sound, and who are the members of the board that decides the question of such importance to the individual?

4. How is registration or subsequent conscription, physical or moral, to be enforced? Is intimidation to be used? Is blacklisting to be employed? What other method? Is this measure to be equally enforced across the country? For example, in Quebec, or among the Mennonites in the west?

This registration is no mere census. It seems to look in the direction of a measure of conscription. As some of us cannot consciously engage in military service, we are bound to resist what—if the war continues—will inevitably lead to forced service.

I have no shame in reading to-day that statement opposing conscription, even though the reading of it was called forth by the Minister of Mines and Resources, who at that time held a responsible position in the Union government which put over conscription. My letter cost me my position. I was driven into the wilderness. I was not active in politics at that time, and up to that time had not been. Sir Wilfrid Laurier also at that time went into the wilderness.

The Minister of National Defence the other day quoted scripture in support of the government's policy. I do not belong to any church to-day, but it makes me fairly sick to hear anyone quoting the New Testament in support of war or preparation for war. I felt so strongly upon this matter while the war was on that in 1918 I sent in my resignation from the ministry of the then Methodist church. I propose to read a paragraph or two from that document. It is not easy for me to do so, but it may show what war will mean to Canada when the next war comes:

The war has gone on now for four years. As far back as 1906, I had been led to realize something of the horror and futility and wickedness of war. When the proposals were being made for Canada to assist in the naval defence of the empire, I spoke and wrote against such a policy. Since the sudden outbreak of the war, there has been little opportunity to protest against our nation and empire participating in the war. However, as the war progressed, I have protested against the curtailment of our liberties which is going on under the pressure of military necessity and the passions of war.

According to my understanding of economics and sociology, the war is the inevitable outcome of the existing social organization with its undemocratic forms of government and competitive system of industry. For me, it is ignorance, or a closed mind, or camouflage, or hypocrisy, to solemnly assert that a murder in Servia or the invasion of Belgium or the glaring injustices and horrible outrages are the cause of the war.

Nor, through the war, do I see any way out of our difficulties. The devil of militarism cannot be driven out by the power of militarism without the successful nations themselves becoming militarized. Permanent peace can come only through the development of good will. There is no redemptive power in physical force.

This brings me to the Christian point of view. For me, the teachings and spirit of Jesus are absolutely irreconcilable with the advocacy of war. Christianity may be an impossible idealism, but so long as I hold it, ever so unworthily, I must refuse, as far as may be, to participate in or to influence others to participate in war. When the policy of the state—whether that state be nominally Christian or not—conflicts with my conception of right and wrong, then I must obey God rather than man. As a minister, I must proclaim the truth as it is revealed to me. I am not a pro-German; I am not lacking, I think, in patriotism; I trust that I am not a "slacker" or a coward. I had thought that as a Christian minister I was a messenger of the Prince of Peace.

That was written twenty years ago and I have no reason to feel ashamed of the stand I took at that time, though it led me into strange paths.

More than ever before I am convinced of the futility of war; more than ever I am convinced that armaments are no insurance against war. In the present crisis it seems to me we need men of vision and faith who will strike out along altogether different lines. Unfortunately as a nation, we to-day are proposing to travel the same old road over which the nations have travelled for centuries past and which has led inevitably to disaster.

This is an important occasion in the history of Canada. It may be, as the Prime Minister suggests, that we are simply advancing a little bit further along the line of the policy adopted by his party. It may be that our armaments are not great compared with those of Europe, but I submit that we are at the crossroads and definitely choosing the road of military preparedness. I had hoped that we had learned the lessons of the last war and would undertake to strike out along new lines, getting at the causes of war and putting our faith in fair play and good will. We can do this in Canada much more readily than can most of the nations in war-ridden Europe. I believe that Canada has a wonderful chance along new lines.

The other day in our papers I read the brave words of one of the elder statesmen of Japan, Mr. Yukio Ozaki. In the midst of the frenzy and fanaticism and militarism that prevail in that country Mr. Ozaki dared to give words of warning to his people; he dared to advocate a policy of peace. Personally, I regard it as one of the great privileges of my life that two or three years ago I had the honour of being received by Mr. Ozaki in his own home at Karuizawa. He was at one time Minister of Justice, a member of parliament, and is an ex-mayor of Tokyo. Speaking at Karuizawa a few days before I met him, he said:

> We must find a new way to peace. We must search a road to justice. The world must prepare to have a world court of justice which can settle the conflicts when they arise, but by other ways than using force. The victory of the strongest won by not appealing to justice is only for the barbarous and the primitive.

We denounce some of these other nations as barbarous and primitive and we say that the world has gone mad. And it has. But why should we say that the only thing for us to do is to go mad also. That is an absurd position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, this house can laugh if it pleases. If it sees anything funny either in the interruption or in what I have been saying, it is perfectly welcome to scoff. Unfortunately—or fortunately perhaps—I have had to endure some scoffing in my time and I can take a little more, but I want to say to my fellow members, many of whom I have known for years, it does seem to me, irrespective of the way this vote goes, that we as Canadians should understand that Europe is going down, and down, and down, because it has relied on force.

A few days ago I moved a resolution that we should maintain neutrality, not because I was indifferent to the affairs of Europe but because I thought that if we could cut ourselves free we should have time to develop other policies on this continent and avoid the disaster which must overtake Europe if she pursues the policy of force. I know there are people in Europe who are just as much for peace as are any of us in this house. I know there are people in England, many of them, who voted for the peace ballot, who are just as sincere and earnest in the pursuit of peaceful methods as are any of us. I mentioned one of my friends in Japan, and there are those even in Germany and Italy, and in other countries where fascist dictatorship exists, who are still hoping for better days and still trying to witness to the faith that is in them.

I could wish that our country, so blessed in resources, so blessed in its geographical position, instead of following the lead of Europe, would rather decide that we shall work out our destiny in our own way by other and more civilized methods than the world has yet known. If at the close of this debate the estimates are adopted as they stand, I shall not be utterly discouraged, because I am confident that despite passion and party prejudice there are many in this country who are earnestly looking for some other and better way. Whatever is true of this house, I know that throughout the country there are tens of thousands of our young men and young women—many of them children of the men who fought at the front in the last war—who cherish the great hope a way may be found so that they will not be asked to sacrifice their lives as their fathers did, but rather may be able to live out a nobler and fuller life and take their part as patriotic citizens in building up in this dominion a civilization based upon peace.

PAIRS

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I was paired with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Miscellaneous.—To provide for expenses in connection with the Book of Remembrance to be placed on the altar of the memorial chamber in the Houses of Parliament, $8,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would tell us how far advanced the work is.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, the contract for the completion of the Book of Remembrance was let about five years ago, and it was then thought the book would be completed this year. Unfortunately, however, the work is of such an artistic nature it has taken longer than it was thought it would. It will now take in the neighbourhood of two more years to complete the book; that will be in 1939.

Mr. HEAPS: What will the book have cost, when it is completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The original contract was for $35,000. To that must be added this year's vote and probably a vote of a similar amount next year, making a total of $51,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is rather ironical that we should consider this vote immediately after voting the increased estimates for the Department of National Defence. Where is the work being done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the city of Ottawa. Mr. Purves is the artist, and an honorary committee works in conjunction with him.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields memorials, $51,340.

Mr. MacNEIL: What work is still under way, in connection with memorials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The work on memorials is practically completed. Before the completion of the Vimy memorial seven others had been erected, Vimy being the last of all the Canadian battlefields memorials overseas. That is one of the reasons for the reduction in the vote this year.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to place on record where they are.

Mr. MacNEIL: What proportion of this vote will be expended on other memorials either here or abroad?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This vote will be spent abroad entirely.

Mr. MacNEIL: Principally at Vimy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total cost of the Vimy memorial was approximately $1,302,806.84, it being by far the largest of all battlefield memorials.

Mr. MacNEIL: Could we have the details of this expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are as follows:

Non-recurring charges:
Auditors' expenses, $150.
Studio Maida Vale, rates, taxes, et cetera, $1,000.
Studio caretaker—salary, $300.
Repairs and maintenance studio, Maida Vale, $750.
Completion of rest house, Vimy, $4,500.
Completion of carving, tarring roads, surfacing road to rest house, et cetera, $2,165.
Chains and bronze pickets across access road to Vimy memorial, $665.
Erection tool and store shed at pump house, $165.
Fencing, pathway, et cetera, at rest house, $200.
Decorating and painting rest house—furnishings for rest room, et cetera, $1,000.
Office, Arras: rent, postage, tables, phone, fuel, light, et cetera, $1,000.
Insurance, Arras: accident, social and transport, $335.
Transport—oil, gas, repairs, et cetera, $1,665.
Mechanic—wages, $1,335.
Crating, packing and shipping materials and files to Canada, incidentals, et cetera, $5,000.
Pay and allowances, engineer in charge, $6,315.
Contingency, provide loss on exchange, $3,000.
Salaries civilian employees, $2,200.
Miscellaneous—legal expenses, et cetera, including sundry payments to be made at N.D.H.Q., $5,000.
Publication—Vimy unveiling, et cetera, $3,000.
Recurring charges:
Civilian personnel at Vimy—wages, $3,000.
Social and accident insurance, Vimy personnel, $200.
Lighting of tunnels and floodlights, $665.
Operation of rest house, telephone, stationery, cleansing materials, et cetera, $400.
Repairing fences, legal fees for prosecution, $665.
Maintenance of Vimy per arrangement with Imperial War Graves Commission (estimated), $1,665.
Maintenance of seven battlefield memorial sites in France and Belgium, other than Vimy, $5,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the names of the other memorials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Passchendaele, St. Julien, Hill 62, Vimy Ridge, Dury, Bourlon Wood, Le Quesnel and Courcelette.

Mr. HEAPS: Are all these memorials being maintained by the Canadian government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): An arrangement was made some time ago whereby the smaller sites are to be maintained by the Imperial War Graves Commission. It was thought that because of the special significance of Vimy and the fact that the land adjacent to the memorial to the extent of about 250 acres had been given to Canada by France, the memorial should be maintained by Canada. It is being maintained by our engineer working in conjunction with the war graves commission.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister gave certain items for transport and rest house. Am I to understand that facilities are being maintained for the people who visit these memorials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A rest house will be erected at Vimy.

Mr. MacNEIL: How long is it intended to maintain these facilities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will not be a rest house in the sense of being a place in which to stay.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the item for legal fees for prosecution?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will be a small expenditure, perhaps about $150 to cover legal fees in connection with possible trespassing upon the areas adjacent to the memorials.

Mr. LAWSON: Is there any estimate as to the annual cost for the maintenance of this 250 acre park site at Vimy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is under the supervision of a Canadian engineer, Major Simson, who is stationed there in charge of the maintenance of the structure and more particularly of the surrounding ground. It has been generally agreed that any horticultural work required would best be carried out by the Imperial War Graves Commission, similar to that which they are doing so well at the other Canadian war memorials in France and Belgium. Owing to the existence of the organization of the Imperial War Graves Commission in connection with the maintenance of cemeteries, it has been found that they can do the work of caring for the grounds, grass, flowers, etcetera, at these memorials far better and cheaper than it can be done by any other method. There is cooperation between our own engineer on the ground and the commission. The final arrangements have not yet been completed, but for this year we are continuing Major Simson in active supervision of the site at Vimy.

Mr. MASSEY: What steps are being taken to make sure that the grounds are being maintained constantly in good order? I was in England until the first of October and some friends of mine there who had visited the memorial on a Sunday in September reported to me that the grounds appeared in a quite dilapidated condition as a result of lunch boxes and papers being scattered all around and children running over the memorial without regard to its significance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That matter was brought to our attention and explicit instructions were given by cable that more care should be taken to see that the grounds are kept in proper order. That is one of the reasons why we desire at the present time to continue our own direct control in cooperation with the war graves commission.

Mr. MASSEY: There are many people in Canada who will never be able to visit and see the Vimy memorial because of its great distance from Canada. At Christmas time I endeavoured to find a replica of the memorial, but I was told at several shops that no replicas were available and that it was not proposed that any would be available. Is that as a result of a decision by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has never been brought to the attention of the government. I shall be very glad to look into the matter. I am informed the French government have taken certain steps in that direction.

Mr. MASSEY: I suggest to the minister that it might be valuable to have that matter looked into with a view to acting upon it.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will any portion of this vote be expended by the war graves commission in Canada to mark the graves of Canadians who have died subsequently to the war and who have been buried in plots set aside for that purpose in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that would come under the next vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could the minister give the committee the total amount spent on memorials both outside and inside Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the question refer to Canada as well as to overseas?

Mr. DOUGLAS: Can the minister give us the total amount outside Canada and the total amount inside Canada in two separate items?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have not the information for those inside Canada, but I can give the other information.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask if the minister is going to do anything about memorials in the Niagara district, where two million tourists come in every year? The province of Ontario has been ignored in almost every one of these items. Surely the government of this country can fix up the memorials of the war of 1812. I have referred to this matter in two or three sessions. There are many of these historic spots in the Niagara district, near the mouth of the Niagara river, and up the river to Chippawa and Fort Erie. At Ridgeway the province fixed up some memorial, but there are these old ruins in the Niagara district, at Fort Mississauga, at the mouth of the Niagara river, and all along up the river. The place where Laura Secord was born should be marked just as much as the battlefields in Quebec or other places. What is the idea of fixing up some battlefields with memorials and leaving other provinces with no money spent on them at all? Something ought to be done in the Niagara district. The minister said last year that he would visit the district and look into the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This question belongs to another department; it does not affect mine. In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), the memorials raised in Canada were raised chiefly by private sources. The total cost prior to November 30, 1936, for the overseas war memorial was $2,379,172.81, and to that must be added probably $100,000 to bring the cost up to date.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask the minister if anything has been done to recognize the services of Walter Allward, the sculptor and architect of the Vimy memorial, other than the payment of the usual expenses and his fee? I think we in Canada recognize that we have in Walter Allward one of the outstanding sculptors of the day and perhaps of all time. While Walter Allward belongs to Canada, he is also acclaimed to-day by the world as one of its great sculptors and artists. He may be regarded now as a world architect. I was wondering whether the government had under consideration any recognition of his services.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I desire to agree entirely with the observations of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) in reference to the wonderful work done by Walter Allward. I had the privilege of paying a tribute to him where his great monument stands on Vimy Ridge, and my hon. friend was there at the time. I feel that if any Canadian deserves recognition for his wonderful work Mr. Allward certainly does.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister did not understand the question I asked. The property I referred to is dominion government property at the mouth of the Niagara river, where the minister's troops train in the summer. It is in this department, not in the Parks branch. We have not a national park in the province of Ontario. There are two or three small parks, like the one at Pelee island. In the Niagara district there are several memorials that should be fixed up. It is all federal property. Fort George, Fort Mississauga and all these other places are on dominion government grounds; some of them are military burying grounds, and the condition of some of them is a disgrace to the people of this country. At Lundy's Lane some American soldiers are buried. I think part of that property has been taken over and is under the control of the dominion government. Ontario is being neglected almost entirely in these estimates, and yet Ontario pays 42 per cent of the taxes. What have the people on the other side of the line done? The president of the United States fixed up Fort Niagara and all the way to Lewiston, and preserved the memorials. Surely this matter can be looked into, and surely something should be done more than to put a few old slabs on trees. Had it not been for the volunteers in York and other places we might have become part of the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thought my hon. friend was referring to historic sites, but he is referring to our camp grounds at Niagara-on-the-Lake. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister give a summary of the expenses in connection with the unveiling of the Vimy memorial, and say whether any special grant was made to the Canadian Legion who had in hand the arrangements?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No request of any kind for financial assistance was received from the legion. There may be certain assistance rendered with reference to the pictures that were taken, but these have not yet been completed.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is a summary available of the expenses incurred by the dominion government in connection with the unveiling?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. The details are as follows: Canadian government, official representation, $10,750; Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission representation, $2,787.88; transportation, motor cars, accommodation, speaker's tribune, traffic control and other safety devices, loud speakers and broadcasting expenses in connection with official guests from the British isles and the continent, miscellaneous accounts, Department of External Affairs, $17,505.08; hospitality, dinner to French and English officials at Paris, $1,350.66; transportation for guard of honour, $547.56; chaplains' expenses, $2,500; invitation cards and other incidental expenses, $3,086.18; pipe band, drummers, buglers and officers, $14,321.55; military band, $8,100.21; dominion government motion picture bureau, $8,374.66. The total expenditure has been $69,323.78.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many chaplains were there at a cost of $2,500?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were four chaplains, three of whom officiated at the unveiling ceremonies at Vimy, and the fourth officiated at the service at the grave of Earl Haig in Scotland.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did they receive the $2,500 between them in addition to expenses? Did they all come from Canada or were some from overseas?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They all proceeded from Canada, and this was the total amount received by them all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Including expenses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They paid their own expenses out of the amount received. This is the total amount involved in sending them to France and England.

Mr. LENNARD: Was there any religious ceremony in connection with the unveiling of the memorial?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Officially no, but it partook very largely of the nature of a dedicatory service.

Mr. LAWSON: What are the names of the four chaplains?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The three clergymen who officiated at Vimy were Honorary Lieutenant Colonel Reverend Cecil C. Owen, of Vancouver; Honorary Lieutenant Colonel Reverend George Oliver Fallis, of Toronto; Auxiliary Bishop of Montreal, the Right Reverend A. E. Deschamps, and the clergyman who officiated in Scotland was the Reverend John Kelman, also I think of Toronto.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister tell us how the moving picture that he referred to will be handled?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that the arrangements have been made by the official government motion picture bureau. They are making at the present time final sound tests with reference to the production of the official picture. I understand that arrangements have been made in conjunction with the Canadian Legion for the distribution of the picture throughout Canada. There have been, as my hon. friend will realize, some difficulties which have delayed getting it ready.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the picture to be handled so that it will not be exploited commercially? Has the government given consideration to that point?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Such arrangements have not been made so far as I know by the government. I believe the Canadian Legion may make their own private arrangements in that regard. I do not think there will be any possibility of exploitation.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I understand it, they are government pictures, for the records?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; they are official records that were taken by the official motion picture bureau.

Mr. COLDWELL: A question on another matter. If there was no religious ceremony, why are the chaplains especially mentioned?

Mr. MASSEY: The whole ceremony was religious.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It depends upon what my hon. friend calls a religious ceremony. To my mind it was one of the most deeply religious ceremonies I have ever attended, although it might not be officially designated as such. My hon. friend will recognize certain circumstances which rendered it difficult to make it a joint religious ceremony.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was using the term the minister used.

Mr. MacNEIL: I draw attention to the fact that the department is in possession of almost priceless films which were taken during the last war and constitute, in my opinion, an important memorial of that war. May I ask how these films were made available to motion picture producers in such a way as to exploit them commercially?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that was done at all, I have no knowledge of it; it must have been done before I came into the department. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: They may have gone away, like other papers.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not know to what the hon. member is referring when he uses that term. It will be in the memory of a good many hon. members that a film was prepared most carefully with the assistance of the motion picture bureau and was handed over to the legion for distribution throughout Canada; that film went from Halifax to Vancouver, and was so shown.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is the department still in possession of the films that were taken on the battlefields in the last war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that they are being looked after by the government motion picture bureau, under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Department of National Defence, $64,411.

Mr. MacNEIL: I now ask my question with regard to the marking of graves of Canadian ex-service men who have died since the war and have been buried in plots set aside for those who served.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The matter was last dealt with by order in council P.C. 3310 of October 22, 1935, under which authority was given to the Canadian agency of the Imperial War Graves Commission to—

> . . . provide and erect headstones on the graves in Canada of each member of His Majesty's naval and military forces whose death occurred or shall occur during a period 1st September, 1921 to 31st August, 1935, both dates inclusive, under such circumstances and from such causes as would have brought the case within the scope of the Imperial War Graves Commission had such death occurred on or prior to August 31, 1921.
> The cost of such headstones completed and erected on suitable foundations not to exceed fifty dollars each. The expenditure to be chargeable to the adjustment of war claims vote.
> That deaths in Canada from war causes have occurred and are continuing at a fairly uniform rate. During 1933-34, approximately 315, and during 1934-35, approximately 335 headstones were erected on such graves.
> That provisions of previous orders in council did not include any sums for maintenance of the graves so marked.
> That in most cases this is provided locally, but in a certain number of instances some expense under this heading is unavoidable; and
> That the maintenance of these graves can be undertaken by the Canadian agency of the Imperial War Graves Commission without exceeding the maximum amount at present authorized for the erection of headstones.
> In these circumstances the minister on the advice of the deputy minister of National Defence recommends that the provisions of the orders in council mentioned be continued for the further period of three years, namely from first September, 1935, to 31st August, 1938, both dates inclusive, and that sums as may prove necessary may be allocated to maintenance provided that the total maintenance in any financial year shall not exceed the average of fifty dollars per grave as aforesaid.

Mr. MacNEIL: Did I understand that the order in council indicates whether or not these graves must be in selected plots, or whether the grave of any soldier who dies of war disabilities may be located elsewhere?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My information is that they are supposed to be in recognized military plots, but special consideration is given to cases where that is not possible.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to suggest to the minister an improvement with regard to the presentation of his estimates which might apply not only to his department but to every other. We are now considering item 271, adjustment of war claims, $64,411. If there were another column giving the number of the similar vote that is detailed in the auditor general's report for 1935-36, it would help hon. members to understand the item. I have the auditor general's report of that year, but I cannot find without a lot of difficulty the similar item two years back. The second column, of course, gives the vote for last year only. The report for that year will not be available until next year, and if we had the reference to the similar vote of two years ago we could understand the item. That applies to every department. It seems to me little more than a farce to come here to consider an item of $64,000 with nothing before it to indicate what we are talking about unless we ask the minister to take up a goodly length of time in telling us what it is all about. If we had the number in the auditor general's report of two years ago, the last one available, we could look at the item and discuss it intelligently.

Mr. LOCKHART: As regards headstones, mentioned a few minutes ago, what would be the procedure that might be taken to obtain assistance not exceeding fifty dollars on behalf of those who are not buried in certified military plots? There are odd cases where the burials are in private graves, and I am led to believe that in a few cases there was not sufficient money to provide a proper headstone. What would be the procedure to obtain assistance for the marking of such graves?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend will realize, of course, that this is limited to those who died of war disabilities. In all cases where special hardships occur, if the case is reported to headquarters here, immediate action is taken or certainly should be taken to give consideration to the matter.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Funds are available?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister indicate what portion of the $68,971 voted last year was actually expended, and what have been the expenditures for several years, say the last ten years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): 1926-27, $148,942; 1927-28, $134,741; 1928-29, $113,553; 1929-30, $88,963; 1930-31, $106,076; 1931-32, $91,323; 1932-33, $54,731; 1933-34, $56,135; 1934-35, $48,310; 1935-36, $13,864—rather, the last amount should be $54,843—the amount of $13,864 having lapsed that year.

Mr. STIRLING: There was $14,000 not spent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, about $14,000 lapsed.

Item agreed to.

Radio services—for the maintenance and operation of the Northwest Territories radio system, $318,900.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister give a general description of the item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This vote is for the maintenance and operation of the Northwest Territories and Yukon radio system with stations at the following points: Borden, Dawson, Mayo, Edmonton, Fort Smith, Fort Resolution, Fort Simpson, Fort Norman, Aklavik, Herschel, Fort McMurray, Cameron Bay, Fort Rae, Chipewyan, Goldfields, Outpost Island and North Battleford. The estimate includes items for maintenance of all present stations and the improvement of the system by the provision of the following items which are considered most essential and the minimum permissable for the efficient operation of the system: (1) additional equipment to provide ground communication for aircraft at Mayo, Yukon Territory, Dawson, Aklavik, Northwest Territories and Fort Simpson, Northwest Territories; (2) repairs and replacements for existing stations, to keep same at high standard of operating efficiency. Building repairs are always expensive owing to rapid deterioration and fuel costs are very high, wood costing up to $18 a cord and gasoline from 50 cents to $1.25 a gallon landed at stations; (3) new buildings at Fort Resolution, Chipewyan, Goldfields, Fort Rae, and repairs to other buildings.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the public make use of these facilities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; they are used extensively.

Mr. STIRLING: Is a charge made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A charge is made for commercial messages.

Mr. CHURCH: Is there censorship over the military branch of the radio department? Has anyone any right to exercise censorship in the northwest?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that there is no censorship at all.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the revenue from all these stations last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The following list gives the traffic, paid and franked during the last four years:

	Net receipts (paid traffic)	(franked traffic)
1932-33	$20,716	$11,942
1933-34	22,961	24,582
1934-35	28,284	32,296
1935-36	23,905	38,296

Mr. BENNETT: That is government traffic?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mrs. BLACK: Under what department is the radio at White Horse operated? Does the Canadian government pay the operators or does the United States pay them? I understand that the station is particularly beneficial to United States aeroplanes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The station was not established at the expense of the Department of National Defence. Its personnel assists largely in connection with Meterological reports.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the radio commission anything to do with this branch of the radio service?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is the wireless system under the National Defence department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is operated by signallers who are expert technicians, probably as good as any in the world. In this regard I believe they are the most expert in the world to-day, having had wonderful training in lonely places up north. They are rendering possibly the finest service in the department.

Mrs. BLACK: I would add my tribute; we have had these men with us for a number of years.

Mr. BARBER: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a decrease at headquarters, of $4,900 and at Borden, of $3,850; Cameron Bay, $6,450; Fort McMurray, $6,700; Chipewyan, $7,600; Fort Rae, $5,150, and Goldfields, $12,850. The increases are:

Dawson, $5,850.
Mayo, $2,100.
Edmonton, $20,650.
Fort Smith, $9,900.
Fort Resolution, $10,350.
Fort Simpson, $550.
Fort Norman, $3,050.
Aklavik and Herschel, $1,000.
Outpost Island, $1,350.
North Battleford, $14,900.

Mr. BARBER: Why North Battleford?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because that is in communication by radio with Goldfields.

Mr. BARBER: Is that $20,000 at Edmonton for new equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mostly for new equipment.

Mr. MacNICOL: What was the deficit in the radio branch for 1936-37?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The branch is run not as a commercial undertaking but more for public service. One service is entirely free, franked as between one department of government and another, such as the meteorological service, and in other cases charges are made. It is, therefore, not on a paying basis but the service is very valuable.

Mr. MacNICOL: No attempt is made to operate it on a paying basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there any revenue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver:) Yes. Last year, 1935-36, the revenue was $23,905 as compared with franked service amounting to $38,296.

Item agreed to.

Militia services—
Cadet services, $140,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: For what reason has the minister cut down the appropriation for cadet services? I may be wrong, but my recollection is that last year the house applauded the increase in the appropriation. I, for one, am strongly in accord with the purpose of this vote. During the last half-dozen or more years there has been an agitation in the country in opposition to cadet training. In my time I have had something to do with cadet training, and my observation has always been that youth benefited very materially by such training. During the last few years someone has occasionally got on the school board with apparently sufficient influence to break up the system of cadet training, and this has always struck me as a retrograde step. A short time ago I attended a meeting of sea cadets under the control of the department and was greatly impressed with the way in which these young men conducted themselves, their civility, and the manner in which they responded to discipline. All along the line I was very much pleased with the results obtained from the money spent by the department, in that respect at any rate, in the training of sea cadets. Here the minister is going back on that, cutting the vote from $150,000 to $140,000. I should like to have seen him increase it so that more young men could have the benefit of cadet training, particularly in these times when so many are standing on the street corners learning nothing, whereas if there were facilities to train them as they should be trained the country would benefit all along the line. I would ask the minister how it is he has cut this vote by $10,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad indeed to answer. The service rendered has not been interfered with in the least. Last year it was found that on the basis on which the grants were made the amounts voted were not all expended. The same service can be given this year for the same number of cadets for a less amount of money. At the end of the school year, August 31, 1936, the number of cadets enrolled was 82,727 as compared with 82,373 at the close of the previous year. In other words, there was actually an increase of nearly 400 in the number of cadets, although several units were closed. As my hon. friend knows, this is based upon a grant of one dollar for senior cadets only, between the ages of fifteen and eighteen. No allowances are made in respect of junior cadets, that is boys between twelve and fifteen. They are, of course, given as much assistance as possible, but no grant is intended for the instructors in connection with junior cadets. The grant is one dollar a cadet for those who qualify at the end of the year and pass the examination for fitness, and the instructors get the grant according to the number trained and qualified.

Mr. TOLMIE: How many of these are in British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall give the number for all the provinces for the last two years. These are for the school year ending August 31:

Nova Scotia	1,973	1,789
Prince Edward Island	836	860
New Brunswick	2,309	2,130
Quebec	49,216	50,193
Ontario	21,861	22,029
Manitoba	1,914	1,607
Saskatchewan	1,290	1,243
Alberta	1,315	1,118
British Columbia	1,659	1,758

Mr. CHURCH: This cadet item is reduced by $10,000. I do not see why this item is selected for a cut almost every year. One only has to look at what is happening in the cities and towns of Canada to-day where these cadet services have been practically abolished. If you are going to have a skeleton militia you must have some complementary organization, namely the cadet services. The cadets are not a military organization as has been contended by some pacifists in this country. The pacifists are doing the country a disservice. The first duty of a citizen is to protect the country. The pacifists are willing to take an oath of allegiance to His Majesty the King, and they pray for the king; they are something like the Christian Scientists who refuse to use the means the Lord has given. I am opposed to any reduction in this item. I have been a member of the board of education in Toronto and I have seen the excellent results of this training. It teaches manliness, courtesy, respect for authority, and many qualities needed for success in life. The board of education branch of the London county council started out on a pacifist career a few years ago, but now they have gone back to the former condition. They refused to allow the Royal Air Force to have anything to do with the cadet services but they found as a result that education was not advanced at all.

In the big cities of this country where many parents are on relief and have no money the children are running the streets. An investigation has been going on for three weeks regarding the Guelph reformatory, where there are one hundred and fifteen children sixteen years of age and one hundred and seventy aged seventeen. The evidence of some of the teachers was that had these children had cadet training, many of them would not have been roaming the streets, travelling around in motor cars and so on. Cadet training is necessary for and complementary to the work of the board of education. The London county council in England are putting back cadet training, not for war purposes but because of its physical benefits. It was started in Canada away back in the lacrosse days when the cadets played lacrosse and other outdoor games. That has all been abolished and now they are out on the streets smoking cigarettes. The reports of the Ontario government and the police department show that, where they have not cadet training, a large number of these young people from fourteen to eighteen years of age get into trouble. The relation of cause and effect is to be seen in this. The cadet services were a blessing to the school boards of Ontario, and to the poorer boys who were not able to join in sporting events because they had no money. I know some families who have been in Toronto many years and never had anyone in trouble. I got three letters to-day from families in my constituency having boys fifteen, sixteen and seventeen years of age in this institution at Guelph, and one told me that if they had had the cadet service and some physical training they would not have got into trouble. The Y.M.C.A. do the work to some extent, but the boys have to pay fees there.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the government that stops the cadet training; it is the municipalities.

Mr. CHURCH: It is a mistake. The school boards are starved enough these days. The provinces have been allowed by this parliament to take the income tax; over $2,600,000 has been taken from Toronto and $800,000 given back, and it will be necessary to collect the difference by adding to the real estate taxes. This country which has been spending nearly $400,000,000 surely can spend a few dollars to give the school boards throughout the country a little grant towards these services which I say are necessary and which many leaders in public life say teach qualities which make for success in life.

Mr. BENNETT: The government cannot force the schools to undertake cadet training.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was going to point out to the hon. member just what the leader of the opposition has said. Not one of these units has been disbanded by the government. They are disbanded at the request of school boards not desirous of having the service. I can assure the hon. members that in the next year the same service will be provided as has been provided in the last several years. There will be no diminution of service unless desired by the school board concerned.

Mr. Chairman, as there seems to be some disposition to discuss the item further, I would ask that it stand, and would move that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

Monday, February 22, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

*MILITARY SERVICE ACT

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Is the "Military Service Act, 1917," imposing conscription, still in force?

2. What were the statements made by the Right Honourable Sir Robert Borden and the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier in reply to this question in the House of Commons, after the great war?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, may I give an oral answer to this question? The same question is asked almost every session, although the answer is very clear. The Military Service Act, 1917, is spent. It ceased to be in force after demobilization, following the conclusion of the war and the completion and fulfilment of the consequential provisions of the act. It is noted as being spent in the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, volume 5, appendix 1. The French word is périmée. I do not see why periodically this question is being asked.

So far as the second part of the question is concerned, Sir Wilfrid Laurier died before the first session following the war, so that he could not make any statement about it. Sir Robert Borden may have made statements, but I do not know about them.

WHARFAGE AND HANDLING OF GRAIN AT QUEBEC PORTS

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What revenue was received by the government during the year 1936 from the ·06 wharfage per ton on grain received into the private elevators of Sorel?

2. Since when have wharfage charges been made on grain received in the port of Sorel, and what amount was collected in this connection during 1936?

3. What are the rates of wharfage charges on grain in the ports of: (a) Sorel; (b) Quebec; (c) Montreal?

4. What revenue was received by the government during 1936 from wharfage on grain received in the ports of: (a) Sorel; (b) Quebec; (c) Montreal?

5. What quantity of grain, in bushels, was received and stored, during the year 1936, in the ports of: (a) Sorel; (b) Quebec; (c) Montreal?

6. What is the storage capacity for grain, in bushels, in the ports of: (a) Sorel; (b) Quebec; (c) Montreal?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $8,696.18.

2. October 1, 1936. $8,696.18.

3. (a), (b) and (c). Six cents per ton of 2,000 pounds.

4. (a) Sorel, $8,696.18; (b) Quebec, $12,019.14; (c) Montreal, $138,574.70.

5. (a) Sorel, 22,751,693 bushels; (b) Quebec, 6,111,765 bushels; (c) Montreal 79,404,-903 bushels.

6. (a) Sorel, 3,000,000 bushels; (b) Quebec, 4,000,000 bushels; (c) Montreal, 15,162,000 bushels.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE INSURANCE RATES

Mr. TUCKER:

1. What were the original insurance rates on cargo and ships on the Hudson Bay route?

2. When, and by how much have such rates been reduced up to the present?

3. How do such rates now compare with similar rates on the St. Lawrence route?

4. Is the government taking any steps to have the insurance rates on the Hudson Bay route reduced to a parity with those on the St. Lawrence route?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Insurance rates on cargo: This is entirely a matter of competition and is not subject to additional premium for the suspension of the North American Warranty.

On ships: In 1930 the premium for the suspension of the warranty was 60 shillings per cent on the insured value, plus 2 shillings per ton on the gross registered tonnage. On a vessel valued at £10 a ton, this works out at 4 per cent in respect of vessels passing Cape Chidley inwards on and after 10th August and leaving last loading port in Hudson Bay on or before 30th September.

These rates are in every case subject to the proviso that vessels should be properly fitted with and equipped for the use of wireless direction finding apparatus. In 1932 further reductions were made in the case of vessels equipped with the gyro compass, in addition to wireless direction finding apparatus.

2. Up to 1936 rates have been reduced annually, and for 1936 the rates were 17 shillings 6 pence on the insured value, plus 1 shilling 6 pence per ton on the gross registered tonnage in respect of vessels equipped with gyro compasses.

For example—(a) In 1932 a ship of 5,000 tons gross valued at £50,000 and insured against all risks would have paid in 1932 and 1933, a sum of £1,500, in 1934, £1,250, and in 1935, £937.10s., and in 1936, £625.

(b) If without a gyro compass, the same ship would have paid in 1932 and 1933, £1,750, in 1934, £1,500, and in 1935 and 1936, £1,125.

Opening date of season to be altered from August 10th to August 5th, subject to provision that no vessel to pass Cape Chidley between August 5th and August 10th until advised by Patrol Ship "N. B. McLean" that it is safe to do so.

Closing date without surcharge extended from October 7th to October 10th but surcharge of 25 per cent will be maintained between October 11th and October 15th.

3. Rates to Churchill estimated at approximately 1¼ per cent in excess of rates charged on the St. Lawrence route.

4. By strong representations from the Canadian government to the imperial shipping committee, these rates have been reduced annually up to the present time and this policy is being continued.

UNLOADING OF COAL AT PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve - Rosemount):

1. Has the government reached a decision upon the question of permitting coal dealers to unload, in the port of Montreal, at points between Boulevard Pie IX and the works of the Canadian Vickers Company, or further east?

2. Have there been negotiations upon this question?

3. If so, with what results?

Mr. HOWE: No representations have been received.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT

Mr. MacNICOL:

1. How many airplanes have been purchased by or for the Department of National Defence from Great Britain, i.e. from the government or British manufacturers, in the twelve months previous to February 1, 1937?

2. How many of the said airplanes were sent to the Dominion air force at Trenton, Ontario?

3. How many flying hours have been credited to each of the said planes that were sent to Trenton?

4. Are any of the said planes defective? If so, how many?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. (a) Four Blackburn "Shark II" torpedo-spotter reconnaissance aircraft were ordered in 1935 but were delivered during the twelve months previous to February 1, 1937. Three aircraft of the same type were ordered in April, 1936; delivery of these has not yet been made.

(b) Six Westland "Wapiti IIA" day bomber aircraft (used) were purchased from the air ministry in 1935, and delivered in Canada during the twelve months previous to February 1, 1937.

2. Three of the Shark aircraft referred to in (a) above.

3. Eight hours, six and one-half hours and five hours respectively for the three aircraft.

4. Some not unexpected difficulties have arisen, partly due to the Canadian winter climate and partly to inexperience of this equipment on the part of the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel. These matters are being righted.

PENITENTIARIES—NUMBER OF PRISONERS AND COST OF MAINTENANCE

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How many prisoners are there in each of the penitentiaries in Canada?

2. What is the cost of maintenance, per capita, of prisoners in each penitentiary?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. On January 31st, 1937, there were the following number of prisoners in the respective penitentiaries, exclusive of those on the register but not actually in the penitentiary:

Kingston	719
St. Vincent de Paul	883
Dorchester	364
Manitoba	291
Saskatchewan	390
British Columbia	275
Collin's Bay	202
Total	3,124

In addition to the above there were 123 convicts on the register of the different penitentiaries but not included in the above total, as follows:

Kingston	41
St. Vincent de Paul	45
Dorchester	13
Manitoba	4
Saskatchewan	15
British Columbia	5
Total	123

2. Kingston	$1.74
St. Vincent de Paul	1.85
Dorchester	2.11
Manitoba	2.84
British Columbia	3.58
Saskatchewan	2.56
Collin's Bay	4.43
All Penitentiaries	2.33

Year ending March 31st, 1936.

BORSTAL SYSTEM

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was an investigation made into the workings of the Borstal system in England by the Department of Justice?
2. If so, with what results?
3. Are any steps being taken this session to give effect to the installation of such a system for the youth of Canada in order to improve present antiquated conditions as to youth.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes.
2. The report and study of the Borstal system in England is contained in the annual report of the superintendent of penitentiaries tabled in the House of Commons, February 10th, 1936.
3. It is not anticipated that such steps will be taken to give effect to the installation of this system until the report of the commission to investigate the penal system of Canada has been presented.

ANTHRACITE COAL COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was the total cost of the Tory commission to investigate coal in Canada?
2. What sums were paid to commissioner, counsel, and other officers connected therewith?
3. What is being done to give effect to the findings of the said report?
4. Why did not such an inquiry cover a policy of a national coal supply for Canada as adopted by resolution of this house in 1926-27?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $22,246.50. (To February 18th, 1937).
2. Remuneration and expenses of commissioner, $9,364.95; of counsel, $2,903.77; of other officers, $5,320.91.
3. Consideration is being given to recommendations made in report which was received on February 3rd, 1937.
4. The inquiry was held to deal with complaints that conditions prejudicial to the public existed in connection with the importation and distribution of anthracite coal.

NEW BRUNSWICK, UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has the federal government contributed $33,000 monthly to the New Brunswick provincial government in lieu of relief during the year 1936?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

2. If not, what amount was contributed?
3. How was the above amount apportioned to the different counties, towns and cities in the province?

Mr. ROGERS:

One and two. The amounts of the monthly grants-in-aid authorized for the purpose of assisting the Province of New Brunswick in discharging its responsibilities relative to the relief of necessitous persons within its borders for the fiscal year 1936-37 are as follows: April, May and June, $37,187.50; July, August and September, $33,468.75; October, November and December, $33,468.75; January, February and March, $33,468.75.

3. The apportionment of the monthly grant-in-aid within the province is left to the discretion of the provincial authorities and is not a matter of record with the dominion.

BIG BRAS D'OR, N.S., WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What was the total amount of expenditure in respect to wharf construction at Big Bras d'Or, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, in 1936?
2. Who was the foreman, and who was in charge of the work?
3. To whom, and what amounts were paid for the following: (a) wages; (b) materials; (c) supplies?
4. If any balance remains unpaid, what is the amount of such balance, and to whom is this, if any, owing?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. $5,575.70.
2. (a) K. McKay, (b) Work done under supervision of District Engineer at Halifax, N.S.
3. (a) K. McKay, foreman, $505; John Squires, $291.37; J. F. McDonald, $192.75; J. A. McDonald, $178.35; Edward Squires, $9.60; Alister McDonald, $9.60; A. Stephenson, $2.40; R. McKenzie, $1.80; Archie Dunlop, $52.80; Jack Squires, Jr., $15.45; John McDonald, $50.40; J. F. McKenzie and team, $28; John Morrison, $70.80; John Campbell, $60.60; Abel Stevens, $106.80; Nelson Morrison, $32.40; James Campbell, $41.40; Alex. McRae, $34.80; Norman Morrison, $8.10; Fraser McLean, $21; Malcolm McAulay, $3.60; Gordon Stevenson, $7.20; Alex. McLean, $30; D. M. McKay, $2.40; Edmund McDonald, $14.40; John McLennan, $14.40; James Morrison, $7.20; total, $1,792.62.

3. (b) and (c), Norman McLean, ballast poles, $13; Malcolm McAulay, spruce, etc., $43.44; Willie McDonald, ballast poles, $25; Alex. Y. Morley, trucking, $51.38; Neil McKinnon, lumber and trucking, $169.86; Canada Creosoting Co. Ltd., lumber and freight, $1,994.69; Alex. McRae, ballast poles, $9; Alex. Morley, trucking, $12; Bethune's Garage, trucking, $25; Frank A. Bill & Son, Ltd., hardware, $401.08; J. F. McKenzie, logs, $52.64; W. D. Grant, trucking $27.15; William Faye, hauling ballast, $212.50; John Squires, Jr., hauling stone, $215; The Sydney Foundry & Machine Works, $59.90; R. J. Fife, planks, $53.85; R. Musgrave & Sons, blacksmithing, $408.86; Gordon Stevenson, car hire, $3.50; Rod. McLeod, hiring of boat, $2; K. McKay, disbursements, $3.23; total, $3,783.08.

Grand total, $5,575.70.

4. Work completed; no balance remains unpaid.

MOOSE JAW, SASK., ARMOURIES

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. Have the armouries at Moose Jaw recently been, in whole or in part, destroyed by fire?

2. If so: (a) what are the details of the damage; (b) what arrangements are being made for repairs; (c) have tenders been called for in respect of such repairs; (d) if so, by what firms or persons were tenders submitted, and what are the details of such tenders; (e) have any contracts for such repairs been awarded, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Yes.

2. Preliminary report received is to the effect that the north end of the building is completely gutted, and estimated structural damage involved about $40,000.

Further details yet to be reported, and as soon as received, the question as to what steps required to carry out the necessary repairs will be immediately considered.

CANADA GAZETTE—LIST OF REGISTRARS OF ELECTORS

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. By whom was the king's printer requested to insert the list of registrars of electors in Canada Gazette of January 16, 1937?

2. What was the date of this request?

3. Was the king's printer requested to hold the publication of the list of registrars of electors until the month of March next?

4. What were the actual expenses incurred in the printing of the list of registrars of electors in the Canada Gazette of January 16 last, for (a) typesetting (b) paper, presswork, overhead, etc.?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Dominion franchise commissioner, but no date requested for insertion;

2. January 12th, 1937.

3. No.

4. (a) and (b)—cost not appreciable in amount and not susceptible of calculation in items stated.

MONT-JOLI, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

When, and where was the inquiry held, relative to the dismissal of E. Levesque, postmaster at Mont-Joli, Rimouski county, as mentioned in the minister's answer, reported in Hansard of February 4, 1937?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Decision to change postmaster was reached following an enquiry conducted by the district director of postal services, Quebec, March-April, 1936, in connection with a parcel mailed at Mont Joli prepaid with previously used stamps, and related irregularities.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Has the governor in council, under section 6 of the National Harbours Board Act, 1936, transferred to the National Harbours Board any ports for administration, management and control, other than those of Halifax, Saint John, Chicoutimi, Quebec, Three Rivers, Montreal and Vancouver?

2. If so, what are these other ports and upon what date were they so transferred?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

*ST. LAWRENCE RIVER MARINE EMPLOYEES

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. What are the names, occupations and domiciles of the individuals employed by the Department of Marine, during 1936, on the St. Lawrence river, on dredges or icebreakers?

2. What is the number of persons employed, in said department, in any capacity, either temporarily or permanently, during the same period?

3. By whom was each of these individuals recommended for employment?

Mr. HOWE: This question involves names and records of over 5,000 employees in the Department of Marine. It would be necessary to search the records for the last thirty or thirty-five years to ascertain who recommended these employees. This would be a practically impossible task, one which certainly could not be completed for presentation at this session, and probably not at the next.

Question dropped.

RICHELIEU RIVER IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Has the government spent the full amount contained in the special supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, and reading as follows: "Richelieu river; improvement of river and Chambly canal system, $500,000"?

2. If not, how much of same was spent?

3. By what department of the government was that expenditure made?

4. Was the work done by day labour or by contract?

5. If by contract, was it allotted by tender?

6. If by tender, who were the tenderers, and what was the respective amount of each tender?

7. Who were the successful tenderers, and what is the domicile or head office of each?
8. Has the work contemplated by such tender been completed?
9. If not, how much of that work remains to be done?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No.
2. $9,844.90 to February 17, 1937.
3. Public Works.
4. Preparatory work done only, such as surveys, borings, preparation of plans, etc.
5 to 9. Answered by No. 4.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NEW EQUIPMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

1. What sum of money is being spent by Canadian National Railways for new equipment?
2. What are the different classes of equipment and quantities of each?
3. With what companies have the orders been placed?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Approximately $17,400,000.
2. 300 refrigerator cars, 300 gondola cars, 3,000 box cars, 15 snow ploughs, 14 flat cars of 40 tons capacity, 44 flat cars of 50 tons capacity, 50 first-class coaches, 10 mail and express cars, 10 baggage cars.
3. Canadian Car Foundry Company, Eastern Car Company, National Steel Car Corporation, Canadian National Railway shops.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COMMISSIONS UNDER PUBLIC INQUIRIES ACT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many commissions have been appointed by the present government since they took office, under the Public Inquiries Act?
2. Who are the commissioners in each case?
3. What was the approximate cost of each commission?
4. Were any of the findings of any of these commissions given effect to?

DISMISSAL OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. How many civil servants were discharged from their duties from November, 1935, to January, 1937?
2. How many in each department?

SEASONAL STAFF AT CHURCHILL

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. How many men were employed between the 1st day of June and the 31st day of December, 1936, on the seasonal or temporary staff at the port of Churchill?
2. What were their names and home addresses, and on whose recommendation were they appointed?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled herewith.

[Mr. Gariepy.]

ROYAL COMMISSIONS

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many commissions appointed by the present government are there in Canada at the present time?
2. What different matters are they inquiring into?
3. What has been the cost of each to date?
4. What have the legal fees of each commission amounted to up to the present time?

Mr. RINFRET: This question is similar to question number 15, in the name of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), which was allowed to stand to-day as an order for return. I ask that this one also be allowed to stand, both questions to be answered together.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MONT JOLI, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

For a copy of the report of the investigation relating to the dismissal of Etienne Levesque, postmaster at Mont Joli, Rimouski county.

WHARFAGE DUES AND CHARGES

Mr. GARIEPY:

For a copy of all regulations, resolutions, orders in council, passed by the government since September 1, 1936 to date, relative to wharfage dues, and all charges in connection with wharves or properties belonging to the national ports, or to any other port or wharf owned, administered or controlled by the government or the national harbours board.

EUROPEAN WAR PENSIONS TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

For a return showing:
1. The complete list of European war pensions paid to government employees in Ottawa, with class rating.
2. In what department employed, and at what salary or wage.
3. The complete list of army officers holding permanent appointments, with their officia. title, who are receiving European war pensions.
4. What salary, separate from pensions, is paid to each.

Mr. POWER: I submit that it would be almost impossible to comply with an order such as this. I have before me an extract from page 590 of Hansard of February 15, 1934, dealing with a question almost identically the same which had been asked by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard). In 1933 a return had been brought down by the then Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), and when the question was repeated in 1934 the hon. gentleman said:

Mr. Cahan: A year ago the hon. member made a similar inquiry and an order for return was made. It has been impossible during the year to obtain anything like a satisfactory return to that order, although to-day I have laid on the table of the house the best information we could obtain. During the present session I have laid on the table of the house sixteen portfolios containing the names of between 99,000 and 100,000 persons receiving pensions. To ascertain who of all those in the public service of Canada are receiving such pensions is impossible by mere comparison of names. It means that each department must send to every employee in the public service, permanent or temporary—

Mr. Bennett: Including those in foreign countries.

Mr. Cahan: —to ascertain whether that person is one of those 99,000 or 100,000 persons whose names are mentioned in the sixteen portfolios I produced. It is impossible to answer the question now, and the departments report that it is impossible to prepare an answer in less than ten or twelve months or perhaps more. Therefore I ask the hon. gentleman if he would drop that question under the circumstances.

In view of the fact that an attempt has been made already to secure similar information which it was found impossible to obtain at the end of one year, I suggest that the hon. member drop his request for this order.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to point out that the return showing the names of all persons in this country receiving pensions was filed after much consideration. I think the original motion was made by Mr. Lucas.

Mr. POWER: No, by Mr. Garland of Bow River.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was Mr. Lucas. In answering the question it was necessary to table sixteen portfolios. The suggestion was made at that time that any hon. member who had any particular name in mind could refer to the return in order to obtain the information he desired. It was only after much consideration and grave doubt that this return of the names of all those receiving pensions in Canada was filed.

Mr. POULIOT: The present government will decide for itself.

Question dropped.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

For a return showing:

1. What amounts, if any, were paid as reparations to Canada by Germany under annex I to section 1 of part VIII of the treaty of Versailles: (a) to civilians; (b) to civilian corporations; (c) to Armenians; (d) to ex-prisoners of war.

2. If the fund has been depleted.

3. What balances remain to be allotted.

4. Under what status the fund is presently held.

Mr. RINFRET: I shall endeavour to give the hon. gentleman the information he seeks, but I must make a reservation in connection with the way in which his question is put. These reparations were not paid by Germany exactly as the hon. member suggests in his question, nor were the payments distributed in the manner indicated. However, I shall endeavour to give the hon. gentleman exact information covering the subject.

Motion agreed to.

ST. ANN'S, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to refer to the approval given on February 1 for a return of certain papers from the Post Office Department. That was twenty-two days ago and I was wondering if the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) would be kind enough to check up this matter.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): I shall be very glad to look into the matter immediately. I understood this matter was taking some little time but I hope to be able to table the information very soon.

Mr. LOCKHART: No searching should be required, because all the papers should be on file.

FARM PLACEMENT SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Information continues to come to me that certain farmers who come under the farm placement scheme have not yet received the remuneration agreed upon. I would like to ask the minister if he can give any assurance to the house that immediate steps will be taken to reimburse these people.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was good enough to give me notice of this question. I may say in reply that all payments to farmers in connection with this plan are made directly by the provincial governments. I am sure my hon. friend appreciates the difficulty of administering such a plan over such a wide area. The subject matter of this question has already been brought to the attention of the government of Saskatchewan. On February 9 a report was received that all payments due up until December 31, 1936, had been forwarded where the recipients had complied with the regulations, and further assurance was given that all future payments would go out regularly.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Cadet services, $140,000.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister to tell us how much of this money is spent in each of the provinces?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I have the numbers enrolled in the different provinces; on August 31st, 1936: Nova Scotia, 1,789; Prince Edward Island, 860; New Brunswick, 2,130; Quebec, 50,193; Ontario, 22,029; Manitoba, 1,607; Saskatchewan, 1,243; Alberta, 1,118; British Columbia, 1,758; total, 82,727.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the government exercise any supervision to see that this money is spent for the purposes for which it is voted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The moneys are payable on the certificate of the inspecting officer. Instructors in the permanent force are in contact with the school instructors, and the grant is based on the number of cadets who qualify. It applies to cadets between fifteen and eighteen years only.

Mr. HEAPS: I was wondering if any supervision was exercised by the government over the expenditure of the money. Are any reports made to the department showing how the money was spent, or is an examination made on behalf of the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The district officers commanding get reports from the officers of every unit in the dominion, and these reports come to the department here.

Mr. BENNETT: The other day the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who is not present at the moment, asked a question, and I think it might be well if the minister would explain that the government's curtailment of the grant this year from $150,000 to $140,000 is not a matter of government policy but is because the larger sum is not required through municipalities having declined further to utilize cadet services. If that were on the record the hon. member for Broadview would have the explanation he sought the other day.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The right hon. gentleman is correct. The government has not been responsible for the disbanding of one single unit this past year. Several units have been disbanded, but not at the instigation of the government, and although several units have been disbanded the actual number enrolled at the present time is about 400 in excess of a year ago.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the suggestion made to increase the vote by $10,000? Apparently nobody would have any objection to that.

Mr. SPENCE: Had this item passed I would not have had a word to say about it. I am not condemning the minister for reducing the item by $10,000 because I assume the explanation is that there is no demand from the public schools for the money. I should be delighted to see the minister increase the grant by $500,000, if for no other reason than to assist private schools and colleges. Take, for instance, the De la Salle organization and St. Andrew's College in Toronto, two of the best drilled corps in this country, equal almost to the Kingston cadets. They are well dressed and well drilled, and are an inspiration to everybody who sees them on parade. We are not spending half enough money on cadets. The cadet services should be encouraged, and if the public schools do not want the money let the private schools in any part of this country have it. The militia regiments should also get a little more money to encourage them to have a cadet corps in connection with every regiment. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that cadet training should be encouraged because it is the sort of training that makes men out of the boys. To see them on parade is a beautiful sight, and everyone who sees them applauds them. I do not think we are spending nearly enough money on the cadets, and anybody who criticizes the expenditure of a few dollars for this purpose has very little to do. I understand that only about one dollar per head is given to the cadets.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not for all cadets, only those between fifteen and eighteen years of age.

Mr. SPENCE: It does not work out to one cent an hour for the training they put in, and their uniforms are not paid for by the defence department but by private interests, I believe. Does this department provide the uniforms for the cadets of De la Salle or St. Andrew's College in Toronto? They are the two organizations I know best.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad indeed to hear the observations of my hon. friend. May I say that the department does not purchase the uniforms, and the cadets do not receive the one dollar. It goes to the instructors.

Mr. SPENCE: Yes, I realize that.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to know what explanation the minister has to offer for the fact that there are 400 more cadets and yet the vote is $10,000 less.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The increase in numbers is from 82,373 to 82,727. A number of units have been disbanded. It is probable they were very small units, and it is possible that some of the larger units may have more cadets this year than a year ago. May I assure my hon. friends who have made inquiries, that the total amount voted last year for this purpose was not expended, and the same amount of training will be carried on under this reduced vote as was done with the larger vote last year. There will be no curtailment whatsoever in that regard.

Mr. POULIOT: On Friday last the hon. member for Broadview or some other member suggested that this vote be increased by $10,000, and the minister said he would think it over. I wonder what he has decided in the meantime.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry that my hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not say I would think it over. If I were satisfied that we could not give the same service with this reduced vote I should gladly think it over, but $28,307 of last year's vote was unexpended. We can therefore give the same service and the cadets will have the same opportunities under this vote as under the larger vote last year.

Mr. HEAPS: No requests for cadet training last year were turned down?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, if this vote were for physical training I would not object to it. Indeed I would like to see not $140,000 but something like a million dollars divided among the provinces for physical training, either under the Department of National Health or under the provincial educational departments. I am speaking from experience. I know as a matter of fact that this is not used for physical training, that the cadet grant is very largely looked upon simply as found money, and the boys who parade often do so just for a month or two in order to qualify for the grant.

The question which I rose to ask is this: Last year in the province of Saskatchewan, with which I am familiar, the number of cadets was 1,243. I should like to know what the expenditures were in salaries for military district No. 12 in connection with the cadet services. What salaries did the employees of the Department of National Defence receive in connection with cadet services in military district No. 12?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amounts are not broken down in the figures that have been supplied me by the provinces. I have only the number of cadets in each province. I shall be very glad, however, to get the information as far as possible for my hon. friend later on.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister know what the expenditure was in military district No. 12 for supervision and inspection of cadets apart from the grant made for the number of cadets per head? We know, of course, that at one dollar per head it would be $1,243.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was $5,711 for pay and allowances for three instructors.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where were the instructors located, what amount was paid to each of them, and what are their names?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Sanderson, A. R., $2,153.50; Cummings, W., of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, $1,642.50; and Joyner, C., of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, $1,916.25.

Mr. COLDWELL: Were there any travelling expenses in addition?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. They are included in these total estimates. They are not shown individually.

Mr COLDWELL: How many corps would they inspect, and where were the corps located?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that twenty-eight units is the total in Saskatchewan, and between the three instructors they would, I assume, all be inspected.

Mr. COLDWELL: I just wondered how many days were occupied in inspecting these cadet corps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot answer that. When the instructors were not discharging this particular duty they would be engaged in other work whether for cadets or district headquarters.

Mr. COLDWELL: I may tell the minister that when they inspect corps in the cities they can hold six or seven inspections a day. Some hon. member says they can do no such thing, but I know that an inspection in my institution used to last about three-quarters of an hour one day a year, so I know precisely what I am talking about. What I am trying to point out is that in my opinion this grant is a wasteful one, that if it is to be used for physical training we could use it to much better advantage in another connection. I am objecting to the expenditure not only on the ground of military training but in the public interest on the ground of wastefulness, because I am convinced from my own experience that as used now it is a wasteful expenditure.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree to a certain extent with what was said by the hon. member who has just spoken. If this vote is not for military purposes, I do not see why it should not be transferred to the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could we have the location of these twenty-eight corps in Saskatchewan?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not that information with me, but I shall be glad to get it for the hon. member.

Miss MACPHAIL: From what parts of Canada have requests for grants ceased to come?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The decreases in cadet detachments are: Alberta, three; British Columbia, one; Nova Scotia, five; Ontario, seventeen; Prince Edward Island, one; Quebec, twenty-five; Saskatchewan, eight; Manitoba, two, or a total of sixty-two detachments.

Miss MACPHAIL: Those are discontinued?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is Mr. Sanderson the physical training instructor in the Regina normal school, and is this payment really for the work he does there? I may say that the work Mr. Sanderson is doing in that institution is excellent, but it is not only military work. I think that point should be made clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am unable to answer the hon. member's question. The instructor is shown here as "sergeant-major instructor A. R. Sanderson of the R.C.R." My hon. friend will probably know better than I whether Mr. Sanderson is doing other things as well.

Mr. MacINNIS: Have there been any increases in units, and if so in what provinces?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, in three provinces: New Brunswick, one; Ontario, one; Saskatchewan, one.

Mr. SPENCE: When the minister was reading out the amount spent in each province, I noticed that Ontario is spending about $20,000 and Quebec about $50,000. I am not at all objecting to that, but I should like to know how it comes about.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I correct the hon. member. In that statement I did not give the amount spent; I gave the number of cadets in each province.

Miss MACPHAIL: The fact that seventy-two units throughout Canada have been disbanded—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Sixty-two detachments.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think the minister said seventy-two—that sixty-two units have been disbanded throughout Canada goes to show that there is a lack of interest in cadet training. I have many times carefully argued the matter. I do not think that this is good physical training, and if it is military training it would be better that it should be definitely military training in one of the military units. This vote, it seems to me, comes in between those two positions, and it would be well to get rid of it as soon as possible. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Coldwell:

That item 60 in the estimates be reduced by $139,999.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the amendment, some years ago I supported the view of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce when she moved a reduction of a similar item. At that time I said that I was ready to support her in order that the vote should be set at a reasonable figure. It seems to me that it is now nearer that level, although not precisely so, because it should be $150,000. At the time we protested against the vote it was several hundreds of thousands of dollars, but it is now much less. I regret not to be able to support the amendment moved by our charming colleague. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that every member would approve of the transference of that vote to the Department of Pensions and National Health, if the purpose of the vote is what it is said to be, and were that done, I am sure the hon. member for Grey-Bruce would withdraw her motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my opinion the hon. member for Témiscouata gave the best reason why this vote should be eliminated: he intimated that a few years ago it amounted to $700,000 and that it is now down to $140,000. If there were any great demand in the country for this service, there is no doubt that hon. members would be receiving letters and resolutions asking them to support a larger grant. But all the resolutions and all the letters we get are in opposition to any grant whatever.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Parkdale says "No, no."

Mr. SPENCE: I did not say "no, no," but I will do so now.

Mr. MacINNIS: That reminds me that when he suggested that this grant or an increased grant be given to any school, public or private, that requested it, he was on very dangerous ground, because if grants are to be made to private schools there will soon be received sufficient applications from such schools to absorb a very much larger vote than this, and one could have no assurance that the money would be used to the advantage of the people of this country. There is a considerable demand throughout Canada for physical training; it is something that has been neglected for a great many years. To say that this grant is given for physical training is foolish. This instruction is not physical training; it continues for a very short period in the year, in fact for only a few months, whereas the children are in school for ten months. If we are to have physical training it should be given over the ten months during which children are in school. If the federal government wishes to contribute to physical training it can do so in a much better way and one that would be much more beneficial to the various municipalities who have difficulty in finding money for school needs. It can be done much more satisfactorily than by means of this grant, which is not required or needed. If it were not a free gift from the government there is not a school in the west that would accept it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to make a few observations in sppport of this vote, or at all events of the minister's intentions. I said the other night that I was sorry to see the vote cut down, but the minister's explanation was satisfactory and I wish to express my approval. I have had something to do with cadet training but it seems to me that the cadet training with which I am acquainted is something different from what my hon. friend (Mr. Coldwell) has been discussing. Instead of training for two months the cadets that I am speaking of receive training throughout the year. Every week in the twelve months they are thoroughly trained. I am now referring to the sea cadet corps at Halifax and in all the principal cities of the country. In Quebec and Montreal there are splendid corps; I have seen the cadets in Ottawa, and I have seen them in Toronto and in Oshawa. There is a splendid corps in Winnipeg. I am not so sure about Regina. My hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar tells me that there is one there. I know that there used to be one and I am glad to hear that it is still there. I know there is a fine corps in Vancouver.

These cadets are given thorough physical training every week and are taught a great many things that will stand them in excellent stead as they go along in life. I sometimes go to see them train and I know they are taught all sorts of useful vocations in connection with cadet work and so on, all of which makes them real men. I am proud of the work that is done for young Canadians by the cadet corps with which I am associated. These particular cadets are also trained in connection with shipping. I have not by me at the moment the number of Canadian boys trained in the cadet corps supported by the Department of National Defence under this vote and now serving on ships throughout the world. I believe the boys are sent from Toronto to the ship Conway in England and are there given excellent training, graduating to the merchant marine. I know of a large number of young Canadians who are now serving on ships of the empire—not particularly warships, though I see no reason why they could not graduate to that branch of naval service. I am speaking of cadets that finally go on merchant ships. The Canadian Pacific and other shipping companies have them.

This is good work the department is doing for Canada and I like to see these young men trained. They are altogether different from the young fellows one sees standing around the street corners. I have not an unkind word to say about the boys that stand around street corners because they have not the same opportunities that you and I had when we were boys; and if the minister had double the appropriation he could train a good many more boys and take them off the corners in the evenings.

When I go to the Navy League headquarters on the lake shore in Toronto I see there in training, on Tuesday nights, I believe, anywhere from a hundred to a hundred and fifty of these boys, and it is interesting to watch them. They are taught civility; they are encouraged to think quickly and to be prompt in action and in formations. And that is what the young folk want to do instead of standing around the street corners learning nothing. I am not so familiar now with what goes on in the schools and I cannot speak from experience, but I know that in 1936 the physical instructor of the collegiate institute in Belleville—I believe his name is James Willis Howard—gave a fine discourse to Ithaca university in New York on the value of cadet training. It was so well thought of that it was quoted in Amerman newspapers and journals throughout the country. That is one physical instructor in a collegiate institute in Canada who fully endorses this movement. It is with great pleasure that I shall vote against the amendment when it is submitted to the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the vote is taken on the amendment may I ask the minister whether he is prepared to consider transferring this vote from his department to the Department of Health? If the Minister of Pensions and National Health is not ready to consider taking over this item in his own department—

An hon. MEMBER: That's just as bad.

Mr. POULIOT: May I tell the hon. member for Parkdale, after the interesting speech just delivered by the hon. member for Davenport with regard to the health of the boys who receive special training under the Department of National Defence, that these healthy boys should be transferred to the Department of National Health so as to keep up the name of that department; otherwise if they are all sick there, we shall have to call it the Department of Sickness.

Mrs. BLACK: It is certainly not my intention to say much this year on the subject before us. I am able to speak from experience as to what cadet training does. In the Yukon in the very early days we had a cadet corps taken charge of voluntarily by an officer of what was then known as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the boys in the city of Dawson at that time fairly scrambled over one another to get into that little corps. It was an honour to join and be kept on and a decided dishonour when a boy was let out. It trained the boys mentally, physically and morally. As I say, I can only speak from experience, having had three boys disciplined in that way—a very small number; I should have had more. It is interesting to me to know that the school cadet movement, the object of which is to impart mental, moral and physical training to the youth of Canada and to develop in them the principles of patriotism and good citizenship, was first authorized by an amendment to the Militia Act for the province of Canada, assented to at Quebec on June 9, 1862, under which authority was granted for the formation of associations, for purposes of drill in universities and schools. Enrolment in a school cadet corps, in so far as the department is concerned, is a purely voluntary matter on the part of the individual school boy. During the past summer twenty-nine cadet corps held private camps for their members, without expense to the government, receiving on loan from the department various articles of camp equipment. Under the provisions of the Strathcona trust and in accordance with an agreement entered into by the Department of Militia and various provincial educational authorities the Department of Militia agreed to supply qualified physical training instructors for duty at normal schools.

I do not see how anyone who watches the boys of the present day, out of work, with very little to amuse them and in many cases, no money, can possibly object to this cadet training. The boys in this country, the children in this country, need more and more every day mental, moral and physical training. By joining the cadet corps they are brought in touch with people who are interested in the youth of the country, and if we do not bring up the youth of the country as we ought, what is going to happen in the future?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am afraid that several things are being confused. No one is objecting to physical culture. Indeed I should like to see a much larger grant for physical training. But I am pointing out that cadet drill is not the best kind of physical culture. In fact most of the progressive countries of Europe, including the old land, have to a very large extent abandoned cadet training. Cadet training is military training, not physical training. You can if you wish give physical training in small doses, but I think all the drill sergeant's idea is to get a number of boys out on parade and see how quickly they can obey him without thinking particularly of what they are doing.

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

On the other hand physical training should make a child alert and well balanced physically. If you want to make a grant for physical training, of which I am thoroughly in favour, then I suggest it be taken from under the Department of Defence and placed under the Department of Health or the educational departments of the several provinces. Then we could adopt modern systems of physical education.

There is no one in this committee more interested in physical education than I am. I have taken a great deal of it myself and have given a great deal from time to time. The poorest form of physical training is the kind that is given in cadet corps. If we want to continue to pay $5,000 a year for the supervision of twelve hundred cadets in Saskatchewan, when that money could be scattered over a large number of schools to aid in giving physical education, well and good; but in my opinion this country cannot afford to spend money wastefully. I would rather see $1,000,000 spent efficiently than this $140,000 spent, as I regard it, wastefully. I am not saying that the men in charge of this work are not doing their best; they are. But the system under which they work is in my opinion wrong. We should consider more modern methods of giving organized supervised games and physical education.

The hon. member for Davenport spoke of the naval cadets. I doubt whether naval cadets are included in this appropriation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Sea cadets are.

Mr. COLDWELL: He tells us it is much better to have the boys drilling in the evening than standing around the street corners. But let me point out that in all the cases of which I have knowledge the training is given not in the evenings but during school hours, usually at the close of the school day. It does not take anyone off the streets; all it does is to take a group of boys out of their regular classes for a certain length of time. If we are to make a grant for physical training let it be for physical training, and let it be for girls as well as for boys, and then we can get it under the department of health. Followed to its logical conclusion, the argument we have had this afternoon would simply mean that what we ought to do is to put everyone in military uniform and give him physical training. Then indeed we should have a situation comparable to that in Germany and Italy under Hitler and Mussolini.

Mr. BROOKS: I did not intend to say anything with reference to this matter, but some arguments have been brought up with which I do not entirely agree. I had some experience in cadet work as inspector of schools for a number of years in New Brunswick and I must say that my experience was that wherever you found a cadet corps in a school you always found a school where the discipline was good, the physical training good and the children more alert than in other schools. Cadet training is physical training, and the very best physical training. Physical training of course comes entirely under the school curriculum, and the school curriculum, as we know, is made up by the educational department for the different schools. As to military training, as militia officer in the past I have found that young men coming in from the towns and country districts after even ten or fifteen days in a militia camp show a great improvement in smartness and the way they carry themselves. I do not think that either military training or cadet training hurts anyone. Those who had experience with men coming in from all sections of the country in the early days of the war must have observed the great improvement in physique after a short period of training. I am sure we cannot estimate in money the value to the young men of the Dominion of Canada of the training for which this money is voted. I am very much in favour of it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says it teaches men to move automatically; my experience is that it teaches them to think quickly, makes their minds more alert. I make these few remarks because I believe in this kind of training and regard it as a great asset to the young manhood of Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: There has been much stress laid on making minds alert. If that is a result of cadet training, it might be a good idea to have a corps from the membership of the house on the grounds in front of this building. Much of what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar expresses what I would say in regard to the speech made by the hon. member for Davenport. He talked a great deal about getting the boys in uniform and off the street corners—

Mr. MacNICOL: Pardon me; I did not mention the word uniform.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, the hon. member told us how smart they looked in their uniforms as he saw them being paraded, so that they must have had the uniforms on. I think we ought to be careful about that, because some people get so enthusiastic about getting boys in uniform, as in Germany and Italy for example, that they have got it down to little chaps about ten years of age. They get everyone into uniform and then say that they are curing unemployment. But getting people into uniform does not mean that the real problems of unemployment have been solved.

Many who have spoken have argued that cadet training makes boys more alert and quick to meet the problems of life. I think world authorities are agreed that it does not do that. The last speaker (Mr. Brooks) referred to the change in the physique of men trained at the beginning of the war, but that was not all due to cadet training. A great deal of it was due to physical training, as every one knows, because cadet training is not good physical training. In order to have the men in good physical condition, physical training, which had nothing to do with cadet drill, had to be added.

I have said all I intend to say this year or other years. The vote should be transferred to the Department of National Health, or to the department of education, where it could be used for purposes of physical training, in which case it could be made much larger than it is to-day, and we could have training not only of boys, but of girls as well. If we are to have physical training there is no reason why we should take one part of the human race and train it to be physically fit, leaving the other part untrained. I shall continue to move that it be reduced until, some day, we will come to that conclusion.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not wish to talk at cross purposes. All hon. members want some type of training which will make our young people as healthy as possible, and make it possible for them to have exercise and physical development. We are trying to decide the best method of accomplishing that end, and upon that subject there seems to be some difference of opinion. I believe the figures the minister gave on Friday evening afford the best contradiction of what has been said by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and others.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Davenport is experienced in this.

Mr. DOUGLAS: For a number of years I was a member of a cadet corps, and from first-hand information I think I know something about cadets. From the very fact that sixty-two units have ceased to exist during the year it is apparent that cadet training no longer appeals to youth. Surely the hon. member for Davenport does not suggest that, because there are two and a half times as many cadets in the province of Quebec as there are in Ontario, there are two and a half times as many healthy boys.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is not so much socialism and communism in Quebec.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think we ought to keep to the subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not propose to be intimidated by hon. members shouting "question." The fact remains that the young boys are not accepting this type of training as they used to; they are going into boy scout work and the Canadian standard efficiency tests.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. DOUGLAS: When the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) introduced his resolution suggesting a ministry of sports, and the Minister of National Health replied, it was the general consensus of opinion that there was room in Canada for some organized type of physical training and recreation, and that it should come under the departments of education in the provinces. This parliament could make grants to the provinces for that purpose. I should like to join with hon. members who have preceded me in saying that the vote should be transferred to the Department of National Health, with amounts allocated to the respective provinces to carry on cultural and physical training for the improvement of the youth of Canada. It should not be associated with the Department of National Defence, as it has been in the past.

Mr. POULIOT: What does the Minister of National Health think about the transfer of the vote? I ask him in the mildest manner if he will kindly give his answer to that question.

Mr. POWER: I do not know that I should object strenuously to having this branch of the Department of National Defence transferred to the Department of National Health. Of course, if parliament decides that it shall be done, there is nothing to do but to obey. But before undertaking any such task we would have to ask very large subsidies to provide for staff, instructors and other people who would undertake to carry out the training of the cadets. That is not so simple or easy as it would appear to the hon. member for Témiscouata. It is not practicable in one day to transfer from one department to another a branch of training which has been carried on for many years. I am sure that in any case nothing could be done this year, but I am willing to tell the hon. member for Témiscouata and other hon. members who have been so kind as to be willing to give me further responsibility, that during the interval between this session and the next I shall be only too pleased to study the possibilities of the situation.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not agree with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) or the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) much as I should like to at times. Sometimes the hon. member for Grey-Bruce makes a very pleasant speech, and I feel like supporting her. However on this particular occasion may I say she has always had a hatred of cadet corps, and always shows a desire to reduce the vote. I am not blaming her for her attitude, but I must endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. members for Yukon (Mrs. Black) and Royal (Mr. Brooks), who have had considerable experience. Why hon. members around me persist in saying there is no physical training in cadet corps work I cannot understand, because that is absolute rot. The cadet corps in Toronto about which I speak—and I assume they are the same in Vancouver, Winnipeg, and other large cities—shows evidence of physical training. Watching them passing on the street one can tell distinctly that they are well trained physically, or they would not be in the condition they are. Hon. members talk about training for ten days or two weeks. May I say that the boys in St. Andrew's College and De La Salle are training all the time; otherwise they would not be in such good condition.

Mr. HAYHURST: Mr. Chairman, I was a cadet instructor for nine years, and I believe I should know something about cadet work. At the same time I feel there is a belief on the part of people in the different provinces that the cadet instruction should be entirely revolutionized. Military training or regimentation as it has been practised in the past leads to only one or two good effects. So far as I can ascertain, the ability to think rapidly is not developed by cadet training. It is developed more readily by organized sports than by the regimentation brought about through cadet training.

The best feature in connection with cadet training, as I have known it, is that it encourages leadership. Cadet instructors, corps commanders and platoon commanders develop the ability to lead. Although this principle may be found in boy scout training, I should like to see it remain in the cadet movement. On the other hand I believe the principle under which cadet corps are organized is entirely wrong, because the municipalities and school boards need that money. The corps of which I was instructor happened three years in succession to win the shield given by the right hon. leader of the opposition. The members of the corps were mostly of Ukrainian parentage. It is said that people of that race make the most disciplined soldiers, although of that I am not certain. Napoleon once said that the Czechs were the best soldiers, because they were willing to obey. No doubt the same conditions exist in some of the central European countries. I should like to see increased facilities provided for the development of the cadet idea. I am against the reduction in this amount, in fact I should like to see it raised to $1,000,000. If cadet training cannot be placed under the department of health this year, perhaps consideration will be given to this matter. The town in which I live was not able to provide any money for sports and we used the cadet money for that purpose. To-day the sports activities of the town have suffered considerably because the cadet corps has been disbanded and no more money is coming in for that purpose. I should like to see this vote increased to $1,000,000 in order that grants could be made to each of the provinces which in turn could divide up the money for the purpose of providing facilities for sport in the different towns and villages by which health and physique of the young people, both male and female, could be improved and developed.

Some one said that cadet training is the poorest form of physical training there is. I suppose he was referring to the mere handling of rifles and so on, but that is something that can be learned by any man who wants to be a soldier, in two weeks. To do that requires no mental discipline or cadet training. Many of our young men have no facilities by which they can develop themselves along mechanical lines. Many of these boys would like to be aeroplane mechanics as they have no liking for ordinary regimentation. A new and better outlook by society would lead to a cleaner and saner world.

Mr. MacNEIL: I have given a good deal of attention to these cadet corps and I have come to the conclusion that they are obsolete. I think we should pay more attention to providing proper methods of physical training for our young people, to be carried on under the direction of those who have taken advantage of the world's experience in this regard. I believe the results obtained would be much better as far as the physical and mental development of our young people is concerned. We should not be spending this amount to carry on physical and military training which is obsolete and merely a disguised form of recruiting for the military units. Facilities are needed everywhere for vocational and technical training which would prove of infinitely more value to our younger generation. My chief objection to this vote is the fact that it does not reach the young men who need it most. The benefits of this vote reach only a comparatively small number of young men, and I agree thoroughly with the views expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that this money is wasted.

Amendment (Miss Macphail) negatived: yeas, 11; nays, 85.

Mr. STIRLING: Am I right in understanding that this vote covers the naval cadets?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, the sea cadets.

Mr. STIRLING: I am a very strong supporter of these sea cadets. There is a corps in my city with which I have been intimately connected for many years and I am very grateful for the good work which has been done. It is gratifying to see the characters of these boys being moulded by the instructors and the petty officers. This work has been going on for several years and good results are being obtained. It is not a very easy thing to do when you are located three or four hundred miles from the coast, but we have been able to get some of these boys placed in the marine service. As far as the boys in the corps at Vancouver and the ports on the Atlantic coast are concerned, they are practically all absorbed into the merchant service and their record has been very good indeed. About half a dozen years ago it was necessary to reduce this vote almost to the vanishing point, and I should like to have the minister tell the committee to what extent these grants are now being made to the sea cadets, and whether he will consider increasing them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The sea cadets are on exactly the same footing as the other cadet corps. Fourteen corps are affiliated with and six are not affiliated with the division of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve.

Mr. HEAPS: When this vote was first brought before the committee I asked the minister a question with regard to supervision over the grants, and the minister explained that these grants were properly looked after by the department. However, after listening to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst) I am inclined to think that something must be wrong somewhere when the money supposed to go to the cadets has been spent for the purposes of sport and other recreational facilities. I should like to know how these funds are being used in other parts of the country and I am just wondering whether something should not be done to provide proper supervision and inspection. Perhaps the people in other districts could be given the same latitude in spending this money as apparently has been given to the people in the district of the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago.

Mrs. BLACK: I can speak from knowledge of one officer who trained a corps, and I know that every cent he earned was used for the purchase of boxing gloves and footballs which he provided with his own money.

Mr. HAYHURST: I should like to clear up this question of where the money went. The cadet instructor is supposed to put most of it in his own pocket, but in this particular case he gave it for the benefit of the community.

Mr. LOCKHART: In connection with the sea cadet work, have any representations been made to the minister or the department in connection with an extension of this work? I know something about cadet work myself, and I know there are many limitations. Is the money paid to instructors in sea cadet work the same as is done in connection with the land cadet services?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has any thought been given by those in charge of the sea cadet services that the service might be extended a little to make it more interesting to the boys and develop them a little more? It provides one of the most marvellous trainings in the country, and I was wondering if the minister had received representations for an extension of this work, and if so, will he give them his serious consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Numerous representations have been received praising the work carried out by the sea cadets. Very recently representations were made for an extension of this work, particularly on our coasts. Private citizens have made very strong representations to the department in that regard.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister gave the number of cadets by provinces for 1936. Could he give us the amount that was spent in each province?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not been broken down in that way.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It is not available by provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is any training still given in marksmanship in any cadet corps?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: What type of institutions are qualified for assistance on account of marksmanship? Are instructions in marksmanship given under the supervision of militia units or under the cadet instructor attached to the school?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The instruction is given by the instructor who receives pay for these services, just as for the ordinary training of cadets.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are the rifles and ammunition supplied by the department from assistance given for instruction purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Rifles are issued and ammunition is supplied by the department.

Mr. BENNETT: The sea cadets vote would not in any sense cover the training in the ship that is being built down in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing to do with this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. That ship will not be finished until towards the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. BENNETT: That will not be covered by this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not under this vote at all.

Item agreed to.

Contingencies, $28,800.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there anything here about the pensions being paid to General McNaughton and Colonel Steel?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not under this vote.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This vote is to provide for the cost of telegrams and telephone calls, postage, and so forth for militia services at headquarters. It includes guards of honour and the expenses of the Bisley team, the latter item being estimated at $1,200.

Mr. COLDWELL: What did guards of honour cost last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So far this year, $3,244.75.

Mr. POULIOT: In order to save time, may I ask the minister which is the item relating to the McNaughton and Steel stuff?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The pension is purely statutory under the terms of the Militia Pensions Act. I forget the exact section, but it is the one dealing with officers seconded from the Department of National Defence to any other department.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder if I shall have to block all the estimates in order to get some information about these fellows. I understand the pension is statutory, but the money must be provided somewhere in the estimates like every other statutory expense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Such pensions are payable by the Department of Pensions.

Mr. POWER: They are statutory and are not voted by this parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the whole law should be repealed.

Item agreed to.

Engineer services and works, $2,816,950.

Mr. GREEN: The minister, speaking in the house last week, stressed time and again the necessity for defending our ports and harbours. May I ask what provision is being made for the defence of our ports on the Pacific such as Prince Rupert, Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster, and Alberni?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it would be better to answer that question in detail when we come to the various items, rather than make a general answer. There is a question, of course, how far it is advisable to go in giving details, but I shall be very glad to give all the information I have myself in reference to what is in contemplation. The question I think had better come under the items for aircraft and naval expenditures; also in connection with general stores under another vote. There are certain items for gun emplacements and things like that in this vote.

Mr. GREEN: Are there to be any coast defence batteries to protect the cities of New Westminster and Vancouver?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend will wait until we reach that item I will give him all the details I can with reference to it. I question very much the wisdom of going into too much detail, but if my hon. friend insists I shall be glad to give him what I know myself.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister if there is a statutory appropriation of expended money which is not mentioned in the estimates, and if so what it amounts to?

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend is referring to pensions for officers of the Canadian militia, he will find that at page 47 of the estimates under the heading "Militia Pentions Act, 1901," and the amount is $1,400,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly. It is authorized by statute, but it has to be voted each year.

Mr. HEAPS: The amount for engineer services and works is three times the amount of the item last year. Can the minister give us a break-down of the item, and the reasons for the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I had better give the items to my hon. friend: Installation of air conditioning system, Ottawa, $6,000; salaries, temporary civilian employees, engineers, architects, Ottawa, $40,000; Petawawa, continuation of building program, $25,000; military district No. 1 ordnance clothing store, $5,000; Barriefield R.C.C.S. depot, $30,000; Barriefield, central heating plant, $75,000; garage and workshop, $45,000; miscellaneous services, $20,000; St. John's, Quebec, conversion of old married quarters to barracks, $8,200; Valcartier, completion of works and services, filling group, dominion arsenal, $50,000; Valcartier, construction of three additional magazines, $30,000; rebuilding of fortification walls, Quebec, $30,000; Valcartier camp, continuation of building program, $10,000; Halifax, surface exterior walls, military hospital, $5,000; Halifax, construction of garage, $14,000; Winnipeg, Manitoba, additional garage accommodation, Fort Osborne barracks, $25,000; radio beacon building at Winnipeg, $5,000; Shilo camp, continuation of building program, $12,000; Shilo camp, providing a tank for water supply, $8,000; coast defence, Pacific coast, $895,000; Esquimalt, British Columbia, new ordnance store building, $175,000; Esquimalt, British Columbia, continuation of construction program joint service magazine, which was commenced last year, $100,000; Kamloops, British Columbia, procurement of site for magazine, and preliminary work, $36,000; Dundurn camp, Saskatchewan, providing tank for water supply, training area, $8,000; Dundurn camp, Saskatchewan, additional magazine building and heating plants, $39,750; Calgary, Alberta, new barracks, miscellaneous services, $40,000; a total of $1,736,950. I omitted two items: military district No. 2, purchase and construction of new rifle range at Hamilton, Ontario, $100,000; Military District No. 4, Montreal, Quebec, purchase and construction of new rifle range, $150,000; a total for that purpose of $250,000.

Mr. HAYHURST: The grant for Alberta is pretty small.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. RAYMOND: I should like to get some information. In the bluebook which contains the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, the total amount for national defence —militia and naval services—is shown as $13,377,000. In the bluebook which contains the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, reference is made to the estimates of the previous year, the fiscal year 1936-37, and I find that the amount therein stated is $14,677,000. Will the minister state which amount is correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Details of the vote for 1936-37, including cadet services, contingencies, engineer services, general stores, non-permanent active militia, the permanent force and the Royal Military College, make a total of $12,018,926. For the same items the total in 1937-38 is $17,850,428, or an increase of $5,831,502.

Mr. RAYMOND: But, referring to the bluebook which contains the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, I find that the total, in the column 1936-37, is $14,677,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that does not cover supplementary estimates.

Mr. RAYMOND: My reason for asking this question—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe I know what the hon. member is referring to. He will recall that last year we had the main estimates, we had the supplementaries and the special supplementary estimates, and in some of the supplementaries there were certain votes under the Department of National Defence approved for unemployment relief purposes which were then under the control of this department, and also a certain amount—as I recall, $2,601,000—which should not really have been charged to defence but was at that time administered by this department; that should be deducted from the total for the year.

Mr. RAYMOND: And this includes all the supplementary estimates for last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. I should add for the information of my hon. friend that there is an amount for two destroyers which have been purchased from the British admiralty which is not in the estimates now before the committee, but will be in the special supplementary estimates for the year 1936-37 and will be something over $2,000,000.

Mr. RAYMOND: Do I understand that these are the only supplementary estimates that the minister intends to bring before the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except that it may be necessary, towards the end of the session, to introduce amounts by way of revotes for projects now under construction and not yet completed, there will not be any further amount this session for defence purposes.

Mr. RAYMOND: Only revotes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only revotes.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Chairman, for the very reasons which I have set forth during the debate on the amendment presented by the hon. member for Vancouver-North (Mr. MacNeil), I intend to oppose this increase in the National Defence estimates, and therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix):

That item 62 of the National Defence estimates be reduced by $1,867,850.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix) whether he wishes to eliminate the items concerning Valcartier, which are included in this vote?

Mr. LACROIX: I may point out to the hon. member that this is not a matter of patronage, but of principle.

Mr. BENNETT: That argument should be conclusive.

Mr. RAYMOND: The minister has stated that the estimates were, first, for the maintenance of internal security and the preservation of law and order within our territory, and second, for protection against any exterior aggression. Is the minister able to say what portion of these estimates is for the maintenance of internal security and the preservation of law and order within our territory, and what portion is for protection against any exterior aggression?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am afraid that is a very difficult question to answer to-day, but every cent of these estimates is to be used for the inside defence of the Dominion of Canada. As I stated in the main debate, it is not the intention to use any of these amounts for any purpose outside of the Dominion of Canada. That is as clear as I can possibly make it. This particular increase of $1,867,850 which we are now discussing is all for absolutely necessary purposes within the Dominion of Canada, to try to make efficient the very small militia force we now have.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of the material will have to be bought outside of Canada, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, but very little of this vote provides for buildings and works.

Mr. RAYMOND: I understand the minister to say it is for the defence of Canada, but it may be important to know where is our first line of defence. In view of the declaration made in the other chamber that our first line of defence is in Europe, may I ask the minister if he believes that our first line of defence is in Canada or in Europe?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That, Mr. Chairman, is a question of major policy, and possibly the hon. member is asking me concerning something that really should belong to the Prime Minister and the government as a whole. I believe it became very clear during the course of the debate last week that all the amounts asked for at this time in this vote are for the protection of Canadian territory or Canadian territorial waters, and under the items referred to in that debate there was no consideration of using any of this money for extraneous commitments or enterprises of any kind. I think that was made abundantly clear in the debate of a week ago. As to where the front line of Canada's defence is, I doubt if anybody here can with accuracy forecast. All I can say is that all the items in these estimates are intended only for the protection of Canada, of Canadian neutrality and of the territorial waters adjacent to our coast.

Mr. RAYMOND: In other countries expenditures for similar purposes are spread over so many years. Has the minister anything of the kind in view here, or are these expenditures only for this year's program.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. RAYMOND: This does not contemplate anything in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; no specific plans have been laid down for next year. The estimates for any subsequent year will depend upon the conditions existing at that time, but no plans have been prepared for next year.

Mr. RAYMOND: And can we expect that next year the estimates will be about the same as they were last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The estimates next year will depend on the conditions prevailing in the world at that time.

Mr. HEAPS: Of the total increase more than half is for the defence of Vancouver?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not Vancouver, but the Pacific coast.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no doubt the matter was given very serious consideration before the increases were made, but what expert opinion was obtained, and was the defence program for Vancouver decided upon as the most efficient that could be devised?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Very careful consideration was given to the general plan arrived at in this connection. Perhaps I had better give some details with regard to this item of $895,000. This item is for the first stage of construction of emplacements, observation posts, defence light emplacements, power house, et cetera, in the vicinity of Esquimalt, Victoria, Vancouver, off Johnstone strait and off Prince Rupert. It will provide for the acquisition of property and for sufficent construction work to enable protection guns and other equipment to be mounted in case of necessity. It does not provide full protection and accommodation. The total estimated cost of the works contemplated would be about double the amount asked for this year.

Mr. MacINNIS: If that is so, am I right in saying that these estimates, so far as the Pacific coast is concerned, are only a prelude to estimates of a similar kind to be brought down next year and the year following and for many more years to come?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct. It would probably mean that the same amount might be asked for next year, because $895,000 is roughly speaking about half the amount estimated as necessary for the particular purpose.

Mr. GREEN: How much of that is for the protection of the lower mainland in British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is all designed for the same purpose; the protection of Vancouver island is not separated from the rest. It is all one coordinated plan of defence worked out by experts of the department and by others whose advice they have taken. I do not believe the final details have yet been worked out with reference to the vicinity of Vancouver. Plans are now being drawn up in connection with Vancouver island and the northern portions along Johnstone strait and off Prince Rupert.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Mr. GREEN: Is there any special report in connection with fortifications around the city of Vancouver?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A special report has been prepared in connection with Vancouver, Victoria, Esquimalt and Prince Rupert.

Mr. REID: Is anything being done in the defence program in connection with Queen Charlotte islands?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That situation has been very carefully surveyed and reviewed in the last six months.

Mr. POULIOT: It seems to me that there are two kinds of works contemplated in this item; there are historic works and military works. I have no objection at all to the work that is to be done on the citadel at Quebec, which is a great historic monument, but I do not believe it is worth much from the military point of view, because a shell might destroy it. Those old walls which could resist the cannon balls of days gone by are not so impregnable now. I will not ask the minister to tell the committee where they are located, but I should like to know whether this includes some anti-aircraft defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This particular vote deals with emplacements in connection with coast defence, batteries or anti-aircraft guns, et cetera. The guns themselves will be under another vote.

Mr. POULIOT: Can the minister tell me, roughly speaking, what will be the total in connection with so-called historic work, rebuilding or military construction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amount is small, $30,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What amount is being spent on coastal defence in the east as compared with the Pacific?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I speak only from memory, but it is about $3,500,000 as against $7,000,000. It is about $11,000,000 altogether.

Mr. PARENT (Quebec): What amount is being spent for the improvement of the walls in the city of Quebec? Is the amount spent there considered a military work in the national defence scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is not in the slightest, but during recent years when the administration of unemployment in connection with the camps was to a certain extent under the Department of National Defence this work was carried out. In my opinion this vote should not be under the Department of National Defence but under some other department. It has been cut down but we are trying to do the best we can.

Mr. COLDWELL: What appropriation has been made for the defence of the prairie country through Churchill and Hudson bay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question also is being considered, but no specific developments have yet taken place.

Mr. MacNEIL: Am I right in assuming that this amount now voted represents about fifty per cent of the program contemplated?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, but in regard to one specific item only, that for $895,000, which deals with the preliminary steps that must be taken with reference to certain emplacements and defences in four or five places along the Pacific coast. The amount asked for this year—that is, only for work that can be done this year—is $895,000, and it is expected that a similar amount will be required at some future time.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who prepares the plans? Is there in the department a council or a general staff on whom the minister relies for advice as to suitable plans and so forth? Will he inform the committee as to the personnel of any such council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question was carefully considered by some of the officers from headquarters in Ottawa in consultation with officers in the various districts and also with an outside expert who gave their opinion with regard to Pacific coast defence.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that include officers on exchange from Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One officer came out especially in connection with this work and was here about two months.

Mr. BROOKS: What points in eastern Canada does the minister propose to defend, and particularly what ports in the maritime provinces? What is the nature of the defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Speaking generally the reply would be that mostly in the vicinity of the leading ports of the maritime provinces these plans are under consideration. Of course the full development cannot take place with the amounts now asked for.

Mr. BROOKS: I noticed there was nothing in the estimates but engineering services for New Brunswick. I was wondering if they proposed any defences for the harbours.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question is being considered at the present time, I have had correspondence on that, and when I have a reply I shall be glad to let my hon. friend have a copy.

Mr. MacNEIL: In view of the fact that experts of the British war office have advised the department in regard to these fortifications, is it fair to assume that our coast defence plan is part of an empire defence plan, and that provision is being made for establishments in Canada as bases for imperial forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, it is not. These services were asked for by the Department of National Defence, and before this officer arrived our own officers had worked out plans, and speaking broadly and generally the recommendations agreed in each case.

Mr. POULIOT: Did Major B. D. C. Treat have anything to do with it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is the gentleman I have been speaking of for the last ten minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: I like so much to hear of him. But I do not see the use of having him here if he has only repeated what others have said. Probably he spoke only after having heard the good Canadians—I know there are some in the department—and then repeated that, and so he was a great man. Why does not the minister leave him outside of this country?—because he is of no use at all.

Mr. RAYMOND: I understand the minister said the other day that an amount of $2,600,000 voted last year was not spent during the year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, that is not correct. It was voted last year for purposes which this year are not included in the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. RAYMOND: That money was spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, much of it was.

Mr. DUPUIS: To clarify the atmosphere could the minister tell us from the point of view of experience and of science whether it is feasible for a belligerent to come from Europe to Canada with aeroplanes and attack the cities of this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I certainly do think it possible, not only with long range aircraft of modern types but also through the development of aircraft carriers. It is quite possible under modern conditions to have a raid on Canadian coasts and cities.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should further like to know this. I understand that if war is declared this country is concerned in seeing our trade continue, our goods shipped overseas and our avenues of trade kept open. Am I correct in saying that ships loaded with our goods could not go outside the three mile limit, otherwise we would become belligerents? If so, we must have warships to protect our merchant shipping, and after our shipping goes outside the three mile limit it must be protected by the British navy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That of course raises the very difficult general question of neutrality in war time. Anyone will realize at once in view of Canada's very modest naval strength that it would be entirely impossible for us to protect our own trade routes. All we can hope to do is to protect the focal areas, that is, the points at which the trade routes from other countries converge upon our harbour mouths and shipping terminals on both coasts. Our defence against raiders or aircraft carriers must of necessity be limited, in view of the modest forces we have, to our own territorial waters.

Mr. DUPUIS: I thank the minister for the information, which I think it is well that the people should have, especially those who oppose this estimate, so that they may know what the situation would be if war were declared.

Mr. GARIEPY: War declared by whom, and between what nations?

Mr. DUPUIS: By any European country or by any American country, in which European countries might become involved. I think it my duty to declare now the reason I am bound to vote for these estimates. It is, first, for the reasons which have been explained by the minister, and, second, because, having asked my constituents to tell me what to do,—because after all I am only their spokesman in the House of Commons—they held a general meeting and passed a resolution by a large majority in favour of this government spending that amount of money for national defence. The resolution has two other paragraphs, in one of which they state that in case of war they want this parliament to ask the people through a referendum whether they are willing to take part in any European war. And if there is such a referendum they ask that nobody be permitted to vote except those residing in Canada. But for the time being I am perfectly free and I am in duty bound to vote for these estimates.

Mr. RAYMOND: I assume this program has been prepared under the advice of the minister's military experts. May I ask if they were Canadian officers or imperial officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were all Canadian officers except the one to whom I referred. An officer was asked for by the department, to come from England especially to advise on coast defences. He was here about two months and he acted in cooperation with our own officers of all three services.

Mr. STIRLING: And he had information on this very subject, which was technical information that the government desired.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Exactly. He is supposed to be, and I believe is, one of the leading specialists on fortification works.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the danger from aircraft is a determining factor we should examine more closely the minister's statement. He gave it as his opinion that we are in danger from air raids. There are two ways in which such raids could be made, as he suggested. One is by a return flight of aircraft from Europe, which I think it can be stated generally is at present a practical impossibility. A ship would have to refuel on this side. Where would it refuel?

Mr. DUPUIS: It might go to the hon. member's house.

Mr. COLDWELL: It would not find gasoline in my house with which to refuel. The second way would be by aircraft carrier. In the event of war and aircraft carriers being used, if we are to prevent air raids we shall have to prevent the coming of the carrier. How could two destroyers possibly cope with that situation? We have to bear in mind that in any war we should be involved largely on account of our association with some other country. It might be because of proximity to the United States, or because of our connection with Great Britain, even if we declared neutrality. We must remember that either of those nations has a navy powerful enough to prevent the passage of aircraft carriers across the Atlantic, and would be prepared to stop them for their own protection and the protection of their trade routes. I believe the endeavour to frighten people with the thought that we are defending ourselves against air raids is making the house rather ridiculous, especially when we examine the matter in the light of cold reason. We are not in danger of air raids, and I was greatly amused to read that following the discussion in the house last week an official in the department suggested that a special department should be installed in McGill university to teach people how to look after themselves in the event of air raids. That sort of thing, it seems to me, is an attempt to play upon the nerves of people who have not thought the matter out. I suggest that we examine the minister's statement in the light of actual physical possibilities.

Mr. POULIOT: The vote of $2,816,950 for engineer services and works must be considered without fear or favour. So long as the king of the United Kingdom is the king of Canada, and so long as we are linked with Great Britain and are a part of the British Empire I shall have no objection to a reasonable expenditure in the defence of Canada. As Canada is part of the British Empire, in looking to our defence we are to a certain extent defending the British Empire. That is my humble view, and the opinion I have reached after having visited my home and having discussed the matter with sound-thinking Canadians who hold a similar view. They are interested in the defence of Canada from coast to coast, but they do not want to go further than that. I shall not object to voting for the defence of Canada, so long as my mind is satisfied.

In this instance I am asked to vote $2,816,950, representing a two-thirds increase. We must consider, first of all, that except in the event of civil war any attack must come from the outside. In that event would it come from Europe or from Asia? We do not know. It may or it may not come; I am not ready to discuss that point. It would take a technician, possibly an officer of the army, a man of great experience or a university professor to discuss it. In my view, however, if a thing is done it must be well done. I do not say that money should be wasted, and in this connection I would apply the same reasoning as I do in connection with the dragoons. Their work was not well done, and it might better have been dispensed with. I hope in future the guard will have better horses, or will not parade before the parliament buildings.

Defence must be appropriate. This is not a matter of voting money for the relief of unemployed; it is not something to be done by the Department of Labour or the Department of Public Works. This is a vote for the defence of Canada, and a serious matter. I have no objection to defence, provided we have reasonable grounds for believing that an attack can be made and that the amount voted will provide improved works, and a defence sufficient to prevent an enemy from entering the country.

There is something else which strikes me, but which I have not yet expressed. I make this observation as a Liberal, and following the principles laid down at the St. Roch hotel by my Quebec leader, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I wonder whether this is not part of the H.I.P.—the home improvement plan—with Mr. Purvis at its head. I find it a great mistake to have him in charge of the unemployment business. He is the man who controls the manufacture of explosives, and also celanese and cellophane. I wonder whether he is not the nigger in the wood pile in that business. He may have done much more than B. D. C. Treat from Surrey, England. I should like to have this point clear. Notice that the man in charge of unemployment relief in Canada, the head of the employment commission, is our own little Zaharoff—a most incredible thing—our pocket edition of Zaharoff. He is head of the employment commission. I ask the minister honestly to tell the committee if Purvis had anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the increase in the votes for the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have pleasure in informing the hon. member that I never had the privilege of discussing any items in the defence estimates with Mr. A. B. Purvis.

Mr. POULIOT: So much the better.

Mr. RAYMOND: Are the expenditures involved in this item for the purpose of defending Canada against exterior aggression?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is all for purposes within Canada, and for no other purpose.

Mr. RAYMOND: But could the minister make a distinction, and state whether the expenditures are to protect Canada from exterior aggression?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly, they are all for that.

Mr. RAYMOND: I ask that because I recall the words of the Prime Minister. After reviewing our friendy relations with other countries, recalling our geographical position and drawing a picture of the international situation he said, as reported at page 1048 of Hansard:

> On the whole there has been some improvement, a less tense strain in the international situation.

He described Canada as the most secure of all countries, and then said, as reported at page 1050:

It is not contended that danger is great for us. There is a danger but so far as Canada is concerned it is, as I have already pointed out, an incidental contingency. Relatively our danger is small.

I said before, and I now repeat that I am ready to vote every dollar which I believe necessary for the protection of Canada, but for the protection of Canada alone. Although I have full confidence in the words of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, I cannot convince myself that so large an increase is necessary for the protection of Canada, and Canada alone. I may be wrong in my fear; I hope I am. I would rather be wrong than have others wrong. Although I would be willing to support the item, I am reluctant to support so large an increase, particularly in this year when we need every dollar to run the country. I do not know what deficit will be shown when the budget is brought down on Thursday. We may foresee, however, that it will be large, and that we may have a further deficit next year. I believe the Prime Minister said that the defence force had been neglected during the last few years, for reasons of economy, and that this program was not presented last year on account of the European situation due to the Italian war with Ethiopia. But economies are just as necessary to-day as they were during the last five years and unless it is absolutely necessary, I do not think there should be any increase in the military estimates.

Mr. HEAPS: I think this increase is merely the thin end of the wedge; it is just an illustration of what future governments will be asking for. The present government is asking for approximately $1,000,000 to carry on the defence of a small part of our Pacific coast line. The minister has informed the committee that next year a similar amount will be required in order to complete the defences of one portion of the Pacific coast. If approximately $2,000,000 is required to provide this limited defence, no one knows what amounts we may be asked for in future years in order to provide a complete defence of both our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I am not a military expert, but speaking as a layman I contend that it is impossible for any Canadian government completely to defend our Atlantic and Pacific coasts with the resources at their disposal. In making this statement I am taking into account that our air defences may also be considered as part of our coastal defences. In a matter of this kind the minister is entitled to have the best expert advice available, and I ask him if it is his opinion or the opinion of his expert advisers that this $2,000,000 will provide adequate defences for that part of the country to meet any contingency the government might have in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not pretend to be an expert on these matters, but the best advice which I have received as minister of the department from those competent to give advice is that these amounts will afford reasonable protection.

Mr. HEAPS: What does the minister mean when he says, "will afford reasonable protection"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The money being voted this year and what will be necessary next year.

Mr. HEAPS: Therefore, unless something unexpected develops, these amounts will be sufficient to take care of the defences of the country so far as the minister's department is concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would not commit myself as to any development in the future.

Mr. MacNEIL: In discussing the coastal defence plan for the Pacific coast the minister stated in the neighbourhood of Esquimalt there would be some concentration of defence in the nature of gun emplacements and various kinds of fortifications. I do not think we should overlook the fact that Esquimalt is a British naval base. Is it fair to assume that the British naval authorities will place British naval guns in these emplacements in order to repel capital ships? It is difficult for me to believe that the Department of National Defence will be in a position to place at that point guns sufficiently powerful to repel raiders of any first class power, considering the range and calibre of the guns usually found on the capital ships of the great powers. In concentrating our defences at Esquimalt are we not asking for trouble? Are we not adopting a provocative measure of defence? Will we not be involved in any conflict in which the British Empire may be involved?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Esquimalt is a Canadian base and is Canadian controlled. There is no suggestion whatsoever, so far as my knowledge goes, that the British government will place any guns for the defence of Esquimalt. We have had some 9.2 guns at this point for some years. These guns were ordered relined and remounted last year and it is intended to supplement the number of guns during the present year.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is not Esquimalt the base for the Pacific squadron of the British fleet?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At one time it was a regular base but it is no longer. It is used now only for stores and coaling purposes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is there any arrangement between the Canadian and British governments whereby a British warship may come into that port at any hour and for any purpose? Is there any understanding that in the event of hostilities Esquimalt will be defended by the British navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the latter observation is quite justifiable. For years naval stores have been kept at Halifax and Esquimalt, to be used when desired.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has made a point which we should remember. He stated that unless our coasts are adequately defended, any defences will be simply provocative. We must either go the whole hog or remain in such a position as not to be a menace to any other nation. The minister says that he does not anticipate large expenditures in future years. A short time ago I asked the minister if it was contemplated to defend Churchill, and he told me not this year. If we are going to defend our coast lines adequately, these key points will all have to be defended. If we once put our feet along this path of providing gun emplacements, coastal defences and so on, we must realize that we may be led much farther than we are given to understand today we will be. I am thoroughly convinced of that, and that is one reason why I am opposing this estimate. I believe that with a coast line such as we have, to do as the government intends will mean embarking upon a course which will be more or less provocative and interfere with any neutrality we may desire to observe in the future.

Mr. LACOMBE: Is it the intention of the Minister of National Defence to ask for increased estimates for national defence year after year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I said before, I cannot state at the present moment what the estimates for next year will be. They will be governed by conditions prevailing at that time. However, I can tell my hon. friend that at the present time there is no plan to provide for increased estimates. This matter will be decided by the government in the light of conditions existing at that time.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are our coastal defences designed to repel naval vessels and aircraft?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To repel one or the other or both.

Mr. GARIEPY: So far I have not made any declaration on this important matter and before doing so I wanted to hear what explanations the minister had to make. I have just one or two remarks to make before I declare definitely my intention to vote for this amendment. Whether or not we like it, we must face the state of affairs which exists at the present time. I am not at all satisfied with the explanations which have been given for this large increase.

The other day mention was made about internal protection; the communists were after us; we were all to be smashed between Calgary, Fort William and Montreal. But to-day it is all different. It is aeroplanes now. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that the protection which we are providing against the danger is ridiculous. Next it is the protection of air ports. I agree with the statement which has been made that the money to be spent in that regard will be a mere drop in the bucket. The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis), in putting a question a moment ago, said, "If war is declared." I asked him by whom and between whom, and he did not reply. The reply we had received a few minutes before from the Minister of National Defence was that we must prepare for the future. He did not know what would be done next year. "Conditions prevailing throughout the world," he said, "would have to guide us." Now is it not remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that at the very moment when we are jumping into an increased military expenditure of a couple of millions, the other side decides not to spend anything on colonial protection. As the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) said the other day, it is a mere coincidence, but a coincidence which should open our eyes.

We are gradually getting into war, and we may as well face the issue. For my part, that is what I say. I say it is a question not of local defence, but a war defence. I am against war; I am going to take my stand against it right now. I have not forgotten what took place from 1914 to 1918. There were heroes, there were great soldiers, there were friends of mine who went to the front and wrote their names in history. I had two brothers there, one of whom was wounded, who spent three and a half years at the front and fought with courage. But during the last twenty years we have been in the grip of an agony as a result of the war, and we wasted money the repayment of which will be a burden for generations to come. We go into our cities and we see men starving and seeking work. They ask for local expenditure. The women and children want fair protection, and here this government comes with an increase of two million dollars for armaments. I appeal to the country from this house; I do not think the government's request is fair. The province of Quebec is in the confederation and in the British Empire, and we are ready—I speak for my riding—to shoulder our proper responsibility, but this is not a request that should come at this time, and for my part I am going to vote for the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Gauthier) negatived: yeas, 17; nays, 91.

Mr. STIRLING: In the list which the minister read at the commencement of the consideration of this item, the amount appeared to me to total about $1,750,000. Then the minister gave two subsequent items amounting to about $250,000, so the total was about $2,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am ready to give the details: Repairs and upkeep to departmental properties, $830,000:—military district No. 1, $37,865; military district No. 2, $53,375; military district No. 3, $49,125; military district No. 4, $41,125; military district No. 5, $74,375; military district No. 6, $20,625; Halifax garrison, $99,375; joint service magazine, $13,375; military district No. 7, $23,135; military district No. 10, $69,375; military district No. 11, $42,375; military district No. 12, $12,775; military district No. 13, $40,000; Petawawa camp, $25,000; Ottawa services, $10,000; Connaught rifle range, $20,500; rifle ranges generally, $20,000; travelling and freight, $20,000; headquarters reserve, $77,600; alterations to armouries upon reorganization of the non-permanent active militia, $80,000 or a total of $830,000.

Mr. STIRLING: This vote would not cover any new equipment required for the reorganization in the non-permanent active militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; that is in general stores vote.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister explain what the air-conditioning item for Ottawa is for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This item is for the provision of air-conditioning equipment in certain rooms of the photographic building at Rockcliffe, in which it is essential that certain conditions as to temperature and humidity should be maintained in order to prevent distortions and scale changes which affect the accuracy of the completed work seriously.

[Mr. Gariepy.]

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give rather more of a description of the development that is being carried on at Valcartier? There was an amount given of $50,000 towards the expenses at the filling group. How nearly completed is the filling group?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This will complete it. There is $50,000 for the completion of works and surveys, filling group of the arsenal at Valcartier.

The second item for Valcartier is $30,000, for construction of three additional magazines. With the contemplated accommodation of the filling group at Valcartier in 1937, the magazine accommodation now under construction will be sufficient only for the storage of raw materials, but three additional magazine buildings will be required for storage of finished products and for storage of ammunition now in unsuitable accommodation at Levis.

A third item for Valcartier is $10,000 for continuation of the building program. Work in this connection will be undertaken on the hospital building, improvements for roadways, the engineers' compound and other small items.

Mr. STIRLING: And if the filling group is now just about complete, could the minister say when the transference of the work will take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I am informed, during the course of the present year, 1937.

Mr. GREEN: This item is largely for construction work. Would it not be possible to give a great deal of that work to the unemployed veterans? I understand that about 33,000 of them have already registered with the veterans' assistance commission, and of that number approximately one-half are employable. Surely this would be a good opportunity to provide work by day labour for quite a large number of these men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In all departmental contracts there is a clause to the effect that there must be a reasonable quota of ex-service men employed on these works.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible, in view of the fact that this vote is for defence purposes, to employ a larger number of returned men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to take that into consideration.

Mr. HEAPS: Is all this work to be let by contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Last year it was practically all let by contract.

Mr. HEAPS: On what principle is the letting of contracts determined?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In every case, to the lowest tender.

Mr. HEAPS: Did the lowest tenderer get the contract in every case last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except for one small contract in Nova Scotia, where it was decided that local coal should be used in preference to imported coal.

Mr. STIRLING: I wanted to ask the minister to amplify the remarks he made in his speech last week with regard to the investigation he has been carrying on to find out what industrial units could be utilized for the supply of equipment and munitions and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That matter comes under the general stores vote. I shall be glad to deal with it at that time.

Mr. QUELCH: For what sizes of guns are the emplacements being built on the west coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The guns that are now there, but were outmoded, were 9·2 guns, but they are being reconditioned, relined and remounted and will be as good as new when that work is completed. It was commenced last year. It is intended to supplement them with some six-inch guns and also, I believe, with some others.

Mr. HEAPS: Is much to be spent by way of expropriation of properties?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I could not give a definite answer. I should not think the amount would be very large. So far as possible we are proceeding by expropriation or negotiation—preferably by expropriation.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there much property to be bought out of the amount that is to be voted at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should think the amount will include the purchase of properties, but I do not suppose it will be very extensive, because in any case it is hoped these properties will not be located in congested areas.

Mr. MacNEIL: One matter causes me concern. In going over the reports of the Department of National Defence I find that amounts ranging from around $300,000 to approximately $1,000,000 have been voted each year in succession for this particular purpose, engineer services and works, and I assume that the same men who are now planning our coastal defences have been aware of the dangers with which, it is alleged, we are threatened at the present time. How does the minister account for the fact that notwithstanding these expenditures extending over a long period of years he now states plainly that no coastal defence exists? Why was no provision made, when the department was first made aware of war preparations in Europe and on the Pacific, for the defence which is now being planned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course my hon. friend will realize that I cannot answer for any of my predecessors. I can tell him that within one week of coming into office I took action to ascertain the present condition of these matters.

Mr. MacNEIL: Another question: Could the minister roughly segregate the amount of this vote that is being spent on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts and the amount that is being devoted for purposes inland? To what extent is money being expended on the further construction of armouries and training grounds?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is not a single cent for armouries, except a small amount for reconditioning. Not a cent is included in these estimates for new armouries.

Mr. MacNEIL: I assume that the minister is planning adequate protection against aircraft. Is the department taking into consideration the danger of air raids from over the arctic circle—which may not be as incredible as at the moment it may sound? In all seriousness, it has been shown by aviation experts in recent years that the shortest route to this country from some of those countries which we are led to believe may now be threatening Canada is over the arctic circle into the very centre of Canada. Is the defence plan taking into consideration protection against aircraft raids from that direction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Provision in that respect is being considered and, I believe, a report on the matter will be made to the department.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $6,060,699.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Clothing and necessaries, an increase of $35,000; miscellaneous stores, increase $97,950; artillery stores, increase $2,858,616; equipment and maintenance, increase $120,900; medical stores, increase $1,000. Inspection stores and ammunition, salaries and wages, maintenance and services; increase on the former of $54,900, on the latter of $141,650. Dominion arsenal, Quebec, $140,388. Other expenditures, $113,155. Extension to the gauge plant at the dominion arsenal, Quebec, $150,000; machinery, $15,000. For the dominion arsenal at Lindsay the increase is $950. Total increase $3,729,509, with a decrease of $220,010; or a net increase of $3,509,499.

Mr. THORSON: Where will these stores, particularly guns and munitions, be purchased?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as possible we are endeavouring to have them purchased in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: To what extent will that be done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have a committee now surveying all resources, both public and private, in the Dominion of Canada, with that purpose in view. We have not yet reached the stage of production of ammunition to any extent in the dominion, but the decided objective is, on account of the difficulty of obtaining these supplies outside the country, to have them manufactured in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: Is it intended to encourage the production of these stores in Canada and to set up factories for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course it would take some time to establish public factories for that purpose. At the present time, for the immediate emergency, it has been decided to cooperate with private industry, exercising proper supervision and control.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are General Motors making or proposing to make munitions or equipment for the department? Let me explain what I have in mind. There has been a rumour, for example, that the assembly plant at Regina is to be converted into a munitions factory by the General Motors corporation. I have read that in western papers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no information in that regard, and I do not believe that is the case. The only work which that corporation is doing for the department is trying to develop a tractor; as I recall, the sum of $4,500 has been expended in that work.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of course many of our industrial plants could be readily converted into munitions factories, and I believe that a good deal of the urge for rearmament is coming from industrialists who see the prospect of profit. That is the reason I should like to see something done to curtail possible munitions profits. One other question. I notice that in this item is included ammunition and guns and supplies. Following the question of the hon. member for Selkirk, may I ask, are we buying munitions from abroad? To be more specific, are we experimenting with any guns produced in Czechoslovakia? I have in mind the Bren machine gun. If so, what are we paying for these guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe it was the year before last that two were ordered by the department; ten more are now on order. The Bren is a new automatic machine gun which up to now has been manufactured in Czechoslovakia. I understand that the rights of the manufacturer have been purchased by the British government and that they are to construct as soon as possible a factory in the United Kingdom for the extensive production of that type of gun. The department has been looking into the question with a view to having the gun manufactured in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What are we paying for these guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe we paid $1,000 apiece for the first two.

Mr. COLDWELL: Anyone who has seen one of these guns and compared it with an automobile realizes that there is very little mechanism about it. These guns are manufactured, particularly under mass production, very cheaply, and here we are paying $1,000 apiece for machine guns from Czechoslovakia, probably from a factory owned by a gang of international munition makers, possibly to practise slaughter upon other nations who are using exactly the same gun to slaughter Canadian boys. It seems to me that if we are going to buy guns we ought to buy them without encouraging these enormous profits that are being made by the munition companies, and I call attention particularly to this gun from Czechoslovakia. We are paying $1,000 each for these guns and I venture to say they can be made for at least a quarter the cost of a Ford car.

Mr. THORSON: I have nothing to add to what I said the other day by way of protest against this program of increased armaments. I accept without hesitation, of course, the statement made by the Prime Minister that we have not made any commitments, but it is not always within the power of one individual to decide what the future will bring, and I am afraid that this policy now initiated with the best of motives will lead us in the wrong direction. I am opposed to it for the reasons I stated the other day, and therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix), that item 63 of the estimates of the Department of National Defence be reduced by $3,509,499.

The CHAIRMAN: I may point out that an amendment such as this does not require a seconder.

Mr. RAYMOND: The other day the Minister of National Defence, speaking on the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), said:

> We have reduced the military establishment of this country from 135,000 to 90,000; in fact we have done that within twelve months. All we are doing now is to see to it that this small force shall be properly equipped.

I understand that the item now under discussion is to provide for some equipment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. RAYMOND: I am surprised that there is an increase. If the military establishment has been reduced from 135,000 to 90,000, the cost of equipment should be reduced. Will the minister be kind enough to explain?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was no equipment to speak of before. We have reduced the paper strength, as it is called, of the militia forces from 135,000 to a total of about 90,000. The actual training strength will not be very much changed, but under the old form there was very little equipment available. What equipment we had was largely obsolete, and we are now endeavouring to get some modern guns and machine guns, and other things necessary for an effective and efficient militia force in the dominion. This is to replace equipment that has become obsolete and worn out and to obtain more adequate equipment for our forces.

Mr. RAYMOND: How was the money voted last year under a similar item spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was spent for the same purpose, but it was not nearly sufficient to proceed with the mechanization of the reorganized forces of Canada.

Mr. RAYMOND: Is this just for the present year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was preliminary to what we are doing now.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister must realize that both in this house and outside there is a strong volume of opinion against this vast increase. It is coming to be realized more and more even in this chamber, as we have seen this afternoon, that the vast amount of money we are asked to spend on these items will not make Canada any more secure against attack than it was last year and that these increased expenditures on armaments will not secure our neutrality to any greater extent. A certain number of people who stand to gain by these expenditures will be heartily in favour of this vast increase. The armament manufacturers or those who intend to manufacture armaments and those who have to deal with war materials will all be glad to see this increase, and in my opinion the increase this year is merely the prelude to greater increases to be asked for in this chamber in future years. I believe this is merely the thin end of the wedge, and the minister has more or less admitted it. It is my experience that those who run departments are always anxious to have the most efficient and the greatest department anywhere. In municipal affairs I have found the same thing. The head of the fire department wants the greatest fire-fighting apparatus to be found anywhere in the world, and the same applies to the war department. Now we are setting up a war department we are entering upon a vast expenditure for armaments.

I wish to refer to a statement made by the minister with regard to the purchase of munitions. I think it would be better if he did not go outside to purchase munitions. If the government is going to go into the purchase of armaments, in my opinion it should, as far as possible, establish its own munition plants. I do not think the minister has far to go at the present time. There is no need at this stage, for him to go to private armament manufacturers and ask them to put in bids, for in the last war the railway shops of Canada were able to turn out munitions, and I was told that they did so as efficiently and as cheaply as the private manufacturers could produce them, if not more so. If such is the case I want to take the profits out of this whole manufacture of munitions, if we can do it by the government owning, controlling and operating the munition factories. Then perhaps the pressure from outside by those who produce these goods would not be as strong as it is now. I should like to know whether the minister has canvassed the situation recently to see whether the government itself could not undertake the manufacture of munitions in plants in which they were manufactured during the last year. I have reference to the railway shops.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I find myself in agreement with much of what the hon. member has said, and the government took action some time ago along the lines he now suggests. An interdepartmental committee was appointed some months ago to make an industrial survey of the whole of Canada. That committee has been functioning. There is also in the Department of National Defence under the master general of the ordnance a joint army, navy and air supply committee, and that committee has already surveyed about sixty or seventy industrial plants throughout the dominion. It has also been instructed to survey the public plants of the kind to which my hon. friend has referred with a view to making an up to date report as to how far, in the event of an emergency, these plants could be used for public purposes. So that what my hon. friend advocates has been carried out for the last several months.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister says that in case of emergency these plants will be utilized. But I am not now referring to a case of emergency, unless he calls present conditions a case of emergency. I am referring to the money which we are asked to vote in this item, which is to go for the purchase of munitions. I want to know whether the minister can give an undertaking that the supplies for which this money is now being voted could not be manufactured in the railway shops, in plants which are partly or wholly under government control and ownership. A survey may have been made, but I want to know whether there is going to be a start made and these shops owned by the government and people of Canada kept in operation, because from these shops I am sure he will get just as good an article as, if not better than, that produced under private ownership.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A considerable amount under this vote we are considering will go to the government-owned institutions at Valcartier and the dominion arsenal at Quebec. In addition we are surveying the plants to which the hon. member has referred to see how far they can be used for the purpose.

Mr. HEAPS: Are there government-owned plants outside the railway shops capable of manufacturing munitions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Where are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are factories in Canada which did produce munitions during the war and would be willing to do so again if given the opportunity.

Mr. HEAPS: But those are privately-owned institutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. HEAPS: But what I want is to get the manufacture of these munitions entirely out of private hands. What I am asking is a complete survey of government-owned institutions capable of manufacturing munitions required by the government. If the minister could have that survey made, it would meet with the approval of people inside and outside this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is being done at the present time, in regard to both publicly and privately-owned plants.

Mr. FINN: Let me say to the hon. member who has just spoken and to hon. gentlemen opposite who supported the motion of want of confidence in the government, that they cannot blow hot and cold. They must either stand by their guns or desert their guns. Having found that a vast majority of this house and a tremendous body of public opinion in this country are favourable to the policy of the government as brought down by the Minister of National Defence, he asks the minister, in whom he voted want of confidence, whether he will give an undertaking. I ask him what good that undertaking would be to him after having voted no confidence in the minister.

Then the hon. member referred to defences on the Atlantic and the Pacific and asked what good were they. I did not speak on the amendment, but let me remind him that the country to the south of us is the United States. There is to-day what is called an imaginary boundary line between this country and that, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If the hon. member goes out in front of this building he will see carved deep in the stone over the main entrance these words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

Is it the responsibility of the government, is it the responsibility of this house, is it the responsibility of this country to defend these gates? If we do not defend them, then we are vulnerable to any enemy which may attack the United States, and then what happens? The enemy will enter Canada through these gates, and not only shall we be at once in the position of becoming belligerents, but the Americans will have to defend themselves against enemies invading their country through ours. Therefore the American government will have to fortify that imaginary boundary line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Let my hon. friends opposite who voted want of confidence in the government on this most important and vital matter answer that question as to whether they are in favour of reasonable defence of the gates of this country both east and west and the great St. Lawrence river, or whether they are in favour of a do-nothing policy, and simply telling the government which is in power to-day, You are no good for the fricassee; you are no good for the soup, and like the rabbit that ran away, you are no good at all. That, Mr. Chairman, is the position of my hon. friends led by the hon. gentleman in the front seat who is laughing on the front of his face. But the people of this country understand the situation, as does this house.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McNEVIN: Mr. Chairman, my object in rising is to point out to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) that in connection with securing a supply of arms and munitions sufficient to meet the requirements of the dominion, serious consideration should be given to using the facilities available in the constituency of Victoria, Ontario, which I have the honour to represent. With respect to overseas orders for arms and munitions which are coming to Canada, I do not believe the government would be justified in interfering with the private corporations which are filling these orders for arms and munitions. Yet, in connection with the supply of these materials for use, if needed, in our own country, the question is entirely different, and I believe it would be a sound policy for the government to manufacture arms and munitions for our own defence, when required. This policy would prevent private corporations from making exorbitant profits, as happened during the great war.

If present government facilities are operating at full capacity, and are not adequate, then we should carefully supervise any additional contracts for war material. I referred in my opening remarks to the dominion arsenal number two located at Lindsay, Ontario. This is a plant covering several acres, the buildings of which are in a reasonable state of repair. It is true some additional material and machinery of the newer type would have to be acquired. Yet the amount of money necessary to place the plant in perfect running order would not be an unreasonable sum. It should not be forgotten that in order to provide sidewalks, roads and other necessary civic services for the arsenal, the town of Lindsay spent from $75,000 to $100,000, a large amount of money for a town of only eight thousand people. This has added materially to the burdens of the corporation, which at the present time is receiving very little in return. The plant is the property of the dominion government. The item under discussion contains a substantial expenditure for arms and munitions, and I desire that the department supervised by the Minister of National Defence give consideration to reopening this plant in the present emergency, and that the manufacture of these materials be carried on at this plant under the direct supervision of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) said just before six o'clock. There are in Canada firms equipped to make the various items required, and they have no connection whatsoever with international munitions makers. One firm I have in mind is John Bertram and Sons Company, Limited, of Dundas, Ontario. That firm is one hundred per cent Canadian, employs Canadian workmen and is fully equipped to manufacture either big guns or munitions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin), may I say I had the pleasure of visiting Lindsay during the last year, and accompanied by officials of the department made a thorough inspection of the buildings and properties there. The government of Canada has in the properties at Lindsay a very considerable investment, amounting to about $800,000 for the land and $900,000 for the buildings, or a total of $1,700,000. I can assure the hon. member that this year the department will make a careful survey of the possibility of utilizing the property now in possession of the government, in connection with projects being developed.

May I tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), that there is no suggestion of any pressure in regard to any government policy, so far as firms in Canada are concerned. This is entirely regardless of any pressure or suggestions by any firms of any kind in Canada.

Mr. McNEVIN: I wish to thank the minister for his explanation. I am satisfied the government will give consideration to the matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I say a word or two in comment on what the minister has said in reference to the Lindsay arsenal. I know he was there, because I made a thorough inspection of the plant myself. In my view Lindsay is particularly well situated. I am familiar with the town and the surrounding country, and I believe it is well situated for the work the minister had in mind.

When he was speaking before the dinner recess the minister said that the department intended to do similar work at Valcartier and, if I remember correctly, at Montreal—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At Quebec.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. At that time I noticed he did not mention Lindsay. I had intended to bring the fact to his attention, because of all places mentioned I believe Lindsay has the best location. Valcartier could be blown off the map by aeroplane invasion, but it would take an aeroplane different from what we have to-day to cross the sea and then go as far west as Lindsay. Besides, the topography of the land about Lindsay lends protection, and its waterways offer points of landing for seaplanes. The buildings are as the minister described them.

May I now say a word on behalf of the minister's staff, at the Lindsay arsenal, because they all strike me as being competent men. I saw that they had covered all the equipment with grease, which is a first class protection, and I believe a word of commendation now and then from the head of the department would mean a great deal to men who take care sufficient to protect the valuable equipment in the plant. My understanding is that the machines could be put into instant operation. During the great war large quantities of munitions were made there, and ample testing places are available. I should like to encourage the minister to go the whole way in providing work for Lindsay workmen along with those of Valcartier and Quebec. Lindsay is so far removed from possible attack that anything done by the department at that point would be safe from attack by sea.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the survey made of the plant at Lindsay, may I say to the hon. member that to put the plant into shape for production of small arms and ammunition would cost in the neighbourhood of $400,000. To equip the plant with the necessary new machines to produce small arms and munitions would cost perhaps a million dollars.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister seems to be of opinion that we may be subject to air attack. I shall not argue the point with him, but shall ask him this question: In the defence estimates what provision is being made to secure supplies to reassure the civilian population that sufficient preparations will be ready to keep communities safe from air attack?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The only answer I can make is that by the cooperation of the three branches of the service we hope to be in a position to meet any such aggression, if it comes. I did not get the drift of the hon. member's question, and I do not know if he was referring to food supplies.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I am referring to actual defence from air attack. I think it is generally realized that an air raid would consist largely in the dropping of bombs. There are three types of bombs, namely the explosive bomb, the gas bomb and the incendiary bomb. Of the three I believe the last is by far the worst. It is all very well to say that the three branches of our military defence will cooperate to ward off attack, but I would direct attention to the fact that the Prime Minister of Great Britain told the British House of Commons that aeroplanes were not meant for defensive purposes and that it would be impossible through the use of planes to defend a city from aerial attack. If these are defence estimates, what defence are we providing for the people of Canada? Are we going to rely upon a few guns stuck here and there? I contend that that is no defence whatsoever. If the minister is right, our real defence lies in our preparedness to meet conditions which will arise should an air attack occur. I believe the purpose of such an attack would be to strike panic into the hearts of the people so that they would compel whatever government may be in power at the time to sue for peace. This brings me back to the point I made this afternoon, that armaments such as we can provide are simply provocative and would in my opinion invite a potential enemy to strike terror into the hearts of our people. What defence is the department providing in the event of air raids?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I said before, I do not pretend to be a superstrategist like my hon. friend, but I do suggest that aeroplanes provide the best defence against air raids. The only defence my hon. friends are willing to provide is no defence at all; they are ready to leave Canada entirely defenceless. We are making a reasonable effort to meet any possible aggression and I think we are all united in the hope that there will never be any need for these defences. We intend to provide on our coasts a few high speed aeroplanes which will work in cooperation with the other services.

Mr. COLDWELL: That does not answer my question. I want to know what preparations the department is making to protect our people from incendiary and gas bombs. I realize it would be almost impossible to provide protection against explosive bombs. As we all know from our general reading, the defence program of Great Britain has been concentrated upon this particular problem.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The best methods which the combined skill of the technical advisers of the department can devise will be taken and these will be used in conjunction with the precautionary measures already taken.

Mr. MAYBANK: For the convenience and education of the hon. gentleman, perhaps the minister could have all the plans of strategy published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. MacNEIL: As the minister is well aware, it does not require a superstrategist to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). In the event of an air raid the civilian population will suffer. The minister is well aware that military strategists of the first rank agree that the only defence against air attack is retaliation and we would have no opportunity to engage in such retaliation. I think special provision should be made to protect the women and children in the principal harbours on both our coasts. The minister should consider the building of bomb proof and gas proof shelters in order that the civilian population will not suffer. Is this defence merely for the small number of troops who will be actually manning the guns at these points? This matter is being considered in other countries and I cannot understand why the minister brushes our suggestions aside with derision, particularly as they concern the women and children of this dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may say that every single cent of these estimates might possibly be used for the protection of the women and children of Canada. I do not think my hon. friend is very helpful when he suggests that there should be no protection whatsoever.

Mr. MacNEIL: My question still remains unanswered. Is any provision being made for the construction of shelters in the event of air raids?

Mr. LENNARD: It does not require a military strategist to realize that should any country attack Canada by air, it would first of all establish an aeroplane base somewhere in Canada. If we did not have planes available to attack that base, we would be powerless.

Mr. POULIOT: This item of $6,060,699 covers "the purchase, inspection, maintenance and repair of stores, clothing, necessaries, mechanical and water transports; cost of material and labour for the manufacture of ammunition; inspection of output; maintenance of and repairs to arsenal buildings and plants; freight, cartage, transport and travelling expenses and other services generally." Does this item include anything for the purchase of ordnance, or is it just for the purchase of rifles and cartridges?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I said before, there is in this vote an item amounting to $3,795,331 for artillery stores, or an increase of $2,858,616.

Mr. POULIOT: About one-third of this vote will be used for the purchase of ordnance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): More than one-third for artillery stores.

Mr. POULIOT: Will this item cover the purchase of anti-aircraft guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are two sections of anti-aircraft artillery, including munitions for mobile units and excluding coast defence but available for these purposes which would cost about $350,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Items 62, 63, 64 and 65 are closely connected. One covers the building of fortifications and the providing of bases for guns. If I am not mistaken, that would be under item 62?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Quite right.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the guns and ammunition would come under item 63, general stores. These things would be used by the non-permanent and permanent militia, covered by items 64 and 65. I voted for the reduction of item 62 for several reasons, one of which was the fact that it covered the maintenance of historical buildings which I felt should be placed under the control of our parks commission. This shows that there is little order in the departments of government. Will the minister tell me if the final say in the purchase of the items covered under general stores will be left to him or will that be decided by a commission? I should like to know also if item 63 is under his control?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, under the control of the governor in council.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. This is how I understand government, Mr. Chairman, that every minister shall be boss of his own department, and shall not be bothered by commissions around him on which he can lean to escape responsibility. There is one thing that struck me in the minister's explanation a few moments ago with regard to Mr. Purvis. I am very much concerned about this item for general stores; I was very much afraid, and I think I still have reason to believe, that Mr. Purvis might be the nigger in the wood pile, but I will take the word of the minister that he has never spoken to Mr. Purvis about the increase in the military vote. I think that is a fair interpretation of the minister's words. I do not need to tell the committee that soldiers cannot fight with wooden guns or air rifles, like children. They must have real guns, and real ammunition for them, I admit. If the first item had been reduced, I would have voted for a proportional reduction in item 63, because as there would have been less engineering services and less work, the material required should also have been less.

But I will go the limit. I will take the word of the minister this time, but I promise that I shall scrutinize the other items very closely. Undoubtedly if we are to have a permanent and a non-permanent force, our soldiers should be reasonably well equipped; otherwise let us dispense entirely with the Department of National Defence. If we have soldiers, they must have clothes, be protected against the cold in winter and be well cared for while they serve in the army; otherwise let us reduce the whole vote for this department to one dollar or one cent. But if we are to have an army, we must look after our soldiers in peace time as well as in war. That is my humble view, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment to this item. I do not know what I shall do on the others.

Mr. BARBER: What is meant by mechanical water transport?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The operation and maintenance of mechanical transport vehicles with the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps. The increase this year is $416, the amount being $25,401 this year as compared with $24,985 last year; other vehicles, last year $12,845, and this year $16,935, or an increase of $4,090. In the item for the purchase of motor transport vehicles there is a decrease from $33,263 last year to $28,757 this year. The amount for operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Army Service Corps water transports is $7,450.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) before the dinner recess tried to make it appear that our attitude over here was not consistent with the attitude we took the other day. I maintain that it is absolutely consistent, and that in fact we are taking very much the same attitude as the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) took just a few moments ago. He said that if we were going to have soldiers we could not arm them with wooden guns. All things are relative, and it is just as logical to arm soldiers with wooden guns as to try to protect this dominion by expending the appropriations that are now before the committee. It is as impossible to do the one as the other. Our geography and our long coast line make it impossible for us to defend ourselves by making these expenditures.

Referring to the question we were discussing a moment ago as to the manufacture of munitions by the government or by private enterprise, I understand the minister stated that surveys had been made. I should like to ask how much of the supplies at present being used by the government was manufactured by government works, how much was supplied by private industry within the dominion, and what proportion we imported from other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is my hon. friend speaking of munitions only, or of all supplies?

Mr. MacINNIS: Of all supplies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Until the present year quite a lot of the supplies required by the department, ordinary supplies which any department might require, like clothing—

Mr. MacINNIS: Leave out clothing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So far as the supply of munitions is concerned we have been limited in recent years to the production of the Quebec arsenal, but now we have just about completed the filling group at Valcartier, which is a dominion-owned institution operated in conjunction with the ammunition group at the arsenal in Quebec. We have had to import some munitions from other sources. It is hoped now, especially in view of the delay there would be in obtaining supplies from overseas, that most of our supplies can be manufactured in Canada. That is why the survey is now being made in regard to publicly-owned and private plants, the supervision of private manufactures or the utilization of available government-owned institutions.

Mr. MacINNIS: That point is a very important one. If we have to have armaments and munitions of war for offence or defence, so far as possible they should be manufactured by the federal government rather than by private firms engaged in the manufacture of arms. To turn the work over to private enterprise would mean that we would be continually subjected to pressure to buy supplies. There are rumours floating around at the present time that are disquieting, and we should be very careful that we do not give occasion for such rumours to arise, or put ourselves into the position where we shall be subject to pressure in the future.

Mr. HEAPS: Did I understand from the minister that the survey is now almost completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will take at least another year.

Mr. HEAPS: Assuming that it does take another year, there must be in the possession of the government at the present time quite a number of facts pertaining to sites now under government control and as to facilities which the government could command in the immediate future. Could sufficient arms and munitions be supplied in the government's own factories to meet present needs?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are two principles involved. The first would be to decide the question of complete public ownership of these utilities; the second, their capacity to produce sufficient quantities to meet requirements. My hon. friend will realize that it takes some time to instal new machinery—new jigs and dies and all the necessary implements of production—in any factory, publicly or privately owned. At the present time it seems essential to expedite as much as possible the production of these necessary supplies. There may be an immediate policy and a long range policy. A long range policy would doubtless, as it did in England, combine government-owned arsenals and institutions with the cooperation, attended by strict supervision, of private industries.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister at hand the contracts that were placed outside Canada for light and heavy artillery, small arms and tanks, et cetera, the countries in which they were placed, and the firms with which they were placed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think that in recent months we have placed any contracts of the kind my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Do I take it that no contracts were placed outside Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were for aeroplanes, but that was twenty-four months ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS: None for small arms or artillery or tanks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, not recently.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it proposed, in connection with the amount we are voting in the present estimates, that these arms and munitions be manufactured in publicly-owned plants here in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member will find very greatly increased amounts for production of these articles in arsenals which are now government-owned in the Dominion of Canada. It is a question whether these will be sufficient to meet the increased amount provided for in these estimates, and therefore it may be necessary, during this year at any rate, to cooperate with private industry, with, as I said before, the most rigid supervision. After all, with regard to profits there are three elements: in the first place, supplying our own necessities in our own country in peace time; in the second place, the control of exports from Canada, and in the third place, the measures that it might be necessary to take if an emergency arose. The first one can be handled in two ways: in the first place, with reference to about eighty per cent of our supplies, where the principle of competition can be utilized one can, I think, safeguard the public interest. But the duty of the government becomes evident when you deal with the remaining ten or fifteen or twenty per cent, where the production is highly specialized, and it is in cases such as these that in England they now are using a very rigid system of inspection and of audit, and have introduced the principle of reasonable remuneration, thereby eliminating excessive profits from the production of armaments or munitions. In regard to export to other countries, I think my hon. friends will find, before this session is over, that the provisions of sections 290 and 122 of the Customs Act will be stiffened so as to give the government more control over the export situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister any idea what proportion of this vote is likely to be spent in Canada for the purchase of these supplies? Or will it be spent in England?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except with reference to, probably, some guns which could not possibly be made in Canada, by far the greater proportion, probably eighty per cent, of the amount, will be spent in Canada.

Mr. MacNEIL: Have any purchases been made or any contracts placed for the purchase of anti-aircraft artillery or heavy guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: If so, from what sources?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think an order was placed by my predecessor for anti-aircraft guns from England. Of course we are amplifying that order by providing in these estimates for some more anti-aircraft guns.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could the name of the firm be given?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All orders were placed through the British War Office, as in the case of the Bren guns. I think I probably misled my hon. friends this afternoon. Although those machine guns were made in Czechoslovakia they were ordered through the British War Office.

Mr. POULIOT: Are they on trucks or to be put on foundations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that anti-aircraft guns are mobile units.

Mr. MacNEIL: Have any purchases been made or contracts placed for tanks or armoured motor vehicles?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; in the estimates we are now considering there is provision for some few light tanks. In the reorganization of the militia which was effected on December 15 last there are six tank battalions created; each one is to be supplied with one light tank for instructional purposes, and the tank depot at London, Ontario, will have three tanks for instructional purposes.

Mr. MacNEIL: What purchases have been made or what contracts have been placed for the purchase of machine guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Twelve Bren light automatic machine guns, two of which have arrived in Canada, were ordered from the British War Office. There is provision in these estimates for twenty-one more guns of the same kind for instructional uses in the various units throughout Canada; there is also provision for a substantial further number. It has not yet been decided whether they will be obtained from England or manufactured in Canada. An endeavour is being made to see if they can be manufactured here.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. COLDWELL: What company has secured the manufacturing rights of the Bren gun?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): None so far. Several have been endeavouring to do so.

Mr. COLDWELL: The gun is still under the control of the Czechoslovakian company?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; the British War Office.

Mr. DUPUIS: I assume that the government was authorized under previous estimates to place orders for such guns in England?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. Orders went out last year and the year before.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand the minister to say that so far as small arm munitions are concerned, we are in a position to manufacture all our requirements in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; I said this, that we are endeavouring through inquiries to find out if we can so do. Last year we certainly did not have the facilities in this country, and as far as I know we do not have them yet. Various people have been endeavouring to obtain the rights for manufacturing machine guns, but so far there is absolutely—

Mr. BENNETT: No—small arm munitions. I gathered—and I want to be sure I am correct—that we have facilities in this country to manufacture all the small arm munitions we may require. Is that right?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right. We have the facilities here for manufacturing small arm munitions, and we are providing in these estimates for the augmentation of the productive capacity in the arsenals with reference to small arm munitions.

Mr. BENNETT: Small arm munitions are manufactured at the present moment, I suppose, at the arsenal at Quebec?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What will the Valcartier arsenal manufacture?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is another operation of an exactly similar kind to the Quebec arsenal production, an extension of it.

Mr. BENNETT: And what about the Lindsay arsenal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Lindsay arsenal is at the present time used only for the storage of equipment.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Lindsay arsenal, as my right hon. friend knows, was used for this purpose before and could be so used again. We have made investigations of the cost of so doing. According to the estimates we have received, it would cost $400,000 to place the Lindsay arsenal in a position again to manufacture small arm munitions.

Mr. BENNETT: The equipment was not taken away?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; it was stored there.

Mr. BENNETT: And I suppose it is obsolescent as compared with current equipment; is that the position?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And those are the three places at which we manufacture small arm munitions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is quite correct.

Mr. BENNETT: When we come to shell cases, we of course manufactured shell cases in large quantities in this country during the war. Are we in a position to manufacture shell cases in Canada now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe that to a small extent that is now done in the dominion arsenal at Quebec. But my right hon. friend may know that recently a private corporation in Canada is carrying out at Hamilton an order for shell cases for the British government.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That is the National Steel Car Corporation.

Mr. McNEVIN: In view of the fact that Lindsay arsenal has been mentioned, I might state that while some of the machinery is obsolete and out of date, a large number of machines are still fit for certain operations.

Mr. LACOMBE: Speaking this afternoon on item 62, I asked the minister if it was the intention of the department to come every year before parliament or before the committee and ask for such an increase in the vote for national defence. To make my position perfectly clear, I ask the minister if his answer is the same as regards item 63.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; my answer must be the same. I am not in a position at the present time to announce what the policy of the government may be next year; that must necessarily depend upon conditions then prevailing. However, I should hope that no increases would be necessary. After all, a minister of the crown has responsibilities in connection with his department and I simply could not make, I would refuse to make commitments now with reference to what may be done next year.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If I understood the minister correctly, I understood him to say that the British war department had the right to manufacture certain machine guns, and that certain companies were trying to secure these rights in Canada. Would it be possible for the government to secure them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, I think so.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not inquiring about government policy, but that seems to be the wise course, knowing as I do the minister's attitude towards taking the profits out of war manufacture. Would the government give consideration to such a step?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No decision has been made in that regard, but I want to leave this thought with my hon. friend. In connection with the installation of these factories the preliminary cost is tremendously heavy. The cost of the machinery is heavy, and if in a year's time we could dispense with it there would be an enormous economic change resulting in the throwing out of employment of a good many people. The economic argument must be met. I realize the force of the argument for having these things publicly owned, but if we require some supplies within a reasonable time we may have to cooperate with private interests.

Mr. HEAPS: Would not the same argument apply to private concerns? They would have to get equipment, and if it were no longer required the same argument would apply to their staffs, who would no longer be needed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But it would not cost the private concerns as much.

Mr. HEAPS: Why would it cost the government more?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A private concern could turn its plant to a good many other uses.

Mr. QUELCH: Are the manufacturers of war material in Canada subsidized?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, at least not by the Canadian government.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does this provide for the purchase and use of chemicals in warfare?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MacNEIL: No thermite?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Would this be the appropriate item under which to discuss the question of aeroplanes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That comes under the next vote, vote No. 69 or No. 70 on page 26.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a considerable quantity of machinery stored at Valcartier in storehouses and sheds. I do not remember whether it was for the manufacture of guns or what it was for, but when I inspected the machinery it was all in excellent order, capable of being used again. For what purposes would it be used?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not familiar with that situation.

Mr. POWER: That must be the machinery taken from the Ross rifle factory when it was dismantled years ago.

Mr. STIRLING: I thought it was in connection with heavy guns.

Mr. POWER: I believe it has to do with the manufacture of Ross rifles, abandoned since about the middle of the war. That is the machinery now stored in the immigration sheds in Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. Thorson that item 63 of the estimates of the Department of National Defence be reduced by $3,509,499.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 26; nays, 113.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister go into a little further detail with regard to this investigation that he is carrying on? I understand that a departmental committee of officers is considering the factory possibilities throughout Canada. How do they know where to go? Are lists submitted? Are applications made, or does the minister send this committee to certain places?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I said this afternoon, there was created by order in council an inter-departmental committee from five government departments in connection with an industrial survey in case there might be an emergency, and in the Department of National Defence there has been formed a departmental supply committee called the army, navy and air supply committee. They are making a survey of the general requirements of the nation industrially. In regard to applications for examination, no application has been refused but in some cases they have not yet completed inspections asked for. Requests have come from public bodies such as boards of trade, firms, from members of parliament and others. As far as I know, in no case has a request been refused. The idea is to make this survey as comprehensive as possible so that there may be on file complete information with reference to all industrial plants in the dominion.

Mr. STIRLING: Did the minister publicly intimate that it was desirable to have applications? Is he sure that all factories with possibilities have got into touch with the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not believe that was done, and possibly it should be done, because a request came from the committee itself the other day for more publicity in order that all those who are interested may immediately file applications for inspection.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the name of the firm to which the minister referred a minute ago—the firm having contracts with the British government for the manufacture of shell-casing in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no official knowledge, and can speak only from hearsay, but I believe it was the National Steel Car Corporation of Canada, Limited.

Mr. MacNEIL: With reference to stores, to what extent has the minister accepted the advice of experts from the British War Office?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think they were consulted with reference to the stores vote.

Mr. MacNEIL: Might we have a clearer explanation of the duties to which these officers have been assigned in Canada? I understand there are twelve. What particular duties have they undertaken in connection with the reorganization of the Canadian military forces. What are the plans for coastal defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not know of any separate organization in connection with the reorganization. The only organization established is the one I mentioned in reply to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) with reference to the industrial survey. They have obtained the services of Colonel Ogilvie of the Department of Mines, but the personnel has not yet been decided upon.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister mentioned that in the case of the Bren machine guns, they were obtained through the war office. They were actually manufactured, I think, in Czechoslovakia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, by the war office.

Mr. STIRLING: In connection with the shell cases which were also ordered, or to be ordered through the British War Office, how will that operate? Will they be made in Woolwich?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have not ordered any so far.

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the minister to say they probably would be obtained—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, just the few machine guns.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said a moment ago that certain guns were ordered through the British War Office. He mentioned two or three items. What is the modus vivendi in connection with that? How is the British War Office used and what are its functions qua our department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The first thing, of course, is to get an order in council authorizing the purchase from either the air ministry in regard to certain aeroplanes or the war office, and I think the high commissioner's office in England was used. They are practically acting as agents for the Canadian government in getting supplies for us and thereby assuring us that we are getting good equipment at reasonable prices.

Mr. STIRLING: At the present time the British government we understand is working full time and overtime to supply its own requirements. I remember instances when we endeavoured to purchase this and that and found it was impossible to get delivery for two, three or four years. Is the minister not going to run into that difficulty?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, I quite agree. The average time for the supply of aeroplanes from England is twenty-four months, and it would be longer than that in regard to munitions. I think some equipment ordered by my hon. friend long before he left office has not yet been delivered. That is why it is going to be absolutely necessary for us to supply our own requirements.

Mr. BENNETT: That is why I was asking the minister whether or not he believed that this appropriation of $6,000,000 could be spent during the twelve months.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is going to be very difficult.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it is not for me to suggest what the path of wisdom would be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The main thing is to get the appropriation through first.

Mr. MacNEIL: To what extent does this vote provide for the purchase of mines and depth charges for the protection of our harbours and also chains necessary to intercept raiding craft.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is nothing in this vote. I think there is in the naval vote provision to a certain extent for the equipment mentioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) asked the minister about ten military officers from Great Britain. They have been mentioned a number of times. Are there ten or twelve, and what are their names and duties?

Mr. POULIOT: And experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The interchange officers from Great Britain in Canada are as follows:

Capt. and Bt. Major G. H. A. MacMillan, M.C., Argyl & Sutherland Highlanders at Royal Military College;
Capt. E. F. B. Cook, R.E., at Royal Military College as instructor in engineering;
Capt. T. C. Thompson, M.C., Royal Signallers to signal training centre, Camp Borden;
Capt. J. B. Gordon-Duff, Rifle Brigade, to P.P.C.L.I.;
Lieut. J. S. Symons, R.H.A. to R.CA.;
Lieut. H. A Prince, Sixth Gurkha Rifles, to R.C.R.

That is a total of six, and we have also six officers interchanged with these officers, who are on various duties in England, for instance:

Major J. C. Murchie, R.C.A. at War Office;
Capt. & Bt. Major W. C. Thackray, R.C.A. to Royal Artillery;
Capt. N. J. W. Smith, R.C.E. to R.E., Aldershot;
Lieut. H. F. Cotton, P.P.C.L.I. to First Battalion Rifle Brigade;
Capt. G. W. Smart, R.C. Signallers to Fourth Division Signallers;
Lieut. R. M. Crowe, R.C.R. to Fifth Battalion 12th Frontier Force Regiment, India.

This practice has been going on for many years; it is no new departure.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have we any similar exchanges with other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MUTCH: Can the minister tell us whether these officers imported from England have been vaccinated?

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $2,578,740.

Mr. POULIOT: Does this item include disbanded regiments, and, if so, how many?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think what my hon. friend is referring to is that in the reorganization some of the old regiments have to be disbanded because new units have to be created. There was an increase of artillery units and engineering; some infantry and cavalry units were disbanded, and these were shown on the returns for some time.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not catch the minister's answer. I should like to know the definition of a disbanded regiment. Besides that, I wonder whether any of those are considered as non-permanent active militia, or if they will be revived in case of need.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Necessarily a disbanded regiment ceases to exist, but if there should be a change of policy a regiment could be revived with its old name.

Miss MACPHAIL: A resurrection, in other words.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his explanation, but may I refer you, sir, to the fact that an hon. gentleman here to-night is an honorary colonel of three disbanded regiments. Most foolish. However, I shall not insist on that. But the minister has just told us about the officers who have come from England, all captains and one lieutenant, no honorary colonels, no honorary lieutenant-colonels. No one hears of such a thing in Great Britain, but here we like what is fictitious, and we think a lot of these honorary officers. I would ask the minister, for his own peace and security, to drop all appointments of honorary officers. We do not need them. Some people are fond of brass hats and so on; I do not care for them, I say that openly and no one will prevent me from saying that I am against brass hats and honorary colonels and honorary lieutenant-colonels. What is most stupid is that there are only two full colonels in active service, and I think forty-six honorary colonels.

Let us be serious. As we have a large country, vast in area, we must have efficient transportation for every unit. May I quote the example of the United States where special officers are trained with great care, possess great skill and will be ready within a very brief time to form regiments and battalions. They have the knowledge required of leaders in the army, and with a small group of officers the United States have a very practical non-permanent active militia. I ask the minister whether the officers of his department are aware of the facts as to how the officers are trained at West Point and elsewhere, and whether Canada is to act on similar lines.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I tell the hon. member that we have the Royal Military College, one which is reputed to be as good as any in the United States or England.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister. Might I ask him the number of officers and men, and their pay, in the non-permanent active militia. While he is looking for the information, may I say that we now see the waste of money in connection with the League of Nations. Canada, subscribing to the league, has spent millions of dollars. We are one of the few countries which has honoured bills received from Geneva. What is the result of that? It has been more expense for the Department of National Defence. This is not the only country in that difficulty; every country is in it. I believe these facts show that the moneys voted for the league are pure waste.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member for Témiscouata seems to have a grudge against honorary colonels. May I convey to him the fact that if it were not for some honorary colonels, many of the militia regiments to-day would not be in existence. The money they get from the government would not keep them long. I know of one honorary colonel who contributed $20,000 in the last two years. They should receive a great deal of credit, and should not be criticized so much.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. member for Parkdale for his kindly interruption. May I ask him how much money the honorary colonel of three disbanded regiments must subscribe to those disbanded regiments to keep them going on, disbanded?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In reply to the hon. member may I say that in the non-permanent militia there are 6,812 officers and 42,080 other ranks, making a total of 48,892 as of June 30, 1936.

Mr. POULIOT: How long do the officers and other ranks serve during the year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As a rule they serve exactly the same length of time. They do their training with their units. In some cases they do their annual training during the summer months. The period of training varies from ten to fourteen days, according to the militia unit concerned.

Mr. GREEN: How many anti-aircraft batteries are provided in the reorganization?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has not yet been finally decided upon. The exact location of the anti-aircraft batteries has not yet been decided, but is being considered.

Mr. GREEN: Placing of some of the units has been announced, but I can find no reference to anti-aircraft batteries on the lower mainland of British Columbia. Will a battery be placed there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This might come under the heading of coastal defence, as apart from the reorganization of the units of the non-active militia.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are any militia officers retiring on pension owing to the amalgamation or disbandment of militia units?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; no officers would be affected, because no pension is payable to non-permanent active militia in that way.

Mr. LENNARD: I have heard reference to-night to the pay received by officers of the non-permanent militia. I know a little about what goes on in the non-permanent militia forces, and I have yet to hear of one officer in the non-permanent active militia who has received any of the salary allotted to him. It goes into battalion funds.

Mr. MacNEIL: To what will the increase be devoted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is mostly for training. May I read the memorandum in regard to it:

To provide for 9 days' additional training for N.P.A.M. anti-aircraft batteries, coast defence batteries, engineer fortress companies and fortress signal companies, and two days' additional training for cavalry, infantry and services.

To provide for a small increase in camp training as opposed to training at local headquarters.

To provide special training for units which will be converted from one arm of the service to another; particularly infantry units being converted to machine gun battalions or tank battalions.

To enable units that have been formed by the amalgamation of two or more units, or have been converted to another arm to train approximately the same numbers as were trained by the original units during 1936-37. This provision is considered most important if the enthusiasm of the new units is to be maintained.

To provide additional funds for royal and provisional schools in order that officers and n.c.o's of units being converted from one arm of the service to another may receive instruction in their new duties.

To provide funds for additional courses of instruction in tank and armoured car training.

To provide a small increase in funds to cover expenses in connection with sickness and injuries to personnel and horses in consequence of increased numbers to be trained.

To provide an increase in the annual allowances in consequence of increased numbers to be trained.

To provide a small increase in funds for the purchase of training manuals. Several manuals are being revised and reorganization of the N.P.A.M. necessitates the purchase of an increased number of others.

Grants to Associations—$1,500.

As a result of reorganization of the N.P.A.M. the number of units affiliated with certain of the Associations has increased while in the case of other associations, there has been a decrease in membership. The additional amount of $1,500 is to meet increased expenditures of the associations in which the number of affiliated units has increased.

Operational expenses of military properties—$10,912.

The bulk of this increase ($6,800) is to cover new charges against this allotment, that is for rent of the Sarcee Indian reserve which has been paid from training allotment in past years, and for snow removal at Halifax which was formerly taken care of by military personnel or by relief labour.

The balance is chiefly due to increased cost for fuel, et cetera, owing to changes in armoury accommodation.

Salaries and wages—$11,228.

There is a net increase of 13 positions as compared with 1936-37. This is chiefly to adopt the approved policy of the department of making civilian appointments to positions such as caretakers, watchmen and firemen, so that military personnel who are presently performing these duties may devote their entire services to regimental duties.

Provision is also made for a few additional caretakers, necessary for the care of new buildings recently taken over by the department, and in some cases to supplement the present staff, consequent upon reorganization of the non-permanent active militia.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to mention one matter to the minister. He said that the total number of men in the non-active militia was some 48,000. How many were there last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course the paper strength last year of the militia, before reorganization, was 130,000 in round numbers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that is what I am coming to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The training strength last year was 39,000 in round numbers, and this year we are making provision for a training strength of about 46,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The point I am trying to make was that when I heard him use the figure the other day I was not unaware of the fact that a report was made to the former government with respect to the matter. Reorganization involved a reduction from 143,000 paper strength to 90,000 paper strength. But paper strength had no value; it was the strength actually on the rolls, and the strength on the rolls last year was a little less than 40,000. Do I understand the strength on the rolls now is some 48,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The strength on the rolls for training purposes. The paper strength on the rolls this year is about 87,000. We can train only 46,000 of these.

Mr. BENNETT: When I use the term "paper strength," I mean the actual men attached to the units. They had 140,000 at one time. That was paper strength, pure and simple.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: At that time there was a discussion as to the reorganization of eleven divisions with one division of cavalry, as the possible thing. After the Washington conference we reduced that to six divisions with one cavalry division. It is upon that statement the minister is now proceeding with his operations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was prior to the disarmament conference, in 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; there were two separate things. I happened to have received the same secret report as the minister is talking about. It provided for eleven divisions, besides the cavalry division. After the Washington conference of 1921-22 we began to readjust our situation. Finally, because of our being called upon to make a report to Geneva for the purposes of the disarmament conference as to what we would regard as our effectives, we made a report which contemplated an effective and paper strength of about 90,000. I understand it is upon this figure that the minister now proceeds. He contemplates the training of a little more than half that number.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty about the situation is that the paper strength is no indication of the real strength. You can with some degree of certainty say that if you undertake to train 48,000, you probably will be able to train that number. In the breakdown of item number 64, how much is it contemplated to spend on training?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total amount to be spent on training is $1,785,800.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that training for seven days or ten days?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It varies according to the unit. Certain arms of the service get more training, especially the coastal defence batteries and the artillery units.

Mr. BENNETT: The infantry training is for seven or ten days?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Artillery, field army, 12 days; coast defence, 21 days. Engineers: units other than fort companies, 12 days; fortress companies, 21 days. R.C.C.S., 14 or 21 days. C.O.T.C., 12 days. Cavalry and infantry, 10 days. R.C.A.S.C. and R.C.A.M.C., 10 days.

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest that officers and non-commissioned officers in the non-permanent active militia should be Canadians. A Canadian is more patriotic and makes a better soldier than anyone else and there is no excuse for other than Canadians being in this branch of the service.

Mr. MacNEIL: I move that vote number 64, non-permanent active militia, be reduced by the amount of $220,640. I move this amendment because of the facts disclosed by the minister during the previous debate. There is every indication that the major part of these appropriations will go to the creation of a mobile force, an ideal arrangement for the dispatch of an expeditionary force overseas. As was intimated, no great attention is being paid to the development of coastal defences or of what might be strictly described as the defence of Canada. There is also every indication of very close cooperation between what has been termed the Canadian war department and the British War Office. I believe our Department of National Defence was rightly described as our war department by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). We have often suspected that department of being the Canadian branch of the British War Office.

There has been no indication that this department has attempted to achieve any greater efficiency or to overcome the obsolete methods which have been adopted in the past. I directed the attention of the minister to the fact that since the armistice this parliament has voted millions for the purposes of national defence and he has admitted in this house that at the end of that period actually no defence exists, that nothing has been accomplished. The suggestion has been made that we are unchivalrous in attacking the officers of the department, but I would remind the committee that the same practice has been carried out by both sides of the chamber in connection with men who were unable to defend themselves. I think it is quite permissible to question the competency of a department which has shown no results over a long period of years. It is the same staff made up of the same so-called experts who will be called upon to expend these additional amounts, and there is no definite assurance that under a reorganization the department will achieve a more efficient defence. We have had no assurance from the minister that an adequate plan will be evolved to restrict war profits in advance of the outbreak of war or upon the outbreak of war. There has been no definite assurance from the minister that there will be a proper organization of war industry.

There has been no indication that the department will assume any greater responsibility in the expenditure of these sums in connection with the development of the physiques of the young men who may be called upon to serve in these various units. We may yet be involved in a struggle without any opportunity being given to this house to express the will of the Canadian people. Under the Militia Act as it stands to-day the governor in council may dispatch troops abroad by declaring an emergency, and this would be an accomplished fact when parliament met within fifteen days. In moving this amendment we want to make our position clear that in opposing the increase in these votes, we do not take the position that Canada should be entirely without defence. We believe that the ordinary amounts made available to this department should be sufficient to provide adequate protection for our coasts without creating additional forces and storing large amounts of war materials. I am very much alarmed by the admissions made by the minister that this vote simply indicates the commencement of a program which in five or six years will increase the votes to—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must correct that statement; I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister said that he would make no commitment with regard to the future but that undoubtedly similar expenditures would be necessary in succeeding years in order to complete the program. I think it is a reasonable inference to make that the general program will necessitate the increasing of these estimates from year to year until our armament project reaches a possible expenditure of $100,000,000. Under these circumstances and in the absence of suitable explanations from the minister, I believe we are fully justified in protesting against the increase in this item.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the percentage of Canadian-born and Canadian residents in the non-permanent active militia, as compared with English-born? I am referring to officers and non-commissioned officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry, but that is not known. However, I may say that all the members of the non-permanent militia are good Canadians.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister, in replying to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), gave the number of officers and other ranks in the non-permanent forces. Did he also give the amount of money paid to these men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not have that information under my hand, but I shall get it.

Amendment (Mr. MacNeil) negatived: yeas, 26; nays, 92.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister has said there is to be an increase in the non-active militia forces during the coming year. Could he state where these increases will take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are distributed all over the country. The authorized peace establishment on December 31, 1935, was 9,010 officers; other ranks, 124,925, or a total of 133,935; 1936, officers, 8,670; other ranks, 117,920, or a total of 126,590. Then the actual strength by military districts is as follows:

Strength by Districts

Permanent force, $5,848,039.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister how many militia councils there are, who compose them, and have all members of these militia councils been in the line in a theatre of war? If not, who are those who have never been there? When I speak of a theatre of war, I speak of any theatre of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The defence council is as follows: the minister is the president; the deputy minister, the vice-president; the chief of the general staff, the director of naval service, and the senior air officer are members, while the adjutant general, the quartermaster general, the master general of the ordnance and the judge advocate general are associate members.

Mr. POULIOT: And the names?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister, the hon. member knows. The deputy minister sits in front of me, Colonel LaFlèche; the chief of the general staff is Major-General Ashton; the director of naval service is Commodore Nelles; the senior air officer is Air Commodore Croil; the adjutant general is Major-General Constantine; the quartermaster general is Major-General T. V. Anderson; the master general of the ordannce is Major-General Caldwell, and the judge advocate general is Colonel Orde.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, Colonel Orde. Has he ever been in the line in a theatre of war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Did he get an increase in pay last year, and are there many other officers in the drill shed or armouries at Ottawa who have had an increase in pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe his classification was changed.

Mr. POULIOT: An increase of $600, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, approximately.

Mr. POULIOT: Are there other officers in the drill shed who have had an increase in pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are bound to be every year because there are promotions and retirements every year.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking of the permanent force, may I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to sessional paper 160 reference No. 41, tabled on February 10? A wonderful resumé has been made of it by the correspondent of the Canadian Press, who found that there are 95 officers and 215 other ranks in the department 37 years of age or older, and 34 officers and 377 men younger than 37. Then, dealing with those 37 and over, he found there were 68 officers and 119 men who had served in the line in an actual theatre of war; 4 officers and 9 men who had been stationed farther than twenty miles behind the fighting line; 9 officers and 18 men who had been stationed in England; 14 officers and 60 men who did not leave Canada on active service overseas. Of the total departmental staff, 92 officers and 345 men were born in Canada; 37 officers and 246 men were born outside Canada.

For that reason, sir, I shall vote against this item, because I do not see why men born outside Canada should be on the headquarters staff of the department. There are now 246 of them, and that does not include non-commissioned officers, as to whom I shall have the figures later on because the house has passed an order for a return of that information. I do not see why we do not have good Canadians at departmental headquarters at Ottawa. We have some, but they are not all Canadians. There is no excuse for not giving a chance to Canadians to enlist in the departmental staff as men, as non-commissioned officers, and as officers. It is clear this is something that should be done, and there is no excuse for the contrary. So long as there is one man born outside Canada in the Department of National Defence I shall vote against this item. There should be a general clean-up there.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the minister?

Mr. POULIOT: We have adopted him. I was speaking of the men. The minister is a good Canadian by adoption. Canada is his country by adoption and, I would say, by predilection; besides, he has been elected by the people, and therefore he is all right with me.

An hon. MEMBER: And he is a good Scotsman.

Mr. POULIOT: And he is a good Scotsman. There are many good things about him. I know the minister is not responsible for the state of affairs that exists in the department. What I said the other day I meant. I am not going to move an amendment, but I am ready to vote for an amendment to reduce the vote to the figure at which it stood last year, just on account of the state of affairs in the department and also because of red tape. I am strongly opposed to red tape. Red tape must disappear from the Department of National Defence. I am in favour of a good army to defend our country, but I want no red tape and I want no other people than good Canadians to defend our own country. That is where we should find real patriotism. When I say Canadians, I mean Canadians at heart; some of them, like the minister, may not have been born in this country, but the majority should be Canadians. As I have said, however, I do not blame the minister or the deputy minister for the present state of affairs; I blame the bureaucracy that has been established there a long time. The minister and the deputy minister have served in the fighting line, but there are some in the department who were hiding themselves when the others were fighting,—and now they are the bosses and try to run the whole show. Enough of that; it must stop. Representatives of the people must bring them to their senses.

There is something else. I ask the minister by what process an efficiency medal is granted to any man in the army. I ask him also if a man has not to be in active service for twelve years before becoming entitled to receive the efficiency medal, and if it is not against King's Regulations and Orders to award that medal to anyone who has not been on active service but who is just an honorary officer. I suggest to the minister that he should read that part of the regulations which relates to the efficiency medal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Canadian efficiency decorations are awarded to officers who have completed twenty years of service in the non-permanent active militia and have been certified by the responsible military authorities as being efficient and thoroughly capable officers. Service in the ranks may count as half time, war service as double time, providing the officer was serving in the non-permanent active militia on or before August 4, 1914. Honorary colonels and lieutenant colonels who have qualifying service are also eligible. In all cases the granting of this decoration is purely a matter of routine affecting those who have qualified through the necessary length of service.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister give a more detailed statement as to how this amount is to be spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. The increase is $234,713. Administration takes $3,998. Provision is made for one officer previously included in the general allotment. There are also minor adjustments of pay and allowances. As regards training, there is an increase of $28,000. That is consequent upon reorganization being carried out in the non-permanent active militia. A larger number of instructors will have to be provided by permanent force units; there will be additional unit training, and courses in Canada, with new equipment recently received and more which will be available during the coming year. Combined training of the permanent force units at a central camp calls for some small increase in addition to the normal courses abroad. Instruction in coast defence, tanks and armoured cars will have to be carried out by eight officers; $11,563 is due to the provision for increased personnel and new building accommodation. An increase of $191,152 is shown under a general heading in which provision is made for an increase of twenty-two officers and one hundred and seventy-three other ranks. This includes nine officers and eighty other ranks who were previously engaged in connection with civil aviation, and also a small increase in other charges incidental to the increase in strength.

Mr. HEAPS: How many men and how many officers are involved in this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are twenty-two officers and one hundred and seventy-three other ranks. Of these, nine officers and eighty other ranks were previously paid under the vote for civil aviation—they probably belonged to the signal corps; they are now paid under this vote.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total number of men and the total number of officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): December 31, 1936, 419 officers and 3,617 other ranks, or a total of 4,036.

Mr. POULIOT: And what is the pay of each, please ?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Colonel, on appointment, $9.20 per day, after three years in the rank, $9.60; after six years in the rank, $10. Lieutenant-colonel, on appointment, $7.70; after three years in the rank, $8.10; after six years in the rank, $8.50.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but what I want to know is the total amount to be paid to officers, on the one hand, and men, on the other; also the amount to be paid to non-commissioned officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I regret that it is all shown as the total of pay and allowances.

Mr. POULIOT: What I want is the total for officers, non-commissioned officers and men. I will also ask the minister if the number of non-commissioned officers was included in the number of other ranks that he gave before.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. The pay and allowances for 362 officers is $1,029,081; for 3,595 other ranks, $3,504,091.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. May I ask the minister also if there is any militia council besides the one he has mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. In the old days, I believe, it was called the militia council. It is now called the defence council.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister tell us who are the members of that council besides himself and his deputy, whom we all know, who have been in the fighting line in an actual theatre of war? Who are the other members of the council who have been nearer than twenty miles to the firing line, and for more than a week?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed they all saw service either in this war or in former wars.

Mr. POULIOT: In both wars? Not any war. In the South African or the great war? Just a minute, Mr. Chairman, the minister is ready to answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have answered.

Mr. POULIOT: Were there any who did not go to any war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not mean officers who have gone to England. That does not interest me. That an officer has been stationed in Canada or in the rear in France does not interest me either. I want to know if every member of the council has been in the trenches, in France, on the Salonika front or elsewhere, or at sea, for more than a week during any war? If there are some who have not, I should like to know their names.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I have no personal knowledge touching the hon. member's question. My information is that they all saw service.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister began to give us the per diem rates of pay for the various ranks. Will he complete that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These are the rates:

Rank	Pay
Colonel—on appointment	$ 9.20
after 3 years in rank	9.60

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these amounts inclusive of rations and quarters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are there allowances for married officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. In every single case mentioned there are allowances for single and married officers and men of other ranks on a corresponding scale. There is a graduated scale of allowances according to whether they are single or married.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the minister give the allowances?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These are the allowances:

Rank	Single	Married
Colonel	$3.20	$4.40
Lt.-Colonel	3.00	4.20
Major	2.70	3.80
Captain	2.30	3.20
Lieut. and 2nd. Lieut.	1.80	2.60

Mr. DOUGLAS: What men of different ranks in the three arms of the service are in training in Great Britain? The minister said that there were six officers. This summer I met a number of Canadian officers from the air force who are training in London.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall have those under the various votes.

Mr. POULIOT: It has been said that the increases in these votes are due to the spread of communism. That may be so; that may be one of the reasons why there is an increase in these votes. But, Mr. Chairman, would you like to have a recipe for the prevention of communism, something that will result not in an increase but in a decrease in expenditures? There is one thing against which I have always protested and will always protest, and as soon as I have an opportunity to do so I will try to introduce legislation in that regard. For the present, however, I will say that one thing which is shameful is the fact that some members of the Department of National Defence have one foot in that department and the other foot in some other department and on that account they get a pension when they hold a job for which there is no pension. One case is that of General McNaughton. It is a shame. That man, who belongs to the permanent force for which there is a vote here, is no longer chief of staff. He was entitled to a pension of $4,800 in June, 1935. He was not transferred but was seconded or loaned to the Department of Trade and Commerce as head of the National Research Council although he is not qualified for that position, and he receives a large salary, a salary of $15,000—$15,000 too much—and will be entitled afterwards to a pension which will be double the pension to which he is now entitled. He is entitled to a pension as former chief of staff. Let the government send him back to the Department of National Defence and appoint to the National Research Council a good man like Sir Frederick Banting. It would be an honour to him and a great boon to humanity to have Sir Frederick Banting replace General McNaughton as head of the National Research Council. I am willing to go the limit with regard to the permanent force and to make any concession I can. But when a man is no longer necessary in one department and chooses to go to another, he should go there with his two feet; he should not keep one foot in the National Defence department and the other foot in some other department. If the Department of National Defence agrees to the change, it is because it no longer requires him, and if he is not needed in that department I do not see why he should be given this advantage. I cannot understand it. I submit, therefore, that the law in connection with the permanent force should be amended in the very near future, because such a salary paid to a man who is not qualified to receive it is a direct provocation to communists and to all those who are against social order in the country. I am strongly opposed to such salaries being paid to nonentities, to men who give pink teas day after day in an effort to make those whom they entertain forget that they are nonentities. But they are nonentities and they will offer people a glass of wine or a cup of tea, a piece of toast or a piece of cake. And that piece of toast, that piece of cake, that glass of wine, or that cup of tea is an investment they make to keep their job. This is the way in which some people in high office in the civil service carry on. It is bureaucracy at its worst; I denounce it again in this year 1937, the centennial anniversary of the year 1837, and I do not denounce it for McNaughton only, I denounce it for all those who are in the same class of suckers of the civil service, who try to run the whole show. I hope that notice is sufficient to those concerned.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister quoted a number of allowances just now. In the auditor general's report there is something called a flying allowance. What is that, and to whom is it paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That comes under the Royal Canadian Air Force vote. I shall be glad to give the information then.

Mr. MacNEIL: Sometimes this item appears in addition to ordinary pay and allowances of officers attached to headquarters. How many of the officers attached to the permanent force are entitled to the flying allowance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that when a militia officer is attached to the Royal Canadian Air Force and is instructed to fly, he gets an additional allowance of $2 a day for the period so employed.

Mr. POULIOT: May I direct the attention of the committee to a mistake which is frequently made in the English language. It is that when an hon. member judges anyone in the pay of this country, the papers say that such member has attacked such high official. I do not attack McNaughton, any more than I would be attacking my bootblack if I said he had given me a bad shine. This man is in the pay of the dominion government. He is a servant of the servants of the people. Therefore I did not attack him; I judged him, as I have a right to do. By tolerance we admit people in the gallery; we could discuss the case of any civil servant in camera without letting anyone hear our remarks, but as we live in a free country people can listen. This is no attack, and those who say it is an attack make a mistake in the use of English; it is just a judgment which we pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In reply to the question of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), there are four officers of the staff at the staff college, Camberley; two at staff college, Quetta; one at the imperial defence college, London; one at the senior officers school, Sheerness; two at the gunnery staff course, Woolwich; one at the anti-aircraft defence school; two at the school of military engineering, Chatham; one at the London City Guilds college; one at the ordnance officers' course, Woolwich, and one at the small arms courses, England.

Mr. STIRLING: In Quetta, India?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: I move in amendment:

That vote No. 65, permanent force, be reduced by $234,713.

I do so for the reasons I have stated before, and also because the minister has shown no justification for this increase. I protest against preparations for an overseas expeditionary force in Canada at this time without full disclosure of our policy in that regard.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend does not say too much, I shall vote for his amendment. If he says too much, I shall not.

Amendment (Mr. MacNeil) negatived: yeas, 22; nays, 83.

Mr. BENNETT: Does General McNaughton at the present time receive any pension of any kind from this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as I know, not a cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to ask further whether the minister is aware that General McNaughton receives the salary which the Prime Minister fixed for the head of the National Research Council and which was paid to his predecessor?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is my understanding.

Mr. POULIOT: Now I shall have to give some more explanation on account of what has just been said by the leader of the opposition. Here was Doctor Tory, one of the clearest minds of this country, a man who had been the principal of a great university in the west, a man of great knowledge and a scientist. When he left he was refused a pension by the right hon. leader of the Tory party, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett). He refused Doctor Tory a pension; then he appointed his pet McNaughton to that high position, and I remember that you, sir, took exception to the matter yourself when you were on the other side of the house. So did I. But never an answer from that moribund government. We were being asked to save money to this country. By sending McNaughton back to the Department of National Defence there would be a saving of thousands of dollars to the Canadian exchequer. But the previous government did not listen to that; they gave a deaf ear to that wise advice, which came not only from St. Mary and Témiscouata but from nearly the whole opposition. McNaughton who had a salary of $9,000 as chief of staff in the Department of National Defence was entitled to a pension of $4,800, or $1,000 more than members of parliament receive now for their arduous duties; he was entitled for the balance of his life to a pension of $4,800; surely that was enough. But although he had apparently no scientific training since the day he left McGill, three score years ago—or one and a half score years ago—he was appointed as head of the National Research Council. To the surprise of all of us that great military genius was put there. We find McNaughton on the National Research Council, Steel on the radio commission, and MacBrien in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—a fine trio. And afterwards we hear about peace! Mr. Chairman, McNaughton was not transferred; he was loaned. He was loaned by the previous government. He was loaned to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Why? To serve the purpose of the high-ups, of their bureaucracy at its worst. Knowing nothing about the progress of science, he was placed in the National Research Council. He was there at a salary of $15,000. In spite of the fact that the commission does not command any pension, and due to the fact that he has not been transferred but has been seconded and loaned by the Department of National Defence, instead of having only $4,800 for his pension he will have $9,000 yearly when he retires, and that will be in three or four years at the most. It is shameful, sir, and I strongly protest against it. I maintain that man is not competent, that it is a case of shameful favouritism which anyone must denounce bitterly, because it is a provocation to those who suffer hunger and who complain that they have nothing to eat. It is a provocation to all. I have no animosity against Mr. McNaughton; I do not care about him. For me he is a nonentity and not a man at all, but I do not want any Canadian citizen to ask me, "How is it I can have nothing to eat, while that man has too much, much more than he deserves"? That is all.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I desire to point out that it is an error to state that Doctor Tory was refused a pension. Doctor Tory was in the service of the country for several years under an appointment which did not enable him to pay into the superannuation fund. He was not eligible, nor was it suggested at any time that he was eligible for pension. I desire to point out, further, that all those who do receive pension under the civil service pay a premium during the period of their term of office, for the purpose of receiving the pension which is awarded to them by law and not as a gratuity or as a charitable act. It is something for which they pay, as we pay for endowment insurance. They pay a premium, and in the estimates the government supplements it to the extent of $2,000,000 each year. That is a right which is accorded by an act which was not made by any of us, and which has been on the statute books for many years.

Mr. POULIOT: One word: I said that Doctor Tory had no pension. He had none. This is a well known fact, and the record is to that effect. That is one point. The second point I know very well, namely, that according to the Militia Act a man from the Department of National Defence may be transferred to another department. That is all right. But this enactment is all wrong, and I will take the first opportunity to have it repealed. The other point is that a man has to be defended when he is a pet. The reason McNaughton was appointed to such a high post at such a high salary was not because he was competent but because he was a very dear pet. That is all.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could the minister give us the distribution of the permanent force, as he did the militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have it by military districts.

Mr. DOUGLAS: All right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are these:

Mr. MacNEIL: In the plan of reorganization has consideration been given to the abolition of some military districts? It seems to me that we now could concentrate our effort on the development of coastal defence, and that in the interests of economy we might abolish some of the thirteen military districts for which headquarters are now maintained. Under the new plan of reorganization will that be possible?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From time to time the question raised has been discussed, but it has not come to my attention recently in connection with reorganization. Suggestions are coming in from time to time, and it has been discussed at headquarters.

Item agreed to.

Royal Military College, $377,200.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the staff of the military college, and what are the rates of pay for instructors in the institution?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The rates of pay are:

Appointment—Rank—Name—Amount

Commandant, R.M.C., Brigadier, H. H. Matthews, $6,000.

G.S.O.I., Lt.-Col., K. Stuart, $3,723.

Staff Adjutant, Major Bvt. Lt.-Col., C. R. S. Stein, $3,248.60.

Instructor, Air Force, Sqdn. Leader, G. E. Wait, $4,200.

Mr. COLDWELL: What are the academic standards required for students entering the Royal Military College?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are as follows:

A candidate must be a British subject, and his parents must have resided in Canada for the two years immediately preceding the date of entrance. A son of an ex-cadet of the Royal Military College of Canada whose residence is anywhere in the British Empire, or a son of a member of the Canadian civil service or the Canadian diplomatic corps, shall not be disqualified on the grounds of non-residence.

At the discretion of the minister, the provision in regard to residence in Canada may be waived in favour of sons of:—

(i) members of the Canadian militia or ex-members of the Canadian permanent force or the Canadian expeditionary force, who, for reasons of health are residing outside of Canada.

(ii) British subjects employed temporarily abroad by purely Canadian commercial or industrial concerns.

In such cases, an affidavit, setting forth the circumstances which require the applicant to reside abroad, must be submitted with the application.

A candidate must have attained the age of sixteen years and not have attained the age of nineteen years on the 1st January in the year in which entrance to the college is desired. In special cases, where a candidate has passed honour or senior matriculation and is physically well developed, he may, on the recommendation of the selection board, and with the approval of the Minister of National Defence, be admitted if not more than two months under the minimum age.

Educational qualifications — The minimum qualification for entrance is as shown hereunder. Any superior qualification (e.g. senior matriculation or partial senior matriculation in addition to junior matriculation) which candidates may submit will be taken into consideration in determining the order of merit of candidates.

To be qualified for admission to the Royal Military College a candidate must have completed a "pass" standard in the examination for any one of the following, provided such examination includes the compulsory subjects algebra and geometry:—

Nova Scotia—Grade XI certificate, provided it covers the requirements for junior matriculation in arts or science at any of the recognized universities in the province.

New Brunswick—Provincial junior matriculation.

Prince Edward Island—Second year certificate of the Prince of Wales' college.

Quebec—The junior matriculation of McGill university, Loyola college, Laval university or L'Ecole Polytechnique, Montreal; or a certificate from the authorities of Laval university that they accept the educational standing of a candidate as the equivalent of their matriculation.

Ontario—Provincial junior matriculation or the matriculation of the University of Ottawa.

Manitoba—Provincial junior matriculation.

Saskatchewan—Provincial junior matriculation.

Alberta—Grade XI diploma.

British Columbia—Provincial junior matriculation.
Abroad—The school certificate of the Oxford and Cambridge examination board or the University of London, which will be accepted, subject for subject, as equivalent of the junior matriculation of McGill university.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What was the enrolment last year at the college?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The number of vacancies allotted by the department for the school term ending September, 1936, was 44. Three additional vacancies occurred after the allotments by the selection board, so the total would be 47.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What was the total number attending the college?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two hundred is the total number allotted, and I think they were up to strength last year.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister break up that forty-seven into the different provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Ontario, allotted quota, 14; candidates admitted, 16; Quebec, French-speaking, quota, 9; admitted, 5; English-speaking, quota, 2, admitted, 7; Nova Scotia, quota, 2; admitted, 3; New Brunswick, quota, 1; admitted, 2; Manitoba, quota, 3; admitted, 3; British Columbia, quota, 3; admitted, 4; Saskatchewan, quota, 4; admitted, 4; Alberta, quota, 3; admitted, 2; Prince Edward Island, quota, 1; admitted, none; Abroad, quota, 2; admitted, 1. The total quota was forty-four and the total admitted, forty-seven.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What fee do the students pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): First year, annual fees, $100, outfitting allowance $250 and expense allowance $200; second year, $100 and expense allowance, $200; third year, $100 and expense allowance, $200; fourth year, $100 and expense allowance, $200.

Miss MACPHAIL: What is meant by expense allowance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I suppose it is what we would call spending money.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the $100 tuition fee cover board and room?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that is the total with the $200 expense allowance.

Miss MACPHAIL: This seems to be a good scheme for the people who can get their children into the college. It has been stated often in this house that the federal government has nothing to do with education, but here we are maintaining an institution where history, mathematics, algebra, geometry and all the things that go to make up education are taught. We vote considerable sums of money in order that a certain group may have their education spoon-fed. This small group of 200 are really educated at the expense of the dominion government. They get their spending money; they get their fees and they get their board and room paid for with only a small expenditure on the part of their parents. They are practically kept by the state. I am not going to say any more about it other than that this is a part of the whole mistaken scheme of always preparing for war.

Mr. VIEN: I think the hon. member is mistaken. The expense allowance is provided by the student in addition to the tuition fee of $100.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total cost to a student for the four year course is $1,500.

Miss MACPHAIL: Why was the minister referring to spending money? What has that to do with the item under consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was giving the expense to a student attending the college.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is that spending money provided by the government for the student or by the student for himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is provided by the student.

Miss MACPHAIL: What has the Department of National Defence to do with the amount of spending money a student provides for himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was giving an estimate of the cost to a student attending the Royal Military College.

Mr. COLDWELL: This $250 is really the minimum amount of spending money a student must have? We are everlastingly talking thrift to our children and yet we provide $250 a year as spending money. That seems to me to be quite thriftless.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to see scholarships provided for needy students all over Canada who cannot afford to pursue their studies. I do not expect that my suggestion will be acted upon, but I would like to see this total amount of $377,200 made available to students in Canada who have not the means to pursue the studies they are well qualified to pursue. I have always thought that the Royal Military College was a part of the war machine in Canada; I still think so, and I resent the fact that while, ordinarily, education cannot be touched by the federal government, yet in circumstances such as these the federal government hires professors and they go on teaching these students. We do this in one field, but in another field we cannot teach young Canadians because the field of education is controlled by the provinces. I protest against that.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have here an item of nearly $400,000 which is spent for the education of approximately, I think, 200 students. I wonder whether the minister could give us any information as to the occupation these men follow after their university career is finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think I had better give the percentage taking commissions. The balance would go to civilian occupations, mostly to different branches of the engineering profession. The percentage taking commissions from 1919 on was 18, 5, 14, 9, 28, 30, 29, 18, 29, 12, 23, 30, 17, 47, 35, 49, 44 per cent. So 56 per cent last year would go into civilian occupations, and 44 per cent took commissions in various services.

Mr. HEAPS: Why does the military college train students for private vocations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The military college provides excellent instruction in various branches of the engineering profession, and when the students graduate, if there are not openings for them in various branches of the service, naturally they go into different professions.

Mr. HEAPS: I know of cases where students have entered the Royal Military College, when the opportunity presented itself, in order to obtain a civilian training. If we are going to have a military college, why should it not be maintained strictly as a military institution? Not that I am anxious to maintain military institutions, but if we are going to maintain this one, that seems to me the efficient way to conduct it. Would the minister tell us whether there would be vacancies in our permanent militia for 100 per cent of the students upon graduation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that there would not necessarily be.

Mr. HEAPS: Complaint was made a few moments ago by one hon. member that a large number of officers with the Canadian militia have come over from Great Britain. I do not know to what extent that is true, but the statement has been made, and other members have the same impression. Perhaps the minister would give us information in that regard.

[Miss Macphail.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is my hon. friend speaking of the non-permanent militia or of the permanent force?

Mr. HEAPS: The permanent force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are quite a number in the permanent force who are British-born, but in the permanent force there are no officers from England except for temporary periods of attachment in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS: On what basis are the Royal Military College students selected?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a quota basis from the various provinces of the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Fixed by statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, fixed by statute.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I know there is a quota for each province; but how are the students selected? Is it by examination?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The board of education for the province makes a report on the educational standing of the applicants, and then selection is made on the basis of comparison and merit.

Mr. VIEN: I would like to suggest an amendment to the course of tuition given in the Royal Military College. Prior to two years ago the student who graduated from the Royal Military College could enter a university of the province of Quebec for any profession, but last year the Quebec law with respect to the bar, the Quebec Bar Act, was amended, so that to-day a graduate from the Royal Military College is not admitted to the study of law in the province of Quebec unless he follows an additional course in philosophy. I would suggest, in order that graduates of the Royal Military College might be able to enter any liberal profession, that philosophy should be added to the course of tuition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct attention to one thing, which I thought the minister was going to deal with? The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) asked why we should maintain the Royal Military College. It is maintained under the provisions of head 7 of section 91 of the British North America Act. Under that section, as perhaps all members know, exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the militia, military and naval service, and defence was vested in this parliament, and under that provision we have established that school. That answers to some extent the question put by the last member, as to why the course of instruction is as it is.

On the question of education generally I was surprised at the question being asked in the form in which it was. Section 93 of the British North America Act provides:

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions—

And those provisions respect the rights of minorities and matters of that kind.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice that the cost of the Royal Military College is $368,400. If there are 200 pupils, that means the cost is approximately $1,800 per pupil. Is that in addition to the fee which is paid? If so, the cost runs to nearly $2,000 per pupil per year, and I would point out that many of our schools in western Canada are being run for a quarter of that amount, for the teacher and the education of all the students in the school.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total expenditure for the year 1935-36 was $359,-132.83. The average for 200 students in 1935 was $1,795.66, or, less the annual fee of $100, $1,695.66.

Mr. LOCKHART: In view of the increased activity in aviation, are any arrangements being made at the Royal Military College to have the curriculum include instruction in this field of work to encourage and develop our young men who may be going through the college? Is any special provision being made for the young men to develop in that field?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the present time we have in the college an instructor in aviation. But I think what the hon. member means is to make special facilities available for these boys, on graduation, to enter the air force. That is being done.

Mr. LOCKHART: The reason I inquire is that I know quite a number of the boys who are attending the Royal Military College, and there is a feeling among them that a number would like to enter the aviation field. I wondered whether that wish could be met to the extent of special training and other inducements to them to enter that branch of the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the present time graduates are offered commissions in the Royal Canadian Air Force, but I assume the same conditions apply here as obtain in other branches of the service, and that all cannot get commissions who wish to obtain them.

Mr. MARTIN: Without anticipating the resolution which stands in my name, it does seem to me, having in mind the great expenditure on the Royal Military College, an institution intended for the national welfare, and in view of the reply given by the minister that a student expends on his own behalf about $1,500 over the four year course, that opportunities should be given to young men who have not the means but who possess special aptitude for this kind of work; that if the college is to be maintained as a state institution, some facilities should be afforded to poorer students in order to remove the stigma of aristocracy or exclusiveness which certainly attaches to those who are privileged to attend the college. I say that without desiring to reflect upon the character of any of those who are now attending or have attended the Royal Military College. But in every community in which I have lived there are some boys who, because they have attended the college, consider that they occupy in consequence a special social standing in the community. Yet there were many others in the same community who were as well qualified to attend but who, because of financial disability, were precluded from doing so. I suggest to the minister that serious consideration be given to extending the privilege of training at this institution to those who, solely because of financial reasons, are unable to attend. I should like to have the minister either approve or disapprove this suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I might sympathize very largely with the views of my hon. friend, but they raise, of course, a question of government policy upon which I am not competent at the present time to pass.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Are there any aeroplanes or is any equipment of that type available at the military college for the education of the students? If so, what amount of this money is set apart for that kind of training?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My information is that they are instructed at the Royal Military College in the theory of aviation and subsequently go for training courses to Camp Borden or elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) overlooks one fact. All the students who go to the Royal Military College, Kingston, go there on merit. I remember a former minister of militia, Colonel Ralston, saying that perhaps it was the one institution left in all the world in which merit determined the right of a student to attend. There is no question of financial position at the time the examinations are held; if a student who is very poor tops the list he will have the opportunity of going, and in most cases there have been found in all communities men willing to assist such students to go to that college. I have in mind a case that came to my own attention through a friend who was deeply interested in the welfare of a young man who had passed at the top, and who succeeded in graduating although he came from a very humble home and had no money of his own. It is not unusual for boys of humble circumstances to graduate at the top of their class, but the point I desired to make was that it is perfectly clear there is no question of riches or poverty at the time the preliminary examination is passed; choice is made on the basis of merit and not on the financial or social circumstances of students.

Mr. DUPUIS: But in the case of these poor students who are at the top of their class there is, I understand, no government appropriation to help them to attend the Royal Military College.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are not debarred from going, except that the number of students who can be accommodated is limited to two hundred, and of course that makes the number available from each province comparatively small.

Mr. DUPUIS: But supposing it is only possible for the young man's parents to pay the $100 fee; the balance of money required will not be paid, I suppose, by the military college administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. It costs $450 the first year and $350 each year thereafter until the student graduates.

Mr. HAYHURST: As I understand it, the body that chooses the students selects them on the basis of merit, but I must point out that in many parts of Canada, and certainly in my own district, nothing is known of the Royal Military College and no one from our community has ever been accepted in the college. At least one hon. member has spoken this evening as though it made some difference where a man is born. In my constituency it happens that most people come from central or eastern Europe, but it does not matter whether they are born in England, or Ireland or eastern Europe or Quebec or Ontario or elsewhere, they all receive the same consideration at the hands of our people and, I may add, at the hands of the Alberta department of education; so that I take issue with anyone who raises in this house any question of racial superiority or even suggests that because, for instance, one man was born in Scotland and another in England there may be some difference in their calibre or abilities. I have always held the idea that, no matter where a man or a woman is born, he or she is to be judged wholly by his or her integrity, character and intelligence. The same considerations, in my opinion, should apply to admission to the Royal Military College. It happens that in Alberta two boys were chosen for the British navy. We know why they were chosen, because a competitive examination was held and thrown open to applicants from Alberta. These two boys, one from Lethbridge and one from Vegreville, were selected and entered as cadets, and they are now serving as lieutenants in the British navy. As I have said, this was a competitive examination, and selections were made on the basis of ability, irrespective of race, creed or colour.

It would seem that knowledge of the Royal Military College should be more widespread, so that we may be assured of recruiting boys who have ability, without special consideration to those whose financial circumstances may enable them to get the best type of training, which I believe must or should be given at the college, if they can get $1,700 per pupil. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated that in Saskatchewan many schools are run for a quarter of that amount. In Alberta we consider ourselves lucky if we get a similar amount. What we need is a more equitable deal for all the people of Canada, without regard for this race superiority complex, which should not be voiced in this chamber.

At times one finds it difficult, when listening to these debates on defence, to separate what is intended to be serious from what seems to be futile. As a matter of fact, a whole lot of it is purely political propaganda, perhaps for the purpose of raising our status as politicians. We are one of the British peoples, though some hon. members seem to hate to admit it. After all, we are all a part of the British Empire, and although I represent a part of Canada more thickly populated than any other by new Canadians, I am not afraid to make that statement. I repeat, we are all a part of the British Empire, notwithstanding the fact that there are people who perhaps feel it is a terrible thing for us to have the British fleet behind us. I do not suppose that in Britain they mind saying, the fleet is behind us. I do not think there should be any objection to having aeroplanes to protect our own coasts in order to safeguard our democracy. I feel keenly about democracy because it is the greatest asset we have. It is something to be prized, to be able to come here and speak our minds freely and listen to the different statements that are made. Some hon. member from Toronto said that Canada resembled a Balkan state, but as a matter of fact each province is part of the great dominion, and whether we were born in England or anywhere else, we should all be loyal to the dominion.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are the students required to have a recommendation from the minister or from any other person in order to be admitted to the college?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister has no say, except in certain cases where the quota is not filled; then the selection is made from a general list by the selection board, and the appointments are made on merit.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is that determined by competitive examination?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): According to the ratings they have previously established in their respective provinces. If one province did not fill its quota, there might be a vacancy and that would be filled after a comparison of qualifications and on the basis of merit.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose in a particular province there are four vacancies and of the persons entitled to go one or two decline, Would an opportunity be given to the students in that province to fill the vacancy or vacancies?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; it is done from the general list if the province does not fill its quota.

Mr. MacNEIL: Are graduate students, not granted commissions on the forces, kept on the reserve of officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They join the militia.

Mr. McCANN: Has the Royal Military College any degree-conferring power?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. McCANN: It is unfortunate that it has not. I have known something of the institution for a number of years and have known a great number of distinguished graduates. I feel, at times when there is a good deal of criticism of the institution, that we do not stop to think. There is not in this country a university which, through the tuition fees paid by its students, would be in a position to educate them. We forget entirely that our universities are aided either by private philanthropy, endowment funds or provincial grants. The Royal Military College could not for a moment carry on if it were not given some aid from the federal government, and it being the only institution of its kind in Canada carrying on its particular line of work, I submit that it is entitled to the aid it receives from the federal government. It is too bad that this government, who run the Royal Military College, do not arrange that a degree should be conferred upon those who graduate—a degree which would entitle the graduates to be placed in exactly the same position as are men in universities who take a similar course.

A number of those who graduate from the Royal Military College take out commissions in the imperial army and follow that particular career. There are others who take a course in engineering, and who, in order to enter the competitive field in engineering, in this or in any other country, after leaving that school, find it necessary to take a year at some recognized university which has the degree-conferring power. I suggest to the minister that this institution should have a charter as a university in order to give its graduates degrees just as universities do that pass students in the different lines of science. I know, having been educated in the city in which the Royal Military College is situated, that although a good deal is said at times about its students assuming that they have a higher social standard because they belong to that particular school, because they wear a pill-box hat, and although there is supposed to be some snobbery among them, it was one of the duties imposed upon us attending Queen's university to take some of that snobbery out of them—and we were usually successful—so that they were better off for having been in a town where there was another university. However, that is aside from the point I wish to make, which is that the Royal Military College holds in Canada a unique position. It has trained a large number of men who have reached prominence in the military and scientific departments of the country and it is doing a very useful work. I submit, therefore, that it should continue to have the federal subsidy provided for in this vote.

Mr. LENNARD: Referring to the question of snobbery among the cadets of the Royal Military College, I should like to say that they show a distinct politeness to their elders which is lacking in some of those attending our universities.

Mr. BENNETT: I had hoped that the minister would answer the very pertinent inquiry made by my hon. friend from Renfrew South. The fact is that I asked the question myself when I first knew of the college. The reason no degrees are awarded is that it is not intended that the college should give a civil education, if I may use that term, and the justification for its existence is found under the head of section 91 of the British North America Act. If it were awarding degrees for academic distinction, it would be placed in such a position that it might be regarded as violating the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act. It is therefore, a purely constitutional reason why no degrees are awarded. The institution can exist only as a military school. Essentially that characteristic must dominate its life, and if it departs from that and becomes a civil educational institution under the provisions of the provincial legislatures, it can receive no federal aid. That is the real reason.

EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE ACT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to repeal the Employment and Social Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am moving the introduction and the first reading of this bill to repeal the Employment and Social Insurance Act. Last June this legislation was K.O'd by the Supreme Court of Canada and on January 28 the privy council gave it its coup de grace. Since February 1 this legislative corpse has been lying in state on the order paper. It is too late to revive it or even to embalm it. This bill is intended to be a grave digger as it is high time that this legislation was buried.

If I may be permitted, I should like to give a little experience I had just recently. Three commissioners were appointed under this act, and I was told the other day by the government that the judgment of the privy council decided the status of these gentlemen. I drew your honour's attention to the fact that one of these commissioners had been canvassing from door to door among the members and I inquired if he had a licence as a parliamentary agent. I went up to my room and I saw him in the corridor speaking to a stenographer. He was probably trying to canvass her. He told me that he wanted to see one of my colleagues, whose office was beside mine. I happened to know from that hon. gentleman that this former commissioner, who had received a salary of $9,000 per year for doing nothing, was looking for another soft job paying at least $5,500. I called down to the main door to have a constable sent up. When the constable came up I asked him to ask this gentleman if he had a licence as a parliamentary agent. The gentleman gave no answer to the constable. I then went over myself and I said, "What are you doing here, bothering the members, running from room to room?" He said, "I want to see such and such a member." I said, "I know that is false because that member told me he wanted nothing to do with you, that you were just looking for a soft job." I said, "Have you a card as a parliamentary agent?" And he said, "No." I then asked the constable to escort him out of this parliamentary building, which he did. I had to do this thing myself, but I did it, and this gentleman is now out of the building. Therefore I want the commission put out of the picture also. I move the introduction of this bill, seconded by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père), the respected whip of Quebec.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Of course my hon. friend can insist upon introducing this bill and the others that follow it on the order paper, but I should like to say that the legislation which these bills are intended to repeal has no operative effect whatever and no purpose would be served by taking it out of our statutes. On the other hand, some of this legislation might be amended and by co-operation with the provinces be brought within the sphere of federal jurisdiction. As to the others there is the possibility of amending the British North America Act, still in co-operation with the provinces, to make the legislation effective.

As there is no purpose whatever to be served by repealing this act, which is a dead letter as it is, and as it may be useful in some way to keep it there, perhaps my hon. friend would agree to let the statute remain as it is now and allow the government to deal with it in the best interests of the house and of the people.

Mr. POULIOT: Answering what my hon. leader from Quebec has said, I do not intend to kill that legislation, because it is dead now; I am only trying to bury it—that is the difference. If we have a dead letter on the statute book it is just as well to dispense with it, because otherwise when there is a revision of the dominion statutes these acts will be included.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, never.

Mr. POULIOT: I think it is just as well to allow this bill, which is only seeking to repeal another act, receive its first reading. Never did a government object to the first reading of a bill except when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was Prime Minister. I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has no objection to the first reading being given.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have no objection. The hon. member has a right to introduce it, but it is useless.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WEEKLY REST IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to repeal the Weekly Rest In Industrial Undertakings Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MINIMUM WAGES ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, to repeal the Minimum Wages Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF WORK ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to repeal the Limitation of Hours of Work Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, to repeal the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and the Natural Products Marketing Act Amendment Act, 1935.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35, to amend the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in reference to these bills there is a great deal to be said on both sides. I presume that it is inopportune on the first reading of a bill to enter into a prolonged and detailed discussion, but the remarkable thing about this proceeding is that the leadership of this house has evidently passed to the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I have just one word to say in reply to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. The other day he said that the decisions that had been given by the privy council were just opinions, and it is precisely on that ground that I am asking for the repeal of these bills, which are all wrong.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THE BUDGET—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR SITTING OF THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25—TRADE AGREEMENTS WITH RUSSIA AND GERMANY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That standing order 28 respecting the committee of ways and means be suspended for the sittings of Thursday 25th February and Friday 26th February, 1937.

He said: Standing order 28, as hon. members know, obliges the Speaker to leave the chair on Thursday and Friday without question being put. It is the intention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to introduce his budget on Thursday next, and he wishes to do so with the Speaker in the chair.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this would seem to be an appropriate time to ask whether the trade agreements between Canada and Russia and Canada and Germany will be laid upon the table before Thursday. I cannot recall that having been done, and I think it should be done before the budget is brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should prefer to have the Minister of Finance answer the question. I shall ask him to do so to-morrow.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Before this motion passes may I suggest to the Prime Minister that it should refer to Thursday only? It has been the custom for many years to adjourn the debate on the budget over Sunday in order to give members the opportunity to consider its provisions, and this practice should be followed particularly this year if there is to be submitted at the same time a new trade agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada. I do not suppose the Prime Minister wishes to give up the privilege of going into supply on Friday without a motion, and I would therefore suggest that this motion be amended to apply to Thursday only, with the understanding that the budget debate will not be proceeded with until probably next Tuesday. This I think would give ample opportunity to hon. members to consider it properly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I say that the government had no intention of proceeding with the debate on the budget on Friday. It was intended that the debate should be adjourned until next week. As to whether it should be adjourned until Monday or Tuesday next, might be arranged when the Minister of Finance is here. I imagine that the minister will take no exception to having an adjournment made until Tuesday if that is the wish of hon. gentlemen opposite. As a matter of fact I had one copy of the motion amended in the form in which my right hon. friend (Sir George Perley) has just suggested, making it apply to Thursday only. I spoke to the clerk, a moment or two before the house met as to the advisability of the amendment being made in that way. It was thought that it did not very much matter, that in any event the house could go into supply on Friday. We do not anticipate any opposition to the motion to go into supply on that day. However, it may simplify matters if the motion is amended as suggested, and I so move that it be adopted with the words "and Friday 26th February" omitted.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house I propose, for the convenience of hon. members, to put a motion with respect to sittings on Wednesday of which notice appears in to-day's votes and proceedings. Tomorrow will be the last private members' day if the house so agrees. I gather there is an understanding between members of the different parties in the house that this will be acceptable to them. If that is so, I would now move:

That on and after Wednesday the 3rd of March next to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays over all business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO SIGNATURE THIS DAY AND TABLING ON THURSDAY NEXT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the house that the trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom was signed at noon to-day. The agreement was signed on behalf of the United Kingdom by Sir Francis Floud, K.C.B., High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, and on behalf of Canada by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and myself. The agreement will be tabled on Thursday afternoon.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION ON POLITICAL GROUNDS AGAINST APPLICANTS UNDER LAND SETTLEMENT SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): There is an extraordinary news item in the Montreal Gazette of to-day, to the effect that unemployed who desire assistance in settling on the land will be refused aid if they have "advanced ideas" or have been members of a communist or socialist organization; that aldermen at the city hall were so informed yesterday by the Auger-Rogers back-to-the-land plan forwarded them by the provincial ministry of colonization. The regulation reads in part:

The would-be colonist of "advanced ideas" who has previously taken part in a communist or socialist organization cannot be accepted.

In view of the fact that the opposition in the British House of Commons is a socialist opposition, and that New Zealand, a sister dominion, is under a socialist government, it seems to me an extraordinary thing that any regulation of this kind can be put forward in one of our provinces. I am aware that later in the article the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is reported as saying he knows nothing of the matter, but I do not think that that statement of his, as given to the press, is quite enough, and I ask whether the minister will give the house the assurance that the government will give no assistance to any scheme that discriminates against any individual because of his political affiliations or his religious beliefs.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): All agreements with the provinces concerning unemployment relief contain a provision that there shall be no discrimination with respect to race, religion or political affiliation. In my opinion no regulations under any agreement can be made which are contrary to that provision. I hope that will satisfy my hon. friend.

LABOUR DISPUTE

GOVERNMENT DOCK FACILITIES AT VANCOUVER AND UNLOADING OF MOTORSHIP BELLINGHAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) with reference to a situation in the port of Vancouver. I have received to-day a telegram, a copy of which has been sent, I believe, to the minister. It states that the motorship Bellingham, American registry, arrived in the port of Vancouver yesterday with a cargo of fish consigned to the Canadian Fishing Company Limited. The owners of the vessel wished to have the International Longshoremen's Association of Vancouver discharge the cargo. The Canadian Fishing Company will not allow that to be done at their dock. The owners of the vessel are willing to have the cargo discharged at any other dock. Mr. Burns, who I believe is the port manager at the government docks, advised the International Longshoremen's Association that he is not in a position to say that the facilities of the government docks will be available if members of the International Longshoremen's Association are employed to unload the ship. Could the minister give the house any information with regard to this matter, and state whether the shipping federation completely control the men who are to discharge and load ships in the port of Vancouver, and particularly on government docks?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I received notice of the hon. member's question and telephoned our port manager to-day. The facts are not exactly as stated by the hon. member. It is true that the steamship Bellingham arrived at Vancouver yesterday with a cargo of 250,000 pounds of frozen fish consigned to the Canadian Fishing Company Limited, but the contract for the carrying of this cargo calls for the running of the cargo at the dock of the Canadian Fishing Company Limited, Vancouver. After unloading about twenty-five per cent of the cargo the ship's crew discontinued servicing the winches, thereby causing a stoppage of work on the part of the longshoremen. The reason given for this action by the ship's crew is that the longshoremen working the ship are not members of the International Longshoremen's Association. On the other hand, the Canadian Fishing Company Limited refuses to permit I.L.A. men to discharge cargo at its dock. It is to be noted that the Canadian Fishing Company Limited is not a member of the local shipping federation. Representatives of the local International Longshoremen's Association called upon Mr. Burns stating that the reason for the action of the ship's crew was that before leaving Ketchikan for Vancouver the crew had been assured that the cargo would be unloaded by I.L.A. men. They then wished to ascertain whether Burns would permit the unloading of this cargo at the harbour board's fish dock. Mr. Burns pointed out that this was quite impossible for the reason that the water depth of the fish dock would be insufficient, it being about ten feet only, to accommodate the steamship Bellingham. Moreover, the landing of the cargo elsewhere than on the Canadian Fishing Company's dock would create a breach of the contract between the vessel owner and the company under which the latter could refuse delivery of the cargo; in other words, before any arrangement could be made to unload the cargo at any dock, arrangements would have to be made for the disposal of the cargo. It is perishable cargo, and if it is unloaded at our docks and thrown out there it would belong to no one. We should like to know before it is unloaded what the disposition of it is to be, and who is to pay the charges.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Naval services—To provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $4,486,810.

Mr. POULIOT: This vote is for naval services. Last year it was $2,654,000; this year it is $4,486,000 or an increase of $1,832,000.

The government has decided that two new ships shall be purchased for the protection of both our coasts. I take it for granted that the government's views in this respect are sound, but on the other hand we must not forget that the coasts on both sides are hundreds of miles long and there are many bays on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic seaboard, besides the gulf of St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence river. It is necessary, therefore, for the new ships to be the most effective and speedy. Our entire fleet on each side will consist of one man of war only, and the life of that man of war is that of a dog, twelve years. I submit, therefore, that when the government decides to purchase one battleship for the defence of each coast the ships should be the most efficient and the speediest, and ships that can give the best service. I believe hon. members will agree with me in that. I do not object to the vote because it is too large—and I am wondering whether there will be an amendment to reduce it—but I do object to it because it is too small. We do not need second hand ships, and if the government is of the opinion that we must have ships to defend our shores they should be the very best. If we have a small ship let it be the latest one from the shipyards. I cannot therefore vote for any amendment to reduce this item, because I do not think it is large enough; and for that reason I cannot support this item in the estimates.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister explain this vote and tell us what proportion will go to the Pacific?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps I had better break it down. The increase is $1,832,310, made up as follows:

Pay and allowances, $359,325.
Stores and allowances, $350,760.
Medical services, $3,500.
New ship building, in connection with four mine sweepers to be constructed in Canada, $700,000.
Repairs and maintenance, $128,400.
Works, lands and buildings, $200,000.
Miscellaneous effective services, $92,225.

There is a decrease of $1,900 in non-effective pay vote. May I make it clear that the vote for two destroyers purchased from England is not in the present increase; it is to be introduced in a special supplementary estimate for 1936-37. The main increase in this vote is for the four mine-sweepers and stores and equipment on both coasts.

Mr. BARBER: What will be the total expenditure for naval protection? The estimates are divided into three parts; we have roughly $19,000,000 for land forces, and about $11,000,000 for air forces, and I understand there is about $5,000,000 for naval protection. What will be the total for naval protection—$5,000,000 or $7,000,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The two destroyers were really under this fiscal year's expenditures because negotiations to purchase them were completed last year and they will be charged against expenditures for 1936-37. The total of $2,000,000 should be added to the figure shown for the present year.

Mr. BARBER: Seven millions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes in all.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give us any idea what the annual increase in the estimates will be to take care of this expenditure now proposed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The appropriations for 1937-38 are:

Ships—
Saguenay (destroyer), $296,925.
Champlain (destroyer), $25,000.
Skeena (destroyer), $295,525.
Vancouver (destroyer), $25,000.
Crescent (now Fraser) (destroyer), $300,000.
Cygnet (now St. Laurent) (destroyer), $300,000.
Armentieres (mine sweeper), $41,980.
Vessels in reserve (Ypres and Festubert), $22,950.
New schooner, $28,650.
New construction (towards 4 mine sweepers), $750,000.
Fitting ships for R.C.N., $56,000.

Barracks—
R.C.N. barracks, Halifax, $436,500.
R.C.N. barracks, Esquimalt, $485,145.

Dockyards—
H.M.C. dockyard, Halifax, $102,225.
Armament supply depot, Halifax, $168,050.
H.M.C. dockyard, Esquimalt, $78,500.
Armt. supply depot, Esquimalt, $332,180.

Port Defences, $42,300.

Naval Intelligence—
Headquarters, Ottawa, $13,650.
Halifax, $7,800.
Esquimalt, $6,900.
Naval headquarters, Ottawa, $54,625.
Officers and men overseas, $278,000.
Cemeteries, $1,550.
Comox rifle range, $1,330.
Ottawa W/T station, $22,300.
General Account, $19,250.
Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, $43,500.
Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $250,975.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not make myself clear. What I want to find out is what increase in the estimates will be necessary as a result of the expenditures we are incurring this year for increased naval armaments and new ships. Will that mean an increased future outlay each year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will be the difference in the number of ratings and stores necessary for the new destroyers as against the old ones. The new ships are considerably larger and will require an increased personnel. There will be an increase personnel for the new mine sweepers and training schooner. Otherwise there is no increase.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): About $300,000 or $400,000, but that is subject to correction.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I did not take part in the debate which took place last week on the amendment presented by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), but the public and this house knew very well where I stood on this question of armament. However, I wish to avail myself of the present discussion of the military estimates to say once more that I am against any direct or indirect contribution to extra-territorial wars. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake St. John-Roberval (Mr. Sylvestre):

That item 67 of the national defence estimates be reduced by $1,832,310.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to my hon. friend moving his amendment, but the reason he sets forth is not fair. He states that he is against extraterritorial wars, but these estimates which we are discussing have no connection whatever with extra-territorial wars.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to tell the committee that I am entirely satisfied with the explanations given to me by the minister a moment ago. The committee will see in due course what to do with the supplementary estimates in regard to second hand ships.

Mr. STEWART: What is the cost of the mine sweepers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amount included in the estimates this year is three quarters of a million dollars. The estimated cost is one quarter of a million each, a total of one million, but it is not anticipated that they can be finished during the present year.

Mr. TOLMIE: How many mine sweepers will be constructed on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has not been finally decided, but at least one, possibly two.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister say when he expects the two new ships to be delivered to this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were commissioned as Canadian vessels a week ago and are expected to sail from England about March 12.

Mr. TREMBLAY: What is the increase in the tonnage?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The details of the new destroyers are as follows:

Displacement, 1,375 tons as against 1,075 for the old Champlain and Vancouver which have been demilitarized. The dimensions of the ships are as follows:

Length, 317¾ feet as against 275¾ feet.
Beam, 33 feet as against 27 feet 5 inches.
Draft, 12 feet as against 11 feet.
Horse power, 36,000 as against 29,000.
Speed, 35·5 knots as against 36 knots.
Engines, Parsons geared turbines; boilers three admiralty, three drum type.
Fuel oil capacity, 470 tons.
Guns, four of 4·7 inches, one 3 inches, five smaller guns, and eight torpedo tubes, 21 inches.

They were completed April 5, 1932, and the purchase price was $1,000,000.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the usual period of usefulness of a ship of that kind, and when were these ships completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The estimated life of a destroyer of this type is about twenty years. They were built in April, 1932, they are a little over four years old.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are told that this is a part of the defence plan for Canada, which is supposed to be an adequate plan. What function are these destroyers, these new ships, designed to perform? What work are they particularly required to do under the plan set forth by the minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That I think is more or less obvious. It will be patrol and defence of our territorial waters, harbour mouths and shipping terminals on both coasts. I do not for the moment pretend that this is an ample naval force for that purpose, but it is at least a force which would cooperate with other forces in giving some reasonable protection.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There will be only these two destroyers doing that patrol work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We shall have four modern destroyers when the other two are here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But there are only two on each coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has been the case so far.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister really consider that two patrol boats on each coast can defend this country or maintain our neutrality?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think they can do quite a lot in cooperation with the other services. It is much better than nothing at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister not think as a matter of policy that if the same amount were spent say for air defences it would give better results?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, in the cooperative work of the various services it is necessary to have surface ships as well as air services, and these as my hon. friend will agree are on a very modest scale indeed.

Mr. MacINNIS: In answering the hon. member for Winnipeg North a moment ago as to the increased annual cost on account of equipment the minister said that there would be a certain increase in cost arising out of the increased ratings. I am not very familiar with these terms. What does "increased ratings" mean? Does it mean the additional number of men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would there not also be an increase in cost arising out of the larger ships and more efficient equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, possibly, that is so.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to reiterate my opposition to any increase in the national defence estimates, and I believe, moreover, that the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois) has stated the reasons why just as well as I could do it myself. However, my attitude is based mainly upon the answers given to me yesterday by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), when he stated that he may, each year, ask for increases, depending on conditions then prevailing. That is why I am supporting the amendment presented by the hon. member for Nicolet.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister said that the maintenance of the two new ships will perhaps amount to $300,000 each. Is that included in the present estimate?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Amendment (Mr. Dubois) negatived: yeas, 18; nays, 117.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—Expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $11,391,650.

Mr. BARBER: Does this vote include expenditures for landing fields? Have landing fields through to the coast been completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Landing fields would not ordinarily come under the Department of National Defence but, as the hon. member will realize, under the civil aviation branch of the Department of Transport. I presume the hon. member has reference to the matter we discussed last year.

Mr. BARBER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was well under way some time ago. I do not know whether the Minister of Transport can answer it, but there was definite progress made with reference to it before the transfer from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport took place.

Mr. BARBER: I just wish to remind the minister that a discussion took place last year with respect to a landing field at Chilliwack, and at that time he promised it would be proceeded with. The latest information I have is that nothing has been done, not even to the extent of securing the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think definite steps were taken before the transfer was effected, but I shall look into the matter, with my colleague, and inform the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister tell the committee the number of machines the government has in service in the air defence of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the present time the total in Canada is 182 aeroplanes. There are 8 fighter Siskins now obsolete; 18 army cooperation of which 15 Atlas, now practically obsolete, and 3 Avro No. 626; 4 Vancouver flying boats, which are obsolescent; 7 new torpedo bombing Blackburn "Sharks," only 4 of which have been delivered so far, but which are modern service planes; 105 various types of training planes, many obsolete, and 40 transportation planes of different types used on various government services, particularly civil government air operations, making a total of 182.

The present estimate provides for an increase of 102 planes, as follows: 12 fighter planes, 3 army cooperation planes, 7 flying boats, 24 bomber planes, of which 18 are used Wapiti planes, and 6 new Avro No. 626, 11 torpedo bombing planes, 18 coastal reconnaissance planes, and 27 training planes.

Mr. HEAPS: How many aeroplanes has the minister purchased since assuming office?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Since April 1, 1934, the following were ordered: October 3, 1934, 10 Atlas airframes from the air ministry; on May 27, 1935, 10 Civet Fleet airframes; on November 18, 1935, 6 Wapiti airframes, from the air ministry; on November 28, 1936, 5 Stranraer aeroplanes, from Canadian Vickers; on September 22, 1936, 10 Fleet trainer airframes; on May 11, 1936, 1 Avro tudor aeroplane, from Armstrong Siddeley; on May 4, 1936, 7 Torpedo "Shark" aeroplanes, from the air ministry; on August 29, 1935, 3 Avro type "626" aeroplanes, from Armstrong Siddeley; on August 23, 1935, 3 Northrop Delta aeroplanes, from Canadian Vickers, for civil government air operations; on August 9, 1935, 2 super-71 Fairchild aeroplanes, from the Canadian Wright Company, and on January 11, 1937, 4 Northrop Delta aeroplanes for civil government operations.

Mr. HEAPS: How many of these machines are now being operated by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All the planes as required and suitable, namely 182 of them; but few are modern service planes.

Mr. HEAPS: Are any under repair?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Inevitably there are always some under repair.

Mr. HEAPS: Some are so obsolete that they could not very well be used by the government for flying purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not that I know of. Unless they are being repaired for purposes of training, I am not aware of any. Some are obsolete of course.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How does the speed of these planes compare with those of similar types in other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The new planes we are receiving compete favourably with the best in the world, and the new ones being ordered will be modern in every detail —speed, strength and range; in every way they will be the most modern available. In almost every case the types have been advised by the British air ministry.

Mr. HEAPS: The Blackburn machines are well known, but I understand that some of the machines purchased here in Ottawa are old and obsolete. Persons conversant with flying claim it would be hazardous for them to be utilized for flying purposes. I believe the matter was brought up last year by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). Eight machines were purchased last year, and I understand other machines not much better than those are being purchased.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): None of that kind has been purchased since last year. These machines were pronounced airworthy by inspectors whose duty it is to inspect them.

Mr. HEAPS: On what basis are they purchased? Are purchases made through tenders, or does the department simply purchase the machines it believes to be best suited for the purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With regard to service planes, technical officers in the air service consult with officials of the air ministry in England and endeavour, generally, to have the same type of machines as is recommended by those officials. I have here the recommendations of the air ministry with reference to all the modern service planes which recently have been ordered in Canada.

Mr. DENIS: Are they to be built only in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, so far as I know, and in so far as possible. With the exception of certain used machines for training purposes, 18 in number, which we are to obtain from the British air ministry, and are to be reconditioned here. With the exception of these, all machines, will be built in Canada this year, it is expected.

Mr. MITCHELL: Have we any modern pursuit fighting planes, and, if so, how many, and when were they purchased?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The only modern service planes we now have are these Blackburn Sharks?

Mr. MITCHELL: How many?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Seven ordered altogether, but only 4 have been delivered so far. Three of them should be delivered before April 1, from England, bringing the total up to 7. Seven other flying boats are being constructed. These will have a very long range, will be used for coastal defence purposes and are recommended by the air ministry as being the best type for that particular work.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would you mind telling—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Davenport has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL: How old are the Siskin fighters, and when were they designed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are as follows:

Siskin: 2 in 1927, 1 in 1928, 4 in 1929, 1 in 1931, total 8.

Army co-operation types: Atlas, 2 in 1927, 2 in 1928, 1 in 1929, 10 in 1934, total 15; Avro 626, 3 in 1935.

Flying boats, Vancouver, 4 in 1930.

Training types: Avro 621, 6 in 1930, 1 in 1936, total 7; Courier, 1 in 1928; Fairchild 51, 2 in 1927, 5 in 1928, total 7; Fleet, 17 in 1931, 10 in 1935, 10 in 1936, total 37; Moth, 18 in 1929, 14 in 1930, 1 in 1935, total 33; Tomtit, 2 in 1930; Wapiti, 6 in 1935; Blackburn Shark, 4 in 1935, 3 in 1936, total 7; Vedette, 4 in 1929, 8 in 1930, total 12.

Mr. MITCHELL: Are the fighting planes all new?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Siskins have formed the main arm of the Canadian flying corps for years and I should like to know if these machines were new when purchased.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that they were, but have become obsolete.

Mr. MacNICOL: For some time rumours have been going around the air field at Trenton that a number of the planes have not been giving satisfaction. A few days ago I put a question on the order paper with reference to this matter, which the minister answered yesterday. The minister stated that three Shark II planes were sent to Trenton and that these planes had flown only nineteen and a half hours. Then follows a rather significant remark by the minister: "Some not unexpected difficulties have arisen." Does the minister expect that these planes will give satisfaction? If not, is it the intention of the department to return them to where they came from?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was not informed of this matter until I saw my hon. friend's question on the order paper. I understand that there were some technical difficulties in connection with the Blackburn Shark planes, having to do with the lubricating system, but I have been told that these difficulties are being successfully surmounted. I do not think there is any question in the world that these machines are the most modern and up to date to be obtained, and there is every likelihood of their proving to be first class in every particular.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): How many squadrons are now in existence in the non-permanent active air force, and where are they located? Is it the intention of the department to create additional squadrons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The squadrons are located as follows:

Toronto, No. 10, army cooperation squadron.
Vancouver, No. 11, army cooperation squadron.
Winnipeg, No. 12, army cooperation squadron.
Montreal, No. 15, fighter squadron.
Montreal, No. 18, bomber squadron.
Hamilton, No. 19, bomber squadron.
Regina, No. 20, bomber squadron.
Quebec city, No. 21, bomber squadron.
Calgary, No. 13, army cooperation squadron.

These are the squadrons authorized up to date, and their continuation will depend on the generosity of this house.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Is there a distinctive uniform for this branch of the service? Do the members of it have separate quarters, or are they quartered in the different armouries throughout the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With some of the newer squadrons there has been a little difficulty in getting suitable quarters, but the older squadrons have their own quarters. I think they all wear the air force uniforms.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in the city of Brantford there are between fifty and one hundred qualified pilots. There is no opportunity for these young men to enter a squadron although they do belong to the flying club established under the civil aviation department. They are a splendid body of young men, and I feel that there is ample personnel available to establish a squadron at Brantford. When additional squadrons are being established I trust the minister will not forget this city.

The question of uniforms should receive the careful attention of the minister and his department, not only with reference to the flying clubs but in connection with the non-permanent active militia. The day of the khaki uniform has passed. It is a drab, unattractive thing and does not inspire any enthusiasm in the youth of our country. I believe there would be a greater urge to join the various units if our young men knew that they would be outfitted in colourful uniforms. We should get back to the days of the distinctive regimental uniforms. About the only attractive uniform at the present time is that worn by the Highland regiments. Other units should not be penalized simply because they are not Highland regiments. There should be an attractive walking-out uniform of which the members of the units would be proud.

There are many centres in Canada where proper facilities are not provided in the way of armouries for the various units. If I might be permitted to refer again to that great city which I represent, Brantford, I would remind the minister that while we have one quite modern armoury, the other building, known as Dalhousie Street armoury, could hardly be described as such. It is simply a commercial building consisting of a basement and three floors. There is supposed to be a shooting range in the cellar, but as that space is mostly taken up with the furnace and piles of storage, it is entirely inadequate for the purpose. The other floors are broken up into small sections, and in order to get from the ground floor to the second or third floors you must go outside and ascend by another stairway. As I said before, the so-called armouries is not in any way worthy of the name. In that armouries there have been located three units, an artillery unit, a machine gun unit, and a cavalry unit. One of them, the artillery unit, the 54th Battery, won the governor general's cup this year, which is the prize given for the very best shooting by any artillery unit in Canada, and I say that a unit that can win such honours is worthy of some consideration as to where they shall be quartered in their home town.

Speaking generally of armouries, I think more consideration should be given to the men in the units. What have we in our armouries to-day? We have a large drill hall containing the officers' quarters, which are usually fairly palatial, and I quite approve of that. I was pleased indeed to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) refer in such splendid terms the other day to the brass hats. We have to have generals; we have to have officers. An army cannot function without generals and officers any more than a factory can function without managers and foremen. Then besides the officers' quarters and the drill hall there is what is known as the sergeants' mess, reasonably good quarters, but only reasonably so. We must pay due regard to the sergeants, the non-commissioned officers throughout the country because they are in many respects the backbone of every militia unit.

But what about the men? Often we find that the men are almost entirely forgotten. At the close of the parade the regiment is dismissed. The officers go to their quarters, the sergeants go to their quarters, and the men—well, only an army expression would describe what they do. They merely break off and go on their way. I think that more consideration should be given to the men.

I have referred to the uniforms. The officers and the sergeants have dress uniforms but the men have nothing but khaki. They should have something bright and brilliant. When the parade is over, instead of being dismissed and sent on their way, they should have some quarters of their own to which they could go and mingle with their pals.

In conclusion, and to sum up, I would again draw the minister's attention to the fact that in Brantford we have enough men to form a squadron of the air force. I hope that a survey will soon be made of the quarters provided for the various units in Brantford, and generally I would most strongly urge that more colourful uniforms be given to all ranks. And in all cases where a new armoury is being built more consideration should be given to the accommodation which will be known as the men's quarters.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the minister to the unique situation in Esquimalt. Both the naval and military headquarters are located at Esquimalt. Esquimalt is a small municipality, and because of its close proximity to Victoria it does not derive a great deal of benefit from the purchase of the military and naval supplies required. The following resolution was recently passed by the Union of Canadian Municipalities:

Whereas Esquimalt is almost solely a naval and military station from which in times of peace or war the Pacific coast of the Dominion of Canada and its sea-borne commerce may be efficiently guarded;

And whereas in order to meet the requirements of the naval and military authorities and to provide facilities needed, a large proportion of the buildings and land have been acquired by the crown and are used for naval and military purposes which if taxable would exceed in taxable value all other assessed property in Esquimalt;

And whereas the cost of maintenance of all public streets, roads, lighting, public health and all other functions of a municipality have to be undertaken and financed by owners of private property within the municipality;

And whereas free education is given in the municipal schools to the children of all ranks in the army and navy;

And whereas the drydocks at Esquimalt are available for purposes of public trade of a revenue-producing nature, yet being government-owned are free from taxation, which would not be the case if they were privately owned;

And whereas Esquimalt is called upon to shoulder financial liability for essential services;

And whereas this liability is imposed upon the municipality by virtue of its geographical position, but which is incurred directly on behalf of the whole dominion;

And whereas by the Municipal Act, section 211, chapter 179, all government property is exempt from taxation;

Therefore be it resolved in view of these special circumstances that the Union of Canadian Municipalities requests the dominion government to afford relief to the municipality of Esquimalt by means of an adequate annual grant.

The assessment on land in Esquimalt amounts to $2,134,756; the exemptions total $892,705, leaving a taxable land assessment of $1,242,051. Crown properties equal 13·88 per cent of the total assessment on land. On improvements the total assesment is $10,227,095, and the exemptions on improvements, $8,218,650, leaving a balance remaining of $2,008,445, only 75 per cent of which may be taxed. Crown exemptions amount to $8,072,750, or 78·80 per cent of the total assessed value of improvements. The revenue lost on crown properties, calculated on the present rate of 40 mills levied on land and 50 per cent of the assessed value of improvements, exceeds the total present revenue of the municipality from all sources by approximately $88,000.

Owing to the proximity of Victoria, as I mentioned before, a large proportion of the business goes to that city. The advantages derived from the presence of naval and military establishments at Esquimalt are outweighed by the cost of services, such as the upkeep of roads, education, and so forth, within the municipality. In this respect there is no comparison with the city of Halifax, which derives all the benefit from the purchases made by the naval and military establishments. Within a single year recently the supplies purchased in Halifax by the forces reached a total of $276,489. But as I have said, Victoria is so close to Esquimalt that Esquimalt derives little if any benefit from that source, as practically all supplies required for government establishments in Esquimalt are purchased in the larger cities.

I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee, and with your kind permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall put on Hansard a tabulated comparison of the conditions existing in seven cities in the southern end of British Columbia.

	Total taxable property	Exemptions	Population
New Westminster	$20,392,047	$ 8,508,605	17,524
North Vancouver	7,214,195	4,165,075	8,510
Victoria	50,837,461	22,338,032	39,082
Burnaby	19,446,115	7,286,350	25,564
Saanich	11,954,659	1,623,759	12,968
Oak Bay	10,816,317	530,073	5,892
Esquimalt	3,250,496	9,111,355	3,274

Esquimalt has 25·91 miles of roads and 18·98 miles of sidewalks. Roads and sidewalks are deteriorating fast owing to the lack of funds. Three of the main roads lead directly to the naval barracks, the military barracks and the dry docks. The greatest volume of traffic is over these three roads.

Members of the permanent force of Canada are part of the active militia within the meaning of the Municipal Act, and are classified accordingly, thereby enabling them to exercise the municipal franchise. The payment of taxes or other moneys to the municipality is not necessary to secure this right, residence only being required. A recent statute of the province of British Columbia, namely the Public Institutions Indemnification Act, 1932, provides that the municipality must bear a portion of the charges for such institutions as public hospitals for the insane and tubercular sanatoria where a patient prior to his admission was a resident of such municipality. This is so in the case of the municipality of Esquimalt, where, if a soldier is admitted to an institution for the insane, the municipality must meet a certain proportion of the cost.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

The municipal council in 1934, in an endeavour to keep down excessive taxation, was driven to the floating of a six per cent loan of $30,000 to pay off an accumulated bank overdraft. However, vacant property continues to revert, with the result that taxes on improved property must be increased to a point which makes it impossible for the owners to hold on, in spite of the fact that expenditure has been reduced to a minimum. The situation is further complicated by cost of unemployment relief, social service costs and loss of provincial government grants.

The population of Esquimalt is 3,274. Hardly one thousand are ratepayers, and mainly of the wage earning class. Many of these people suffer from lack of employment. Unless relief is obtained the outlook will be desperate. Under the circumstances, and in view of the fact that the municipality is almost solely a naval and military station and that the facilities provided by the corporation such as roads, street lighting, schools, et cetera, are of as much benefit to government establishments as to the private owner, it would not seem unreasonable for the dominion government to afford such relief by means of annual grant as is done by the British government under similar circumstances. For example, the city of Plymouth, in England, is given relief of taxation on this particular account; the government pays the same as the ordinary ratepayer. In Chatham the treasury makes a grant in lieu of rates, and the valuation is fixed by His Majesty's treasury. In Portsmouth, government property is rated, but a contribution is given in lieu of rates on figures agreed upon between the treasury valuer and the city valuer. So that in all these three cities a certain provision is made for the extraordinary condition to be found in these large naval and military ports. Esquimalt is in a similar situation, and I suggest that these circumstances be taken into consideration by the government with a view to giving reasonable relief to this particular municipality.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend has made an excellent submission regarding the peculiar difficulties of Esquimalt. As a matter of fact he was good enough on several previous occasions to bring this matter to my attention, and also he and I were members of a delegation which discussed it some time ago in the city of Victoria. The question, of course, is one of considerable difficulty. The problem arises in other parts of Canada, although possibly not so acutely as in the case of Esquimalt. Some time ago I asked for a report with regard to the situation, and as soon as it is available I shall be pleased to take up the subject with some of my colleagues and further consider the representations made by the hon. member.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should be glad if the minister will let me have a copy of that report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly.

Mr. HEAPS: When the report is received I trust that the minister will see to it that circumstances in other places similar to those of Esquimalt will be dealt with in a similar manner. I hope that no favouritism will be shown to any town on the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast or in the interior. I know the minister will be flooded with requests from various quarters for special consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a difficulty.

Mr. HEAPS: I hope he will not give special consideration to any particular district. I realize that when Esquimalt advances reasons for special treatment, Brantford will do the same; Lindsay will want special consideration, and Halifax, and Toronto, and probably a few other places, and there will be no limit to demands made upon the department by cities all of which, indeed, suffer to a certain extent. The result of that kind of thing has been described, and rightly so, as establishing a vicious principle, the principle of patronage. I notice that the minister (Mr. Power) who is sitting next to the Minister of National Defence does not agree that it is a vicious principle.

Mr. POWER: I was going to say that it is the principle of the pork barrel.

Mr. HEAPS: It is fundamentally vicious, I suppose, while a minister is in opposition, but it is quite legitimate when he and his party have returned to office. My point is that I have always objected to any form of patronage, and I trust that with regard to the money that is to be expended under this item and the money which the house is voting for further estimates of defence, no consideration of that kind will be allowed to weigh with the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is nothing here for it.

Mr. HEAPS: I know, but sometimes it seeps in by some back way which is hard to discover. Occasionally the ways of the department are very dark and devious; we have known of contracts going to persons who were associated with the party in power at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not the case with this department.

Mr. HEAPS: I would not say definitely that it is not. The minister must remember the statement made last year in this house by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) with regard to quite a number of aeroplanes. I have heard something again this year which I do not want to repeat on the floor of this chamber; I do not mind giving a statement privately to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. HEAPS: These things do happen, and I object to this form of patronage, because where patronage creeps into any department, the department cannot be efficiently run. If we are to spend money by the millions, while I object to expenditure of this kind, my specific protest at this time is against the intrusion of any element of patronage. So that whenever hon. members, whether on the Liberal or the Conservative side of the house, ask special consideration or special favours from the department, I hope no favours will be granted but that all expenditures will be made strictly on their merits.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) I may say that I asked no special consideration for Brantford. I merely drew the attention of the minister to the fact that in Brantford we have between fifty and a hundred qualified pilots who are able and anxious to serve their country and at the present time have no opportunity to do so.

Mr. TOLMIE: I too would like to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North that I did not have patronage in view at all. I merely called to the attention of the minister a situation with which I acquainted him when he was visiting the city of Victoria. The situation in Esquimalt as I have described it is a peculiar one; it does not exist anywhere else in Canada. I again draw to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North the fact that in England the principle of a government contribution has been applied to three of their large naval bases. If there are other points in Canada which are in the same situation as Esquimalt, justice in this respect should be done to them.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I should like to know what type of plane will be stationed in or adjacent to the city of Calgary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the hon. member mean the permanent force squadron or the non-permanent at Calgary? There was an idea of having a permanent force squadron at Calgary; provision also is being made for the organization of a non-permanent squadron. To which does he refer?

Mr. LANDERYOU: What type of plane is being stationed there?

Mr. CRETE: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Verville):

That item 69 of the national defence estimates be reduced by $6,706,622.

Mr. THOMPSON: How many fliers are in the force at the present time and to what extent does the government propose to increase the personnel? In my opinion there is no way in which we can more effectively help our defence in Canada than by increasing the air force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The following are the increases in personnel provided for in the estimates. Taking the permanent Royal Canadian Air Force, the strength at January 31, 1937, was 147 officers and 958 airmen, or a total of 1,105; and in the increases provided for there will be added 48 officers and 540 airmen, or a total increase of 588, bringing the new strength of the permanent force up to 195 officers and 1,498 airmen, or a total of 1,693. Taking the non-permanent force, the strength at January 31, 1937, was 76 officers and 455 men, and the increases are 42 officers and 491 airmen, or a total increase of 533, bringing the new total strength of the non-permanent force up to 118 officers and 946 airmen or a total of 1,064, making the new total personnel of the two branches 313 officers and 2,444 men or, altogether, 2,757.

Mr. THOMPSON: What length of training is given these men before they are able to fly their aeroplanes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The degrees of training vary. There is preliminary training, the first months being devoted generally to instructional work on the ground, and also training on trainer aircraft, and there is defence training later on. At Trenton, Camp Borden and various schools instruction is given in different types of flying. The training is progressive, so many hours being given to flying, and so many hours to technical training on the ground and to other subjects.

An hon. MEMBER: Is there a training school?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; there is Camp Borden, and it is intended to make Trenton the main school in the dominion.

Mr. POTTIER: What portion of this is for the purpose of air fields?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is nothing definitely for air fields as such, but there is a considerable amount for stores and buildings and in connection with Trenton and other depots throughout the country. The air fields are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. There is nothing for air fields in this vote except for Nova Scotia and Vancouver island, provision being made for some aerodromes.

Mr. POTTIER: Where are these aerodromes located in the maritime provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At Dartmouth and other localities not yet determined.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this increase in item 69 for the same reasons which I gave when discussing item 67, and the more so because after scanning the details of this vote I am wondering where these expenditures may lead us to. In fact, once we have acquired these war machines we shall have to provide for their maintenance, and increase the number of our aviators. I also wish to point out to the committee the many losses of lives that this aviation training school is liable to cause among our Canadian youth. I shall therefore support the amendment presented by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Crete).

Mr. MITCHELL: I am going to oppose the amendment for this reason. Some years ago—it was either in 1931 or 1932—there was an air display across Canada demonstrating the acme of perfection in aviation in the dominion at that time, of which a squadron of Canada's best fighting aeroplanes formed a part. I believe the Siskin fighters took part in that. In conversation with some of the men in charge of the Canadian air force aeroplanes I was informed that these machines were built according to plans prepared shortly after the war and the opinion expressed by the men handling these aeroplanes was that they were obsolete and inadequate at that time, which as I say was in 1931 or 1932. I have no other authority than the opinion of the men who handled these aeroplanes. In my opinion it is high time that Canada had up to date equipment, certainly in our air defence.

Mr. MacNICOL: What plans, if any, is the government making to ensure in Canada the further manufacture of aeroplanes? I might mention a rumour that was current last summer about the time the government took its stand on the question of sanctions, on which at the moment I have no comment to make, either for or against. It was rumoured in Toronto that there was a delegation of manufacturers there from Great Britain considering taking over the old boiler plant which had been operated by the John Inglis Company, a very large plant, quite satisfactory for making aeroplanes, but that owing to the stand taken by the government they crossed over the line and decided to have their planes made in the United States. I do not know how much truth there is in that rumour, but I should like the minister to tell the committee what efforts are to be made to see that the aeroplanes are manufactured in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not acquainted with the plant mentioned by my hon. friend, but generally speaking the desire of the technical officers is to have as far as possible the same type of aeroplanes in Canada as are used in England by the air ministry there. The normal way of proceeding, apart from the possibility of the government themselves manufacturing, would be that when our officials, with the advice they get from the officials of the air ministry in mind, decide upon a particular type, say a fighter or bomber, it would be up to whoever got the agency from the parent company in England, and probably paid for it, to get the licence to manufacture in Canada, provided they had the equipment for so doing. So far only one company is building service planes for the dominion government, but during the year there is no question that other companies will have to undertake the work.

Mr. BENNETT: What company is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Vickers of Montreal.

Mr. HANSELL: I have been waiting for this amendment, and rather expecting it, in view of the fact that the increase in the estimates for the air force is larger than for any other department. I am going to vote against the amendment, and I want to record my reasons for so doing.

One of the best plans of national defence I believe to be defence from the air. I have been reading a good deal along this line recently, and expert opinion seems to be that there is no effective defence possible from land or sea, that both land and sea forces are vulnerable, but that the air forces are invulnerable except to attack from the air. I am glad to notice that there are to be twenty-four bombing planes, but there should be several times that number. It may be of interest to some hon. members to know that in the bombing raids upon London during the great war not one single bombing plane was ever brought down by anti-aircraft guns. On the other hand we are told that bombing planes can hit their mark both on land and sea with very close precision. Looking at these defence estimates from every possible point of view I believe there is no reason why we cannot vote for this increase in the air forces. As it is difficult to know just where civil aviation ends and military aviation begins, I wonder if the minister would mind giving his opinion as to the advisability of building up a civil air force for transport or other purposes all the way across Canada, and whether or not such an air force could be quickly changed if necessary to military uses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think in most countries nowadays the big planes used for civil aviation are convertible, and some planes built for civil government air operations are convertible for purposes of national defence.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): Before the vote is taken I wish to ask a question or two of the minister. Before I do so, however, I should like to commend him on the very efficient manner in which he placed before the house a few days ago the defence situation, together with an outline of his proposals for improving it. The minister has also defended his estimates in an admirable manner under heavy fire, not only from one section of the opposition; I notice that quite a few "shorts" fell in his direction. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have made it very plain to everyone that the proposed increased armament is for defence purposes only. To me that seems largely self-evident. The scope of our defensive armaments as limited by the estimates precludes the possibility of their being used for offensive action overseas. In other words no serious percentage of the arms and equipment to be provided by this program could be moved outside of the country without weakening our defensive position at home to an extent almost inviting disaster.

Now, sir, our defence program, small though it be, should be viewed in the light of modern conditions. Methods of warfare have changed. They have very largely moved from the land and the water into the air. This condition invites from me at this time what may be considered in some quarters as a preposterous statement; however I give it for what it is worth. There is the possibility that at last the tide has commenced to turn, that modern world armament has reached or will shortly have reached, before the completion of the British defence program, the point where it defeats its own ends. My opinion is based upon certain facts. I repeat that offensive warfare has largely moved from the land and the water into the air. I refer to bombing, whether with gas, explosives, or incendiary and chemical materials. It is largely agreed among competent authorities that especially under weather conditions favourable to the attack no adequate direct defence against bombing has yet been found. But there is the important exception of indirect measures, in other words the fear of certain and effective retaliation. The German general staff—and I refer to it simply to illustrate my point—is quite well aware of what retaliation would mean. They realize that bombing attacks on London or the Midlands or important ports would probably be highly successful in themselves, but at the same time they are just as completely aware that even before their bombers in their hundreds—and there would be hundreds—reach England, as large or a larger number of British bombers would be winging their way to Germany, probably actually passing the enemy squadrons, and would cause unparalleled damage to the cities, towns, ports and important centres in that country.

No one man is responsible for the tragic and utterly crazy military situation that exists to-day. It has grown to its present alarming proportions through factors largely arising out of the treaty of Versailles, and also, as has been mentioned here time and again, through the failure of the League of Nations to function as we all hoped it would. I submit that preparedness is reaching that ultimate point where there is a real possibility that it will defeat its own ends. As one surveys the political and military evidence as it now exists I think the conclusion can be fairly reached that preliminary overtures for some measure of disarmament may be under way before the completion of the British program.

At this point I would direct attention to certain remarks of the Prime Minister in his eloquent speech on Friday last. They were of importance, and cannot receive too much emphasis. At page 1048 of Hansard for last Friday the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> We know whatever the ambitions of their rulers may be that throughout the world the peoples as a whole are anxious to preserve peace. On the whole there has been some improvement, a less tense strain in the international situation, a balancing of forces, a growing recognition on the part of every government of the uncertainties of success and the penalties of failure, a growing readiness too to seek to remove the causes of conflict, the sources of friction, and to realize that in the end war settles nothing even for the victor.

Of course there is the other school of thought which holds the view that world conflict is inevitable. We may rest assured it will not be provoked or commenced by the British commonwealth of nations. Its position is now well known, and can be appropriately described in a sentence from Lincoln's first inaugural speech. I believe this sentence is as fitting as it could be:

> This government will not assail you; you can have no conflict, without yourselves being the aggressors.

For the time being the English-speaking people must continue to do their part. This is a matter of first-class importance. As I see it, the British commonwealth of nations is like a chain girdling the earth, but at the same time it is no stronger than its weakest link.

In conclusion may I say that as I view it our minister is simply endeavouring to bring our defences to such a point of efficiency that, if a testing time should come, his hands will be clean and his conscience clear. In the short time the department has been under his care he has shown great courage, in the face of considerable pressure, in the reorganization and modernizing of the non-permanent service. I believe the results speak for themselves. He has shown great courage in laying all his cards on the table and asking for enough money to furnish a modest defence force with that quality and class of arms and equipment to which our Canadian soldiers, sailors, and airmen are justly entitled.

Is it the intention of the department to have considerable coordinative training between our air squadrons and our naval units?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that is the intention.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): I believe two destroyers will be reporting in April. Is it the intention of the government to have the two new destroyers manoeuvre together, or to have one join the obsolete destroyer on one coast, and the other join the other destroyer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The practice in the past has been to have the four destroyers meet annually in West Indies waters for naval training exercises. I presume that will be continued in the future.

Mr. MacNEIL: The trend of the discussion confirms the suspicions I expressed the other day. We are not discussing preparations for defence; rather we are discussing preparations for participation in a war of offence. This afternoon we have heard that we should have more colourful uniforms with which to arouse militaristic sentiment in our youth, and that we should have larger armouries instead of emphasis on coastal defence. We have heard the minister describe how the major portion of the expenditures will go for the purchase of mobile equipment, and no emphasis is placed on the necessary part it will play in actual coastal defence. Now we are calmly discussing—and it is being advocated—increased purchases of bombing planes, and it is suggested that bombing planes are necessary for defence. I am anxious to have someone explain to me how, under conditions of modern warfare, a bombing plane could be considered as a defensive weapon. Bombing planes are used to bomb, and surely it is not intended to drop bombs on our own territory. Evidently it is expected we shall engage in measures of retaliation, and drop bombs on innocent women and children in other parts of the world.

Mr. REID: What about submarines?

Mr. MacNEIL: The correct defensive weapon against the submarine is the depth charge. It is inconceivable to me that in Canada we should plan an expedition to retaliate against other countries, and that we should make preparation on such a grand scale as to send flight squadrons across the Atlantic or the Pacific to drop bombs on the towns of other countries.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Suppose a foreign country established a base in Canada, what would happen?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is a remote possibility, and for defence against it bombing planes are not required. To repel the attack of air raiders you must have fighting planes, and fighting planes are not usually armed with bombs. The point I make is that the discussion indicates that the trend is not towards preparation for defence, but rather for offence, and that all—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MacNEIL:—All the items presented by the minister indicate careful preparation under advice of experts of the British war office, so that we may take our place in the line of empire defence. My views in that regard are confirmed by the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. In that regard the assurances given by the government stand for naught; for all preparations indicate that steps are being taken in a contrary direction. For these reasons I support the amendment, and have no scruples in protesting against the increased expenditure for aviation, advanced largely at the expense of civil aviation, where our young men actually get their technical training. Clearly the expenditure is intended for purposes of offence rather than defence.

Mr. MARTIN: So far I have not taken any part in the discussion of these estimates, but I do believe the observations of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. MacNeil) cannot escape the consideration of the committee. The Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice have indicated in no uncertain terms that the program of the government, in these particulars, was actuated by no consideration other than one of national defence. In fairness to my convictions, which I believe are well known in some quarters, I could not possibly vote for any measure which would be for purposes of offensive action.

Mr. MacNEIL: Why bombing planes, then?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has made a very serious charge, one which is not only in contradiction to the undertaking given by responsible ministers but clearly involves an issue far out of proportion to anything already mentioned by the hon. member. As one member to another I would ask him if he can substantiate his charge that the estimates are for purposes of offensive action and not for purposes of defence, and not in vague but in specific language, I would ask him to give some justification for his observations.

Mr. MacNEIL: I will inform the hon. member that the information tabled by the minister during the discussion of the estimates indicates that the major portion of the expenditures is for weapons which may be considered weapons of offence rather than weapons of defence. Greater emphasis is placed upon mobile equipment, which may readily be used for purposes of overseas contingents, and not for coastal defence, as might be expected from the solemn assurance which was given the house. Sir, I am quite within my rights in questioning the assurance given by a minister in that respect.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question? Against which country is the policy of Canada, in terms of offensive action, directed?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is the question I have been asking the government, and to which we have not yet received a satisfactory answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) when he says that bombing planes are offensive weapons of war, and I base this assertion upon the statement made last year by the Prime Minister of Great Britain when speaking in the House of Commons at London. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) also made that clear when he said that aeroplanes were weapons that could be used in retaliation; that their specific defensive use was for reprisal purposes.

As I said before, I do not believe that Canada is in danger of attack from the air. Under present conditions I do not think that such an attack would be feasible from a military point of view. Apparently the Department of National Defence and certain members of this house do not agree with that. If these estimates were for the purpose of protecting our women and children instead of buying bombing planes for retaliatory measures, we should be considering ways and means of protecting our people from possible attacks from the air.

Last night reference was made in a Canadian radio commission broadcast to the matter of defensive preparation from air attacks and to a report issued by a group of Cambridge scientists dealing with the matter. It happened that a copy of this report came to me from Great Britain through the mail last evening. A distinguished group of Cambridge scientists examined the measures that might be taken as protection against attack from the air, and arrived at the conclusion that no absolute protection was possible. Because of that, they are opposed to this form of warfare—to war itself. Among the group is to be found some of the most distinguished scientists at the university of Cambridge. The group includes:

J. D. Bernal, M.A., assistant director of research in crystallography.
H. A. Harris, M.A., D.Sc., professor of anatomy.
A. F. W. Hughes, M.A., Ph.D.
Joseph Needham, Sc.D., Sir William Dunn, reader in bio-chemistry.
N. W. Pirie, M.A., Ph.D., demonstrator in bio-chemistry.
J. S. Turner, M.A., Ph.D., demonstrator in botany.
D. H. Valentine, M.A., demonstrator in botany.
E. B. Verney, M.A., M.B., B.Ch., F.R.C.P., F.R.S., Shield reader in pharmacology.
C. H. Waddington, M.A., lecturer in zoology.
Arthur Walton, M.A., Ph.D.
W. A. Wooster, M.A., Ph.D., lecturer in the department of mineralogy and petrology.

There is a further list of other scientists comprising the group whose names I will not read. They indicate quite clearly the position in which nations taking measures of a provocative nature will find themselves. In my opinion nations that provide air and naval bases are provoking attacks by other nations. As we know, there is no defence from air attacks except retaliation. The question asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Vancouer North has never been answered in this chamber. He asked: Against whom are we arming, and whom are we preparing to attack? If these estimates were in reality defence estimates, if the department and hon. members of this house believed that we were in danger of air attacks, the thing to do would be not to buy bombing planes but to build bomb-proof and gas-proof shelters for our people in our congested centres and to teach them the proper measures to take in the event of attack by air. This is not my own conclusion; I am simply repeating the conclusions arrived at among others by the group of scientists referred to in the broadcast last evening. I regard their statement as one of the most authoritative that has been issued. Moreover, they say that there is no protection for children from air attacks.

Mr. DUPUIS: Against whom does the hon. member protect himself when he locks his door?

Mr. COLDWELL: Against the robber or burglar who may be in the vicinity of my home.

Mr. DUPUIS: Name him.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say against the robber who may be in the vicinity of my home.

Mr. DUPUIS: There are many international robbers.

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask the hon. member what robber is in the vicinity of Canada at the present time and against whom are we preparing these weapons?

Mr. DUPUIS: Name yours first.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to read from the report to which I just referred.

Mr. DUPUIS: Scientists will never solve this question.

Mr. COLDWELL: The following is an article which appeared in The Lancet of December 19, 1936:

> Major Blackmore said little could be done for the child under five. From that age on, they could be persuaded to wear a respirator, but the resistance to breathing, though reduced to two and a half inches, was enough to inhibit small children. A pram cover has been designed to convert the perambulator into a gas proof room, and this worked excellently. The objections were the difficulty of manipulating a perambulator, and the fact that only 25 per cent of the population of the east end of London possessed perambulators.

Mr. McLEAN: (Melfort): Does that article refer to conditions in Canada or to conditions in another country?

Mr. COLDWELL: The city of Montreal is probably just as crowded as the city of Liverpool.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But there is more space around it to which the people could be removed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I imagine that gas would kill the people of Montreal just about as quickly as it would kill the people of Manchester.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But I would point out that they do not have to stay in the city.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quote further:

> A gas-proof box had been designed for children under two and worked well, but the babies objected strongly and yelled. The sight of a mottled face through a yellow celluloid window always convinced the mother that the child was being suffocated and she took it out. Further possibilities were being explored. One of the difficulties was to find personnel for experiment.

And Major Blackmore is in charge of this particular work for the present government of Great Britain. The point I am making is this: We have heard a great deal in this house about the defence of our women and children. Today we are told that we need bombing planes for protection, for retaliatory measures if you will, but no appropriations are to be found in these estimates for giving any real defence for our women and children in the event of air raids. I say, Mr. Chairman, that these defence estimates can be construed only as offence estimates.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In your opinion.

Mr. COLDWELL: In my opinion. If we are looking for real defence for our people we should examine the scientific factors that will be brought to bear in the next war. If we believe that war is a possibility we should prepare ourselves for that. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) last night mentioned the new bombs that have been perfected, the thermite bombs. I wonder whether the Department of National Defence has given any consideration to precautions which might be taken to meet the havoc and devastation that would be caused by aeroplanes dropping thermite bombs. There is not a chemical known that will extinguish fires started by that type of bomb because it burns without air. If hon. gentleman care to get the report to which I have referred this afternoon, they will find experiments in the use of thermite described therein, one of which was the dropping of thermite through a pail of water which resulted in burning out the bottom of the pail. To guard against the effect of aerial attacks would be a real defence measure. If we are buying planes because we fear air raids, then I say that the methods of defence which we should adopt are rather methods that would enable us to defend ourselves against the effects of the raids about which we are being continually frightened. I am asking the department to be logical. I have been logical. I have opposed this estimate because I do not believe we are likely to be attacked from the air. I ask the department to be equally logical, and if they believe that air raids upon us are possible, let them make some recommendations to this committee to meet the situation that would then arise, we will say, in a city like Montreal, Halifax, Vancouver or Saint John.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Mr. Chairman, I have not said a word upon these estimates so far, but when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggests that the only possible defence for the Dominion of Canada is a gas-bag, a fire hose and a funk hole, I must ask permission to make a brief reply.

You will recall, sir, that in 1914 there was a war. At that time the German cruiser Emden broke loose, and raided and sank thousands of tons of British shipping. Perhaps the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, or if he is not a naval or military expert, perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) can tell us what would have prevented the Emden, had it chosen to do so, from coming to Victoria, destroying the shipping there, passing on to Vancouver and repeating the same process there. Had we anything to defend ourselves with at that time? Was there a man, was there a ship, was there a plane which could have interfered? Am I right when I suggest that the defence upon which we relied at that time was two or three Japanese cruisers which happened by chance to be in the immediate vicinity? I am not a warrior. I do not want war; I deplore war as much as anybody in this house can possibly deplore it, but I submit that we must consider realities.

In 1914 there was also the cruiser squadron of von Spee attacking shipping in the south Atlantic. It met the ships of Cradock, defeated them and then moved towards the east coast of South America. That was a much greater menace than the Emden. What was there to prevent it from going up to Victoria or to the Atlantic ports? Could my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence state that we now have at Vancouver or Victoria or any other coast city, aeroplanes or anti-aircraft guns with which one might stop such a squadron from attacking our ports? It is true that the squadron moved around the other way and there was met by a British squadron, but it is conceivable that in the next war conditions might not be exactly the same. It might be that British squadrons will not be moving freely here and there in the Atlantic to chase German cruisers. History repeats itself, but not always on the same lines. It might be that for a time British warships would be compelled to remain near home and they might have to let a stray vessel of the enemy cross the seas, destroying what it will.

I ask my hon. friends, the military and naval experts in the southeast corner, this question: Are you willing to say that this country should go absolutely without defence? I answer that you are not, because you voted this afternoon time and time again for the expenditure of the same amount as we expended last year. You believe in defence, but you do not believe in efficient defence. You believe in fighting, but you believe in fighting with what someone has described as wooden guns. I want peace. I will do anything that is possible for peace. I have asked this house, and especially the Minister of Finance, and I have appealed to the nation as a whole, that we ought to consider means of expanding our trade and developing our commerce with other nations of the world. But if you are not going to do that, are you going to face realities? Are you going to meet the exigencies of war, as you must do if war comes? Are you going to realize that in that case you must be prepared to defend Canada? And what are you going to defend it with?

I do not suggest to-day that these estimates are too high or too low. I am not competent to judge. All I say is that we have police forces in our cities. Will you withdraw the police? Would the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who knows someone in his immediate neighbourhood who might be a robber hesitate to lock his door because he did not happen to be acquainted with the robber? I submit that we do not know the nation against which we may be engaged. The scene changes rapidly, and no one knows what may happen. But I want to mention one word that I received to-day in a letter from a friend in London. He said: "My friends here expect the storm to break before July." I hope he is wrong. I feel in my heart he must be wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I do not believe the world can be so mad. Would we not ourselves be full of madness if we failed to take cognizance of the circumstances, if we failed to realize that when the storm breaks, we may in some measure be brought into close contact with it. When that storm comes, it may be necessary for us to do something, and we at least ought to be prepared, not for every eventuality, but surely for some.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), whether he intended it or not, has really diverted the discussion from the point we were raising. He urges that we face realities. That is what some of us are trying to do. We are asking whether this greatly increased armament is adequate. The minister cannot say that it is. We are asking against whom are we preparing to fight. The minister cannot name the nation.

Mr. DUPUIS: Any nation which may be at war with us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister and the government are not facing the realities of the situation. If we venture to criticize anything, someone sneers that we are not military and naval experts. Hon. members who do the sneering are themselves not much more military and naval experts than anyone else in the committee. We have asked the minister again and again with regard to the advice of experts, but we are told that he must not divulge military secrets and strategy. I submit that although we members of parliament are not naval and military experts and make no pretence of being such, we are called upon again and again in the discussion of estimates to determine upon policies with regard to agriculture, as to which most of us are not experts, with regard to commerce, concerning which most of us are not experts, with regard to labour, with regard to legal matters, in which most of us are not experts. Then why should it be that the military estimates should be considered as quite different from any other? Though we may not be military experts, some of us have been trained in some degree in logic, and logical reasoning is not confined to either side of this house or any group in this house. As duly elected representatives we are asked to determine upon a certain policy, and it does not help to clear the situation when hon. members opposite sneer or pound their desks.

The hon. member for Huron North had a good deal to say about guns and ships and anti-aircraft. I submit that the vote we are discussing is not concerned with any of these things.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What we are now concerned with is planes, bombing planes. It is curious that although the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) objected to this provision on the ground that essentially it would mean offensive rather than defensive warfare, the minister had nothing to say. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) supplemented what had been said earlier by quoting an authoritative statement from men who are dealing with this very question at close quarters in England. Again, the minister has nothing to say in rebuttal of the argument. Only a few minutes ago an hon. member who sits just behind the minister distinctly made the statement, in supporting the government's policy, that bombing planes were practically useless except for retaliation. The minister has not indicated whether he accepts such supporting opinions as that. From all I have read, it is generally agreed that bombing planes are of very little value except as a means of retaliation. Yet the minister has nothing to say when we point to an argument of that kind, an argument put forward as one reason for supporting the estimate for an increased expenditure on bombing planes. When, a few days ago, we were urged to accept these increased estimates and all that this program involves, we asked against whom we were arming. We pointed out that it was next to impossible for the Japanese on one coast or the Germans on the other to send an expedition to Canada. We were told in reply that occasionally raiders may come over here and that we ought to be able to repel occasional raids from whatever country they come. One would have thought that if we were facing realities the program would be one of coastal defence. Quite true, certain increases along that line have been proposed, but now the minister comes along with proposals for an increased expenditure well on to seven millions of dollars, the major part of which relates to this arm of defence, and we ask the reason for it. It is admitted that if a raider came across at this time, our bombing planes would not be much good, but the major purpose of the bombing plane would be retaliation. Let us come to realities. Is it suggested that if a German plane, we will say, came over here and managed, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) put it the other day, to drop a bomb on a granary in Saskatchewan, we must send our air force away over the Atlantic to drop bombs on Germany?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the logic of the proposal.

Mr. DUPUIS: To protect us against such an attack.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we to understand that our only purpose in providing for such a large force of aeroplanes circling over this country or known to be somewhere available, is that the Germans will be afraid to come over here for fear that we then would go over to Germany? I suggest we are being driven to extreme and imaginary assumptions if that is the argument in support of the vote. Is it possible for us to accept that point of view without going contrary to the policy which we have been assured is the policy of this government? I could hardly but accept the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), coming as they did from men who are sincere. I could hardly but accept the assurance they gave the other day that this defence vote was for purely defence purposes. But, Mr. Chairman, whatever they may think, I do not know exactly the means by which advice is passed on from one governmental body to another, from the United Kingdom to this country, but I do say that we have the right to be suspicious. We have the right to be suspicious when we find that a major part of the increase is to be devoted, not to defence purposes—admittedly it would be useless for strictly defence purposes—but to what would be of value as a means of retaliation. That retaliation would undoubtedly carry our planes over to some foreign country. Again and again it has been admitted that we are not going to attack the United States. Then the only other foreign country would be overseas. It may be that somewhere there will be a submarine upon which a bomb might be dropped. I admit that possibility. But essentially that would not deter a great nation from sending bombers over to this country. The effective use of bombers can mean only that we would send bombing planes to Europe or to Asia, and that means that we depart entirely from the policy which the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister, and the Minister of National Defence himself have stated is the policy of Canada. I think we ought to be fair in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we ought to be straightforward in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear the minister say, "hear, hear." Then the government should proceed with perfect fairness and frankness. Somebody said that the Minister of National Defence had laid all his cards on the table. I am not suggesting that he has some Machiavellian plan to put this program over on Canada, but I do suggest to him that the program which is being outlined is not one that will commend itself to a very great number of Canadians as being a purely defence program. And that is especially true of this item. It has been charged in some sections of the chamber that we in this corner have not been absolutely consistent. I do not know what other course we could have taken in order to be consistent. We have from the very first opposed the increase in armaments, and we are opposing it item by item. When our motion of lack of confidence was before the house, the Prime Minister suggested that we had some other end in view and that when it came to the estimates we would not vote against them. That was his suggestion in opposing our resolution. Well, we are voting against these increases steadily, item by item, and we propose to continue doing so; we are sincere in that. Some of us believe that we could settle the matter far better by other means than by military defence preparations. I am convinced of the truth of that. As I tried to set forth in my resolution earlier in the session, I believe that if, in an endeavour to bring about better relations between Canada and the other countries, if necessary making financial sacrifices and refusing to ship our raw materials to be used in the manufacture of armaments in other countries, thus provoking yet other countries to retaliation,—if to that end we devoted one-tenth of the attention and one-tenth of the money that we give to military matters, it would be a surer defence than any other which could be provided. I have said that again and again. I should like to wipe out all these increases. But an item of this kind is particularly objectionable, simply because it seems to indicate that, if not in the back of the minister's mind, at any rate in the back of the minds of his officials—and we have no way of getting at them except through the minister—there is the idea that these military bombing planes may be used not in Canada but for some expedition outside Canada. They are mobile; they are the arm that could be most readily used if we were asked to send a military expedition abroad. One cannot but have the feeling that somewhere considerations of this kind are behind this program.

We are given a picture to-day of what will be involved, and if bombs are dropped in other countries it will be on other households, upon women and children as well as men. I can very well recollect, as can many hon. members, the consternation, the abhorrence, we experienced in the last war when the Germans began using gas. It was a horrible thing, we thought; never would we resort to any such thing. Throughout the world there was an outcry against it. Yet the horror has passed and the use of gas and gas bombs and bombing planes is being accepted as essential in modern warfare. That is the picture to which we must look forward.

I wish to say as a Canadian—and I feel sure I represent the feeling of tens of thousands of other Canadians—that we would do anything rather than involve this country in fratricidal strife.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think that is true. I will not sneer at my hon. friends opposite, for I believe they would do almost anything to avoid such a state of affairs. But I do say that they are adopting a military program which will inevitably land us in that sort of thing. They do not want it any more than I do, but they are adopting a program which in the end means war, and not merely war for the defence of our own borders but war which will inevitably land us in some foreign country. That is the end of the road.

Mr. FRASER: Does the hon. member really believe that bombing planes are not used in coastal defence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The best information that I can secure is, as was stated by an hon. member on the government side a few minutes ago, that bombing planes are almost useless for purely defensive purposes. That is my information.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex): If the hon. member is referring to me, I object to that statement; I never said any such thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hansard will show it. He said that bombing was practically useless except as a means of retaliation. I believe that was the meaning of his words. I should not like to do him wrong but that is what I wrote down.

Mr. LENNARD: May I ask the hon. member one question? What would he do in the event of an enemy nation sailing aeroplane carriers within a few hours' distance of our coast? What method of offence would he adopt?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think I am particularly called upon to answer that question. That contingency is so remote that we can very well disregard it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is one question which has been asked so often during the course of this debate, and which I regard as so preposterous, that I consider it my duty to answer it. Hon. gentlemen are asking us: Against whom are you arming? Can there be anything more ludicrous than that question? My hon. friend has just asked the same question, and I ask him: Can he cite any country in the world, any parliament in a civilized country where, when they organize their defence, they broadcast to the world that they are arming against this or that country? It is absurd to ask that question and my hon. friend knows it.

We in Canada are a peaceful people and we try to maintain friendly relations with all the nations of the world. We have no enemies, I hope; in fact I know we have no enemies. How can my hon. friend ask us to say that we are arming against somebody in particular? But we live in a world the conditions in which we cannot ignore. We live in a world which is arming everywhere and in a way we all deplore. At no time in history has there been such intensive arming on the part of every nation as there is at the present time. Rulers of nations advertise themselves, as was done in two countries which I could name but shall not, as wanting by force to propagate their doctrines throughout the world. As I say, we are the enemy of no one, but we have to take into account the madness that prevails everywhere. And we try at least—at least, I repeat—to defend ourselves in case of need. My hon. friends themselves are voting for credits for defence. Some hon. members on that side, and even on this side, have moved amendments to reduce the items in the estimates, but they want to keep the amounts as they were last year or the year before; that is an admission that there must be some provision for the defence of Canada. If there must be some national defence, is it not proper that it should be at least a little efficient, a little effective? That is a question more logical and reasonable than the one asked by my hon. friend.

After all, the first law of life is that of self-preservation. Every organism that lives seeks to protect itself, to make conditions so that it may live. The first duty of a nation is to defend its citizens; that I believe, no one will contradict. But my hon. friends say: Oh, we are in no danger, there is no need; we cannot foresee any. Well, to govern is to foresee. On a question like this we cannot follow our own personal fancies; we must take into account our responsibilities for our fellow men in Canada, and if unfortunately in a certain emergency something happens which my hon. friends say cannot happen, but which others say may happen, I could not justify myself to my conscience for neglect to take precautions by saying that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) or the communist party of Toronto or some groups in my own province told me that we did not need any defence. We are responsible; we have to make provision, and that is what we are doing at this time, as members of the government and as members of parliament doing our duty as God has given us the light to see it. I have heard somebody say: These explanations are all right, but my electors in the sixth range of some township will not understand that. Mr. Chairman, we are not going to govern Canada on that basis. I am a member of this government, and we are going to govern Canada in the way which we believe is the straightforward, honest and fair way for the protection of our citizens. And let me also ask—for some hon. members come back time after time with the suggestion that we are preparing for participation in wars outside Canada—why should hon. gentlemen say this when they know that it is not the case, when they know that it is not true—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Which statement?

Mr. FRASER: It is no worse than the statement made by the hon. member a few minutes ago. Let him withdraw his own.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. The Minister of Justice said that in expressing ourselves as we had done we made statements which we knew not to be true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Which we knew to be wrong. I say that statement must be withdrawn.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I said that they know these estimates are not for outside intervention but for the defence of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We do not know that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in my opinion is not well taken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I appeal against your ruling. I have never allowed anyone to say that my motives were wrong, that I knew anything which I did not know. I appeal against the ruling.

Mr. CLEAVER: But you will accuse any member of the government of that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend wants to speak, I have the floor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have appealed against the chairman's ruling.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I suppose my hon. friend does not insist on his appeal?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have appealed against the ruling of the chairman.

An hon. MEMBER: Put it in writing, according to the rules of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have the right to appeal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But your appeal must be in writing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That has not been the practice of this house. I am willing to put it in writing, but in the meantime I say that has not been the practice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend want me to write it for him?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. But I have been in this house for a good many years and I have never seen a member compelled to stop to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be good enough to put his appeal against the ruling of the chair in writing, and present it to the table.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know of no such rule. Perhaps the chairman will show me the rule. It is not the practice of the house. I submit we ought not to make a certain rule in one case and another rule in another case.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, during the twelve years I have been a member I have never seen a motion which was not in writing. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moves to appeal from your decision, he must put it in writing, in order that Mr. Speaker may take cognizance of his complaint. That seems clear and official, and there is nothing now before the chair. Mr. Chairman, you are ready to submit to Mr. Speaker the complaint of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but you have nothing in your hand. What can you give to Mr. Speaker? It is just as clear as daylight at noon. Therefore it seems to me that while we were waiting for Mr. Speaker to receive your report the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have ample time to draft a short motion. More than that, I am ready to oblige him by drafting the motion, if he will tell me what he wants to put into it. That, however, is not an engagement to vote for it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, no hon. member is allowed to impute motives to another. The Minister of Justice has done that, and I have appealed. Ordinarily it is sufficient to appeal to the Speaker. I have never known of a case of this kind, and I say it is distinctly subversive of the law of order of the house, and of all sense of justice and fair play, if there is to be one set of rules for one party and another set for another party.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend is entirely wrong. If he thinks I was imputing motives, I am quite willing to give him satisfaction. I did not impute any motives to the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is all I asked for at the beginning.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the question of privilege, I would say it has just been settled.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend has been successful in one thing, namely to cut my speech short.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Crète) negatived: Yeas, 22; Nays, 120.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I understood the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

An hon. MEMBER: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

DIONNE QUINTUPLETS

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, for the protection of the Dionne quintuplets.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. GRAY: In 1935 the provincial legislature of Ontario passed an act respecting the guardianship of the Dionne quintuplets. Under this act the Minister of Public Welfare was appointed a special guardian and the lieutenant governor in council was empowered to appoint additional guardians. At the present time His Honour Judge Valin, Doctor Dafoe and the father, Mr. Dionne, are the active guardians of the quintuplets and in them is vested full power to look after the health and general welfare of the quintuplets.

An application was made recently to the patent office for the registration of the words "quins," "quints" and "quintuplets" as trade marks to be used exclusively in connection with certain articles. The application lists some two hundred articles, but I shall read only a few. It was made by the Blossom Products Corporation, of Allentown, Pennsylvania, in the month of January and asks the right to use these words in connection with panties, bloomers, stepins, undersuits of knitted and woven fabrics, pyjamas, bathing suits, corsets, combinations, slips, mufflers, mittens, knickers, rompers, creepers, ties, bibs, overalls, suspenders, wind-breakers, crossword puzzles, paper games, bicycles, tricycles, brooms, kiddy carts, wheelbarrows, scooters, checker boards, blankets, spreads, beddings, pillows, mattresses, quilts, sheets, scarves, alcoholic beverages, ale, beer, gin, whisky, brandy, dental cream, toothbrushes, lip and cheek rouge, mascara, eye shadow, eyebrow pencil, high chairs, baby chairs, tobaccos, cigarettes, pipes, patent medicines and sewing boxes, in connection with all of which wares the applicant is exclusively concerned. The commissioner of patents found that he would be bound to grant the application of the applicants unless some protection was given. This bill proposes to vest exclusively in the guardians of the quintuplets the right to use the words "quins," "quints" and "quintuplets." Perhaps hon. members would like to discuss this bill and may have certain suggestions to make by way of amendment, and for these reasons I think it only right, should the house agree, that the bill should be referred to the private bills committee. I have discussed this matter with the commissioner of patents and he advises me that this is the only procedure by which the necessary protection can be given.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as this bill is going before the private bills committee I shall not discuss it at length at this time. I may say that I claim no experience in this matter, but I wish to confirm what has been said by the sponsor of the bill (Mr. Gray). Unless a bill of this kind is passed, the objects hoped to be attained can not be attained. Under the provisions of the Unfair Competition Act, which is a statute passed in 1932 dealing with the registration of trade marks, generally speaking trade marks in the form of a word may be registered only in association with specific commodities which are manufactured or sold by the person seeking to register the trade mark. On the other hand, there is nothing in the act giving the Secretary of State any discretionary power to refuse an application by any firm for the registration of the word "quintuplets" or other words of that kind. Although this is a common word, it has come to have great commercial value because of the great public interest throughout the world in the Dionne quintuplets. Commercial houses both in Canada and abroad have been anxious to register these words as trade marks, and, as the hon. gentleman has just said, some applications have been made to my department.

After consultation with the commissioner of patents we came to the conclusion that we could not refuse such an application or delay the grant indefinitely. The department has always taken the stand that it could not view favourably any legislation which devised to private or commercial firms special privileges, but it would appear that the circumstances in this case are such that the department would not oppose this bill. It will be sent to the private bills committee where all sides, if there are more than one, can be heard. Therefore, I ask the house to consent to the second reading and send the bill to the committee.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is not a case of sides or parties; it is essentially a question of the public interest. I venture to say that no such measure has ever before been submitted to any parliament. I wonder whether the house realizes just what this bill means? It means that the provisions of the law with respect to trade marks are to be set at naught. As the minister (Mr. Rinfret) has said, a trade mark can be registered only under certain conditions, but these conditions are not to be observed with respect to this matter. These words are to be declared trade marks without any obligation upon these people to comply with the provisions of the law with respect to trade marks. In other words, this bill is to prevent anyone else from using these words.

Mr. GRAY: During the life of the quintuplets.

Mr. BENNETT: These words are declared to be the trade marks of five minor children incapable of holding property except through guardians. The guardians have given no indication of any intention to utilize these trade marks in accordance with the provisions of the law. In my judgment it is legislation which, in the public interest, we cannot entirely overlook. I cannot think of the use of the word "quints" causing any harm to these five children. What harm could possibly be done by someone using the word "quints" according to the terms of the law when they have to do certain things in order to maintain the validity of their trade marks? As the minister very properly observed, they can be used only in connection with some specific matter.

We are now being asked to call these words trade marks and vest them in the guardians for purposes not at all related to commerce. This parliament is being asked to do something which I venture to say has never before been done by any parliament in connection with trade marks. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gray), who has moved the second reading of this bill, has stated that it will be sent to the private bills committee, so there is no object in my directing the attention of the house to the facts I have mentioned other than to say that the public interest must be considered regardless of any sentimental or other considerations which may obtain. I venture to say that in the long history of the administration of trade marks there has never been such a bill as this one for the purpose of creating trade marks out of words of this kind and vesting them in the guardians of minor children who have no intention of utilizing them for commercial purposes. I only direct attention to that and will leave it at that because the bill is going to the private bills committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

DIVORCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

PROVISION FOR APPEAL TO PROVINCIAL COURT OF APPEAL IN DIVORCE AND MARTIMONIAL CAUSES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Green for the second reading of Bill No. 15, to provide for appeal to the court of appeal of the province of British Columbia in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have always been opposed to divorce. A few years ago I fought strongly against the bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Woodsworth) establishing divorce courts in Ontario. I stated at the time that it would facilitate divorce, and that the number of divorces would increase as a result, and unfortunately the statistics show that I was right. But this bill is altogether different. A divorce court is operated and now exists in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: It did before British Columbia joined the union.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, before it joined the union, but the courts have held that there was a doubt as to whether there was an appeal to the court of appeal of British Columbia and that appeals should go to the privy council. It has been represented to me, and I have the conviction, that divorce is rather more easily obtained under these circumstances, that perhaps it is not surrounded with the same safeguards there would be if there was an appeal court in British Columbia for divorce as there is in the other provinces. In other words, this bill, instead of facilitating divorce, will make it more difficult. It will assure more safeguards to the parties. Under these circumstances I do not oppose the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Appellate jurisdiction in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the sponsor of this bill if this clause includes appeals on questions of fact as well as of law?

Mr. GREEN: Yes; it includes an appeal on questions of fact.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Aviation—Royal Canadian Air Force—Expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $11,391,650.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Just before recess I was about to ask the minister a question. At the moment, however, I should like to make some observations with reference to remarks by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to the effect that we of this group have hardly been consistent in that we voted for estimates equal to the amount of last year. We have not opposed defence. We have opposed the increase in defence, because we do not believe that any adequate reason has been shown for these increased estimates. The Minister of Justice made a strange remark. He said he did not propose to be convinced that the vote was a waste of money merely because that point of view was advocated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), the communist party in Toronto, and some sections of his own province.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is quite true.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I would not go so far as to say that the minister intentionally lumped together all these groups for the purpose of inferring that the inspiration for this opposition came from the communist party.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is a mere coincidence.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If such an interpretation should be put upon our action, I should like to state here and now that our opposition has been consistent with the policy and philosophy of this group. While it is not unusual to hear some hon. gentlemen associate us with the communist party, in order to cast somewhat of a slur upon our group, it is unusual to hear them include also any hon. members from Quebec who happen to differ from the government.

I think we are fully within our rights in asking two questions with reference to these increases: first, if they are needed, and, second, if they are to be used exclusively for defence. The minister said this afternoon that the question against whom the provision is to be made is totally irrelevant, because in other countries where rearmament is being voted no mention is made of the nation against whom they are rearming. That is hardly in accordance with the facts. As a matter of fact, again and again in the Japanese diet Russia has been cited as the nation against whom Japan is providing defence. Hitler has stated repeatedly that fear of communism is what causes his country to arm. The Prime Minister of Great Britain made the statement not long ago that the frontier for Great Britain was on the Rhine, and that Britain must protect the sea route to India, which is the life-line of the empire. I think these statements clearly show against whom those nations are arming. But no such statement has been made in connection with these estimates. We are repeatedly told that we have no enemies, and at the same time, that we must defend ourselves lest some time or another we should manage to develop enemies. There is no reason for some of the indignation that was displayed this afternoon merely because we asked, quite frankly, are these purchases that it is now proposed to make, in the best interests of defence, or are they such as will not give adequate defence but rather will lend themselves to the formation of a mobile unit for use elsewhere? In asking the minister to give that information, we are not being obstructionists, nor are we trying to be facetious. Therefore I ask the minister just what part would bombing planes play in actual defence in the event either of an attack by raiders or an invasion of our coasts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is the first time during the discussion of these estimates that the minister in charge of them has been asked this question by any member of the group in the corner. All the members of the group other than the hon. member who has just spoken took it for granted, and so stated plainly in this committee, that these estimates were to be used for offensive purposes outside the Dominion of Canada, and they thereby broke the rules of the house, because not only my leader, the Prime Minister, but two or three of our colleagues and many others who are conversant with the policy underlying these estimates stated, not once, but time after time on the floor of the house that not one cent of these estimates is intended for any purposes of aggression outside Canada, but that the vote is intended solely for the defence of the dominion. I think my friends and my political opponents alike will agree with me that I have refrained from any provocative utterances during the discussion of these estimates. What has happened? My hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation moved an amendment when Mr. Speaker was in the chair a week ago. The debate upon that amendment occupied the house for almost a week. During the discussion unequivocal assurances were given by the government that every cent of these estimates—air force, militia and naval estimates—was for the defence of Canada, of Canadian territorial waters and Canadian neutrality. Yet when we come to the items, hon. member after hon. member day after day rises in his place and refuses to accept the assurances which have been given. There is a rule that when an hon. member rises in his place and makes a statement his word is to be accepted, and I am very much surprised at the suspicion and distrust which seem to have been engendered in the minds of my hon. friends opposite.

With reference to the use of bombing planes, I do not pretend to the wonderful knowledge that some of my critics appear to have, but the best technical advice I have received is that the most effective defensive weapon to-day is the aeroplane, the bombing aeroplane. My hon. friends, however, will not accept the assurances of those who give this technical advice. I desire again to assure the hon. member for Weyburn, if assurance is of any use to him, that every cent of these estimates is intended for the purposes that have been specified, for the defence of Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I asked the minister a perfectly civil question. I hardly think it is necessary—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I asked a perfectly civil question. I refuse to have it imputed to me that I am not open to conviction, or that I am impervious to any explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad to know that the hon. member is open to receive an explanation. I am trying to convince him; I trust that when I have finished my explanation he will be entirely convinced. At one time the members of the group to which he belongs argue that these defence estimates are not adequate for the defence of Canada; at another time they complain that these estimates are used for offensive purposes. They offer us two great policies, one a home policy and the other a foreign policy. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in reply, I believe, to the Prime Minister, said the other day that he was in favour of military sanctions with reference to the League of Nations.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was in the house. The records of Hansard will confirm my statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: The records of Hansard will not show any such thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, if I am misquoting my hon. friend I will certainly retract, but I should like to refer to Hansard to substantiate what I have said, that he was in favour of participation with reference to any obligation existing under the League of Nations.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That means one thing and one thing only. It means military sanctions. And what would that involve? I am neither criticizing nor commending the policy he advocates. But if Canada had sent a mobile division last year to Ethiopia, it would have cost this country in eight months over $100,000,000. That is the meaning of the foreign policy of the hon. member for Vancouver East; yet when we come here proposing a modest expenditure of $35,000,000 for defence of our Canadian homes and Canadian shores, these hon. gentlemen do everything possible to retard and hinder and impair the passage of the estimates.

This is the quotation:

Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): But suppose the hon. member is wrong, and there had been a war, would he have been in favour of participating in that war?

Mr. MacInnis: Most certainly, in any action which Canada as a member of the league would take to protect another member of the league.

As I said, I neither commend nor condemn that declaration of policy, but I am stating its implications and its consequences. If Canada had been called upon last year to send a division to Ethiopia, the cost to this country would have exceeded $100,000,000; yet, though we have given repeatedly in this house most emphatic assurances that these modest estimates are solely for the defence of Canada, we have two declarations of policy from our critics across the way: one from the member for Vancouver East, which would mean an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian money; the other, from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who would not allow us a gun or an aeroplane or a warship or a torpedo-boat destroyer or a submarine, but who would have a national policy of dug-outs for the Dominion of Canada. That is going to be the home policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group—overseas hundreds of millions of dollars; in Canada not a cent for the defence of the liberties and the security of the Canadian people. We must not give to our Canadian boys, the finest fighters in the air the world has ever seen, decent aeroplanes to meet anyone who might assail us. Instead we must have a policy of dug-outs, east and west, north and south. That is the policy of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I have never seen such inconsistency, suspicion and mistrust in all my experience in the House of Commons.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I asked a question, and I am still waiting for the answer. I enjoyed the exuberant eloquence of the hon. gentleman, but I should like to get an answer to the question which I asked.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question was with regard to bombing aeroplanes, and the answer is that according to the best opinion they constitute one of the most effective defensive weapons.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister accuses the group over here of holding up the estimates and prolonging the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh, yes, he did. He said that day after day this discussion had gone on in the house, and he also accused us of being responsible for the debate which took place during the best part of last week. I would point out in the first place that those who spoke most on the question last week were members of his own party, and if he is going to point the finger of accusation at anyone for holding up the discussion he had better look around him among his own friends. There he will find the culprits. For, after all, the Conservative party did not participate in the discussion at all; only five members of Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group spoke on it, and they were not allowed more than forty minutes each; in fact I doubt whether they took up the whole forty minutes. But if they did, that would mean two hours on the part of this group in the discussion last week, while all the rest of the time the hon. gentleman's own supporters discussed the question. They were the ones who took up the time. And the same thing with regard to the amendments. The items under discussion yesterday and again to-day have been spoken to mostly by members on the minister's side. I do not know of any member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group that has moved any amendments; possibly one may have done so. Most of the amendments came from supporters of the minister himself. Why, therefore, does he accuse us? As the hon. member for Weyburn said, his own exuberance ran away with him and he forgot himself, and possibly the same remark applies to some of the arguments he has used. I have not spoken a great deal on the question. I asked a few questions for information and I do not believe any of us in this group are entirely opposed to having defence. I realize that we must have some defence, just as it was pointed out that if we are to preserve order in any community, we must have the nucleus of a police force there. But there is legitimate room for differences of opinion on these estimates. I am of opinion that we could have had the same efficiency in connection with the defence forces of the country with the amount of money spent last year as we shall have with the money we are asked to vote on this occasion.

An hon. MEMBER: Give the basis of your opinion.

Mr. HEAPS: It is my opinion though it may not be worth much, and in a discussion such as this I do not suppose that it would be worth much, but I believe the opinion is shared by many others. As I have said here before, if only a tithe of this money spent for war purposes were spent in an effort to foster peace sentiments among the nations, we should get far more value for the money expended than we receive for the money spent on munitions and in preparing for some eventuality.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of National Defence is greatly concerned about the inconsistency of the defence policies of the small group in this corner, but I am not sure that his own party are all at one on their defence policy. There is possibly more inconsistency on that side, not only relatively, but perhaps on the whole. When he has got rid of the inconsistency in his own camp, he can come over here and lecture us. Let us look at the situation we were dealing with last Thursday. I made some reference to sanctions—and remember sanctions were applied by the Liberal government against Italy in the war with Ethiopia. If those sanctions had led to war, would the government have taken part in that war or would they have backed out? That is a question we have a right to ask the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you ask us where the fire goes when it goes out?

Mr. MacINNIS: Judging by the look of distress on the hon. member's face, I doubt whether he himself knows the answer to that. The question before the dominion is still the question of foreign policy and we have not settled it yet, nor have we done anything towards settling it. Am I to understand, is the house to understand, is the country to understand, that in developing this defence policy we are withdrawing from the League of Nations and will take no further part in applying sanctions or in any other phase of the work of the league? That is a question which must be answered satisfactorily to the people of Canada. If we are going to withdraw, what alignments are we going to make? For, after all, we must have some policy, a policy of collective security; either we must have a policy of association with the commonwealth of nations in a league of some sort or we must make some other arrangement. One of these alternatives is inevitable; which one are we going to choose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to the hon. member that this house has already agreed that with respect to sanctions parliament will say what is to be done. That has been settled; my hon. friend was a party to it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Evidently not—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: —because when the sanctions were applied to Italy this house was not consulted, and when Doctor Riddell was censured the house was asked nothing about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I spoke on a previous occasion, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked me whether I would make a statement of our foreign policy. In that statement of our foreign policy I drew the attention of the house to the fact that the policy of the government with respect to sanctions was to allow parliament to decide. That was a clear statement and it was accepted by everybody.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of National Defence paid some attention to some remarks I made both last night and to-day with regard to what constitutes real defence against air attacks. I am not retracting anything I said in that regard. It may be called in derision a national policy of dug-outs, but I fancy that if the hon. gentleman will read Hansard and see what I actually said and the views I expressed, together with the authorities upon which I based those views, he will feel ashamed of that remark. If we are really in danger of attack, as the minister has constantly reminded us, I wanted to see that the women and children for whose protection these armaments are supposed to be obtained, shall be provided with some defences. And there is nothing in these estimates that will provide any such defence.

My point of view regarding armaments can be well stated in the words which I read in the debate of a week ago yesterday. I suppose there was no man in the British Empire more closely associated with the foreign policy of Great Britain in the pre-war years than the late Sir Edward Grey. Shortly after the beginning of the war, Sir Edward Grey used these words:

> The increase of armaments that is intended in each nation to produce consciousness of strength and a sense of security does not produce these effects.
> On the contrary, it produces the consciousness of strength of other nations and a sense of fear. The enormous growth of armaments in Europe, the sense of insecurity and fear caused by them—it was these that made war inevitable.

This statement, I believe, is absolutely correct. Last week we saw the announcement from Great Britain of a great armament program, and a day or two later there was a discussion in Germany regarding the matter, and a sense of greater insecurity engendered there. The result will be that Germany will adopt another great armament program. That will cause Russia to build up still greater armaments, and so the mad race goes on, until the time comes when one nation feels that it is in a position to bring the matter to a show-down. It is a tragedy for the world that collective security has broken down. I would be glad to see a reconstituted and reorganized League of Nations, with some power such as an international police force to enforce law and order in the world. But these individual national rearmament programs can lead only to ruin and chaos, and that is the reason for my opposition to these estimates. I have consistently preached this for years. What I have said in this house is what I have said ever since the war. And I am not in the position of some hon. gentlemen who perhaps did not make their position clear prior to the election. I did. And I had many friends among hon. gentlemen opposite who told me that I was not alone in that attitude, that it was the policy of the Liberal party. Consequently, when I see this rearmament program proceeding, I feel, rightly or wrongly, but conscientiously at least, that I must oppose it. Because I agree with the statement made by Sir Edward Grey when the war broke out, that a sense of insecurity will pervade the world and all the nations, it also seems to me that we in this part of the world, small in population, with a tremendous territory to protect, ought to weigh well the consequences of joining in such a race and of following a policy which may appear provocative. The item under discussion, that of bombing planes, is a provocative item. The Minister of National Defence and those advising him may believe that bombing planes constitute an arm of defence; I do not, nor, may I add, do those who have spoken of aeroplanes in the British House of Commons, including the Prime Minister of Great Britain. So we in this group are opposing these increased estimates because we believe they can lead only to further rearmament and to ultimate disaster. When the minister complains about obstructionist tactics, let me point out, as was done by my colleague from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), that last week only five of this group spoke, for forty minutes each or less. But the debate went on all week. None of the group to my immediate right spoke; almost the entire debate was carried on by the supporters of the government. When I used to read Hansard before I came here, I marvelled how the present Minister of National Defence, when he was in opposition, could manage to keep up such a barrage on the ministers who were then in power. Consequently, it comes with rather poor grace from the minister that he should complain that we are examining these estimates thoroughly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not complain.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then what was all the heat about?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was all light.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood him to say that we had been obstructing the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, I never said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, if I am mistaken, I am glad to withdraw the reflection upon the minister.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken? Sometimes I may use provocative language—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no, no!

Mr. POULIOT:—especially when through the chair I reply to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). But my hon. friend who has just spoken said that this increase is a provocation. I ask him, whom do we provoke? Do we provoke the United States, which is spending billions for its army and navy? It provokes us. Do we provoke Japan? Japan is in the same case; she provokes us. Every nation is provoking each other; well, then, it is time to be careful and defend ourselves. If I voted for some amendment—I may vote for others in the future—I shall never vote for a motion or amendment on the ground of provocation, because it was made clear that this expenditure was for self-defence, and when it is for the defence of this country the government will find me just the same as before. I would ask the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, whom do we provoke by increasing the estimates of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. COLDWELL: When I look at the late war I realize this, that the nations which were least armed were the ones which were not involved.

Mr. POULIOT: Belgium, for example?

Mr. COLDWELL: Belgium was armed to the teeth; its fortresses around Liege were the greatest fortresses that had been built.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh, you are obsolete.

Mr. COLDWELL: They had just been completed under the direction of some of the greatest French and British engineers, when the great war broke out. Belgium was destroyed. I look at Denmark, and I see it practically unarmed when the war began.

Mr. FRASER: A different thing, altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not now.

Mr. COLDWELL: It had the most desirable naval bases for operation against the British navy which could be found on the shores of the North sea. But Denmark was not invaded, because she provided no excuse—no provocation, if you like—for invasion. That is my view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To what extent was Canada armed before the last war?

Mr. COLDWELL: Canada was not well armed before the great war, but Canada entered that war of her own volition.

Mr. FRASER: And she will the next.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to change the subject for a moment, and get on a peace-time footing. I understand the plans of the Department of National Defence call for certain extensions at the Jericho air base in Vancouver. There is some suggestion that part of the extension will require taking over a portion of Locarno park, which adjoins the base, on the west. May I point out that the park is comparatively small, but that it is one of the most popular parks in Vancouver, has one of the safest bathing beaches for children and is one of the best parks for picnic purposes. It would be too bad if the department were to take over any of the park, because I believe in the vicinity there is vacant land which should be used, even if it is not quite so satisfactory. I suggest that the minister give the matter serious consideration before any of the park area is taken over.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South is one of negotiation at the present time with the Vancouver city council and the Vancouver parks board. No decision has yet been reached; the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the minister to the fact that Fredericton, the capital city in the province of New Brunswick, has no air port. In a defence program it would surely be regarded proper to have a landing field at each capital city, and I would ask that consideration be given to providing one for Fredericton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Representations have been received from New Brunswick, and the matter is now under consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The vote in question involves a large sum of money, and I do not believe the minister fully answered the question I put to him. I know he has had a grilling for two days, and perhaps he is a little irascible. But in asking him as to the usefulness of bombing planes for defence purposes, I do not think we are casting any aspersions on the word of the Prime Minister or on that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. POULIOT: The aspirations of ministers are always dangerous.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I was talking about aspersions, not aspirations. Emerson said: "Your actions speak so loudly I can't hear what you say." The only way we can judge the use to which any arm of the service will be put is to know the nature of that part of the service. I can imagine that a bombing plane might be used to attack an aircraft carrier or, in a remote instance, perhaps to attack a submarine, although depth charges would seem to be the logical weapon for that purpose. If there are any other uses, I think the officials should give them to us, through the minister. That is the only way we can judge whether the major part of this great sum of money is going to be used in a service which will actually constitute a defence, or whether it will be used for other purposes. I think that is a fair question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe I replied to the question on at least two occasions. As I said, out of the 102 aeroplanes involved in the estimates, only 24 are bombing planes. As I said this afternoon, there are other types such as fighters, reconnaissance, torpedo bombers, bombers and also small training planes, which constitute 27 out of the total of 102. In the opinion of those whose advice is competent, bombing planes are most effective, with fighter and reconnaissance planes, for defensive purposes. That is as clear, as lucid and as precise as I can make my answer.

Mr. DOUGLAS: One other question—and this is the last: If I understood him correctly the minister said this afternoon that some of the planes were being built in England because the British air ministry thought it wise to have planes of the same design and make. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, it is not exactly correct. The reason they were made in England previously was that we did not have resources in Canada for building them. Deliveries from England of some planes ordered have taken about twenty-four months, before they have actually reached Canada. So the hon. member can see that if there are immediate requirements—and there are—we must look to other sources for the production of the planes.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Did I understand the minister to say that it was desirable to have planes of the same design as those in the British air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Why? What is the object of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because it has been for many years the considered policy in all arms of the service that equipment in all branches shall be of a pattern identical with that used by the mother country if possible. That is the reason.

Mr. O'NEILL: I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North who appeared to object vigorously to some observations that had been made. Apparently he thought someone had said that the group to which he belongs was obstructing the passage of the estimates. Hon. members will recall that a resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and during the discussion of it all we heard was war, rumours of war, preparations for war, and so on. Then, a resolution was brought in by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and the same thing happened.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; I wish to correct that.

Mr. O'NEILL: The resolution was brought in by the hon. member for Weyburn, and the talk was along similar lines. Another resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver North, the discussion of which consumed a week, with the exception of Wednesday afternoon. Now we hear the same arguments to which we have listened on private members' days since the opening of the session. Since we have been here we have heard nothing but wars, rumours of wars and preparations for wars. The hon. member has said that only five members of his group have spoken. I imagine it would be a revelation to those hon. members if we were to take time to show them a comparison of the time those five members have consumed, as compared with any other five members, including the Prime Minister.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Do you include the hon. member for Témiscouata?

Mr. O'NEILL: I do not say they are obstructing passage of the legislation; I am not saying that. I would not say a thing like that. It seems to me, however, that a great deal of time has been consumed by those five members. Honestly, I should like to have the command of the English language and the powers of oratory possessed by those hon. gentlemen. Possibly, if I had such powers, I might be consuming a good deal of the time of the house. However, I really do not know what I can say now either for or against war, after listening to the remarks of members of the group to which I have referred.

Mr. HEAPS: May I say a word in reply to what the hon. member has just said?

An hon. MEMBER: Just one word.

Mr. HEAPS: There seems to be an anxiety among some hon. members opposite to have the vote taken, and we hear hon. members shouting, "Carried, carried." When I hear that, I remember the time when some hon. members opposite sat on this side of the house, and I remember too, the days and weeks they consumed in the discussion of a small matter which was really of very little importance. I wonder now what some hon. members who are sitting opposite to-day would have said if the same estimates had been brought down by a Conservative government.

An hon. MEMBER: We would vote for them.

Mr. HEAPS: It is easy for hon. members to say they would vote for them. I imagine that for every day which has been spent at this time, they took probably a week. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) has not been in the house very long and perhaps that is why he spoke in the way he did. Had he been a member of his party when they were in opposition he would have known that in connection with peace, order and good government more time was taken up by those who now sit to the right of the Speaker than has been taken up on this question, which I believe is of greater importance to this country. If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken will take the time and trouble to read Hansard, I can give him the names of five members of his own party—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I will let him take the names of five members of his own party and compare their speeches with those of five other members of this house to see how much time was taken in debate. I am willing to give him the names of ten members and let him see what happened. There is always a certain lack of restraint on the part of hon. members on the government side of the house, but I think what has happened in this debate shows a lack of appreciation of what this house means.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We did not repeat the same thing all the time.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not repeating anything I have said before in this chamber. I would not be saying what I am saying now were it not for what the previous speaker said. It must be admitted that it is the right of an opposition to criticize estimates and that is the position his party has always taken. Now they are in power, hon. members opposite are denying us the right to elicit information. They say we should not speak because we happen to be in opposition. Let me say to the hon. member for Kamloops: Compare the number of speeches on this particular question delivered by members in this group with the number of speeches delivered by members of the Liberal party.

Mr. O'NEILL: That is what I am doing.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member must be asleep; if he were awake he would see that only five members of this group spoke on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil).

An hon. MEMBER: You only have seven members.

Mr. HEAPS: If each member spoke for forty minutes, that would take only a little over three hours of the time of this house. How can the hon. member say that we have been responsible for keeping this thing going for a whole week? Is it not a little absurd to say that, when we spoke for only a little over three hours? No member of the Conservative party took part in this debate, but thirty to forty members of the Liberal party spoke on the question. They wanted to express the views of their constituents on this matter, and that is only what we want to do. I do not think there is anything more I can add to the volume of speeches already delivered, and I am quite prepared to let the matter rest.

Mr. MacNEIL: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of questions to ask in connection with this estimate which I think is of sufficient importance to warrant questions being asked and their being answered. I fail to understand why this group should have ricidule and sarcasm heaped upon it because its members view this matter very seriously. I think I have a right to view this matter seriously as I have a distinct recollection of many hours of the time of this parliament being spent on subjects of less consequence, on matters of a purely partisan and political nature. If we make a mistake in formulating a national policy, it may mean the lives of many Canadian young men. Of that there can be no doubt. We stand at an important point in our national affairs and there is little excuse for the levity which has been assumed by some members. While in the heat of debate provocative remarks may be passed, I do not think hon. members should question our sincerity. I think they should recognize that we are accorded the support of many thousands of our fellow citizens.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) brought up a matter which has not yet been satisfactorily answered. The minister stated that he was relying almost implicitly upon the expert advice of the departmental staff. He suggested that we were questioning the good faith of himself and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in giving certain assurances to this house. I do not intend to suggest for one moment that the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence has attempted to deceive this committee. I think the Minister of National Defence must admit that both he and his deputy minister, a man for whom we all have the greatest esteem, are so burdened with administrative details that they cannot give the necessary study to questions of a technical nature. The minister has admitted quite frankly that he must rely upon this expert advice.

The minister asks that we rely upon the advice of men who during the past eighteen years have received from this parliament approximately $300,000,000. That vast amount has been expended by these experts, and yet the Minister of National Defence rose in his place the other evening and said that at the present time we have no defence, that we must ignore all the activities of the past and start anew. This is the same staff of experts whose advice must now be accepted by this house.

It was shown very clearly that the most ghastly and stupid blunders were made by the general staff at the outbreak of the last war. They said that bombs could not possibly be used in trench warfare, that the private soldier would have to rely upon rifles and bayonets. It was Tommy Atkins himself who discovered that if he was in a hole here and Heinie was in a hole over there, he could take a jam tin, fill it with guncotton and a few rusty nails and get at his enemy. That is what was done in spite of the advice of the experts on the general staff. The history of the general staff has been that of retarding development. We have in the evidence of the Minister of National Defence clear proof of the incompetency of the present staff, upon whose advice we must rely. The minister should not seek to answer our questions by stating that that is the best advice possible.

I think the experience in the last war was such as to give us the right to suggest that the general staff in Canada is acting in rather too close cooperation with the British War Office. The general atmosphere of the Department of National Defence is such as to suggest that they rely almost entirely upon the advice of the experts of the British War Office. It is quite reasonable to suspect that similar conditions exist to-day as existed at the outbreak of the last war when it was found that commitments, of which the British government had no knowledge, had been made in the name of the British Empire.

The minister alleged that this group was inconsistent because the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) stated that he would participate in a war in defence of collective security. I should like to point out one phase of that question which has not been dealt with. Under a genuine system of collective security, national increases in armaments would not be necessary. The genuine assertion of a policy of collective security without increased armaments would mean an overwhelming superiority of pooled armaments which would make increased armaments individually unnecessary. It is the abandonment of the policy of collective security and the resorting to a policy of individual rearming which has led us on our present mad course. I think these points should be borne in mind. The minister in his estimates this afternoon dealt with the increase in personnel in the Royal Canadian Air Force. What proportion of that personnel will be stationed on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, and what proportion at inland points?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend refer to the non-permanent air force?

Mr. MacNEIL: To both.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At Vancouver there is at the present time No. 4 F.B. squadron and there is a fighters' squadron being sent out there from Trenton as soon as organized. So far as the non-permanent air force is concerned, there is No. 11 army cooperation squadron on the Pacific coast at the present time. In regard to the Atlantic coast, non-permanent air force, Montreal has got No. 15 fighter squadron and No. 18 bomber squadron. Quebec has one in process of organization. I think it is No. 21 bomber squadron. In the permanent force there is at Dartmouth, on the Atlantic coast, No. 5 F.B. squadron.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the proportion inland?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I had better give the personnel of the Royal Canadion Air Force as located: Total of all ranks at headquarters, 88; courses abroad, 11; Camp Borden, 205; Vancouver, 74; Trenton, 336; Ottawa, No. 1 depot, 91; Ottawa, R.C.A.F. station, 137; Winnipeg, 42; Dartmouth, 66; district headquarters, 9; permanent force detachments, 50; seconded, 5; total, 1,114 in the permanent air force. Now for the non-permanent: Toronto, No. 10 squadron, 115; Vancouver, No. 11, 109; Winnipeg, No. 12, 111; Montreal, No. 15 fighter squadron, 7; Montreal, No. 18, bomber squadron, 7; Hamilton, No. 19 bomber squadron, 121; Regina, No. 20 bomber squadron, 7; total, 477; grand total, 1,591. May I point out that those stationed at Calgary and those in the east at Trenton would be almost immediately available for coast defence purposes.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the number of qualified pilots among the commissioned officers and other ranks? I ask that question for the reason that the rumour is abroad that only too frequently the sergeant pilots are the real experts in the force and that they do not gain the promotion they deserve from the skill they have acquired in the force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My information is that all the general list officers are qualified but the actual number of sergeants and other ranks qualified to fly is not available.

Mr. MacNEIL: To what extent is the training completed under the auspices of the British aviation authorities. Are the pilots finally trained in England or here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Here, except that in rare cases the officers proceed to take courses of instruction in England with respect to specific aspects of the training problems of aviation.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister assures the committee that steps will be taken to restrict the making of profit in the purchase of equipment. To what extent is it intended to undertake the supervision of agencies established in Canada to assemble planes that are really manufactured abroad and merely assembled in this country—mere assembling agencies without assuming responsibility in regard to manufacture?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will be done so far as possible by the department, and in fact it is now being done. The most effective way would be this: Most of the purchases made in the old days were made through the air ministry, and a comparison of prices paid by the air ministry, plus the cost of transshipping the planes to Canada and other similar factors, would give us the principle of reasonable remuneration which has been adopted in England. That is the course which will be followed.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister yesterday gave the number of officers training in England for the permanent militia. Will he give similar figures for the air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are eleven altogether at the present time engaged in courses abroad.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In England?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Mr. Chairman, as I have not so far spoken on these estimates, I cannot be accused of taking up the time of the committee, nor am I going to speak very long tonight. So much has been said from different sides on this question that it is very conflicting, I think, to almost everyone of us. I should like to put the question from another angle for a few moments.

We are told that the world has gone mad. Surely it is time for us to restore a little sanity somewhere. I have been thinking along this line: We are voting this session for defence purposes around $35,000,000. Suppose Canada, for instance, said: As a government we shall try a new experiment in the world. We shall cut out absolutely all armaments, defence or otherwise; we shall use that money in the production of the necessities of life in this country, and then we shall distribute these necessities of life among those countries that need them most. If we have an enemy, we shall give them that which they need, and the keener the enemy the more goods we shall give them. I am just wondering what $34,000,000 or $35,000,000 would mean to Canada if it were used in the extra production of goods to be distributed among other nations. I am wondering what effect this would have on the nation which received these goods as a free gift. I hope the day is not far distant, when some nation,—and I hope it will be one of the leading nations—will have the courage to take such action.

I am thinking of a Teacher of a long while ago who laid down certain rules for the government of mankind, and I think the nation that first adopts the golden rule will be the foremost and most respected nation in the world. I say again, think of what that $34,000,000 would mean to Canada if it were used in our mines, in our manufactures, on our farms and so on. A little while ago we had a tremendous surplus of wheat. Would it not have been a fine gesture to have given that wheat to the country that needed it most? I repeat, it is said that the world is gone mad. Let us try to bring back a little sanity by applying the golden rule. That will solve problems both national and international.

Item agreed to.

Civil government air operations—for air survey photography and contingencies which may arise in other air operations, $361,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask if the work carried on by the aeroplanes under this item is duplicated by the aeroplanes of other departments, by the topographical surveys, for instance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; there is no duplication.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—
Salaries, $409,847.
Contingencies, $55,500.

Mr. POULIOT: On this item I will refer the committee to what was said yesterday afternoon and evening by the member for Témiscouata about red tape and other things in the department. On the other hand, I wish to pay a tribute to the deputy head, who is highly competent. I hope that, acting in cooperation with his minister, he will bring at least some order into his department, get rid of red tape, and put an end to the system of bureaucracy which has handicapped that department as badly as it has many others. The deputy minister has an admirable war record, and since his appointment as deputy head he has proved to be a very efficient executive. Very sincerely I pay that tribute to him. At the same time I ask the minister seriously to consider the matter of seconding, which is absurd. Several members have complained about the practice. It is all wrong. Civil servants can be seconded only from the Department of National Defence. The system leads to abuse. If a man is not needed any longer in the Department of National Defence, and his services are requested by the minister of another department, he should be transferred there and have nothing more to do with the department in which he formerly served. As matters are now, there are some who enjoy benefits which they do not deserve, because they do not belong any more to the Department of National Defence except to derive emoluments from it. It is time that this should be stopped. The minister nodded affirmatively when the matter was brought to his notice a moment ago. I hope he will deal with it this year, so that by the next session the practice will have ceased and it will not be necessary to call upon the house to put a stop to it.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister inform the committee as to the total amount that is being voted in the present estimates for the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, $34,999,871—practically $35,000,000. That is apart from the $2,000,000 odd, which will be included in the supplementary estimates for 1936-37, in connection with the purchase of two destroyers from England.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that include various items for public works construction which might properly be charged to the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: To make myself clear: the repeal of seconding must have retroactive effect.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 218, to provide for expenses connected with Canada's representation at the coronation of His Majesty, $35,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver North in connection with the last vote, I hope I made it clear that my reference was only to public works carried out in connection with the Department of National Defence, not, of course, general public works by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. MacNEIL: The reason I asked that question is that under the Department of Public Works there are a number of items of construction of armouries and repair and maintenance of naval dockyards.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is quite correct. Every year under public works there are a few items relating to certain works they carry out for the Department of National Defence, at Esquimalt and Halifax and other places, that will be revealed when the supplementary estimates come down. They are not under our control.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the preparation of the summary which we find in the last report of the department, are all these items of construction that are under the Department of Public Works finally included under the various heads in this summary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the total I gave? No.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the department's estimates each year are items which are strictly under the heading of the Department of National Defence; there are other items, in the Public Works department, relating to the construction of armouries and similar undertakings. If we desire to make a fair comparison and go back over the report of the department, do we find in the comparative summary, which in the last report is found on page 13, 1926-27 down to the present time, those public works items finally incorporated in the statement issued by the department?

Mr. BENNETT: No; in the auditor general's report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is my hon. friend speaking of the annual report of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that they are not included.

Mr. POULIOT: Item 218 is to provide for expenses connected with Canada's representation at the coronation of His Majesty. I am told it was called.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was called.

Mr. POULIOT: In this regard may I suggest to the minister that the Canadian representation at the coronation of His gracious Majesty should be led by a member of the House of Commons who is in active service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The vote is No. 249.

Miscellaneous—To provide for expenses of the contingent to attend the coronation of His Majesty, $197,000.

Mr. HEAPS: What vote are we discussing now, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: No. 249.

Mr. HEAPS: You called 218.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was passed last week.

Mr. POULIOT: It is the same matter. As it is the same matter, I hope the committee will kindly listen to the following suggestion. Canada has decided to send a representation to His Majesty's coronation. Very well. The vote is $197,000. I suggest to the minister that that delegation should be led by a member of the House of Commons who is in active service. He is a full colonel.

Mr. STREIGHT: Full, did you say?

Mr. POULIOT: I did not say honorary.

Mr. STREIGHT: Would the hon. member explain what he means by "full"?

Mr. POULIOT: By "full" I mean entirely qualified, a man who has seen real service, who, by the way, is just a colonel. I should be glad and everyone in the country would be delighted if the hon. member for York West (Mr. Streight), who participated in the South African war, and who had an admirable record during the last war, were asked to lead the delegation at the coronation of His Majesty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: There is no man who is better qualified than the hon. member to whom I have referred. He is actually in active service; the honour belongs to him, and the way that this committee has received my suggestion shows that it deserves consideration. Moreover, I warn the minister to be very careful and to show his respect to His Majesty by sending to the coronation men with a fine war record. This is a national defence vote, and referring to it I submit that those who go to represent Canada at the coronation should not be members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who might go again to Madison Square Garden, but should all be Canadians, men who have been in the army. If any one is to lead them, it should be the officer who is in active service in the House of Commons and who has won the many decorations which he wears on occasion.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister please give us a break-down of this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is to provide for the contingent which will be going across: the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $13,000; for the permanent and non-permanent active militia, $140,000; for the Royal Canadian Air Force, including non-permanent air squadrons, $26,000; for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $18,000. This makes a total of $197,000.

Mr. HEAPS: This is one item which should be reduced. We are spending a good deal of money at this time to send this contingent overseas to participate in the coronation festivities, and I suggest that if we spent about $100,000 less, Canada would be just as well represented and the rest could be spent among deserving people who will be compelled to stay in the dominion. With the vast number of unemployed in Canada it is not good policy on the part of the government to spend such huge sums of money to send a contingent overseas to take part in a series of festivities. I should be more satisfied if the government of their own volition would reduce the amount by half and spend the other half in Canada—they might even augment it considerably—for the benefit of those who will have very little to be happy about when these ceremonies are taking place. Could the minister not see his way to cut the amount by half? As I say, Canada would be just as well represented if half the number went over.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the last coronation the number who went over in the contingent was more than double the number that will be going on this occasion. If I remember rightly, the personnel was about 720. At that time, however, the expenditure was for as far as the port of disembarkation only. This time the entire expense is borne by the Canadian government.

It might interest hon. members if I read a statement showing the allotment of the non-permanent active militia personnel:

Military District	Officers	Other ranks	Total
No. 1	3	9	12
No. 2	7	18	25
No. 3	5	12	17
No. 4	9	23	32
No. 5	6	12	18
No. 6 (N.S.)	3	8	11
No. 6 (P.E.I.)	1	5	6
No. 7	3	7	10
No. 10	3	9	12
No. 11	4	9	13

No. 13	3	8	11
	50	130	180
Permanent force
All districts	5	20	25
Band	1	34	35
Total militia (Including nursing sisters.)	56	184	240

Mr. FAIR: How does the minister arrive at the figure he has given?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For the naval forces the amount is $13,000; for the militia forces, $140,000; for the Royal Canadian Air Force, including non-permanent squadrons, $26,000; for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $18,000. These are broken down into various items, including travelling and expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: Any salaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Pay and allowances during the time they will be away.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister give those items?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These are the details:

	$ 18,000 00
Grand total	$ 197,000 00

Winnipeg has been taken to arrive at an average for the whole of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: How much was spent at the last coronation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Speaking from memory, I believe it was about $135,000.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Will the officers and men who are going over, especially the officers, be paid a salary while on the trip or will they go gratuitously?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They will receive a subsistence allowance overseas.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Expenses, but no salary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The usual pay and allowances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one point the minister has not so far mentioned which ought to be recalled; it is that in arranging for the contingents which are to take part in the ceremonies, there has been conference between the different dominions, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada, and as far as it has been possible to do so, an arrangement has been worked out for representation in relation to the size of the dominions. I believe it is true, relatively speaking that other countries in the empire, having regard to size, are sending larger representations than Canada. What should be kept in mind is that so far as these coronation ceremonies are concerned the eyes of the world will be upon the different dominions represented there. There will be seen on the screen, in all the theatres in different parts of the empire, views of those who took part in the ceremonies. The whole coronation will be broadcast from one end of the world to the other. All that the government is seeking to do is to have Canada hold her place relatively with the other dominions in these proceedings.

Mr. POULIOT: May I offer a suggestion that would make for economy? I will not reduce the number of men. But the transportation overseas represents a large amount. I remember distinctly that at the time of the Gaspé tricentennial celebration the Prime Minister of Canada very wisely went down from Montreal to Gaspé on the Saguenay. We have two boats now, the Saguenay and the Vancouver. I wonder whether, for the last time that they are in service for the Dominion of Canada, it would not be proper to use those boats for something definite before we scrap them. They served once for the Prime Minister of Canada to go to Gaspé, we should use them to carry our delegation to the coronation. This would mean a saving of $60,000. I propose no amendment, but I make that suggestion to the minister. What was good enough for the then Prime Minister of Canada must be good enough for any member of the delegation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are obsolete ships, and we are not obsolete.

Mr. POULIOT: The Minister of Justice, I hope, will not lead a regiment there, although he is the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Would the minister be kind enough to tell the committee who led the Canadian representation to the coronation of His late Majesty King George V, and whether that officer was a member of the House of Commons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe the selection made at that time was the senior combatant acting officer of the House of Commons, Colonel Maclean.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suppose that in this matter, as in the other items of expenditure, the government have definitely made up their mind, and that this vote will be passed, but I must once more protest against this large expenditure for such a purpose. Canada in the past has not been a military nation. It seems we are now in danger of becoming militarized. There are these ceremonies connected with the coronation of the king. With what other nations of the empire may have done or may propose to do I am not very much concerned; I am thinking of Canada and what she should do. Evidently we are making the coronation very largely an occasion for military display. Evidently there is, even in this minor matter, an arrangement among the different dominions. I suppose it will exhibit the solidarity of the empire from a military standpoint; every nation outside the British commonwealth will interpret it in that way. I do not think that is a good impression to go abroad, if we propose to restrict our military activities to our own defence. If the coronation of the king is an event in which all the population of this country are supposed to take an interest, I do not know why those who go should be limited to members of parliament, public officials and particularly the military. The suggestion may be regarded as fantastic, but I made it the other night and I repeat it, that since the vast majority of the people of Canada who have built up this country are farmers, labour men, business men, there is no earthly reason why farmers and labour men and business men should not be sent to the coronation. But that is not being done. I can understand that they might feel very much out of place in the blaze of colour which no doubt the papers will report at the time of the coronation. But such people are the basis of our Canadian life, and I do not see why we should elevate one particular class in this country and give them a joy-ride while other people remain at home. Those who remain at home, the farmers moiling and toiling across the western plains, the labouring people, are going to pay the bills. There is no one else to pay them. If the minister proposed to insist that the very wealthy, and those easily able to pay, should bear the entire cost, one could not make quite as strong an objection, but the cost is distributed over the entire population, poor as well as rich. It is, however, only one class of the community which has any part in the celebrations. It is no wonder that great numbers of the people in this country begin to doubt whether the government as it now exists is in reality a government of the people, and whether they should take any particular interest in the coronation ceremonies.

I wish to point out, as my colleagues have done, that we have very needy cases in this dominion. Almost every post brings to my desk, as I am sure it does to many others, appeals for help, statements of the desperate conditions existing in Canada. I am thinking not merely of personal appeals for help, but of appeals on behalf of large groups of people. We have nearly a million people on relief; that is just one group, a very important one. It is all very well for the government to say: Oh, well, under the British North America Act we cannot do anything about it, or we can do only this much, we can give grants in aid. Simply to screw such unfortunate people down to bare existence, while other classes in the community are given every opportunity, is not right; it is not consonant with the principles of democracy. I protest against that kind of thing. We have the money in hand to do things like this, but we have not the money to help these needy people. We are told we should protect the mothers and the children, but we read daily of the pressing needs of mothers and children in every province of this country, lacking ordinary medical necessities, in many cases not supplied even with sufficient food, and yet we have these vast expenditures for purposes of ostentation. If we must have soldiers go abroad, cut this contingent in two and cut the expenses in two, and I am quite sure that the people of this dominion would feel a great deal happier, and Canada would have adopted a much wiser course, and just as patriotic a course as by passing these votes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is very hard to satisfy my hon. friend, and I am not surprised that he has seized this new opportunity of making some capital politically. But may I tell my hon. friend this: the king is going to be crowned in London, and for the first time as King of Canada. Instead of being crowned in Ottawa or Cape Town or Canberra or Sydney or Melbourne or any of the other capitals of the nations of the commonwealth, he is being crowned in London, and there he takes the oath to govern his people in Canada, his people in New Zealand, his people in Australia. If, instead of having the present arrangement, we had a king or a ruler who would be crowned in Canada I should like to know whether we could get away with $197,000. If, instead of having a monarchy, we had a republic, as some irresponsible people mention at times, do we think we could get away with $197,000? Does the hon. member believe there would be nobody dressed in military uniforms if, instead of being a nation in the British commonwealth of nations, participating in the coronation of our king in London, we had all that in Canada—whether through a king, a president or some other ruler?

I believe on the whole this is certainly not an extravagant amount for the coronation of our king, and the arrangement of the British commonwealth is the best which could be had, so far as Canada is concerned, when we consider it in terms of money. I believe the hon. member will be better advised not to raise all these questions just for the purpose—and he will forgive me for saying this—of criticizing. I have yet to see a proposal by this government which has been accepted by the hon. member. Surely some of our proposals must be deserving of approval and ought to be supported at times.

This afternoon the hon. member was very thin-skinned, and thought I was imputing motives to him. About five minutes before he had said that my right hon. leader was not sincere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, my hon. friend said that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no such statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hansard will show it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no such statement.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But I did not raise an objection.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no such statement, and there was nothing to object to.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I want my hon. friend to have all possible latitude, but he should be a little less sensitive when other members speak. On this vote I think he might very well let his criticism go.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not object to anyone criticizing me. What I did object to this afternoon was the statement that we were making statements which we knew were not true. I object to that kind of allegation. Let me say that this afternoon I took considerable time to say I was quite sure the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Defence were sincere in their belief that they were doing this merely for defence purposes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was said in a very queer way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said that, as Hansard will show. I said that I did not think that would be the result, and that the voting of moneys to purchase bombing planes, et cetera, which we were then discussing, in my judgment would inevitably lead us into war. I maintain that I have a perfect right to make that criticism. The Minister of Justice now says—and I suppose he has a right to say it, if he thinks it—that I have raised these questions for political ends.

An hon. MEMBER: He said no such thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is strange that if the proposals of the government are considered to be in harmony with the will of the majority of the people, I should object to them in order to gain political prestige. The votes show, so far as the committee is concerned, that those of us who have been objecting are not in the majority, and are not on the popular side. It would be easy for some of us to float with the current—very easy. We are trying to advocate something which undoubtedly is unpopular in Canada. But fifteen or sixteen years ago I was elected by a certain group of people who stood for certain principles. I represent that group. In a democracy I have a perfect right to express the convictions of that group, and I am trying to do so. That is what I am here for, and I have a perfect right to express my views. Simply because these views do not harmonize altogether with the ideas held by the ministers and the larger parties is no particular reason why my motives should be impugned, or why it should be said that I am trying to make political capital. This is a game of politics. I am trying to express the opinion of those who have sent me here, and of others who voted for this group at the last federal election, and I have a perfect right to do so.

Although I did not object at the time, I thought the Minister of Justice was hardly fair this afternoon when he closely associated our group with the communists. Surely that is not quite fair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I never said that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, we were told that the minister was not going to do anything at the dictation of the group in this corner, or the communist group in Toronto. I do not think that is fair. I believe the minister knows perfectly well that at the last election most of us were opposed by communists. Some of us were opposed to war before the communist party in Canada was organized. We do not see eye to eye with them in regard to many of these matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Will the hon. member permit me to speak? At the same time I said certain groups in my own province expressed the views held by the hon. member and the communist party in Toronto. I may assure him that those people in the province of Quebec were not communists. Apparently on this question there is a disunited front.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is all very well, then. All I wish to say is that I am a little weary—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —of having people in this house shout at one simply because he states a position, on which he was elected, and on which he has been elected at election after election throughout the years.

The minister has a perfect right to introduce the estimates, but we, as part of the opposition, have a perfect right to criticize them. I do not intend to go over the ground again, but I do protest—and that is all I can do—against these very large expenditures which are not directly related even to the defence of the country, as must be admitted. This afternoon dire necessity was pleaded; someone suggested that war might come before July. If anything like that were true, surely we would expect those advocating military defence would spend every cent of the money in the defence of this country, instead of on a ceremonial affair in London. That is the basis of my criticism of the estimate. I again protest against this elaborate expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to correct an erroneous impression left by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, when he referred to the soldiers being sent over. May I inform him that about eighty per cent of the amount spent is being spent on volunteer citizen soldiers in the militia forces of Canada. Many hon. members know those men, and every class he mentioned—the farmers, the labouring class, the business men, the fishermen, the miners—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But they go as soldiers, not as fishermen or miners.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; they go in both capacities. They are citizens of Canada, and volunteer soldiers. To soldiering they give only a small amount of their time, as a patriotic duty. I feel certain that labourers, farmers, miners, officials and every single section of the community throughout Canada will be represented in the contingent to be sent. I think the hon. member either wittingly or otherwise conveyed an erroneous impression when he stated it was a military contingent. These men are volunteer soldiers who are rendering a magnificent service to Canada. As a matter of fact, some of them are actually on relief at the present time in some of the cities. They are performing a magnificent work in the militia service of Canada. So far as possible, every section of the community as well as every province should be represented in the coronation contingent.

Mr. DUPUIS: How many will be going from the districts of Montreal and Quebec?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would be districts four and five. There will be nine officers and twenty-three other ranks from district No. 4, and six officers and twelve other ranks from district No. 5. Those will be from the non-permanent active militia. There will also be some from the permanent force, from the naval forces and possibly from the air force.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Has the minister any information as to the prices of covered and uncovered seats at the coronation and what procedure is necessary to obtain such seats?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The department has no official information, but we shall be very glad to communicate through the ordinary channels with the high commissioner's office and find out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that this week the press of the country will be given full particulars in connection with the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is to make the selection of the officers and men to go to the coronation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that question was fully answered some time ago in connection with a question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). Applications will be forwarded from unit commanders to the various districts and they will recommend to national defence headquarters at Ottawa.

Mr. POULIOT: I am fearful of what will happen because of the petty patronage that exists among certain officers. The minister should be very careful to keep his eyes open and watch this game in order that those who go shall be worthy. Otherwise some pims will be going there.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If I got the minister's figures correctly, they work out to one officer to three men; is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There will be seventy officers and 264 other ranks from all services including the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a total of 334.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is that not a large proportion of officers as compared with other ranks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the proportion is fair. In the air force the proportion is even larger because of certain conditions that exist, while in some of the other forces the proportion will be lower.

Mr. BENNETT: I followed the minister when he referred to the apportioning to the various military districts of the numbers to go. I should like him to make clear just how the selection of the personnel is to be made within the districts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In a letter which went forward to the district officers commanding in January, concerning militia personnel, certain basic principles were laid down which will have to be observed with reference to proper territorial and other representation. The first stipulation was to personal fitness and general appearance, although certain exceptions will be made in connection with men possessing war disabilities which might prevent them from carrying arms. It was recommended that one-third of the military contingent should be made up of those who had active service. It was stated that while this proportion might be increased, the younger officers and men were not to be overlooked. There was to be the proper proportion maintained among the different arms of the service. The circular letter was dated January 29, 1937, and signed by the adjutant general.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to know who makes the final selection. The district officers commanding will send in lists of names to the adjutant general, but I want to know by whom the ultimate selection will be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has not been determined as yet, but I think it will be made by a committee of the defence council.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the district officers commanding send in only the exact number of names allotted to their districts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They will send in three times the number.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the ultimate selection will be made in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The initiation of the lists will be in the hands of the regimental commanders and district officers commanding, but the ultimate selection will be made at national defence headquarters.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Has the entire quota been filled? Have there been any selections from Saskatchewan?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The district officers commanding have been asked to have the names in by March 3.

Item agreed to.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Pensions payable to men on active service, northwest rebellion 1885, and general pensions, $20,000.

Mr. GREEN: The estimates of the pensions department have been up only on one other occasion this session, about five weeks ago. At that time I asked the minister to let four items stand in order that we might have an opportunity of seeing any report or reports which might be made by the veterans' assistance commission. I have no desire to hold up the estimates of the minister, but I should like him to hold over certain items, say item 198, dealing with war veterans' allowances and item 193, dealing with unemployment assistance, in order that we may discuss any questions that might arise out of these reports.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I would be prepared to hold over item 193, dealing with unemployment assistance, in order that any discussion on these matters might take place.

Mr. GREEN: I think it should be pointed out that up to date we have received only one interim report from this veterans' assistance commission. That report deals largely with the organization of the commission, and with the instructions that they sent out. It is really a very minor report. I believe that the delay in bringing down a more complete report from that commission is doing great harm because soldier organizations, right across Canada, expected great things of this veterans' assistance commission; the veterans themselves expected great things of the commission; and the special committee of this house which sat last year to deal with pensions and returned soldier problems also expected great things of this commission. All these bodies expected that the government would act on the report of this commission, and act during this session, not during the session of 1938. But now the position is this, that if these reports are not brought down very soon, it will be too late for the government to pass legislation this session, and there will be nothing done until 1938. That can be seen plainly by all interested parties, and I am afraid that the result will be grave dissatisfaction among veterans right across Canada.

Last year the soldier organizations who were represented before the pension committee, and the committee itself and the house all recognized that the principal soldier problem was the problem of the unemployed war veteran. This house passed the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act, which provided for setting up a veterans' assistance commission, and we also voted $500,000 with which they could do their work. The duties of this commission I think may be fairly summarized by saying they were to investigate the extent of unemployment among veterans, to classify the unemployed veterans, for example, as to whether they were employable or unemployable, and to ascertain their ages and occupations. The commission were also to try to find schemes for the employment of these unemployed veterans who are employable, and were supposed also to report on ways of caring for the unemployable veterans.

The organization of the commission took place in July of last year, and they have held public hearings across Canada, a great deal of interest being taken in the hearings in all centres, so that there are many thousands of people throughout the country waiting and watching for results from the commission. The commission have seen many industrialists and other employers of labour and have had questionnaires returned from 33,000 unemployed veterans. My suggestion is that by this time the commission should have had figures available for consideration by this house, and yet, as I have said before, we have only one interim report outlining the organization of the commission and referring to two schemes which were recommended by one of the honorary local committees.

The Veterans' Assistance Commission Act provided for these honourary local committees, and according to this interim report they have been set up in ten cities. The report shows that 170 men have been appointed as members of these local committees, and these men are among the leading men in the different cities. I know that in Vancouver the minister has been able to get some of the best men in the city to act on the honorary local committee. These committees have held meetings and no doubt have made recommendations. They are really exploring a new field, trying to help get jobs for the unemployed veterans. They deserve great credit for that and should be given all possible assistance, but I have had this experience with the committee in Vancouver; they have asked me: "Suppose we do work out some scheme; how do we know that the government is not going to sidetrack it, like governments do? Are we not wasting our time in doing this work?" Now the last thing I want to see happen is for the government to give any justification for these committees to think that such is the case. If these local committees go out of business, if they lose interest, it will be fatal to the success of the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act and the whole plan will fail.

I suggest that the government should at once get from this veterans' assistance commission, and table in the house so that we can all study them, reports showing the extent of unemployment among the veterans, the classification of the unemployed, the schemes for employment that have been worked out by this commission, and what ways they have to suggest for caring for the veterans who are actually unemployable.

The minister said the other night that there were 33,000 unemployed veterans in Canada who had filled in and returned the questionnaire sent out by the commission. I think it would be a fair estimate that many thousands of these, perhaps 15,000, are unemployable. I suggest that the government should face this problem of the unemployable veterans right now; waiting will only make the problem worse. The commission can do nothing for them because they are unemployable; no improvement in business conditions can help them because they are unemployable.

Are they simply to be kept on relief for another year? The government might as well decide now what they propose to do about this problem. If they do not, I am afraid that the unemployed veterans will lose confidence in the veterans' assistance commission and also in the government, because all their hopes are based upon action being taken by this commission and by the government during this year, not next year.

The special committee of this house which sat last year realized that early reports from the commission were absolutely necessary, and the minister will remember that we included in our report this recommendation:

> To ensure that the progress of the commission's activities, both in connection with its surveys and application of approved projects, be made known to the government, your committee would also recommend that the commission be required to submit from time to time interim reports on matters arising out of the act.

In pursuance of that recommendation there was placed in the act at the beginning of section 12:

> The minister may from time to time require the commission to submit a report on the progress of projects and other matters arising out of this act.

We were very keen that the commission should report as early as possible, because we realized that little could be done to deal with the problem of the unemployed soldier until we got a report from the commission. Some of us complained last year because there would have to be the delay of one year in getting action. This year we have come to Ottawa expecting to proceed on the basis of reports from this commission; all action was to be based on their suggestions. All the war veteran members of the house, regardless of party, are ready to help the government work out some reasonable solution for this problem. The question is above partisan politics. We are only too glad to help the minister and we realize that the problem is difficult, but in order to help him and to get on with this work we simply must have reports from this commission, and we must have them quickly; otherwise no help can be given to the unemployed veteran during the present session. I suggest to the minister that he put all possible pressure on the commission, that he get as many reports as possible and have them tabled as quickly as possible, so that we can do something during this session to help these men. He will find hon. members on this side only too glad to cooperate with him in facing the problem.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. POWER: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I should like to point out that any discussion of reports or interim reports of the veterans' assistance commission would hardly be in order on the item we are now discussing, which deals with pensions for the northwest rebellion.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that.

Mr. POWER: Now that my hon. friend has had an opportunity of laying his views before the committee, I think we should confine ourselves to this item; but if the committee wishes me to do so, I shall have no objection to discussing now this particular phase of the matter. In any event, however, we shall have to revert to it, I assume, when the item of the veterans' assistance commission is reached.

Mr. GREEN: I brought forward the matter for this reason, that it really is the essential point in the pensions estimates during the present session, and if we can be satisfied that that is recognized there is no reason why we cannot get ahead rapidly. I think the minister will agree with me that this is the main thing to be dealt with in regard to pensions this session.

Mr. POWER: I do not want to accuse my hon. friend of blocking the estimates until we come to the section which interests him. Neither on the other hand do I feel that I should be doing my duty to hon. members who may want to discuss other items if we do not take them in a fairly orderly way. After all, the estimates of the whole department are before the committee. I know my hon. friend does not wish to block the returned soldier pension vote of $41,000,000; I am sure he has no idea of doing that.

Mr. GREEN: I do not want to block any votes. I merely point out the urgency of this question.

Mr. POWER: I am quite willing to discuss that with the hon. member upon the appropriate item of the estimates, and I shall call it at any time he likes and shall be pleased to meet him in any way he wants. But surely when I have called an item—and it is in the discretion of the minister to call any item he pleases—that has no connection whatever with the matter he has brought up, if he does not wish to discuss it, let him allow it to pass; if he wishes to discuss it, let him do so. He has asked me to hold back the item on unemployment assistance and I have agreed to do so, in order to permit him to discuss the very item which is now brought up.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the item?

Mr. POWER: The northwest rebellion pensions.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): I would request that we hold over, if possible, items 193, 198 and 200, in order to give us a chance to prepare our questions.

Mr. POWER: Quite frankly, I do not expect to pass many more items this evening. As a matter of fact, I had intended to go on with matters dealing with pensions rather than the health section of the department. As regards item 200, war pensions, $41,500,000, I do not think there would be any great objection to passing it unless the hon. member has some specific matter to bring up. As a rule it is not discussed very much, apart from the necessary explanations. On the last occasion I gave explanations for over an hour.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): The only reason I mentioned this is that if we stick to the subject matter we shall all be prepared to discuss the subject, but if we allow other matters to be brought in under item 199 we may not be prepared to deal with them.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member, then, asks me to hold over items 193, 198 and 200.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid I started this question of holding over items. I am quite satisfied with the minister's assurance, given earlier in the discussion, that he would hold open one item and would allow us to discuss on that item any other one. All I ask is that we get reports from the veteran's assistance commission just as quickly as possible. If that is done, I shall have no objection whatever.

Mr. POWER: Well, I suppose I shall have to be out of order myself for a moment and we shall talk about the report. I am now ready to table—as a matter of fact I did communicate to the hon. member certain reports which I had—(1) order in council appointing members of the veterans' assistance commission; (2) order in council substituting Mr. MacNicol for Brigadier-General Ross as a member of the commission; (3) interim report re employment of ex-service men in the maritimes, dated, November 3, 1935; (4) interim report re corps of commissionaires dated November 3, 1936; (5) interim report re preservation of forests in the maritimes, dated, December 10, 1936; (6) interim report re the establishment of a community centre, dated December 17, 1936; (7) second interim report re corps of commissionaires, dated December 18, 1936; (8) second interim report re employment of ex-service men in the maritimes, dated January 20, 1937; (9) preliminary report of the activities of the veterans' assistance commission, dated January 21, 1937; (10) copy of letter addressed by the minister to each member of each honorary local committee; (11) order in council re a corps of commissionaires; (12) order in council re the establishment of a community centre. I have received another interim report from the commission but am not prepared to table it at the present moment because I am asking the commission to clarify it and give me further details regarding it. I will undertake this, however, for the sake of my hon. friend and any others who are interested, that this report will be tabled in ample time for discussion in the house before parliament prorogues.

Mr. GREEN: Of course, it is not so much discussion in the house we want; it is action in the house we want, and if the discussion is held only a week before parliament prorogues, this will not help the unemployed veteran body. The report should be tabled in time for us to take some action. The minister realizes that that is the position.

Mr. POWER: But even this minister must give this matter some consideration before he takes action, because it may develop into a very, very important problem, and I think I should be given time to consider a report so far-reaching in its consequences as that will be, and to ask for details and particulars and clarification of the report before I lay it on the table of the house and make it public.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister give us the assurance that he will bring in that report in time for the government to bring down legislation at this session?

Mr. POWER: If the government decides that it should bring in legislation dealing with that report it will find the time; it will make the time.

Mr. GREEN: Another point: in the meantime would it be possible to have a report showing how many of these unemployed veterans there are, and the different classifications? I believe that information is almost ready, and it would help us a great deal if we could get it to go on with. We shall then know how big the problem is that we have to deal with.

Mr. POWER: I have had, though not in the shape of a report, certain information dealing with the classification of ex-soldiers who have replied to the questionnaires, but that report is not complete, and in the form in which I have it before me I do not think it would give information which would be of value to any member of the house. It has not given me any information of any value, and I am asking the commission to come to certain conclusions or to indicate just what they think we should do with these figures. Suppose they give me a figure showing that, of the 31,000 who registered and replied to questionnaires, some eight or ten thousand are already pensioners, some six thousand are men who have the war veterans' allowance, some seven thousand are men under forty years of age, and so on and so forth—these figures are not accurate, because I have not this document before me—these figures will not lead us to any conclusion unless further details are given. It was only last week that I received this mass of figures with details of that kind, and I am asking for further clarification of the report.

Mr. GREEN: The veterans' assistance commission have now been working for several months. Would it not be possible for them to prepare, say by next week, figures that will be of some use to us?

Mr. POWER: I cannot give any undertaking.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has power under the act to require reports from the commission.

Mr. POWER: And that is what I am doing.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid the commission will lose the confidence of the veteran body in Canada if they do not do something quickly.

Mr. MacNEIL: Through the courtesy of the minister I have had an opportunity of perusing the material which is about to be tabled and I think he will agree with me that it does not constitute the report for which we have been waiting expectantly. It is true that this material does present a record of valuable accomplishments in the establishment of local advisory committees and in assistance which is contemplated—

Mr. POWER: Assistance which has been given. The community centre has been established.

Mr. MacNICOL: Which item are we discussing?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 199.

Mr. MacNEIL: As the hon. member for Vancouver South has pointed out, you cannot separate the various sections of the returned soldiers' problems. These various pensions are related one to another.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The rebellion was in 1885; what has that to do with veterans of the last war?

Mr. HEAPS: How long have these pensions been going on? How many people have been receiving pensions?

Mr. POWER: There are now 49 pensioners altogether, 43 disability and 6 dependent.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the item in previous years?

Mr. POWER: In 1933-34 it was $26,000, of which $20,495.17 was spent; in 1934-35 it was $22,000, of which $20,183.76 was spent; in 1935-36 it was $21,000 and exactly $21,000 was spent; in 1936-37, prior to November 30, 1936, it was $20,000, and we have expended $14,270.73.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pensions or salaries?

Mr. POWER: These are all pensions payable to militiamen who were on active service in the rebellion.

Item agreed to.

European war pensions, naval, militia, and air forces after the war, $41,500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to pass one comment on this item in connection with a case which apparently is outside the departmental regulations. A soldier named Thomas Cruden was gassed in the war. He is a Scotchman and was very diffident about making application, and finally he had to be sent to California by a fraternal organization to which he belonged. It seems that being in a hospital in California he cannot receive consideration from the department. I am not finding fault with the department, because I have found in the last year or two that a great number of cases I have been interested in have been taken care of, and I am convinced that there has been a great improvement in the way in which returned soldiers have been treated. I have no fault to find with what has been done in Canada; on the contrary I have a great deal of commendation and praise for the way in which the department is now looking after the returned men. This man, Thomas Cruden, is in a hospital in the United States, having been sent there by the fraternal organization to which he belongs, and because he is outside Canada it seems that he has no claim on the department. Is there any regulation under which he can come?

Mr. POWER: If the gentleman has any claim for pension he can submit his claim from outside Canada as well as from within.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will he be accorded his pension while in a hospital in the United States?

Mr. POWER: He could get his pension wherever he happened to be unless we were paying for him, and then we would deduct a certain amount. He would probably get the pension awarded him by the pension commission here. If he were in one of our own hospitals his pension would be taken away during the time he was in hospital if he went on pay and allowances, which would amount to much more in most cases.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was ordered to California by his doctors and was sent there by this fraternal organization. I shall again report the case to the department and I feel confident that if anything can be done it will be done.

Mr. MacNEIL: It was expected that the war veterans' commission would deal with those in receipt of small pensions, and I was endeavouring to point out to the minister that if we could gather some more accurate information as to his intentions with regard to the general problem, as far as he is able to divulge it, it would be of great assistance to us in the consideration of these estimates. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South, I would remind the minister that it was recommended by a special committee last session that one of the first duties of the veterans' assistance commission would be to make a survey and submit suitable recommendations in regard to those veterans who at that time, it was urged, should receive the benefits of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. A formula was devised and those capable of maintaining themselves were put into one category. A classification was established for those between the ages of fifty-five and sixty, but it was not possible at that time to secure the approval of parliament for any lowering of the age limit. It was felt, however, that there was a large category that might not be covered by amendments to the act, and that their interests should be safeguarded by early recommendations from the veterans' assistance commission. Through the courtesy of the minister I have been given an opportunity of perusing this material and I approve everything done. But that does not bring us to the core of the problem and I submit that we have a right to expect from the veterans' assistance commission at an early date some interim report which would review the evidence given before the commission at its various sittings, give us some outline of the picture, the general distress existing among ex-service men, and recommend to the minister, and through him to parliament, some emergent remedial legislation.

I can sympathize with the minister in his statement that it is impossible to bring in a comprehensive plan with respect to a problem so complex and therefore I shall not harass him or press him. As stated by the hon. member for Vancouver South, however, the organized veterans, and the veterans generally throughout Canada patiently accepted the assurances given the house last session that after a proper inquiry was made and projects were formulated they would then receive the benefits they have a right to expect, particularly in the case of the unemployed. We are in danger of moving rapidly towards the close of the present session and the minister has not been able yet to suggest any adequate appropriation for men in this category. We would appreciate some assurance from him at an early date that such interim report may be had—not the material placed on the table this evening but an interim report which would to a degree at least meet the distress of which we find evidence on every hand, and, may I suggest, to relieve which he has more or less promised that some measures would be taken. I hope he will agree with the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South that the two votes be held over until we have an opportunity of reviewing the findings of the veterans' assistance commission.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend has for the past week or more been so busily and vociferously and actively engaged in the arts of peace that I could reasonably expect he would soon be following his natural bent and engaging in the arts of war, but I am sorry that I should be the victim of his aggression without even having the right to declare my neutrality.

Mr. HEAPS: No defence.

Mr. POWER: No defence whatsoever. But I may repeat what I said to the hon. member for Vancouver South, that an interim report was submitted to me some time ago. The matters contained therein are of such great importance that I thought it necessary to refer the report back to the committee for further details and clarification. When I have received a reply from the commission I shall be only too glad to table the report, and if at that time the government decide that action should be taken upon it I can assure my hon. friends that time will be found, or made, to permit of legislation being brought down. I cannot give any other assurance than that; I think that is fair enough in all conscience.

Mr. MacNEIL: As the report touches so closely the question of war veterans' allowances, will the minister consent to hold over the items?

Mr. POWER: I am willing to consent to hold up any item and undertake that we shall discuss the whole realm of ex-soldiers' problems on that item. But one hon. member wants item 199 held over; another wants another item held over. Unless we can come to some agreement as to which item shall stand, I might as well throw up my hands and not attempt to pass any estimates for some days. In view of the fact that the matter under discussion is the veterans' assistance commission, I think item 193, unemployment assistance, would be the appropriate item to hold over.

Mr. BENNETT: That is fair.

Mr. LENNARD: Can the minister tell me how many veterans between fifty-five and sixty are receiving the burnt-out pension?

Mr. POWER: That again is war veterans' allowances. That comes under the legislation passed last session. Applications could come in only some time in July or August, and I think in the neighbourhood of six or seven hundred have been accepted so far. I shall be glad to furnish my hon. friend with full and specific details of that when we come to the appropriate item.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister kindly tell me what is the yearly contribution of General McNaughton to the pension fund since he has been seconded from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. POWER: I have not the least idea, nor do I know how I could find that out, because no contributions are made to the Canadian pension commissioners. My hon. friend knows, I think, that the Militia Pension Act of 1901 is administered by the Canadian pension commissioners only to the extent that they pay out the amounts of money which are indicated to them by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister, and I ask him who will give me the information.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that the Department of National Defence could do it. I am sure I cannot.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I shall put a question on the order paper which will be answered by the Secretary of State.

Mr. POWER: By the Department of Finance in all probability.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. GREEN: Last year quite extensive amendments were made to the Pension Act. Would the minister tell the committee how they have worked out. I have had no complaints about them; they seem to be working well.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend has had no complaints, doubtless they worked out well. I have before me a report from the chairman of the pension committee. It is lengthy; I do not think I need read it all.

An hon. MEMBER: Table it.

Mr. POWER: I could table it—no, it is more or less confidential. But I could give the high lights of it. The increased liability due to the addition of the widows who became entitled to pension—my hon. friend will remember that in certain circumstances widows not previously entitled to pension became eligible—amounted to $36,792. The reinstatement of additional allowances for housekeepers involved an increase of $24,388. The correction of marriage status involved an increase of $4,578; the increase due to pensions paid in respect of self-inflicted wounds was $5,388; perpetuation of errors in previous awards, $8,811. These actions in themselves show an increase in the annual liability of $79,957, which exceeds by $35,842 the total increase in annual liability. This latter figure may be taken as indicating what would have been the normal decrease had it not been for the enactment of the amendments of 1936. The fact that these sources of irritation and dissatisfaction have been removed at such moderate expense is a gratifying comment on the soundness of the action taken by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: When the minister next comes with his estimates before the committee, I should be greatly obliged if he could be in a position to indicate something as to the amount of the patriotic fund at the end of the South African war. Under the statutes passed last session the South African veterans who were burnt out are not eligible for any benefits. They used to receive benefits from the patriotic fund, but it will be recalled that that fund was exhausted in dealing with the soldiers of the great war. The number of South African veterans left is small. If the government contemplate legislation, I think something should be done in that regard. It will be recalled that we did not pay them; they were paid by the British government. Inasmuch as we assumed no financial responsibility with respect to them while in South Africa, and those who returned are now few in number—because I think the average would be between sixty and seventy—and are in pretty bad shape, unable to work, not receiving the benefits now that they did get from the patriotic fund, and not eligible for pension under existing legislation, I trust the government will not overlook the claims of these unfortunate men, who are most deserving from the standpoint of their present status.

Sir EUGENE FISET: When the committee was sitting last year, I made myself the advocate of the South African veterans, and I am only too happy to endorse what the leader of the opposition has said. These men are very few in number. Last year it was provided that they would be admitted to hospital free, but unfortunately their pension was paid by the British government, and the only thing to do is to supplement the pension which they are now receiving, or at least give them some grant under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I hope it will be done.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Would a person who has served in the naval, military or air forces here in Canada but who did not go overseas be entitled to any of these Canadian pensions.

Mr. POWER: The air force was enlisted by the imperial government, so they would not be entitled to Canadian pensions. But any other man who enlisted in the Canadian forces was entitled to obtain a pension if he could prove that his disability was incurred in or was due to service.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Who did not go overseas?

Mr. POWER: I must say the deadline for further applications for pension was set at July 1, 1936, for those who served only in Canada. So they are debarred by statute from making application now, although they had approximately twenty years to do so.

Mr. BROOKS: In connection with the amendment regarding the deadline, may I say that practically the only complaint I had last year in connection with pensions was that many of these men did not know that the deadline expired on July 1. What effort was made by the department to notify the different returned men's organizations that the deadline for soldiers who had not served overseas had been set?

Mr. POWER: The legislation was introduced about March 1, and was finally passed about the beginning of June, last year. In that period the question was debated and, as the hon. member knows, was discussed before a parliamentary committee. Returned soldiers' organizations were immediately made aware of the fact that there was to be a deadline for certain cases in Canada. I was out at the Canadian Legion convention in Vancouver, and announced it there. I know that, generally speaking, the ex-soldiers' associations were quite familiar with the legislation proposed. I do not think there was much objection to it, from their standpoint. I shall have the figures available at a later time, but offhand I would say that about six cases have been turned down as being statute barred since then—not more than that.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not see how they could be notified during the convention at Vancouver, because the amendment had not then been passed.

Mr. POWER: That it was the intention of the government to introduce such legislation.

Mr. BROOKS: That it was the intention?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: What effort was made, after the amendment was passed? There were quite a number of complaints, and I believe the persons complaining thought they did not receive sufficient notice.

Mr. POWER: I think the deadline was set at July 1, 1936. The legislation was passed in June. I doubt whether it would have been possible, during that short period of time, to advise all ex-soldiers in Canada as to their rights under the legislation. But certainly all ex-solders' associations were fully aware of it.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to prolong the debate, but the minister must bear in mind that all returned men do not belong to veterans' organizations.

Mr. POWER: I quite agree.

Mr. BROOKS: There were men who came to me and said they had absolutely no notice of the intention of the government to set a deadline at July 1.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice there is a reduction in the estimate of about $150,000 as compared with last year. I wonder whether this means that we have reached the peak in our pension expenditures, or whether it is just an estimate of the amount that has to be paid. If it is just an estimate, perhaps the minister could give us the amount actually expended last year on pensions.

Mr. POWER: On a former occasion I discussed the matter at some length and said that it was more or less of an estimate. I did say, however, that I thought that at the time pensions had at least been stabilized, and that they would not rise higher, unless there was some change in the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Except for the war veterans' allowances.

Mr. POWER: Yes. That is another matter altogether, which will rise to $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 in a few years. I have no objection to giving the expenditures. In 1932-33 pensions were about $43,000,000; in 1933-34, $41,800,000; in 1934-35, $41,900,000; in 1935-36 $41,521,000, and in 1936-37, prior to November 30, they stand at $27,653,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Why is there such a large sum in the estimates?

Mr. POWER: Because we expect to spend approximately $41,500,000. We expended $41,521,000 in 1935-36, and expect to spend just about that much this year.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Do I understand the cut-down on the deadline was for soldiers who did not leave Canada?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I have in mind some men in my constituency who would be in this class: They served overseas, and I should like to have an answer to give them. They were gassed, and although they have no marks on them by way of wounds, as a result of the gas they have recently been unable to follow their occupations.

Mr. POWER: There is no deadline for them, if they served overseas. That provision applies only to those who served in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): I have received several letters from war veterans in western Canada, and especially from ex-prisoners of war, who complain that they are unable to obtain remuneration from the pensions department. They contend there are a great many pensioners employed at large salaries, and they feel that if there were a deadline whereby, after a man received say $2,000 per year, his pension would be discontinued, they would have a better opportunity of presenting their case and receiving a certain amount of money from the vote. Is it a fact that there is no limitation on the amount of salary a pensioner may receive?

Mr. POWER: Pension has nothing to do with the salary a man receives either from the government or from a private concern. It has always been held as a principle, from the very first pension committee, that the awarding of a pension to any ex-soldier should not debar him from any employment whatsoever. I do not know how the constituents of the hon. member in western Canada would be assisted in any way in establishing their claim for pensions if we were to take away from someone who already has a pension his right to earn a living or to earn a salary commensurate with his ability and capacity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is a question I should like to ask, but I see it is eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, to wit:

Of Matthew McKay, member for the electoral district of Renfrew North, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral district.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 24, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-GERMANY AND CANADA-RUSSIA—DOCUMENTS TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked yesterday if the trade agreements between Canada and Germany and between Canada and Russia would be laid on the table before the debate on the budget to-morrow. I should like to say that the government feels it is desirable if hon. gentlemen opposite are agreeable, to defer discussion of the agreement with Germany until the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), who negotiated it, is in the house. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) desires me to say that the delay should not present any practical difficulties since the agreement does not involve changes in any tariff items requiring consideration of the committee of ways and means. The arrangements with the Soviet union require no further action, and I am therefore tabling now an exchange of telegrams made public in a statement to the press on September 12, 1936; a statement issued by the "Tass" official Russian news agency and made public on September 14, 1936; together with order in council P.C. 2354, of September 10, 1936, removing the embargo on certain Russian products.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask whether the Russian documents are voluminous?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. CAHAN: Could they be published in the votes and proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no objection to that. They have already appeared in the press.

Mr. CAHAN: It is very difficult to keep copies of what appears in the press.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall ask that they appear in the votes and proceedings to-morrow.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*WATER CONSERVATION COMMISSION

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What was the personnel of the water conservation commission?
2. What amounts were paid to each: (a) as salaries; (b) as living and travelling expenses?
3. What was the total amount of money spent on, for, or by this commission since its appointment?
4. What was the date of its appointment?
5. Has this commission filed a report with the government?
6. Is such a report obtainable, and, if so, where?

Mr. RINFRET: I am informed that there exists no commission bearing that name.

*CORONATION DAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is Wednesday, May 12, coronation day, to be a public holiday in addition to May 24?
2. Will banks and financial institutions, places of business, industry and stores, and government offices be closed, and will a proclamation be issued to this effect?
3. Is the government putting on a special coronation celebration? If so, where, and what is it to consist of?
4. Will any coronation medals be awarded in Canada, and to whom?

Mr. RINFRET: This information will be given to the house from time to time.

LETITE, N.B., LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Did a vacancy occur in the position of lighthouse keeper at Letite lighthouse, Charlotte county, New Brunswick, in the year 1936?
2. If so, was a competition held under the Civil Service Act to fill the position?
3. How many candidates took the examination, showing those who were successful and the order in which they were placed by the Civil Service Commission?
4. Were any of the successful candidates returned men, and, if so, did a returned man receive the permanent appointment?
5. If not, why?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Five—Prescott H. Dines, Thomas M. French, Russell B. Matthews, Frank K. Spinney, John M. Tucker.

Two candidates were successful. Mr. Prescott H. Dines secured a rating of 92·4 and Mr. Russell B. Matthews a rating of 81·4.

4. Permanent appointment not yet made. Dines, the highest rated candidate, volunteered for active service but was rejected, as he was under military age. He has served for twenty years as assistant lightkeeper and is, therefore, qualified by training and experience to succeed to the vacancy in accordance with the recognized principle of promotion. In such cases absolute adherence to the returned soldier preference may not accord with the best interests of public service. The matter is still under consideration.

5. Answered by No. 4.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STOCK ISSUES

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

1. What amount of stock of the Canadian National Railways and subsidiary companies is held by: (a) the public; (b) financial companies; (c) in Canada; and (d) outside of Canada?
2. What is the annual interest rate of the different issues, and total annual payments?

Mr. HOWE:

1. As set forth on pages 31 and 32 of the printed report of the Canadian National Railways for 1935, the capital stocks of railways comprising the Canadian National system amount to $464,755,279.03, of which amount $4,584,225 is owned by the public and the remainder by the government either directly or beneficially.

The amount owned by the public represents minority shares of certain subsidiary companies which shares were not acquired when control of such companies was obtained many years ago by the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk companies. No dividends are at present being earned on any of the share capital.

2. With regard to debenture stocks and bonds (the funded debt of the system) full particulars, as at December 31, 1935, are shown on pages 27 and 28 of the 1935 annual report of the railway. That statement indicates the issuing company, the date of the issue, the date of maturity, the principal outstanding, and the annual interest accrual; also the issues guaranteed by dominion and provincial governments.

It is impossible to say where and by whom these securities are held, as the greater part are in bearer form and the railway company has no record of the holders.

FARMING POPULATION—INCOME TAX

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many residents in Canada are engaged in farming at the present time?
2. How many farm owners are there in Canada at the present time?
3. How much revenue did the government receive on account of income tax paid by farmers for the year 1935?
4. How many farmers paid income tax for the year 1935?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. On June 1, 1931, 1,128,154 residents of Canada were employed in agriculture.
2. On June 1, 1931, 583,706 farmers owned their farms and 67,942 farmers owned part and rented part of their farms.
3. Fiscal year 1935-36, $46,609.35.
4. Fiscal year 1935-36, 694.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

INDIAN RESERVES SURRENDERED

Mr. NEEDHAM:

1. Have any Indian bands surrendered their reserves?
2. If so, how many and for what cause?
3. What benefit, if any, accrued to each Indian band as a result of such surrender?
4. Can an Indian band surrender part of a reserve without surrendering the whole?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. In each of the fiscal years ending 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, were loans made by the dominion government to any provincial government for helping said provincial government with its relief problems?
2. If so, what amounts to each, year by year, were lent?
3. Was interest payable on such loans by such provinces?
4. If so, what amount of interest was payable by each province, year by year, for money so advanced?
5. Have all provinces paid such interest on such loans? If not, what provinces have paid and what amount each year?
6. What amounts are owing by any province for such moneys advanced to them: (a) for principal; (b) for interest?

[Mr. Howe.]

MOTION FOR PAPERS

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT EMPLOYEES—ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. MacKINNON (for Mr. Gariepy):

For a return showing:

A list containing the names, occupations and domiciles of the individuals employed by the Department of Transport during 1936 on the St. Lawrence river, for navigation purposes or works of different kind or nature.

Mr. HOWE: This is another omnibus question that entails an almost impossible amount of work. It involves going back over the files for many years. I think the motion should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

NATIONAL SCHOLARSHIPS

PROVISION FOR ACADEMIC AND TECHNICAL TRAINING OF OUTSTANDING STUDENTS FINANCIALLY UNABLE TO CONTINUE THEIR EDUCATION

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East) moved:

Whereas the important industrial nations of the world are spending large sums annually in scholarship systems, to ensure that the most brilliant of their boys and girls may not be prevented because of a lack of financial resources, from securing adequate academic training to enable them to take their proper place as thoroughly trained leaders in the industrial, professional and public life of their respective countries;

And whereas in this age of scientific advance in all walks of life Canada cannot afford to longer ignore and lose the tremendous asset which it possesses in the latent ability for trained leadership of the brightest of her young people;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, following the practice already established in Great Britain and other industrial countries, the government should investigate the desirability of a system of national scholarships to be made available to outstanding students who are financially unable to continue their education, to enable them to secure undergraduate and (or) post-graduate training in our universities, university colleges, agricultural colleges and technical schools.

He said: Mr. Speaker, no one is more persuaded of the limitations of this resolution and of some of the technical difficulties involved than I am. I feel, however, that in asking the government to investigate the desirability of setting up a system of national scholarships I am not being inconsistent in leaving details, which for the moment cannot be decided in general discussion, to the body which, I trust, will be set up for the purpose of considering the principle behind the proposal.

May I say, even though it be at the expense of laying myself open to the charge of boyish frankness, that one satisfaction I have in bringing this resolution before the house is that it is the realization of an ambition which began at a time when a scholarship would have been of very great assistance. If for no other purpose than to confirm the judgment of those who gave assistance to me, I sincerely trust that in the proposal I am making there will be some compensation to these individuals.

I do not propose to spend much time in drawing attention to the obvious plight of men and women of my generation, and of the young people of generations following mine, in Canada. That must be taken as self-evident. But it is important to note that the young people of this country, as of most countries to-day, are actuated by a fear of dislocation of their own possibilities because of economic conditions for which they are not responsible. Many young men and women with special aptitudes are denied the opportunity of proceeding in courses commensurate with their abilities and their desires to make some achievement for the national welfare.

While I do not think any hon. member, whether he be of a younger or an older generation, is not fully alive to this need, I venture to suggest that possibly younger members who have recently come to this chamber can approach the problem with greater freshness and vitality. To-day we talk, sometimes with alarm, sometimes perhaps imprudently, of the spread of ideas that are inconsistent with and contradictory to the basis of the civilization which all of us in the western world know best. I simply suggest this, that if we are to ward off the encroachment of ideas that are alien to principles which I believe every hon. member will accept, that must be done, not by condemning the evils or the imperfections of a particular economic thesis suggested, but by offering something that will adequately meet the needs which are felt by so many young men and young women in this dominion. One cannot emphasize that too much. I am not suggesting that through an acceptance of the principle of national scholarships there will nowhere be adherence to communism. I am not suggesting that those who receive scholarships under this system will possess in themselves guaranteed assurances of a contribution to the state. But what I say is that, according to the law of averages, if this privilege were accorded to young men and women who now have not the means of proceeding to agricultural colleges, to technical institutions, to the universities, there will be a substantial number of those selected who certainly will more than justify any expense or any violation of principle involved in the acceptance of the proposal I have in mind.

I suggest that there can be only one effective argument against the proposal for a system of national scholarships. Leaving aside for the time being the problem we have in this country by reason of the fact that education, under the British North America Act, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, I believe, the only effective argument is that which suggests it is not the function of the state to make the provision which is proposed in this resolution. I am prepared to meet that argument. I hope that those who take issue with me will not base their objections on grounds of cost, or of spoon-feeding; those are self-evident; I am sure any number of hon. members may be assumed to have them in mind. As regards the functions of the state, may I simply say that no man who is alive to the currents of his own day, no man who knows the course of history, will deny the ever-present law of change, or, if you will, evolution from one form of society to another. I do not believe I am giving expression to anything inconsistent with my own political principles when I say that the stage through which we are passing is one which indicates that more and more the state will be called upon to intervene and engage in new activities. This means an era of socialization, or whatever one may wish to call it. That seems to be a tendency which no thinking man or woman can deny. That being the case, having in mind that in Canada we have always recognized that it is an obligation of the state, or more particularly a function of the provinces, to provide educational facilities for our citizens, I think we have to go one step further and to realize that if we are charged with the responsibility of education we ought also to be charged with the responsibility of seeing that those who are properly qualified are given the education.

In suggesting the two objects behind this resolution, I use the language of the consultative committee of the Board of Education in Great Britain in 1916 when it made its report to the Minister of Education, who in return introduced a bill for furthering a program of national scholarships in the United Kingdom. The first object is the training of men and women according to their capacity so that they may serve public ends in the manner for which they are best fitted, the reward of merit and the encouragement of learning being subsidiary to this purpose; the second is the provision of equal opportunity, so far as this is consistent with the best use of the means at our disposal. An analysis of these two objects will reveal, first of all, that if democracy is to be preserved—and we boastingly refer to our desire to have it preserved—we should be consistent and realize that the basis of democracy must be education. This does not mean that equality of opportunity in education involves extending to every citizen the same measure of education, but it does mean the selection, within the democracy, of men who are best fitted for a particular pursuit or a particular function.

In 1925 Lord Eustace Percy, speaking in the British House of Commons as Minister of Education, laid down a principle which I think must challenge every existing democracy. He said that the time had passed when we must look upon democracy as meaning that education must be distributed to all sorts of people; rather, he said, children must be trained for the station to which, not by birth but by natural capacity, they properly belong. Why? Because, as we face problems in this house from day to day, every hon. member must feel, as I do in proper humility, the immensity and the difficulties of the many questions with which we have to deal. These problems are becoming more and more complex, and the problem of government in the future will gradually shift. I do not believe this house will lose its definite relation to these problems, but gradually the problems will call for examination in detail by others outside parliament, and it will be left for members of this chamber and other responsible bodies to pass upon the judgment of those servants of the state who by training are particularly qualified to make suggestions to the government of the country. While it may be disarming to a good many of us, I think we have to abandon the idea that every member of parliament is a potential prime minister. That is not the case, and we have to use the brain power which providence has given us in this country as in others, in the same measure as we use the agencies of the state in the development of our natural resources, in the surveys that are made, in agriculture, in mining and in all other branches of our economy. I believe that if we in Canada have risen to a high standard of prosperity, this is largely in spite of ourselves, largely because of conditions which were not present in many other countries that deliberately planned a course of action.

[Mr. Martin.]

Let me discuss this difficulty, the perfectly obvious one—that this is a provincial matter. The other night the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), speaking on the estimates in connection with the Royal Military College, quite properly pointed out the reasons why the federal government could legally and constitutionally extend to the Royal Military College the grant it does. It is because that comes properly within one of the specific phases of jurisdiction accorded to the dominion government. It is true, as I said a moment ago, that education under the British North America Act was specifically and exclusively reserved to the provinces; but the term "exclusively" surely does not mean that the federal arm of government cannot extend to the provinces, by way of supplemental assistance, measures which properly come within the provincial sphere. If there should be disagreement with that statement, we have the precedent of our National Research Council scholarships, and if we want a further precedent, we have the grants in aid in respect of technical education, pursuant to the Technical Education Act of 1919. I am not particularly concerned in what form the federal government assists in furthering this proposal, but I am interested in having substantially the desired results, and if they are to be brought about by grants in aid to the provinces, definitely earmarked for that purpose. I do not see that there will be much to object to in the method.

I fully realize that a resolution of this kind will meet with a certain amount of natural opposition, for it is difficult for us to take, as we should do, the long view, which in the long run is the short view. We cannot calculate in terms of months or even of a year the benefits that accrue from what we do in this house; it is in the long term of time that the good we do in this house really becomes effective or apparent. I suggest that the story behind the rivalry in the field of commerce and industry, with Germany on the one hand and Great Britain on the other, presents one of the greatest romances and one that vitally affects the proposal which I am now discussing.

I should like for a moment to go back to the Napoleonic period, when Great Britain was the first, in fact the only power, to develop mechanical industry and to use science for practical ends on a large scale. In the same period Great Britain had a monopoly of ocean navigation to practically all the markets outside the western world. In those countries where European civilization was not accepted Great Britain was the chief buyer and seller. Of what was that the product?

It was the product of a spontaneous effort on the part of industry, unrelated to science, unrelated to the universities, unrelated to knowledge in the sense in which we understand these terms to-day. There was no public system for the encouragement of industry, commerce or agriculture, or of any other phase of Great Britain's economy. The universities lived in self-contained units. There was no relation between the university towns and commerce and industry; in fact, the university man was reluctant to take any part in the business world, for it was not regarded as proper to his function or his training. Likewise, in industry, every firm was jealous of its own secrets and of its own prowess and record. It was unwilling to disclose these to other firms and it would have no relations with science or the universities. Well, as long as this British monopoly prevailed, the common sense of Englishmen sufficed. Just about the time Cavour was bringing about unification in Italy, unification came about in Germany; in 1870 there came about the formation of the German state, based upon the Bismarckian philosophy, and England found her rival, a rivalry based not upon spontaneous effort but upon the coordination of all branches of German economy; industry, the college, the university, the agricultural school and government were all harnessed together in one cooperative enterprise in the name of the state to try to secure for Germany the ascendancy that was already England's. By that method of rationalization, by the encouragement given to research, by help given to poor scholars, by industry cooperating with government, Germany rose to a position where she seriously rivalled and imperilled the ascendancy of England. That effort of Germany has been duplicated in other countries. This rationalization, or coordination of forces, represents what can be done if the state will only try to coordinate all these agencies which can be utilized to make of the state what it became in Germany.

The scholarship system I have in mind is not novel; it is something that goes back even to the beginnings of Greek culture. In the form of which I am now speaking I suppose its beginnings were in the time of Henry VI when he, along with others, endowed schools providing opportunities for poor scholars. That system has been carried on in Great Britain ever since. The Education Act of 1852 in England, at a time when there was no acceptance of the view that it was the function of the state to administer matters of education, nevertheless extended further provision for assistance to poor scholars. In the Education Act of 1907, amending the act of 1902, further provision was made for a program of national scholarships. And not only that act but what has been done since that time in England should be an example to us. During the great war, when the nation was concentrating its forces upon the successful prosecution of the war, the Department of Education, acting upon a minute of council, began to investigate once again the question of scholarships. This was done because in the words of the committee that set about making the examination, no time could be lost in developing to the utmost the resources of the best of England's brain power. In 1916 this committee made a recommendation to the board of education for an increase in the number of scholarships. Again in 1925 under Lord Eustace Percy another committee, this time a commission, made an investigation recommending still further increases, and this in a country where private endowments are greater than in any other country in the world. It may be argued, however, that the case of England is not applicable here, that England is a unitary state. The constitutional difficulty in connection with education does not exist there as it does here. But the principle is the important point. The fact is that His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom have realized that it is the function of the state to select from its citizens those who, having special intellectual attainments and ability, but lacking financial resources, should be given the opportunity of proceeding to higher education along the lines designated.

What is happening in England, what happened in Germany has been followed in other countries. Take Japan. One hundred years ago Japan could not in any particular begin to rival the industrialization of any western country; yet within seventy years she has been able, by the same coordination of effort and utilization of her brain power, to reach almost the point of equality in commercial and industrial rivalry with most of the countries of the western world. How was that done? It was not done by industry refusing to cooperate with universities or with the state in these matters. It was, as in the case of Germany, the result of coordination of effort on the part of industry and the universities—and when I use the term "university," I include technical schools and agricultural colleges. Any hon. member who has studied in Europe or the United States will remember that there is no exclusion of Japanese representation from their universities. The Japanese government annually since 1904 has been sending hundreds of its brightest students, but some of the poorest financially, to American and European universities, giving them the best training afforded there, on condition that these students return to their own country and try to make some contribution to the national welfare of Japan. I was reading the other day a statement by Doctor Compton, an outstanding administrator in the field of technological research. Speaking of Japan as of 1934, he said:

> I found sixty-nine research institutes, twenty-four of which were supported by the industries of the country and forty-five under support of the central government. These institutions were conducting research in every phase of national industry. In them were employed over one thousand scientific experts with approximately twenty-five hundred scientific assistants. In addition one thousand men were engaged in the electrical technical laboratory in Tokyo testing electrical equipment and carrying on research in electricity along the lines of power transmission, illumination standards, material and instruments.

That is on the technical side. On the general side every American university and some of our own in Canada have Japanese students studying political science, philosophy, engineering, getting the best out of our system and then going back to their own country to use their equipment in the interests of Japan.

The same is done in Italy. I was in Italy last summer and had an opportunity of learning something of what the Italian government is doing in the utilization of her best brain power. Next year it is hoped to enlist in all branches of university training eight thousand students annually, paid by the state, conditional upon their staying in Italy for a period of years to help rebuild the economy of that country.

Take Russia. Russia stands for something which is fundamentally antithetical to the ideas which I have been taught and in which I believe, but on its economic side the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics offers a challenge to the whole world in its coordination of effort in all branches. It seeks to rebuild Russia in an attempt to rival in all branches of industry other nations throughout the world.

One or two points about Russia: In 1930 there were 400 research institutes; to-day there are 840. In addition to this, there are scattered throughout the country 188 branches, engaged in scientific pursuits, not purely for academic interest but having in mind an attempt to strengthen the economy of Russia. There are 47,900 trained men who will come out of these institutes this year and who will be engaged for a period of five years on the study of problems affecting Russia.

There are 80,004 students this year who will come out of universities, men whose university education has been paid by the state, men whose financial condition would not otherwise permit them to have this kind of training, men who will be expected, by the terms under which they entered the universities, to carry on in the interests of their country. Whatever we may say of her, whatever we may think of the philosophy which actuates her political officials, by the way in which she has planned her whole economy Russia does offer a challenge to the whole world, including our own country. She has a population of 186,000,000 people, some twenty times that of this dominion.

To give an example of just how far behind we are, let us make a comparison. If we divide the figure 20 into the Russian population, we have a figure which nearly represents the population of Canada. On that ratio of comparison, we would have 2,500 men engaged in research in our National Research Council. Instead of that, we have only 160. By the same method of comparison, instead of spending about $500,000 annually upon our National Research Council, as we do, in order to be on the same level as Russia we would have to spend something like $25,000,000 annually. For the moment we may think that certain advantages we have will always give us a measure of economic and commercial strength. On the other hand, we may take the stand that in the long run, unless we plan as other countries have planned, or take the same point of view as they have taken, we shall find ourselves lagging behind and, as a result, our people will suffer.

Since 1916 South Africa, one of our sister dominions, through its government has expended $100,000 annually, except in the last fifteen years when it has spent an average of $150,000 annually in providing opportunities to poor students to attend university. True, the grants vary, but the principle is there. These sums are apart altogether from private endowments.

In Australia we have exactly the same condition, but on a greater scale. Bursaries, fellowships and scholarships are provided for young men and women who are financially unable to pursue their studies, and are cared for by the state on a conditional basis.

New Zealand is a country much smaller than Canada, but referring to the New Zealand Year Book for 1934, I find that an average of nearly 2,000 students received free university education annually in the preceding ten years. In the last eight years the government of New Zealand has spent approximately $100,000 in providing opportunities to poor men and women to attend the universities of that country.

I turn again to Great Britain, and the policy she has pursued, irrespective of the government in power. Her case is outstanding for a number of reasons, because the universities of Cambridge and Oxford and the provincial universities are more heavily endowed than are any corresponding institutions in any other country of the world. Despite, that fact, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, directly and through local educational boards, spends thousands of pounds annually in providing opportunities for young Englishmen and young English women to attend the universities, in the hope that those men and women may become part of the civil service, and serve the state in the professions or in some other capacity.

Professor Ernest Barker, whose name will be well known to most hon. members, has calculated that nearly one-half the total number of students in British universities have obtained assistance in various ways other than through their own financial means. I have made the calculation that in 1929 the British government assisted financially no less than 72,000 students who otherwise would have been unable to complete their university education. This is altogether apart from the appropriations for research. Even more startling, the quinquennial report of the university grants' committee of Great Britain, published in 1936, indicates that 41 per cent of all students in British universities are in receipt of financial assistance from government departments, local educational authorities, school or university endowments and the Carnegie trust. In 1934-35, 20,000 students were assisted and the sum of £1,350,000 was expended on their behalf.

Surely the most effective argument must be a presentation of the practice of countries the statesmanship of which is at least equal to that of Canada. In that connection let us consider Sweden, a country which to-day seems to project itself as such a great example in matters of government. Last year Sweden provided 3,000 scholarships to poor men and women; most of those scholarships were in agricultural colleges. Provisions were made by the government for the maintenance and tuition of the students. Apart from those, 1,600 students are given free education in the schools in forestry, not purely because of academic interest but because there, as in other countries, there is the same coordination of effort and the same decision to try to have all agencies in the state working for the common welfare, instead of permitting the condition which, I am afraid, obtains in this country, whereby each pursues his own course, government on the one hand and industry on the other, with very little interrelation between the two.

Denmark—and I think Denmark is the most outstanding example—is denied those physical advantages which Canada is accorded. Yet by planned effort, she has been able to attain a very definite supremacy in many markets of the world. She rivals Canada in the bacon and dairy products' markets. Behind her success is not a spontaneous but rather a definite and planned effort. By thousands—I think last year it was something like 4,000—her young men and women gain training in institutions corresponding to our agricultural colleges, such training being at the expense of the state and on condition that these young men and women return to the farms to serve in positions of leadership, in the ultimate hope that Danish agriculture may benefit, as in fact it has benefited.

When I speak of Denmark, I cannot help recalling the situation in my own constituency, one which is both urban and rural. I have calculated that in fifteen years, in the rural portion of my constituency, only three have been privileged to attend an agricultural college. Of that number only two came back to the farm. In one case a very definite leadership has been given to neighbours, and the result has been a considerable improvement in the standard of agricultural pursuit in that district. But, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you what I envisage, and I hope it will not be said that I am given to flights of imagination. As my justification I can give only the situation that exists in other countries. If every year at the expense of the state, because these people have not the means themselves, certain numbers of students could be afforded an opportunity of attending, let us say the agricultural college at Guelph or some other school where agricultural science is taught, these people would come back to their communities as leaders. They would have an improved knowledge of scientific agriculture, and this would be worth more than one can measure in terms of dollars and cents.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows full well some of the agricultural problems that face my riding. There are two specific problems in regard to which we have endeavoured for a considerable time to find a solution. I suggest to the minister that if twenty years ago we had initiated a policy under which young farmers could have received this additional training, the problem in connection with the growing of corn in Essex county and western Ontario in general might have been greatly minimized by this time. Sometimes we face these problems without any consciousness of the real difficulties involved or of what the problems really are, and an adequate knowledge of these matters can be acquired only over a period of time and by a considerable amount of study.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARTIN: I am in the hands of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MARTIN: I impress that point upon the house. I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would not agree, having in mind that many of our agricultural problems can be best tested by others than governments. We call upon the government continually because, in that field of work, normally speaking only in the civil service can we find those equipped to deal with these problems. I venture to suggest that, just as in Denmark the improvement in agriculture has been spontaneous, coming from the people, so in Canada there would be less reliance upon the government if, for the time being, the government would adopt a policy of greater intervention in these matters. I do not want to mention the argument of cost; I hope it will not be brought up.

Miss MacPHAIL: No, not after yesterday.

Mr. MARTIN: Not after yesterday, as the hon. gentleman says.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN: I am afraid that in my zeal for this subject I have confused the sex of the hon. member. I simply wish to say this: I realize that expenditures have to be made. If there is justification for spending money on national defence; if there is justification for spending some $300,000 on the Royal Military College at Kingston, having in mind what statesmanship is really intended to mean, I believe there can be no comparison between the merits of this proposal and these other minor matters which, in the course of time, will appear as fleabites. But if there is any argument on the point of cost, I suggest that anyone who examines the achievements of research scholars of the National Research Council will see that, as a result of the scientific endeavour of one of these scholars, more money has come to Canada than has been expended, during the years from 1916 on, on scholarships on behalf of the National Research Council. But even if that were not the case, surely that is not the test. Perhaps the results of such a policy are incalculable, but the real test is this: Is this not a preventive measure? The very nature of research precludes any consideration of cost.

I thank the house for its indulgence, but before I take my seat I should like to refer to the National Research Council. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of money we spend on the National Research Council is highly inadequate. It seems to me that in the light of what other countries have done and are doing for research we have no reason to be proud of our record. First of all, on the scholarship side, anyone who is familiar with the projects contemplated and the work to be done will realize that twice the number of scholarships which are extended to national research fellows would not take care of the need. I should like to place on Hansard the record of contributions by this government, in terms of scholarships, to the National Research Council:

National Research Council
Expenditures on Post-Graduate Research Scholarships

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that since this resolution was placed on the order paper I have received letters from over five thousand people in this country, from university professors, from ministers, from industrialists, from teachers and particularly from young men and young women. If we are to avoid the pitfalls which are sometimes evident in other countries more than in our own, we should recognize that the state has a definite obligation. As I have already said, the argument with which I shall be met is that education is a matter for the provinces, but there is nothing to prevent the federal government from offering positive assistance, consistent with the exclusive jurisdiction which by law is accorded to the provinces. At a time when we are talking of national unity and of the divisions that exist in our own country, perhaps a scheme of national scholarships open to men and women of merit in every part of Canada might help to emphasize what I think we in this house should emphasize, namely, that if Canada is to remain a confederation of nine provinces we must continually bring to the front the state in terms of the federal arm of government.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that all sorts of criticism will be levelled at this proposal. I know many will say that it is all right for those who want education, that it is a project to assist intellectuals. It may hold out that advantage; it may act as an encouragement in these days to young men and young women who are looking for encouragement. I believe I might put my argument on a sounder basis. I am not thinking of extending charity; I am not only thinking of young men and women in the cities and in the rural districts who need special assistance. I am thinking in terms of my own country. I should like to see Canada utilize the same forces that other countries have used and are using in their attempt to secure a strengthened economy. I fully believe that if the government could see its way clear to set up a committee, not necessarily of paid officials but of eminent men and women who would volunteer their services, to prepare the lines along which this proposition might be worked out, in a period of time this proposal would stand a test which few measures, in the long run, are able to stand.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion that has been presented by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) I wish I could discuss the matter as eloquently as he has, but I am afraid in that respect I shall fall very considerably short; therefore I would ask the house to bear with me while I make a few remarks on the subject under debate.

First of all, and without indulging in any flattery, I wish to compliment the hon. member for Essex East on the very able manner in which he has presented his motion. His argument was in terms so clear and concise, his illustrations so aptly chosen, and his supporting data so carefully selected, that if there were any doubt in the mind of anyone when he came into the house as to the wisdom of accepting the motion I am sure that by now it must have been altogether removed.

May I say also that I feel very happy in following my hon. friend from Essex East when I realize that he is a Canadian of French descent, a Roman Catholic, and from the province of Ontario, and I myself, seconding his motion, am a Canadian of English descent, a Protestant, and from the province of Quebec. I think this will serve, as does the motion itself, to emphasize the national unity that exists and always should exist in this Canada of ours.

A number of years ago, when I was considerably younger than I am to-day, I read the pages of Oliver Goldsmith's Deserted Village, and many in this house will remember at least the first two lines as I do:

> Sweet Auburn! lovliest village of the plain,
> Where health and plenty cheer'd the labouring swain,—

It went on from there, and in one passage these words occur:

> Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way,
> With blossom'd furze unprofitably gay,
> There, in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule,
> The village master taught his little school.

I am in one sense the personification of the character presumed to be represented in that part of Oliver Goldsmith's Deserted Village. I think, if I am correct in my estimation, that I am possibly the only member of this house who is at present actively engaged in the teaching profession and who hopes, God willing, to remain actively engaged in it for a number of years yet to come. For that reason I desire to lend every possible encouragement to the purpose of the motion, in the hope that I may contribute to the subject under discussion something that will at least lend weight to the arguments that have been used by the mover.

May I just say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I am happy to see returning to this house the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), who has been enjoying a profitable holiday in a climate which at this time of the year is a little better than our own, whose family in days gone by made a very considerable contribution to the cause of education as exemplified in this motion, and who is himself a member of the Protestant Committee of Education for the province of Quebec. I am sure he is deeply interested in this motion and in the discussion that will take place upon it.

I am fully aware, as the mover has already impressed upon the house, that education is a subject which was placed under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments by the fathers of confederation when they framed the British North America Act in 1867. I for one would not in any way seek to change what the fathers of confederation so wisely did in this respect. But the motion has nothing whatsoever to do with any change in our educational systems as they exist to-day, and I hope to make that abundantly clear as I go from point to point in the course of my remarks.

The provinces are doing an admirable job in the field of education. The motion does not in any way seek to criticize the activities which the provinces are carrying on in the educational field or the manner in which they are carrying on those activities. This proposal is designed in particular to give encouragement to whatever they may be doing in this field without striving, by any devious ways whatsoever, to enter the field of education, which we all recognize belongs strictly and entirely to the provincial governments. The purpose of the motion is to supplement the efforts not only of our provincial governments but also of all existing organizations interested in the subject of education.

In my native province of Quebec the schools, of course, date back to many, many years prior even to confederation. We had a peculiar system of education in our early days, and it was not until the year 1790 that there was any real order put into our educational work as conducted in that province. A commission was appointed at that time headed by the chief justice of the province, William Smith, and it is interesting to notice one of the phrases that he used in connection with the recommendations brought forward by that commission. He suggested the establishment of three parish schools, "for the teaching of the three R's in order that the lower classes might be lifted out of a state of base barbarism." That was in 1790. I want to assure this house that in the province of Quebec we have made very long strides since the year 1790. We have an educational system of which we are justly proud, and I want to remind the house that we have living within our province two great peoples, Canadians of French descent and Canadians of English descent. We carry on our educational systems—I want you to notice that word; it is in the plural—we carry on our educational systems without any conflict whatsoever. The Protestant educational system is in no way interfered with by our Catholic or French-speaking majority; and likewise the Catholic and French system is in no way interfered with by the English-speaking and Protestant minority. Such is the condition in the province of Quebec, where these two great peoples live side by side in complete harmony one with the other, particularly where the educational field is concerned, so that we can immediately dispel from our minds the possibility of the creation of friction as a result of the adoption by the house of any measure such as is proposed in the motion now before us.

[Mr. Walsh.]

I am much impressed by the terms of the motion, particularly the last paragraph, which I may be allowed to quote:

> That, in the opinion of this house, following the practice already established in Great Britain and other industrial countries, the government should investigate the desirability of a system of national scholarships to be made available to outstanding students who are financially unable to continue their education, to enable them to secure under-graduate and (or) post-graduate training in our universities, university colleges, agricultural colleges and technical schools.

I have been deeply impressed also by the reasons advanced in support of this resolution by the hon. member who moved it and by the paragraphs that precede the concluding portion of the motion. His resolution was very carefully prepared, and, as I have said, he is to be commended for the manner in which he has presented the subject to the house. It will be noticed that he has not emphasized solely academic pursuits; he has discussed also the possibilities of graduate and undergraduate work in our agricultural and technical schools. Personally I prefer that the emphasis should be placed upon those two particular phases, because I believe that from them our primary industry of agriculture and our secondary industry of manufacturing would be greatly assisted by the trained minds which could be brought into action through the medium of scholarships, an asset which is being lost to Canada because of the inability of these young people to finance themselves through a graduate or undergraduate course in any of our universities, agricultural colleges or technical schools.

Our provinces are specifically charged with the work of education, but, as we know, many if not all are financially embarrassed and for that reason are not able to give the measure of assistance in the field of education which no doubt under happier circumstances they could provide. For that reason, in my opinion, the dominion government should at this time bring into play its financial resources so as to give these young men an opportunity to further their education, and thereby become the national assets that God evidently intended them to be when He endowed them with the latent ability that we should provide the means to develop.

If, Mr. Speaker, we canvassed the members of this house we should be astonished to find how many hon. members have been assisted to a higher degree of education through scholarships provided by schools, by governments, by private enterprise or by other organizations interested in education. When I began to study this question and discussed it with various hon. members, I was amazed at the number who told me, in effect, "Well, I should not be where I am or what I am to-day if such and such a scholarship had not been available for me when I was going through high school or just entering college." Many in this house have thus been assisted to bring to the affairs of the state a trained mind. Why should not the dominion government, as other countries have done, interest themselves in this field and provide opportunities for the development of latent talent for use in the industries of our country?

As was mentioned by the mover of the resolution, many organizations have endorsed it. I might mention the Citizens Research Institute, of Toronto, the National Research Council, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Canadian Federation of School and Home Clubs. Also, of course, our universities and colleges are one hundred per cent behind this motion, and all express the hope and have the expectation that it will be adopted, thus giving the government the privilege of at least discussing the matter and if possible bringing in a measure upon which this house can act, or of acting themselves without further discussion in this chamber.

I have mentioned our universities and our colleges. Many of us are graduates of universities. I am thinking of one university in the city of Montreal, known as l'Université de Montréal, a French Canadian institution which has been established for many years. Although this is somewhat aside from the question under discussion, indirectly it bears on it. L'Université de Montréal is situated, in an unfinished condition, on the northern slopes of the mountain around which Montreal is built. It is in financial distress, and I am sorry that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is not in his seat; for I was going to suggest to him that when he is considering relief projects for Montreal and for the province of Quebec he might provide ways and means for the completion of that university, so that we may have on the northern slopes of Mount Royal a foundation which will become nationally and internationally known as a centre of French culture in the second largest French-speaking city in the world. In this matter I wish not to be misunderstood. I am not saying this for political purposes, nor have I any political motive in view. It does not affect me in my constituency. What I have said arises from a deep conviction and a sincere interest in the cause of education and in the project that has been put forward by the mover of this resolution. Scholarships could then be provided in an exceptionally fine university where students, even English-speaking students, could get the benefit of French culture. I hope the Minister of Labour will give due consideration to this suggestion and make it possible for us in Montreal to have this centre of French culture completed at an early day.

I believe it was von Bismarck of Prussia and Germany who on one occasion said that the nation that has the schools has the future. This motion will provide an incentive for our schools to do even better work than they are doing at present. Our schools are doing very excellent work and I do not wish them to feel that I am in any way suggesting that they need this spur; but I believe it would be an added incentive to them to instil a deeper sense of responsibility into the minds of the pupils who are attending our schools to-day, and in so doing encourage some of the brighter pupils to look forward to the possibility of taking advantage of one of these national scholarships. In my opinion our schools need that encouragement; education in Canada needs it. As we all know, education is something of a sacred trust. Although at present it reposes in the provinces, we believe that the government at Ottawa should indirectly take an interest in education and seek to give some measure of encouragement to the excellent work which the provinces are doing.

Education is a heritage that we ourselves in this generation must assist in every possible way, so that as we pass from the field of activity we can leave behind us those who are probably better educated than we had an opportunity of being. Education is a process that is intended to fit the individual to become a valuable and useful member of society, and by the adoption of this motion I suggest that we should be making a greater use of our educational system, and making of that system a real national asset and a national benefit. We must emphasize that point and emphasize it rather definitely.

In conclusion I should like to sum up in a few words my reasons for supporting the resolution so ably moved by the hon. member for Essex East. I would emphasize again that it will in no way interfere with provincial administration of our educational systems. I suggest again that it will emphasize the Canadian point of view in our educational systems, that it will encourage and supplement the efforts that are now being made, and place educational facilities at the disposal of those who would otherwise have to forego them. It will not establish any precedent, because the government of Canada has interested itself in education on many previous occasions and made grants to provincial governments for provincial education in days gone by for the purpose of giving them the advantage of additional income so that they could carry on their work more effectively. For these reasons I have seconded the motion that has been moved and I give it my unqualified support.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): I am sure that one may heartily congratulate the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) on his presentation of this very important problem. Those of us who know him personally—and I am sure he will permit me to say this—realize the worthy effort that he put into his own education and the value that scholarships have been to him—scholarships well won and applied. And perhaps in his presentation this afternoon, which was indeed a most erudite and scholarly exposition of his purpose, one could find that he himself was his own best recommendation for what he is advocating. Then, too, it would seem significant that the one who seconded the motion, the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), is himself a superintendent of schools. So that this motion has been launched ably and under most auspicious circumstances. When therefore two hon. members such as those who have moved and seconded the motion bring it to the attention of this house its purpose must be a most worthy one and one to which the government should give full consideration.

It would seem to be a common failing of human nature to tend to regard lightly the value and importance of an education. Sometimes it would seem that we fail to recognize the vitalizing value and the quickening influence and practical worth of scholastic and academic education. In Canada, however, we have gone far along the way of providing means of education for our youth during the most important and vital stages of their earlier development.

One-fifth of our total population is represented by children attending school, and tomorrow morning throughout the length and breadth of this dominion 2,300,000 children will go to school, almost double the number that went to school twenty-six years ago. These children will trudge their way, some of them unwillingly and others gladly, to meet 73,000 teachers. It is noteworthy that the Canadian schools number on their rolls twice as many children as there are farmers in the whole of the dominion, and as many as there are men and women in all other occupations combined. Granted that the schools across the length and breadth of this dominion, under the restrictions under which they have been placed in regard to expenditure, have done an extraordinarily fine piece of work; granted that the vast majority of the 73,000 teachers are noble men and women, working many of them for pathetically small salaries, but conscious of the weight of responsibility that rests upon them; granted that the attendance at schools is on the increase—for the average child to-day spends eight and a half years in school, whereas his or her parents spent only six; granted a good many other things in connection with our educational system of which we may be justly proud, have we yet realized fully the importance of education?

In 1930 and 1931 the national expenditure in Canada was $4,750,000,000, of which fifty-five per cent was spent for food, clothing and shelter, including the taxes paid as part of the purchase price. Seven per cent went for direct taxes, eight per cent for savings and thirty per cent for other things, including approximately eight per cent for indirect taxes and 3·5 per cent for schools and universities. Only 3·5 per cent of our national expenditure went to schools and universities. And my definition of university is the same as that of the hon. member for Essex East, and includes agricultural colleges, technical schools and so on.

I referred a moment ago to the salaries paid to some of our teachers. This house was shocked a few weeks ago when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) drew to its attention the salaries paid—or at least that were not being paid—to some of the teachers in his own province of Saskatchewan. While conditions may not be as extreme in other parts of Canada as in the dried-out areas of that province, nevertheless looking to my own province of Ontario I find that the average salary of public school teachers in 1934 was only $1,141. And in the same year in Saskatchewan the average salary paid in the rural elementary schools was the amazing figure of $505. Yet it is upon these men and women that we place the responsibility for the education of our children, the most priceless asset of the nation. And only 3·5 per cent of our national expenditure is devoted to education. I fully admit that the number of dollars spent on the school system does not measure its value. The test of any educational system is, does it educate? The value of any educational system is to be found, not in the beauty of its buildings and equipment, not in the theories that motivate it, but in what the pupil learns. Does he leave school, or whatever institution it may be, equipped and ready to face the practical workaday problems of life? What has he learned concerning the cultural things which help to make him not only a man but a gentleman? Has he been regarded as an individual and had his native traits and individual tendencies recognized and developed fully, or has he been just one of thirty or forty pupils or whatever number may be in a class room? Has he merely been exposed to the prescribed course of study, or his some effort been made to see that he not only swallowed but digested what he was given? In other words, what sort of foundation is being laid for him for the days when he is forced to build upon it and is faced with the problem of earning his own living?

In the remarks I am making it is not my desire or my purpose to criticize the educational system of this country. A noble work is being done in all provinces. But do we make it possible for the worthy student to go as far as he or she would or could? Is money, or rather the lack of money, a barrier to higher and specialized education? As the hon. member for Essex East has so well pointed out, in Canada it would indeed appear so. And when we realize what is being done in other countries, as has been so well demonstrated this afternoon, to develop students who have shown themselves meritorious and worthy, young people of character and of guarded and studied ambition, and of hope not only for themselves but also for the nation to which they belong, then I say it is high time that we took stock of ourselves to see where the slack may be in our system of education.

It would seem that in this resolution the quick centre of our difficulty has been touched. Hon. members know well that legion is the name of those who have been and are compelled to curtail their early education by reason of various and difficult circumstances The unemployment of parents and heads of families because of conditions for which they are in no way responsible has meant that boys and girls, young men and young women, have been denied the training necessary to equip them properly and adequately for their life's vocation. Then too our schools, which have a high standard of usefulness, the sphere of which for years they have been widening, as a result of lack of funds have in many cases not been able to provide adequate facilities for technical training. In these days, horrible to relate, apprenticeship is almost unknown in this country. The lack of this training has been painfully felt in far too many quarters. It is regrettable that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is not here to participate in this debate, but I am sure he would be here were he not prevented. It is of the utmost importance for us to realize that in this dominion we are facing or are about to face a scarcity of trained men and women for highly specialized jobs. As I mentioned in the house the other day, in the building industry alone a comparatively small percentage of increase in its activities would occasion an absolute shortage of skilled mechanics.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Will my hon. friend permit me? The Minister of Labour has been here this afternoon; he was compelled to go out for a few minutes, but he will come back. I should not like it to appear on the record that he was away while this resolution was debated.

Mr. MASSEY: I am very glad to withdraw the remark, but I am sure the minister heard me say that he would be here if it were not for some very good reason.

There are upwards of 130,000 young men and young women attending technical schools in Canada. But this number is less than one per cent of our total population, and only about five per cent of our school-going population. Attending universities in Canada there are to-day 32,500 young men and young women, about 1·5 per cent of our school-going population. I am sure that when we consider the importance, for those who are capable of absorbing it, who merit it, and who wish to have it, of university education or technical or advanced or specialized education in some form, it seems extraordinarily unfortunate that so small a percentage of our population is able to take advantage of the opportunities that these institutions have to offer.

Last session I was privileged to introduce a resolution dealing with the reestablishment of youth. During the course of my remarks, as reported on page 907 on Hansard of March 9, 1936, I drew the attention of the house to the percentage of those who remained in school after sixteen years of age. Those figures themselves tell the story, when it is realized that so many of our young people find it necessary to leave school for various reasons at or before the age of sixteen, and when so often the reason is the absence of funds to permit them to carry on.

Now, what have we done in connection with scholarships? It would seem unnecessary to bring this crying need to the attention of the house in the way it has been. We have witnessed what has been done in other countries, as it has been so ably demonstrated by the hon. member for Essex East this afternoon. Should we be so slow to recognize what we should do and must do in Canada? What means have been taken to provide for the better students, the meritorious students, to carry on with their education? Scores, yes thousands, of young men and women are compelled to leave school in order to seek employment, and many times it is a hopeless effort to look for a job. Their education is cut short; they are denied opportunities for further education simply because of the lack of funds. To that I have referred previously, and I refer to it again with emphasis. There are many problems that face governments in these days, Mr. Speaker, not alone the governments of this nation but those of all nations. But what more important problem can there be for the consideration of the government than the problem of making available higher education to those who have proven themselves able and willing to embrace it, and thus the better to fit the most meritorious of our youth for the days to come, when they will be engaged in gainful occupation?

For many years it has been my peculiar privilege to have an extensive contact with youth, both as a result of my vocation and as the result of an avocation. Scores of young men have come to me in the last twelve years or so from all walks of life and with all sorts of problems. In thinking over some of the cases that have come to my attention during the last few years I came to a letter, written on the the letterhead of the Danforth Technical School, Greenwood avenue north of Danforth, Toronto, under date of January 14, 1937. The Danforth Technical School is a most worthy institution, presided over most ably by the principal, Mr. Ferguson. Under the date mentioned he has written, in part, as follows:

> We have in this school a young boy sixteen and a half years of age and in the third year industrial course, majoring in pattern making and design. This boy's father has been and is still out of work for about four years, and I believe, the family is on partial relief. The boy informs us that it will be necessary for him to stop school almost immediately to become a wage earner since there are six children in the family, five of whom are girls. The teachers' confidential report, which I am submitting, is very encouraging, he, of course, stood first in his class.
> In order to supplement the teachers' report we gave him a group intelligence test which revealed a mental age of practically twenty years and an intelligence quotient of 124·5. Realizing that this was an exceptional boy, both from the standpoint of intelligence and application, I arranged to have Mr. M. Parmenter, who is experienced in administering individual intelligence tests, to give him an individual test which revealed an I.Q. considerably above the average.
> Here is an exceptionally bright boy whose school career is about to be curtailed because of the financial conditions in the home. I would like to see, if at all possible, some sort of scholarship arranged for the boy so that he could not only complete his four-year industrial course but carry on through the university in the school of science. It is boys of this type that should make our leaders in the future. If you can suggest any way by which this can be brought about it would be greatly appreciated by all of those connected with this school and, I believe, would be rendering a service to the nation as a whole.

I had a long talk with that boy. Personally I found him to be everything that his principal suggested in this letter. I found that boy in this position, that it would be necessary for him to cease attending school immediately. What was there for that boy but to do what he was forced by circumstances to do? It was impossible for him to carry on; it was impossible for him to go ahead and finish his four year course, let alone go to the university. Here is an intrinsic asset to this nation, more precious than all the silver and gold in the mines of Canada, yet we permit circumstances which we can control to carry boys like this away from their studies and force them to take any jobs they can get, thus depriving them of the fullest benefits of an education. Why should it be that the son of a wealthy man, regardless of how much intelligence the boy may possess, regardless of how thick his skull may be and regardless of anything else, should have the opportunity of a cultural training, a university training, while that opportunity is denied a boy such as I have described, though in the case of some of the sons of wealthy men, their thick skulls may provide a veritable anvil for weary pedants to pound upon?

It is said by some that the lack of money really is no handicap to the boy who actually wants an education, that he can work his way through university; it has been done over and over again, it may be said. It is true that it has been done, but how many times must we remind ourselves that these are vastly different days from those of the 1920's, that we are facing conditions vastly different from those that existed fifteen years ago? How can a young man count upon going to university, where he knows he will have to face the necessity of paying fees, paying for books, paying this and paying that, when he must hazard the whole thing on being able to obtain a job firing a furnace or doing something similar? There is no desire on the part of the youth of this country to be spoon fed. I fully believe there is just as much red blood coursing through the veins of Canadian youth to-day as was ever the case, but Canadian youth must recognize the situation with which it is faced. So must we, and so must provincial and municipal governments. Times have been and are cruel; the struggle has been against seemingly unconquerable odds and against influences that certainly have been uncontrollable. But to-day unnecessary hazards and handicaps beset the path of youth. Should we not as a parliament do something, in the face of the conditions that have been sketched this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh); or should we just sit back and do nothing while many of our young people are deprived of the opportunity to obtain the advantages of higher education?

Last year, during the course of the debate to which I have referred already, in connection with the resolution I introduced having to do with the establishment of a national youth reestablishment commission, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) said in part, as reported on page 919 of Hansard:

> In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat that the government is fully in sympathy with the reestablishment of the youth of this country and, like any government conscious of its responsibility in relation to unemployment at this time, we will take every possible step to see to it that young men and women are given opportunities within which they may realize their desire for remunerative employment. I do not believe the youth of this dominion expect ready-made jobs, nor do I believe that the solution for unemployed youth lies in public employment. If I did believe that I should have some misgivings for the future of Canada. It is our duty to create conditions within which our Canadian youth may once more, as in other years, find their own opportunities and make the most of them.

It will be recalled, as has been mentioned already this afternoon, that the Technical Education Act of 1919, through grants in aid to the provinces, made it possible for the provinces to carry on technical education. In 1921, as a direct result of that act, there were 57,000 students enrolled in technical schools. Eight years later, in 1929, there were 121,000, and even in 1934, under such conditions as we have discussed this afternoon, there were 122,000 students. There, it would seem to me, is the legitimate echo to expect from the remarks made by the Minister of Labour last year, that if worthy work is done along these lines the results are assured. After all, the Technical Education Act was not an unusual act. The bugaboo and hazards of interfering with provinces were gracefully overcome. The provinces were glad to accept the assistance. The money was used, and used adequately and well, with the result that in ten short years 121,000 of our Canadian youth found themselves in a position to avail themselves of technical education.

The value of scholarships is indeed beyond debate. Those of us who have had to do with youth, those of us who have had to do with young men and women, fully realize the value of scholarships. We speak a great deal, and with much pride, of our national resources. We talk in glowing terms about our country, rich in natural resources. Hon. members coming from constituencies wherein are forests, mines and the like, boast about the great wealth of Canada. There is no wealth in Canada which could even begin to compare in value with the potential wealth supplied by our youth. Are we to-day going to fail to "mine" that youth? In other words are we not going to do our best to bring to the surface the fullest and best within that youth?

I strongly support the resolution. Its passage would be hailed with great acclaim throughout Canada. Youth is vocal these days; youth has spoken and is speaking on this point. The hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and myself, as delegates to the League of Nations, had the opportunity this summer of attending the world youth congress at Geneva. During the course of that congress and within the Canadian delegation itself there was much discussion concerning scholarships. The Canadian Youth Congress, one of the national youth organizations in Canada, in a statement of its principles, refers specifically and directly to the desire of youth to be able to embrace scholarships, in other words that scholarships be set up within this dominion. Other youth organizations throughout the length and breadth of Canada have likewise expressed themselves.

The hon. member for Essex East states he has received 5,000 communications in regard to this great problem. Youth is vocal in the matter, and as one who has been actively interested for many years in the wefare of Canadian youth, with all the earnestness of which I am capable I urge upon the government their ready acceptance of the burden of the resolution.

It was George Eliot who wrote:

There is no short-cut, no patent tram-road to wisdom. After all the centuries of inventions, the sole path lies through the thorny wilderness which must still be trodden in solitude with bleeding feet, with sobs for help, as it was trodden by them of olden times.

May the government not be deaf to this appeal for help!

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, it is no part of my plan or intention to discuss the value of education as such. That must be patent to all. As one who for some time has been engaged in educational work I have knowledge of the need of a measure of encouragement or assistance to permit students who are financially unable to pursue advanced studies to continue their educational training.

May I congratulate the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) upon the thoroughness of the preparation and presentation of his observations, and upon the excellent work he has done throughout Canada in promoting the ideas exemplified in the resolution now under consideration.

I note the resolution states that the government should investigate the desirability of a system of national scholarships. Sir, I have no doubt of the desirability. I would ask that the government consider ways and means of making a beginning on such a program. It has been said and demonstrated in the house that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. In Canada there are many students —I have taught some of them myself—with brains capable of assimilating knowledge, and with the will to study. Too often, having had their minds awakened by the processes of study, through adverse financial circumstances they have been obliged to abandon their studies carried on under the guidance of men and women skilled in leading the student mind away from the pitfalls of half-truths which throng the pathway of the student. What is the result? Too often the result has been that those active brains go on, unguided, building for themselves on false premises, or at the best on half-truths, adhering to all or any of the crack-pot theories which bedevil the thinking of people in Canada to-day.

We need to conserve and develop that brain power. Surely the British North America Act cannot prevent the people of Canada through us, their representatives, from offering to help and encourage, by way of scholarships, all worthy students who have shown possibilities. I am particularly concerned with the carrying on of advanced education under such a system. I do not think it is possible to do too much at one time, but we must begin somewhere. My own observation from experience is that the real and crying need to-day is to pick out those who have shown unusual possibilities and allow them to go on into the realm of investigation and into the speculative part of education so that under proper guidance they may serve Canada more intelligently in whatever sphere or whatever phase of Canadian life they may follow.

Therefore to my mind it is important that we should consider the matter from the standpoint of conservation. I believe we must look to the conservation of our best brains, which, although perhaps not yet developed, give promise of something for the future. We are reminded constantly of the lack of balanced thinking, and I believe much of that is due to the fact that having reached a certain stage really bright minds are left to shift for themselves, building without a sure foundation, lacking in guidance, and arriving at futility.

For these reasons I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution, in the hope that out of it something may come to help take up the slack and eliminate the waste which in my personal experience I have seen.

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me, while I deem it also my duty, to rise in this house in support of the resolution which has just been presented by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). The hon. member deserves to be complimented for this resolution, and all those who will graciously support him will certainly also be worthy of praise.

I know that throughout Canada many young men have been unable to complete their studies on account of financial difficulties. You may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that no expenditure, except perhaps the moneys voted for the relief of our unemployed, could ever be more useful than that which is anticipated for the purpose set forth in this resolution. Such a proposal would certainly be worthy at any time, but it is all the more deserving, coming as it does in a period of depression such as the one we are now experiencing. Many countries have enacted measures in support of this plan, and as Canada is a progressive country, I think it would be a step in the right direction, should this house declare itself unequivocally in favour of this proposition.

Lately, Japan, Germany and Russia have all acted along the same lines. In 1935, the United States enacted their National Youth Administration Act for the purpose not only of subsidizing high school studies, but also of providing for the completion of their course by young students who, though needy, are nevertheless brilliant, conscientious and eager to succeed in the avocation for which they have been endowed with particular talent by the Divine Master.

In 1935, the United States voted over 25 million dollars for needy students, and while we should not always follow the lead of that country, we may without hesitation, in this case at least, accept the resolution presented by the hon. member for Essex East, with a view to granting deserving students some beneficial, and I shall even say necessary help.

If I may be permitted, however, to make a suggestion, I think that it would be advisable to point out that in the past too many students have chosen the professions, such as medicine and law, with the result that, today, these professions are overcrowded; from this it may be inferred that there have been too few who followed a scientific course.

Here is what one of our learned compatriots said in a lecture at Quebec, in 1880:

> There is that rankling sore, the overcrowding of the professions, specially the liberal professions. It steadily swells the flow of intelligent young men, fed with latin and greek, who, when they leave our colleges and universities have to face the hideous spectre of misery and idleness. These conditions are a social menace that we must necessarily stem by creating new opportunities, by opening new avenues, and by directing, in any possible way, towards agriculture, industry, colonization, mechanics and all fields of human activity, even that of science, these energies which are eager for action and are lingering in inactivity.

That statement still applies to the present time, and the professions are more overcrowded than ever. In those circumstances our youth are justified to look elsewhere, particularly in the economic sphere. We must look toward the development of our natural resources, for there lies the secret of our future prosperity.

Between 1924 and 1930, 60 per cent of the 1,210 graduates who came out of our classical colleges insisted on further increasing the overwhelming number of doctors and lawyers, while less than 200 followed scientific pursuits. I believe these figures will help to show that is in the interest of our students, at least for the time being, to turn toward other occupations than the so-called professions.

If our young men prepare themselves, sincerely and conscientiously, in their respective avocation, our country, vast as it is, will surely take notice of them.

Success is gauged according not to the wealth that one may acquire, but to one's service to the community. However, neither is excluded, and it is always well to remember that you cannot acquire leadership without earning it.

I consider it therefore my duty to support this resolution, and I trust that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will welcome it with his usual smile, a sincere smile, and that he will do his utmost to place this proposal among those which he supports.

I understand that there are only 72 bilingual members in this house, 59 of whom are from the province of Quebec, so you will allow me to resume in English the comments I have to offer on this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the mover (Mr. Martin) and the seconder (Mr. Walsh) of the resolution which is one, I believe, that will receive the approval of all groups in this house.

It is to be regretted that it is not possible for us to get together more often on measures and resolutions presented in the house, especially when these are for the welfare of humanity which, after all, is the quintessence of government's raison d'être.

The Old Age Pensions Act has been a godsend to many people well advanced in years. This act has made it possible for some to make the remaining years of their life a period of quietude and contentment never experienced before in many cases, and may this enjoyment reach into years of ripened old age as a fitting close to the useful lives which many of our aged have given to the development and progress of this country.

This resolution might be called, if I may be permitted the term, the corollary or complement of the Old Age Pensions Act, for if we recognize in a tangible form by the old age pension the services rendered us by our aged, can it not, therefore, be deduced that we should do all within our power to enhance and encourage the latent possibilities of our youthful talent, a talent which often cannot assert itself properly because of financial difficulties?

Especially is it fitting and proper that the resolution be introduced at this time, during a period of depression and financial anxiety such as the world has never before experienced.

I feel quite certain that each and every one of us knows of many cases in our respective constituencies where the carrying out of the spirit of this resolution by the government would be like manna from heaven. For my part I am cognizant of many cases of young men and young women in my constituency who, because of financial embarrassments, could not finish their university courses.

which would have needed in some instances only one or two more years of study to complete, in order to equip these young people for life's journey.

I know of other cases also, as all of us do, of young boys and girls whose talents need only to be developed and nurtured, but the inability of whose parents to give them a course of studies which would make these youths assets of no mean value to their community, their province and their country, has resulted in the stifling of their youthful hopes. We always have too much mediocrity in any given country, and as a converse we always have too few intellectuals.

It has been estimated that in round figures 100,000 boys and girls leave school annually before the age of eighteen, and that about 2,000 boys enter our universities annually. Of these about three per cent have the brilliant qualities to make outstanding leaders, and granted that these 2,000 will finish their university course, we therefore turn out about 60 young men annually destined for leadership.

From the above figures, therefore, it may logically be deduced that we have 3,000 young men annually who are potential leaders but who are unable to finish their studies—and this to the detriment of their self-assertion, and to the detriment of this country.

Russia is now spending an average of $400,000,000 yearly in scientifically educating leaders for the development of her industries and commerce.

Japan not only educates thousands of her youth in her imperial universities, as has been said this afternoon, at the expense of the state, but spends $600,000 annually in sending three hundred of her most brilliant students to study new methods and ideas in foreign countries, and to bring these home for the benefit of her national development. In Great Britain there is in operation a system of scholarship whereby it is possible for any brilliant pupil to win his way, by means of scholarships, from the elementary school through the high schools and universities of the country, the funds being supplied by the government of Great Britain. Germany, France and Italy are doing likewise.

In the United States college enrolment dropped ten per cent between 1932 and 1934. In order to compensate for this curtailment, in June, 1935, the United States founded the National Youth Administration, which copes with the situation by coming to the assistance of students who have already made their mark in scholarship, but who are unable to continue studies owing to financial difficulties.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

In a survey reported to the office of education in connection with the National Youth Administration, it was revealed that in ninety-nine institutions, approximately fifty-five per cent of the college age students received an average of A or B. There were two factors responsible for this scholastic superiority: first, the students had been selected on the basis of good scholarship, and, second, the students selected to receive federal assistance not only desired a college education but were of the conscientious type who made the most of the opportunities given them. The primary qualification of students so selected should be their needs as to financial assistance required, good character, and the possession of such ability as to give assurance of their doing good scholastic work.

I quote from a report of a subcommittee on American vocational guidance, on child health protection:

> Scholarships for the young are the result of an effort to give these young people a square deal. They are an output to assure to young people that equality of opportunity.

Such a resolution, if carried out, would remove from the labour market a large number of job applicants who could be advantageously absorbed in the field of education to the betterment of the community and the country. Our future students who must make important decisions concerning social and economic problems in the future, cannot be too well prepared and this resolution would reduce the financial hardships that are limiting the educational careers of many students.

After July 31, 1936, the United States spent for the National Youth Administration as follows: students, $9,569,949; college age, $13,448,132; graduate age, $979,289, or a total of approximately $24,000,000. After May 26, 1936, the National Youth Administration helped the American youth as follows: 7,000 graduate students, on an average of $25 to $30 a month, to help their way through; 133,000 college students earning a maximum average of $15 a month to help meet expenses of college education; 269,500 high school students earning up to $6 a month through government assistance to pay for carfares, lunches and text-books.

What country offers a better laboratory, as it were, than Canada as a vast field for our youth to work in, to study and to solve its varied problems? We have many major problems peculiar to Canada, arising from climatic conditions, wide areas of scattered population, geological formations, mineral deposits, water power possibilities, forest areas drought areas.

The depression has also created social and economic problems unheard of before, many of which have been beyond the scope of the present generation, and what a splendid opportunity there is for our youth to profit by our experience, as important as it has been to a certain extent, to remedy the ills which we all wish and strive to see banished from our confines.

There is nothing that we like better than to pick out sure winners, and as this resolution calls for the choice of the elite among our financially embarrassed students, it assures us that our moneys will be well spent, on subjects who have already proved their mental fabric as well as their moral and physical fibre. No money would be better spent in Canada than that diverted towards the carrying out of the resolution by the government. We are subsidizing movements having in view the bettering and development of agriculture, and it would appear to me that the amelioration and the advancement of our youth take precedence over any material development which we might conceive of, or favour. The progress of any country is in the genius, the happiness and the enterprise of its people. The past five years of depression have destroyed much of this wealth. It behooves each and every one of us to do our utmost to revitalize it, as it were, in these three sources and there is no surer method of doing this than in carrying out the tenets embodied in this resolution.

In conclusion, permit me to state that I am heartily in favour of the resolution and I believe that no legislation which could be passed at this time by any government would be received with more general support, approval, satisfaction and commendation than that presented by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Before dealing with the motion so ably presented by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), I wish to express a word of commendation of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), especially with reference to two subjects which he treated this afternoon. In the first place, when he spoke of proposed help to the university of Montreal by trying to interest the provincial authorities in cooperating with the Department of Labour by means of public works to be carried out this year or next, he referred to something which I had in mind, and I shall be glad indeed to support any movement in that direction.

The second point to which I wish to refer relates to his reference to the satisfactory operation of the school systems in the province of Quebec. I may illustrate that by an anecdote concerning an incident in which I took part. I mention it not for the sake of publicity but to show how well we in lower Canada who live in towns where the population is bilingual get along with our friends and neighbours who speak a different tongue and practise a different religion. Some thirteen years ago, when I was mayor of my own town, the Protestant school commission in a neighbouring town decided to erect a new school house. The school house was duly built and was ready for the school term. The commission thought there should be a ceremony of official opening, and for that purpose they invited the mayor of the town, himself English-speaking and Protestant, to perform the ceremony. For some reason he did not turn up, and when the time came to pronounce the school formally open, the school commissioners got together and said, "What shall we do? The mayor is not here." One of them suggested, "Let us ask the mayor of the next town who is present. He is French, a Catholic and a Liberal, but he certainly will not mind opening our school." I accepted the invitation, performed the ceremony and pronounced the school well and truly open, and it has been prosperous ever since. I mention that to show how we get along in lower Canada, because we believe in the bonne entente for the benefit of Canada.

In the life of a country, in its everyday life, there are some moral factors which I am afraid do not receive all the attention they deserve. People have to devote so much time to the daily struggle for existence that they are forcibly compelled to neglect some moral values, and among these moral values education is very often the first victim. Where is there a larger loss to any country than that caused by lack of opportunity, in thousands of cases to young men and young women of talent, who cannot find ways and means of completing their studies? And to my mind the completion of studies does not necessarily mean a university degree; it applies just as well to the young mechanic trying hard to learn a trade and to the young girl seeking the knowledge that will help her honourably to earn a living should she be compelled to work, or to perfect herself in any career of her own choosing.

The loss to Canada from that source is incalculable. It must be appalling. It is utterly impossible to figure it out in terms of money, just as it is impossible to calculate the awful anguish and anxiety suffered by those ambitious and generous young people when they find themselves obliged to give up their studies through lack of money.

And what can be said about the state of mind of the parents? They endure the same sufferings as their children. Often their sole ambition was to have their children properly educated, and if they cannot realize it they feel they have not done their duty towards their children, and that single thought is sufficient to spoil their peace of mind and render them very unhappy.

And right here, sir, let me return to another aspect of the case, the position of the educators. Teaching is a self-denying profession. The rate of remuneration is, in many instances, lamentable. Our colleagues from the west, early in the session, told us of the plight of teachers in the western provinces. I cannot claim that it is any better in the rural districts of Quebec. May I quote from Le Devoir of February 20, 1937, something that appears on page 3. The report is to the effect that Mr. Albini Paquette, secretary of the province and Minister of Health, promised at a meeting of the association of Catholic female teachers, held in Quebec city on February 19, that at this session of the legislature he would introduce a law by which these female teachers would be assured of a minimum salary of $300 a year. I need not comment on that.

Here I want to pay a public tribute to the members of the religious teaching orders. Thousands of men and women, members of religious orders, are teaching in Canada, without regard to pay, actuated only by their confidence in God and the love of their fellow men. I cannot find terms to express adequately the debt of the nation to all our educators lay and religious, and any study of the question is incomplete when it overlooks teachers of all ranks.

It is suggested that scholarships be established by the dominion government. There is already quite a number of endowed scholarships at our universities. The province of Quebec, for years, has awarded scholarships which permit some students from that province to pursue their studies in other Canadian universities or abroad. If anything is done by this government in connection with scholarships, I suggest that special attention should be given to a plan that would permit Canadian students, if they wish to do so, to study at universities other than those in their own provinces. This is a vast country; it takes a whole week by the fastest train to cross from east to west, and it is impossible for most of us to get fully acquainted with other provinces. Time and money as usual are the obstacles. If anything is done to help young men and women in their respective professions to learn more about other provinces, I think we shall have done something towards building up Canada as a nation. Such scholarships—I am speaking of the province of Quebec—are open, I understand, to all, with special consideration to pupils whose families are in difficult circumstances. I do not contend that the system works to perfection, but it has given excellent results in various professions and in the arts as well.

In the discussion of Monday evening on the estimates for the Royal Military College we were reminded that under the British North America Act the control of education had been left to the provinces. The provinces are justly jealous of their rights and are opposed to centralization. On the other hand, so far they have not shown any tendency to refuse grants from the dominion government. In any event it appears to me that any plan under the proposed resolution would have to be worked out in cooperation with the provincial authorities and might consist of special grants, thereby giving every province an opportunity to apply them along the lines they consider best in accordance with their particular genius and their particular ideals. The fact that this involves cooperation with the provinces does not in itself present insuperable difficulties. Roads are a provincial concern; yet the dominion is cooperating with the provinces in the construction of the trans-Canada highway. The provinces have departments of health and so has the dominion government. The provinces have departments of agriculture, and so has the dominion government. Many other similar instances could undoubtedly be cited.

The question of scholarships could, at any rate, be discussed with the educational authorities of the various provinces. Their points of view necessarily have to be obtained and duly considered, because they would not care for any infringement of their rights in regard to education. If this resolution is adopted, it might be brought before the next dominion-provincial conference. The resolution is deserving of serious consideration. It represents idealism in its highest form, service to others for the benefit of the state. It expresses a noble sentiment. It is both humanitarian and patriotic. I hope it will lead to constructive results.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not want to speak at length but I would express on my own behalf and on behalf of the group with which I am associated our support and appreciation of this resolution. The ground has been well covered as to the reasons why the government and people of Canada should consider a system of national scholarships. I do not know whether the mover is aware of the fact that it is by a peculiarly happy coincidence that this resolution should be moved in the middle of the week that has been set aside as education week in Canada.

The idea of scholarships is not at all new A great deal has been said this afternoon about the scholarships in the old land, the scholarships with which I was familiar when I was a boy and later when I was at college there. After all, when we look backward down the long avenues of time; particularly, may I say, when we look into the pages of British history, we find that many of the scholarships and many of the schools in which they are now given originated in mediaeval times, which some people call the dark ages, but which, when we look into them, were not in many respects so very dark after all. There you found the threefold system of education of chivalry, monastery and guild, and if these gave a somewhat lopsided education, nevertheless we can find a great deal of inspiration in such mediaeval movements. In my association with boys and girls throughout the years I have witnessed again and again the tragedy of youth potentially able to absorb education and to develop, being denied the opportunity owing to lack of means. Perhaps our greatest waste in Canada is not the material waste but the intellectual waste so involved. And since this resolution tends to concentrate attention upon the problem, it is justified at this time.

Several times to-day mention has been made of the appropriation for the Royal Military College. That is a precedent which we might well keep in mind. When we consider that we are able to find approximately $360,000 to educate 200 boys in that institution we might well consider setting up for the same amount of money 1,200 scholarships of $300 each to look after some of the underprivileged boys and girls who are deserving of educational opportunities.

Of course I regard higher education as essential to the public good. In fact never in our history did we need a more widespread knowledge of affairs than we do now. For after all, higher education should produce that breadth of mind, that vision, that ability to size a situation up more or less accurately, which seems tragically lacking in these days of difficulty and stress. And when we look at the recent records of our institutions of higher education we find that although traditionally conservative—I use the word in its dictionary sense—they have displayed an unusual amount of progressive leadership in the past few years. It is astonishing to many that in the old university of Oxford, for example, we find some of the most progressive thinkers and writers in the English-speaking world. That is all to the good. The more we can place our youth in contact with ideas and ideals, the more we can develop their ability to think, the healthier and the better will the nation be. It is almost platitudinous I know to repeat a remark made at the close of the war by one of the prophets of our time, Mr. H. G. Wells. He said that we were about to witness a race between education and catastrophe. I think that has been borne out in the days that have followed, and I am afraid that catastrophe is far in the lead.

I do not wish to go into the tragic circumstances of the schools in some parts of Canada; I did that on a former occasion. But I do feel, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) felt, that if we are to keep pace with other progressive nations we have to develop immediately our educational institutions and facilities. I further believe that this will have to be done on a national scale. We have to avoid interference with the provincial educational systems; we have to avoid interference with the rights of minorities, or in some parts even of majorities, but nevertheless we have to expand our facilities for the acquisition of knowledge, and I believe that must be done under some more nearly national system of education.

On behalf of the group with which I am associated I congratulate the mover, the seconder, and all the others who have spoken to this resolution. The debate has been an excellent one, and coming as it has after a hectic week, it has provided I think for all of us something of a relief. On behalf of this group I want to express appreciation of and support for the resolution.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I believe that the house is indebted both to the mover of this resolution (Mr. Martin) and to others who have taken part in the discussion. The subject is one of exceptional interest, an interest which unquestionably has been accentuated owing to the difficult years through which we have been passing. Perhaps as one who was himself a teacher and who, like others in this house, has profited from scholarships, I may claim a peculiar concern in this matter.

In offering my congratulations to the mover of the resolution I would add this further observation: as I heard him I wished that he could have delivered the same address, with the same zeal and conviction, in provincial legislatures throughout this dominion. I also wished that he might have delivered it, if he will permit me to say so, at the annual meetings of many of our large industrial corporations. He has suggested that this resolution should not be considered in any narrow way. I agree with him entirely in that. The question of jurisdiction cannot be altogether avoided. At the same time it would be an evasion of the issue to say that there is any insuperable constitutional obstacle in the way of a grant from the dominion government for this purpose. Nevertheless we are obliged to consider priorities of obligation in connection with the different governments in Canada. And it seems to me that we cannot avoid the question of financial responsibility for the provision of scholarships. Should this obligation be assumed by the universities themselves? To some degree the obligation of providing scholarships has been assumed by universities throughout Canada, as in other countries. But I am far from suggesting that the provision of scholarships by universities has been at all adequate. I believe very strongly that universities in this country could do more than they have done in the way of making scholarships available to graduates of our high schools.

The question also arises as to the assumption of at least a portion of this obligation by individuals and corporations. I am not certain that throughout the discussion enough emphasis has been laid upon that feature of the problem. We are all aware of the fact that in the United States particularly there are educational endowments, established in some cases by individuals and in some by corporations, which have made available large sums of money either for research or for the provision of post graduate scholarships. It has often seemed to me that we in this country have not kept pace with that movement. For example I recall that a strong supporter of national scholarships spoke to me some time ago and told me of a conversation he had had with the head of a large life insurance company in Canada. He said that the head of this large insurance company welcomed the proposal for national scholarships, particularly on the ground that it would provide insurance companies with a larger number of well equipped students in higher mathematics who might become actuaries.

My immediate response to that situation was this: These large life insurance companies in Canada ought to assume at least a part of the obligation to establish scholarships in their special field. I do not think it at all unreasonable that great corporations which have an increasing need for trained students should of themselves establish scholarships, particularly in those branches of study and research relating to their own activities. Personally I should like to see such a development take place in Canada. I am quite aware of the fact that it is said on behalf of some of those corporations that their by-laws do not permit the use of their funds for such purposes. On the other hand there is scarcely a large corporation in the country that does not spend large amounts for advertising purposes. For my own part I cannot think of a better method of advertising on the part of many of these corporations than through the establishment of scholarships of this kind.

I am not going to suggest that the field of education is one which can be clearly defined and restricted for all time. I am very glad indeed that the mover of the resolution himself recognized that the dominion government had made certain important contributions in the direction suggested by the resolution. I should like to bring to the attention of the house what has been done through the National Research Council in recent years. During the nineteen years ending March 31, 1936, the National Research Council has awarded 344 bursaries, 244 studentships and 97 fellowships. These 685 awards were held by 401 persons in nineteen departments of science at twelve Canadian universities. Of these grantees 371 have secured the degree of M.A. or M.Sc. and 260 the degree of Ph.D. I agree with the mover of the resolution that much more could be done in that direction. I will not dispute with him that more has been done in other countries. As I said at the beginning, it is very largely a matter of determining priorities of obligation. The National Research Council, I may say, is now giving further attention to the whole question of scholarships and fellowships, and the provision that has been made for the present year is somewhat in excess of that made for last year.

In considering our obligations, particularly at this time, I do not believe we can ignore the primary obligation we have towards those younger people who are now unemployed. As members of the house will be aware, the speech from the throne contained an explicit reference to measures which would be undertaken for the reestablishment of unemployed young people. I feel quite certain that at this time members of this house and the country generally would feel that this type of assistance should have priority over any far-reaching change in the existing establishment of studentships and fellowships by the National Research Council.

I feel that the mover of the resolution has served a very useful purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I can assure him that the National Research Council is giving careful attention to this whole matter. It does seem to me that the question is one which in its very nature requires the utmost cooperation between governments before there should be any departure from existing policy. I have not raised explicitly the question of provincial jurisdiction, but at the same time I think the dominion government would be in a vastly better position in relation to this proposal if it had been adduced by any of those who have supported the resolution that provincial governments of their own initiative had established either undergraduate or postgraduate scholarships on a substantial scale. The government of Quebec, I believe, is somewhat of an exception in that regard, and some of the provinces that have provincial universities have made a beginning in that direction. So that while the resolution cannot be accepted in its precise terms I can assure the mover that the question is one which has received and is receiving consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, as has been said before, the debate this afternoon has been on an exceedingly high plane, and on behalf of this group I should like to congratulate all hon. members who have spoken. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who introduced the resolution, certainly covered the ground thoroughly, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who has just spoken, has shown that there are factors which make this question more a provincial than a federal matter. But that does not necessarily mean that we should not discuss this question here in order to bring home to the people of Canada the significance and importance of the question which we are facing to-day.

Long ago it was said by a great Greek philosopher that there was no royal road to learning, and in the study of history we find that sometimes the more knowledge people possessed—I am speaking of book knowledge—the more they beclouded or covered up their philosophy with verbosity in their efforts to hoodwink the people. Thus at various periods we have had what we call the worship of books instead of the use of books and the use of real knowledge.

It has been said in this house that the chief trouble is lack of money, and that is so. In the homes of the people who raise large families there is not sufficient money to prepare their children to meet the battle of life as we have to meet it to-day. I have in my hand an educational magazine issued in the province from which I come. On the cover of that magazine are a few words by Mr. J. W. Studebaker, commissioner of education in the United States, which I should like to read:

> When Leonardo da Vinci completed his painting on the wall of the old monastery, he called the monks in to view it. They fell to discussing the beautiful colourings of the tablecloth. Impulsively the great artist took his brush and in their presence dashed it across the tablecloth. Turning to the monks, he said in substance: "I brought you to look upon the face of the Master and you see only the cloth which I had painted upon the table."
> I sometimes wonder if in our profession we do not need a da Vinci to dash his brush across some of the "educational tablecloths" and help us to see more clearly the child.
> Organizations, techniques, methods, buildings, equipment—all of these and many more are essential to educational progress and we must devote our thought and energy to their study and use. They are the tools—the implements—for promoting educational progress. All of these implements must fit into their place in the picture, but with the child always and ever as the centre of interest.

The Minister of Labour showed, in substance, that among educated people unemployment is probably greater than among any other class. Many professional workers of all kinds are unemployed. In most European countries the authorities have recognized the importance of this problem of unemployment among professional workers, and a variety of measures have been adopted with the object of increasing their opportunities.

Whilst I am not speaking against the resolution, yet I feel that a broader vision must be developed. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to a statement by H. G. Wells to the effect that if we do not employ a better system of education we must face catastrophe. It is my view that the whole field of education must receive some attention at the hands not only of the dominion government but of the provincial governments as well, so that we may not be able to say, "O education, what crimes have been committed in thy name!"

Higher education for children in large families must take up an excessive portion of income. It is much to be hoped in the interests of international efficiency and the equalizing of opportunity for the highest education, that the income limits may be generally raised. All young people should be educated to the limit of their capacities, and those who cannot afford to educate themselves, and are worthy of the monetary outlay, should receive some form of scholarship.

In that respect I may add I am not speaking entirely in favour of academic education as it is generally understood to-day. We realize that technical skill, the skill required in household economy and other subjects of a practical kind, are just as important as the skill required in the so-called classical subjects.

Youth itself is seeking further advantages, and lack of employment is keeping the young people at school. If these young people were being educated along the line of scientific research and in fields where their knowledge will be required upon completion of their courses, much would be done to solve the present problem of professional unemployment. It is well known that colleges and universities have continued to turn out graduates trained for professional and technical occupations much faster than they could be absorbed, thereby adding to the number of unemployed. Odd jobs for professional workers are fewer and farther between than in the cases of other workers.

The problem of the professional and technical worker has received much less attention in Canada than in most other countries. The evolution of technical methods and customs undermined the demand for their services in the same way that the development of automatic machinery limited the jobs of manual workers. The effect of the development of mechanical music upon employment among musicians is well known.

In connection with the defence estimates which we were discussing Monday and yesterday, it was evident that we should develop an air consciousness in our people. This could readily be done by the development of our commercial airways. It is quite evident to-day that travel is as cheap, as efficient and as comfortable by air as by any other way. However, the railways as at present conducted are not a paying proposition, and more competition from airways would render the payment of dividends upon the investment in railways still less likely. Consequently members of the house persistently think in terms of communication as we have it to-day instead of in terms of the efficiency that could be developed by the technological improvements now available for our use.

We should regard education as a continuous adjustment of the individual to life, which means more and more an adjustment to make proper use of leisure time. People must have the right aspirations so that they will have something specific to think about. It has been said that England's greatest battles have been won on her playing fields; it might also be said that Canada's greatest battles will be won in her class rooms. Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock.

[Mr. Hayhurst.]

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 25, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 36, for the relief of Charles Marsh Doxsey.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 37, for the relief of Phyllis Stanners Kitchin, otherwise known as Judith Stanners Kitchin.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 38, for the relief of Ivy Jackson Beaulne.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 39, for the relief of Charlotte Opal Moore Norton.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 40, for the relief of Mildred Tannenbaum Sufrin.—Mr. Jacobs.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—SECRETARY

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Is Clive B. Davidson presently engaged as secretary of the Canadian Wheat Board?
2. If so, at what salary?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.
2. $6,800 per annum.

BINDER TWINE EXPORTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. WARD:

1. Did the Canadian manufacturers, in the years 1927 or 1928, export binder twine to Russia?
2. If so, what quantity was so exported?
3. Was the price per pound charged the Russian government more or less than the prevailing wholesale price in Canada at that time?
4. If so, what was such difference?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.
2. 1927, 114,934 cwt.; 1928, 57,637 cwt.

3 and 4. No information.

NATIONAL PARKS WORKERS—SALARY DEDUCTION

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Was the hourly rate of pay to workers in national parks reduced on April 1, 1932?
2. If so, who reduced it?
3. What department or agency in Canada possesses the power and authority to set this wage rate?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Pursuant to Salary Deduction Act.

3. The governor general in council—the rates are based on the wage scale prevailing in the district.

MARKET GARDENING PRODUCTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the approximate value of the market gardening products of Canada in 1935; also in 1936?

2. What was the value of the market gardening products of the province of Quebec in 1935; also in 1936?

Mr. ROGERS: Approximate value of market garden vegetable crops in Canada: 1935, no information; 1936, $20,000,000.

Value of market garden vegetable crops in Quebec: 1935, $5,442,000; 1936, $6,221,000.

LA SALLE—250TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. MALLETTE:

1. Will the 250th anniversary of the death of René Robert Cavelier de la Salle be officially recognized on March 19 next?

2. Is the government aware that the state of Louisiana is making preparations to celebrate this anniversary?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. It is the intention of the government to recognize the 250th anniversary of his death by providing for the erection, this year, of a memorial to La Salle.

2. Yes.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What was the total expenditure for the National Research Council since June, 1935?

2. Did that council make any scientific discovery during that period?

3. If so, what member or employee of that council made it, what was it, and when was it made?

Mr. ROGERS: Return tabled herewith.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, among my New Year's resolutions was a secret undertaking that my budget speech this year should be brief. I must confess, however, that this resolution has suffered the fate of many of its companions. In preparing a budget, a bewildering array of complex questions demand attention, if one is to give a reasonably complete and accurate statement of the economic and financial position of Canada in these difficult years. To abbreviate further the statement which I now offer would mean presenting to this house something less than is expected in an annual review of this kind. But, Mr. Speaker, if I cannot bring you greater brevity than last year, perhaps I can bring you greater cheer.

A year ago I was able to show that the state of business and trade was generally encouraging and suggested that we might reasonably expect throughout the year a strengthening and broadening out of the forces of recovery then clearly in evidence. My expectations of a year ago have been amply realized. The last twelve months have witnessed a continued and increasing vigour in the recovery movement, and the gratifying evidence of expanding business activity and more widely distributed economic betterment stands clearly recorded. In many directions the gains have exceeded expectations. The strength of Canada's recuperative power, the success of our constructive efforts, both as individuals and as governments, and the improvement in world economic conditions generally are seen in the growing volume of newly created wealth finding broader domestic and foreign markets and in the renewed spirit of confidence and enterprise on the part of our people.

I shall have occasion later to refer to the less satisfactory aspects of current developments and to certain signals which may point to danger ahead. Viewing the situation broadly, however, in the light of the progress of the past year and the major underlying forces at work, I believe I can fairly say that since 1929 no New Year has dawned with brighter promise for Canada. I shall be greatly disappointed if, by this time next year, Canada has not moved substantially further along the road of economic recovery.

I shall now present, with as little resort to statistics as possible, a few of the more significant evidences of our economic progress during the past year. Consider, first, our most comprehensive measure of economic activity in Canada, the index of the physical volume of business. This index is made up from forty-five important factors, and measures the physical volume of output in nearly all our leading industries as well as freight traffic on our railways, construction activity, and domestic trade. At the low point of the depression in February, 1933, this index had fallen to 67 as compared with 100 in 1926. The average level of this same index for the final quarter of 1936 was 119·3, an improvement of over 78 per cent from the low point and of more than 10 per cent as compared with the last quarter of 1935. The preliminary index for January, 1937, the latest month for which the figure is available, stood at 117·3 as compared with 106·2 in January, 1936.

This substantial improvement in business as a whole is confirmed by other broad indicators of general economic activity such as electric power production and carloadings. During 1936, the output of electric power established a new record, the total being 8·9 per cent higher than that for 1935, which was the previous record year. During 1936 also the railways carried more freight, total carloadings increasing by 5½ per cent. The improvement in carloadings has been greatly accelerated since the beginning of the year. Total cars loaded in January, 1937, exceeded the figure for January, 1936, by about 20 per cent, and were greater than in any previous January since 1931. Railway freight traffic is still substantially below the volume of the years 1926-29, but the return of normal grain crops in the west and restoration of construction activity with normal building material shipments would eliminate much of this differential and produce a radical change in the earning position of the two railway systems.

Manufacturing of all kinds showed a generally well-sustained growth during the past year. The gain over the preceding year was 10 per cent, and the output was greater than for any previous year since 1929. Output of automobiles was somewhat lower in 1936 than in 1935, but this was due to the production of some of the new 1936 models in the fall of 1935. In the case of pig iron and steel production, one of our major capital goods industries, the upward trend is now clearly defined, steel output rising by 18 per cent in 1936 to the highest point since 1929. In general, the capital goods industries which normally suffer so severely in depressions and thus contribute so greatly to the spread of unemployment, have in the past year shown a marked increase in activity, recording gains in output of over 8 per cent. This improvement, which may be regarded as one of the most significant features of the recovery in 1936, may reasonably be expected to be accelerated during the present year, as the latent demands arising from equipment replacements and plant extensions exert further impetus.

Activity in the forest products industries throughout 1936 showed truly remarkable gains over 1935, the general index for this group having moved up more than 25 per cent from December, 1935, to December, 1936. In British Columbia the lumber cut increased by about 15 per cent. Exports of planks and boards to the United States increased by more than 55 per cent as compared with 1935, while sales to the United Kingdom were almost 40 per cent higher. Expanding output has brought a most heartening increase of employment in logging. The seasonally adjusted index for the final quarter of 1936 recorded an average improvement of more than 28 per cent over the same period in 1935. Since the turn of the year, unfortunately, activity in the industry has been retarded because of weather conditions—too much snow in some sections, too little in others.

The production of newsprint in Canada soared to a new high point in 1936 with an output of more than 3,200,000 tons. This represents a gain of 16 per cent over 1935, and of 66 per cent over 1932, the low year of the depression in this industry. This output means that Canadian mills operated at an average of over 82 per cent of rated effective capacity for the year as a whole, and at 91 per cent of rated effective capacity in the last quarter. The increase in demand for Canadian newsprint, chiefly in the United States but also to an increasing extent in other world markets, and the probability of a moderate rise in prices augur well for the immediate future of this important industry which for so long has suffered from actual or threatened bankruptcy.

An ever-mounting total of wealth continues to flow from our mines. In 1936 the value of our output reached the imposing total of over $360,000,000, an increase of more than 15 per cent over that for 1935, the previous peak year for mineral output in Canada. At current production levels our mines are turning out wealth at the rate of a million dollars a day. While gold continues to hold the spotlight with an output of $130,000,000 in 1936, or double that of ten years ago, and with many new mines still coming into production, yet the other metals, such as nickel, copper, lead and zinc, are finding an increasingly important place in the growing volume of our mineral exports. Canada's base metal industry has undergone remarkable changes in the last ten years as the result of an expenditure of almost $100,000,000 in plant extension and equipment and the coordination of mining, smelting, refining, fabricating and marketing facilities. In the production of nickel, lead, zinc, the platinum metals, asbestos and salt, new all-time records were established in 1936 and the output of coal was greater than in any previous year since 1929. As in the case of the lumber industry, the mining industry in its expansion is showing a steadily mounting pay-roll. The seasonally adjusted index of employment in mining was over 12 per cent higher in December, 1936, than in December, 1935, while the index of employment in metal ores moved up about 20 per cent during the past year. It is extremely gratifying to note this movement of our people into primary industries, where they find profitable occupation in the output of natural products with which Canada is so bountifully supplied.

Agricultural production suffered in 1936 through unfavourable weather during the growing season. Improved prices, however, resulted in a money return for field crops greater than in any year since 1930, amounting to approximately $600,000,000, an increase of about 17 per cent over 1935.

With regard to wheat, the 1936 yield was about 52·7 million bushels below that of 1935, and was the smallest crop since 1919. Drought conditions again played havoc in certain areas, destroying crops completely in some districts and reducing to meagre levels the yield in others. In spite of the smaller 1936 yield, however, the value of this crop was substantially above the value of the 1935 crop due to greatly enhanced prices, which are again reaching levels which promise more profitable and stable conditions for the western farmer.

During 1936 an increasing volume of live stock was marketed, but with prices slightly less favourable than those prevailing in the previous year. The bureau of statistics' index of live stock sales rose over 12 per cent above the previous year's average. For the dairy industry generally, prices were moderately higher during the past year. There was a striking increase in cheese exports, and the volume moving abroad in 1936 was more than double the amount exported in 1935 with prices higher than at any time since 1930.

Recent price movements have operated distinctly in the direction of reducing the farmer's handicap. As the house well knows, the farmer was particularly hard hit in the collapse of prices following 1929, and we find that by 1932 the average level of prices for farm products was down to 48·4 per cent of the average level in 1926. Since that time, however, prices have greatly improved, particularly in the past year, and by the end of 1936 this index had moved up to 82·4. While prices of things which the farmer sells have been moving upward, there has been relatively little change in the prices of things which he buys. In fact, taking 1926 prices as equal to 100, we find the retail price index in December, 1936, standing at 81·8, while, as noted above, prices of agricultural products had reached the 82·4 level, after a rapid rise in the last few months of the year. At the end of 1936, therefore, the farmer's relative position, as far as prices were concerned, was slightly better than in 1926. Wide disparity between prices of primary and finished products is perhaps the most significant feature of what we call a depression, and it is greatly to be hoped that this approximate parity between agricultural and other prices can be maintained.

The general level of wholesale prices which had been remarkably stable in Canada since 1933 has finally begun to move sharply upwards. During 1934, 1935, and the first half of 1936, the bureau's index fluctuated narrowly around 72 per cent of the 1926 level. In the last half of 1936, however, the wholesale price index rose by over 10 per cent to 79·7 at the close of the year, an upturn that has restored wholesale prices to the level prevailing at the end of 1930. This rise in prices is a world-wide condition and the forces which have brought it about continue to be effective. One may express the hope that such forces may not be allowed to get out of hand. While they may correct the economic disparities from which we have recently suffered, and while they may give every evidence of abounding prosperity for a time, they are likely, if the pace is too rapid, to create new disparities and plunge us once more into the throes of depression.

An obvious indicator of the general state of our economic health is the volume of dividend distributions by corporations. It is gratifying to report, therefore, that reliable estimates of profits for the past year were the highest since 1930, and reveal an increase of more than 13 per cent over the 1935 total. An unofficial index of dividends distributed stood at 117 for December, 1936, against 100·1 for December, 1935, and 62·5 at the low point in August, 1933. Profits are the mainspring of economic activity in the system under which we operate. Increasing profits are therefore the best augury for increasing employment, the best indication of the approach of the day when private industry will be able to release governmental bodies from the enormous burden which they have had to bear in recent years.

In the financial field, conditions have remained generally favourable. The year 1936 witnessed a striking increase in the volume of capital issues publicly floated. Bond issues publicly offered in Canada for new capital and for refunding purposes, excluding treasury bill issues, are estimated to have reached a total of $715,000,000 as compared with $541,000,000 for the previous year, an increase of over 32 per cent. Of this 1936 total, $242,000,000 was for new capital and $473,000,000 for refunding purposes. Financing for private corporations accounted for $232,000,000 of the total in 1936, or more than five times the total of such financing during 1935. The increasing volume of such private corporate issues and the increasing proportion of such issues offered for new capital purposes are healthy signs.

This heavy volume of bond flotations is in part a reflection of prevailing low interest rates. The wages of money, as measured by the yield on high grade bonds, averaged lower in 1936 than at any time since before the war. These low rates have made it possible for the dominion government and for the eastern provinces to refund outstanding obligations and to raise new funds at record low cost. For short term money the dominion is paying on a yield basis of approximately three-quarters of 1 per cent per annum, while on long term issues the rate has been only slightly over 3 per cent. Except for an interruption in September and October, the trend of high grade bond prices was steadily upward during 1936. An unusual number of actual or pending flotations and fears engendered by the weak financial position of certain western provinces, coupled with unfavourable developments in foreign markets, have caused some hardening of the rates during the past month. The somewhat lower levels of bond prices resulting have attracted renewed investment buying and yields on high grade securities for the most part are still slightly above the levels prevailing a year ago. The continuance of interest rates on substantially the present basis will foster economic recovery by encouraging private enterprise to expand existing equipment and undertake new projects on a low capital cost basis.

It is unfortunately true, however, that the financial position of several of our provincial governments is such that they are unable to take advantage of prevailing low interest rates in order either to reduce their fixed charges by refunding outstanding debt or to obtain new funds for relief and other expenditures. Despite drastic efforts to reduce expenditures and increase taxes, and despite a long record of honourable dealing with their creditors, they have been unable either to balance their budgets or to have recourse to the investment market for the funds necessary to meet their commitments.

[Mr. Dunning.]

This is a problem to which the government has given the most serious and unremitting attention since the day it assumed office. I need not recount the efforts which were made last year to find a solution. The plan then evolved which would have made low rates available to the provinces as a result of dominion assistance under appropriate safeguards, proved unacceptable in several quarters. The acute stage which the problem has reached in Manitoba and Saskatchewan during the recent past led the government to make the decision which was announced by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the house last week. That decision followed investigations which demonstrated what had long been recognized as a fundamental weakness in the allocation of financial powers and responsibilities to the provincial governments by the fathers of confederation seventy years ago. The revenue-raising powers assigned to the provinces do not appear to be commensurate with the responsibilities which they were given or which they have assumed in an age of increasing provision for governmental social services. It is a basic principle that a government should be able to stand financially upon its own feet—that it should itself be responsible for raising the revenue necessary to meet its own needs. I look therefore with great confidence to the results of the investigation into this whole problem to be made by the royal commission which is to be appointed. If this investigation and report are as competent, as impartial and as constructive as the occasion demands, they may well serve to point the way to such action as to make the year 1937 as significant in Canadian history as the year 1867.

In this connection may I pay tribute to the assistance given by the Bank of Canada in conducting the preliminary investigation of the financial position of these two provinces at the request of their governments and of this government. The province of Alberta has now requested a similar investigation. As the house knows, the bank has power to act, upon request, as the fiscal agent and the adviser of any provincial government. We now have an illustration of the important contribution which the bank may make to the financial welfare of the dominion merely by providing a source of competent and disinterested advice to our major governments.

Our banking system currently finds itself with ample reserves for the accommodation of commercial borrowers. While the volume of commercial loans is abnormally low, there have recently been indications of growth, and a moderate increase is expected during the present year. Contrary to the prevailing belief in some quarters, the banks will heartily welcome the opportunity thus provided to invest their funds at somewhat higher rates than have recently been available on gilt-edge securities. It is also encouraging to note in recent banking statistics that debits to individual bank accounts in the clearing house centres of Canada—in other words, the cheques drawn by the public on their bank accounts—showed an increase in December, 1936, of 16 per cent over December, 1935. We have to go back to 1930 to find an annual volume of debits exceeding the level reached last year. This indicates, Mr. Speaker, that the velocity of circulation of cheque-book money is speeding up with the rising tempo of business activity and the increase in public confidence.

This is the factor so frequently forgotten by advocates of monetary panaceas. The volume of money-work done is the product of the amount of money multiplied by its velocity of circulation. An arbitrary increase in the amount of money by the fiat of a government is likely to defeat its object by a proportionate or more than proportionate decrease in the velocity factor. If the increase in the volume of money continues beyond a certain but unpredictable point, public confidence is lost altogether and a flight from money occurs. In the early stages of a severe and prolonged depression credit expansion may be an essential weapon to combat the deflationary forces at work. It must, however, be recognized as a very dangerous weapon requiring the use of expert technique as well as great wisdom and caution. The control of the volume of money and credit with a view to mitigating the extremes of booms and depressions is one of the primary functions of a central bank. The easy money policy which has been followed in the recent past is, in my opinion, an illustration of appropriate action in a time of depression. There will come a time, however, and it may come more quickly than many of us expect, when precisely the opposite policy will have to be followed, if the best interests of the country are to be served.

Monetary policy has a role to play during depressions. That role is an important one; although I am bound to say that as a medicine for depressions monetary techniques are far more effective when applied before rather than after the event. During the present depression, more deliberate use has been made of monetary devices and remedies than in any previous depression. This is largely to be explained by the great advances made in monetary theory and central banking practice during the post-war years and, in so far as Canada is concerned, by the fact that we have only recently been building up the necessary mechanisms for control. But monetary policy should not be regarded as a panacea. It can, at best, only create conditions favourable to sound development. In a constructive program it should merely take its place as part of a much larger whole. Fundamentally our need is an increase in our aggregate national income—an increase in material wealth, not a different yardstick by which to measure it. Real purchasing power consists in goods and services produced, not in the number of monetary tickets which are used to facilitate the exchange of these goods and services.

An increase in our national wealth and income can best be secured by facilitating the production of the many things which Canada is best fitted to produce; and by exchanging these products on as large a scale as possible for products which Canada cannot advantageously produce. To these objectives the government has been energetically devoting itself by opening up and expanding foreign markets for our basic products, by stimulating employment in productive lines, and by endeavouring to eliminate uncertainty and fear which paralyze initiative and retard industrial enterprise. The success of these efforts is indicated in part at least—for I do not wish to claim for the government all the credit for the recovery which we have enjoyed— in the statistics which I have already given, indicating encouraging expansion in nearly all lines of productive activity. These statistics are confirmed by preliminary estimates of the national income for 1936. By national income I mean the income of all the people of Canada—I am not using it in the sense of governmental income. These estimates indicate a total of $4,520,000,000 as compared with $4,094,000,000 in 1935. This is an increase of over 10 per cent in the national income, that is, the aggregate of the individual incomes of all the people. It is an increase in real purchasing power, created not merely by writing up a credit to ourselves in our national bank account but by providing profitable opportunities for the production of goods and services. While there is still a substantial distance to go, this advance, like the others which I have recorded, is impressive and gratifying

In surveying the general outlook, however, we must not close our eyes to the fact that business cycles in their course from depression to full recovery never completely conform to an established pattern. We cannot deduce from past experience that the upward movement must inevitably continue or that it will proceed evenly and satisfactorily in all directions. The point I am making is this, that while the general movement is at present strongly upward, yet we must not lightly assume that we have solved our problems, or that we have by any means reached the stage where we can relax our vigilance or our economies. We must not lose sight of the fact that, in certain fields, improvement has lagged, and that to a large number of our people the recovery of business has not yet brought the expected relief. In other directions there is more than a suggestion of a mentality that led to the deplorable excesses in the late twenties. Greed and unreasonableness in industrial relations are dangers that can paralyze our best efforts. There are forces unleashed in the recovery period that must be grappled with no less vigorously than those facing us in times of depression. These realities must not be neglected. Furthermore, disturbing factors in international relations still perpetuate much uncertainty in the world outlook. To these less favourable factors I wish to devote a few moments.

Apart from those sections of our agricultural industry which have suffered from the ravages of drought, the most conspicuous laggard among our major industries has been private construction. While there was a very slight improvement in total private building, and a moderate increase in residential and industrial building, the bureau's index for construction activity averaged slightly lower in 1936 than in 1935, and stood at the deplorably low level of 49·8. The value of contracts awarded amounted to only $162,000,000 as compared with an average of $428,000,000 in the prosperous years from 1925 to 1929. This is especially unfortunate in view of the fact that so large a proportion of our unemloyment is to be found in the construction trades and the industries dependent upon them. It was for this reason that the home improvement plan has been devised and it is confidently hoped that during the next twelve months it will lead to a substantial volume of repair and modernization work which will transfer skilled craftsmen from relief rolls to pay-rolls, and at the same time serve to protect and increase the value of an important capital asset, the homes of our people.

As already indicated, the betterment and extension of industrial plant and equipment should also make a larger contribution to employment and business activity during the present year. Improvement should also occur in the field of housing construction, long retarded by uncertainty as to continuance of employment and particularly by high real estate taxation. It is obvious, however, that these difficulties are in part at least the result of a vicious circle. Real estate taxes are high, for instance, because relief costs are high; relief costs are high because unemployment is heavy; and unemployment is heavy, to an important extent, because the building industry is inactive. Conversely, the building industry is inactive because all these other things are true. We are now reaching the stage in the recovery movement when this vicious circle must be broken. In my opinion, therefore, it behooves every branch of the construction industry, including the lending institutions which finance the repair and erection of houses, to study the facilities now available through the government's housing programs and to use the utmost ingenuity in providing a sound product at a reasonable price and in selling that product to the ultimate consumer. Public works construction cannot be continued indefinitely on the scale of recent years without building up an intolerable burden for the future. If it must be kept up in the late stages of a recovery movement, what hope can there be that governments will be in a position to use public works requirements as a reserve against future depression?

If the construction industry makes the effort which I have indicated, and if it receives, as it should, the hearty cooperation of the general public, the results will go far to solve the next problem with which I wish to deal, that of unemployment and relief. The bureau of statistics publishes monthly an index of employment which is reasonably representative of all industries. It is based on returns submitted by about 10,000 firms employing approximately 1,000,000 persons. After adjustment for seasonal variations, this index stood at 111·1 for January of this year. Compared with January, 1935, this represented an improvement of about 5 per cent. In the field of manufacturing, employment moved up 6 per cent. In lumbering and mining, as mentioned previously, it showed substantial gains, while wholesale and retail trade employment in December was at the highest December figure on record. In the construction and maintenance industries, however, the index showed an actual decrease of employment which brought down the general average.

The disheartening aspect of these figures, however, is the obvious failure of employment to keep pace with the striking gains in business activity previously reported. Partial explanation of this is to be found in the substitution of full-time for part-time work and in the taking up of the "slack" which previously existed as a result of redundant staffs maintained by many employers who were reluctant to dismiss employees not really needed. For the rest, the explanation rests upon the progress of invention and the improvement in technical and managerial processes. To this extent it is a phenomenon which is usually met with in the early stages of recovery from depression. As it indicates an increased efficiency in the productive mechanism, its results are not to be deplored. Its ill effects are temporary; in the long run it increases employment by cheapening production and expanding consumer purchasing power. As recovery gathers momentum, increases in employment will tend to conform more closely to expansion in business activity.

Still more disheartening to most observers is the failure of the numbers on relief to decline proportionately with the revival of business. The registration of relief recipients maintained by the national employment commission, the results of which are now available on a preliminary basis for last month, indicates that as compared with January, 1936, heads of families on relief rolls in January, 1937, had decreased by 8 per cent and the total number of individuals on relief by 5 per cent. Excluding those on relief in the drought area, the respective declines were 11 per cent and 7½ per cent. These decreases are of sufficient importance to confirm our belief that with expanding activity, industry will be able to re-absorb at least that portion of our relief recipients who are employable. However, to those observers who look for an early end to the relief problem the decline during the past year will appear discouragingly small. In addition to the factors mentioned above, the explanation for the slow rate of reabsorption is to be found in the fact that the new jobs opening up are being taken in large part by persons who were unemployed but not on relief, and by the new recruits who annually leave our schools and colleges to join the ranks of industrial workers.

It is probably true, Mr. Speaker, that a hard core of unemployment and relief will always remain. Doubtless there will be a number of those in the higher age brackets, who have been on relief for several years, who may be permanently "unemployable." Even in the best of times, we have always had unemployment, but the unemployed have not been "in the statistics" nor a charge upon public funds to the same extent as to-day. The depression will leave us with a new problem which will demand new methods of treatment from the appropriate authorities.

I am convinced, however, that in the policies now being followed and in the economic forces now working with increasing momentum, the present and major problem will rapidly be reduced to manageable proportions. The real solution must come, and is coming, through the expansion of private enterprise, based on conditions favourable to the more extensive development of our primary and other industries. The fostering of private construction along sound lines, as already indicated, will also make an important contribution. As real purchasing power thus created becomes more broadly diffused throughout our economy, we will find the problem of relief dwindling in its proportions. In the meanwhile, the situation also demands important supplementary activities such, for instance, as the national employment commission is sponsoring as part of its contribution to the solution of this national problem. I refer particularly to the farm placement scheme, the home improvement plan, the coordination of the efforts of various governmental bodies and private organizations with regard to youth, the organization of community cooperation, and measures designed to bring about a more efficient and economical administration of direct relief.

It may seem ironical for me to sound a warning about a problem of prosperity whilst we are still harassed by the problems of depression. Evidence is accumulating, however, of the prevalence of a state of mind which justifies a warning signal. If we may judge by the activity in brokerage offices, the rapid rise in stock market prices, and the ratio of stock prices, particularly in some sections of the market, to nearby earnings and dividend prospects, we are forced to recognize a revival of that get-rich-quick spirit which proved so disastrous in the pre-depression years. As business activity increases and especially if the commodity price level shows a rapid rise, this speculative fever is likely to become more widespread and more hectic, creating false standards of value and an unbalanced development with their inevitable aftermath. It is not too early, therefore, to call attention to these potential dangers and to express the hope that adequate measures may be taken with sufficient promptness to keep unsound developments in check. The Bank of Canada has the power to control the total volume of credit in circulation, but if the amount of credit flowing into the special channel of speculation is to be regulated there will be needed the effective cooperation of the stock exchanges and the banking institutions which will be called upon increasingly to finance speculative activity. We are, I hope, too close to 1929 to forget the necessity of ordered progress and well-balanced development.

Finally, a word as to the international situation. On the financial and economic side, the year has brought much of encouragement. Perhaps the most significant development in this connection was the devaluation of the gold currencies of continental Europe. After years of resistance, during which continuing deflation in an important area constituted an important barrier to world recovery, most of these "gold bloc" countries finally took the inevitable step and adjusted their monetary units in order to correct the overvaluation of their exchanges. In this operation they were assisted by an international understanding that the United States, Great Britain and France would use all available means for keeping their currencies approximately stable in terms of each other. This cooperative agreement, which Holland and Switzerland have since joined, marks a notable advance in international collaboration in the field of monetary management. Not only has the devaluation thus effected with international support resulted in a greater degree of stability and certainty in exchange rates but it has placed the economic structure of the gold bloc countries in a position of better equilibrium with other countries, an essential condition for sound world recovery. It has also removed one of the major reasons for the exchange controls, quota arrangements and other restrictions which have been strangling international trade. Already some tentative steps have been taken in certain European countries to relax tariff barriers and trade restrictions. International trade has felt some impetus from this stimulus as well as from the greater stability in exchange markets and particularly from the rise in world prices for primary commodities.

World trade as a whole, however, has not made the progress which one might have hoped for, and in some areas there are still evidences of financial or economic strain. Nevertheless, in most countries, as in Canada, the signs point to continued progress if only peace can be preserved and political friction reduced. Looking back on 1936, however, one cannot pretend that political progress has kept pace with economic improvement. War and the fear of war appear to loom larger in men's eyes than at any time in recent years. Rival ideologies clash in the press and the chancellories of Europe; doubt appears to have been cast for the moment at least upon the value of cooperative undertakings and the sanctity of international commitments; and an increasing proportion of national income goes into expenditure for armaments. Regret it as we must, realism compels us to face the facts squarely and take these potential dangers into our reckoning when we look to the future. Perhaps the best hope for peace lies in the fact that the dangers are so clearly realized. Where all can see the danger it may not be too much to hope that sufficient wisdom will be found among the nations to avert catastrophe.

I propose on this occasion to defer the review of the growth in our foreign trade and also of our treaty negotiations with other countries until I have discussed the public accounts for the year.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1936-37

With reference to the government accounts, may I first point out that, because of the early date at which the budget is being brought down, the figures which I shall present for the current fiscal year ending March 31 next are estimates only. I trust that our estimates of revenue and expenditure will be very close to the actual results disclosed when the books for the year are closed, but it will be recognized that they are approximations only and, also, that it is especially difficult at this time to present our annual balance sheet.

Following the procedure of last year, I shall first, with the permission of the house, place on Hansard a number of tables giving a complete summary of revenues and expenditures under the various categories and of the total deficit or increase of net debt for the current year, together with comparative figures for the four preceding fiscal years. The tables follow:

REVENUES 1936-37

For the year as a whole, we estimate that total revenue from taxation and all other sources will aggregate $452,123,000. This total is almost $80,000,000 in excess of that for the preceding fiscal year and is exceeded by the revenues of only one other year in the history of the dominion, the fiscal year ended March 31, 1929, when total collections slightly exceeded $460,000,000. Looking at it from another point of view, it represents an increase of 45 per cent as compared with 1932-33, the low year of the depression. While taxpayers may greet this news with mixed feelings, I think it will be generally accepted as a striking tribute to the recuperative powers of the Canadian economy and a convincing confirmation of the reality of the economic recovery which I have outlined in the earlier part of this address. This increase of course is due to the increased taxes imposed last year, but essentially, expanding government revenues reflect and confirm the increase in national income.

The revenue from all tax sources will amount to $384,618,000, an increase of $67,306,000 over last year. To this increase, all our major forms of taxation contributed.

The sales tax is now the largest single source of government revenues. For the year we estimate a total yield from this tax of $115,500,000 an increase of $37,948,000 over the preceding year. As the rate of this tax was raised last year from 6 to 8 per cent, it may be estimated, assuming no retarding effect on business from the higher rate, that $28,875,000 of the increase was due to the increase in rate and the remainder to the improvement in business activity and to higher price levels.

The second largest producer of revenue was the income tax, which we estimate will yield during the current year $102,000,000. This is also a gratifying increase over the previous year—$19,290,000—and is attributable largely to the improvement in corporate and individual incomes, although the increase of 1½ per cent in the corporate income tax rate is estimated to be responsible for approximately $5,840,000 of the increase. Of the total receipts, $58,400,000 will come from corporations, $8,700,000 from the five per cent tax on interest and dividends, and $34,900,000 from the tax on individual incomes.

Excise duties, imposed chiefly on liquors and tobacco, are expected to yield $45,500,000, an increase of slightly over $1,000,000 as compared with last year.

Receipts from customs duties show an increase of almost $7,500,000. Last year you will recall that $74,004,000 was derived from this source as compared with $76,562,000 during the preceding year. We estimate a total yield this year of $81,500,000. While this is still less than half the customs revenue received during 1929 or even 1920, the increase this year amounted to 10 per cent, and there is evidence of an increasing rate of gain during recent months.

Special excise taxes will show an increase from $35,181,000 to $38,100,000. This increase is accounted for chiefly by increased receipts from the 3 per cent special excise tax on importations and the tax on transfer of securities. There was a slight decrease in receipts from the tax on bank notes due to the statutory decrease in chartered bank note circulation.

Non-tax revenues, that is, the revenues derived from investments and various departmental services, are expected to aggregate $58,770,000, an increase of $3,860,000 over the previous year. The largest increase in this group will be attributable to post office revenues which are estimated at $34,310,000 as compared with $32,508,000 for the year 1935-36. The nominal surplus on post office operations is estimated at $1,893,000. In calculating this surplus we have included in expenditures of the department the cost of civil government. It has frequently been pointed out, however, that the post office accounts do not provide, on the expenditure side, for the rental value and other costs of premises occupied and equipment used, nor on the revenue side do they include any credit to the post office for services rendered to other departments through the free use of the mails.

During the current fiscal year, we estimate that special receipts and other credits will total $8,735,000, as compared with $374,000 the previous year. This is mainly accounted for by the fact that we expect to take into our revenues $8,000,000 received from the Canadian Wheat Board which will represent an offset in part to the disbursement of $15,856,000 which we provided for last year to recoup the Board for the net liability assumed when it acquired the wheat and wheat contracts held by Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited in connection with the 1930 wheat pool and stabilization account. It is a matter of congratulation that a liability to our national finances of menacing proportions has been removed. At the close of the last fiscal year the position was such that the government felt it essential not only to pay to the board the $15,856,000 referred to above, but the further substantial liability shown on the board's books on the basis of closing market prices on March 31, 1936, made it appear almost inevitable that an additional heavy loss would have to be provided for again this year. We were criticized for the provision then made. We were told that we should await the complete disposal of the board's holdings before providing for any losses. It seemed to me, then, and it seems to me now, that it was only the part of ordinary business prudence to make at least a partial provision for what appeared likely to be a heavy loss. No one is happier than I am to-day to be able to welcome back to the treasury, as a result of good luck and sound policy, a portion of the funds then disbursed.

EXPENDITURES—1936-37

In dealing with expenditures, I wish to emphasize again the importance of concentrating on the aggregate of our expenditures of all kinds and on our over-all deficit rather than on ordinary expenditures and the surplus or deficit on ordinary account. However, for the purpose of analyzing details and making comparisons with previous years, I shall first present the expenditures under the five main categories in which they are now classified in the public accounts.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

The ordinary expenditures for the year are estimated at a total of $391,860,000. This is $19,321,000 in excess of the expenditures for 1935-36. As ordinary revenues are estimated at $443,388,000, the so-called surplus on ordinary account would be $51,528,000, as compared with a deficit on ordinary account last year of $317,000. As I have indicated, however, this surplus on ordinary account has only slight significance under present conditions.

The largest increase in ordinary expenditures is in the cost of old age pensions, which are estimated for the current fiscal year at $22,500,000, as compared with $16,764,000 last year. Most of this increase of $5,736,000 is explained by the participation this year for the first time of the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick in the old age pensions arrangement. Other important increases were $6,320,000 in the cost of national defence (including civil aviation); $2,856,000 in interest on the public debt; $1,698,000 in ordinary expenditures on public works; $1,889,000 in the expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce; and finally, an increase of $979,000 in the ordinary costs of post office operations.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Total expenditures charged to capital account will amount to only $3,447,000, a decrease of $3,097,000 as compared with the year 1935-36. The chief item is $3,178,000 for public works construction.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

We come now to that important group of items which are classified as special expenditures, and which this year relate solely to disbursements made for unemployment relief purposes. During the year 1936-37 special expenditures are expected to aggregate $80,429,000. The decrease of $21,618,000 as compared with the total for 1935-36 is wholly explained by the absence this year of any disbursements for grain marketing losses. Under the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, total expenditures are expected to reach $46,064,000. Of this total $28,930,000 will be accounted for by grants-in-aid to the provinces for direct relief; $14,159,000 by the dominion's share of joint dominion-provincial projects; and $2,750,000 by the cost of the special railway maintenance program which it will be recalled was designed to provide work for single homeless unemployed men formerly taken care of by the relief camps.

The serious drought which developed in the three Prairie provinces last summer necessitated relief on so extensive a scale that the government felt obligated to regard the condition as a national emergency and as one therefore which called for special dominion assistance. To meet this unforeseen and emergent problem, funds were appropriated by governor general's warrants to a total amount of $12,240,000 in order chiefly to pay for the cost involved in purchasing and distributing feed and fodder for live stock in the drought-stricken area and the cost of providing direct relief to families living in the area. Agreements were entered into with the three provinces under which the dominion agreed to bear 100 per cent of the cost of direct relief in the drought area as defined, 100 per cent of the cost of feed and fodder for live stock, and 50 per cent of the cost of moving live stock into other feeding areas and of the losses involved in shipping low grade cattle out of the drought area to packing companies for conversion into tankage and boneless beef. These agreements contained special provisions for the protection of the government through the assistance of representatives of the comptroller of the treasury's office located in the three provinces. It is now estimated that the expenditures under this program will not exceed $9,741,000 by the close of this fiscal year. Of this amount $5,490,000 will represent the cost of direct relief and $4,251,000 the dominion's share of the cost of feed, fodder and freight charges.

The cost of dominion projects carried on under authority of the special supplementary estimates for 1936-37 aggregated $24,624,000. Of this total $17,360,000 represented the cost of projects undertaken prior to March 31, 1936, and $7,264,000 the cost of new projects.

The following table, which I will place on Hansard, compares the expenditures made or to be made for direct relief and various unemployment relief projects during the present fiscal year, with similar expenditures incurred in the preceding fiscal year.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

The next main category of expenditures is that of government owned enterprises in which is grouped the losses of and non-active advances to government owned enterprises which are operated as separate corporations.

Canadian National Railway Company

Operating revenues of the Canadian National Railway Company increased about $13,400,000 in the calendar year 1936 over the corresponding figure for 1935, or 7·7 per cent. However, operating expenses increased by the same ratio and the net revenue after taxes, rentals, etc., available for interest on debt was $6,600,000 as against $6,800,000 in the previous year. The increased operating expenses were due in part to the costs absorbed by the Canadian National Railway Company under the various government unemployment relief programs and increased wage rates.

After applying the $6,600,000 available from earnings to interest charges of $49,900,000, there resulted a net income cash deficit of $43,300,000, which amount has to be paid by the dominion and charged to dominion expenditure in the current fiscal year. This cash deficit compares with $47,400,000 for 1935, the improvement being entirely due to reduction in interest charges resulting from refunding of securities at lower rates of interest.

It should be borne in mind that there are certain non-cash charges in the railway accounts which should be taken into account in reconciling the above-mentioned figure of cash deficit with the net loss for the year as shown by the annual report of the railway company.

In addition to payment of the railway's deficit, the government will advance $9,916,000 by way of loan to the Canadian National Railways during the present fiscal year. This will be made up as follows: $7,053,000 on account of miscellaneous debt retirements under the 1936 budget, and $2,863,000 representing cost of equipment purchased under the special supplementary estimates. Repayment of $395,000 was received on account of loans made in the fiscal year 1936 for repairs to equipment under the Supplementary Public Works Construction Act.

During the fiscal year, the government made temporary loans aggregating $33,032,970 to the company to meet called or matured debt, the major item of which was $24,220,000 Grand Trunk 6 per cent dominion guaranteed bonds, which were redeemed on September 1, 1936. These temporary loans together with loans aggregating $2,043,725 carried over from last fiscal year, were repaid from a public issue of dominion guaranteed bonds dated February 1, 1937, in the amount of $35,500,000. This issue was sold in two maturities: $15,500,000 2¼ per cent seven-year bonds yielding 2·39 per cent and $20,000,000 3 per cent fifteen-year bonds yielding 3·04 per cent.

Canadian National Steamships

During the fiscal year, the Canadian National Steamships returned $1,500,000 to the government. This was due mainly to the winding-up of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The amount of working capital and insurance fund that had been advanced as a non-active loan in previous years has been returned, in addition to the surplus of $343,000 accruing from operations during 1936 prior to the sale of the fleet. The operations of the West Indies service in the calendar year 1936 showed an operating surplus, after payment of interest to the public, of $70,000. This is the first surplus recorded since the inauguration of the service and compares with a deficit of $270,000 in 1935.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Harbour Commissions

Assistance to harbour commissions appearing as expenditure in our accounts will total $2,669,000. This amount is composed of $250,000, representing the operating deficits of the harbour commissions at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec and Chicoutimi. The balance represents non-active advances of $443,000 for deficit on the Jacques Cartier Bridge, Montreal, and $1,996,000 for refunding of obligations of the harbour commissions at Three Rivers, Chicoutimi and Saint John, less refunds of $20,000 representing advances in previous years for capital expenditures at Halifax and Saint John.

The operations of the harbours are conducted on a calendar year basis and 1936 represents the first full year under which the management of the various ports previously administered by harbour commissions was centralized. While the National Harbours Board was not appointed until October last, centralized control has been effective since November, 1935. Net operating income of these harbours before interest on investment and depreciation showed an improvement in the calendar year 1936 of $1,128,000 over the corresponding figures for 1935.

To sum up, the total amount treated as expenditures in our accounts in connection with the operations of the railways and other government owned enterprises operated as separate corporations was $44,472,000 as compared with $50,940,000 for the previous year. This is exclusive of such amounts as are carried in our accounts as active assets, to which reference will be made later.

WRITE DOWN OF ASSETS

During the fiscal year it is estimated that assets will be written down in the amount of $19,310,000. Apart from the normal write-offs in connection with soldier and general land settlement loans and seed grain and relief accounts, which altogether total $545,000, this write-off item of $19,310,000 is explained by the contribution which we propose to recommend to parliament should be made by the dominion in connection with a cooperative program for the adjustment of indebtedness of farmers in the drought areas of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The proposal involves the writing off of provincial treasury bills held by the dominion as security for repayment of loans made to these two provinces to enable them to finance relief and seed grain expenditures in the drought areas during the period from May 1, 1931, to January 1, 1935, plus such accrued interest thereon as has been capitalized. The amount involved will not exceed $805,000 in the case of Manitoba, and $17,960,000 in the case of Saskatchewan.

In the supplementary estimates for the current year authority will be sought to transfer these treasury bills in the government's books from "active assets" to "non-active assets" as at March 31, 1937. Final write-off and cancellation by the dominion government will be made on receipt of proof that the two provincial governments, the municipalities concerned and the mortgage lending institutions which have made loans to farmers in the drought areas have also made the required adjustments in debt or tax claims, as the case may be, in order to provide relief for farmers who have suffered from prolonged drought conditions.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

If we add together the capital and special expenditures, as well as losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises, and the other charges representing write down of assets to which I have just referred, we find that the grand total of expenditures for which the government is responsible during the current fiscal year will aggregate $539,518,000. This is an increase of $6,933,000 over the grand total of expenditures for the fiscal year 1935-36. It should be remembered, however, that the total for 1936-37 includes the abnormal item of $18,765,000 representing the write down of loans made to Manitoba and Saskatchewan during the years 1930 to 1935. Had this item which relates to transactions of previous years not been included, our total expenditures for the current year would be $11,832,000 less than those for last year.

PERCENTAGE DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES, 1936-37

In the following table an attempt is made to show the percentage distribution of revenues and expenditures for the current year. Receipts from various taxes and other sources of revenue are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly several of the main items of expenditure and groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The form of our estimates and appropriations, and the method of classifying accounts make it impossible to achieve precise accuracy in such calculations as those I am now placing on Hansard, and I hope that by another year we may be able to introduce such changes in our procedure regarding estimates and accounts as will make it possible to determine more accurately the real costs of the various important services of government. I think members of the house have long recognized the need for the change I suggest. However, the results shown in the table are sufficiently accurate to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury by several important services or obligations. I now place the table upon Hansard without further comment:

OVER-ALL DEFICIT, 1936-37

Taking the total revenues for the year at $452,123,000 and the total expenditures at $539,518,000, it is apparent that there will be an over-all deficit for the fiscal year of $87,395,000.

This, of course, takes into account the railway deficit as well as other expenditures for which the government is responsible. It compares with a total deficit last year of $159,989,000. It is better than the figure of 100 millions deficit which I set as our goal in the budget last year. If we make allowance for the abnormal write-off of $18,765,000 which relates to the activities of previous years and also for the special receipt of $8,000,000 from the wheat board, it is indeed a very much better showing than we estimated a year ago.

But while we have succeeded in cutting last year's deficit nearly in half, and while we are able to show a substantially smaller deficit than in any year since 1930-31 when the deficit was approximately the same as for this year, I think it will be realized by all members of the house that the gap between our total income and our total outgo is still very broad and that it must be bridged at the earliest possible date.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS ACTIVE ASSETS

In addition to provision for the expenditures of the year as outlined, account should also be taken of loans and investments made which we regard as active assets in the public accounts. For the year such loans and investments are estimated at $36,785,000, excluding loans that may be made to provinces between February 15, 1937, and the close of the fiscal year on March 31.

Loans to Provinces

Loans made to the four western provinces which are the most important item in this category have shown a marked decrease during the present year. The Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act of 1936 restricted such assistance to a maximum amount measured by the provincial share of the cost of unemployment relief and undertakings during February and March, 1936, and under any agreements entered into pursuant to the act. Moreover, the act contemplated that any province desiring such assistance should establish the necessity therefor, and in practice we have required the submission of detailed statements of the financial position of the province.

Up to February 15, 1937, the net loans made under this authority have amounted to $10,892,235 as compared with $42,304,150 made during the preceding fiscal year. As of this date, loans made to the four western provinces under authority of the various relief acts were outstanding in the dominion's books to an aggregate amount of $127,419,400. The totals for the various provinces were as follows: Manitoba, $19,415,855; Saskatchewan, $51,898,717; Alberta, $25,759,748; and British Columbia, $30,345,080. It will be understood these figures relate to totals outstanding prior to the write-off referred to previously.

I desire to place on Hansard tables showing the net loans made to each province during each of the last six fiscal years, and a classification of such loans on the basis of the general purpose for which the loans were obtained.

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

Loans to Canadian National Railways for miscellaneous debt retirements, less repayments, already referred to, amounted to $4,614,000. Purchase of railway equipment for the Canadian National Railway amounted to $2,863,000 and for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to $2,303,000. In addition, $555,000 was loaned to the latter company for railway betterment expenditures in connection with the government's unemployment relief program.

During the fiscal year the government's purchases of Canadian Farm Loan Board 3½ per cent bonds will amount to $11,100,000, and of the board's capital stock to $794,000. The total investment by the government of Canada in the farm loan board will reach approximately $28,684,000 at the close of the present fiscal year.

The amount paid out by the government on loans approved under the terms of the Dominion Housing Act is expected to total $1,218,000 during the current fiscal year. The dominion's share of such loans represents 20 per cent of the lending value of each property financed under the act, and is paid out from time to time as required after loans are approved.

During the year, $323,000 was advanced to the harbour commissions at Montreal and Vancouver. These loans are considered as active assets, as both commissions have paid a substantial part of the interest accrued on their obligations held by the government.

Under authority of the Bank of Canada Act Amendment Act, the government purchased 102,000 shares of class B stock of the Bank of Canada, representing an investment of $5,100,000.

Repayments of $2,977,000 were received during the year in reduction of soldier loans and loans to provinces for housing purposes.

The following is a statement of the amount of loans and investments made during the last fiscal year, which are regarded as active assets, and the comparable figures for the four preceding years:

LOAN FLOTATIONS

During the fiscal year under review dominion obligations were issued to the amount of $382,996,000. In the case of treasury bills which have a three months' maturity and are refunded as they mature each fortnight, only the increase in the total outstanding during the year is included in the above figure. These issues, to the extent of $311,000,000 were for the purpose of meeting maturities and the remainder was for the deficit and other current purposes.

This financing was done at a very satisfactory cost to the government. The rates of interest on new issues were lower than those prevaling on maturing issues, resulting in a considerable saving to the treasury in annual interest charges. At the close of the fiscal year, the average rate of interest on the fundel debt and treasury bills outstanding was 3·75 per cent as compared with 3·9 per cent a year ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Have you the figure without the treasury bills ?

Mr. DUNNING: That includes the treasury bills.

Mr. BENNETT: Have you the figure without the treasury bills?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that figure in this statement, but I will get it.

Loans were floated in both the domestic market and in the United States. The issues in Canada, exclusive of treasury bills, amounted to $267,996,000. The first issue was made in June, 1936, to an amount of $134,703,000. This issue was essentially a conversion loan, only $20,000,000 being issued for cash, the balance being made up of conversions of 1½ per cent bonds due September 15, 1936, 2 per cent bonds due October 15, 1936, and 5 per cent bonds due November 15, 1936. The new issue was comprised of two maturities, 1½ per cent four year bonds yielding 1·63 per cent and 3¼ per cent thirty year bonds yielding 3·30 per cent. Cash subscriptions were accepted only in respect to the latter maturity.

The other major operation in the Canadian market was undertaken in September when a $100,000,000 issue was offered. This loan was also in two maturities; $45,000,000 1 per cent four and one-half year notes sold to yield 1·40 per cent and $55,000,000 3 per cent bonds (callable in thirty years) sold to yield 3·11 per cent. The issue of perpetual bonds in the Canadian market represented a new departure in dominion financing. It was intended as the initial step in a program which is designed to provide for the consolidation and simplification of our public debt structure. Another purpose which we had in mind was to facilitate the setting up, as soon as the condition of our national finances make it practicable, of a general sinking fund to provide for the gradual amortization of our long term debt on scientific lines. The response of the investing public to this experimental issue indicated that perpetual obligations might prove as popular in Canada as they have long been in the United Kingdom. In this connection, I believe that the house will approve the policy which we have been following of taking advantage of the present period of low interest rates to get as large a proportion of our debt as possible into the form of long term obligations.

The $33,293,000 5 per cent school lands debentures due July 1, 1936, and held by the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were renewed for a further period of one year at an interest rate of 4 per cent.

The fortnightly offerings of our treasury bills at public tender have continued to meet a highly satisfactory response during the current year. The present cost of this short term money is around three-quarters of one per cent. The lowest rate realized by the government was ·643 per cent on September 15, 1936. The total amount of these treasury bills now outstanding is $150,000,000 as compared with $120,000,000 at the close of last fiscal year, and the average cost of funds obtained from this source during the year has been ·775 per cent. It will be realized, however, that our purpose in issuing treasury bills is not primarily to obtain the borrowed funds at such a very low rate but rather to provide an adequate supply of high grade, liquid credit instruments in order to make possible the organization of a more effective short term money market in Canada and to facilitate the essential operations of the Bank of Canada.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the last two tax-free issues of the dominion floated during the war period will mature during the present calendar year. The first of these issues is the $89,787,000 5 per cent war loan bonds which are payable in Canada and New York and which fall due on March 1st. As it was believed that the major portion of this issue is now held by United States investors, we entered the United States market in January to raise the funds necessary to pay off this issue at maturity. On January 21st we offered in that market an $85,000,000 issue in two maturities: $30,000,000 2¼ per cent seven year bonds sold to the public at 99½ to yield 2·39 per cent and $55,000,000 3 per cent thirty year bonds sold to the public at 98 to yield approximately 3·10 per cent. The remainder of the funds necessary to pay off the maturing issue will be provided directly from the dominion treasury.

The interest saving from this refunding operation will exceed $1,700,000 per year for the next seven years at least. The additional interest saving from the refunding of the last of our tax-free issues, the $236,299,800 5½ per cent victory loan bonds, which we expect to refund prior to their due date on December 1 next, should be substantial. To this interest saving on both issues should of course be added a substantial increase in income tax revenues following the elimination of these last tax-free bonds.

I now place on Hansard a statement summarizing the essential details of the new issues made during the year:

THE NATIONAL DEBT

As at March 31, 1937, the outstanding unmatured funded debt and treasury bills of the dominion, less sinking funds, will amount to $3,275,574,000. Adding to this amount $255,419,000 of other liabilities, consisting chiefly of annuity, insurance and superannuation funds, post office savings deposits and certain trust and contingent accounts, we arrive at gross liabilities of $3,530,993,00. Active assets, including cash on hand and investments, amounted to $437,498,000. After deducting the latter figure from the gross liabilities, we reach an estimated net debt of $3,093,495,000 as at the close of the fiscal year. The increase over last year of $87,395,000 represents, of course, the amount of the over-all deficit to which I have previously made reference.

I now place on Hansard a statement showing the assets and liabilities of the dominion as estimated as at March 31, 1937.

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion outstanding in the hands of the public at the close of the fiscal year will amount to $1,003,000,000, an increase of $9,000,000 over the same date a year ago. This increase is due mainly to the issue of dominion guaranteed securities to refund matured or called debt of the Canadian National Railways which had not been guaranteed.

In addition, there are other contingent liabilities arising out of guarantees given under relief and other acts. During the year the only new guarantee was that in connection with the home improvement plan under which the government guarantees approved lending institutions against loss up to 15 per cent of the aggregate amount of loans made by each lending institution. The limit of the aggregate loans to be made under this plan will be $50,000,000 and therefore the maximum contingent liability of the government will be $7,500,000. As at January 31, 1937, the amount of such loans subject to guarantee was $1,501,000. It is difficult to estimate what the total will be on March 31, 1937, as an acceleration of lending activity is expected with the approach of the spring building season.

I am glad to be able to report that as a result of the policy of orderly marketing and the rise in wheat prices to which I have already referred, bank loans which were made to the Canadian wheat board under our guarantee have been completely paid off, as well as the loans made from time to time directly to the board by the government. In a report made public on January 4, 1937, the Wheat Board stated that the total wheat and wheat contracts which had been taken over from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited as of December 2, 1935, amounted to 205,186,980 bushels. As of that date the board also held 90,186,986 bushels of 1935 crop wheat making a total holding as of that date of 295,373,966 bushels. The wheat and contracts taken over from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited plus the total receipts by the board of 1935 crop wheat to the end of the crop year on July 31, 1936, aggregated 355,927,206 bushels. By July 31, 1936, the board's total holdings of wheat and wheat contracts had been reduced by sales to 86,729,413 bushels. Even after giving effect, as of March 31 last, to the payment of $15,856,000 which we made to the board, the liability of the board on that date for guaranteed bank advances was still substantial. To-day the board has outstanding no loans from the chartered banks or the dominion government or from any other source.

There is still outstanding the dominion's guarantee to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited given to assure the due payment of day to day margin moneys which may be payable by the wheat board to the association arising out of transactions and trades in grain made by the board as a member of the association. These margin deposits are made daily and no liability accrues from day to day. The government's guarantee of bank advances for the purchase of oats by Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited for account of the province of Saskatchewan is also still outstanding. As at February 1, 1937, the amount of bank loans outstanding subject to this guarantee was $384,760.

I now place on Hansard a table giving the principal amount of the bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the dominion which it is estimated will be outstanding as at March 31, 1937:

I now come to the budget forecast for 1937-38:

BUDGET FORECAST—1937-38

I have already stated that the over-all deficit for the current fiscal year is estimated at $87,395,000. While it is the smallest deficit since 1930-31, nevertheless its magnitude is such as to indicate the necessity of unceasing effort to restore a balance between total income and total outgo at the earliest possible moment. In the budget of last year I discussed in some detail the dangers involved in the continuing series of large annual deficits and defined the government's policy as one which sought "an immediate, appreciable approach to a balanced budget as the first step in a definite, positive program which will assure the attaining of our final objective within a limited period." I then indicated the measures by which it was proposed to reduce the previous year's deficit by approximately $60,000,000 to a figure not in excess of $100,000,000 for the current year. At that time, while I did not expressly state my expectations in view of prevailing uncertainties, I hoped that it would be possible to reduce the deficit to $50,000,000 for 1937-38 and to wipe it out altogether the following year. It now seems probable that this objective will be within our powers of accomplishment.

The house will recall that the main estimates, which are intended to provide for the ordinary operations of government, call for appropriations of $410,467,000, and I expect the various departments, under the consistent pressure which is being exerted to effect economies and hold down expenditures, to keep their actual expenditures below the aggregate appropriations by as much as five to ten million dollars. The special supplementary estimates which will be tabled shortly and are intended to make provision for those special or emergency needs arising out of the abnormal conditions now prevailing, indicate a maximum total expenditure of about $96,000,000. Later, the usual provision will be necessary by way of ordinary supplementary estimates for a moderate amount of further expenditures. In this connection, I wish to announce that the government has decided to recommend to the house the restoration of the 5 per cent deduction from civil servants' salaries, effective from the beginning of the new fiscal year, and the necessary provision will have to be made in the supplementary estimates. Making allowances for these additional expenditures, we may estimate the total expenditure for 1937-38 at about $520,000,000.

The house will realize that at this early date it is very difficult to estimate the revenues for next year with the same assurance as in previous budgets. However, judging by the way revenues have been running during the last few months, and based on the outlook for the next twelve months, I estimate that for the fiscal year 1937-38 our present tax structure will produce an aggregate revenue of $485,000,000 derived from the usual sources as follows:—

Taxation Revenue—
Customs duties	$ 90,000,000
Excise duties	47,500,000
Income tax	113,000,000
Sales tax	131,000,000
Manufacturers', stamps, importations and other special taxes.	42,000,000
Banks and insurance companies	2,000,000
Total taxation revenue	$425,500,000
Non-tax Revenue—
Post office receipts	36,000,000
Interest on investments	11,600,000
Other	11,900,000
Total non-tax revenue	$ 59,500,000
Grand total revenue	$485,000,000

This estimate takes no account of any special receipts and credits and represents a lower rate of increase than took place during the present year even after making allowance for that portion of this year's increase in receipts which was due to increased tax rates.

If this estimate of total revenue is realized and if aggregate expenditures are kept within the estimated figure of $520,000,000, the overall deficit for the coming year should not exceed $35,000,000. Stating my expectations in another way, I shall be greatly disappointed if we cannot keep our total deficit for 1937-38 within the limit represented by the net cash deficit of the Canadian National railway system. If we can attain this objective in 1937-38, I am confident that it should not be beyond our powers to wipe out the deficit altogether during the following year and begin the period when progress can be made in liquidating the accumulated deficits which have been funded during the depression. That is the goal which we must steadily keep in sight.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Last year the size of the gap between total income and total outgo made it essential to impose a substantial increase in taxation levies. The public accepted the imposition of these new burdens, not gladly it is true, but nevertheless with a sure sense that it was the right thing to do, that a serious problem existed and that it had to be faced squarely, though sacrifices might be involved. Fortunately the increase in the total income of the people has reduced the weight of the burden. In view of the progress that has already been made and the outlook for the immediate future, I am indeed happy to inform the house that it is not my intention to recommend any increases in taxation for the coming year.

Taxation Changes

The income tax will continue on the present basis. Furthermore, no alterations are to be made in rates of taxes either under the Special War Revenue Act or under the Excise Act. The only changes proposed are a few minor additions to the schedule of exemptions under the sales tax. Articles specially designed for use of the blind are to be given exemption. Art work and printing plates made therefrom for non-advertising purposes in periodical publications will also be exempted. Other items to be added to the list of exemptions are raw and salted hides, certain refractory materials, spinal braces and parts thereof, ingredients used in canning fish, and parts for grain and seed cleaning machines.

TRADE AND TARIFFS

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to matters relating to trade and tariffs. The expansion of our foreign trade is undoubtedly the outstanding feature of the recovery movement in Canada during the past year. The acceleration of foreign demand for our products has probably been the most important single cause of the increase in our productive activity. It has provided expanding and profitable markets for our great primary industries and as a result of this impulse new vigour has been infused into all our industries.

Foreign Trade

In the calendar year 1936 Canada's export trade passed the billion dollar mark, the higest level since 1929. Indeed, taking account of the lower level of prices, the physical volume of our exports was about equal to the 1929 level. The value of our exports, including commercial gold, reached a total of $1,027,901,000, a gain of $189,559,000, or 23 per cent over 1935. This increase is all the more significant in view of the fact that agricultural and vegetable products which accounted for 47 per cent of our total exports in 1928 were only 34 per cent of the total in 1936. Imports for the year amounted to $635,191,000, which exceeded the 1935 total by $84,876,000, an increase of 15 per cent. Our total foreign merchandise trade for the year amounted to $1,663,093,000. This was an improvement of $274,435,000 over the previous year, or an increase of 20 per cent. The latest available figures for exports show a percentage increase for January of this year, even greater than that for the whole year 1936. The increase in January, 1937, over January, 1936 was nearly 29 per cent. As a result of our gains in 1936 Canada has moved up from fifth to fourth place among the nations of the world in export trade, while retaining her position of fifth place in total trade.

This expansion of our foreign commerce of course reflects in part the improvement in world trade conditions, more stable currency relations in foreign exchange markets, and a general improvement in the demand for raw materials. But that is by no means the whole story. For while the total international trade of the world, as indicated by figures for 73 countries published by the League of Nations, is estimated to have improved by about 8 per cent in 1936, Canada's total trade showed an increase of 20 per cent. As our own trade gain is so much above the average of other countries I think it is not unreasonable to interpret this as clear evidence of the success of the government's trade policies.

A statement of total merchandise trade for the twelve months ended December 31, 1936, with comparative figures for 1935 follows:

Trade of Canada
(includes commercial gold but not monetary gold)

	Calendar Year 1935	1936	Increase
Imports	$ 550,314,551	$ 635,190,844	$ 84,876,293
Exports:
Canadian produce	825,284,114	1,015,205,435	189,921,321
Foreign produce	13,058,945	12,696,519	—362,426
	$1,388,657,610	$1,663,092,798	$ 274,435,188

The figures just given show that Canada established on merchandise trade account a very substantial net credit balance. If to the export figures already given we add, as we should, the gold earmarked during the year and held by the Bank of Canada for clients abroad, that is, gold of our own production which would otherwise have gone abroad and is, in fact, owned abroad and paid for so far as we are concerned, then the excess of our exports over our imports would have amounted to the very impressive total of $452,000,000. The credit balance on commodity trade alone, excluding gold, was 326·9 million dollars, and was the largest recorded since 1925. Preliminary estimates of tourist trade show an increasing stream of visitors to our country, and an expenditure here last year of about $250,000,000, an increase of more than 24 per cent over 1935. After deducting estimated Canadian tourist expenditures abroad there still remains a net credit balance on tourist account of $165,000,000. Adding this to our merchandise credit just referred to gives a total credit balance of no less than $617,000,000 on account of merchandise and tourist trade combined.

This credit balance, Mr. Speaker, gave Canada an ample supply of foreign exchange funds with which to meet interest and dividend payments to foreign creditors as well as other invisible debit items in our balance of payments, and at the same time enabled us to effect a very substantial reduction in our net capital indebtedness abroad.

In examining the distribution of our trade among countries during the past year we find that the United Kingdom purchased from us just over $400,000,000 worth of goods, which was about 39 per cent of our total exports, a percentage slightly above that of the previous year. The British Empire, as a whole, took about $486,000,000 of our total sales abroad as compared with $382,000,000 in the previous year. While the greater part of this additional volume sold within the empire went to the United Kingdom, nevertheless South Africa, Australia and New Zealand also purchased substantially more from us than in 1935.

Imports from the United Kingdom were slightly higher in volume, reaching a total of $123,000,000 as compared with $117,000,000 for the previous year. From the empire as a whole our purchases were up over $15,000,000 in 1936 as compared with 1935.

I desire now to place on Hansard figures showing trade with the United Kingdom and with the empire as a whole, for the calendar year 1936, with comparative figures for 1935:

Trade of Canada with Empire Countries
(includes commercial gold but not monetary gold)

	Calendar Year 1935	1936
Imports from the United Kingdom	$116,670,227	$122,971,264
Exports to the United Kingdom	307,714,364	400,749,376
Imports from the British Empire	173,888,810	189,319,021
Exports to the British Empire	382,222,952	485,619,218

I am sure it will be a matter of special interest to the house to observe the growth in our trade with the United States, as we now have a full year's experience under the operation of the agreement which established new schedules of rates on January 1, 1936. During the year our total trade with the United States, including commercial gold, amounted to $787,000,000 as compared with $683,000,000 for 1935, an increase of $104,000,000, or 15 per cent. If we exclude commercial gold entirely from the figures for the two years under comparison we find that the trade increase in 1936 was just over 22 per cent. Calculated on this same basis, exports to the United States were greater by 26 per cent, while imports from the United States were higher by 18 per cent. It will be noted that these percentage increases are appreciably above the corresponding increases in our trade with all countries. The increase in trade with our nearest neighbour is ample evidence of the benefits which follow a policy of seeking wider markets through trade agreements. I shall now review, in summary fashion, the steps which have been taken by the government in this direction during the past year.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

As a result of negotiations, Russia rescinded an order of April 20, 1931, which had prohibited all importing organizations and trade representatives of the Soviet Union from purchasing any goods of Canadian origin, as well as from chartering Canadian vessels. Canada, on her part, rescinded the Order-in-Council of February 27, 1931, prohibiting the importation from the Soviet Union of coal, woodpulp, pulpwood, lumber, asbestos and dressed furs.

A provisional trade agreement was concluded with Germany on October 22, 1936, whereby each country conceded to the other a guarantee of most-favoured-nation treatment in tariff matters. Associated with this was a "payments agreement," which provides that exchange accruing from German exports to Canada shall be made available for the purchase of Canadian goods. Definite percentages of this exchange are allotted for the purchase of commodities of such interest to Canada as wheat, apples, cheese, honey, fish, fox skins, asbestos and lumber.

The Canadian-Polish convention of commerce was brought into operation, providing for exchange of most favoured nation treatment between Canada and Poland, and for special concessions on both sides with respect to a limited list of articles.

A former arrangement with Brazil, whereby Canada conceded her intermediate tariff to Brazil in return for most favoured nation treatment, was terminated by Brazil on July 30, 1936, in pursuance of her policy of cancelling all old trade agreements. Following negotiations, Canada retained the benefit of the Brazilian minimum tariff (which is about one-quarter less than the maximum) on all goods, in return for granting to Brazil the Canadian intermediate tariff.

With another South American country, Uruguay, Canada signed an agreement on August 12, 1936, which provides for exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment as regards customs duties and related questions, including quotas and allocation of exchange for commercial transactions. Uruguay is to accord Canada her normal tariff, thus ensuring Canadian goods against a tariff one-half higher, which, under Uruguayan tariff regulations, may be applied to countries not offering reciprocity.

The trade agreement of 1932 between Canada and New Zealand, which was drawn for only one year, has been kept in operation by several renewals; on July 22, 1936, the agreement was extended until September 30, 1937, without further amendment.

Canada-United Kingdom Trade Agreement

These general observations regarding the expansion of our import and export trade constitute a fitting introduction to the presentation to parliament of the new trade agreement which has just been concluded with the United Kingdom. The speech from the throne intimated that agreement in principle had been reached between the two governments. As you now know, sir, the new trade agreement was signed on Tuesday of this week, and at the conclusion of these remarks I shall lay it upon the table of the house. At this point I should state that by arrangement with the government of the United Kingdom, which is as anxious as we are to put the tariff changes arising from the agreement into force at the earliest possible moment, it has been agreed that the provisions of article 9 and schedule "E" of the 1932 agreement shall cease to have effect from 12 o'clock to-night, when the provisions of articles 6, 7, and 8 and schedules IV and V of the new agreement will be in effect.

The extent and importance of Canada's trade with the United Kingdom would enable me to give a much more imposing statistical presentation than I used earlier in these remarks. But in this matter widely known and well understood facts make mere figures seem superfluous. We all realize that Canada's most prized market has been and continues to be the United Kingdom. Every Canadian minister of finance, in almost every budget speech, has had occasion to refer to that fact. In going last summer to London to initiate the negotiations which have resulted in the agreement to be tabled this afternoon, Canadian ministers realized that they were setting out upon a mission the objective of which was not to capture but to hold the most valuable market this dominion has ever known. As to how or when or by whom that great market was gained for Canada is not a matter about which we need dispute. Former Liberal administrations were pioneers in seeking it out and securing it, for they first conceived and put into operation the principle of giving to British goods a preferred position in our economy. But the good work initiated in 1897 has been carried on by all succeeding governments in Canada, however greatly the views of the major parties might differ as to the best means of attaining the objective. While those of us who sit now to your right, Mr. Speaker, may not adopt the same methods as our predecessors, believing our own to be better, we readily admit that they and we have been and are actuated by a keen desire for the best good of our country. Our objective, may I repeat, at London last summer was to retain for Canada a magnificent market; and I am certain that the opinion of this house and the country will be that the ground which has been won over many years has been held and consolidated at a minimum of cost.

Time will permit me to review only briefly the general principles underlying the agreement and to summarize its main provisions. Needless to say, all the articles in the agreement as well as the items comprising the schedules thereto, will be open to the fullest discussion when the House is in committee.

Careful examination of the provisions of the new agreement, which can only be made in committee, will I think, convince the house that a successful effort has been made to bring the policy of British preference, which successive Canadian governments have maintained for forty years, into closer alignment with the trade policy to which this government stands committed. The present agreement is in no sense a simple renewal of the trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed at Ottawa in 1932. The detailed differences between it and the one which it will supersede will be developed in committee. From the beginning, however, it should be clearly understood that throughout the negotiations which resulted in the present agreement, the Canadian government has insisted on broadening the opportunities of international trade, without impairing the practical effectiveness of the British preferential system, and has endeavoured to apply within that system the principles of commercial policy which it hopes to see realized in the economic relations of Canada with the rest of the world. The measure in which these objectives, which were in large part shared by the government of the United Kingdom, have been attained, can only be appreciated by a close examination of the text of the new agreement and its comparison with the corresponding provisions of the Ottawa agreement of 1932.

The goal of both the United Kingdom and the Canadian government in intra-imperial, as in international trade, is the lowering of tariff barriers and the freeing of trade from fettering restrictions; and the preamble to the agreement is evidence of a new emphasis on the importance of increasing the volume of international and intra-imperial trade, and a departure from some of the earlier forms of preferential policy, which were too much concerned with diverting a diminishing volume of trade into unfamiliar and uneconomic channels.

An examination of the changes in the structure of the Canadian tariff resulting from the application of the provisions of the new agreement will show that the emphasis on trade expansion in its preamble is not misplaced. Although actual margins of preference on 179 items enumerated in schedule IV will be increased, in each case this increase is a consequence of a reduction in the duty against the United Kingdom. No preferences have been enlarged or created by increasing rates of duty against third countries, and the concessions made to the United Kingdom have been by way of lowered duties. It should not be necessary to stress the fundamental difference between this approach to the problem of preferential treatment and that which resulted in the 1932 agreement, in which a large proportion of the preferences guaranteed to the United Kingdom were created by raising the intermediate and general tariffs, and coupled, in a number of cases, with higher duties against the United Kingdom itself than had formerly been in force.

It will be found, in comparing the tariff items in schedule IV on which the preferential rate is reduced, with those in schedule I of the Canada-United States trade agreement, in which special reductions below the intermediate tariff were accorded the United States, that there are very few items which occur in both schedules. The explanation of the fact that enumerated tariff concessions to the United Kingdom and to the United States are largely made on different commodities lies in the complementary rather than competitive character of the bulk of Canadian imports from our two chief customers and sources of supply.

The reduction in the number of tariff items on which margins of preference are bound against decrease, from 215 in the 1932 agreement to 91 in schedule V of the present agreement, is further evidence of the effort that has been made to reconcile the principle of preferences with the necessity of removing barriers that stood in the way of international trade. The new agreement achieves a radical and far-reaching revision of the restrictions which its predecessor put upon the freedom of Canada to negotiate for the reciprocal reduction of tariff rates with third countries. Many items on which the differential margin between the British preferential and intermediate tariffs had operated either to limit Canadian trade treaty negotiations with foreign countries, to maintain prices of imported or domestic goods at unduly high levels, or in which five years' experience had shown that United Kingdom industries had not made, or were not likely to make, full use of the preferences afforded them, have been dropped from the schedule, and, in twenty-one cases, the margins of preference on items remaining have been reduced.

In addition to the limited number of fixed margins of preference provided for in schedule V of article 8, there is provision in article 7 for a sliding margin of preference on United Kingdom goods, which are enumerated in schedule IV, dutiable under that schedule and "not of a class or kind made in Canada." I might point out that the obligation to maintain preferential margins on goods in this special category is terminable at any time by the reduction of the British preferential rate to free entry.

Further, either government is free at any time to modify or suspend any of the margins of preference set out in schedules III or V, if it is satisfied that a combine or monopoly of exporters is exploiting its domestic consumers by virtue of the preferential margins there provided for.

The gradual change and diversification of trade between Canada and the United Kingdom has given a very real point to the grievance frequently voiced by British industrialists who have been heard to complain that while competitive Canadian goods could enter the British market free of ordinary duty and free of dumping duty, and in some cases be sold there at prices below the fair market value for home consumption of the same goods in Canada, if the British manufacturer tried to meet dumping by dumping, his efforts were effectively blocked by ordinary duty plus special duty, which kept the Canadian market a closed and profitable preserve for our protected manufacturers. Such situations I know were not very frequent, but that they could occur is sufficient justification for the inclusion in the agreement of a special provision—article 12—under which the Canadian government agree that, in circumstances such as I have described, they will exempt particular classes of United Kingdom goods from dumping duty. This article is self-explanatory; it will, I think, be recognized as neither more nor less than an assurance of fair play both for the British manufacturer and the Canadian consumer. I hope that this evidence—afforded by the presence of this article in the agreement—of the government's determination to give no shelter or protection to unfair practice in export or internal trade, will in itself lead offenders to abandon the practice complained of, and make it unnecessary to apply the procedure provided in the agreement.

From this review of the aspects of the new agreement affecting the tariff treatment of British goods imported into Canada, it will,

I think, be recognized that the Canadian government has succeeded in translating into policy those principles by which, in opposition, its leaders measured and criticized the Ottawa agreement of 1932. It will be remembered that the principal counts on which that agreement was then judged and found wanting were, first, that preference had been increased by raising rates against third countries instead of lowering them in favour of Britain; second, that an inordinate number of tariff rates were bound against decreases; and, third, that the term of the agreement—it was fixed for five years as against three for the new agreement—was unduly long and restricted the independence of action of succeeding parliaments and governments. Under each of these heads, the new agreement meets the conditions which the present Prime Minister laid down when leader of the opposition, and, taken as a whole, I think it can be regarded as the complement within the commonwealth to the United States trade agreement in the international field.

Turning now to those provisions of the new agreement bearing on the tariff treatment of Canadian goods imported into the United Kingdom, I need not emphasize the vital importance to Canada of confirming, for a further period of years, the assurance of unrestricted free entry into the United Kingdom market, which perhaps more than any other single factor has assisted Canadian economic recovery. In these years of constricted international trade, when high tariffs, exchange regulations and quantitative restrictions of every type have limited Canadian export opportunities, free entry into the United Kingdom market has saved the Canadian economy from strains that it probably could not have withstood. The importance of external markets to a country geared into a world economy needs no expounding—and of external markets no other has continued all through Canadian history to offer to the Canadian lumberman, farmer and fisherman the freedom of access which he enjoys in the United Kingdom.

The assurance in article I of the new agreement of the continuance of free entry for Canadian products is undoubtedly the great advantage which we receive from it. In maintaining free entry into the United Kingdom for Canadian goods, including manufactured products, we have kept open for a further term of years a door that once seemed to be rapidly closing. It is a matter of common knowledge that British industrial interests, with appetites edged by their recent taste of tariffs, are anxious to round out their present protective system by the imposition of duties on manufactured goods imported from Canada—nor are British agriculturists by any means reconciled to the continuance of free entry for empire produce. The fact that, in spite of the influence of these powerful economic groups, the government of the United Kingdom were prepared to renew the assurance of free entry for Canadian produce is evidence of their appreciation of the magnitude and value of the reductions in duty on United Kingdom goods contained in schedule IV to the new agreement.

The trade figures that I am tabling in a separate document indicate much more clearly and vividly than any summary I could compress into this speech, the range of Canadian commodities, produce of factory, fisheries, forest, farms and mines, that are now being exported to the United Kingdom. It is this vast physical movement of goods that is in the last analysis the test of the value to Canada of the free entry into and preferential treatment in the world's greatest import market which the terms of this agreement assure us. We are all aware of the importance of the British market for lumber and salmon and apples and wheat—we are less likely to realize that it is also a market for iron and steel products—for motor cars and machinery, manufactured goods of many kinds. The exchange of goods between Canada and the United Kingdom is no longer merely an exchange of raw materials for finished goods.

I do not propose to enlarge on the items on which the United Kingdom has agreed to reduce or stabilize its tariffs. The reduction of duty and consequent increased margin of preference on natural silk stockings will be of value to an export industry that has, in recent years, been supplying an increasing share of the United Kingdom's import requirements, while the assurance that neither the duty on motor cars and their parts, nor their content qualification for preferential treatment, will be increased without the consent of the government of Canada will remove two sources of uncertainty which have caused a major export industry a great deal of anxiety. In passing, it might be noted that schedule II contains the first reduction of rates by the United Kingdom in a trade agreement with a commonwealth country; in most of the trade agreements concluded by the United Kingdom in recent years that country has refused to make any reductions in tariff, and confined its concessions to undertakings not to increase existing rates of duty.

As regards those commodities on which Canada is guaranteed the benefits of definite margins of preference, I might point out that there are no articles in schedule III on which margins of preference were not bound in one or other of the agreements concluded by the United Kingdom with the dominions in 1932. There were a number of commodities on which the same margins were guaranteed to two or more dominions, and there were other commodities on which a margin was guaranteed to one dominion but of which some other dominion was actually the United Kingdom's largest supplier; for instance, the margin on honey was bound in the New Zealand agreement but Canada sent more honey to the United Kingdom than did New Zealand, while the margin on chilled and frozen salmon was bound in the Newfoundland agreement, although Canada was as large an exporter of this product as Newfoundland. In negotiating the present agreement, we not only consolidated the preferences shown in schedules B and C of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, but added a number of preferences, which the United Kingdom was already bound to maintain and which are important to Canada.

Not only are no new commodities bound, but in no case have existing margins of preference been increased. It is as true to say for the United Kingdom as for Canada that no concessions incorporated in the new agreement have impaired the tariff treatment of third countries. In this connection, a point that is often overlooked by critics of the system of preferences might be emphasized. The preferences enjoyed by Canada in the United Kingdom market are really extremely moderate and are much lower in most cases than the measure of domestic protection enjoyed in home markets of foreign countries by competing producers of those commodities. The ad valorem preferences are as a rule ten per cent, and in no case exceed fifteen per cent; the preferences expressed as specific duties on foreign goods are approximately equivalent, at present prices, to this range of ad valorem rates.

Article 5 falls into two parts—the first part, relating to bacon and hams, corresponds to article IV of the 1932 agreement, which assured free entry of bacon and ham up to a maximum of 2,500,000 hundredweight or 280,000,000 pounds per annum. The new agreement continues the assurance of free entry and confirms the maximum of two and a half million hundredweight (almost double the largest actual shipments made by Canada in any year to date). It assures Canadian farmers an uninterrupted opportunity of expanding their export trade toward that maximum and precludes the United Kingdom from bringing imports from Canada within its general system of supply regulation, unless their rate of expansion becomes "abnormal and such as to endanger the effective working of the system of supply regulation"—and then only after consultation with the Canadian government, which, for its part, agrees to continue to furnish as close estimates as possible of the forward movements of bacon and ham to the United Kingdom market. The importance of the assurance of favourable entry into the profitable and protected British market for bacon—which is, incidentally, the only import market for bacon of any consequence in the world to-day—is clearly shown in the supplementary statistical material which I propose to have printed for the convenience of members of the house. At this time it is enough to say that in the last calendar year, out of total exports—that is Canadian exports—of bacon and ham of 158 million pounds, 98 per cent of the total, or more than 154 million pounds, valued in excess of $25,000,000, were shipped to the United Kingdom. The safeguarding of this market, and the maintenance of our opportunity to expand our sales in it, are in themselves major advantages of the new agreement.

The special provisions of the agreement relating to bacon and cattle represent an adjustment of differing types of economic organization. The general assurance of exemption from import duty had to be reinforced—for these commodities—by guarantees that the system of supply regulation which the government of the United Kingdom has adopted for the protection of its domestic agriculture would not frustrate the purpose of the preference which they were ready to accord to Canadian produce. It was, therefore, necessary in each case to work out in collaboration with the United Kingdom a method of securing for Canadian farmers the opportunity to develop their exports to the United Kingdom, without attempting to dictate to the United Kingdom government the form that its domestic policy should take. This method we think we have finally found in article 5 of the new agreement, which safeguards Canadian interests and at the same time enables the United Kingdom to proceed with a policy of marketing organization which they hope will result in stable and remunerative prices for bacon and beef, from which of course every Canadian producer of hogs and cattle will benefit.

The detailed arrangements affecting cattle and beef are complicated and I shall reserve their fuller discussion for committee. At this stage I shall only point out that our producers are guaranteed absolute freedom from import duty, the value of which is enhanced by the preferential margin created by the imposition as from December 1, 1936, of a duty of a cent and a half a pound on foreign chilled beef, and a proportionate duty on foreign frozen beef. Within the framework of the general scheme for regulating the import of cattle and beef into the United Kingdom, Canadian exports of fat cattle and beef would be free from all quantitative control so long as the annual quantities shipped do not exceed what the agreement describes as "recent levels," that is, 1933 and 1934, when the number of fat cattle exported to the United Kingdom averaged 50,000 head as against 6,000 odd in 1935 and 33,000 in 1936. In passing I might point out that the irregular volume in which Canadian cattle move to the United Kingdom market, which in 1934 took 85 per cent of our exports as against only 7 per cent in the next year, illustrates the basic difficulty of adjusting our interest in reserving the right of access to what is now a secondary market for our cattlemen, with the United Kingdom's not unnatural interest in securing a stable and uninterrupted supply of meat from countries whose interest it would be to cooperate in its endeavours to stabilize supplies and prices at a remunerative level. In the light of this situation it should, I think, be agreed that the United Kingdom has gone a long way to recognize the special character of the Canadian cattle export trade and to make special allowances for its maintenance under the international meat scheme which it proposes to set up.

The fact that there is no counterpart in the present agreement to articles 5 and 18 of the 1932 agreement does not mean that the United Kingdom proposes to revert to the conditions which governed the importation of live cattle from Canada prior to 1932, or that Canada has any intention whatever of altering, to the disadvantage of the United Kingdom, the regulations for the importation of pedigreed stock from that country.

General considerations of the same order account for the disappearance of articles 10 to 17. Surely this country has sufficient interest in maintaining an efficient and law-abiding customs administration to make one-sided provisions, such as article 16 of the old agreement, entirely unnecessary. Questions of departmental procedure and organization, which are properly each country's domestic responsibility, have been returned to its jurisdiction. Formal changes of this character are of course subordinate to the main purposes of the agreement and will not involve any interruption of arrangements that have been working to the general satisfaction of both countries.

Concessions in the tariff treatment of United Kingdom goods which are to be made by Canada are chiefly those embodied in schedules IV and V to the agreement. Schedule IV enumerates the proposed reductions in duties, while schedule V sets forth such fixed margins of preference as the Canadian government undertakes to maintain in favour of certain specified commodities originating in the United Kingdom. For purposes of brevity and clarity, it is advisable to refer separately to these two schedules.

Schedule IV enumerates 425 tariff classifications of goods on which this country gives an undertaking not to increase duties of customs against Great Britain in excess of those therein set forth. Of the 425 items, 246 appear for the purpose of binding as a maximum the duty at present effective, and 179 for the purpose of reducing the existing rate on United Kingdom products. As an indication of the scope of the reductions in duty, it may be stated that, in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, imports from the United Kingdom of the goods covered by the group of 179 items which are to be reduced were valued at between 27 and 28 million dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: Are the 179 items to be bound at the reduced rate?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, bound against increase.

Obviously, time at my disposal will not permit detailed reference to the great number of commodities affected by the reductions in rate under schedule IV. Beyond any doubt, however, these represent the most extensive downward revision of duties on United Kingdom products made at any one time since the inception of the British preference. These reductions cover an extremely wide range of semi-processed and fully manufactured goods of the kind which enter into the daily living of our people:—

In foodstuffs and other edible commodities, reduced rates will apply on meat extracts, chocolate and cocoa preparations, unsweetened biscuits, pickled and preserved vegetables, marmalades and preserves, canned herring, and confectionery of all kinds. Reductions are proposed also on cigarettes, as well as on ale and beer.

A wide field of paper products is affected, including greeting cards, camera films, electrical insulating board, wall-papers, wrapping paper of all kinds, and "all manufactures of paper n.o.p.," including envelopes and stationery.

Paints, varnishes and lacquers, as well as white lead, oxides and fillers, will bear lower imposts on importation from the United Kingdom, as will also certain clay products, notably firebrick, earthenware churns and crocks, tiles and blocks for flooring, sanitary earthenware of all kinds, and various types of English-made stoneware and earthenware.

The duties on glass tableware, cut glassware, and certain sizes and weights of plate glass are lowered, and rates on all unenumerated manufactured articles of glass are also reduced.

Reductions will apply on numerous primary and secondary products of iron and steel, including hot- or cold-worked bars and rods; rounds and squares of defined sizes; hot-rolled strip and hoop steel; poundage and other alloy steels in flat form; corrugated metal sheets and enamelled sheets; saw steel, tempered; fully finished structural steel; forgings of iron or steel; railway axles; cast iron and cast steel pipe; wire cloth and netting, including netting for fox-fencing; coal-cleaning machinery; ore and rock crushers, grinding mills, coal cutters and rotary coal drills; blowers and rotary kilns for metallurgical purposes; office machinery of all kinds; vacuum cleaners and sewing machines; lawn mowers and ball and roller bearings; nuts, bolts, butts and hinges; vitreous enamelled ware and other kitchen and dairy hollow-ware; sanitary ware of iron or steel, coated or not; steel wheels for railway rolling stock; trackless trolley buses; aircraft engines; dynamos, transformers, generators and electric motors; electrical precision instruments of various kinds; files and rasps; buckles, clasps, fasteners, needles and pins; and furniture of wood or metal.

In cotton goods, the reductions will affect printed, dyed or coloured fabrics; shadow-cloth, gabardines and certain cut-pile fabrics; cotton handkerchiefs; book-binders' cloth, and certain fine cotton fabrics.

Practically all the major items in the wool schedule figure in the list of proposed reductions. The following wool products are among those which will enter from the United Kingdom at lower duties than heretofore; woollen and worsted yarns, whether for manufacturing purposes or for counter-sale; pressed felt and wool filter cloth; blankets of all kinds; woollen and worsted fabrics "in the grey," imported for finishing in Canada; practically all lines and weights of woollen and worsted cloths, including suitings and overcoatings; woollen clothing of all kinds, and many unenumerated articles manufactured from or containing wool.

In silk and artificial silk goods there are many important reductions, including those on woven fabrics of all kinds, embroideries, laces, braids and cords; and clothing and wearing apparel wholly or in part of artificial silk.

The duties are reduced on knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods of all kinds; as well as on hosiery, gloves and mitts, rugs and carpets, and linoleum.

Leather and leather products show reductions on belting; on gloves and clothing leather; and on all leather further finished than tanned, n.o.p. Similarly, duties are reduced on boots and shoes; on trunks, bags and valises; on fancy cases and boxes, and on clothing made from India rubber or from water-proofed cotton fabrics.

Miscellaneous articles upon which reduced rates are proposed includes braces, jewellery, brushes of all kinds, pens and pencils, tobacco pipes and all smokers' accessories, photographic dry plates, abrasives, medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations, toilet soaps, mucilage and adhesive pastes, surgical dressings and bandages, manufactured goods of celluloid, halibut liver oil, blackings and dressings for leather or metal, articles of sterling or other silverware, clock movements and parts thereof, children's carriages and sleds, picture and photograph frames, and woven dress linens.

An interesting feature is the provision for the free entry, from the United Kingdom, of goods, other than spirits or wines, more than 100 years old.

The undertaking to maintain certain fixed margins of preference applies only to the items enumerated in schedule V, which sets forth in each instance the measure or amount of the margin. This schedule contains 91 items as against 215 in schedule E of the agreement of 1932; moreover, in 21 of the 91 items comprising the schedule the amount of the margin to be maintained is materially lessened. Among the 125 items upon which Canada is no longer (as compared with 1932) bound to maintain fixed margins of preference, are many which will be of great value in trade negotiations likely to be entered into with other countries. There is this further important difference between Canada's commitments as to fixed margins in 1932 and the commitments being entered into to-day: that, except as regards certain primary iron and steel commodities, by far the greater part of the scheduled items enumerate commodities not produced or manufactured commercially at all in Canada, and, hence, entail no element of protection for domestic interests. The value of imports from the United Kingdom, in the fiscal year 1936, under the 91 items on which fixed margins have been granted, was approximately 37 million dollars.

In the tariff resolutions which I shall table on concluding, it is provided that the various rates set upon United Kingdom products, under this agreement, shall become British preferential rates in the customs tariff. This is in accordance with the practice followed for many years by Canada of generalizing within the empire to the greatest possible extent concessions in tariff treatment granted to any one empire country. This principle is so desirable that, in this instance, the government is disposed to apply it without exception, in spite of the fact that there are involved one or two items in respect of which the chief beneficiary may be an empire country which affords no preference to Canada; in such instances, it lies within the power of the governor-general in council to withdraw from any such non-reciprocating empire country the preferential treatment now voluntarily extended to it.

We regard the agreement as a friendly arrangement for closer economic cooperation, from which both countries will benefit and by which no other country will suffer. A liberal and moderate preferential policy such as this agreement embodies will supplement and strengthen the growing movement for freer trade within the world as a whole.

Other tariff proposals, not directly associated with the United Kingdom agreement, while not great in number, are of importance to Canadian producing and consuming interests, and of considerable significance to countries whose trade with Canada has been a factor in the recovery to which I have previously referred. Revisions in duties which extend to intermediate tariff countries include reductions in the rates on cotton clothing of all kinds, as well as on a wide range of articles manufactured from cotton; on various gums and resins used in industrial processes; on well-casing of steel for oil and gas wells; on printing plates and paper used in the production of periodicals; on parts for aircraft engines; on a wide range of plastics and plastic materials; on plate glass, decorative marble, slipper cloth, parts of surgical instruments, and certain copper alloys. Provision is made for the entry free of duties from all countries of small "personal gifts," as well as for the free entry of stringed musical instruments certified to be more than 100 years old. Various liquorice fibres and products will enter at lower rates than heretofore, as will various fumigants and disinfectants, egg-cleaning machines, electric razors, forged steel rolls, silk yarns covered with metallic strip, certain motion-picture equipment, corset rivets, and cotton laces used in the garment industry.

TARIFF BOARD REPORTS

Reports which have been received from the tariff board and which find reflection in the tariff resolutions moved to-day include those on cherries in solution, motion-picture equipment, steel wool, hard rubber in sheets, and plastics, the last named providing for a completely new schedule to cover these products, now so widely used in industry. The board has reported also as regards chiffons and silica sand; and all reports received I shall table this day. The board will have ready in the near future reports on other matters referred to it, and it is expected that these will be received in time for consideration by the government while the house is still in committee of ways and means.

Conclusion

May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, on a note of cheer and of challenge: cheer, because the immediate outlook points to a continuation of the encouraging trends in economic activity which I have already reported; challenge, because the problems of depression we have still to solve and the new problems which will emerge with buoyant prosperity demand the best that we are capable of in wisdom, in forethought and in cooperative endeavour. We may rejoice that we have been among the leaders in the degree of our recovery from the depths of depression. But we have special problems inherited from the war or arising out of our economic and political structure with which we as a people and as a parliament will be confronted for some time to come. These problems are by no means insuperable; they merely forbid complacency, sectional dissension or relaxation of effort.

They can and will be solved as prosperity increases, if only we take care to see that such prosperity is soundly based and evenly distributed, and if we all put our shoulders to the wheel in a common national effort. I mention them here not to diminish the joy which we naturally feel in the record of expanding trade, increasing business activity, rising payrolls and improving revenues which I have been able to report, but rather as a challenge to continued endeavour, to individual, corporate and national integrity, to a keener sense of trusteeship in carrying out our everyday business and civic responsibilities. If this challenge be accepted by the Canadian people, I am confident, sir, that better days lie ahead—better indeed than we have yet known.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Speaker, I beg to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:—

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the revised statutes of Canada 1927, and amendments thereto and to provide—

1. That schedule III to the said act, being the list of articles exempted from the consumption or sales tax be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out the paragraph reading as follows:

"Fire brick, containing not less than ninety per cent of silica; magnesite fire brick or chrome fire brick; other fire brick when for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such fire brick; materials, not to include plant equipment, consumed in the manufacture or production, and which enter directly into the cost of the manufacture of such fire brick;"

and substituting therefor the following:

"Fire brick, plastic refractories, high temperature cement, fire clay and other refractory materials for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment, and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production of such fire brick or refractory materials."

(b) by striking out the item reading as follows:

"grain or seed cleaning machines;"

and substituting therefor the following:

"grain or seed cleaning machines and complete parts therefor;"

(c) by adding to the said schedule the following:

"Raw and salted hides;

Photographs, paintings, pastels, drawings and other art work and illustrations of all kinds, whether originals, copies or proofs, and printing plates made to reproduce the same for use exclusively as non-advertising news pictures or for illustrating non-advertising articles or stories in periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges, the pages of which are regularly bound, wire stitched or otherwise fastened together;

Materials used as ingredients in canned fish;

Goods enumerated in customs tariff items 236B and 698."

2. That any enactment founded on paragraph one of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-sixth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

3. That subsection four of section eighty-six of the said act be amended by deleting the word "six" and substituting therefor the word "eight."

4. That any enactment founded on paragraph three of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of May, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act 1934 to give statutory authority to the validation fee of twenty cents per proof gallon upon spirits exported, which was imposed by regulation approved by order in council dated the second day of December, 1933; and that any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of December, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter thirty-nine of the acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the acts of 1930 (second session), chapter thirty of the acts of 1931, chapters six and thirty-seven of the acts of 1932-33, chapters thirty-two and forty-nine of the acts of 1934, chapter twenty-eight of the acts of 1935, and chapter thirty-one of the acts of 1936, be further amended by striking thereout subsection 2A of section 6 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(2A) The governor in council, whenever it is deemed expedient to do so, may order that import, excise or other duties and taxes, in whole or in part, shall be disregarded in estimating the market value for the purpose of special duty of goods of any kind imported into Canada from any specified country.

2. 4. Resolved, That Schedule B to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1060 and 1063, the enumerations of goods and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties in said schedule B:—

Item No.	Goods	When Subject to Drawback	Portion of Duty (not including Special Duty or Dumping Duty) Payable as Drawback
1060	Paper of all kinds.....	When used by the publisher or printer in Canada in the production of periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges, the pages of which are regularly bound, wire-stitched or otherwise fastened together.....	75 p.c.
1063	Materials, including all parts...	When used in the production of engines for use exclusively in the equipment of aircraft.....	60 p.c.

5. Resolved, That any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions to amend the Customs Tariff or schedules thereto shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-sixth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have not seen copies of these agreements until to-day, and as they are somewhat complex I think it undesirable to endeavour to proceed with them at once. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday next, following the practice set up by Colonel Ralston. An opportunity will thus be given to apprehend these agreements. Although copies have not yet been distributed, I assume they will be.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTION TO COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS TO CONSIDER AND REPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it be an instruction to the committee of ways and means that they have power to consider the terms of the trade agreement entered into on the 23rd day of February, 1937, between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom together with the modifications in the customs tariff therein mentioned and to report to this house on the whole agreement prior to the introduction of a bill respecting the said agreement.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post Office—Outside Service

Salaries and allowances, $16,713,338.50.

Mail services, including mail services by air, $14,520,000.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,004,600.

Mr. BROOKS: On Friday, February 12, when this item was being considered, I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) a question concerning the attitude of the department in connection with the dismissal of certain returned men and also the non-appointment of returned men to vacancies that had occurred, and I called particular attention to the case of the dismissal of the postmaster at Canterbury Station, New Brunswick. I pointed out to the minister at that time that a request had been made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Clark) for the dismissal of the postmaster on the ground that he had been engaged in partisan work during the previous election. I also pointed out that an affidavit had been sent to the department but that evidently it was not considered sufficient. The department had its inspector go to Canterbury Station from the city of Saint John; an investigation was held, not of the charge of partisanship but in regard to the site of the post office, and the postmaster was dismissed on the ground that the site was not as good as another which was proposed. In this connection I wish to quote from certain letters that passed between officials of the Canadian Legion, British Empire Service League, and others, and the department. In reply to a letter from the hon. member for York-Sunbury complaining about partisanship, the Postmaster General, on April 1, 1936, wrote:

Dear Mr. Clark:

With reference to your communication of the 27th March in regard to the position of postmaster at Canterbury Station, N.B., I may say there is no vacancy in the postmastership at that point at the present time and no serious complaints have been received about the manner in which the post office is being conducted by the present incumbent, Thomas J. McMullin, who was appointed on the 12th January, 1931.

I note your remarks to the effect that charges of political partisanship can easily be sustained against the present postmaster.

Charges of partisanship were not investigated, but the postmaster was dismissed, as I have said, on the ground that the site was not satisfactory. I would point out to the Postmaster General that in the correspondence set out in sessional paper 118, it appears that as far as the site was concerned there is very little difference between the previous site and the proposed site, the latter being about one hundred yards farther away from the centre of the village. The village is a very small one, and the previous site is nearer the school. As we all know, in these small villages and country districts children go to the post offices and get most of the mail.

Communications were received by the department from returned soldiers' organizations. On page 13 of this sessional paper is a copy of a telegram sent to the Postmaster General from the Fredericton branch of the Canadian Legion. The telegram reads:

Hon. J. C. Elliott,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Strongly protest removal of Thomas McMullin ex-service man from postmastership Canterbury.

W. A. Gibson,
President, Canterbury branch.

In the sessional paper is included another telegram from the Woodstock branch of the Canadian Legion, as follows:

Woodstock, N.B., June 9.

Hon. J. C. Elliott,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Thomas J. McMullin postmaster Canterbury York county, N.B. to-day received notice of dismissal no reason given from post office inspector St. John said dismissal to take effect twelfth instant. This man is returned soldier receives small pension and is member this branch. Special meeting executive called this evening strongly protest this dismissal and ask new appointment held up pending investigation.

On June 12 the appointment was made. On page 9 of the sessional paper is a letter from J. C. G. Herwig, of the service bureau of the Canadian Legion at Ottawa, reading as follows:

The Hon. J. C. Elliott, K.C., M.P.,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Elliott:

An urgent request has been received from our Woodstock (N.B.), branch to make representations to you with reference to the release of Thomas J. McMullin of Canterbury. I quote hereunder from their message.

The message is the same as the telegram I have just read.

This notice was given without much warning and no reason was given for the dismissal which is to take effect from the 12th instant.

It is pointed out that Mr. McMullin is a returned soldier receiving a small pension and the postmastership, therefore, is his livelihood because pension is insufficient for maintenance. I understand from officers of your department that the reason for this dismissal is that the present location of the office is unsatisfactory. If this is the case, then we feel that McMullin should be given an opportunity to change to a more suitable location before his dismissal is carried out.

When discussing the release of returned soldiers with you, you gave us assurance that they would not be removed from positions of this kind except for cause. In this case we are assured that the objection could be readily met by Mr. McMullin if he were given an opportunity to do so.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Would my hon. friend give me the date of that letter?

Mr. BROOKS: The letter was written on June 10. It continues:

We think, therefore, that we are not unreasonable in asking that you delay drastic action in this case until Mr. McMullin has an opportunity of providing more suitable quarters.

This was not done. McMullin was dismissed on June 12.

I want to bring to the minister's attention another matter that has to do with the actions of certain commissions appointed to investigate partisanship in New Brunswick. The one case I refer to particularly is the dismissal of a postmaster at Mill Cove, New Brunswick, which is in my own constituency. This case is entirely different from the other. As I pointed out, in the first case the postmaster was accused of partisanship. He was dismissed on the ground that the site was not considered satisfactory. That was the excuse given. In the second case the ground on which the complainant asked for the postmaster's dismissal was that the site was not satisfactory, but it was so obvious that the site proposed was unsatisfactory—not as satisfactory as the former site—that a charge of partisanship was brought against him and an investigation was held. The complaint was made by the defeated candidate in the constituency of Royal. He wrote to the department, who advised him how the investigation was to be carried out. Affidavits were made and a commissioner was appointed to hold the investigation. The commissioner was the law partner of the man who made the complaint, Mr. White, the defeated candidate in Royal. In order that the minister may understand this matter, I shall quote from some of the correspondence.

On June 3, a letter was written to the Postmaster General as follows:

June 3, 1936.

Hon. J. C. Elliott,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Re: Mill Cove Post Office

Dear Mr. Elliott:

I would request the removal of the above post office from C. W. Orchard's to James McLaughlin's, as location of the office on McLaughlin's premises would be a more practical site to enable it to better serve its patrons. The present site is not, I understand, as satisfactory as if the office were located on Mr McLaughlin's premises.

Yours very truly,
Donald V. White.

As a matter of fact the proposed location at Mr. McLaughlin's would require the patrons of that post office to walk about an extra mile for their mail, and when the matter was looked into it was found that the complaint that the site was unsatisfactory would not hold water; so then it was decided to bring a charge of partisanship against the holder of the office. An affidavit was procured from a gentleman named Robert M. Mott. I shall not read the whole of it, but his chief charge was:

In the last dominion election I saw the said C. W. Orchard drive up in his car with a Conservative voter to one of the polling booths in the said parish of Cambridge and in the afternoon I saw his wife drive to the polls with two Conservative women in her car.

The department wrote to Mr. Orchard asking him what he had to say about the charge, and he replied:

June 30, 1936.

Postmaster General,
Ottawa,
Canada.

Dear Sir:

In reply to your letter of the 22nd I will say as to my taking an active part in politics it is a complete falsehood. I did not canvass nor was I canvassed. True I took my wife's uncle along with me to the polling booth he came and asked my wife if he could get a chance with me—he has been a life long Liberal—he says I don't say how I'm going to vote, she said that is your own affair there is room if you want to go. On my way back my wife's cousin asked me if she and my wife's niece could go along with my wife, her cousin has always been Liberal don't know about her niece what she is. We did not ask any of them to go with either of us, they came back with other parties. On her way my wife took a man in whom afterward we heard refused to go in the Conservative cars. She asked him if he would have a drive he accepted. With the exception of asking this man to have a drive we can both swear that we only took these people because we were asked—and did no canvassing whatever. I want the name of the persons who sent in the sworn statement—how could anyone take an oath that these people were either Liberal or Conservative.

There have been a number of falsehoods about our office which we have proved out to the department and it is getting irksome. I hope I shall always keep broadminded enough that I can give a person a lift regardless of their politics in which I take no active part.

Please write me the name of the person who sent the statement.

Yours truly,
Charles W. Orchard.

A commission was appointed and an investigation held. I shall read the report. The investigation was held at Cambridge, New Brunswick, on September 24, 1936, and the evidence as reported reads:

The witnesses for the informant testified that during the provincial and dominion election campaigns of 1935 Charles W. Orchard, postmaster at Mill Cove, attended the conventions of one of the political parties, that during the federal campaign Mr. Orchard attended a political meeting of the same party on the evening when two of the parties held meetings in the district, and that during his term of office Mr. Orchard had attended other political conventions of the same party. They also testified that on dominion election day, October 14, 1935, Mr. Orchard had driven one voter to the polls at Cambridge, and that his wife had driven two women voters to the same poll.

The postmaster gave evidence on his own behalf, stating that he had not attended political conventions as a delegate, that voters driven to the polls were driven at their own request, and were taken by his wife and himself when they themselves went to vote. He admitted that he had never attended conventions of other than the one party, but stated that he had attended joint nomination some years ago and that during the 1935 dominion election campaign he had attended a political meeting of another party.

The evidence was to the effect that it was a Liberal meeting.

His wife, deputy postmistress, testified similarly regarding the voters driven to the polls, as well as voters themselves, two of whom claimed to belong to party other than the one the postmaster was believed to support. All the voters transported were relatives of Mrs. Orchard. The honorary chairman of the Conservative party for the district testified that postmaster Orchard had never attended committee meetings of that party.

The finding of the commission was:

In view of the evidence submitted, I feel that sufficient proof has been offered to find postmaster Orchard guilty of acts of political partisanship.

The convention which he was accused of attending was an open-air convention held on the shores of Grand lake in the county of Queens, New Brunswick. Hundreds of people were there and I saw among them the chairman of the Liberal party in the county of Queens, and dozens of other Liberals. Mr. Orchard lives only a few miles from this place, and practically everyone in the neighbourhood, no matter what might be his party affiliations, attended this convention. It was like a picnic, but only those who were delegates could vote. Mr. Orchard was dismissed on this very flimsy evidence which was brought before this commission. The facts proved were that he conveyed three voters to the polls; two of these voters were Liberals and they do not know how the third voted. I should like to read to the committee one or two letters indicating the attitude of the public. This may seem trivial to some, but it is important to the people who live in this district, and that is why I am bringing it to the attention of the Postmaster General. I am not going to worry the committee in regard to these commissions which have been investigating not only this case but others, but I know of other dismissals in my own constituency just as unfair and unreasonable as this one. I hope in future these matters will be more carefully considered by the authorities. I have in my hand many letters but I shall read just a few. This one is dated September 27, 1936:

Dear Sir:

As I am a resident of Mill Cove I am writing to you in regard to the post office. There are five families living here and the post office is one and a half miles away. I think it is far enough to have to walk after the mail without having to walk any further. If they shift the post office we will have to walk for our mail two miles and a half. So I don't know what we will do. Please let me know what is to be done.

Another letter, dated September 24, reads:

Just a few lines in regard to the office at Charlie Orchards. As I think it would be an unfair thing to move the post office any further than where it is for we have about one mile now and what will it be for us if you moved it any further so hope you will please decide to leave it at Charlie Orchard for the people in the settlement, and obliging.

Mrs. Clifford Thompson.

The point is that practically all the people who get their mail at this post office were compelled to walk a mile further for their mail just to satisfy a supporter of the party in power. I may also point out that the post office of which Mr. Orchard was postmaster was beside the school at Mill Cove and the children who come from the back districts would get their mail and take it home after school. After the post office was moved, they had to go half a mile up the road to McLaughlin's, get their mail, go back half a mile and then return home. Anyone who knows country districts in the winter will know that is a real hardship. I hope that in the matter of appointing commissions to investigate complaints of this kind there will be more careful investigation, and that the rights of the people will be the first consideration. It does not make so much difference that Orchard was dismissed, but the fact that dozens of people have to walk daily another mile through all kinds of weather to get their mail seems very unfair.

I should like to correct a statement I made the other day with reference to the postmastership in the town of Woodstock. I stated that a returned man had not been appointed to that vacancy. That is correct, but I have learned that the present incumbent is appointed only in a temporary capacity. But I object to that. Looking over some records not long ago, I noted that most of these temporary appointments are given to some party heeler, and then perhaps later a returned man is appointed. Why cannot the returned man be appointed as temporary postmaster in the first instance? It is sometimes months before the regular appointment is made. I ask the Postmaster General if it is the intention of his department to appoint a returned man to the Woodstock post office. If so, how soon will that appointment be made? It has been pending now for a considerable length of time and it seems to me the appointment should be made without further delay.

I also asked the Postmaster General last year with reference to the post office at Florenceville, New Brunswick. A widow was dismissed from that post office without very much reason, as is the case in a good many instances in my province. At that time I asked the Postmaster General: "If a change is contemplated, will an investigation be made before any such change takes place?" The Postmaster General answered: "Yes, an investigation will be made." But I am informed that no investigation was made, that the postmistress was dismissed without any investigation. The Postmaster General gave me his word that an investigation would be held, but there was no investigation.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Dealing first with the Canterbury office, since the hon. member started speaking I have been able to obtain the report upon which this change was made. This office is in the electoral district of York-Sunbury. The revenue was $1,834. A report was asked from the district director, and I have a copy of it in my hand. It is dated April 27, 1936, and reads:

A number of the patrons of the office were interviewed, and it would appear that public opinion was favourable to the proposed location. The proposed site is 180 yards west of the present location and is more central as shown by the sketch herewith enclosed, which also shows the location of the patrons.

I should be glad to elaborate on that if my hon. friend wishes me to do so.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to ask a question. In the letter written by the Postmaster General to Mr. Herwig on June 10, a statement was made to the effect that a returned soldier in a position of this kind would not be dismissed without cause. I also understand that Mr. McMullin was not given an opportunity to change the site of his post office, so in my opinion the reason given was only an excuse. Be that as it may, however, I should like to ask the minister if Mr. McMullin was given an opportunity to change the site of the post office, if it was not satisfactory.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I can go only by the records I have before me. First, I might say a word with regard to the question of changing the site of a post office in charge of a returned soldier. If a change of site is considered desirable, the practice has been, quite consistently for a number of years, to have an examination made by the district director. If this report shows conclusively that some other site is much more desired by the people who are to be served, which site according to the map is much more central—and it was so in this instance—the change is made. It has not been the practice to consider the returned soldier as being dismissed if his site is not as suitable as the other one suggested. That is not in the nature of a dismissal for cause.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to ask another question. Did the Postmaster General receive any complaints with regard to this site prior to the letter which was written by the hon. member for York-Sunbury? I have the correspondence under my hand, and it does not indicate any such complaint.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am not aware of any such complaint, but this change was made at the request of the patrons who were being served, and with a view to securing a better site.

Now I might say a word with regard to the second matter to which my hon. friend referred, the post office at Mill Cove. I have before me the finding of the investigator, and I would say to my hon. friend that I think quite as much care has been taken in these cases as has been customary in regard to matters of this kind. A commissioner was appointed; he made a report, and the report indicates that the postmaster at that point has been guilty of political partisanship. I should like to refer my hon. friend to what is frequently the most important evidence one gets. It is the evidence of the postmaster himself as to whether or not he was guilty of political partisanship. This is what he says:

The postmaster gave evidence on his own behalf, stating that he had not attended political conventions as a delegate, that voters driven to the polls were driven at their own request, and were taken by his wife and himself when they themselves went to vote.

In all fairness I would suggest to my hon. friend that most people are taken to the polls by their friends when their friends go to vote.

He admitted that he had never attended conventions of other than the one party, but stated that he had attended joint nomination some years ago and that during the 1935 dominion election campaign he had attended a political meeting of another party. His wife, deputy postmistress, testified similarly regarding the voters driven to the polls, as well as voters themselves, two of whom claimed to belong to party other than the one the postmaster was believed to support.

I want to say to my hon. friend that, apart altogether from the evidence given by the postmaster, the finding of the commissioner is that on the whole evidence given before him the postmaster was guilty of political partisanship. I do not know how we can retry the finding of any commissioner as long as the record appears to show that there was evidence which, if believed by him, would support the charge. I am not going to argue the matter, but that has been the practice, and that is the course which was followed in this case.

Now I should like to say a word with regard to Woodstock, about which my hon. friend asked. The revenue of that post office is over $19,000. When the appointment is made it will undoubtedly have to be made by the civil service commission, and the returned soldier preference will apply. I am afraid I cannot say much more than my hon. friend can say with regard to what the civil service commission will do. I think that covers the three cases to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a public utility, Mr. Chairman, and in my opinion it should be operated in a different way. I do not intend to say very much about this firing business. I remember when the present Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) was on my football team; I believe this is a little contrary to his own way of doing business, so I do not believe he has very much to do with it, though there were postmasters fired in the Niagara peninsula.

This utility is maintained by the public and should be conducted on a commercial basis if we are to have any efficiency. Years ago Sir William Mulock got efficiency and many reforms were introduced into the department in order to make it more businesslike. I must say, however, that this business of firing aged employees who are in the evening of life, without making any provision for them, is not creditable to the post office or any other public utility.

I come from a city which contributes some $7,000,000 yearly to the postal revenues of this country, and in my opinion Toronto is getting very poor service for the amount of money expended. In the residential districts the service is not what it should be. In addition to that, I believe Toronto, which contributes about $90,000,000 annually to the revenues of this country, should have some better post office terminal system. In that city we have no post office with the exception of the old building which was constructed shortly after confederation, at the head of Toronto street. It is true that we have the terminal in the union station, but I maintain that the Post Office Department of Canada is away behind the times. We are sending ministers over to England on almost every boat nowadays. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was in the house for only three months before he took a Cook's tour around Europe. If they would open their eyes and see what the British post office is doing in the way of efficiency, they would be doing something for the people of this country.

As a postal item is under discussion, I should like to know what the department is going to do about the postal service in my constituency, that of Broadview, which comprises a large district over the Don, and in which is one of the largest business retail streets in Canada, namely, Danforth. In that section of Toronto there is no adequate post office. Post office business is conducted in an old leased building. Other places, from which the department derives very little revenue, can have buildings valued at $100,000 erected. Only the other day we heard about one at Fort Erie, in the Niagara district, where the revenue is not nearly as large as it would be in Toronto. I do not object to Fort Erie getting something, but the commencement of that federal building with the laying of the corner stone was nothing but a Liberal rally in the district. With a golden trowel the member laid the corner stone, and there were the usual ceremonies. The revenues from that district are set out in the returns received by the Postmaster General.

In my opinion the Post Office Department should be operated from the commercial aspect, and the commercial aspect only. There should be some efficiency in the department. Toronto contributes $7,000,000 to the revenue. In that city we are entitled to one cent drop letters. The revenue from Toronto should not be used, to the detriment of increased service for Toronto at less cost, to bolster up post offices in other places throughout Canada, in the manner indicated.

All along the line the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, which contribute eighty per cent of the cash taxation to the federal treasury, have been discriminated against. The day is coming when the businessmen will insist upon business administration in the Post Office Department. We should have additional facilities in Toronto for handling the mail. Regarding the delivery of letters in the residential districts of Toronto may I refer to an editorial appearing in the North Toronto Herald, published in the constituency of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Baker). I happen to live in that district. In the newspaper editorial there is a complaint about several postmen having been bitten by dogs when they go to deliver the mail. That should not be so. The minister ought to notify people that if they want to have mad dogs, and that kind of thing, about the property, they had better get their mail at the post office.

This is not the only public utility in Toronto which is suffering thus from vicious dogs attacking inspectors. The minister is not much of a dog fancier—at least he was not when I used to know him so well. May I repeat that other public utilities in Toronto are suffering in the same way from people who keep these mad or semi-mad dogs. When postmen come to deliver letters they are bitten, and they have no remedy for damages.

In addition to that, the time is not far distant when more humane methods should be used for the good of the rank and file of the men who do the work in the Post Office Department,—not for the brass hats to whom the hon. member for Témiscouata referred.

The rank and file of postmen are not receiving the consideration they should. Should one of these poor chaps steal a dollar or a dollar and a half out of the mail, he may be sent to prison for three years. I know of no other public utility which uses its employees in that way; when such utilities have revenues, they pay their employees proper living wages and rates. In my view the law concerning the three year sentence in connection with postal employees should be changed.

Some of these postmen are returned men. One of them may steal a dollar or two out of a letter, especially if his family is not receiving proper maintenance. With the increased revenues in the Post Office Department I say that law should be changed. It was introduced before confederation, and there should be some amendment of it, and the men affected given parole or some other consideration.

There is another point concerning the revenue of the department about which I should like to speak. The newspapers of Canada are receiving a cash subsidy of $8,000,000 from parliament. Why do they receive that? They get it through the carrying of second class mail at less than cost. The special freight rate they enjoy is greatly to their benefit, and it costs the department a loss of over $8,000,000 to carry the newspapers through the mail. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is one who knows a great deal about the Post Office Department, and only a few days ago he referred to this matter. If these newspapers can afford to have a couple of pages of turf news, they can afford to pay a proper rate for the delivery of their newspapers, and to do it without cash subsidies from parliament. In my view the law in that regard should be changed.

The Postmaster General should take up the bill I introduced some years ago concerning the identity of the newspaper as to ownership. We should follow the law of Great Britain and that of the United States, whereby newspapers must disclose their identity as to ownership, stockholders, mortgagees, mergers and matters of that kind or be refused the right of the mails. The fourth estate is not what it used to be as a defender of public rights or of the liberty of the subject; this seems to be past and gone, forever. I say that the Postmaster General should consider this matter and bring in an amendment to the Post Office Act, whether hon. gentlemen in another chamber like it or not. There should be proper disclosures as to ownership of newspapers receiving these subsidies; otherwise they should be denied the right to use the mail, as is done in Washington, under the laws of the United States.

I believe the department should add new features. I hope the Postmaster General will go to England for the coronation ceremonies, because if he goes over there and keeps his eyes open—and he has pretty good eyes when he wants to see—he will notice the improvements they have in England. The minister sometimes did not see the referee and got ruled off when on my team, but he is very observant. I believe he should go to England and see what the Post Office Department over there is doing to add to the usefulness of the post office.

The Post Office Department has not in Toronto the modern facilities to do business. It is not equipped as are other public utilities, such as the Bell Telephone Company, the Consumers' Gas Gompany or the Hydro Electric. It has not the modern type of building, modern facilities or modern methods. The Post Office Department is a public utility, and as such it is away behind the times. We could learn a lot by going to Washington and finding out what they are doing in the larger cities of the United States.

I agree with the hon. member for Parkdale in connection with his observations about the Christmas mail. When hon. members on this side were in office they played the game. I never succeeded in placing a man in the Post Office Department at Christmas time. I never asked to, because I knew it would not be done. Last Christmas the returned soldiers got a raw deal from the Post Office Department. They were asked to file their applications, go down to Adelaide street and register. They spent hours and hours of time trying to get the work, but they were refused. Other men from all over Ontario were taken on. I do not blame the present Postmaster General or the Toronto postmaster, but I believe there should be in Toronto a system similar to that found in the municipalities. Municipalities try to run their business from a commercial standpoint, and not as Liberals or Conservatives. If the federal authorities did as the municipalities do, they would get greater efficiency in the Post Office Department, and would receive a fair day's work for a fair day's pay from the rank and file of the men who, dear knows, could stand a little increase in their pay. We should have more humane treatment of the men. Some day the people who pay for the Post Office Department will rise up and have something to say about the way in which it has been operated.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In answer to the hon. member may I say that no one appreciates more than I do the contribution made by the city of Toronto to post office revenue. The hon. member is correct in stating that we receive about $7,000,000. When he complains about the building accommodation in Toronto, I notice he looks at his friends on his side of the house. He will be one of the first to remember that the fine building they have there near the station for sorting purposes was erected as a result of estimates passed when I had the privilege of being Minister of Public Works. I think my hon. friend will admit that the service in Toronto has been improved as far as possible since the present administration has been in power. I agree with him that perhaps there was a good deal of room for improvement. As far as the dogs to which he has referred are concerned, he is a good lawyer and he knows that the control of dogs is a matter entirely within provincial jurisdiction. That is something over which the federal parliament has no control. I am bound to say that we have had no complaints from the couriers. I want to be fair to the people of Toronto and to the character of the canines in that city by saying that no complaints have been received. In view of what my hon. friend has said, perhaps representations should be made to his friends at Queen's park.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not his friends.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Then perhaps the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) will make the representations.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are not my friends either.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I have no doubt it will be given consideration.

I just wanted to return some of the compliments which the hon. member paid to me by saying that if the team which he captained a short time ago was the wonderful success it was, this was due to the management of my hon. friend.

With regard to the deficit which my hon. friend stated was due to the handling of a certain class of mail, I must say that the figure he gave is too high. There is no doubt there is a deficit, but the amount is much smaller than that mentioned by my hon. friend.

I find I neglected to answer one of the questions raised by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) with regard to the Florenceville post office. The information which I have from other sources is that there was an inspection made of this post office. A shortage was discovered and as this was the second offence of that kind, the inspector asked for the resignation of the postmaster which was accepted.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, there is no one who can make excuses better than the Postmaster General. He is certainly clever and accomplished at that. I do not think anyone regrets more than he does the fact that he has to defend his department in connection with such matters as were referred to by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). He knows that these charges were made by a certain individual and that these postmasters were going to be fired regardless of whether or not an investigation was held. I am sorry to say that the spoils system is carried on in the maritimes. After every election the same thing happens, and I do not want to go back too far. I regret that sometimes the Conservatives have done this, but they have not been as bad as the Liberals. The minister will not be able to blame the hon. member for Royal if he asks that these postmasters be changed should this government be defeated in the next election. Such practices should be stopped and men who are doing their duty should be protected.

In Ontario the spoils system has never been developed to this extent. When we came into power in 1930 there was not a man in the customs house, the public works department or the post office in Toronto who was fired. I am glad to say that that is still the fact, with the possible exception of the extra men taken on at Christmas. We could not get a look in at all. The hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) ran away with all the jobs and we got nothing. However, we shall get back at them, that is if we live long enough. I have always had great regard for the Postmaster General, but I do not think he is sincere when he defends the action of his department in laying off the two postmasters referred to by the hon. member for Royal.

Mrs. BLACK: Mr. Chairman, quite unlike the previous speakers, I have practically no complaint to make in connection with the carriage of mails in the Yukon territory. Times have changed since those early days when we had to pay a dollar to get a letter sent as far as Skagway. Times have changed since our mails were carried by dog team and when men had to stand in line and pay a dollar to get inside a post office. A good looking woman could get in for nothing, but I always had to pay.

Mr. LAWSON: You were the first in.

Mrs. BLACK: When new contracts are being made, I should like the Postmaster General to consider the service between Dawson and Granville. Granville post office is being conducted by a man who is very much interested in that part of the country. He works for the people and with the people. Because of the increase in the use of labour by the Yukon Consolidated Gold Company in the summer months, there are between three and four hundred men located within three-quarters of a mile of this post office. The post office itself is about half the size of the Clerk's table, there being hardly enough room for two people to get in at the same time. There are no facilities for issuing money orders at this post office and a number of requests have been made that these facilities should be provided. Last summer when I was at Granville I was given about $700 loosely tied up in a bundle with which to purchase money orders in the town of Dawson. Money is tied up just with some paper and a piece of string and given to anyone going to Dawson to purchase money orders to be sent from there. This is most inconvenient and I think there should be facilities provided, at least in the summer time.

The people in this locality are anxious to have a biweekly mail service during the summer months. The roads are good and the mail comes in in large quantities. There is considerable parcel mail during the summer and it would be a great convenience to these people to have this biweekly service. I am sure everyone in the locality would appreciate it if the Postmaster General would consider this request.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I would say that any request made by the hon. member who has just spoken will receive every consideration. She has already spoken to me with regard to the service between Dawson and Granville and also with regard to the desire to have money order facilities at Granville. While the revenue is not very large, the post office receipts being only $194, I realize that a great service would be given. Since the hon. member formerly spoke to me about it I have discussed it, and while it is as well not to make any promises before something is actually done, her request will receive the most sympathetic consideration.

Mr. MALLETTE: Before I ask the minister the question I wish to put to him, may I draw to the attention of the committee the very fine French accent which has been acquired by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church)? If there is one word well known politically in the federal division of Quebec, it is the word Témiscouata. The hon. member for Broadview referred to it a moment ago and called it "Temiscooter." I do not know whether he is seeking to reform our pronunciation or is trying to give a hint to the hon. member for Témiscouata to join the boy scouts. Probably the hon. member for Broadview can explain it.

I was not in this chamber the other day when this vote was first introduced, and I should like to know from the minister whether any decision has been arrived at with regard to the representations made by the postal employees about two weeks ago respecting Christmas and New Year deliveries. I know we are a long way from next Christmas or New Year, but I do not see why the service should be given on these two days. The rest of us sit at home and enjoy ourselves, and I think these humble employees of the Post Office Department should have the same privilege as their fellow citizens.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): As far as these services are concerned, I cannot add anything to what I said when the matter was under discussion for a considerable length of time the other evening. The result of the present arrangement has been exceedingly favourable, particularly in the large cities. Communications we have received from various sources indicate how much the people in those places appreciate getting their Christmas mail either on Christmas day or within a day or two of Christmas. I repeat what I said the other evening that with regard to Christmas it is utterly impossible, particularly in the large cities, to keep anywhere in sight of the work if we allow the complete Christmas holiday to pass without the mail being sorted or any mail being served; it could not be finished at the end of the week. That has been the experience in the past. We in the department are most anxious to give the public the best possible service consistent with reasonable expenditure. Nobody desires less than I do to pay out money to give people service they do not want, but at the same time we owe something not only to the people to whom the letters are delivered but to those who have sent those letters; they are entitled to have them delivered within a reasonable length of time. With regard to smaller places it is much easier to make some arrangements which may not be so expensive but will give a reasonable service. We are surveying the whole situation, but I should not be fair to my hon. friend if I led him to believe I thought that, with a volume of mail such as we had this last year, it would be humanly possible, if we were to dispense with the Christmas mail delivery, to get the Christmas mail disposed of within the succeeding three or four days.

Mr. MALLETTE: As reference has been made to large cities, may I point out that I understand that in the city of Quebec, which is quite a large place, the people are opposed to these deliveries. As regards accumulation of mail for delivery on Christmas day, a little missionary work could be done by means of advertising so that people would be induced to mail their communications earlier. The department very thoughtfully sent us circulars early in December telling us that, if we wanted to have our mail delivered to the United Kingdom or elsewhere abroad, it should be posted by a certain date. The same procedure might be applied to deliveries within Canada. What I had in mind was the interests of the postmen. As I have said, all of us enjoy Christmas and New Year's day, and I believe these employees should be with their families on those occasions. Of course I bow to the inevitable; although I sit on this side I am not a member of the opposition.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I inquire if representations have been made through the postal services, particularly in cities of 25,000 to 40,000 population, asking that Saturday afternoons be allowed to the employees who work in those cities? Very many of these men are interested in sports. It seems to me that while the argument advanced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) may be quite in keeping with the situation as far as Christmas mail is concerned, it is difficult to appreciate the necessity of having mail delivered on Saturday afternoons in these smaller places, where half the places of business are closed. I understand that strong representations in this connection are being made.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Prior to the recent inauguration of service on Saturday afternoons, no mails which were received in a city like Montreal after about nine o'clock in the morning were delivered that day, and numerous complaints, verbal and written, were received. Those complaints were investigated very carefully, and I will say very frankly that I think I can convince the hon. member that, of all days except possibly Christmas and New Year, when the volume of mail is much heavier than it is at any other time of the year, the delivery which cannot be dispensed with is the one on Saturday afternoon. Perhaps I might give the result of an investigation that was made by an inspector sent down to Montreal, following complaints which were received. I recall particularly the case of one letter which was posted in Winnipeg by air mail on the 12th—

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the minister permit a question just at that point? Have investigations or inquiries been made in centres such as those to which I have referred? I am speaking not of Montreal and Toronto, but of cities with populations ranging from 25,000 up to 50,000. Has the matter been gone into thoroughly in connection with cities of that size? I was thinking particularly of St. Catharines. Was an investigation held there?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If my hon. friend had just borne with me a moment I do not think it would have been necessary for him to ask the last question, because what applies to the city of Montreal as regards mail that is sent part of the way by air applies also to these smaller cities. If this mail comes in on a Saturday morning after sortations are made for the mail carriers to get out on their rounds, it lies in the post office until the following Monday morning. The delaying of one letter of that kind will do more injury to the Post Office Department than can be cured by a lot of expenditure and much diligence. That is our trouble. Unless there is a sortation, a staff kept for sortation purposes on Saturday morning, and the mail that comes in on Saturday morning is sorted so as to get out on Saturday afternoon, all that mail remains over until the following Monday, and the result in some cases, particularly where important business messages are involved, is very serious. People do not send letters by air mail unless they are important. They pay a higher rate and we think they are entitled to the best possible service that can be given within a reasonable price.

Mr. LOCKHART: I quite appreciate all that the minister has said with regard to Montreal. Very little air mail ever reaches such an urban centre as that of which I have spoken. They do have a sorting staff in the morning and two deliveries in the uptown business section, and I cannot see the application of the minister's argument in cases such as I have mentioned. I insist that the minister cannot have made a thorough inquiry into conditions in places of that size when he compares them with cities like Montreal where a large amount of air mail comes in. I would ask him again whether the matter was gone into carefully in connection with urban centres of the size I have referred to—not whether the air mail question was taken into consideration, but whether the matter was reviewed from the standpoint of having the mail all cleared out by Saturday noon and not on Saturday at nine o'clock.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In the first place it must be apparent to my hon. friend that it is impossible for him or anybody else to say that no air mail will come into St. Catharines or any other place. That depends upon whether the man at the other end sends his letter by air mail or not. That is the answer to the first part of his question. With regard to the question whether or not investigations have been made there, I will say frankly that there has not been the same degree of investigation in connection with places of that size that there has been with regard to cities like Montreal and Toronto and the larger centres from which the majority of the complaints came. The inspector was regarded as one of the most capable men in the service in this respect, and he reported that the great majority of the complaints were made in consequence of there not being a Saturday afternoon delivery.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wish to bring another matter to the minister's attention. The evidence submitted at the inquiry in connection with the post office at St. Ann's, Ontario, was given to the house, and I want to make a few observations in that connection. There were about 105 pages of evidence and correspondence. I notice in the evidence that the building which was abandoned was in much better condition than the one to which they went. The new premises were not as clean, nor was the accommodation in a general way as good. Moreover, something must be said about the calibre of the four or five witnesses who tried to substantiate the charge against the previous postmaster. I know a considerable number of the citizens including nine or ten of the most responsible men in that community who testified on behalf of the previous postmaster. Petitions were circulated to which nearly eighty-five per cent of the community subscribed one hundred per cent in favour of the former postmaster. I have read all this evidence carefully, and I wonder whether the Postmaster General has gone thoroughly into this case. Before I get through I am going to bring to his attention something which should convince him of the absolute injustice of the action that was taken in this particular case. I refer particularly to the calibre of the men who testified against the former postmaster. I wonder whether the minister carefully reviewed all the evidence that was brought down in the return asked for and whether, having reviewed it, he is of opinion that any charge had been made out against the man who previously held the office. Does he not think it was absolutely a case of discrimination?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): As soon as my hon. friend mentioned this case I sent for the file. It has only just come in and I have not had an opportunity of looking it over, but I think I know the evidence probably as well as he does. I read it all and considered it carefully, and I did so because a special request was made to me by the postmaster's counsel, an eminent lawyer from Toronto. I went over the evidence with him and these are the circumstances as I recall them. In August, 1935, the man who had been postmaster there for a number of years—a gentleman named Snyder, who bore an excellent reputation in the community but who was certainly not as popular with the Liberal party as with the Conservatives, for he was a strong Conservative—became assistant postmaster, the post office being given to his son shortly before the election. For the father's actions in the post office, the son, who was the postmaster, was responsible. The investigation was held by a competent young man whom the hon. member for the riding will know—a Mr. Bench—and the evidence disclosed that a number of persons had stated that he had repeatedly spoken very strongly in favour of his particular political party, and that he did so in the store in which the post office was held, and in the presence of the son, who was the postmaster. The finding was that he was guilty of political partisanship. There was no question about it. My hon. friend after reading the evidence must admit that there was evidence of partisanship on which the commissioner who heard the witnesses could quite properly find that the man had been guilty of partisanship. That was the finding. I was asked to consider it very carefully; I went over all the evidence with counsel for the postmaster, and I would say to my hon. friend that after reading the evidence there was no course left for me but to accept the finding of the commissioner.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did the minister consider the calibre of the witnesses, several of them of foreign extraction who gave evidence against the previous postmaster, and does he not think that the men who gave evidence in favour of the previous postmaster are of a different calibre and type altogether from those who gave evidence in favour of the new man?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I wonder whether my hon. friend thinks that I interviewed the people who gave evidence, or had an opportunity of judging them as the commissioner who heard the evidence had. The commissioner, a gentleman of repute, a barrister of high standing at the Ontario bar, heard these witnesses; he came to his own conclusion, and I am satisfied that the correct thing to do in view of his finding was what the department did. It is not a pleasant thing to dismiss a man who is getting up in years and who has served the office well in the past, with the exception that he was a bit partisan at election times. But when a change is made just prior to the election, the office handed from the father to the son, and the son is the postmaster and the father the assistant, then I do not think my hon. friend will claim that, when a complaint is made and the man who hears the evidence finds that the father was guilty of political partisanship in the office and to the knowledge of the son, and that under the law he should be dismissed, it would be fair that that postmaster should be retained. After all, this is a business. You cannot have the postmaster irritating and annoying people who are compelled to come into the store where the post office is situated to do business when an election is pending. There are, of course, certain ridings in which political feeling runs higher than in others—I am not saying my hon. friend's riding is one of those, but his party has been very fortunate in that riding for a long time. I think he is not being quite fair to the people who gave evidence there to the effect that almost every time they went into the store this assistant postmaster said something to them about the demerits of the Liberal party and the merits of the Conservative party, to contend that they should have to put up with that. In the past the practice has been to accept the finding of the commissioner, and I venture to say that in no case has more care been given to making sure that that finding was right than in this case.

Mr. LOCKHART: I know the commissioner very well and I know his calibre. I read his findings carefully, and I say that they do not bear out all that the minister has said. When you have a petition circulated in a community of several hundred constituents who are served by a post office of that kind and find eighty-five per cent of all the residents in that community, irrespective of party, signing the petition in the interests of a man who has served them for thirty-two years and who has a family, and then you have a commissioner finding a small measure of partisanship on the part of the assistant postmaster, the father, and on that the postmaster is dismissed, I can hardly see how discrimination could be more apparent.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Regarding the petition, my experience leads me to believe that a man who has served the people as mail courier or postmaster or in almost any capacity can get nearly everyone in the community to sign a petition. The law does not make any provision for the consideration of petitions in matters of this kind. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that there was a large petition, but I have before me a large number of letters from people who signed the petition, to the following effect:

> Please cancel our names to Snyder petition for post office at St. Ann's as I was wrongly informed.

Another:

> I shall be glad if you will remove my name from the petition sent you, as I signed it under a misapprehension.

Another:

> I shall be glad if you will remove my name from the petition and also my wife's, as we signed it under a misapprehension.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask the names of those who wrote these letters.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): They are all in the return; if my hon. friend has read the return he will have seen them.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well the name is very important; I know the standing in the community of the men who signed some of these letters.

Mr. FINN: I have not any desire to enter into the merits or demerits of this case, but in fairness to the Postmaster General and the officers and the commissioner I would point out one thing. A commissioner is sworn; evidence is given on both sides, and given under oath. My hon. friend the member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) takes the view that perhaps some of the witnesses were not of the same calibre as the people who gave evidence the other way. If that was so, I would point out that counsel who acted for this gentleman was at fault, on the basis as laid down by my hon. friend, in not proving or giving evidence of bad character. That not having been done, the commissioner was bound by the evidence, and no matter how many petitions came in they did not come before him, they were not signed under oath. If such factors as this should enter into an inquiry, why should they not apply to proceedings in the magistrates' courts, in the county courts, in the supreme court? You can get lots of people to sign petitions against people being hanged, but that does not prove that they were not guilty. If citizens of my hon. friend's riding knew that people of "questionable" character gave evidence, they should have given evidence of that "questionable" character, so that the commissioner, the Postmaster General and his officials could have taken that into consideration. But there is nothing of that sort on the record; therefore my hon. friend, in the parlance of the legal profession, is out of court.

Mr. TOLMIE: Had the Postmaster General requests from the west to make these changes concerning letter carriers? Were there complaints and requests from western postal officials?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think when the matter was under consideration the other evening, I said that I could not speak so positively with regard to Victoria, but I know there were protests from Vancouver.

Mr. TOLMIE: Asking for the change?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Oh, no, protests after the change was made.

Mr. TOLMIE: What I wanted to know was whether there were any requests for the change from merchants or others interested at any of these western points.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not recall any from that section of the country.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has the proposal of the federated association for a five day week been considered by the department and, if so, what decision has been reached?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No decision has been reached. The deputation representing the amalgamated civil servants spent the forenoon with me the other day discussing the matter. They placed before me the proposition, which is not new by any means, of an eight hour day and a five day week. I heard everything they had to offer by way of argument, and no decision has been reached.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has this new plan been in operation sufficiently long for the minister to form an opinion as to its success?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is the delivery on holidays and Saturday afternoons?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Well, I am absolutely satisfied that for the Christmas and New Year period and for Saturday afternoons it would be impossible to revert to the old system and give the public a reasonable service.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In spite of what the minister has said I should like to protest against the change that was made last Christmas season. A few moments ago the minister suggested that the demand came from the larger centres, and he tells us now that it would be quite impossible to give the service if we reverted to the old arrangement. As a matter of fact, we had the old arrangement for a great many years. The postal employees in my city objected very decidedly to the change, in the first place because of the arbitrary way in which the announcement was made. They had no previous indication, I understand, that this change was being made. At times this department has considered the advisability of setting up some sort of joint councils. It seems to me that whether or not we have such councils, the least that might be done, where a large group of faithful employees such as the postmen are concerned, would be to give due notice of the intention of the department; in fact I think they might have been taken into consultation.

With regard to the deliveries at Christmas, in our childhood we had an old saying, "Christmas comes but once a year." I think everyone feels that the postmen, who are serving us very, very faithfully, ought to be allowed to have Christmas day off. Some of them regard Christmas as having a very distinct religious significance. The great majority of them look upon it as a home day, and I do not think, merely because they are government employees, the postmen ought to be deprived of enjoying that one day in the year. A great many of them have very heavy work prior to Christmas; many men have heavy work during Christmas week. I do not object so much to the delivery on New Year's day, which has neither the same religious significance nor the same home traditions and which, outside of perhaps the Scotch community—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad the hon. member made that exception.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —has nothing like the same significance as Christmas day. I would plead that the men be given Christmas day. I know that the interests of the general public must be considered. I think I touch a fair cross-section of the community, and among my own friends in various circles I found a good deal of regret expressed because of the action taken by the department. Business men do not want their mail delivered on Christmas day, except under very exceptional circumstances. The people who most enjoy Chirstmas day want other people also to have an opportunity to enjoy themselves. For many years past it has been the practice of the department, and a very good practice too, to send out a warning to the public to post their Christmas mail early. They have fair warning, and if they delay in getting out their Christmas mail I see no reason why the postmen should be penalized. If necessary, an extra force should be put on. I know extra men are put on, but, if necessary, that force could be doubled, in order that as much mail as is required may be delivered by the day before Christmas.

I should also like to say a word with regard to Saturday afternoon. Last year I protested in this house against the practice that had grown up of frequently having no delivery for two or three days. Often a holiday falls on a Monday, which would mean that there would be no delivery from Saturday morning until Tuesday. I think we made a mistake in allowing that practice to develop, because I knew of certain business men who had important mail delayed for two or three days. I suggested that some change should be made in order to remedy that state of affairs. Now the minister has gone altogether too far. He now wants to take away the Saturday half holiday in any case. It would seem to me reasonable that there might be a delivery in certain restricted business districts on Saturday afternoon. I recognize that important mail may have to be delivered at that time, but as far as the general public are concerned, many people now take Saturday afternoon off, and I do not see why the postmen, with the exception of those necessary for the delivery of mail in such restricted areas, should not have their Saturday afternoons free as well. I brought up this matter last year and pleaded that a change should be made so that we would not run through from Saturday until Tuesday without a mail delivery, and because of that fact I now ask the minister not to go quite as far as he has gone and, if possible, to give the great majority of the men their Saturday afternoons off.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I just want to say a word to my hon. friend, first with regard to his suggestion that these regulations were put into effect without notice having been given. My hon. friend is in error there, quite unintentionally I am sure, because I do not think he was here the other evening when this matter was discussed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but I know the postmen say they did not get very much notice.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): All their representatives had notice of the matter and discused it with me on, I think, the 27th of November. We intended to put it into effect the following Saturday, but at their request we allowed it to stand over for a week longer in order that they might be able to communicate with the people whom they represented. I am very greatly surprised to find my hon. friend taking the position he now takes, because I always thought he was a very easy man to satisfy. When these estimates were under consideration last year, I find that on April 24 my hon. friend made this statement:

> There are two criticisms of the service which have been given me by certain business people. One is in regard to delay in delivering letters owing to holidays. In many places now Saturday is a half holiday; there is no delivery on Sunday, of course, and it is becoming the practice on a number of occasions to give a holiday on Monday, which means that the mail is not delivered for two and a half and sometimes three days. In the case of urgent business or sickness or anything of that kind that is a very long delay. Personally I do not want to see the men deprived of their holidays, but I think it might be possible by a slight increase of staff to arrange that there would not be that long delay.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; I referred to that to-night.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I take it now that the hon. member is entirely in accord with Saturday afternoon deliveries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I have always said, if I may say—

Mr. GRAY: Just like the defence estimates.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know why we have to have interruptions of this kind that are absolutely irrelevant even if they come from the chief whip.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): An angry man.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If you are going to permit the defence debate to be continued to-night, I am quite willing we should go into it.

Mr. JACOBS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We were told the other day we were wasting time when we were considering an expenditure of $35,000,000, one which might involve this country in war—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We were told we were wasting time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Keep smiling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is out of order in referring to a past debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Keep smiling.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But the chief whip of the Liberal party referred to a past debate before I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He was out of order too.

The CHAIRMAN: Any hon. member of the committee who in this discussion refers to a past debate is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; the chairman did not call him to order but he did call me to order.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not hear him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The chairman never hears, when it is on the Liberal side.

The CHAIRMAN: That is a reflection on the chair, and I want it withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will recall it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member withdraw?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I withdraw it. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, to come back to the question we are discussing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and protect me from interruption, and reference to other debates, I would like to say with regard to this matter that the Postmaster General was quite right when he read from the remark I made last year in the house. I said I had had complaints from certain business people to the effect that it was too long a time from a delivery on Saturday morning until Tuesday morning, and I thought arrangements could be made, when two holidays occurred in that way, whereby, through putting on extra men, there would not be that long delay. But I said it seemed to me to be going altogether too far to proceed to cut out the Saturday holiday for all the men. That had not been in my mind at all a year ago. I said I thought that in the swing back from what seemed to be a certain easy-going arrangement the Postmaster General had gone too far.

I do think that it might be possible for the majority of the men to be given a half holiday on Saturday, but that in certain restricted business districts a Saturday afternoon service might be given by putting on more men. That is all I said, I wish especially that the Postmaster General would reconsider the Christmas arrangements, so that the postmen would have their Christmas day.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I know how interested the hon. member is on behalf of the people who are engaged in this and other kinds of labour. I hope I am not entirely unsympathetic to those men. We are paying a very substantial sum for the Saturday afternoon service and it is treated as overtime. Formerly, when the Saturday afternoons were taken off, when Christmas was taken off and when New Year's day was taken off, there was no reduction in the pay of the men. When we give the extra service we give overtime to the men who serve. I do not see how there could be any possible objection, and I know that was the view of the people who represented them on the discussions. Of course it is only fair to say that they preferred to get the overtime pay, that they did not want to have the time worked off by somebody other than themselves. However, this time is being worked off, and we are paying a substantial amount for it. We thought we had given fair treatment to the people engaged in the service.

Mr. MUTCH: I should like to learn from the Postmaster General if he has had a number of protests from business people in Winnipeg with respect to deliveries on Saturday afternoon. That city is perhaps distinguished by the fact that the vast majority of business offices are closed that afternoon. I have had a great many communications from people in the postal service and even more from people in business offices protesting against having their mail fired through a slot in the door only to lie there from Saturday noon until Monday morning.

I was interested, too, in the fact that the minister based his decision in this matter upon investigations conducted in Montreal. It is not very often an hon. member rises to boast of the smaller size of his native city, but, after all, certain conditions which obtain in large centres are not found in the smaller ones, and the absence of those conditions accounts for many of us choosing to live in a smaller city where we believe working conditions are more favourable and where we may live the type of life we desire.

Throughout my constituency I have not heard any approval of the Saturday afternoon delivery. If there are some in the constituency who like it, at least they have not been vocal. If the minister has heard from them, I should like to know about it. With respect to Christmas delivery may I say that I have lived in Winnipeg for a number of years, during which we did not have Christmas delivery. In Winnipeg I believe we have not experienced any grievous disrupting of the mail service on that account. Very few business offices do any serious business in the few days before Christmas—I have had enough experience to know that; no doubt much of the post office Christmas business is in Christmas cards.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, my question may sound peculiar, but I do not find any item, other than this one, under which it could be asked. Are there any rules and regulations governing the sending of anonymous literature through the mail? I refer particularly to literature which may be described as propaganda. I believe there are parcels of literature going through the mail which are really a menace to peace, order and good government. During an election campaign literature must have printed upon it the name of the printer and the name of the party under whose authority the literature is printed. But between elections the mails are used for purposes of propaganda, and on many occasions carry anonymous letters.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There is a section in the act forbidding the sending of any obscene, immoral or scurrilous communications. The difficulty in connection with anonymous matter is to find out who is sending it in order that he may be brought within the provisions of this section. In the great majority of cases it is practically impossible to find out who is sending this type of mail. The sender usually typewrites his letter; he uses a different type of envelope and paper from that which he is in the habit of using and he mails the letter at a different post office. If his letters reach the point of being scurrilous or obscene or immoral, then the act would apply, but there is no section referring to anonymous matter.

Mr. HANSELL: I recognize the difficulty in tracing the sending of such a letter, but oftentimes packages of literature come through the mail. However, the answer given will have to suffice. To what section of the act was the minister referring?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Section 7. We have had a case come up which is exactly in point. We find that occasionally this anonymous mail is posted by some official in the department. We are to-day recommending the dismissal of an official in the department for putting anonymous matter into circulation.

Mr. WEIR: I should like to say a word or two with reference to the delivery of mail by rural mail carriers. I am surprised to hear certain hon. members complaining about getting too much mail service. When a holiday comes on a Monday, as happens in many instances, mail on the rural routes is delivered on the previous Friday and then there is no more delivery until the following Wednesday. This is what happens in many of the rural parts of Manitoba due to train services and other conditions. Such a service is certainly not good, and if this holiday service is going to be considered a general policy, I think some consideration should be given to the people residing in the rural districts. Where the rural mail carrier is permitted to consider Saturday as a holiday, there is no delivery of mail between Friday afternoon and Wednesday when a holiday falls on Monday.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go quite as far as some hon. members have gone in criticizing the minister, particularly certain hon. members on his own side of the house. I think the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) express the sentiments of most hon. members with relation to postal employees working on Saturday afternoons and on Christmas day. Why does the minister permit a different condition to exist in one province from that existing in other provinces? The Postmaster General admitted to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that the postmen in the city of Quebec did not have to work on Christmas day. I should think that if the Postmaster General issued a regulation as to the working hours of posties, that regulation should be uniform in all the cities of Canada. The posties of one city should not be privileged over the posties in other cities.

When these estimates were last before the committee, the Postmaster General admitted that a number of young men had been brought in from Newmarket, Aurora and other points within twenty-five miles of Toronto to work as extra postal employees during the rush period. I notice the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) is present, but I am sorry the hon. member for York West (Mr. Streight) is not. They should be proud of having been able to get positions for so many men in Toronto to the exclusion of unemployed young men in that city. They certainly lowered my prestige. When I was home last Saturday a number of people told me that I did not seem to have any more influence. They had read the Postmaster General's remark and they realized why the young men in my riding were not able to get on at Christmas as extra postal employees. As a matter of fact, I did not try to get any on, but that is actually what happened.

When I was home, I met a postie who was dressed in a brown uniform. I asked him why he was not dressed like the other posties and he told me he was just on temporarily. I asked him if he had tried his examinations under the civil service, and he told me quite frankly that he had not, that he had come in from North York to go to work. I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for that district on the large number of young men he has been able to place in the city of Toronto. Shortly afterwards I met two other young men who had tried the postal examinations advertised for November 21. I ask the minister if this is the proper way to run a department? The newspapers carried a great story about the several hundred additional employees who were to be taken on in the postal service, and examinations were advertised for November 21. These young men went down and tried the examinations, but here we are well into the new year and those who passed are not yet in the service. When the estimates were last before the committee, the minister told us that the said extra employees would be on until perhaps March 1.

In conclusion, I want to say that I endorse every word of objection that has been said with reference to working on Saturday afternoons. This is a new thing as far as Toronto is concerned. I also endorse all the objections made to posties working on Christmas day. I hope the minister will turn over a new leaf. His estimates have been under a good deal of fire, more from his own side of the chamber than from this, and he should consider taking patronage out of his department and turning the appointments back to the civil service commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I was not going to interrupt the hon. member for Davenport if he was saying "carried," but as it was something else he had in mind I wish briefly to reply. We consulted the civil service commission as to what should be done in the way of temporary help to work out overtime. We were advised that they could not have examinations completed early enough for this period of Christmas help and temporary help for working off overtime. I have a letter from the chairman of the commission in which he made suggestions that he thought would meet satisfactorily this question of overtime, and we are following them to the letter.

Mr. MacINNIS: In reply to some remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) replied that these new conditions were not put into effect without consultation with representatives of the organizations or assosiations of which the post office employees are members. I have before me a letter dated February 16 from the secretary of one of these bodies, and I find in the very first paragraph this sentence:

> We would like to point out that no employee organization was consulted prior to the government bringing the new policy into effect.

I do not think the Postmaster General is paying any attention. I wonder whether we can have his attention.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I beg pardon.

Mr. MacINNIS: He is holding up the estimates. I thank him. I was pointing out to the committee that the Postmaster General, in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, made the statement that before effect was given to this policy the employees' organizations had been consulted. I also pointed out that the correspondence I have had with the secretary of one of the organizations indicates definitely that they were not consulted prior to the new policy being put into effect.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Let me inform the hon. member that I have a list of the delegates. It includes Mr. Duncan, secretary of the Canadian postal employees; Mr. Moran, of the same organization, and a number of other gentlemen, including Mr. Draper, Mr. Reaves, and Mr. Fitchett, who consulted me on the 24th of November. At that time we intended to put the change into effect the following Saturday afternoon, November 28, but at their request, after consultation first of all as to whether they should be paid or somebody, at least, should be paid for the extra time, and they had worked out with Mr. Underwood the method in which that overtime should be worked off, it was arranged that the change would not be put into effect until Saturday, December 5, in order that they might have an opportunity of communicating with the people they represented. That is all I can say.

Mr. MacINNIS: The announcement of the new policy was made, was it not, on November 17?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think so.

Mr. MacINNIS: Prior to that date had there been any consultation with the associations?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No.

Mr MacINNIS: Then the ordinary course was not followed, that is the usual procedure between an employer of labour and an accredited association of employees, of taking them into consultation before adopting a new policy in regard to the particular work. It is correct to say that that policy was adopted without consultation with the employees. However, I do not have to labour that point because, from the information I have, the employees' associations are not objecting to continuous service; if there is a difference of opinion it is as to which method should be adopted, a five-day week, or a six-day week with a lay-off for a certain time. In that regard has any definite policy yet been adopted?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. The five-day week is another proposition, and I should prefer that my hon. friend would not mix the two matters, because they are not related. The position is this. I think there would be unanimity among all the employees if they, the present employees, got overtime in cash instead of somebody else being taken on to work out the overtime. That, I think, is about the main question between them. But I explained to them that this is being given to people who do not have jobs, and it was thought it was fairer to give this bit of work to someone who was not employed rather than to somebody who already had a job. The employee gets, as my hon. friend understands, a week off for every eleven afternoons that he puts in.

Mr. PELLETIER: Some time ago I read about a new and improved service between Edmonton and Athabaska. Would the minister explain what that new service is?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think the hon. member is referring to the service between Edmonton and Lloydminster. We have recently changed from baggage car service to a railway post office between Edmonton and Lloydminster by way of Willingdon.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not what I was referring to. I recently read an announcement in the Edmonton press that consideration had been given to a request or that a request had been made to increase the service between Edmonton and Athabaska. Is there anything in that?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. That matter is under consideration, but no decision has been reached.

Mr. PELLETIER: Before the minister comes to any decision, I should like to tell him about the service that the Peace River country is now receiving. It is not my intention to make a speech this evening about the merits of the Peace River country—I shall do that later on—but I should like to point out that the present population is somewhere around 70,000 and that the only service we get there is two trains a week; that is, we get mail on Tuesdays and Fridays and the rest of the time we have to go without it. I understand that the United Air Transport planes operating out of Edmonton are carrying on a daily service between Edmonton and the town of Grande Prairie, and the department could very well utilize that line to give a more frequent mail service to the residents of the north country. Nowhere else in Canada, no matter how distant it is, are 70,000 people receiving so little attention as we in the Peace River country. This may be due, of course, to the poor efforts of the member for the constituency, but I shall try to remedy that in the near future. I should like the minister to consider seriously what I am saying, because I believe these people are entitled to better mail service than they are receiving. Two years ago the Lesser Slave lake rose to such a degree that at various points it washed out the railroad. There was a time when no mail was delivered for a period of seven or eight days, and even at that, motor boats had to be used to bridge the gaps over various portions of the railway which had been washed out. The service at that time was most unsatisfactory. I am sure the minister, knowing the beautiful climate of that part of the country, is aware that it would be possible to use aeroplanes to a greater extent than at the present time, especially in view of the fact that there is now an established passenger service between Edmonton and Grande Prairie. The people of that country would be grateful to him if he could find it in his heart to help them and to give them the consideration which is due them.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I can assure my hon. friend that that matter, and a great many other requests from people who think they are in almost as bad a position as that in which the people of the Peace River district consider themselves to be, are receiving the best attention we can give them.

Mr. RICKARD: If the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) has been successful through the medium of the civil service commission, he is to be complimented. I have been interested in this discussion on dismissals and I can tell the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) that, as far as I know, the dismissals have not been one-sided, because I know there are cases in my constituency where dismissals have been made without any commission being appointed. It would be interesting to the hon. member for Lincoln and other hon. members to look up the records for the constituency I represent and see how dismissals have been made there. In one instance a man was dismissed merely on the word of a certain gentleman, notwithstanding that the reports all showed that everything had been O.K. throughout. There were no reports that were not perfectly in order; yet this man was dismissed without cause and the secretary of the Conservative association, a man who had held that position for some years, was appointed postmaster. The old postmaster had two girls working for him, one a Liberal and the other a Conservative. When the new postmaster was appointed he dismissed the Liberal girl and kept the Conservative. These dismissals are not by any means all one-sided, and, as I say, the hon. member for Lincoln would find it interesting to look up the record.

Mr. SPENCE: You have asked us to be fair to you, Mr. Chairman, and I suggest that you should be fair to the committee. You saw me on my feet half a dozen times and yet you allowed five other hon. gentlemen to speak. It is hardly fair of you when you expect civility not to show us some in return.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: That is all I am going to say; I am not criticizing you too severely, but I do not want to be jumping up and down like a jack-in-the-box. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) made some remarks with regard to the eligible list of persons to be appointed as letter carriers and postmen in Toronto. I believe that some two hundred are wanted. The minister says that he has a letter from the civil service commission to the effect that the examination papers have not yet been all read. I have been making inquiries and have been told that the examiners of the civil service commission are really breaking down in health, they are working so hard. Whoever heard of such a thing around here? Just imagine a man writing an examination last November and the papers not being checked up yet by the great staff they have in the Hunter building! It seems to me their system should be changed or they should be eliminated entirely if they cannot do better.

Speaking of Saturday afternoon deliveries and the delivery on Christmas day and New Year, I am not going to criticize them at all because every city has its own difficulties. In Toronto, if we did not get a Saturday afternoon delivery the service would be poor indeed, and until the Post Office Department decides to give us an up to date service and have the mail that goes out on the train from Montreal or Ottawa as well as the mail coming from the west, sorted and delivered to people resident two or three miles distant from the post office, it is no service at all. If I wrote a letter to my home on Friday and that letter arrived in Toronto at 7.30 Saturday morning, it would not be delivered at my house until Monday morning. We are entitled to better service.

I am not asking men to work on Saturday afternoon, but I submit that there should be some system whereby the morning mail would be sorted and got out before noon. Around King street, Colborne street and Church street there are three or four deliveries before twelve o'clock, though, as some hon. members have said, most of the places there are closed in the afternoon and people do not want deliveries there at that time of day. On the other hand, the outlying districts will get no service at all if they do not get an afternoon delivery on Saturday.

As regards delivery on Christmas day, I have spoken to only two or three of the postmen and they all tell me that they were delighted to deliver mail on Christmas day because the presents came in fast and they went home happy, whereas if they did not deliver mail on Christmas day they would not get as much out of the job. On New Year's day there is not the same demand for service, though the Scotchman from Davenport thinks it is as important. I have to differ with some of my best friends and with the Postmaster General himself at times.

At any rate, the laughing stock of the whole matter is the suggestion that the civil service commission have not been able to examine three or four hundred papers written early in November. It is now the twenty-fourth of February and the papers have not yet all been examined. I am told by the department that the health of the civil service commission examiners is breaking down because they are working night and day. If you make any complaint to that department you get a long letter from the secretary, Mr. Foran, a letter of three or four pages cleverly written. I have been in this house since 1921 and I have never yet known a friend of mine who wrote an examination, whether he got 96, 98 or 100 per cent to get a job from the civil service commission. Is there not something wrong? I will go so far as to say that half of the jobs advertised are filled before the advertisement reaches us, and it is only a waste of paper because we simply throw these advertisements into the wastepaper basket.

The civil service has become a matter of personal patronage; it is not political patronage, though it might as well be political. I have never seen a service so badly looked after in my life. It is really a scandal, the way in which it is handled. We have many good friends there and we look sometimes for fair treatment, but it seems to me that no matter who it is you get the same treatment, because they say, "Oh, we are all sworn to do so and so." They are sworn to look after themselves and their own friends.

Mr. FAIR: I have been attempting for about an hour to get a word in and now that everyone else has spoken, perhaps I can ask one or two questions. I was wondering, in those cases where a commission is necessary, what procedure is followed in order to have a commissioner appointed.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The commissioner is appointed on recommendation of the Minister of Justice to council.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the civil service commission make a recommendation to the Minister of Justice?

Mr. FAIR: Is the commissioner sometimes a partisan or is he always independent? An hon. member here said that a partner of the party who laid the complaint was appointed as commissioner. That does not look good to me. I was wondering whether these commissioners are partisan or whether they are independent.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The department recommends obtaining the best man possible, to make the investigation, and I have great faith in the Minister of Justice appointing nobody who is not thought to be competent for that office. Then, of course, the commissioner who is appointed under the Inquiries Act is sworn to do his duty without fear, favour or affection.

Mr. FAIR: Do these commissioners get any remuneration in the way of travelling or living expenses or per diem allowance?

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): They do; they get travelling expenses and send in a bill for their time, and that is taxed by the justice department also.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to know whether any new post offices were established during 1936, and if so, how many in each province.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Does my hon. friend refer to the calendar year?

Mr. FAIR: Calendar year or fiscal year.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): My hon. friend will find in the Postmaster General's report for the year ended March 31, 1936, the new post offices established in that year. The report for this year of course is not yet made. But if he will look at page 6 of the report for 1935-36, he will see the total number of offices established from April 1, 1935, to March 31, 1936, was 148. The number closed in the same period was sixty-one. The number opened during the period November 1, 1935, to December 31, 1936, by provinces is as follows:

Nova Scotia	6
Prince Edward Island	0
New Brunswick	14
Quebec	79
Ontario	53
Manitoba	9
Saskatchewan	30
Alberta	17
British Columbia	16
	224

Mr. FAIR: Were any rural mail routes established in the same period?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I cannot at the moment give with the same definiteness the number of mail routes. There were some new routes established, some improvements to the services, that is in the frequency of mails in a number of post offices. I could not give that up to date, but I could get it for my hon. friend if he wishes.

Mr. GREEN: May I make a suggestion with regard to the extra help that will be required in the larger cities at the coming Christmas? Last year we provided for a veterans' assistance commission, whose duty was to help solve the problem of unemployed veterans in Canada. I believe that there are 33,000 unemployed veterans who have answered the questionnaire sent out by that commission, and over half of that number are employable. In addition to the commission, there are strong honorary local committees, in ten cities at least, perhaps more by this time. These men are doing their best to get work for these unemployed veterans, and my suggestion to the minister is that he adopt a policy of giving this veterans' assistance commission and also these honorary local committees the first choice in the placing of men required for extra post office work at Christmas time. If he will do that, and particularly if he will announce such a policy shortly, it will give great encouragement to these local committees and also to the unemployed veterans, and might go a long way towards making the veterans' assistance commission a success.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There were 817 returned soldiers engaged for this work for the last Christmas rush in Toronto alone. That is 204 more than were engaged the year before. Every returned soldier who was on the eligible list and was available and suitable for the employment was taken. I might give a statement of how these employees are selected. Returned soldiers with dependents get the preference; next, civilians with dependents; next, returned soldiers without dependents, and, last, civilians without dependents.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that that has been the rule, and I am not complaining particularly about what happened last Christmas, because I do not know. But now this veterans' assistance commission has been set up, and they are dealing with the problem of the unemployed returned men—I emphasize the word "unemployed"—it would help a great deal if the department would make a new rule in regard to veterans, and would go first to the veterans' assistance commission, and to the honorary local committees which are serving under that commission, for a list of returned men who are to get the preference.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think the veterans' organization is nearly always consulted by the postmaster in any district where there is any large number of soldiers being taken on. But I shall make further inquiries and give the matter my best consideration.

Mr. GREEN: The veterans' assistance commission has been appointed recently. It was not in a position to furnish names last Christmas, but I believe it will be this coming Christmas. I am sure the Minister of Pensions will endorse my suggestion.

Mr. POWER: I am wondering why my hon. friend is in such a hurry to get their reports, when he says they have only started to work. Not long ago he kept me here three hours to get an interim report.

Mr. GREEN: Well, they seem to be working very slowly; I am trying to help the minister out. I think he should be more grateful.

Mr CLARKE (Rosedale): May I ask the Postmaster General if he could give the total number of employees in the Toronto district, both returned men and general, during the Christmas rush? Also is it possible to get the names and addresses of these temporary employees to see whether they reside in Toronto? There seems to be a kind of inference that a considerable number came from outside Toronto, and if we could get the addresses that matter might be cleaned up

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not think there will be any difficulty in getting the names at any rate.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): And addresses; the addresses are very important.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If the postmaster has kept the addresses, I shall be glad to have them furnished to my hon. friend.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not wish to hold up the vote unnecessarily, but I should like to come back to the very important matter of the balance sheet. On a previous occasion the minister said the surplus would be a little more than $3,000,000. In the course of his remarks on that occasion he stated that this year the cost of the franking privilege would amount to $1,001,000. I should like to know why the cost of the franking privilege during the first year in office of the Liberal party should increase from $750,000 to $1,001,000, or by approximately fifty per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is for both incoming and outgoing mail. Of course there has been a general increase in the business of the departments of the government, and I can only say that the members, who are largely responsible for the use of the franking privilege, decide how much mail they shall send. Of course there are also certain departmental documents that are sent out, and I suppose the departments decide that. I could get my hon. friend the particulars.

Mr. MARSHALL: Am I correct in assuming that $1,001,000 is the correct figure, while the amount of $750,000 stated in the annual report is an approximate figure?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The $750,000 is an accurate estimate made, as I understand it, by actual measurement of the mail going out from here. The $1,001,000 includes the mail coming in.

Mr. MARSHALL: My next question deals with the matter of the expense in connection with the savings bank branch of the post office. The amount stated in the return is $60,000, while the amount mentioned by the minister is $80,000, an increase of $20,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am told that this increase is attributable to an increase in the number of accounts and the general overhead expenses.

Mr. MARSHALL: Can the minister inform the committee as to the amount of money that was actually paid to the postmasters in connection with their work in the savings bank branch?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not have it just at hand but I shall have it in a moment.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have another question. Is the amount charged for heating assumed by the Post Office Department or by some other department? What I should like to get is a correct balance sheet for the Post Office Department.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The estimate given was prepared, I understand with a great deal of labour and care, by the Public Works department.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is that expenditure assumed by the Public Works department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have just two more short questions. and then I am through. What rate of interest is allowed on deposits in the post office savings bank?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I understand it is two per cent.

Mr. MARSHALL: Could the minister give me the net profit derived from the operations of the post office savings bank last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The money all goes into the consolidated revenue fund. We pay the postmaster 27½ cents per $100 deposited, and the money that is deposited goes into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. MARSHALL: The point I am trying to make is that if the post office savings bank costs the government $80.000 and the profits are less than $80,000, I cannot understand why the government should maintain that branch. Why not leave the business to the chartered banks? I should like to get the information if it is available.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think I can explain to my hon. friend just how this works out. This money is paid into the consolidated revenue fund. The finance department has the use of the money. Certain fees are paid to the postmasters for services rendered in taking in the deposits, but the Post Office Department receives no pay as a department. This policy was originated with a view to encouraging thrift by inducing people to deposit savings in this bank, which has the security of the dominion at its back. The offices are there; we have the facilities with which to give the service, and I say very frankly that I think the public should avail themselves of that privilege to a much greater extent than has been the case up to the present. A good rate has always been paid on deposits, and the dominion has had the use of the money at that rate.

Mr. MARSHALL: How many branches are there in the dominion?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If my hon. friend will look at page 11 of the last report, that is, the report for the year ended March 31, 1936, he will see all the details as the situation existed at that time. There have been some changes since then. At that time the number of post offices transacting business had increased from 1,272 to 1,282 and the amount on deposit was a little over $22,000,000. The number of depositors is given, together with the number of new accounts issued.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LENNARD: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Peel has the floor.

Mr. LENNARD: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who was given the floor is not speaking from his proper seat in this house.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is not well taken in committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I came down to this seat from the back benches with the idea of finding out whether there was anything in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) with respect to being noticed by the chair when one desires to ask a question. After sitting here a moment or so I have a suggestion to make. I believe money would be well spent to provide rear-vision mirrors for hon. members sitting in the front seats, so that they will have an opportunity of seeing those on the rear benches who have stood up and wish to speak. Seriously, I should like to learn from the minister whether or not the advertising done by the Post Office Department to avoid a Christmas rush of mail has had the effect of equalizing the traffic. If not, at what time during the Christmas season does the peak load come?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): My advice is that for years advertising has been carried on urging all persons sending extra mail to mail it as early as possible. Apparently in Canada we have not yet formed the habit of mailing early, as it is done in the old country. I am told the campaign over there has succeeded much better than has the one in Canada. I believe, however, that, in view of the large amount of mail handled, the advertising did some good last Christmas. I cannot express too strongly the wisdom of mailing as early as possible.

Mr. LENNARD: How many temporary employees were taken on in Hamilton during the Christmas and New Year rush?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I cannot answer directly, but I could get the information from the postmaster at Hamilton. Probably there will be returns in the office here in Ottawa.

Mr. LENNARD: And the number of returned men?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes; I should be glad to get the information and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister tell me the number of postal notes or post office orders issued on Christmas day in Hamilton? I can furnish the information, if he does not have it.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Then I wonder why the hon. member asks me.

Mr. LENNARD: I was wondering whether the minister knew.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No.

Mr. LENNARD: As we are aware, Hamilton post office was open Christmas day. I would suppose the wicket at which the postal notes would be handed out would be attended by possibly two employees. The fact is that only one postal note was issued, and that about five o'clock on Christmas afternoon.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wish to correct a reference made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) in a discussion which took place earlier in the evening. It was a question as to general standing in the community; I do not wish the inference to go out that it was a question of character.

May I say to the minister that I appreciate the explanation he gave in connection with the evidence. Now that the dismissal has been made, from the explanation given by the minister I conclude that it was made because of the indiscretion of the father who was seventy-two years of age, and that there is nothing against the present holder of the post office. That was the impression I got. The indiscretion of the father, as I understand it, seemed to be the important point. Am I correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I would say that the postmaster is liable for the indiscretion of his assistant in a case like this.

Mr. LAWSON: That is a terrible principle.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The evidence went to show that these discussions took place on several occasions in the presence of the postmaster, in the post office or the store of which the post office formed a part, and without any objection from the postmaster.

Mr. LOCKHART: But the point I am raising is this: The charge of indiscretion was brought against the assistant postmaster. No charge of any kind whatever was brought against the postmaster himself.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Does the hon. member think it was very discreet for the postmaster to stand by and allow his father, who is his assistant, to talk politics to the people coming into the office? If that is being discreet, then he was guilty of no indiscretion.

Mr. LOCKHART: But the new postmaster appointed was not involved in any way, was he, with the exception of the indiscretion of allowing his father, a man of seventy-two years, to discuss matters?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I have the return before me; I do not recall anything else, other than attending meetings.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to inquire about the trans-Canada mail, from the east to Vancouver. Are the contracts held by both railways or by one of them? For instance, are the mails to Vancouver connecting with the boat service handled by both railways? I know the Canadian National Railways, which pass through a large section of my constituency, carry no mails. The result is that the mail goes to Vancouver and then back up through some other service, perhaps by way of an electric railway or some other means. If the contracts are held by one road, for how many years has that been the condition?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The rates are set by order in council. There is no definite term in the contract.

Mr. BARBER: No term in the contract?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No; each railway is utilized to the extent the department thinks it can best be utilized to the advantage of the service.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that for a number of years the mails have been carried over one road.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In some cases that is true.

Mr. BARBER: The other road, the junior one, has not had the opportunity to carry them.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is true in regard to some of the services.

Mr. BARBER: And that will be continued, I suppose?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Well, it is hard to say what may happen.

Mr. WALSH: I do not wish unnecessarily to delay the passage of the item. I believe the district of Montreal has been fairly well treated by the Post Office Department. Outside the occasional instance of a dog biting a postman, and some other minor incidents, we have fairly good service. However, there is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I have before me a file almost a quarter of an inch thick detailing my effort to secure a post office box on the corner of Grey and Western avenues in Notre Dame de Grace in the district of Mount Royal. I believe delay is being caused through the inaction of the postal authorities in Montreal. I bring the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General so that he may stir them up to a little quicker action, and have the box placed in the location I have indicated for the convenience of the public living in the immediate vicinity. I hope the minister will give the matter some consideration, and ascertain where the delay has been occasioned. If instructions have been given for the placing of the box, so much the better.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I shall have the matter looked into. I cannot say I have given personal attention to it, but I am strongly of the impression that possibly something can be done.

Mr. RYAN: Is the department contemplating air mail service between Saint John and Halifax? I ask this because the present train service is inadequate and an opportunity is being offered to establish a service by air.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): This matter would be considered in connection with the general air mail service, but no decision has been arrived at.

Mr. RYAN: I would like the Postmaster General to consider this matter apart from the general scheme as this is something which is very urgent. It is possible to have such a service established at no great cost and I would appreciate if the minister would give this matter special consideration. The ordinary service has been cut down and the merchants are suffering great hardships. I know the board of trade and other organizations have been pressing this matter, and I ask the minister to give it special consideration.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It has been discussed by the gentleman who is in charge of the air service down there and is receiving consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it the intention to establish an air mail service between Charlottetown and points in New Brunswick?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I understand there is a service between Moncton and Charlottetown.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will that be continued?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I hope so.

Mr. LENNARD: What number of postmasters in Canada receive less than $20 per month as commission on stamps?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I have not that information before me, but I can obtain it.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there any regulation covering the remuneration of sub-post offices in cities?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It runs to a maximum of $600 plus certain commissions according to the amount of business done.

Mr. LENNARD: Are there any sub-post offices on the outskirts of cities where the only remuneration received is the commission on stamps and postal orders?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The commission depends upon the amount of business done.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the rate of commission set by the department in Ottawa or by the postmaster of the city in which the sub-post office is located?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The rate is set by the department.

Mr. LENNARD: What would the rate of commission be for a sub-post office located on the outskirts of Hamilton?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If my hon. friend will look at page 21 of the last report of the Postmaster General, he will find the total revenue for Hamilton and the revenue of the various sub-post offices.

Mr. LENNARD: That does not quite answer my question. I want to know the usual rate of commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That is not shown here, but we can obtain it for my hon. friend.

Mr. LENNARD: Could the minister give the rate of commission on stamps paid to village post offices?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The minimum is $100. Then there is a commission of 70 per cent on the first $1,000. There is 50 per cent on that part of the money order commission collected from the public and included in the revenue from $1,000 to $10,000; there is 30 per cent on the postage stamp revenue from $1,000 to $10,000, and 20 per cent on anything over $10,000.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the commission for a post office on the outskirts of a city be as low as two per cent?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Is my hon. friend talking about stamp vendors or sub-postmasters?

Mr. LENNARD: A sub-post office.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I would not think it would be.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not want the minister to think I am trying to hold up his estimates. I shall be glad to take this matter up with him later on.

Item agreed to.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the newspaper "Le Journal," of Quebec, in its edition of Feb. 23, published the following report in connection with the amendment of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) to the national defence estimates:

> The same members who had voted for the motion of Mr. Gauthier voted for that of Mr. Thorson, excepting Mr. J. F. Pouliot, who was absent from the chamber at the time.

I was in the chamber at the time, and I did vote for the item and against the amendment, for the reasons recorded in Hansard.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Prarie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): In order that there may be no misapprehension I desire to place upon record my views with respect to this legislation, and as under our rules the mover of a third reading has no right of reply I shall endeavour to be scrupulously careful not to go beyond what was said during the discussion on the measure.

In the year 1935 the late governor introduced into parliament a bill which subsequently, on April 17 of that year, became chapter 23 of the statutes of Canada. It was intituled:

> An act to provide for the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

It was cited as The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. By section 3 of that act it is provided that:

> (1) The governor in council may establish a committee to be known as the prairie farm rehabilitation advisory committee, hereinafter called "the committee," the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.
> (3) The committee shall consist of the following:
>
> (a) one representative of the Manitoba grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;
> (b) one representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;
> (c) one representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(d) one representative of Saskatchewan live stock farmers from the drought areas;
(e) one representative of Alberta range farmers from the drought areas;
(f) one representative of mortgage companies of Canada;
(g) one representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association;
(h) one representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways;
(i) two representatives from the dominion Department of Agriculture; and
(j) one representative of the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The chairman, it will be observed, is to be appointed by the governor in council. Under the provision of that section of the act the following persons were appointed by the governor in council: Doctor E. S. Archibald, Ottawa, chairman; Dominion Department of Agriculture; James H. Girvin, Medora, Manitoba grain growing farmers; Olaf Nyland, Shaunavon, Sask., Saskatchewan grain growing farmers; P. C. Colquhoun, Maple Creek, Sask., Saskatchewan live stock farmers; Leonard Koole, Monarch, Alberta, Alberta grain growing farmers; R. P. Gilchrist, Wild Horse, Alberta, Alberta range farmers; Professor J. H. Ellis, Winnipeg, government of Manitoba; Dean A. M. Shaw, Saskatoon, government of Saskatchewan; O. S. Longman, Edmonton, government of Alberta, E. W. Jones, Calgary, Canadian Pacific Railway Company; Doctor W. J. Black, Montreal, Canadian National Railways; F. J. Freer, Winnipeg, mortgage companies of Canada; Doctor E. S. Hopkins, Ottawa, Dominion Department of Agriculture; B. P. Alley, Toronto, Canadian Bankers' Association.

These gentlemen were selected by the bodies whom they purport to represent, having been communicated with for that purpose by the then Minister of Agriculture. The bill now before the house for third reading repeals section 3 and dismisses from office without cause given the gentlemen I have named. The section in question reads as follows:

1. Section three of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, chapter 23 of the statutes of 1935, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

3. (1) The governor in council may establish one or more committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

2. One of the members of each committee shall be appointed chairman thereof by the minister.

My first objection therefore is that it is not fair to men who volunteer their services, who accept responsibility and serve without emolument, to dismiss them in this public fashion without cause and without opportunity to be heard. In other words reputable citizens of this country, giving public service, should not be subject to the humiliation of public dismissal by statute without at least some reasons being given why they are dismissed. To suggest that they may be reappointed is begging the question. They are dismissed by the repeal of the section of the statute under which they were appointed.

The second point to which I desire to direct attention is that the statute as amended —I have just read the new section 3—sets up one or more committees. I think it is axiomatic that advisory committees, dealing with a problem as vast as that to be considered in connection with the rehabilitation of the areas in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, should act as a unit, and that the advice which may be given from time to time by committees having different views upon the same problem would not be conducive either to economy in the public service or to efficiency and effectiveness in what they propose to do. The fact is that Swift Current was selected as the point from which operations were to be directed, and a laboratory was built there some time ago, but the central operations have now been removed to Regina. It must not be forgotten that there are three provinces affected, and the likelihood of completely efficient administration from a point like Swift Current is far greater than it would be from a city such as Regina, where the effects of the pressure of the government of one particular province will be much greater than they would be if the representation were from all the provinces.

Lastly I desire to point out that it is a little difficult to understand why such surprise should be manifested at objection being taken to the appointment of a new official in the person of John Vallance to administer this very important act. It was suggested that the preceding government had been guilty of appointing members of parliament, and a very strong attack was made on one gentleman who was appointed from this house to the position he now holds. If we take the language of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on a former occasion, if one can believe the reports that sometimes filter through with respect to caucuses, the hon. members for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) and Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) were not uncertain in their expressions of disapproval of Mr. Campbell on one occasion at that very important gathering known as the caucus. These are reports and rumours which merely filter through, and to which too much importance must not attach. The fact that in the appointment of Mr. Campbell it was provided that he could not be a candidate in an election apparently has been overlooked. But it is established beyond question that the gentleman appointed to administer this act resides within the area, and it has been rumoured—of course once more we must not attach too much importance to rumour—that he is not unwilling to be a candidate at a succeeding election. The manifest unfairness, therefore, if that should happen, of his being concerned in the administration of this act, must be painfully apparent to most of us.

I merely refer at this time to these objections to the measure in order that there may be no question as to the position we have taken, not out of ill will towards any individual but because it is a departure from what I conceive to be a sound principle. The possibility of an appointee again being a candidate in the area in which he is coming into such close contact with the people is something that was safeguarded in the Tariff Board Act by providing that members of that board who retired from office could not for a period of years be candidates in succeeding elections. The other point I have endeavoured to make is that it is detrimental to the public interest that those who serve without compensation or emolument should be humiliated by being publicly removed from office by statute. That is all that I desire to say, because I realize the desirability, on third reading of a measure, of being scrupulously careful not to go beyond the general statements that were made during the discussion of the measure in committee.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Before the third reading of this bill finally carries, and in reply to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) who so kindly mentioned me a moment ago in regard to remarks in caucus, I may say that he is entirely wrong in what he said, and not only that but I suggest that he try to keep up the fences of his own caucus without endeavouring to look after ours.

This committee that was set up was appointed not by statute but, as I understand it, by order in council. The committee which was to give such valuable advice to the government was called together once while the late government was in office, and I believe the members were appointed some three days before they were called together by wire. The soil laboratory work that my right hon. friend speaks of has been going on for years at the university in Saskatoon, and any change from Swift Current to Regina therefore will not affect that work at all.

In speaking of Mr. Vallance, who is in charge of the work out there, I would say that surely in a work of this kind it is much better to have in charge a man who has had actual experience, as Mr. Vallance has had, in Saskatchewan, rather than one even who has been in the government service on an experimental farm. Mr. Vallance came to Saskatchewan many years ago. He started in as a homesteader, went through all the trials and tribulations that every farmer in that country has had to face in recent years, and understands their situation from personal experience. Men who have been in government positions cannot see nearly as well as the ordinary farmer who has himself been through those experiences the troubles that the ordinary farmer has. Mr. Vallance is a practical man, a good grain farmer, a good live stock farmer, and a much better man to head such a committee or such work in that part of the country than any man who has been in a sheltered government position for many years and has never had to endure those hardships. As for Mr. Vallance coming back into public life, I hope some day he will do so. He was a great asset to this house and this country, and will be again if he ever chooses to run.

My right hon. friend accused Mr. Vallance of being that type of man who could not be in any town for more than an hour or two before getting mixed up in politics. I do not think that is a fair statement in regard to Mr. Vallance or any other man appointed to public office who, in his work, is supposed not to deal with politics but with the duties of the position to which he has been appointed. For instance, just prior to the election, my right hon. friend appointed to the bench in Saskatchewan perhaps one of the bitterest partisans we ever had in that province. I make no comments in that regard; I believe that gentleman has made an admirable judge. I think he forgot politics, as he should, the moment he was appointed to the bench, and I am satisfied that John Vallance is not talking or thinking politics any more than that man now on the bench is thinking politics. Because the one happens to be a lawyer and the other a poor rural rustic from Saskatchewan is no reason why these men should be put in different categories. It may be so in the minds of some people but certainly not in the minds of the people of western Canada.

Speaking of appointments made by those in office which should not be made, my mind harks back to the election of 1926. I believe at that time my right hon. friend was in charge of the Department of the Interior, and at that time there was appointed—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I was Minister of Finance.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Did not my right hon. friend also have charge of the Department of the Interior at that time?

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that I was Minister of Finance. My memory is not good enough to say whether or not I may have acted as Minister of the Interior on some occasions; I certainly acted in many capacities in those days.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): At that time, if my memory serves me aright, my right hon. friend was at least acting Minister of the Interior.

Mr. BENNETT: I may have been.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not altogether blame my right hon. friend for what happened, because we do not expect quarter to be given in an election campaign, but at that time certain homestead inspectors in Saskatchewan were dismissed by wire, and a man was appointed, presumably to be a homestead inspector, who worked throughout the election campaign. When the election was over a check up was made and it was found that this gentleman had never made any inspections at all. He had a good deal of trouble getting his pay from the department, and at the time his statement was that he was not hired as a homestead inspector to do homestead inspecting; he was hired to assist Doctor Swanson in the election. But he got $250 for it, just the same.

Perhaps when some of us look over our past records we would be better advised not to make comments upon political appointments, even when elections are not in the offing. Mr. John Vallance is not a political appointee. He is a first-class man for the position, and I do not think you could find anyone in that part of western Canada, other than outright political partisans, who would have one word to say against the appointment of Mr. Vallance for the work he is doing. Not only that; I think it will be found that under his direction this act will be carried out in much better fashion than it would have been under a man who did not have the same experience that Mr. Vallance has had in Saskatchewan.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): I should like to express the opinion of at least part of Manitoba with regard to this act, because it happens that in my riding there are three municipalities adjacent to the drought area under discussion. It seems to me that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has done a great disservice to the proper functioning of this act in the future. As I understood his remarks to-day they were simply an attack upon the man who has been charged with the administration of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: That was a minor part of my remarks.

Mr. GLEN: The right hon. gentleman referred to the removal of the office from Swift Current to Regina and to the dismissal of these men without cause, and his third point was a direct attack upon Mr. John Vallance. I am not here to say very much with regard to Mr. Vallance except, as has been well said by my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), that I think he is probably as capable and competent as many of the men appointed by my right hon. friend. If the right hon. gentleman is no better judge of the calibre of Mr. Vallance than he was of the calibre of some of his own appointees, I think there is a great deal of hope that this act may be carried out in a proper way.

I recall that the right hon. gentleman enunciated the doctrine that those in high positions ought to be able to carry out their policies without interference. I remember that when my right hon. friend became Prime Minister in 1930 he looked around for an ambassador to London and chose Hon. Howard Ferguson. Well, we know that Mr. Ferguson started out with very high qualifications, but he added to those qualifications by characterizing himself as a crusader who was going to convert the old country people to his point of view. We know his record during these years, and I venture to say that the ambassador appointed by this government has done more in his first year in office than Mr. Ferguson did during all the time he was in England. I might say also that the slogan "Canada Calling" that has been adopted by the present ambassador has met with a response which I think does great credit to our high commissioner, and I believe it will bring added benefits to this country.

I remember also that before my right hon. friend became Prime Minister he criticized some appointments made by the Liberal government, and in particular he picked upon the tariff board of that day. I remember the violent attack that was made upon the chairman of that board, the present hon. member of this house for Ontario (Mr. Moore). The reins of office were no sooner in the hands of my right hon. friend than Mr. Moore, as he was then, was fired from that job and the appointees of the new government put in. My right hon. friend spoke of the rumours with regard to Mr. Campbell. Well, I made it my business to look over Hansard to find out what the right hon. gentleman said at that time with regard to Mr. Campbell and his qualifications, and the only remark I could find was that Mr. Campbell was appointed because he was a western member. No other qualification was mentioned. Those of us who had some knowledge of Mr. Campbell were quite satisfied that he was no world renowned economist, and some of us did wonder why a Progressive, or a member of the Progressive body, should be appointed to an office which so directly affects people in western Canada.

What was the picture behind it? I am perfectly sure the right hon. the leader of the opposition did not approve that appointment, although he might have consented to it; for I am quite sure he does not suffer fools gladly. It might be interesting, however, to know just what services Mr. Campbell rendered the Conservative party which were sufficient to gain him an appointment from the then Conservative government. It must have been a most wonderful performance to be sufficient to gain him a statutory appointment at a salary of $10,000 a year. If he survives only two more years he will retire with a pension of $5,000. It is gall and wormwood to some of us to see anything done in that fashion. Further, it is serious for us to have to bear with it, but apparently the right hon. the leader of the opposition has made it as definite as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and it cannot be changed. The right hon. gentleman opposite spoke about rumours emanating from caucus. There was no need for rumours, because any hon. member on this side of the house would be willing to express here or on the platform exactly what was in his mind.

I can recall, too, that the right hon. gentleman, in his wisdom, appointed to the railway board a very distinguished judge, Mr. Fullerton. I have nothing to say against Mr. Fullerton, whom I know. I believe he has had a good record as a judge, but as head of the railway board in Canada surely a lawyer was not the man to appoint. As it happens, he has now retired from the office and a man who has some knowledge of his job has been placed in that position.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member is confusing two things. The head of the railway board has usually been a lawyer; the hon. member is referring to the head of the board of trustees.

Mr. GLEN: Yes, the head of the board of trustees. Whatever his denomination might be, the fact is that he had charge of the railways of Canada, and was responsible for the framing and formation of their policies.

As I said before, if the appointments the right hon, gentleman himself has made have shown such a lack of judgment, it ill behooves him to make an attack upon Mr. Vallance simply because he does not think Mr. Vallance is qualified for the position. My view is that the right hon. leader of the opposition has done a vast disservice to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in telling Canada that in his view the administration of the act by Mr. Vallance will not be a competent administration because he believes the head is not competent.

I am thoroughly convinced that as far as possible the act must be divested of any partisan affiliations on the part of those appointed. In looking over the constitution of the committee I can think of many people who should be represented on it but are not now represented. For instance, I find no members of boards of trade within the district affected. There are no members of the trustees associations in the district. They cannot serve because they are not named in the act. Many other organizations are not represented, and yet, Mr. Speaker, the act must be carried out by those who are directly affected. I know that there are many men of all political shades of opinion who would be willing to give of their services and their best wisdom in the carrying out of the measure. After all, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is no fool. He knows well enough that the successful carrying out of the act means something to his own prestige. Certainly a year hence if the act has not been carried out as it should have been, fault will be found, and under such circumstances I would say, the Lord help the Minister of Agriculture when the leader of the opposition gets his teeth into him in connection with any failures there may have been. The Minister of Agriculture has a perfect right to ask that those in charge of the administration of the act shall be men whom he knows, and in whom he has confidence, because he will be responsible, and should have some say in it.

The minister has stated he does not intend to change the committee. One can realize that that is a perfectly honest and frank expression of opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute repeals it; they are dismissed.

Mr. GLEN: Oh, yes, so far as the act is concerned. But so far as the administration of the act is concerned, the minister has said time and again, although the leader of the opposition will not accept the statement, that he does not propose to dismiss the men who are now connected with it.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. GLEN: In any case, if he wishes the act to be successfully carried out, why would he immediately arouse antagonisms and hostilities throughout the whole district by discharging the men now acting? The minister is entitled to have some say as to who shall administer the act, because upon him rests the responsibility. As I understand his capabilities, he will see that the act is carried out properly. For Manitoba's sake I am interested in a proper administration. When the time comes for the formation of the committees I shall be pleased to suggest the names of men who, although they may be Tories in politics, would carry out their duties in a proper manner.

For these reasons I approve of the amendment, and I believe the minister is entitled to passage of the measure. In that I shall support him.

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen). Among the many failings of the previous administration was not that of dispensing with the services of the chairman of the former tariff board. I am in a position to say that the previous chairman resigned, and when the present administration came into being he was a member of the house. I am glad to come to the defence of the leader of the opposition in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, there is one correction I should like to make. So far the discussion would seem to take for granted that Mr. Vallance is at the head of the rehabilitation organization. May I explain that the head of the rehabilitation organization has never been changed; Doctor Archibald is still its head. Mr. Vallance is simply one of the employees who is in charge of the office at Regina.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that it was otherwise; I was careful not to. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) did.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to criticize the personnel of any of the committees, but I do know that under the new measure the companies and concerns represented on the previous committee are omitted. It does seem to me that if some of these concerns could be represented the work of the rehabilitation act would be greatly facilitated. Representations have been made from mortgage companies, the Canadian Bankers' Association and the Canadian Pacific Railway, all of which have an interest in the dried-out areas to protect.

I have no doubt those in charge of the administration of the act are conscious of the necessity for water conservation. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) stated that there was not a great deal of water to be conserved in some of these areas. I should like to point out that in southern Alberta there is considerable water which could be conserved in the spring. It would take a tremendous amount of money to build the huge dams necessary for this purpose, but I believe in the long run it would pay. There are several rivers in the southern part of the province which sometimes overflow in the spring. At times parts of the city of Calgary are under water, and there is no reason why some of this water could not be conserved.

The Bow river empties into the South Saskatchewan river, and then there is the Oldman river which has its source in the mountains and which also empties into the South Saskatchewan river. The Belly river has its source in the foothills and empties into Oldman river. Milk river runs along the southern boundary of Alberta and the United States. This river is fairly narrow, but is quite deep and sometimes overflows in the spring. Although some of these rivers are quite dry in the fall, I think much of this water could be conserved by the building of storage dams similar to the work being carried on by the president of the United States in some parts of that country. I trust this committee will do what is possible to be done along these lines; for I believe in years to come it would mean the salvation of this part of the country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 4, to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 14, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

He said: Two small amendments are suggested. The first is to correct a typographical error, and the second is, in accordance with the suggestion made by my right hon. friend when the bill was before this house, to substitute the word "granted" for the word "given."

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY COMMISSIONER UNDER MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Combines Investigation Act and amending act of 1935, to provide for the administration of the act under the Minister of Labour by an officer to be known as the commissioner of the combines act, for the investigation of alleged combines by the commissioner, and for the appointment of such a commissioner, special commissioners and assistants; and to provide salaries, remuneration and expenses therefor.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps it would serve the interests of the house as a whole if, without prejudice to our position, the Speaker left the chair and we discussed this resolution under conditions which would enable the minister to answer any questions which may be asked.

Mr. ROGERS: That would be quite agreeable to me.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS: This resolution precedes the introduction of a bill designed to change the method of conducting investigations under the Combines Investigation Act and to strengthen the act in certain other particulars. It is proposed to have the act administered by a commissioner under the Minister of Labour instead of by the members of the tariff board in their additional capacities as members of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. The proposed bill differs in a number of respects from the Combines Investigation Act as passed in 1923. Under that act all extensive investigations, other than preliminary inquiries which were conducted by the registrar, were intended to be conducted by temporary commissioners specially appointed for the purpose. Provision will be made in the new legislation for the appointment of a permanent commissioner whose duty it shall be to carry through all investigations to completion. At the same time provision is being made for temporary special commissioners if circumstances should arise which make such assistance necessary.

Other proposed amendments include changes which have been found to be desirable at various times since the act was originally passed. For example, the definition of monopoly which was introduced in 1935, but which was considerably modified before it was enacted, is restated in terms designed to include those large scale enterprises which are able to control prices to their own advantage and to the disadvantage of the public. A more effective enforcement of the law is aimed at also through the removal of a provision which unduly limited the use of documents in court proceedings. This amendment was before the house last year.

Mr. BENNETT: It is proposed to do away with the director of public prosecutions?

Mr. ROGERS: This does not affect that section of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that proposed to be done?

Mr. ROGERS: That is not provided for in the present bill. Provision is also being made to increase the maximum penalties which may be imposed on combinations acting to the detriment of the public.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, one can only say that this does involve additional expense in the setting up of another organization. While the report of the price spreads commission did not provide for the appointment of a director of public prosecutions, this was provided for by parliament. It was to be a similar position to that established in Great Britain. Although this official would have no power to prosecute, he was to cooperate with the attorneys general to see that violations of federal statutes were properly dealt with. As the minister knows, one of our difficulties has been in the efficient and effective administration of our criminal laws, especially that phase of our statutory law which has to do with the enforcement of purely federal statutes. For instance, every session we legislate and then we provide that under certain circumstances a certain penalty shall follow, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) knows that complaints are always being received as to the ability to enforce the law. It was thought in 1935 when the statute was amended and provision was made for a director of public prosecutions that the commissioner of combines should be attached to the tariff board, the members of which were named as commissioners to administer the federal statute and conduct investigations in connection with fair trade—I am using the term in a very non-technical sense—fair trade in the large sense. Just why it is found at this time necessary to amend and consolidate the combines act and to pass a new act, I do not know; because it will be recalled that the present act was decided to be intra vires by the privy council some considerable time after it was enacted.

There are great difficulties in connection with ex parte investigations, and it is not without justice that people complain that to have an ex parte investigation carried on by an official, without affording any opportunity for the other side of the case to be heard, is not the best way in which to lay the foundation for a prosecution. The most noted of all cases that we have had in this country, as the minister will perhaps recall, was the one in connection with the fruit combine, in which the commissioner made investigations in all parts of Canada. The attorneys general of the provinces afterwards took proceedings against the fruit company concerned, and it was fined very large sums of money. That was many years ago. Why it is necessary to amend this act does not at the moment appear to me clear, in view of what the minister has said, unless indeed it is to create another branch of the Department of Labour, which I should not think the minister would find essential for the purpose of supplying him with adequate material upon which to act from time to time. But it does add to his duties and obligations.

It is quite clear that until we see the bill it would be premature to express an opinion on the questions to which the minister has referred. At the moment I do not think any adequate explanation has been given why at this time we should modify the existing conditions with respect to the investigation of combines. The government, however, in its wisdom thinks it is desirable, and has asked the house to adopt that view. The government is able, of course, to see its view enforced, but until such time as more complete disclosure has been made in respect of the matters dealt with by the bill than what has been made by way of explanation to-day, I confess I find it difficult to see the necessity for the proposed amendment.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, in accordance with what I understand to be the established practice I had proposed to give on the second reading a much more extended statement in support of the objects of the bill. This, as the leader of the opposition understands, is merely a resolution preceding the introduction of the bill; it does not enter into specific details as to the legislation itself. I might say this, however. He has suggested that apparently this would only result in adding to the expenses of conducting investigations of this kind, but he will remember that the price spreads commission did propose the setting up of a separate board to deal with such matters. Parliament in its wisdom decided otherwise—

Mr. BENNETT: To save expense.

Mr. ROGERS: —and placed that responsibility upon the tariff board. I am quite sure the leader of the opposition will agree with me that the tariff board under the existing legislation, and particularly in view of the important duties that have been imposed upon it, has quite enough to do within its own functions as a tariff board without undertaking the additional responsibilities which pertains to the trade and industry commission.

Mr. BENNETT: The two things are very closely allied.

Mr. ROGERS: At the same time no investigations under the combines act have been carried out by the tariff board in its capacity as Dominion Trade and Industry Commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the statute was under review by the privy council.

Mr. ROGERS: That was in part the reason. I might add that a number of applications have been pending. I feel sure that the members of the tariff board would themselves readily acknowledge that their functions as a tariff board are sufficient to occupy their time very fully and very usefully. I shall be glad to give further reasons in support of the bill when it is before the house on second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I think it only fair to say that one of the reasons that induced the administration to introduce the legislation in the form in which it was, arose from the fact that many charges of monopoly were closely allied to charges in connection with excessive tariffs, and matters of that sort; and to save expense and at the same time provide for the appointment of a body well qualified to deal with these questions the tariff board was selected as the instrumentality to give effect to the recommendations of the price spreads commission. On the other hand, it was realized that there should be some one person charged with the responsibility, and as Mr. McGregor had previously been attached to the Department of Labour, he was detached from that department when the change was made and attached to the tariff board, so that he would be able to make the investigations which I understand are contemplated by this resolution and report on them to the members of that board in their other capacity as, so to speak, fair trade supervisors. He would thereby furnish information that might be available bearing upon any questions which the administration might be concerned about with respect to tariff matters; for as the minister knows, many of these matters, in fact practically all of them, have an intimate relationship with allegations in connection with the tariff itself, and it was believed that a useful purpose would be served by placing the two under the supervision and control of one body, with the commissioner in the position that he occupied. I should have liked to see it worked out in practice, but since the legislation was under review by the privy council, the opportunity to see how well it would have worked out in practice has not been afforded, and if this bill passes it will be impossible to do that because it is proposed now to dissociate the two. I take it that the members of the tariff board will still be left in the positions which they occupy under the fair trade statute. You do not touch that, as I understand it, by this change?

Mr. ROGERS: There are certain sections of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which will be repealed by the legislation to be brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the first time the minister has intimated that.

Mr. ROGERS: It will appear in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it should have been in the resolution. When you are amending a statute that has not to do with the statute that is being consolidated the resolution should indicate that it is so proposed.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I might explain. I have said that certain clauses of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act will be repealed by the legislation which will follow this resolution. One of those sections is the section which places the combines act under the administration of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. Another is section 14 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, which has been declared ultra vires, and there is one other section which is touched upon.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the privy council said that section 14 was all right. The supreme court said it was bad; the privy council said it was good.

Mr. ROGERS: My impression is that the privy council in that respect upheld the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is wrong.

Mr. ROGERS: There is one other section of the combines act as proposed which will conceivably affect certain functions which were to have been discharged by the trade and industry commission, but I doubt, Mr. Chairman, whether it would be to the advantage of the house for me to give any details of these matters at this time. I simply rose at the moment to indicate the two material changes in the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which will follow if the present legislation is approved by parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know how wide this legislation is going to be. It is to provide for the administration of the act by an officer to be known as the commissioner of the combines act, for the investigation of alleged combines by the commissioner, and for the appointment of such a commissioner, special commissioners and assistants, and to provide salaries, remuneration and expenses therefor. I do not know whether the minister by regulation or statute or otherwise is going to consider the granting of increased powers under this legislation, and I suggest that some consideration be given that question and that when he brings down the legislation he inform the house in that regard.

A few weeks ago a group of merchants in western Canada had occasion to take up a matter which they believed was due to the operation of a combine, and the reply they had from the Minister of the Interior, as he was then, or rather from his secretary, was that there was no legislation bearing upon the matter, nor was it possible to effect a remedy by legislation. The situation is roughly this. Just before the war certain merchants in western Canada organized what was known as the Merchants' Consolidated, a company at that time owned entirely by the merchants themselves on a cooperative basis. Since then, by death, removal and other causes, the company has become more or less a limited concern with about fifty per cent of the stock owned by these merchants. They deal in all kinds of goods, and the particular commodity they are interested in just now is something which is widely used in the west, gasoline equipment. There is only one company in Canada manufacturing a wide range of such equipment, and there are two wholesale houses that handle hardware largely in western Canada, and the organization that is owned by the merchants—Merchants' Consolidated of Winnipeg—is unable to get delivery on the regular wholesale basis through this particular company, which is an American concern with a Canadian subsidiary enjoying quite a high measure of tariff protection. These merchants believe that this operates as a restriction of trade or a combine. I do not know whether the statement made by the minister's secretary is correct, that there is no legislation that can deal with this matter at the present time. If so, I would suggest that if any amendments are to be made to the act or if any change is to be made in the regulations or in the general set-up of this particular department of government, the matter I have just brought to the minister's notice should be taken into consideration. Quite recently the radio business has been brought to our attention and there is a widespread belief in Canada that there is a combine operating in that field, because when we compare prices of similar articles on both sides of the international line we see that there is a considerable difference in prices.

Mr. ROGERS: Radio tubes?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, radio tubes, for one thing. I have taken this opportunity to bring the matter to the minister's attention because I think it should be looked into. Then, too, there are a number of agencies that operate in the sale of goods directly to the consumer and they appear to operate as a sort of combine, at any rate as far as the treatment of their salesmen is concerned. These are matters we do not often have an opportunity of bringing up in the house and I am taking advantage of the present discussion to ask the minister to consider, in connection with the legislation which he will bring down, matters of the sort I have just been discussing.

Mr. ROGERS: I am obliged to my hon. friend for the information he has given with respect to combines which, in his belief, exist in certain fields of industry. I am sure he will understand that the Minister of Labour cannot assume the functions of a commissioner under the combines act. If he will give me the information by letter I will see whether the facts are such as will justify an inquiry under the terms either of existing legislation or of the legislation which will follow the acceptance of this resolution.

Mr. COLDWELL: Apparently I sent the information to the wrong department. I communicated with the Department of Trade and Commerce, which I thought was the appropriate department.

Mr. ROGERS: The Dominion Trade and Industry Commission, which hitherto has had the administration of the combines act, was placed under the president of the privy council. As a matter of fact the combines act had been formerly under the administration of the Department of Labour, and what is now proposed is really a return to that former position.

If I may revert to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, I find in the explanatory note that section 14 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was no appeal.

Mr. ROGERS: No, there was no appeal.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rogers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend and consolidate the Combines Investigation Act and amending act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

European war pensions, naval, militia, and air forces after the war, $41,500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the reduction signify a general contraction in the number of pensions to be paid in Canada?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): No, I do not think so. It signifies that that is about all we spent last year and all that it is likely we shall spend this year.

Item agreed to.

Employers' liability compensation, $40,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does this item cover?

Mr. POWER: This is one which has been in these estimates since 1921, as a result of the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons which sat during that session. For a period of three years from September 1, 1921, the government of Canada assumed the workmen's compensation liability imposed upon employers of former members of the forces who received a war disability pension of twenty per cent or more. That has been continued from year to year ever since.

Mr. MacNICOL: That means former soldiers working in industries that have to provide for workmen's compensation?

Mr. POWER: It was alleged at that time that ex-members of the forces had difficulty in obtaining employment, since the workmen's compensation premiums in their case were higher because they were more likely to be injured in an industrial accident. At the present time, as my hon. friend knows, in I think every province there are workmen's compensation boards, and really all payments are made to those boards. It is a question whether or not this amount really serves the purpose for which it was originally provided, because I think in most provinces—I know in Ontario and Quebec—the premiums paid are based on the nature of the industry. For instance in the pulp and paper industry the amount paid to the board would be, let us say, 10 or 15 per cent; in some other industry, less or more hazardous, the rates would vary accordingly. However, the amount has been fully expended in former years and it is considered advisable to keep it in for fear some men might lose their jobs if the government withdrew the grant.

Mr. MacNICOL: It has been fully expended?

Mr. POWER: For the last three years the expenditures have been as follows:

1933-34	$36,419
1934-35	23,103
1935-36	27,138
1936 to November 30	9,060

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister give the number of workmen covered?

Mr. POWER: Yes. For the year 1936-37 to November 30, 1936 the number of claims and amounts paid were as follows:

	Number of claims	Total paid
Alberta	27	$ 715 67
British Columbia	2	772 60
Manitoba	25	936 84
Nova Scotia	6	365 21
Ontario	68	3,031 75
Saskatchewan	11	1,081 17
Quebec	7	2,157 12

Mr. NEILL: Is this system predicated on a claim being made in case of death or accident, and the department paying?

Mr. POWER: The department pays.

Mr. NEILL: But does the department pay only when a claim is made?

Mr. POWER: Yes, that is the basis of compensation.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be more economical for the government to pay the rate per man, the same as the employer would? Then the department would get the advantage of the insurance principle.

Mr. POWER: I think I misinformed the committee. They pay the full compensation, not the premium. We guarantee the province against any loss because of the employment of these men.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but I want to know whether the department pays the compensation board when a man has been killed or injured. Does it wait until a man has been injured, and then pay, which is equivalent to the department doing insuring, or does it simply pay the rate per man employed?

Mr. POWER: We do not pay the rate per man employed. We pay the claim.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the department be better off to pay the rate per man? They would then get the advantage of joint insurance covering a large number of cases.

Mr. POWER: As I have explained, this arises out of a situation which existed in 1921 in many of the provinces, if not all, where there were no workmen's compensation boards, and the employer was obliged to take out insurance against claims. Therefore he would not wish to take into his factory or industry a man who was more likely to be subject to industrial accident on account of his war disability. As a result of that situation, and in order to encourage employment of ex-soldiers, the department undertook to pay those claims.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the department notified when a returned veteran is employed by any company, under the compensation act?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or is the extra liability to accident by reason of his service as a soldier, or his disability, considered after the accident or death?

Mr. POWER: After the accident or death.

Item agreed to.

Care of patients, medical examination respecting pensions, hospital allowances, and sheltered employment, $2,900,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the sheltered employment cover such things as the vetcraft shop at Christie street hospital?

Mr. POWER: Two factories, one in Montreal and one in Toronto, and one which is supported to a large extent by the department, the Red Cross shop in Victoria, B.C.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am convinced that money spent in that connection is well spent. I went through the vetcraft shop at Christie street hospital, and it was most interesting to see the men working there, many of whom if they were not in that shop would become mentally defective. I know quite a number myself. The department in providing this work is not only giving them an opportunity to supplement their pension; it is making their lives livable. I certainly am happy to support this vote.

Mr. QUELCH: Why the decrease of $100,000?

Mr. POWER: It is on the experience of last year. For the full year 1935-36 the vote was $3,250,000, of which we expended $2,892,531, leaving an amount of $357,468 unexpended. This year up to November 30 1936, we spent $1,595,932.96, and it is estimated that we shall be able to get through next year on $2,900,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): What hospitals are engaged in this work, and in what provinces are they located?

Mr. POWER: We have eight hospitals, as follows:

Camp Hill, Halifax.
Lancaster, Saint John.
Sainte Anne de Bellevue, Montreal.
Christie Street, Toronto.
Westminster, London.
Deer Lodge, Winnipeg.
Colonel Belcher, Calgary.
Shaughnessy, Vancouver.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Could the minister give us the amount designated for each hospital?

Mr. POWER: Of course all the hospitals have not the same number of beds; some are very much larger than others. For instance, Westminster hospital has from 530 to 540 patients as a rule, while Sainte Anne de Bellevue hospital has in the neighbourhood of 500. As at March 31, 1936, the figures for these hospitals were as follows:

	Number of patients	Total patient days	Total expenditure
Sainte Anne de Bellevue	496	167,150	$379,687 54
Camp Hill	139	35,785	115,231 07
Christie Street	347	113,076	403,848 37
Westminster	522	177,454	346,061 32
Deer Lodge	189	67,082	131,955 72
Colonel Belcher	67	24,580	78,417 15
Shaughnessy Heights	142	50,199	164,108 52
Lancaster	68	19,128	47,535 13

Mr. MARSHALL: Is the Colonel Belcher hospital in Calgary owned by the department or rented?

Mr. POWER: No, it belongs to an estate called the Blow estate, and is on lease to the department. I think the lease expires on April 1, 1938.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the cost to the government?

Mr. POWER: The rental is approximately $26,000 a year.

Mr. MARSHALL: Does the government anticipate any change in the location of that hospital? It is on one of the main thoroughfares of the city, which to me is not a very good location. Would the government consider changing the location?

Mr. POWER: When I was out in Calgary about this time last year, as a result of representations made by different soldier organizations I went into that question to some extent in the short time I was able to spend in that city. I did not question each patient, but as far as I could ascertain the patients themselves seemed to prefer to remain in that location. I am quite aware of the fact that a large number of soldier organizations have protested and have continued to protest against having soldiers, especially those whose health is not very good, in a hospital which was once a factory, located in a congested district. But a large number of the patients there are walking cases, class 4, who prefer to be in the city where they can go down town at any time and go to the movies and so on. I can say to my hon. friend that I am still giving the matter some consideration. There will be complaints either way, and I am not quite sure whether it is to the advantage of the men themselves to maintain the hospital in that location or to provide accommodation elsewhere.

Mr. MARSHALL: Did I understand the minister to say that the lease expires in 1938?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: How long has that lease been in existence?

Mr. POWER: I imagine it was a ten year lease.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, a ten year lease.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Could the minister give the cost per patient per day in those institutions?

Mr. POWER: Yes. I perhaps forgot to say to the committee that apart from the hospitals I have mentioned, which are operated by the department itself, we have arrangements with a number of other hospitals, some belonging to the provinces and others privately operated, in which patients who come under the jurisdiction of the department may be treated.

The daily cost per patient is as follows:

Sainte Anne de Bellevue	$2 27
Camp Hill	3 22
Christie Street	3 57
Westminster	1 95
Deer Lodge	1 97
Colonel Belcher	3 19
Shaughnessy	3 27
Lancaster	2 49

The average rate for all the hospitals is $2.55. The cost at Christie Street hospital is higher because there we carry on surgical work, while in some of the other hospitals that is not done. At Westminster, for example, the cost is much lower, because to a considerable extent that is a hospital for mental cases, and there is not very much required in the way of surgery.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain what probational training is being carried on by the department at the present time? As he will remember, the Hyndman commission made a recommendation in regard to probational training, which reads as follows:

That the regulations of the Department of Pensions and National Health regarding probational training be more widely utilized and be made applicable to non-pensioners.

Will the minister explain whether or not anything has been done to implement that recommendation?

Mr. POWER: At the present time probational training really comes down to this: If an ex-soldier comes to us and says that if he had the requisite training he would be able to find a position in a certain industry, and we are assured by the employer that that is so, we find means to give him the necessary training and to pay him while he is receiving it. Of late years, however, very little of that has been carried on. Last year we had only two or three who applied and were accepted.

Mr. GREEN: Is that only for pensioners or is that privilege available to non-pensioners?

Mr. POWER: I am quite sure it is only for pensioners. For instance, to indicate what we try to do, at the present time, we are training a man to be a bootmaker. He is the only one we happen to have on the strength at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to extend that privilege to the younger unemployed veterans who have registered with the veterans' assistance commission? There may be quite a number of them who could be put into positions if they had a certain amount of training.

Mr. POWER: If the veterans' assistance commission make a report to the minister along that line I shall be glad to go into it thoroughly. In fact, at the present time in Montreal the association known as Workshops Limited does intend to go in for something of the kind. As the hon. member is no doubt aware, it is a voluntary organization of ex-soldiers formed under the aegis of the voluntary committee in Montreal. On recommendation of the veterans' assistance commission the amount of $15,000 has been granted.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will be prepared to assist in training of that type?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some time ago I had protests from some of the orderlies in Shaughnessy hospital as to the long hours of duty. Some of them work twelve or thirteen hours each day. I believe the same conditions prevail in some of the other hospitals. Have the hours of work been reduced, or is there any hope that they may be reduced shortly?

Mr. POWER: I think the matter will be settled within a short time. It is now the subject of conversation and discussions with the amalgamated civil servants, and others. Of course, under certain circumstances, it would involve increasing the staff, but not to a very great extent. I do not doubt that within a month or so arrangements satisfactory to the people interested will be made.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have in mind a pensioner recently changed from the regular pay staff, who is now occupying a bed in one of the hospitals. He has had many misgivings concerning the possible cures which may be effected by the experimental work now under way. The man may leave the hospital, under a nominal pension, to go out into the world. If in three or four years he suffers a recurrence of some form of his old trouble is there any limitation as to the time within which he would become disqualified for further hospitalization?

Mr. POWER: I take it the person in question has a pension, although he claims it is not sufficiently large.

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes.

Mr. POWER: There is no doubt that he may return at any time, and his pension will be increased if it is found that the disabilities from which he is suffering have increased. That is probably one of the reasons why our pension expenditures are not decreasing very rapidly. Men pensioned for disability or disease get increased pensions as their disabilities increase. A man may receive a pension of ten per cent or twenty per cent for a heart or rheumatic condition, but as time goes on and he becomes older his disability increases, and with it his pension.

Mr. LOCKHART: This man is still in the hospital. He has observed cases which have left the hospital apparently cured, while others have had difficulty in getting back into the hospital on the basis they think should obtain. He has written me on several occasions, and I should like to be able to assure him that in the event of his leaving the hospital in the near future he will receive every consideration.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member will be good enough to give me privately the name of the person in whom he is interested, I will get a full report and let him know definitely what the situation is.

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with probational training, would it not be of some help if the minister were to write to the honorary local committees stating that the department would be willing to provide probational training for suitable unemployed veterans?

Mr. POWER: I do not know that it is my duty, nor would it be proper for me as minister of the department, to write the honorary local committees telling them what they should or should not do.

Mr. GREEN: No, but I suggest that the minister could tell them that there is that chance of obtaining help. They may not know about it.

Mr. POWER: I should be glad to draw it to the attention of the veterans' assistance commission, but I do not think it would be proper for me to indicate to the committees the line they should follow. They are appointed for that purpose, and are devoting a great deal of time and energy to the work. I believe if it is drawn to their attention in any way, even through the mention of it on this occasion by the hon. member, within a short time that field will be explored and there will be reports upon it.

Mr. GREEN: There is the point I mentioned earlier in the week with regard to getting some of the unemployed veterans work, on a day labour basis, on the new projects under the control of the Department of National Defence. Could the minister do something to help carry out the suggestion? It should be possible to place a great many unemployed veterans on that work, and it is particularly fitting that they should get it. Then there is the further question of extra help at Christmas time in the Post Office Department. Would the minister explore the possibilities of getting employment from that angle?

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister place on record the representations he has with respect to Shaughnessy hospital, the name of the doctor in charge, and the staff under him?

Mr POWER: I am not quite sure that I have the list, but I shall be pleased to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps the minister would be good enough to do so. He mentioned just now that in addition to the hospitals he enumerated, on occasions others were used. Cases have been brought to my attention of pensioners in the interior of British Columbia who have suddenly become ill, and, at least in the opinions of people in the locality, it would have been desirable to have taken them direct to the local hospital. Will the minister explain what course of action is necessary before such a decision can be made? Would the doctor in charge at Shaughnessy hospital make the decision, or who would decide whether a case may or may not be taken to a local hospital?

Mr. POWER: It has to be referred to the district administrator.

Mr. STIRLING: In my case it would be Shaughnessy.

Mr. POWER: Yes, Mr. Derby. There are many hospitals; although I have not the exact number, I know there are three pages of them in my book. I shall be pleased to place them on Hansard.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not ask that.

Mr. POWER: There are about twenty-five or thirty of them in British Columbia, and I shall be only too glad to give the names.

Mr. STIRLING: No, that is not necessary. I merely wanted an answer to my question as to who would settle the point which might arise in connection with taking a pensioner to a local hospital.

Mr. POWER: It would be the district administrator.

Mr. GREEN: Is any medical care provided for veterans and the families of veterans on relief? I have received several complaints about unemployed veterans being unable to get satisfactory medical attention. Has the department any information as to the facilities available?

Mr. POWER: The department looks after the pensioners only. The non-pensioners are looked after by the civilian authorities.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will remember that in the pensions committee last year we dealt with the question of the Canadians who enlisted in the inland water transport section of the Royal Engineers. I understand that the men who enlisted in this unit and who are pensioners are asking for class 2 hospital treatment, which I believe is given only to men who are indigent and who suffer from disabilities not incurred on service. They are also asking for assistance from a Canadian soldier's advocate. Would it not be possible for the department to give some consideration to these matters? The expense should not be very great. After all, they are Canadians and they were more or less inveigled into the imperial service. Many of them believed that they were going to get the same treatment as the Canadian soldiers.

Mr. POWER: A considerable number of those who enlisted in the inland water transport section of the Royal Engineers were Canadian born or domiciled in Canada prior to the war and are now receiving the same treatment as that received by other imperial soldiers. We do not give them class 2 treatment because that is given only for certain diseases or disabling conditions which are not related to military service. The men to whom my hon. friend refers asked for treatment for disabilities which were not due to their war service. This treatment is given to men who served in the Canadian expeditionary force, but it is not given to those who served in any other force, except in cases where we receive authority from the British Ministry of Pensions. In such cases the costs are refunded to us.

Mr. GREEN: These men were Canadians before the war and I do not think it would cost very much to provide this class of treatment or to arrange that they have the assistance of a soldier's advocate in making their claims for pension.

Mr. POWER: I have no recollection that that particular point was considered in the committee last year. A very large number of Canadians enlisted in other forces. For instance, 34,071 enlisted in the Royal Air Force; 710 in the imperial motor transport; 3,971 in the inland water transport; 2,814 in the naval service; 42 in the Jewish Palestine draft, making a total of 41,608. To this total must be added reservists who left Canada at the time war broke out, making a total of 56,198. These men are in approximately the same position with respect to treatment as are the members of the inland water transport.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister know how many of those men are pensioners? It would be only the pensioners who would be entitled to that class of treatment.

Mr. POWER: I have not that information.

Mr. GREEN: Could that be obtained from the British Ministry of Pensions?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister make inquiries along that line?

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to do so. My hon. friend knows that this question was pretty thoroughly gone into in the committee of last year, and no recommendation was made to take these men under the care of the department.

Mr. NEILL: Were there not instances where men of the type referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) thought they were enlisting as Canadians? Has that ever been investigated?

Mr. POWER: That claim has been made on two and perhaps more occasions, but I do not believe it has ever been substantiated. The hon. member for Vancouver South made a very strong case before the committee for this particular class of men, but I do not think the other members agreed fully with him. They did not feel that the men who enlisted in the inland water transport section should become the responsibility of this government.

Mr. GREEN: They are not asking that the government become responsible to the same degree as in connection with Canadian troops.

They are asking only for this hospitalization and the help of the veterans' bureau. Is there any reason why these men could not get some help in presenting their cases?

Mr. POWER: I am told the veterans' bureau will be only too glad to do whatever they can. If I am not mistaken, some of the imperial organizations are requesting the department to name a particular advocate for imperials only. Is that what my hon. friend had in mind?

Mr. GREEN: That might remove a great deal of the present dissatisfaction.

Mr. POWER: The matter came to my attention only within the last two or three weeks. It is being considered, but I do not know just what the decision will be. If this action were taken it would be equivalent to the Canadian government paying an advocate to press imperial ex-soldier claims against the imperial government.

Mr. GREEN: It might prove to be a great deal cheaper than keeping them on relief, should you succeed in getting any money out of the imperial government.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid they will not succeed in getting much money out of the imperial government. I endeavoured to make myself their advocate, without salary, and I must admit that I did not meet with very great success.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any record of an advocate or anyone else being successful in presenting a case to the imperial authorities in Canada?

Mr. POWER: The department has no direct contact with the Imperial Ministry of Pensions here which would indicate just what pensions they pay and why they refuse pensions, therefore it is impossible for me to say whether the representative in Canada of the British Ministry of Pensions is more difficult of approach than the Canadian pension commission.

Mr. NEILL: They are not more difficult of approach, but it is utterly impossible to get anything out of them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): The ex-imperials in Canada have been more or less at a disadvantage in presenting their claims, and have not had the benefits of the services of pensions advocates. It would be a splendid thing if we could select an advocate to act for these ex-imperials, not because it would be cheaper, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), but more or less because it is the right of these men who have taken up residence in Canada. They served for the same cause, and because they happened to have left the mother country and come over here should be no obstacle when they desire to present their case to the imperial government. If it were possible I think it would be a splendid gesture on the part of this government to appoint an advocate to plead the case of the ex-imperials before the proper officials, and I would strongly support such a move.

Mr. BARBER: May I ask under what item provision is made for the purchase of medical supplies for the Department of Health generally?

Mr. POWER: Under this one.

Mr. BARBER: Are these supplies purchased by tender?

Mr. POWER: In every case.

Mr. BARBER: And the department supplies other departments of government, the Department of Indian Affairs, for instance?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: How many years has the Department of Health been supplying the Department of Indian Affairs?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that it is from about 1928. It was a long time before I came into the department.

Mr. BARBER: Do the other departments submit their requisitions to this department, and are supplies then shipped by this department to different parts of Canada?

Mr. POWER: Yes. We do not buy the entire supply, but most of it. The staples that are necessary are purchased by us, but probably emergency supplies and such as are not in our general stores would be purchased directly by Indian Affairs.

Mr. BARBER: Yes, I understand that the supplies that are sent out are very complete. They are shipped to all parts of British Columbia, and the Department of Indian Affairs informed me that such an arrangement had been made. I was wondering how long it had been in effect. The minister says since 1928.

Mr. POWER: I am not sure about 1928, but for five or six years past, at all events, and probably more.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that class 2 treatment for the Canadian pensioner is available only in centres where there is a military hospital? If a pensioner is suffering from some disability for which he is not pensionable and resides in a small town, will the department give him hospitalization in that town?

Mr. POWER: Treatment under class 2 is confined to Canada only; that is to say, an ex-soldier in the United States is not admitted to class 2 treatment. It is available only in hospitals operated by the department or in hospitals with which the department has a contract, where treatment may be carried out under the care of a salaried medical officer of the department.

Mr. GREEN: Does not that really discriminate against pensioners who do not live in a city such as Vancouver or Toronto or Montreal? Does it not mean that a great majority of the pensioners cannot get class 2 treatment because they do not live where there is a military hospital or a military doctor?

Mr. POWER: They come in and get their treatment, and as a rule they are pretty well satisfied with it. I have no doubt that it would be more convenient, as my hon. friend suggests, but he will readily see that it would be impossible for us to establish hospitals in all the centres of all the provinces. He will, I believe, agree with me that it would be taking a bit of a risk to leave to the ordinary medical practitioner, much as I appreciate his high standing and character, the duty of looking after our pensioners in all cases and keeping them as long as he wished in a hospital under his own surveillance for a non-pensionable condition.

Mr. GREEN: After all, a doctor is a doctor, and sickness is sickness, regardless of whether it is a war disability or not. Surely doctors in these small towns would be quite capable of looking after the pensioner who has a non-pensionable disability. Why cannot the department make a contract with the different hospitals in our cities and towns across Canada? Could that not be done?

Mr. POWER: We have contracted with hospitals in a large number of towns; there are approximately twenty in British Columbia, and similarly throughout the country.

Mr. GREEN: Have you military doctors in each of these twenty towns?

Mr. POWER: No. We have them as a rule only in the larger centres, but it must not be forgotton that this is treatment for a non-pensionable disability. It is treatment for a disease which is not due to war service.

Mr. BENNETT: And he gets the treatment because he was a soldier.

Mr. POWER: Yes, and a pensioner, of course. He is pensioned for some other disability, and is being treated for a disease which is not due to his service. My hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Green) will understand how difficult it would be for the department to allow anyone who could obtain a certificate from a medical man in any part of the country to be treated without some kind of check being imposed by the department. It is a matter of administration, and in the interests of good administration I do not think it would be well to relax that regulation.

Mr. GREEN: Of course it could not be done without proper checks, but the minister will see the unfairness of the present position.

Mr. POWER: They usually come in.

Mr. GREEN: A pensioner in Vancouver can get treatment, and a pensioner in a small town twenty miles away cannot.

Mr. POWER: They come in to Vancouver, just as they do to Christie street hospital.

Mr. GREEN: At their own expense, or does the department pay transportation?

Mr. POWER: They are helped a great deal by the Canadian Legion, and if it is found that they have such a disability as will entitle them to pay and allowances, we do give them their transportation.

Mr. GREEN: That is only available, after all, to indigent pensioners, is it not?

Mr. POWER: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the minister to look into that question and see if there cannot be some extension of the present service.

Mr. POWER: The regulation automatically bars a single man whose income is in excess of $45 a month, and a married man with wife only whose income is in excess of $86 a month, but below $86 or $45 a month there is a pretty wide margin before you get to the absolutely indigent class.

Mr. MARSHALL: When these estimates were last before the committee it was stated that the South African veterans were on the same footing as to hospitalization as men who served in the great war. Is that correct?

Mr. POWER: That is not quite correct. There are cases of South African war veterans who, because they are really indigent, are by exception admitted to our hospitals, but they are not admitted as of right.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would a statement that a man was indigent and a South African veteran enable him to get hospitalization?

Mr. POWER: No, I think there would have to be a pretty fair case made out for compassionate treatment.

The right hon. leader of the opposition, when these estimates were under discussion on Tuesday last, asked for a statement with respect to the Patriotic Fund. I have a statement here. It is a lengthy one, and I will send it over to my right hon. friend; or I shall be only too glad to read it or put it on Hansard if he wishes.

Mr. BENNETT: The only question I desired to raise was whether that fund, which I think had roughly $100,000 to its credit in 1914—I am speaking from memory; I was an officer of the fund, and that figure may be excessive—

Mr. POWER: $75,972.

Mr. BENNETT: That fund, with the funds collected during the succeeding years, was administered by a committee. Quite a number of South African veterans from time to time received the benefits of the fund. Inasmuch as the fund is now depleted, and we have provided a very special body to give succour and assistance to those who are unable to care for themselves although they are not pensionable, it occurred to me that something might be done for the small number of South African veterans who are left, because we depleted the fund in caring not only for the South African veterans themselves, in a limited way, but also for those who had become charges on the fund by reason of the great war.

There are two or three cases that have come to my personal attention that make one feel a bit ashamed—if I might use so strong a term—of the treatment which we accord to them; and in view of the large measure in which the fund was used in caring for all kinds, and the fact that we have seen fit now to make special statutory provision for them, might we not find some method to take care of that very small number who are left in this country? I profess I do not know the exact number, but I do know that it is a reasonably small number who are in a position to make a claim on the fund.

Mr. POWER: A statement has been furnished me on the question. I cannot find it at the moment but I shall look it up. The number who sailed for South Africa in the first or second contingent was approximately 5,200; then a later contingent sailed of approximately 2,000. That contingent arrived in South Africa after the cessation of hostilities, after the peace had been signed, and they turned round and came right back. They never saw any active service whatever. On the basis of what occurs in cases of men about that age in the Canadian expeditionary force it is estimated—and of course it is only an estimate—that approximately 5,000 South African war veterans would still be living.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that so? The number is larger than I thought.

Mr. POWER: That is an estimate, but I will check it. Of that number—and this again is more or less an estimate—about 830 would be indigent. Of course, this is almost a pure guess. The amount payable, were these 800 to be placed on war veterans' allowance is something in the neighbourhood of $250,000 annually, taking into consideration those who are unmarried, married, widowers and so on.

The point raised by my right hon. friend would bring up the discussion of a principle which I think operates in a different way in the case of the South African veterans from that in which it operates in the case of those who served in the last war. The War Veterans' Allowance Act was passed in order to permit the country to look after men who could be presumed to be burnt out as a result of the hardships and the difficulties they had to undergo in modern warfare—not that I wish in any way to belittle the services rendered by those who served in the South African war or to minimize the hardships they endured. The presumption is, however, that the trials of climate, the life in the trenches, the strain on the nervous system, and so on and so forth, endured during a period of trench warfare, and the heavy bombardments which took place during the last war were such as to argue that men who served in the front line in that war would be pre-aged and that their mental and physical capacities would diminish more rapidly than those of the ordinary civilian. We are really establishing a presumption of disability due to the war, whereas those who served in the South African war, though they rendered patriotic service to the country, though they went a long way from home to discharge their duty to Canada and the empire, could not be said to have endured the same hardships as those who served in the great war.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, there was no chemical warfare then.

Mr. POWER: No; nor was there any heavy bombardment, or living in trenches in water up to your knees for days on end, and the war did not last quite so long. In many ways the strain of service in the South African war cannot be said to have been as severe as the strain suffered by those who served in the last war.

If we granted war veterans' allowance to men who served in South Africa, it might be quite difficult to refuse, as we do under the legislation, to grant war veterans' allowance to those who served only in Canada or in England during the last war. It opens a wide field and I suggest to my right hon. friend that if he will think the matter over—I shall do the same myself—we may be able next year to bring down some recommendation to parliament with respect to this matter. I can only say that last year during the sittings of the parliamentary committee the question was considered and the committee did not deem it advisable to make a special recommendation to have the South African war veterans placed on war veterans' allowance.

Mr. BENNETT: With a great deal of what the minister has said I am wholly in accord. I realize the difficulty of establishing with respect to pensions a principle that cannot be supported on any broad grounds, but it is because of that very fact that I venture to put before the committee the suggestion I have offered, not that I am doing it for the first time, for the suggestion has been put before the minister by others. The truth is that a substantial fund with which we began at the time of the war became merged into the larger fund and was utilized for the common benefit of all—that is, including those of the great war and those who fought in South Africa. It is quite true that at this time of day to speak of the privations and sufferings of the men who were in South Africa, suggesting that they are in a burnt-out condition in 1937, would be rather to impose upon the credulity of those upon whom you press that argument. Realizing that, I was trying to see whether the claim could not be put on the other ground. For it is quite clear that if the fund had not been exhausted they would still be receiving—I am speaking of the extreme cases—some support from that fund. From time to time we did take care of outstanding cases, and it was with regret that we found the fund entirely depleted; it was because of the great claims upon it during the later years subsequent to the war that it was so rapidly depleted. It must be remembered, however, that the "burnt-out" allowance provided for by statute has taken the place of any claims which might be preferred against that fund. That is beyond question. I realize that the matter cannot be dealt with merely by the minister's saying so; it must be covered by statute. All I wish to do is to suggest that it is worthy of the most careful consideration in the light of the circumstances to which I have alluded. But I should like also to point out that there must be some error in the computation. There were 5,200 men who went to South Africa and subsequently 2,000 who turned round and came back. I believe they landed only for exercise and did not take part in hostilities. That left, therefore, 5,200, and it must be an error to say that 5,000 survive.

Mr. POWER: I am beginning to think that. I shall be only too glad to check and give the figures.

Mr. BENNETT: And the suggestion that 5,000 or 5,200 survived is, of course, entirely astray.

Mr. POWER: No, 7,000 all told.

Mr. BENNETT: But 2,000 did not figure in the matter at all.

Mr. POWER: In proportion there would be something like 3,000 surviving.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is what must be meant. One speaks with great reserve, but I think that is too large a number, because it must not be forgotten that a substantial number of those who served in South Africa volunteered their services in the great war, and in the early stages there were great losses of that type of experienced soldier. In addition, a number have departed this life because they were of an age subject to mortality at a higher rate than would otherwise be expected. The guess that there are 843 survivors who would be in a position to make claims, could, I believe, be subject to a very exact check. My information, whatever it may be worth—and one must always remember that there is no accurate information available—is that something less than 500 are, under any circumstances, liable to make claims, and one could reduce that again to something less than 300 as the number throughout Canada who would be likely to do so. I think in the interim the minister might have a close study made, and while this would involve some time, the records are such that it is possible to do it. Those who, it is asserted, are not otherwise engaged might find in this ample scope for their activities during their very desirable leisure. Perhaps that would meet the situation as sometimes expressed by hon. members on the other side of the house.

Mr. POWER: I shall be very glad to have an inquiry made.

Mr. DUPUIS: In this connection I avail myself of the precedent which the right hon. leader of the opposition is trying to establish to go a little further into the past and ask for something for those who took part in the repression of the Northwest Rebellion in 1885.

Mr. POWER: They are looked after.

Mr. DUPUIS: Well, I have a case of one of my oldest electors, Médard Boulais, who is, I think, now eighty-six years of age. He was under General Laurie in the Northwest Rebellion. He used to be sent ahead of the army as a scout; he did that very dangerous duty for the whole period of the rebellion. He was also the scout for the Queen's Own of Toronto, and as a consequence of his service in 1885 he lost his right to his homestead. In those days these regiments used to take horses, and General Laurie asked him to take with him a team of horses for that purpose. He lost his horses and he lost his homestead. After the rebellion he decided to go to the Yukon where he engaged in prospecting. He is now sick and he has no means whatsoever. He is starving, if I may use the word, because he has to rely upon the charity of friends. I think the Department of Pensions and National Health should do something for a case like that. Mr. Boulais wrote to the department and was told that he had no right to a pension. The last letter he wrote to the department was on December 12, 1936, and on January 27, 1937, he received from the president of the pension bureau a letter stating that his request had been studied and the department regrets to inform him that there is no statute or bylaw by virtue of which he can obtain a pension for his services in that rebellion. If there is no statutory provision for pensions for Northwest Rebellion veterans, there must be something to allow this department to save this man from starving. He is eighty-five years of age and very sick. I have put the matter before the minister in the hope that he will find a way to do something for this citizen.

Mr. POWER: Pensions for Northwest Rebellion veterans are awarded on recommendation by the Department of National Defence, but to establish his right to pension a man must show that he was disabled during the rebellion. The matter to which reference was made in the discussion between the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and myself dealt with the statute which provides for war veterans' allowance, that is to men who are burnt out. It provides that such burnt-out men, whose disability is presumed to be due to service, shall obtain $20 per month if unmarried and $40 if married, if they are permanently incapacitated from carrying on their occupation or if they have reached the age of sixty.

In the case cited by my hon. friend the same result could easily be obtained if the man in question would apply for old age pension in Quebec. He would receive $20 per month under that.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. BENNETT: And in the one case he is eligible and in the other he is not.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to add my voice to that of the leader of the opposition in regard to the plight of South African veterans. I appreciate very much the fact that the minister is interested and is going to give their problem serious consideration. I have had numerous letters from men who served in the South African war, and I know their plight is sad indeed. I would ask the minister to give this problem as early consideration as possible, because as far as I can find out the majority of these men are from sixty-five to sixty-eight years old and so are not eligible for an old age pension.

Mr. POWER: My difficulty is to find a broad principle which will permit the South African war veterans to come in under this act, and at the same time keep in force the restrictive provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act as now existing. It was instituted on the presumption that men who served overseas in the last war were in some cases prematurely aged, and if I can possibly find any such principle as that to apply to South African war veterans I shall be only too glad.

Mr. GREEN: In fairness to the South African war veterans it should be pointed out that the principle is not quite as clear as the minister suggests. The War Veterans' Allowance Act I understand applies to all men who served in France or other theatre of war. There are thousands of Canadian soldiers who were in France but were not in the front lines, and possibly not under as heavy shell fire as those in South Africa. Then there are Canadians who served in Great Britain, or only in Canada, who are eligible under the War Veterans' Allowance Act provided they are small pensioners. On the other hand the South African veterans were subject to disease to a far greater extent than were the Canadian troops in France.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no inoculation for typhoid then.

Mr. GREEN: Probably they had to undergo sufferings at least as great as those of a proportion of the Canadians who were in France. I do not think the principle is quite as clear-cut as the minister says, so I would add my word to that of my leader in asking that the question be given further consideration.

Mr MACDONALD (Brantford): Far be it from me to compare the sufferings of those who served in the South African war with the sufferings of those who suffered in the recent great war. I am sure, however, that those who served in South Africa suffered much more from the effects of heat than did the soldiers in France. I am sure also that the former did not get as good food supplies that we received, nor could they possibly get as good water supplies that we obtained. Further, as has been pointed out, there was no inoculation for typhoid at that time, and I believe typhoid was rampant among the soldiers in the South African war while there was scarcely a case of it among those who served in the last war. Also, as has been said by the right hon. leader of the opposition, most of those who served in the South African war also enlisted in the last war. They had a great sense of loyalty, and I would think a very large percentage of those veterans enlisted under the colours as soon as the last war broke out. I certainly believe they should receive every consideration from this government.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that another class which should also receive consideration is composed of those who did not serve in France but who left Canada and got only as far as England. A great many of these men are not receiving a five per cent pension. The difference between a man who cannot get a five per cent pension and a man who does get it is very small, because a five per cent pension means a very minor disability indeed. But if a man receives a five per cent pension even though he served only in England, he is entitled to the war veterans' allowance. My point is that the man who does not happen to get a five per cent pension is in most cases, just as much entitled to the war veterans' allowance as the man who gets a pension of that percentage. When a man enlisted he had to give up his former mode of living. Many of those who got only to England had to devote long hours to the service of their country. They worked in offices and did other kinds of work to which they were not accustomed, but because they have no disability they are not entitled to the allowance.

While we are on this question I think something should be said about the widows of those veterans who, at the time of their death were receiving the war veterans' allowance. As I understand the law, at the present time the veteran who is entitled to this allowance gets $40 a month if he is married, but on his death the widow is notified that she will continue to get the allowance for one year only. If the man became pre-aged and incapable of working because he served in the war, surely when he dies his widow should not be cut off entirely. When this survey is being made in order to determine how many South African veterans are entitled to this allowance, I would ask the minister that it be extended to include also those who left the shores of Canada and served in England, who may claim this allowance. I would ask also that great consideration should be given to the claims of these widows. I do not suggest that they should receive $40, but I think the widow should receive a small amount of money not only for one year after her husband's death but during her lifetime. I would ask the minister to give that point very careful consideration.

Mr. POWER: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. DUPUIS: In connection with this question, Mr. Chairman, I have had brought to my attention many cases of discrimination of this kind, and really I find it difficult to answer satisfactorily these returned soldiers not only in regard to pensions but also in regard to work. Apparently it is the practice of every department of the government to give a preference, where jobs are concerned, to returned soldiers who receive pensions rather than to those soldiers who had the bad luck not to be wounded or to be sick during service. Those men receive nothing at all, though I submit that they should receive a preference over those soldiers who were wounded and who receive pensions. It appears to the common people—and I am in that class—that if a man receives $90 a month pension he should give priority to a soldier who was just as patriotic during the war, who went to the front line and served under fire, but who was not wounded and who did not suffer any disability which would entitle him to a pension. That is the way people of my type reason. It seems to me that the soldier who receives a pension should take second place to the man who has no pension but who has a family to care for. I think the latter should receive consideration at the hands of the civil service commission or any department of the government that may give work to returned soldiers. I would be indebted to the minister if he could give me an answer concerning those against whom there has been discrimination.

Mr. POWER: Among others, two points have been raised by the hon. member, the first of which deals with the preference given under the Civil Service Act to ex-soldiers. Speaking offhand, but I think fairly accurately, I believe I may have to correct the hon. member in some of his statements with respect to preference given to pensioners over non-pensioners who served overseas.

The preference to pensioners is a peculiar one, and is given them provided they have not as yet successfully reestablished themselves. There are one or two other conditions, but the important point is that if after his return from overseas a pensioner has been successfully reestablished, he does not enjoy the preference. I believe I could give an instance which may make the matter more clear. We will take the case of a man who, prior to his service in the war, was a railway conductor but who, when he returned from overseas, was able to follow his former occupation on the railway, and did so for a period of five or six years. It does not matter what period of time he serves, he is considered to have been successfully reestablished, and even though he be a pensioner the civil service commission will not give him a preference over the ex-soldier who is not in the enjoyment of a pension, but has seen service overseas.

Mr. BENNETT: He still has the ex-soldier's preference.

Mr. POWER: But not the pensioner's preference. Then, there are a number of other cases. Only recently there was an endeavour in my department to establish preference in a case something like this: The civil service commission called for applications for the position of nurse at one of the hospitals. A person who immediately after leaving the army had got married and had no experience in nursing for twenty years following the war endeavoured to set up a preference for herself on the ground that she had had service overseas and had not been successfully reestablished. I am not quite sure yet as to whether I shall not be obliged to reject this person's application, if she comes at the head of the list, on the obvious ground that not having been in nursing service or training for the profession of nursing for that period of time she would not be as competent to look after the rapidly aging ex-soldiers in our hospitals as would some other person who had been training or acting as a nurse in the past twenty years. I believe the illustration will cover one of the points brought up by the hon. member, namely preference within the preference accorded the pensioner.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) was about to discuss the second matter on Tuesday last, namely as to whether or not those who obtained pensions should be permitted to continue in the enjoyment of it and at the same time draw reasonably high salaries in the civil service. Concerning this point I have had a memorandum prepared. I do not wish to tire the committee by reading all of it, but the matter contained therein goes back to 1916. In a special committee formed in 1916, of which I believe the only member now present is the right hon. the leader of the opposition, a recommendation was made:

> That, to encourage industry and adaptability, no deduction be made from the amount awarded to such pensioner owing to his having undertaken work or perfected himself in some form of industry. The welfare of the state demands that so far as possible those who are at all able should endeavour to augment their pension allowance. If the pension granted were subject to reduction owing to the recipient having remunerative work, your committee are of the opinion that a premium would be put on shiftlessness and indifference.

The principle seemed to have been accepted by the house, without very much discussion, with the exception that Mr. W. F. Nickle, K.C., of Kingston, one of those who in 1919 framed the first pension legislation, said this:

> The committee took perhaps a radical step in another matter, but a step that seems to me to have been fair. They said that a man in receipt of a pension should be entitled to the fruits of his labour, that if a man who had lost his eyes adapted himself to circumstances and was able to earn the means of life, if he had lost his feet or his hands and had the pluck to again face life and through the advantage of vocational training or otherwise was able to secure employment in another sphere of activity, that man was entitled to keep what he earned. The committee took the stand that if those who had suffered greatly in this war had the courage when they returned to endeavour to earn a fresh place for themselves in civil life, they should be paid their pension in respect of the physical disability they had suffered, and should also be entitled to what earnings they made, and that the earnings should not be deducted from the pension.
> To adopt any other scheme than this seemed to the committee to have as an inevitable result the encouragement of shiftlessness and laziness and the committee felt that in a country like this everything possible should be done to encourage the men to take on themselves fresh employment when they again returned to this country.

The same principle was carried on, all through the recommendations of the various parliamentary committees, down to to-day. I need not quote the findings of other committees. The Ralston commission, which thoroughly investigated every phase of soldier problems, reported in a similar manner.

In 1933 it was thought there was some intention on the part of the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, to change the principle or in some way take away from those who were in receipt of pension either such pension or some of the salary attached to the positions they held in the civil service.

Mr. BENNETT: But he modified that.

Mr. POWER: Yes, I am coming to that. On reconsideration the Hon. Mr. Rhodes said:

> The last thing in the world that we had in mind was any interference with the sanctity of a contract concerning pensions. Whatever merit there may be or may not be attached to the suggestions contained in the budget speech with respect to pensions, it was never intended to interfere with pensions as such.

The point is that when the men came back from overseas they were told, "You will receive pensions, but go ahead and get jobs wherever you can. Not only that, but we will give you preference in the civil service of Canada in order to permit you to augment your pension by working for the government." I submit it would be something almost equivalent to a breach of faith if at this late date, after a great many of them have successfully reestablished themselves and have succeeded in filling some of the highest positions in the civil service, and despite their physical handicaps have been able to overcome them and render good service to the state, we were to deprive them of their pensions or to decrease their salaries. Moreover, an example such as that to private firms or organizations would not be in the best interests of the state or of industry.

Mr. DUPUIS: I was anxious to obtain from the minister a statement concerning those against whom there has been discrimination. They do not want others to lose their pensions. However, they are told, when seeking a civil service position, that if they had pensions it would be easier for them to obtain that position. They are met with the statement, "although you have no pension, those who have are in a preferred position, when they apply for this work." There are a great many ex-soldiers living in my riding and many of them have become distinguished citizens. They did their share in the last war and are proud of having done it, but a certain number of them are handicapped in the way I mentioned. I think it is my duty to bring this matter before the minister.

By the way, I was invited to some of their meetings and they unanimously passed a resolution approving the government's policy of national defence. Many of them told me that while they hoped there would never be another war like the one in which they took part, they would still be ready to do their part should the need arise. It is for such citizens as these that something should be done to help them, not to receive pensions, because they were not wounded, but to obtain the work they want. It may be said that civilians are discriminated against in favour of ex-soldiers, but I think any reasonable citizen will agree that that is only right. The only point I want to make is that the returned soldier without a pension should be on the same level as the returned soldier who receives compensation for his services in the war.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): When a man receives $6,000, $8,000 or $10,000 as salary, would his pension be discontinued? Is there a certain peak in earning when that action is taken?

Mr. POWER: That is not taken into consideration in any way. As I have indicated, the pension is based upon war services and has nothing whatever to do with civilian occupation.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to the report of the committee which sat during the recess in 1916 and 1917. Ever since we established pensions in this country we have kept two principles in mind. The first one is that the pension is in no sense wages or salary; it is compensation, inadequate in many cases, for injuries suffered by the recipient. The second principle is that in the computation of salary or wages which a man might receive, it is to be taken that that is based upon the service he renders and the service he renders can have no relation to the pension he receives for the injuries he suffered during the war.

Mr. POWER: May I interrupt my right hon. friend to call to his attention another principle. The scale of pension is based upon a man's capacity to earn in the common labour market and has no relation to the occupation which he followed prior to the war.

Mr. BENNETT: As the minister suggests, the pension which a man receives is in no sense predicated upon what he was receiving, but is based upon his then value in the labour market. The hon. gentleman wants to know what would be done in the case of a man receiving $8,000 or $10,000 as salary and being paid a pension of, let us say, $500. I remember having to meet that argument and I found it difficult to do so until I thought the matter out. The answer is that the services which the man is able to render in his then condition are worth $8,000 a year and presumably he would get that, if he renders the services adequately and efficiently, whether or not he had ever been to war. The fact that he went to war and suffered injuries which entitles him to $500 has no relation to the salary which he receives for the services he now renders, whether they be to the state or to someone else. That matter was discussed by the committee in 1916. I sometimes regret that I was not a candidate in 1917 so that I could have followed up some of the work done by that committee during the recess.

There is another matter upon which the private member who is now Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) had very strong views. This matter was raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis). There is a question whether the preference given to returned men might not be open to criticism in 1937. Conditions are to some extent different to-day from what they were in 1919 or 1920. A new generation of younger men has arisen and we now have the possibility of older men being given preference, say for a post office job, when a younger man might be more suitable for the position. I believe I am right in stating that no consideration is given to the matter of age.

Mr. POWER: Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: The question arises as to whether or not that greater preference is fair to the public service. At this time I think much may be said in this regard. However, the statute is there and notwithstanding the views that may be taken with respect to the desirability of it when one is not in office, it is an entirely different matter to say whether or not one is prepared to suggest this repeal when one is responsible. May I say to my hon. friend, the member for Chambly-Rouville, that the act will likely remain. It will terminate its usefulness only by what is euphemistically spoken of as the effluxion of time. I notice in the report which the minister handed me a moment ago that there are only forty pensioners left from the South African war. These pensions were paid originally by the British government.

Mr. POWER: There are forty disabilities and three dependants.

Mr. BENNETT: That indicates that the number we were mentioning, 863, is probably an over statement.

Mr. POWER: There were only 219 deaths among Canadians who served in the South African war.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for York West (Mr. Streight) was one of those who early went to South Africa, and during the last war he took with him quite a number of those who were in South Africa. Perhaps he would give the committee the benefit of his knowledge, which he has just communicated to me, and which I am sure will be helpful in the future with respect to the matter we have just discussed. The pensions paid to the men who went to the South African war were paid by the imperial government. In 1920, after the great war, we raised the pensions being paid to these men to what they would have received had they served in the great war. It seems to me that this fact offers an additional reason for looking into the matter from the angle I suggest.

Mr. STREIGHT: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister where he got his information regarding the hardships of the South African campaign as compared with the hardships in the late war. I also think his figure of 7,000 troops who went to South Africa from Canada, if he took the trouble to look it up, would be raised to about 10,000, and I think his figure of about 5,800 South African veterans being alive to-day would be reduced perhaps 3,000.

Mr. POWER: I believe that is correct, but I shall have the exact figures to-night.

Mr. STREIGHT: I would be surprised if there are 3,000 South African veterans alive in Canada to-day. Speaking of pensions for these veterans, it is quite true that the South African campaign was not comparable with the late war so far as slaughter was concerned. Nevertheless, the South African veterans did go through hardships and trials that we did not experience in the late war. For instance, in South Africa we had to contend with bad water, poor food, and severe climatic conditions. We had not only the heat but the cold. Anyone who knows what the South African climate is like, knows the nights are very cold, and the veterans had to sleep on the cold veldt sometimes with one blanket, and sometimes with a couple of inches of snow around them. I feel that any veteran who has served in any campaign—go back to the rebellion of 1885, or even back to the veterans of 1866—should come under the same heading as the South African veterans. I do not see why they should be discriminated against in any shape or form. Take the South African veterans at the beginning of the great war. Who formed the framework of every battalion in the first division? It was the South African veterans. They were at a premium. They were made sergeants and officers. I was one myself; I know. The framework of our first contingents and of some of the later ones was made up of those who had seen service in South Africa. I hope the minister will not forget to remember these veterans who served in Africa, and if he will look into the matter he will find that a great number of these veterans gave their lives in the great war. I had in my own unit twenty who had served in South Africa, and they never came back from the great war. It was stated a few moments ago that the average age at present of the South African veteran was sixty-six or sixty-seven. I am only fifty-six myself.

Mr. POWER: Did the hon. member run away from school?

Mr. STREIGHT: Just about. I know there are in Canada a number around my own age who served in South Africa. I think not only the veterans of 1885 but even the 1866 veterans should be given a fair show with those who served in the late war.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to add a word in support of what was said by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). There have come to my attention quite recently a number of sad cases of widows of pensioners, and I have referred to the war veterans' bureau two or three very distressing cases. These widows have reached the age of fifty to sixty. Probably during the lifetime of the pensioner the nominal pension that was allotted was received. Then the husband died. There was possibly a small mortgage on the home. In these cases the widow is in ill health; she is not able to carry on and the property has been lost. It is a very distressing outlook for the widow, whose husband served and gave of his best, to be faced with a situation like that, and I do want to support and urge upon the minister what the hon. member for Brantford City has said in that connection.

The other matter I would mention was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). The minister intimated that there were certain hospitals other than military ones, being contacted by the department in connection with hospitalization. May I ask if that is correct?

Mr. POWER: Yes, civilian hospitals under contract with the department.

Mr. LOCKHART: How many of those hospitals are there?

Mr. POWER: Nearly four hundred throughout Canada.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are they all authorized hospitals?

Mr. POWER: Nearly all of them. In practice any well known public hospital has only to write in and we will put them on our list; then they get patients.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to support what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said. What is the great difficulty in extending that hospitalization service as he suggested. The minister has medical men in these districts. I am thinking now of the Niagara peninsula, of towns like Niagara Falls, Welland and St. Catharines. Who are the minister's representatives, and why would it be so difficult to carry on that hospitalization? That is what I fail to see.

Mr. POWER: I do not think there would be very much difficulty. Hamilton is not far away, and we have a salaried medical man there. There would not be any very great difficulty in arriving at hospitalization of any of the class mentioned, and having them checked over by our salaried medical man in Hamilton. Then in London we have a whole staff of medical men, and a staff in Toronto. So I do not think there will be any hardship suffered.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the minister indicate that this service will be extended in the future? It has been restricted very much in the past.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid I cannot.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Salaries—staff, $3,517,600.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): This item was discussed at considerable length on January 19 when the estimates were before the committee and I explained it, giving the reasons for the increase.

Mr. GREEN: How many pension commissioners are there at present and what increase has there been over the number of a year ago?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Reilly was appointed to the commission. Doctor Kee was appointed to the pension appeal board and one ad hoc commissioner, Colonel Cyrus Peck, was appointed. The estimates last year provided for the appointment of six additional ad hoc commissioners, but so far only one has been found to be necessary, and one commissioner to replace Doctor Kee who went to the federal appeal court. As my hon. friend knows, Brigadier-General McDonald, who was secretary to the executive of the Canadian pension commission, was appointed to succeed Judge Taylor. There have been only two new appointments.

Mr. GREEN: The present total is ten?

Mr. POWER: The members of the Canadian pension commission are: Chairman, H. F. McDonald, G.M.G., D.S.O.; members; J. F. Ellis, M.D.; D. W. Gray, M.D.; J. A. L. Robert, M.D.; H. A. L. Conn, M.C.; Sir R. E. W. Turner, V.C.; Stephen Jones; A. Chasse, M.C.; S. Mackenzie, M.D.; C. D. Crowe, M.C., appointed since last year; C. B. Reilly, K.C.; and ad hoc for a period of six months, which was later extended for another period of six months, C. W. Peck, V.C., D.S.O.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the ad hoc commissioner receive a salary?

Mr. POWER: Yes, $6.000.

Mr. GREEN: Is the pension commission catching up with the cases that were in arrears? The minister undertook last year to have quorums stay in the different cities —one in Vancouver, one in Toronto and so on. Has that been done?

Mr. POWER: The chairman of the commission advises me that by March 31 of this year all arrears will have been overtaken. He has not yet issued instructions definitely fixing any quorum in any particular province, but it is proposed to do so as soon as the arrears are overtaken. As a matter of fact, however, I believe the quorum in British Columbia has been there almost constantly since last year. There is some doubt whether it will be advisable to keep a quorum in permanent residence in the maritime provinces, because once the arrears have been overtaken the ordinary routine may not be sufficient to warrant a quorum in that section.

Mr. GREEN: How many appeals were heard by the appeal court during 1936, and what was the disposition of them?

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: Something in the neighbourhood of 1,800, I would say. This is a summary of the decisions of the pension appeal court, that is all the decisions to October 31, 1936, since the inception of the court:

Appeals by the crown	152
Appeals by commission counsel	2,947
Appeals by applicants	7,572
	10,671
Entitlement conceded	1,222
Not conceded	9,353
Dual decisions	96
	10,671

I have not at the moment the figures for the past fiscal year but I can get them. It seems to me, however, there was a return tabled in the house not long ago. I do not think the percentage of pensions granted has increased in the past year.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that it will be only a question of time until we shall be able to do away with the appeal court?

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that perhaps we could have done away with it last year, and introduced legislation to that effect, but as my hon. friend knows, the legislation was revised by the committee and the court remained as it was.

Mr. GREEN: Is the number of appeals decreasing at all?

Mr. POWER: I should not think so at the moment. Possibly when the full effect of last year's legislation with respect to first and second hearings and so on is felt, the applicants will not want to go to appeal so frequently. We hope they will feel that their cases have been thoroughly studied and all possibility of obtaining pension exhausted before going on to the appeal court in what appears to be in many cases rather a vain hope.

Mr. GREEN: I do not wish to reflect in any way on the appeal court, but we understood in the committee last year that probably its usefulness would be ended in a few years.

Mr. POWER: Well, the appeals taken now by the crown are practically nothing; I think there were eighty or thereabouts in the eighteen months prior to the report last year, and there have not been any more since the report was made public before the committee. So the appeals are entered by the applicants, and so long as an appeal court exists I have no doubt that persons who consider that they have a claim will continue to apply to that court.

Mr. POULIOT: It would seem evident to any member of the committee that if a soldier was fit at the time of his enlistment and was unfit at the time of his discharge, he became unfit during his service; but in numerous cases, although, according to the medical report, soldiers have been wounded or suffering from some illness during their service, on discharge they are considered as fit by the board and the appeal court.

At this point may I bring to the attention of the committee a very serious case. It is of one of the doctors of the pension department whose name I do not recall, who went to the war and had two or three years at the front or in the army counted as years in university. Afterwards some imagination was used in his case and he was received as a doctor without having the necessary knowledge. His experience in the hospital was very short; he is only a clerk, just the same as a municipal clerk or a man who writes or examines forms, but he is one of the examiners of the department. I do not care whether he is Liberal or Conservative; that does not interest me, but it does seem that doctors in charge of the examination of soldiers who ask for pensions should be well qualified. War service does not count in such qualification; it is the medical experience that matters. I draw the attention of the minister to that case, which he knows very well, in order that there may be some redress. At the present time, if a soldier suffers from some internal sickness like rheumatism contracted at the front, as may well be seen from his medical sheet, he does not receive much consideration from the board or from the appeal court. General Turner—I have forgotten his initials, I think it is R. W.—may be a great soldier but he is no doctor and his decisions are very poor ones. I say that with personal knowledge of the cases. I know soldiers who at times are hardly able to walk on account of their disability. I have in mind one case, regimental number 897, one of the first men to enlist, who has been most unfairly treated by the appeal board. I denounce the appeal board on account of that. We do not need a brilliant soldier; we need a good sound doctor on the appeal board. It is not a matter of considering the war record of any soldier; it is a matter of seeing whether this poor soldier has suffered any disability from the time he enlisted until the time of his discharge. That seems very simple and clear, but it is hard to make those people understand it. And it is the same thing with the other fellow who signs most of the reports. We have enough of that. It seems to me that a poor fellow who is anxious to receive fair treatment should have it not only from a good fellow but from a competent medical man. Therefore I ask the minister if he would kindly do a little spring-cleaning in his department. There is bureaucracy of every kind in every department. I do not blame the minister for that, but there is the curse of bureaucracy in the Department of Pensions as well as in others. Once I recommended a soldier for treatment at Ste. Anne de Bellevue hospital. He went there and they extracted all his teeth and sent him home. They said, You are all right; go home. I had to apply to Doctor MacLaren, who is now Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in order that this man should be supplied with false teeth by a dentist in Rivière du Loup. This is not the treatment that should be given to a man who has risked his life for his country. The man had a very good record. For all these considerations I ask the minister to use his broom in his department and see that the cobwebs are swept away.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) in his plea for more consideration to some of the returned men who suffer from disease. I believe there are men whose records do not show very much or any disability during service, but who subsequently developed something that cost them a great deal of inconvenience or suffering for the balance of their lives. At the moment I have in mind the case of a young man named McEleese who served the guns in France for more than three years and who, in May, 1919, took his discharge, apparently quite well. Then, in November, 1919, he fell ill, and he has been paralysed ever since. The original diagnosis was sleeping sickness. This man is living in Regina. There is nothing on his sheet that would indicate any cause for his condition such as we sometimes find on soldiers' sheets, but it is believed that the condition from which this man is suffering is due in no small measure to nerve shock which he sustained during the war in the capacity in which he served. For a long time he was in Regina, cared for by friends, and then was transferred to an old folks' home. To-day he is back in the city which is maintaining him as an indigent, as it does for aged persons without means, paying I think it is a dollar a day for maintenance in a private home in that city.

Here we have a young man who has been paralysed for the last sixteen or seventeen years and who, during all that time, has been endeavouring to have his case reviewed. I am hoping that the commission will consider such cases sympathetically. I believe they will. I may say I took up this matter with the minister some months ago and he referred me to the commission, but up to the present time I am afraid nothing has been done. That is a type case, and I take it that there are many other cases of that kind. I have been informed also that sleeping sickness is now believed to be of long incubation. I know very little about that phase of the matter, but that is what I am told, and if that is so it is entirely possible that the germ was present when this man was discharged in May, 1919. I am asking the department to look into cases such as these, and I am sure members of this house would be only too glad to see something done for men who served but who to-day are bedridden and without assistance because of a former or improper diagnosis.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Before this item is passed, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind you that some time ago I endeavoured to ask a question of the minister. We have a quorum that visits the different provinces. In some cases a man is granted a five per cent disability and is recommended for pension, but when his papers come to Ottawa, for some reason or another the pension board here refuses to pay that five per cent. Then the matter is referred to a quorum or to the appeal board, and I have had two or three cases where the award which was recommended by the quorum was not paid. Even if it is a small amount, only five per cent, it would be of great assistance to him, because once a man is in receipt of a pension, though it be ever so small, there are other benefits which accrue to him. He can get free transportation to Camp Hill hospital; he can get assistance from the board during the winter months. So if he is refused this small pension, a real injustice is done.

I have voiced my disapproval of the appeal board refusing pensions such as these after the quorum has recommended that they be paid. The quorum is right on the spot; it examines the man and takes the evidence of the doctor who treated him, and if the quorum is satisfied that it is a genuine case surely the pension should not be refused here in Ottawa. It does not seem to me that these men are fairly dealt with.

A little later I should like an explanation from the minister, if possible, of a case which I have in my own home town. I doubt whether there is another case in Canada; at the most there must be very few. This man enlisted in Newfoundland, with a Newfoundland regiment. He went overseas with that regiment and, being a seafaring man, when he was over there he requested permission to leave the regiment and join up with the navy. Permission was granted; he joined the navy and served during the whole war with great distinction. He won recognition for prize money, and he was awarded different medals. All in all he had a distinguished career. After the close of the war he came back and was demobilized in Canada. To-day that man is a complete cripple. I have taken up his case with the government of Newfoundland and with the British government. I have taken it up also with the Canadian Department of Pensions, but while this man gave such splendid service to the British Empire, not one of these three countries he served is willing to-day to own him in any shape or form. They say, "No, he is not our care, but we will try in every way to get consideration for him." He has been refused a pension time and time again. His application was refused for so long, and he had such a poor education, that he was not able to present his case for the prize money awarded him by the British navy, so he lost that. To-day he is in our town on relief, unable to do a day's work and he is a burden on the community there. I think it is absolutely unfair that a case of this kind should receive no consideration from any of the governments concerned. In the first place I would like to ask with regard to the five per cent not being awarded this veteran.

Mr. POWER: I might answer all these matters raised by the last speakers by referring to the Pension Act. Section 5 of that act states:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and of any regulations made thereunder, the commission—

That is, the Canadian pension commission:

> —shall have full and unrestricted power and authority and exclusive jurisdiction to deal with and adjudicate upon all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension under this act.

This would indicate that in its wisdom parliament has declared that the Canadian pension commission, within its sphere, is absolutely supreme. It never has been thought wise to give the minister or the government the right to adjudicate upon pensions or to adjust pensions. I know that in England under certain very restricted conditions the minister may award pensions. I fear that if such legislation had been in force in this country, however, the complaints which we hear now would be multiplied a hundred, yes a thousandfold.

Having regard to the twenty years in which I have been in the house, and in which I have been interested in matters concerning returned soldiers, may I say that if there is one department of government which has kept free from political influence and which has allowed the duly appointed judges to carry on their work without interference, it is this department. There is no possibility in any way, shape or form of influencing any of those who were appointed under the statute to carry out the duties in connection with war pensions. As a matter of fact, I have been in the department now for nearly eighteen months and I think there are at least four members of the pension commission whom I do not even know by sight. I do not know them, unless I happened to know them before I came into the department. Otherwise I have taken no steps to meet them.

The members of the appeal court are Judge Hyndman, a distinguished jurist from Alberta; Mr. Sherwood of Ottawa, and Mr. Richard of New Brunswick. Last year, as a result of the legislation and as a result of complaints made that perhaps the court did not give due attention to medical questions which arose in a great many of these cases, Doctor Kee, who had probably from fifteen to twenty years of experience as a medical officer, and later as pension commissioner, was afterwards transferred to the court of appeal, thereby becoming a member of the appeal court.

The pension commissioners, of whom one is Sir Richard Turner, usually carry out their duties two at a time, in what is called a quorum. We endeavour—and I think we nearly always succeed—to have one member of the quorum a man familiar with medicine, one who is in fact a medical practitioner. The other is a civilian, sometimes a lawyer and sometimes, as in the case of Sir Richard Turner, a man who has had a long experience in business.

Of course I cannot discuss with the hon. member for Témiscouata the case he has in mind, or give my opinion as to whether or not in that particular case the claimant was entitled to a pension. These cases are fully considered. The evidence is taken down and is thoroughly weighed by the judges who, in these matters have as much authority as have any of the judges of the civil courts in the provinces. After they have given a decision, I am not in any way empowered, nor would I wish to have the authority to interfere.

Many people are of the opinion that all these judges should be medical men. I find that during the course of years these opinions seem to vary. At one time soldiers' organizations made representations that they did not want any lawyers or doctors to sit on any of the courts. At another time and in another period they have said, "We want doctors" and, at another time, "We want lawyers."

Mr. LAWSON: They were right the last time.

Mr. POWER: It depends upon the case in court, and what the decision of the quorum has been. In any event we have endeavoured to meet the wishes of all people by forming a quorum composed of one layman and one doctor.

Mr. REID: May I say a word to the minister and the committee regarding the appeal court, and its operation since a doctor was appointed last year. If hon. members will recall, when the matter came up before the special committee on pensions last year, the thought in the minds of members of the committee and particularly myself was that if there was a doctor on the appeal court, any doubt with respect to physical disability would be considered by a man competent to give a proper judgment. But as one who has attended the appeal court on a number of occasions, may I point out to the minister one case in which I took part only a few days ago. I shall endeavour to show that the returned man is not now getting the full advantage of having only one doctor on the appeal court. The case I have in mind is one of a man who had been too young when he enlisted; as a matter of fact, at time of enlistment he was only fourteen years of age. He had suffered an injury, but before that injury he had been taken out of the ranks and sent back as being under age. Eventually he developed a tubercular bone in the foot and at the age of thirty-six years is now incapacitated by tuberculosis.

A few days ago he appealed to the court, three judges of which were not of the medical profession. The whole case resolved itself into the question whether or not the tubercular bone might be the cause of tuberculosis for a man one hundred per cent disability. I could not help but think to myself—in fact I so stated to the judge—that it would be just as competent for me to go before the Supreme Court of Canada to argue some of the involved legal cases as it was for these three men to discuss as to whether or not the ailment was as serious as had been stated.

May I point out to the minister that a decision was rendered there and then, with no medical man present to give his views and opinion with respect to the physical disabilities of the applicant. I say to the minister and to the committee that it is high time the court of review itself was reviewed. Hope is raised in the breasts of all pensioners who make application, after going through the pension commission, and from there to the quorum, that when their case comes before the appeal court there is yet some hope of a favourable decision being granted. I think the minister will agree that the percentage of cases going through the appeal court in which applicants are successful is very, very small, probably not half of one per cent. In the event of an appeal, however, the hopes of the applicant are raised, and if a decision is to be judged from or hinges on the physical disabilities of the applicant, a medical practitioner should be in attendance. I refer to the case in which I took part a few days ago to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the appointment of only one doctor is not helping very much those cases which to a great extent depend upon medical evidence. If it is not thought advisable to appoint more doctors, then I say to the minister it is high time we reviewed the appeal court.

Mr. LAWSON: As one who has personally handled a great many pension cases, in view of the criticisms of the pension tribunal and the pension appeal court I feel it incumbent upon me to support the minister's statement. I would go still further. Probably because from 1928 to 1935 I represented a riding which had more people in it than had any other riding in Canada, one with an extraordinary percentage of returned soldiers, and because I have had occasion to handle a tremendous number of pension claims, my experience has been that the general administration of the act by the pension tribunal has been just and equitable, having regard to the limitations placed upon the commissioners by the statute. I have appeared before the appeal court as a lawyer only three times and the court ruled against me twice, so my opinion cannot be said to be biased by favourable results. I have had some experience in courts of law, and I want to say that I have never heard judgments more judicial and based upon sounder grounds than those delivered by the pension appeal court. When I appeared before the court, it had on it two members who are still there, Mr. Justice Hyndman and Colonel Sherwood. The other gentleman was not then a member.

I must disagree entirely with the reasoning of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). If he would like to have a demonstration of the considered unanimity of opinion to be got from a number of medical gentlemen, I should like to have him attend a meeting where a board of doctors is trying to decide some question of medical research with medical men appearing before the board who have different opinions.

Mr. REID: I did not advocate a medical board.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not suggest that the hon. member did, but he seemed to have an idea that the doctor appointed as medical adviser to the pension appeal court is not functioning.

Mr. POWER: He is not the medical adviser; he was the medical adviser, but it was thought well to appoint a doctor as a member of the appeal court. Doctor Kee is the member of the court, but as the quorum is only three, he does not sit all the time.

Mr. LAWSON: When he does not sit, the court have the advantage of the advice of a medical man who is removed from bias in the case. They have the advantage of his opinion in helping them to come to a judicial decision. I had a great deal of experience with Doctor Kee when he was acting in a previous capacity.

Mr. POWER: He was chief medical adviser to the board of pension commissioners in the old days and was afterwards appointed to the board.

Mr. LAWSON: I must say that I found Doctor Kee in both capacities to be a well balanced and considerate medical man, always desirous of giving the returned soldier every possible consideration. I want hon. members to believe me when I say that I did not know Doctor Kee until I came into contact with him in connection with pension cases.

I realize there are individual cases where there would seem to be great hardship, but for every case such as those cited by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I guarantee that there are ten in which the judgments are entirely fair. From some of the utterances I have heard to-night I am inclined to think that this parliament is trying to load on to the pension board and pension appeal court a responsibility that belongs to us alone. We must face this responsibility. This parliament in its wisdom originally determined that every man who served overseas should not have a pension. Let us get that clear. This parliament said that before a man could get a pension it must be determined that the condition from which he was suffering was attributable to his military service.

Mr. POWER: Or incurred on.

Mr. LAWSON: That was then divided into two classifications: was it because of or incurred on his military service or, in the alternative, was the condition from which he is now suffering one which existed prior to enlistment and had been aggravated by his service. We in this parliament laid down that test and the struggle of the pension commissioners and the pension appeal court has always been to ascertain that. Once that has been ascertained, the matter of assessment of disability is not nearly so difficult.

The minister has pointed out that the pension commissioners and the pension appeal court had very wide powers under section five, but he did not emphasize the fact that those powers must be exercised within the limits of the statute known as the Pension Act. That statute was passed and the limits prescribed by this parliament. As a result of laborious and painstaking inquiries by pension committees from time to time—these pension committees were in the main, if not entirely, composed of returned soldier members of this house—this parliament has in its wisdom continued the act in its present form. In every case where you find a man who cannot get a pension and who feels he is entitled to one, if you take the trouble to trace the matter down you will find that he has not been able to establish to the satisfaction of a quorum of the pension tribunal the fact that his present condition was incurred on or aggravated by his service. We prescribed that limitation, so why put the blame upon the pension tribunal or the pension appeal court? If I had any criticism to make of the administration—I want to point out that this is only my opinion and better lawyers with wider experience may disagree with me—it would be that the pension appeal court does not give sufficient weight to that section of the act which provides that a man shall have the benefit of the doubt.

In conclusion I want to join with the minister in one statement he made. I want to make it clear to every returned soldier in this country who is seeking a pension that there is not and has not been at any time any political influence or interference in connection with the work of the pension commissioners or the pension appeal court. Moreover, I have such a high opinion of the gentlemen who occupy these quasi judicial positions on the pension tribunal and the pension appeal court that I am confident they would not tolerate any such interference if it were attempted.

Mr. O'NEILL: I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Lawson). I am more inclined to agree with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). There is one matter I should like to mention, and that is the benefit of the doubt clause. When a man has been accepted by the army as one hundred per cent physically fit for service overseas, after he comes back from service in an active theatre of war and is discharged from the army and is not one hundred per cent physically fit, I do not think the onus should be placed on him to prove that his service overseas was the cause of his physical disability. The onus I think should be on the country to prove that that is not so. I have an outstanding case in mind. A man from British Columbia went overseas one hundred per cent physically fit. When he returned he was not physically fit, and he was discharged from the army as not physically fit. After doctoring for some time he eventually died. From the medical records of those days it would appear that there was no doubt at all that his death was directly attributable to service overseas, but unfortunately the doctors' records were consumed in a fire before his widow could establish claim for pension. The only record available at the present time is that of the doctor who attended him in his illness, and that doctor has taken an affidavit that the man's death was directly attributable to service overseas; yet the widow of that soldier has never received a pension.

I have another case. One of the finest specimens of physical manhood that I ever saw came from Kamloops, British Columbia. He was an old countryman, a Scotchman or an Englishman; he was not a Canadian. He enlisted, and to-day that man is living in Victoria, a physical wreck. I do not think there is very much doubt that he came back from overseas a wreck directly attributable to his service overseas. He does not receive a pension sufficient to keep him and his family of three children and his wife. He gets a forty per cent pension and he has a one hundred per cent disability. The onus is placed on him to prove that his present condition is attributable to his overseas service. I think it was the present minister—and I give him credit for it—who was responsible for that clause in the act, but it seems to me to give the benefit of the doubt to the government rather than to the returned man.

Another outstanding case I might mention is that of a man now lying in King Edward sanatorium at Kamloops, who may never be discharged from that sanatorium as cured. He has been in it almost ever since he got out of the navy. About six months after he was discharged from the navy his case was diagnosed as tuberculosis. Since that man when he enlisted was accepted as one hundred per cent physically fit, and since he has served the empire in the day of need, I think that whether his present condition is directly attributable to his service overseas or not, we should try to pay our debt to him. He served us when we needed him, and we ought to serve him now that he needs us. We have plenty of money for defence purposes, plenty of money for anything and everything except for the returned men, and if there is one class of men in this country who are now entitled to something it is the returned men. That is the point I want to make, Mr. Chairman. I would like to see something done with a view to getting something more for the returned men when it becomes necessary to invoke the benefit of the doubt clause.

Mr. LAWSON: If I may not be accused of monopolizing too much time, I should like to take up right where the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) left off. I said that the responsibility was on this parliament, and when I said that I meant it. It is all very well for the hon. member to rise in his place and say that we ought to do this and do that. If we were going to accept as a principle of our pension legislation the very point which he raises, namely, that where a man had a one hundred per cent certificate of health when he entered the army, and did not have a one hundred per cent certificate when he came out, he is therefore entitled to pension, all I have to say to the hon. gentleman is, let him introduce a bill into the house and I will support it. I do not know how much more support he will get, but there is no use simply criticizing the administration and doing nothing more about the matter. The point is, there is the law, and the pension tribunal and the appeal court are bound to enforce it. All I have to say is, let us be fair and honest about the thing. Do not let us be criticizing the administration unless it becomes a question of administration. Under our Penson Act, at the present time a man must prove that his disability is attributable to service, either incurred on or aggravated by service, and you cannot change that until you change the law. It is easy enough to give instances, but I shall not take up the time of the committee to do that. There is no question that there are returned men in this country who are entitled to pension and are not getting it; there is no question that there are returned men who have pensions in excess of their disability, but no administration and no law can bring perfect and equal justice to all people. I think the administration of our pension legislation brings a measure of justice equal to that of our courts of justice, which function in respect of property and civil rights

Mr. O'NEILL: If I may ask the hon. member a question, has he ever attempted to bring in any such legislation?

Mr. LAWSON: No.

Mr. O'NEILL: The hon. gentleman intimated that if I brought in such legislation he would support it.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. O'NEILL: Probably when I have been sitting in parliament as long as he has and know as much about law as he does, I shall bring in such a bill.

Mr. LAWSON: If I might be permitted one minute to reply, if the hon. gentleman sat here till doomsday he would never know as much law as I do, but as the length of his service in this parliament increases he will find that it is the part of wisdom and good judgment in pension matters to pay some heed to the recommendation of a parliamentary committee, itself consisting of returned men, which has spent hours and days investigating the problem and comes back to this house with a recommendation.

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not think there are any members in this house, and there are very few people throughout the country, who do not wish to see the returned soldier treated fairly and squarely by this government and by the people of Canada. In my experience as a medical man I have seen throughout the dominion returned men who I believe are deserving of pension and who are not receiving it. On the other hand, I agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) that there are very, very many returned soldiers who are to-day receiving more pension than they deserve. They are receiving the benefit of the doubt. The doctors are trying to treat the returned soldiers fairly. They are giving them the benefit of the doubt, and many returned soliders, I repeat, are receiving more pension than they absolutely deserve.

But there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that is troubling not only the returned soldier but the private citizen in this country. There are a great many returned men who have been wounded and are now receiving a pension of seventy-five or a hundred per cent, and at the same time they are working for the government and getting one hundred per cent salary. People cannot understand how a man can be one hundred per cent disabled and yet be one hundred per cent efficient; it is absolutely impossible. We know men who at present are drawing one hundred per cent salaries, running from eight to nine thousand dollars a year, and at the same time drawing one hundred per cent pensions running from two to three thousand dollars. One or the other is wrong. When a man is receiving a one hundred per cent salary, if he is getting from seventy-five to one hundred per cent pension his pension should be stopped until he is no longer able to do his work, and then his pension should start again. This is something that is worrying the returned soldiers, because many of them to-day are on relief, and they believe that these other men are in their way, taking positions that they could fill. Either of these things should stop. The minister should investigate the matter, and I urge him to consider the possibility of rectifying what I regard as an evil.

Mr. LEADER: Of all those who have spoken to-night I am inclined to agree more with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) than with anyone else. As a member of this house I accept the challenge of my good friend the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), that the government should introduce legislation to give justice to the man who went overseas and fought our battles. If they will introduce such legislation I will support them.

The hon. member for Kamloops says that the fact that a man offered his services when the country was in dire need should be sufficient to entitle him to proper consideration and a decent livelihood for the rest of his life, and I agree with that. I have submitted to the minister the complaints and requests of a number of returned soldiers; I have also gone to the pension board, and I must say that in all cases the members of the board have shown me the utmost courtesy.

I believe the board has been serious in its desire to rectify any wrong that has been done these men, but there is one particular case I want to bring to the attention of the minister to-night. I am referring now to a soldier who to-day is only forty-two years of age and who enlisted as a very young man. I believe he was discharged as physically fit; at any rate he did not ask for a pension until six or seven years ago when he began to feel the effects of his war service and requested a medical examination. After six years of medical examinations, during which time he has appeared before different boards, they have now reached the stage where they admit that they cannot do anything for him, notwithstanding that he had a wonderful record of service overseas. He was wounded three or four times; he was gassed; he had tonsilitis and a broken ankle and was buried by a shell and extricated by two of his comrades. The authorities have been impressed by his war service; yet they find they cannot do anything for him as far as a pension is concerned.

This man wrote to me two weeks ago and I was struck with his case as one that deserves the most serious consideration the minister can possibly give it. I asked this man whether he would allow me to submit his letter to the House of Commons and he said, "use it in any way you see fit." I wish to read this letter because it shows how bitter some of these men are becoming at the way in which they have been used. I believe this is an isolated case, because on the whole the returned men have been used very well; but there are cases such as this that should have the attention of the minister. The letter reads:

Dear Sir:

I am writing in regard my claim for pension. I am sure there is a mistake about that quorum in April 1936. I was told at that quorum that they granted in my favour. I was also notified to that effect, but they sent it to Montreal for hearing. I do not know what for and neither do they unless it was to do me out of it, so I think they have told you wrong. Such stuff to tell anyone, they don't think my disability came from service. I just wish the fool that said no had the ailments I have, they would belly ache. I suppose wounded, gassed and the rest done me a lot of real good instead of injuring me and my health leave out long service in trenches in mud and water to my waist for this country only to have dirt handed me always. Sir, if I had not of got clothing this winter from two different parties in the city I do not know how my children would of got to school and still they are short of sweaters and bed clothes a great country and fairness Eh? I don't think: I am sending you a copy of my old tribunal case that was held at Winnipeg, read it and then you will know why I am just plain mad and bitter. Please see if you can find out why they went against that, enough for any man to get a pension on. Will you please return that paper to me, I want to keep it. I am appealing but what good will it do. I am sending forms to Mr. Masterman, would you please see that they bring my case up and not hold it six more years if I get a pension or not. I am told that an appeal is supposed to be taken up at once.

I forgot to state that any doubt in the case was supposed to be given in my favour, is it? Same old thing, is the like of this to be allowed?

The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) said that some of these returned men had been retired on pensions of one hundred or seventy-five per cent and were now in good positions enjoying reasonable salaries. Well, perhaps that could be objected to on reasonable grounds. But what about C. P. Fullerton, who, after serving the country for twenty years and receiving $250,000 from the taxpayers, has been granted a pension of $6,000 as an ex-judge? And he is not helpless; he has no disability that we know of. I say this because he has now started business in Toronto and will probably earn $30,000 or $40,000 a year in his law practice. There is no justice in this. The awarding of pensions in Canada is anything but equitable. However, this is by the way. What I am particularly concerned with at the moment is to make a plea for this man whose case I have brought to the attention of the minister, and I trust the minister will give it his most serious consideration.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not think there is any use in bringing up particular cases. I believe it can be said that every man in this house, no matter to which party he belongs, is behind the minister and wishes to see the returned man get a square deal. The minister is a big-hearted fellow; I have known him a good many years and I trust him. I have never yet seen a minister who did not want to give the returned man a square deal, and I think it is bad advertising to talk as we are doing in this house.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not know that I agree with a great deal that has been said this evening. I wonder whether we are sincerely behind the minister to see that the returned soldier gets a square deal. It has been said this evening that there are a good many chisellers among the returned men. My short parliamentary experience leads me to believe that the governments since the great war have been doing their best to chisel on the returned men, and this particular government is no exception.

Mr. STREIGHT: What about the last one?

Mr. LENNARD: I said every government since the great war, and I said that the government in power at the moment is most decidedly no exception.

Mr. POWER: I do not think I can let that go by. It was easy to let everyone have their word to say about the poor unfortunate commission and the appeal court, but may I say that, in my opinion, although there was only one member of the court with whose appointment I had anything to do, I believe the court is carrying on its duty as well as it can under the circumstances. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) has said, it is interpreting the law placed on our statute books by the different parliaments of Canada which have succeeded one another since the war. This legislation is the result of the efforts of no one government and no one political party; this Pension Act, revised, amended, modified and changed, as it now stands, has been so modified on the recommendation of one parliamentary committee after another sitting almost every year since 1916. I suppose I am now the only member of this house who has been on every such committee since 1918, when I first came into the house. I should like to tell my hon. friend who is new to this house that in those committees there never was the least suspicion of any party politics—

Mr. LENNARD: I never said there was.

Mr. POWER: Time after time these committees came before the House of Commons and the house decided that it was in the best interests of the soldiers and of the country to accept, I think in almost every case unanimously, the reports of those committees. That happened last year; it happened in 1933, 1930, 1928, 1924, 1922, 1921, 1920, 1919, 1918, 1917 and 1916. In no instance within my recollection has there been any partisan discussion of the reports of those committees. Yet my hon. friend says that this government, like every government since the war, is chiselling on the returned soldier. I have heard that accusation made many times. We are discussing pensions now; the returned soldier who asks for a pension should at least show that the disability from which he is suffering was incurred during or was due to his military service. There is no association—there has not been prior to recent months at least—no organization of any standing in the community, looking after returned men which has ever suggested that pensions should be given on the basis of service alone. It has been an accepted principle that for a man to obtain war pension from this country he must show, first, that he is disabled and, second, that his disability is in some measure due to or was incurred during service. In 1930, when I was chairman of the pension committee, there was inserted in the act a clause which provided that in cases of this kind the applicant should be given the benefit of reasonable doubt. I do not propose to discuss here the question whether or not the judges appointed under the authority of this parliament do in every case give the benefit of the doubt. But I will say that it must be extremely difficult for any award of pension to be made at this late date unless there is a great deal of benefit of the doubt given.

There has been some discussion of the pension quorums and of the appeal court. Let me put this to the committee: When a pension application is first made, it goes to the Canadian pension commission. Without seeing the soldier, because the Canadian pension commission's head office is here in Ottawa, they examine the case on the basis of the documents on the file. A decision is arrived at as to whether or not the pension shall be awarded. The figures given last year before the committee indicated that at first hearing something like 30 per cent of the applications were granted—and it is now, mind you, twenty years after the war, so that without some benefit of the doubt being given it must be extremely difficult for the applicant to make any case. If the application is refused by the Canadian pension commission, it can go before a quorum of the commission, which, as hon. members know, sits as nearly as possible in the locality where the applicant resides, sees the applicant, hears his case presented through a veterans' bureau by advocates appointed by the government, and there again it is decided whether or not he is entitled to pension. In this court the percentage of claims granted last year, was, I think, 15 per cent; I speak subject to correction; it may have run to 18 per cent. If the applicant is turned down there in the second instance, he has the right to go to the appeal court. Naturally, before the appeal court is reached the good cases are nearly all sifted out; nearly every one who has any chance of obtaining pension has been eliminated before the appeal court is reached. Nevertheless this country, which my hon. friend accuses of chiselling the soldier, pays his lawyer, pays the doctors to look after him, sets up all this expensive machinery and gives him the right to apply to the appeal court for nothing, and because the man knows it will cost him nothing, it is a sweepstake so far as he is concerned; he might just as well go to appeal because he has a possible chance of getting his pension and it costs him nothing to try. The whole machinery is paid for by the country. He goes to the appeal court, and I think it is only reasonable to suppose that that court could not in the ordinary course be expected to grant pension in such a high percentage of cases as is the case in the lower courts. So what may be meant by chiselling on the soldier I do not know.

We cannot give pensions to everybody; at least no one has ever asked that we give pensions to everyone. We cannot give treatment to everyone. A great many of the returned soldiers who are at present suffering from disabilities have now reached an age, forty-nine, fifty, sixty, when normally in civilian life their health is not as good as when they were twenty-five, and naturally they may think it is due to their war service. But it is very difficult to assess the degree, if any, to which the disability from which they are suffering is due to their war service. For that reason a large number of them do not get pension. But I do not think it shows that the governments have been chiselling on the returned soldier when upwards of one billion dollars have been paid out to returned soldiers since the war, a sum equivalent to the whole amount collected in income tax from the people of Canada since income tax was instituted, and when we are paying an annual bill running from $41,000,000 to $45,000,000.

Before I close I should like to make this further point. I have said to my department; I have said outside; I have said at gatherings of soldiers and elsewhere, that it matters not one whit to me if the pension bill amounts to $45,000,000, to $50,000,000 or more. What I am interested in is seeing to it that every soldier who is entitled to a pension under the legislation which parliament has enacted shall get it and, as far as it lies within my power, I am making every possible effort to see that this is done. I am not trying to economize in pensions. I should not mind if the pension bill were very much higher, but I am opposed, in the interests of the soldiers as much as in the interests of the country, to any general distribution of funds for service only.

Mr. FINN: I do not want the committee or the Minister of Pensions and National Health to think I am offering any criticism of the administration of his department by himself or by his predecessors since the great war. I have listened to the remarks of some hon. gentlemen in this committee, and I do feel that the trouble with the Pension Act is that it is not sufficiently elastic; that there is no discretionary power vested in any person to take into consideration the rights of the individual in any particular case and to treat that case as it should be treated.

In my constituency in the city of Halifax I have two particular cases which I am going to bring to the attention of the minister and hon. members of this house. One case, Mr. Chairman, is that of a nurse who went overseas. She might have gone over on the Llandovery Castle; to-day she might have been in the watery deep. I would call your attention, sir, to the fact that it is impossible to make remarks in this house while conversations are going on to such an extent as to interfere with continuity of thought. That remark has reference not to the minister but rather to those who perhaps do not realize that they are interfering with the proceedings of this committee.

This nurse reached the age of sixty-five a few months ago. If she had served for another year and two months she would have been entitled to a pension. Now, however, she has been cast out into the streets without one dollar, without a home, without any person to protect her, and under the act there seems to be no provision under which her case might be given consideration or under which her time might be built up by service. Those in authority at Camp Hill hospital at Halifax say she is still competent as a nurse but that she must retire, and notwithstanding her splendid services overseas and at the hospital since the war she is left without a pension. She is practically on the poor list in the city of Halifax. That, Mr. Chairman, is a case where there should be elasticity; there should be some discretionary power vested either in the minister or in some board so that this nurse might be cared for and put on a basis whereby for the rest of her years—which may be only five or ten—at least she might receive some recognition of her services to her country, particularly as a woman.

The other case is that of a man of about thirty-five years of age, living in the city of Halifax. From this family four brothers went overseas. Three of them are dead. This chap of whom I speak was gassed and wounded twice. He went into his last battle and was shot in the head. Now he receives the magnificent pension of $7.50 per month, and from the city of Halifax he receives $10 a month. That is a total of $17.50, all of which he has to pay for his room and board. He has very severe pains in his chest and some kind friends sent him to an outstanding specialist, and now he has found that his patient has developed tuberculosis. So to-day in the city of Halifax he is receiving $7.50 plus $10 per month, and he has no recourse. There is no elasticity in the act; he has no opportunity to have his case reviewed.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, I believe some provision should be made for cases of this kind. I do not believe there is anyone more sympathetic to the returned men than the present Minister of Pensions and National Health, who is also a returned man. One has had to be there to know and understand what men go through, both physically and mentally, in the awful battles that take place in any war such as that which lasted from 1914 to 1918. Sometimes committees of this house bring in reports, but they do not get down to the practical thought that while a case may be made out, while a man may have a bona fide claim and may be honest, sincere and deserving, it may not come within the four corners of the act as it exists to-day, and that the act should be so amended as to permit of cases of this kind being looked after, so that the returned man who has gone through what this chap went through may be cared for. This man of whom I speak is the last of four brothers. They all went overseas, and as a matter of fact his father served in the South African war. This man to whom I refer is now receiving $17.50 per month, though he is suffering with his head and from tuberculosis. It appears to me that this is a travesty on the act, and I say it is up to the parliament of this country, in which I have the honour to have a seat, to remedy cases of this kind by the necessary amendments to the act in order to give the technical officers of the department the right to deal with such cases. I suggest that they should be handled in this way, submitted for the consideration of the government or the appeal board, and then dealt with by order in council.

I had the privilege of attending before the appeal court in Ottawa, presided over by Judge Hyndman. I want to say that that court is as human and as ready and willing to go as far as possible as any court could be. When the case before it had been presented by Mr. Hogan, the returned soldiers' advocate Judge Hyndman turned to me and said, "Mr. Finn, do you desire to say anything to the court?" I said, "No. I came here because I believe this is a worthy case." He said, "I only wish there was a greater interest shown by members in their constituencies. I wish they would come and give that moral support which sometimes is so necessary to those who feel they have not received justice." In that particular case the decision was that the returned man was entitled to a substantial pension. The war ended in 1918 and this case was last year, and it is only a matter of addition to know the number of years which have passed since then—nineteen years. During all that time he was not in receipt of a pension which the appeal court, the final tribunal, awarded him in a judgment handed down.

I offer these suggestions to the Minister of Pensions and National Health and to hon. members of the committee, and at the same time suggest there should be an amendment to the act whereby in equitable cases the minister might have the case presented to him, in consultation with the appeal court. Finally, a recommendation might be made to the governor in council so that specially deserving cases which have been unfairly considered—not intentionally, but by reason of the narrow scope of the act—might be given further favourable consideration.

I have given two concrete examples in order to show the necessity for elasticity. That can be brought about only by an amendment whereby discretion would be given to some person so that a returned soldier might have an opportunity of a rehearing and final decision. The two examples I have given are sufficient for me, as a member of the legal profession, and are outside any sympathetic interest I may have in returned soldiers. I had the misfortune of losing a young nephew, Lieutenant Clifford Finn, who served overseas. Just before the armistice three machine gun bullets passed through the back of his neck and at the age of eighteen years he was killed. The colonel of his regiment wrote saying that his last words were, "Get the boys under cover. I am going out." I asked my late brother, Doctor W. D. Finn, how it was possible the boy could speak, three bullets having gone through the back of his neck, and his reply was, "Well, Bob, that is possible. The spinal column was cut off, but for a few seconds the clarity of the brain was so great that it gave him an opportunity to think of others." At that moment he, himself, was ready to drop, and never again did he breathe the breath of life.

I want to pay tribute at this time to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), and to thank him for the sincerity and the splendid sympathy he showed to all men who served overseas. He was the representative of Canada, looking after the interests of those men who were fighting the cause of democracy. I believe I would not be out of order in saying that I wondered if whether democracy had failed when last night, after going to bed, I read that the son-in-law of Haile Selassie had been shot within an hour after he had been captured, by order of Mussolini.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FINN: Yes, I know—but I have said it. If I am out of order I apologize—but it is on the record.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up much time of the committee. A few minutes ago the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said there was no use in wasting time, and I agree with him. I believe we waste too much time, and we are not taking enough action. May I say here I did not take part in the great war. I feel, further, that many men did take part who, if an opportunity was presented to them to-day, would not do so again.

Mr. FINN: Were you there?

Mr. FAIR: I promise the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) one hundred per cent support, if he proposes to do something worth while for the returned soldier. In the past, when we needed cannon fodder, our men have been provided for. We have given them uniforms; we have given them $1.10 a day, and we have made millionaires out of our munitions makers. I believe the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power) said that since that time we have paid one billion dollars in payment of war pensions and in addition we have paid millions of dollars in interest on war debts. Yet to-day we have thousands of our returned men on the breadline, or very close to it. What are we doing to help them? We are spending a good deal of time talking, but what action are we taking? It is about time we realized our responsibilities. If I wished to take the time of the committee I could describe cases which have been brought to my attention, but on this occasion I shall not do so.

I do not wish to criticize the minister, nor do I criticize the commission looking after this part of the work. If their efforts are within the law, that is all they can do. But as members of the House of Commons and as representatives of the people, including large numbers of returned soldiers, it is our duty to do something worth while, and to do it at this session. Our returned soldiers have suffered long enough; let us now help them a little bit.

Mr. FINN: I do not wish unduly to detain the committee, but may I say that I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) has the floor.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, parliament has been most earnest in its desire to bring pension legislation to the greatest point of efficiency. The minister has spoken about the advantages received by ex-service men through an advocate. I now appeal to him to give a resident advocate to the interior of British Columbia. When one was originally appointed, his seat of activities was supposed to be at Nelson, but his duties at Vancouver have become so onerous that he seldom reaches the interior. Four-fifths of the ex-service men of British Columbia are located at the coast, a factor which works distinctly to the disadvantage of the men in the interior as they do not have an opportunity to bring their complaints to his attention.

Something has been said about ex-service men discharged as physically fit. We know that when the war closed the great desire of the men was to get home. Sometimes they were discharged as physically fit, after only very short examinations. These are the men who to-day have the greatest difficulty in appealing for pensions. When quorums visit a community, applicants appear in person, and the members of those quorums are able to judge as to a man's physical condition. When the man's condition is supported by the word of a local physician, it seems unreasonable that an appeal court should take a view contrary to that expressed by the quorum. My observations are particularly applicable when the local physician is acting under the instructions of the department.

In this connection I urge, first of all, that the minister give thought to placing an advocate in the interior and, second, that the decision of the quorum be final without opportunity on the part of the government to appeal. I have appeared before the board of pension commissioners in a great many cases and my experience has been that they give a most sympathetic hearing to the cases which come before them. This is particularly so of Judge Taylor and General McDonald. I simply want to urge again that the minister give thought to appointing a soldiers' advocate in the interior of the province.

Mr. POWER: I shall be very glad to look into the question of the appointment of an advocate in the interior of British Columbia. I believe Mr. Markham was at Nelson but was transferred to Vancouver. Because of the great amount of work at Vancouver, two advocates are located there. Mr. Drinnan and Mr. Markham are located at Vancouver and Mr. Sedger is located at Victoria.

In connection with appeals to the pension appeal court, I am assuming that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) is referring to appeals by the crown. From 1931-32 to May, 1933, there were 2,947 appeals taken by commission counsel, that is by the crown. On many of those appeals the decision of the old tribunals was reversed. Since 1933 there have been only 152 appeals by the crown, so surely it cannot be said that the crown has abused its power of appeal since that time. The ratio is 152 in approximately three years as compared with 2,947 in two years.

[Mr. Esling.]

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Mr. Chairman, the minister has referred to section five as conferring wide powers upon the appeal court. I can understand that this court should have wide powers and be free from political interference, but I cannot understand why they should be empowered to brush aside what would appear to be well known British legal procedure and jurisprudence. As I understood the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), when a man has established his claim before a commission quorum he is reasonably assured of his pension, but many appeals from the quorum tribunals are reversed by the appeal court. I know that many men in my constituency have established their cases before the quorum tribunal, but when the government appealed to the appeal court, which did not have the advantage of hearing the witnesses—a procedure which to my mind is contrary to every rule of British jurisprudence—the appeal was allowed.

I know of one man who was in the trenches for three and a half years. He did not receive a scratch, but he is one of those burnt-out cases. He is a physical wreck and is absolutely unable to earn his own living. As you know, we have no relief in New Brunswick at the present time and the condition of this man and his family is absolutely pitiful. His claim was allowed by a quorum of the commission but it was disallowed by the appeal court. It seems to me that something should be done for cases like this. The minister has stated that where cases have been disallowed by the quorum, an appeal could be taken to the appeal court. But in this case the claim was allowed by the quorum and appealed by the government. I think the law should be changed as it is hard to convince the man on the street that it is being fairly administered. This is especially so, when they see men who are apparently in the pink of condition getting large pensions.

I know of other similar cases but I shall not cite them this evening. I know of cases where men were received into the army as physically fit, and yet were demobilized for medical unfitness. Surely if they were fit when they went into the army and unfit when they came out, their unfitness must be due to their service. If the doctors made a mistake in the first place, then the government should be estopped from claiming that the man's disabilities dated back prior to enlistment. If the doctors had not their eyes open and did not do their work properly, I think the government should suffer the consequences.

Mr. LAWSON: I hope the committee did not understand my statement to be as stated by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Robichaud). I never made any suggestion that the pension appeal court might not set aside the finding of a quorum of the pension tribunal for cause. While I realize that one cannot speak of a particular case without having heard all the circumstances, I am confident that where the pension tribunal has set aside a judgment of the quorum, this has been done not merely because the pension tribunal disagreed with the quorum on a matter of fact which depended upon the evidence of witnesses, but for some other reason.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to another matter which has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling). I refer to that group of men who are concerned in the administration of this act and who are doing a great job for the returned soldiers of this country—the soldiers' advocates. I suggest to each hon. member of this committee that when a man comes to him stating that he has a pension claim, he can render that man no better service than to send him to the pensions' advocate in his district. I used to attempt to handle personally a great many pension cases which came to me prior to the appointment of these advocates, but I soon learned, from watching the work of these men before the quorums of the pension tribunals, that they were much more skilful in the job than I. They do their work particularly well and I believe this is one expenditure authorized by this parliament which has been amply justified.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not want to be misunderstood. I was casting absolutely no reflection on the officials of the department. I believe the officials of this department are among the most efficient in the government service. I did not infer that there had ever been any political partisanship displayed.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend says that there are seventy or eighty lawyers in this house, and suggests that they might draft the necessary legislation to meet these cases. I am sure he does not desire that statement to go out to the country because, while I happen to belong to the legal profession and know the rules which govern parliament and the expenditure of public moneys, and while I might be competent with the other legal members of the house to draft an amendment to meet these extreme cases which have been mentioned here to-night, the fact remains that no member of this house, outside the members of the government, can introduce a bill and get it to its second reading if it involves the expenditure of public money. Such a bill must emanate from a member of the cabinet sitting on the treasury benches or meet with their approval.

My hon. friend spoke of the law of estoppel. It is perhaps one of the most intricate pieces of law to interpret and establish that come before our courts. While a person may be estopped, in the pension law as it stands upon the statute books to-day there is no provision dealing with the law of estoppel. That question can only be pleaded to courts of law. I do think, however, Mr. Chairman, that when a serious submission is made to the Minister of Pensions and to the government for an amendment that would make the law more elastic in order to deal with these cases, our efforts should not cease with the member who urges such an amendment trying to make himself au fait with his constituents—

Mr. LAWSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear," and I say, "There, there." When I suggest a thing in this house, it is not to gain votes. I have had too many of them; otherwise I would not be here again. When I speak in this house I do so in order that action shall be taken and a remedy applied, and that the word "gratitude," so plain in the English language and yet so forgotten to-day, should again appear, not in a statute or an amendment, but in our dealing with the human equation. I would ask the minister if he would not consider with his colleagues the question of an amendment to the act in order to give it that elasticity of which I have spoken to-night, so that these very deserving cases, based upon truth and honesty and right, shall have an opportunity of a rehearing, and then we may hope that the applicants may spend the remainder of their days not in poverty but with perhaps a sufficient amount that they can look forward to the next day and feel they were not like the man President Roosevelt described as the "forgotten man." In that very description of his was the reason for his great victory of four years ago, and for his practical annihiliation of all parties in the United States last November, when only two states, and those the ones nearest to us, voted against him. I am not talking to get votes; I am not talking to hear myself talk. I am trying to draw the attention of the Minister of Pensions and of the government to these cases. I see the Minister of Justice in his seat. No more human man, no wiser legislator, no better draftsman, no man of keener intellect then he sits in this house, and I would appeal to him and to the Minister of Pensions if it is not possible to submit this matter to the government in order that they may pass upon the question whether an amendment shall be made to the act to deal with these cases of a deserving nature, which are now without the law because the law does not provide for them.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: May I say to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) that when I spoke of estoppel, I was thinking not of legal estoppel but of moral estoppel.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions a question based upon a communication which I have in my hand, and which does seem to me to present a very interesting question. It does not involve any large sum of money, nor does it involve any radical change of policy. I think the letter is worth reading:

> I am a returned man, nearly stone deaf through war disability. There is a bone conduction accousticon on the market that enables me to hear nearly as good as before I got this head injury. Christie hospital authorities have been trying to get one for me for a long time, but the Ottawa authorities state there is no money available to purchase these things with.
> I got a loan of one of these instruments once, and with it I heard my first talkie. My children's voices were a revelation to me, and they were tickled to think they could talk to me without raising the roof or letting the people in the next town hear what they had to say to me.
> The government supplies artificial limbs for amputation cases; why not aids to hearing? The retail price is $100, but I am unable to go that high. I am a widower with four healthy youngsters to feed, and being a one hundred per cent disability case I can't earn anything towards the purchase of this machine. Life would start all over for me if the government gave me one.

Then he gives his name and pension number. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the man who writes that letter presents a very interesting point. After all, if a man has lost his arm or his leg, he is supplied with an artificial arm or leg, or if he loses an eye, he is given something to replace the eye for appearance's sake. But if a man is deaf, and cannot procure something with which to hear, he cannot hear at all. In this particular case the man is not able to buy this instrument because the cost of the acousticon is too high. I know from my personal experience with friends and relatives that the acousticon is efficient in many cases of deafness. Accordingly I would ask the minister if there is not some provision for such a case as this, and when I ask him that question I realize that this will not open many such cases.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that we have on various occasions tried a number of acoustical instruments, and sometimes they have given satisfaction to the patient. We are quite ready and willing to try any instrument which is submitted to us and has a fair chance of being successfully used by those who are afflicted. If the hon. gentleman will give the man's name and number, I shall be glad to ask the medical officers to go into the matter.

Mr. MASSEY: I gather from what the minister has said that if the instrument is satisfactory in this man's case, he will have a reasonable chance of having one supplied him?

Mr. POWER: Surely.

Item agreed to.

Grant to last post fund, $60,000.

Mr. GREEN: How much of last year's vote was used?

Mr. POWER: The whole amount.

Mr. GREEN: Is it used to pay for the burial of Canadians in foreign countries, and, if so, how much was used for that purpose last year?

Mr. POWER: It is used to a small extent to pay for funerals of Canadians in the United States and England.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the average cost per burial?

Mr. POWER: The grant is a maximum of $50 for the funeral, $25 for the marker and $25 for the grave.

Mr. GREEN: There is some complaint that the words "last post fund" are put on the grave marker. I do not know whether that is so. If it is a fact, I suggest that the department have the practice changed.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that sometimes the relatives prefer it; I do not know why. In the province of Quebec that is always done. I shall be glad to look into the complaint and see whether anything can be done. This last post fund is not operated by the department; it is a grant.

Mr. GREEN: It is also complained that the words "poppy fund" are used. I ask that that be estopped too.

Mr. POTTIER: Is it necessary to have the approval of the officials of the fund?

Mr. POWER: Under the regulations, yes.

Mr. POTTIER: Does that not cause hardship at times?

Mr. POWER: I do not know any other way in which the fund can be properly managed. Complaints have been made in a number of cases particularly where the deceased has been living in an outlying district, but I do not know any other way in which the last post fund could be controlled; otherwise it would be called upon to pay for almost every funeral. These people are volunteers who carry on the work without any assistance in the way of salaries from the department.

Mr. HAYHURST: Last year $60,000 was allotted to the fund and this year the same amount appears in the estimates. It is expected that the number of these burials will increase year by year. How many were taken care of last year?

Mr. POWER: In 1935-36 there were 643 burials:

Alberta	60
British Columbia	105
Manitoba	96
New Brunswick	13
Nova Scotia	11
Ontario	218
Prince Edward Island	3
Quebec	85
Saskatchewan	51
United States	1

Mr. GREEN: In the report of the department for last year, at page 107, there appear these words:

> In view of the number of Canadian ex-service men who are residing in Great Britain and the United States, it is considered that the activities of the last post fund should be extended so that it shall not be necessary for any Canadian ex-service man to be buried as a pauper, wherever he may reside at the time of his death.

What steps have been taken since 1935 to ensure that ex-service men shall be properly buried?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that a considerable number have been buried since the close of the last fiscal year, March 31, 1936. The matter has been given some publicity in the United States, and perhaps my hon. friend is aware that the Los Angeles branch of the legion made strong representations to both myself and the Canadian legion in convention assembled with respect to the burial of deceased Canadians in the United States. Steps have been taken to do whatever is possible in the United States, and certain sums of money have been sent to England to look after Canadian soldiers who may have died there.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is so much soliciting on the part of undertakers seeking the right to bury returned soldiers who die in our hospitals that I was wondering what supervision the government exercises to see that every returned soldier receives a thoroughly adequate casket, is properly embalmed, and so on. Judging by what seems to be almost a competition amongst undertakers, one would suppose there was considerable profit, but there cannot be much profit in the allowance made by the government.

Mr. POWER: We are speaking of the last post fund. That does not provide for the funerals of those who die in our hospitals. That is looked after by the department itself. Some years ago there was a good deal of complaint about the manner in which these funerals were conducted. It was the custom of the department to call for tenders from undertakers and a resolution was introduced into the house by General Ross of Kingston protesting vigorously against the practice. The result was that now we no longer call for tenders, but $75 is given for the funeral and $25 for the grave, and the relatives of the deceased soldier are allowed to nominate the undertaker. I agree that there is a good deal of such canvassing as my hon. friend has mentioned; I myself have received many letters.

Mr. MacNICOL: What supervision does the department exercise to ensure proper burials?

Mr. POWER: The officers of the district look after that, to see that there is a proper funeral, and even if the grave costs more we pay a little more.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is thorough inspection?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HAYHURST: What is the salary of the dominion secretary treasurer of the last post fund?

Mr. POWER: We pay him $1,800.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment assistance, $2,600,000.

Mr. POWER: Would the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) have any objection to taking the war veterans' allowances' item on the understanding that the unemployment asistance item stand, or which would he prefer to have stand?

Mr. GREEN: I should prefer to have them both stand.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member could discuss anything connected with the pensions administration and so forth under one item. It is not usually the custom to hold over two items.

Mr. GREEN: Very well.

Mr. POWER: Would my hon. friend prefer to hold over item 193? It has more reference to the work of the commission than the other.

Mr. GREEN: It does not matter.

Item stands.

War veterans' allowances, $4,200,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the minister will give a brief statement of what this vote is used for, how it is distributed, and why it is increased.

Mr. POWER: The War Veterans' Allowance Act provides for allowances to ex-members of the Canadian forces and to ex-members of the allied forces who were domiciled in Canada at the time of their enlistment and who served in a theatre of actual war, or, not having so served, are in receipt of a pension or have commuted a pension by final payment. The allowance is payable to such veterans upon attaining the age of sixty years or, not having attained this age, who are in the opinion of the board permanently unemployable by reason of mental or physical disability. The maximum allowance is $40 per month if the man is married or a widower with dependent children, or $20 if he is unmarried. The allowance may be continued to a widow for a period of one year.

I think it is well known to the committee that the War Veterans' Allowance Act will continue to rise in cost; the operation will be more expensive as the years go on and more and more men reach the age of sixty or become permanently incapable of carrying on their occupation.

Under the amendments of last year another class was admitted to allowances. I have already stated that the allowances provided for carrying out this act, beginning in 1930 with something like $300,000 have now risen to $4,200,000 and will rise to $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 a year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Who decides whether the applicant is a proper subject?

Mr. POWER: The war veterans' allowance board, the chairman of which is Mr. Walter Woods and the two members, Colonel Carmichael and Colonel Garneau.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the act to-day not permit consideration of soldiers of age down as low as fifty-five years?

Mr. POWER: Yes, in cases of pre-aging so as to render them unfit to maintain themselves. That is in accordance with the amendment passed last year.

Mr. MARSHALL: Can the minister give the amount actually spent under this vote to the end of 1936?

Mr. POWER: I shall give the figures:

1933-34—
Expended	$1,646,313 63
Unexpended	3,686 37
Vote	$1,650,000 00
1934-35—
Expended	$2,017,074 80
Unexpended	2,925 20
Vote	$2,020,000 00
1935-36—
Expended	$2,531,488 77
Unexpended	18,511 23
Vote	$2,550,000 00
1936-37—to Nov. 30, 1936—
Expended	$2,015,831 55
Unexpended	1,384,168 45
Vote	$3,400,000 00

And this year's vote is increased by $800,000 which we expect to expend.

Mr. GREEN: How many applications have been granted under the new classification which was provided for last year covering men who are fifty-five to sixty years of age and incapable of maintaining themselves?

Mr. POWER: Since the act was passed last year, approximately 600 have been granted war veterans' allowances under the extended legislation.

Mr. GREEN: What will that class cost?

Mr. POWER: The number had reached 500 when this information was prepared; we estimated it would cost $150,000 extra annually. I think the average is about $30 a month for married and unmarried.

Mr. GREEN: Has that new classification caused any administrative difficulty?

Mr. POWER: Well, it brought a flood of applications.

Mr. GREEN: One would expect that, but has it caused any serious administrative difficulty? Has it weakened the act at all?

Mr. POWER: Naturally the members of the board were obliged to use their discretion more than before, but I think they have managed to give a fair degree of satisfaction. I have not heard any serious complaint, and I do not think my hon. friend has or he would have told me about it.

Mr. GREEN: The new arrangement then is really quite workable.

Mr. POWER: It seems to be.

Before we leave this item, while we were discussing this matter of war veterans' allowances this afternoon, I gave some information in reply to questions asked by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in regard to the South African war veterans. I was only quoting the figures from memory but they were substantially correct. From figures obtained from the Department of National Defence we find that 5,325 veterans from Canada saw service in South Africa, and that a further number of 2,041 arrived there subsequent to the cessation of hostilities, making a total of 7,366. Here is where I had not remembered by what procedure we arrived at the figure of 5,000. The insurance department expressed the opinion that after the mortality was deducted, the survivals from these two groups would now be 3,920 in the case of those who actually served and 1,569 in the case of the others, a total of 5,489. But we neglected to take into consideration the fact, brought to the attention of the committee this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), that a large number of these men had returned to serve in the great war, who would, of course, if they had now reached the age of sixty, be qualified for an allowance under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. If we assume that the average age was twenty-five at the time of the South African war, the average age of South African veterans now would be approximately sixty. If 15 per cent of the total now living were found to be indigent—here is where the guess comes in—825 veterans would benefit the first year—

Mr. BENNETT: That would be including the 2,000?

Mr. POWER: That would include the 2,000. This would entail, at an annual average rate of $320, an expenditure of $264,000. If, on the other hand, provisions were made only for those who arrived in South Africa during hostilities, the cost would be $188,000 the first year. But we must always bear in mind that in preparing this memorandum they did not take into consideration the fact that a very large number saw service in the late war, some of whom were killed in the war, some probably disabled and receiving pension, and others of whom would be entitled, by reason of service in the late war, to war veterans' allowances.

Mr. STREIGHT: Does the number of 7,366 who served in South Africa include the 1,200 that Canada sent over to serve in the South African constabulary in the latter part of the war?

Mr. POWER: I have not those figures before me.

Mr. GREEN: Before the item is carried, I would remind the minister of this recommendation made by the pension committee last year:

> Your committee also recommends that the Veterans' Assistance Commission to be appointed under the provisions of Bill No. 28 make an investigation into the position of those veterans under the age of fifty-five years who are by reason of disability, pre-aging and general unfitness, incapable of maintaining themselves.

Will the minister require from this commission a report in accordance with that recommendation?

Mr. POWER: Very good; I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Forthwith?

Mr. POWER: Not forthwith. Let me get some of the others off my chest first.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—

Grant to the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, $13,100.

Mr. HAYHURST: Mr. Chairman, I was just wondering about the item on the preceding page under pensions and national health, "authorized by statute." How is it that the amount varies and there is an increase of $100,000 in the amount authorized by statute? What is the explanation for that?

Mr. POWER: We cannot touch that in any shape or form; it is authorized by statute. If it is larger, I assume that more people are receiving pensions under the Militia Pension Act; that is all.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $18,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the proposed act pertain to the proposed legislation in respect of the blind in any way?

Mr. POWER: The grant is being provided under these estimates. No one has asked me to withhold any portion of it, nor do I intend to do so.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Victorian Order of Nurses, $13,100.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister indicate whether this grant is being made to the headquarters of the Victorian Order of Nurses?

Mr. POWER: Yes, to the national organization.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that grant made by reason of the fact that the Victorian Order of Nurses does a very great deal of good work with regard to returned soldiers?

Mr. POWER: No; I think it is general good work all round. This item really comes under the Department of Health rather than under the Department of Pensions.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have a great deal of personal knowledge in regard to the work of the Victorian Order of Nurses in my home town of Brampton, and I should like to say that the splendid work which is done throughout Ontario and the dominion by these nurses cannot be overemphasized. I do not think this item should be allowed to pass without someone making this statement, because there are few organizations in this country that do as good work in as quiet and effective a way as the work which is done by the Victorian Order of Nurses.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and Geology—

For investigation of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, expenses of testing and research laboratories; for publications, English and French, for purchase of books and instruments; for miscellaneous assistance and contingencies; and for investigations by the dominion fuel board, including salaries and all other expenses, $273,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like the minister to tell us, if he can, something about the development of the chromium mine at Collins, Ontario. When I was in the north last summer, I ascertained that about eighty men or more were working there and that the raw product was shipped to Sault Ste. Marie. At Sault Ste. Marie I went to see the smelting of the chromium. When I was there, the plant making the ferro-chromium for the Algoma Steel works was not running at full capacity, and the reason they gave was that the ore could not be brought out from Collins because of the condition of the roads. It appears that the mine is about twenty miles from the Canadian National railway, and as this is a new industry in northern Ontario which, if developed adequately, would give employment to a large number of men and would render very great assistance to steel plants both in Sault Ste. Marie and throughout the country, I should like to know what is being done. This is a new industry in that part of Ontario. The government sent a number of geologists throughout the country to try to find mines, but having found them they said, in effect, "Now, go to it and see what you can do." I think there should be some branch of the department to follow up these matters further. In this case apparently it is a question of roads, and I should like to see the department take whatever means may be available in order to induce the appropriate authority having charge of the construction of roads to get busy and see that the road is kept open so that the operation of the mine will not be interfered with. I should like to hear from the minister as to the prospects of the chromium mine of Collins, Ontario, becoming more completely developed for the benefit of the steel industry of Canada.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): This chromium mine, which, as my hon. friend has stated, is located in the Port Arthur district is, as I recall it, some eighteen or twenty miles from the National Transcontinental railway. The ore is taken to the railway by motor transport and then shipped to Sault Ste. Marie, where it is smelted. Some assistance was given in the building or improvement of the road from the mine to the railway last summer.

Mr. MacNICOL: By this department?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, out of the vote passed a year ago for aid to roads to mining areas. I am afraid I have not information as to the actual amount of money spent last year in this connection, but I would say for the information of the hon. member that expenditures were made in cooperation with the provinces. The federal Department of Mines put up two dollars for each dollar advanced by the provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister mean two dollars a ton?

Mr. CRERAR: No, not two dollars a ton. For each two dollars we put up, the province puts up one dollar for the improvements of the roads. The projects were agreed upon after consultation between the mines branch at Ottawa and the mines departments in each of the provinces. The latest information I have is that progress is being made by the company and that they are enlarging not only the capacity of their mine, so far as the production of ore is concerned, but also the capacity of the smelter at Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does one company operate both mine and smelter?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: My information is that there is a great opportunity there at the present time. The Ford Motor Company, I am told, are considering taking the full output of the mine, which would involve the full output of the smelter at Sault Ste. Marie. However, the steel company at Sault Ste. Marie can utilize a quantity of the material, and anything that can be done to increase the production of chromium in the area would be a great benefit not only to employment at that point but also to the motor industry in Canada. The plant at Sault Ste. Marie is not small; in fact it is very substantial. I talked with the heads of the company, and they struck me as being men who understood their business. Any assistance the department could give would be of great advantage to the country and an evidence of good work by the Department of Mines.

Mr. CRERAR: I agree with the observations of the hon. member. I find that last year $20,000 was spent on the road from the mine to the railway. As I said a minute ago, two-thirds of that amount was put up by the federal Department of Mines, and one-third by the provincial governments. May I say for the information of the committee that this development was commenced only a few years ago. From information we have there can be no doubt that there is a very considerable body of chrome ore in the area, and the value of chromium as a medium for the hardening of steel is recognized everywhere. I have not had an opportunity recently of talking to people engaged in the enterprise, but about a year ago I did have an interview with them. They called to see me in Ottawa and they were optimistic at that time as to the future prospects of their development, and asked for some assistance in fixing up their road. That assistance was given to them. So far as I am able to learn, they are expanding their operations.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe it was either July or early August that I was there. Was the road fixed after that, because at that time I was informed it was not in good condition?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, it was after that. As the hon. member will recall, last year we did not get the estimate through until about the end of June, and arrangements had to be made after that. I should think it would have been August or September when the expenditure was made.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the department know if the process in use at Sault Ste. Marie is giving all the satisfaction that was hoped?

Mr. CRERAR: So far as we are aware, they are operating successfully and have developed a process which is working out successfully.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thank the minister for his information.

Mr. HARTIGAN: As a result of the treatment of coal in the last thirty years, in a great many of our Canadian fuels we have about one-half of one per cent sulphur content. So far as I can remember, the method of removing the sulphur has never been improved upon. When I was a boy the coal was washed, and as much as possible of the sulphur was taken out of it. However, there was always a trace left. Would the minister consider allocating to the fuel board an amount of money sufficient to ascertain whether, by combinations or by chemical affinity, the last trace of sulphur could not be neutralized. I have made diligent inquiry, and I have been unable to find where any effort has been made to improve upon the old washing method. I am not speaking critically, and am only offering suggestions, but it is my belief that after we have had a research department for a number of years, and after we have expended so much money, the time has arrived when the people of Canada are entitled to have definite research work carried out. I make these observations only as suggestions. Perhaps by the coal being treated with hydrogen, the sulphur could be made to combine with the other elements, and in that way the difficulty might be removed. It is incumbent upon the research department of the fuel board to take the matter into consideration, in an effort to give coal absolutely free of sulphur to the people of Canada. At the present time the sulphur content is only a small fraction, but even that amount has a deleterious effect.

Mr. CRERAR: The point raised by the hon. member is an important one. However, I think he is under a misapprehension when he says nothing has been done. I am informed that tests are being carried on at the fuel testing laboratory which operates in conjunction with the mines and geology branch of the department. The hon. member has referred to a matter of research. I may inform him, however, that experimental work is being carried on, and the matter to which he drew attention is being studied. Of necessity we must operate the laboratory within the limits of the vote given by parliament, but I can assure him the work is being carried on.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Has any progress been made?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed progress has been made. Apparently there are two classes of sulphur—and I must confess I am not altogether familiar with the subject. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie could give a better answer. I may say, however, that there are minerals containing sulphides, and on the other hand there are organic sulphurs. Experiments have been carried on with greater success with the first than with the second kind. The difficulties to which the hon. member has referred are found in the latter, namely the organic sulphurs in coal. However, we are doing our best to eliminate the difficulty.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is the fuel testing department supplied with money sufficient to enable it to go on with the experiments? If there is a lack of money, then I say a sufficient amount should be set aside to permit it to proceed with the work. A satisfactory solution of the difficulty would be worth millions of dollars to Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: I should not want the hon. member to get the impression that there is a shortage of funds in this connection. The matter is really a research problem and I have no doubt that some day the scientists will discover a method whereby that substance can be taken from the coal.

Mr. GRAYDON: Near Campbell's Cross, which is in my riding, is a bromine well which has attracted considerable attention. We have been informed that this is perhaps the only well capable of producing bromine in a particular chemical state. Could the minister advise whether or not there are other wells in eastern Canada with a sufficient commercial productive capacity to compete with this one?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I cannot answer fully the question directed to me by my hon. friend. I believe he could get the information he desires by inquiring of the technical officers in the mines branch. I was unaware that there was a well of that type in his favoured district and I am at a loss to state at the moment whether there are other wells of a similar kind in eastern Canada. My deputy tells me that he is not aware of any. I shall be glad to get this information for my hon. friend or he can inquire of the technical officers who, I think, can satisfy him.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand this is the only bromine producer in the eastern part of Canada and I thought the minister would have some information. I shall be very glad to inquire of the officials of the branch.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as our information goes, that is the only well in eastern Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give us the location and the equipment of the different research laboratories connected with this department?

Mr. CRERAR: There is only one associated with the mines branch, the one located on Booth street. Experimental work is carried on in connection with the properties of coal and also in connection with the metallurgical processes best adapated to the treatment of certain ores. This laboratory has done excellent and useful work. Last summer I had an opportunity of visiting a number of large mines in Canada and I was given the voluntary information by different mine managers that the service rendered by this department for many years past had been most valuable.

I do not know whether I mentioned this a year ago, but it is worth repeating; when the representatives from the empire countries were in Ottawa in 1932 to attend the imperial conference, the Premier of Rhodesia visited the laboratory here. They had had trouble in working out a treatment for a certain kind of ore and he arranged to ship several tons here to the mines branch. The technical officers were successful in working out the correct treatment for this ore and as a result of that this mine in Rhodesia has been put into operation. This is a striking illustration of the value of the work being done in these laboratories.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few days ago I referred to the development of the iron mines at Helen mountain in Algoma. Since that time the Ontario government has voted a subsidy of two cents per unit for the development of this mine. The minister referred a moment ago to the assistance being given to the chromium mine at Collins whereby this government was to pay two-thirds of the cost of a road.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, by arrangement with the provincial government.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was wondering whether the same kind of arrangement could not be made in connection with these iron ore mines at Helen mountain. I believe this vote gives a great return to the country and perhaps the minister could give some aid by way of road assistance, to the development of this mine.

Mr. CRERAR: Any request to that effect would certainly receive careful consideration, but I would not want to commit myself or the government in connection with bounties, to which the hon. member referred the other night.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Is this research laboratory at the service of companies and individuals interested in mining?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give details of this vote and how the increase is accounted for?

Mr. CRERAR: The appropriation of the division of mineral resources is $22,000; for the division of ore dressing and metallurgy, $77,000. This is really the important division in this vote. Then there is $46,000 for fuels and fuel testings and $20,000 for ceramics and road materials. This is to cover a study of road materials, binding materials and so on. There is $5,000 for the chemical division and $43,000 for the mechanical section. There is $41,000 for general administration, printing, the purchase of books and contingencies, and $19,000 for expenses of the dominion fuel board?

Mr. BENNETT: Which item is increased over last year?

Mr. CRERAR: The increase of $26,700 is due to some reclassifications which have been made, statutory increases and promotions.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the whole of it?

Mr. CRERAR: It is due to promotions, reclassifications, statutory increases and a few new positions created in extending the service.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any revenue to Canada from any of this?

Mr. CRERAR: The revenue does not amount to a great deal. There is some revenue from assays and from the sale of publications. As a matter of fact, I have under consideration at the present time making a charge for services in connection with ore-dressing processes. If a man comes in with an ore that he has had difficulty in working out a process for, and we take that in hand and work out a process for it, I think a charge could quite legitimately be made for that service. That is under consideration now.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason I asked is that the matter has been discussed for some time.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, March 1, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HOUSING ACT AND HOME IMPROVEMENT ACT—LOANS TO FARMERS

Mr. HYNDMAN:

How many farmers in Canada, to date, have applied for a loan under: (a) the Housing Act; (b) the Home Improvement Act?

Mr. DUNNING: Information not available. Loan applications under the Dominion Housing Act and the Home Improvement plan which are rejected by the approved lending institutions are not forwarded to the Department of Finance. Therefore, the only records kept by the department are those of loans actually made.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

1. How much time does the Canadian Radio Corporation devote to French programs in the province of Quebec?
2. How much time is devoted by the said corporation to English programs in the said province?
3. How much time is devoted by the said corporation to English programs in each of the other provinces?
4. How much time is devoted by the said corporation to French programs in each of the provinces other than Quebec?

Mr. HOWE:

The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

1. Thirteen hours, forty-five minutes, weekly.
2. Nine hours, forty-five minutes, weekly.
3. Eastern network: Five hours, forty-five minutes, weekly. Eastern and midwest network: Two hours, weekly. Western network: Thirteen hours, weekly. National network: Eleven hours, forty-five minutes, weekly.
4. One hour, fifteen minutes, weekly.

PORT OF MONTREAL—COAL DOCKS

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount):

1. Will coal dealers be permitted to unload, in the port of Montreal, at points between Boulevard Pie IX and the works of the Canadian Vickers, or further east?
2. If so, when?

Mr. HOWE:

1. If new docks are built in this area they may be used at least in part for the handling of coal.
2. Answered by No. 1.

BANK OF CANADA BUILDING

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Have plans and specifications been prepared for certain alterations, expansions and remodelling contemplated in connection with Bank of Canada building at Ottawa?
2. If so, who were the architects?

3. At what cities could these plans and specifications be seen?
4. Were they to be had at any point east of Montreal?
5. If not, why?
6. What was the first date on which the plans were available?
7. What was the date on which tenders were to be received?

Mr. DUNNING: As indicated by the honourable the Minister of Public Works in answer to a somewhat similar question on February 4th (Hansard, page 535), the new head office building of the Bank of Canada is being constructed by the bank for itself. If this inquiry were addressed directly to the Bank of Canada they, no doubt, would be glad to furnish the information desired.

CREDIT RIVER, ONT., LIGHTHOUSE

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Was the lighthouse at the mouth of the Credit river in Peel county destroyed by fire?
2. If so, on what date did the fire occur?
3. Has the said lighthouse been replaced?
4. If not, does the government contemplate rebuilding same?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Light in question was discontinued in 1919. The tower was destroyed by fire in July, 1936.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. Matter under consideration.

EMIGRATION FROM CANADA

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many persons left Canada to take up permanent residence abroad in each of the following years: 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936?
2. How many of such persons left Canada for the British Isles in each of the above years, and how many for the United States?

Mr. CRERAR: The department has not the information to answer this question. We do not keep any record of emigrants leaving Canada, consequently the question cannot be answered.

Question dropped.

GRANTS TO FAIRS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Does the federal government make grants to fairs in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta?
2. If so, what fairs have received grants, and what was the amount of each of such grants during the year 1936?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

[Mr. Isnor.]

2.

	Grants paid in 1936

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ASSISTANCE ACT—ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What grants towards relief works have been made under the provisions of the Unemployment Relief Assistance Act by order in council and agreement with the province of Ontario?
2. What municipal works in Ontario were so aided, giving the name of the municipality, the nature of the work and the amount of federal aid in each case?
3. Of the total $2,750,000 under this act voted to Quebec municipalities by order in council dated February 22, 1937, tabled February 24, for relief works, how much has been paid?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The relief works being carried out in the province of Ontario under the provisions of the Unemployment Relief and Assistance Act, 1936, are all set forth in the agreement entered into between the dominion and the province under date of September 10, 1936. A copy of this agreement was tabled in the House of Commons on January 15, 1937.

2. Same as No. 1.

3. Claims have been received from the province amounting to $729,168.53. Of this amount $81,154.81 has been paid. The remaining accounts, which have been received within the past few days, are at the present time being audited and payment will be made in due course, if the accounts are found to be in order.

FEED AND SEED LOANS—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. NEEDHAM:

1. What financial assistance has been agreed upon by the dominion government and the province of Saskatchewan respecting feed and fodder, and seed and spring supplies for 1937 in the area known as federal approved area?

2. For what share is the recipient responsible?

3. For what share is the province of Saskatchewan responsible?

4. For what share is the dominion government responsible?

Mr. GARDINER: Under consideration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. VENIOT:

1. How much did the federal government contribute to each of the provinces, last year and in the current year, as direct grants-in-aid for unemployment relief?

2. How much did the federal government contribute to each of the provinces, last year and in the current year, in the form of co-operative public works and enterprises, to assist in the relief of unemployment?

3. What mileage of trans-Canada highway was constructed, last year and in the current year?

4. What was the gross mileage cost, last year and in the current year?

5. What mileage was constructed, last year and in the current year, in each of the provinces?

6. On what basis did the federal government cooperate in the trans-Canada highway construction in each of the provinces, last year and in the current year?

7. What was the cost to the federal government, last year and in the current year, for trans-Canada highway construction in each of the provinces?

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. What was the premium income for 1928 for the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada, the Canada Life Assurance Company, the North American Life Assurance Company, the Great West Life Assurance Company?

2. What was the amount of death claims paid by each of the above assurance companies in 1928?

3. What was the interest income for each of the above assurance companies during 1928?

4. What were the subsidiary companies, if any, of the above assurance companies, during 1928?

Mr. DUNNING: Return tabled herewith.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD, REGINA

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. What are the names of the present staff of the Canadian Farm Loan Board at Regina office, and what is the salary of each?

2. What are the names of the permanent appraisers employed by the Regina branch of the Canadian Farm Loan Board, and the salary of each?

3. What are the names of the temporary appraisers employed during the season 1936 by the Canadian Farm Loan Board at Regina, and the salary of each?

4. Are there any temporary appraisers employed at the present time?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—OFFICERS AND MEN BORN OUTSIDE OF CANADA

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 160 (reference No. 41 of February 10, 1937), how many of the: (a) 92 officers, and (b) 246 men of the National Defence department staff who were born outside of Canada, have served: (1) in an actual theatre of war; (2) 20 miles behind the lines; (3) in England; or (4) in Canada?

2. Same question for non-commissioned officers?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—DRUMMONDVILLE-VICTORIAVILLE BRANCH RAILWAY LINE

Mr. GIROUARD:

For a copy of all reports, papers, plans and other documents in the possession of the Department of Transport, concerning the proposed construction of a branch line between Drummondville and Victoriaville.

GLAUDE, N.B., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all papers, affidavits, evidence, correspondents and other documents concerning the dismissal of Mr. Henri D. Cormier, former postmaster at Glaude post office, Westmorland county, New Brunswick, together with a statement of cost of investigation showing to whom money was paid.

NOTRE DAME DE LA SALETTE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. MASSEY (for Mr. Wermenlinger):

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relative to the post office of Notre-Dame de la Salette, Hull county, since November, 1935, to date. Also the report of the investigator concerning the said post office.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—GRADE SEPARATION, TORONTO

Mr. HARRIS:

For a copy of all reports, papers, correspondence, plans and other documents in the possession of the Department of Transport, concerning the proposed construction of a grade separation at Victoria Park avenue, Canadian National Railways on the border line between the city of Toronto and the township of Scarborough.

TORONTO PUBLIC WORKS RELIEF PROGRAM

Mr. HARRIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents exchanged between the mayor of the city of Toronto, the board of control, Toronto harbour commission, city of Toronto works commissioner, and the Department of Labour, the Department of Transport, and the Department of Public Works, relating to a public works program for relief purposes in the city of Toronto.

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD

PROVISION FOR REFEAL OF BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT AND SETTING UP OF NEW BODY

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to repeal the Biological Board Act and to provide in its stead for the creation of a fisheries research board to have charge of the fisheries research work carried on by the dominion; and to provide for travelling and other expenses of the members of the board and any emolument that might be deemed necessary to pay the chairman and secretary of such board.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FEEDING STUFFS

REGULATION OF IMPORTATION, EXPORTATION AND SALE

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to control and regulate the importation, exportation, sale and other dealing with feeding stuffs by registration and inspection; the imposition of registration fees; and to authorize the Minister of Agriculture to appoint officers for the effective execution of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SEEDS

REGULATION OF TESTING, INSPECTING, SALE AND IMPORTATION

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to regulate the testing, inspection, sale and importation of seeds; to provide for the appointment and definition of duties of an advisory board; the appointment of inspectors and analysts; the licensing of new varieties of seeds and the imposition of licence fees, and to provide for penalties in consequence of violations of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE CERTAIN CLASSES OF BLIND PERSONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to extend the operations of the Old Age Pensions Act to include certain classes of blind persons not included in the act.

He said: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I think the house in entitled to a little more information than is contained in the resolution itself. The proposal which will be contained in the bill to be founded upon the resolution is to extend the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act to blind persons at the age of forty.

At this stage I need not review the discussions which have taken place in this house on former occasions with respect to this matter. The various conditions in connection with it can be dealt with best on the bill itself, and I respectfully suggest that discussion should take place at that stage. For the present I should inform the house that the estimated cost to the federal treasury of the proposed measure on the basis of present ascertained numbers is about half a million dollars a year. As to the possible growth in future years I may be able to give some definite indication at a later stage of the bill.

As is well known, the Old Age Pensions Act is based upon agreements between the federal government and the governments of the various provinces, and of course in considering any amendment to the act it is therefore important to consider and make sure of the attitude of the various provinces with regard thereto. There are considerable differences of view among the provinces with respect to old age pension matters generally, but I am pleased to be able to inform the house that with respect to this matter there is complete unanimity, so that there will be no difficulty in so amending the agreements with the provinces as to make possible the carrying out of the legislation now proposed, to make blind persons eligible for old age pensions at the age of forty.

If the house would pass the resolution I should be very glad to have the bill distributed as soon as possible, so that detailed discussion as to its provisions may take place at a later stage.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house has unanimously approved of the principle of this legislation on several occasions, in the days of the late administration as well as of the present government. Since the only reason effect was not given hitherto to the recommendations made in that regard has been our financial position, I do not think there is any reason why there should be any further discussion as far as we at least are concerned, so that at as early a date as possible legislation may be enacted based upon the resolution.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): On many occasions, Mr. Speaker, I have found it necessary to criticize adversely certain of the measures which have been introduced by the government. On this occasion I am more than pleased to be able to congratulate the government, and I am very happy to have the privilege of doing so. In many respects this legislation will be far-reaching in its effects. Personally I think $20 per month may be a little low for persons of the age of forty, but I hope this may be just a beginning and that as the years go by we may be able to increase the amount.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether his department, in association with the officials of the Department of Justice, have considered the full bearing of a recent opinion of the judicial committee of the privy council, with regard to a matter such as this. As I read that opinion the privy council have declared it illegal for this parliament to make any appropriation of funds derived from taxation for subject matters over which parliament has not legislative jurisdiction under section 91 of the British North America Act. That is a wide and sweeping declaration of the judicial committee of the privy council which I believe applies not only to pensions for old age but also to pensions for the blind, and a number of the other appropriations aggregating tens of millions of dollars which are annually voted by parliament. In view of that opinion I think the government should take into serious consideration the question whether in voting these tens of millions we are not committing illegal acts which are ultra vires of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: This resolution does not apply to political blindness.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, naturally the recent decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council are under examination by the Department of Justice, with special reference to their possible bearing upon all matters of legislation—upon that which is now on the statute books, and upon proposed legislation similar to that now before us. In the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I can say only that this particular piece of legislation has been submitted to the Department of Justice and has remained on the order paper for some time in order that the bearing of matters to which the hon. member has referred might be fully examined by the Department of Justice. I now proceed with the full approval of the Minister of Justice. At a later stage I hope he may have an opportunity to deal with the phase of the matter to which the hon. member has just called attention. In fact I shall call the minister's attention to the hon. member's observations.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this merely an amendment to existing old age pension legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: If, as is suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), it is contrary to the British North America Act to enact the amending legislation, then the whole of the Old Age Pensions Act is unconstitutional too.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot offer legal opinions, but I gathered that was the legal opinion expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CAHAN: No; I expressed no legal opinion whatsoever.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry.

Mr. CAHAN: I was referring to an opinion expressed by the judicial committee of the privy council.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Old Age Pensions Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY COMMISSIONER UNDER MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, to amend and consolidate the Combines Investigation Act and amending act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition: Mr. Speaker, the bill has not been printed and circulated for twenty-four hours. I received my copy only this morning, and this is an important measure.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe it was understood the bill would not be discussed until it had been distributed. I was under the impression this morning that it had been distributed.

Mr. BENNETT: It was on Saturday.

Mr. ROGERS: In that event I quite agree that we should not proceed until hon. members have the bill before them.

Mr. BENNETT: However, I shall not raise any difficulty on that score. The minister at any rate could make his speech on the motion for second reading and if necessary the debate might be adjourned in order that hon. members may study the matter. Perhaps it would expedite their study if an explanation were now given by the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house for second reading is designed to effect several much-needed alterations in the Combines Investigation Act, with the object of making that legislation a more efficient instrument for safeguarding the public interest against detrimental combinations and monopolies. For some years the Combines Investigation Act has not been utilized to the full extent of its appropriate functions. For this reason it has not been achieving the results which were in mind when it was enacted. In some degree this has been due to certain provisions in the legislation itself. Even before the amendments of 1935 were added I think it was the view of those who had its administration in charge that the act stood in need of improvement. Some of the amendments made in 1935 had the effect of weakening rather than strengthening the act. Those amendments, most of which were introduced in the senate, tended rather to restrict the scope of the act, or to add to the difficulties of its enforcement. It will be recalled that during the last session the government sought to remove one of the outstanding disabilities, but the amending bill was twice rejected by the senate.

It is now proposed to restore the vigour of the Combines Investigation Act and to make it more effective by the amendments set forth in the bill now before the house. Among the changes proposed are the following:

1. The administration of the act under the Minister of Labour by a single commissioner devoting his whole time to this work, instead of by a commission whose members have other important responsibilities, relating to tariff matters.

2. Provision for the appointment, if necessary, of temporary special commissioners to conduct single investigations.

3. The revision and extension of the definitions of merger, trust and monopoly.

4. The removal of the provision enacted in 1935 which prevents the use, in subsequent criminal proceedings against the person who produced them, of documents which a person is required to produce in an investigation.

5. An increase in the maximum penalties for the violation of the act.

6. The omission of the section added in 1935 which prevents the trial of a person upon the same evidence or at the same time under the Combines Investigation Act and section 498 of the criminal code.

These are the more important of the changes contemplated in the bill before the house. Other changes are proposed, including a revision of the provisions added to the act in 1935, at the instance of the senate, with regard to the returning of documents to persons producing them in an investigation under the act; the strengthening of the provisions relating to the liability of any director who acquiesces in an offence committed by his company; and new sections providing when fines are to be payable to the dominion, that rights to civil action are not intended to be affected, and that trials of persons charged with forming unlawful combines shall be by superior courts of criminal jurisdiction only.

I believe it would be the wish of the house if I were first to deal with the reasons which favour the transfer of the administration of the Combines Investigation Act from the tariff board to a single commissioner. The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) expressed a particular interest in this feature of the bill when a few days ago the resolution was under discussion.

The Canadian legislation in connection with combines represents an orderly and propressive development over a period of almost fifty years. In reshaping the legislation, as we are seeking to do at this time, we have sought to incorporate the best features of the several acts which have preceded the present act. The type of administrative agency is naturally one of the most important considerations to be kept in view.

When we turn back to the earlier attempts to deal with combines in Canada we find that various types of administrative agencies have been employed from time to time. For example, the Restraint of Trade Act of 1889, which is now section 498 of the criminal code, made no special provision for the investigation of alleged offences. Several methods of administration were used in subsequent legislation. The Combines Investigation Act of 1910 provided for a preliminary inquiry by a supreme court judge and subsequent investigation by a board composed of three members, which board was appointed specifically for the purpose of investigating a particular complaint. In 1919, during the brief existence of the board of commerce, which was established to administer the Combines and Fair Prices Act, the agency employed was a board of three commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it not called the court of commerce?

Mr. ROGERS: My impression is that it was the board of commerce.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The board of commerce.

Mr. ROGERS: Under the Combines Investigation Act of 1923 it was planned to have all important investigations conducted by a commissioner especially appointed for the purpose, whose status and powers were much the same as those of a royal commissioner appointed under the inquiries act. At the same time provision was made for preliminary inquiry by the registrar. The office of registrar was created by the legislation of 1923 and his duties were in the nature of those belonging to an executive secretary in connection with the administration of the act. The registrar's powers in the matter of conducting inquiries were the same as those of the ad hoc commissioners and were sufficient to enable him, if called upon, to carry an investigation to its completion. In the years 1930 to 1935 the practice of conducting inquiries with special commissioners fell into disuse. The previous administration appointed only one commissioner; all the other investigations were conducted by the registrar.

One disadvantage of the latter method, that is, inquiry by the registrar, was that while the act required that the reports of commissioners should be made public, it did not contain the same requirement with respect to reports of the registrar. Consequently, few reports were made public during the period to which I refer. This had the effect of limiting the usefulness of an act which had been designed to attain its purpose, at least in some measure, through the full use of publicity.

There are certain inherent disadvantages in having all extensive inquiries made by special commissioners. If it is necessary to secure a suitable person to act on a temporary basis, there is a distinct possibility of inaction or undue delay occurring in dealing with matters that should be given prompt attention. The experience gained by such temporary investigators is ordinarily not available for use in subsequent inquiries. In the past recourse has been had to certain men in a number of investigations, and some members of the bar of Canada gained considerable experience in conducting inquiries of this kind, but the fact remains that when you do have these investigations conducted by special commissioners you are deprived in a large measure of the advantage which comes from continuity of experience in this particular field of inquiry.

In adopting the principle of utilizing a permanent investigating agency and in deciding upon the appropriate type of such agency, we believe that the advantages point definitely to the single commissioner as proposed in this bill, rather than to the type of commissioner established by the 1935 legislation. It is quite true, as was suggested in the debate on the resolution, that we have not really had an opportunity of testing the utility of the administration of the combines act under the trade and industry commission. In the year and half since the combines act was placed under the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission that commission has not been able to proceed with its work, largely because of the fact that the legislation was before the courts for the determination of its validity. At the same time the Combines Investigation Act has been handicapped in other directions, not merely in connection with its status under the act but because of the disabilities already referred to which were imposed by certain of the 1935 amendments.

The objection I desire to make to the administration of the Combines Act by the tariff board in its capacity as the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission is not directed in any way to the personnel of the tariff board. It is directed rather to the fact that the tariff board has its own proper functions to discharge, and we do not feel that the Combines Act ought to be administered by a board which has other more immediate duties imposed upon it. We believe that the Combines Act should not be relegated to a position of secondary importance. Moreover, the work of the tariff board is such that on occasion it might very well find it embarrassing to have to act in its dual capacity and deal with business firms which have been dealt with in its capacity as a tariff board. There is likely to be an interference with the ordinary work of the tariff board as well as with the adequate enforcement of the Combines Act. For these reasons we are convinced that in the interests of efficiency, not only in the administration of this act but in the working of the tariff board, the combines act should be placed under a single commissioner who can devote his full time to the investigations which may be necessary under the terms of the legislation.

I concede at once that an organization different from that proposed by this bill would be necessary if the legislative program of the government were intended to provide for direct state regulation and control of trade and industry as a substitute for regulation by competition, or if it were to provide for agreements to fix prices and restrict trade with the responsibility placed upon the government to see that fair price levels were maintained. I should like to make it quite clear that it is not the policy of the present government to undertake what appears to us the unwise and impossible task of the direct control of prices, thereby accepting the ultimate responsibility of telling business the quantities and kinds of goods that must be produced and how they shall be distributed. It is its policy in this matter to do its utmost rather to clear the channels of domestic trade, and for this purpose to eliminate artificial price agreements, to restore competitive conditions wherever found necessary for the adequate safeguarding of the interests of the public. This policy with respect to the combines act can be carried out efficiently as well as economically by a single commissioner, with sympathetic government support, and with sufficient facilities to enable him to initiate and complete the necessary investigations, to make full reports of his findings, and concern himself with such further action as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

I come now to the provision which is made in the bill for the appointment of special commissioners where circumstances require such a course. It is recognized that there may be on occasion a number of applications which would require simultaneous investigation. It has been thought wise, therefore, to provide against undue delay in such case, by making provision whereby special commissioners may be appointed to carry out particular investigations. In the future, moreover, if it should be found desirable to increase the single permanent commissioner by two additional commissioners and to set up what might be termed a separate commission to deal with the Combines Investigation Act, that can be done. For the present, however, we feel it is wise rather to proceed with a single commissioner in order to determine whether or not the work can be done satisfactorily in that way.

A question was raised when the resolution was before the house as to the expense involved in this change, and I believe it was the view of the right hon. leader of the opposition that from the standpoint of expense this was possibly a retrograde step. I examined with some care the debate which took place in this house when the 1935 amendments were under discussion, and while it is quite true that the question of expense was brought forward at that time as one of the reasons for placing the administration of the combines act under the tariff board instead of under a separate commission, it was also pointed out by the then minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Hanson, that provision was made in the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act for an increase of personnel and staff if such should be found necessary to deal with the additional duties conferred upon the tariff board in its capacity as the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission. So I do not believe it follows of necessity that any unnecessary expense is involved by transferring the administration of the combines act from the tariff board to the Department of Labour and placing its administration under a single commissioner.

I should like to turn now to certain new definitions which are incorporated in the bill which is before the house. A change is made in the definitions of the words "merger" and "monopoly." In the 1935 legislation, as originally introduced, an improvement was made in giving to these words a definition which made it clear that the act applied to monopolistic concerns as well as to complete monopolies; in other words, to large or dominating concerns which may not come within the category of either complete monopoly or combination. I am sure it will be within the knowledge of all members of this house that one of the characteristic features of recent industrial organization has been the growth of large scale enterprises of the character of monopolies, trusts and mergers. Obviously a concern of that kind may find it possible either to completely dominate a particular market or at any rate to exercise undue control over prices of a particular commodity; but at the same time there may be nothing of the character of a combination in the activities of such a trust or monopoly. It seemed desirable, therefore, again in the interests of the public, that the legislation should have clearly in view the possibility of a monopoly or of a trust seeking to control production and prices in a manner detrimental to the public interest. Prior to 1935 the act applied to monopolies as well as to combinations, but no definitions of monopoly were provided in the act. Consequently there was some uncertainty as to whether the word applied to anything other than a monopoly, meaning a concern having the exclusive power of dealing in some particular commodity. That is to say, under the previous provision, it seemed to be required of those who sought to bring actions against a monopoly under the act that they should prove that that particular monopoly had an exclusive power. As a matter of fact in our economic life one rarely finds what may be termed a perfect monopoly except in so far as that monopoly has been created by the issue of a patent or copyright or by the possession of some franchise.

The 1923 act had followed earlier legislation in attempting, by the use of the words "mergers, trusts and monopolies, so called," to prevent the word from being given too narrow an interpretation and being made applicable only to complete monopolies. Language more nearly exact was necessary, however, in a criminal statute, to indicate the meaning which was clearly intended. In the absence of a definition of monopoly the public might very well have drawn the conclusion that price control by a monopoly did not fall within the provisions of the act, and was entirely lawful. Such a corporation might very well be declared to be outside the scope of the act as being neither a monopoly nor a party to a combination. To meet this situation the price spreads commission of 1935 proposed that the combines act should be amended to include a more comprehensive definition of monopolistic practices and of monopolies themselves. The definition which the former government introduced in its bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act in 1935 would have implemented the recommendation of the price spreads commission. The definition, however, was not enacted as it was introduced. It was amended in another place, and it was incorporated in the act which finally received royal assent in a form which was quite different from that which was contemplated by the price spreads commission or by the government when the bill was introduced. In its final form it provided that the word "monopoly" should be made applicable to situations where one or more persons substantially or completely controlled a class or species of business in which he or they were engaged. But this definition, again, was made subject to the following proviso which was introduced by the senate:

> This subsection shall not be construed or applied so as to limit or impair any right or interest derived under the Patent Act, 1935, or under any other statute of Canada.

The senate also secured another amendment of the definition of "monopoly" which limited that definition to businesses which dealt in commodities. Thus certain monopolies or monopolistic organizations which had been subject to the provisions of the act when there was no definition of monopoly were given exemption from the act under this new provision. In other words, the definition of monopoly as it was finally incorporated in the act of 1935 appeared specifically to exclude what might be termed monopolies in relation to services as distinct from monopolies in relation to commodities.

Mr. CAHAN: Does this act propose an investigation of patent monopolies?

Mr. ROGERS: An investigation may be had wherever there is an allegation that a combine or a monopoly is operating to the detriment of the public.

Mr. CAHAN: Even under a patent grant?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe I am correct in that. I shall be glad to look it up before the bill is in committee. But my distinct impression is that patents are not excluded, because as a matter of fact there is a definite provision whereby a patent may be revoked if it is found that the concern which has the patent has been using its powers in a way contrary to the public interest.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to discuss it now, but I think the minister should consider whether he is at liberty to do that, first, under the convention, and second, as to whether under the convention there is not an ample procedure for dealing under the convention with that sort of monopoly by the terms of the Patent Act itself.

Mr. ROGERS: There is of course a provision in the Patent Act for revocation. I shall be glad to take up that matter, and perhaps it can be brought forward and dealt with further when the bill is in committee.

This exemption to which I referred was authorized in spite of the fact that the price spreads commission had just condemned the unwarranted suppression of new patents as an abuse of a publicly-conferred privilege and had recommended that more effective use should be made of sections of the Combines Act when it appeared that these tariff duties and patents had facilitated the development of monopolies inimical to the public interest. That is the phrase used in the report of the price spreads commission. If any unreasonable advantage is obtained at the expense of the public by any monopoly or quasi-monopoly as a result of misuse of privileges accorded to it by the Patent Act or the Customs Tariff or any other statute of Canada, there would seem to be no sound reason why an investigation should not be made into its affairs under the combines act or why the penalties of the act should not apply if the interests of the public have suffered. That after all has been the standard which has prevailed constantly in the Canadian anti-combines legislation. When the anti-trust law known as the Sherman Act was passed in the United States the purpose was rather to condemn a monopoly qua monopoly, to condemn a trust by the mere fact that it was a trust and proved to be such upon evidence being adduced to that effect.

Mr. BENNETT: The contest was in the proof of it.

Mr. ROGERS: The contest was in the proof. But subsequently—I believe I am correct in this—the courts applied a less rigid rule, the rule of reason, so that in effect the anti-trust legislation in the United States tended more and more to conform to that established in Canada. In other words, it was required that there should be some proof that public interest was prejudiced by the existence of the trust or monopoly.

In the present bill the definition of monopoly is intended to cover all commercial monopolies. In other words, the exemptions which were added by the senate amendments of 1935 are excluded in the definition of monopoly which is found in this bill. It will include not only any one or more persons who "substantially control any class or species of business," but also those who "have such control over the supply or distribution of or the demand for products of any class or species of business as to enable such person or persons to maintain, enhance or substantially modify or control prices of such products." What I have just stated is in terms the definition of monopoly which will be found within the bill which is now before the house. The inclusion of such corporations within the definition of monopoly does not mean that they are thereby condemned under the act. It does mean that they can be subject to investigation under the act when circumstances warrant such investigation. Before they can be convicted of any offence against the act it must be proved that their activities as have been such as to be prejudicial to the public interest. They must be brought within the category of monopoly, and it must be proved that they have operated or are likely to operate against the interest of the community.

The word "trust" is used in the act as having the same meaning as the word "monopoly." Mergers are separately defined to include all amalgamations of businesses, but only mergers which use their powers to injure the public will be liable to investigation or prosecution under the act. It cannot be made too clear, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of the present bill is not to prevent or discourage trade combinations, or to condemn large organizations of business merely because of their size. Expansion of business has been a part of the development of recent years in this and other countries. Large scale business enterprises of themselves need not operate to the public detriment. Unquestionably some of them may operate to the public advantage through the economies which are brought about through the large scale operations they conduct. There is nothing in the bill which condemns monoplies, trusts or mergers as such. The purpose rather is to bring this particular type of organization within the scope of the legislation in order that, if a monopoly, trust or merger should be controlling prices to the public detriment, investigations may proceed under the act and penalties may be applied if the offence has been committed. We are anxious rather to prevent abuses of powers than to pillory or to describe as unlawful a particular form of economic organization.

I come now to the question of penalties; and here too, on the basis of the experience of recent years, it is proposed to introduce a change. In the first place there is no intention at all to depart from the use of publicity as a main factor in accomplishing the purposes for which the Combines Investigation Act was designed. I am not sure that publicity should be described precisely as a penalty: it is more of the nature of a remedy than a penalty. Publicity is not always enough. It has to be realized that there will always be some individuals who will not be prevented through fear of publicity from attempting to reap additional rewards in the way of price control which might come to them through a use of their extraordinary powers. These may be individuals who are not greatly deterred by publicity because of their personal viewpoint or the nature of their business, or corporations which owing to the anonymity which often clothes the operations of incorporated companies, or because the companies' responsibilities are shared amongst directors and officers, may be peculiarly insensitive to public opinion. For such companies and individuals penalties must be provided in the form of fines or imprisonment which will serve both as a deterrent and as a suitable punishment. It is felt, in view of the growth of modern business corporations, and particularly the growth of large scale operations, that if the act is to be efficiently enforced there should be an increase in the maximum penalties which may be imposed. It is evident that a penalty of $25,000 might be insufficient in many cases to deter a large corporation from violating the act when in a few weeks or months it might make well over this sum in additional profits by continued operation as a combine. By this bill the maximum penalties which may be imposed by the act are increased from $10,000 to $25,000 in the case of individuals and from $25,000 to $100,000 in the case of corporations. The maximum term of two years' imprisonment is retained, but under the act as amended a court may impose both fine and imprisonment.

I should like to make it clear at this point that these are maximum penalties. Fines may range from a merely nominal amount to $100,000. It will be the duty of the courts, not of the commissioner, to determine the extent of the guilt of each convicted member of any illegal combine, and to determine what penalties are appropriate as a punishment, and sufficient to deter others from operating along similar lines.

This brings me then to another group of amendments, which have to do with the use of evidence in prosecutions. I mentioned at the beginning that at the last session of parliament the government had introduced an amendment touching upon this point, which was rejected by the senate. This bill includes an amendment to a section which was before parliament a year ago. This section relates to the use in criminal proceedings of documents which have been previously received from witnesses during an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. CAHAN: Which section is that?

Mr. BENNETT: Is it No. 37?—I hardly think that is the one the senate dealt with.

Mr. ROGERS: The amendment we sought to make last year was to correct an amendment which had been introduced by the senate in the previous legislation of 1935. Under the senate amendment it was made impossible, as I recall, for a document which had been produced during an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act to be used thereafter in a criminal prosecution founded upon that inquiry. Last year in the amendment introduced by the government we sought to have that corrected, but the senate stood upon its ground, and by what is now proposed we seek once more to have that original defect corrected. In other words we do not believe that documents which are introduced during an inquiry should, as it were, find sanctuary during the period of inquiry and not be usable thereafter in a criminal prosecution which might be founded upon it.

Mr. CAHAN: I was inquiring where that is dealt with in this bill.

Mr. ROGERS: I wonder if that might be left until we are in committee?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: The section relates to the use in criminal proceedings of documents which have been previously received from witnesses during an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. When the act was passed in 1923 it contained a provision that no oral evidence which a witness was ordered to give in an investigation could be used against that witness in a subsequent criminal proceeding, thus giving a much broader exemption than that contained in section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act with respect to the answers of witnesses. The act of 1923 contained no provision, and none is contained in the Canada Evidence Act, which would prevent documents which a person was required to produce at an investigation from being used against that person in a subsequent trial. The restrictive provision to that effect was inserted in the Combines Investigation Act by an amendment introduced by the senate in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: What the minister has done is merely to allow the Canada Evidence Act to operate?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I think that is it. There is no specific reference to it here. At the session of 1936, as I have already mentioned, the government introduced a bill to restore this section to its former effect. The senate refused to accept the amendment, and persisted in its refusal. I think one can only assume that the refusal was due to a misunderstanding on the part of members of the other house as to the purpose and effect of the amendment; for it provides no special rule of law that is not applicable to documentary evidence required of witnesses under many other statutes which provide for investigations. It will still be necessary in any prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act to prove documents by the same means as are employed under other statutes, that is, without the obligatory assistance of the accused. The oral testimony which a witness gives in an investigation under this act cannot be used against him in the trial which follows the investigation. Exactly this procedure would be employed in criminal proceedings following an investigation under other statutes, such as the Inquiries Act, the Natural Products Marketing Act, the Tariff Board Act and the various security fraud prevention acts which operate in several provinces. If the legislation were to provide that such documents could not be used merely because they had formed part of the evidence in a previous investigation, counsel conducting a prosecution would find himself unduly and improperly hampered in his work.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it the effect of this legislation would be to leave it to the court to determine in each specific case whether or not evidence is admissible.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe so. The Canada Evidence Act would apply. In other words, documents brought forward under the Inquiries Act or this act would not find sanctuary thereby.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that they had been produced would have no effect at all, as I read it.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The section dealing with this matter is now submitted in revised form, which makes oral evidence inadmissible in any subsequent criminal proceeding, instead of only such oral evidence as a witness may be required to give in obedience to an order. The new section does not give the present special protection to documents produced by witnesses.

These are the changes in the previous legislation contemplated in the bill now before the house. I doubt whether it is necessary to review in any extensive way the conditions in Canada which render it particularly advisable that legislative action should be taken at this time to improve and strengthen the various provisions of this act. There are indications in many directions that the internal trade of the country is, even more than when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) so described it in 1933, enmeshed by secret understandings and by artificial price agreements and other methods of price control. That statement of conditions in 1933 was confirmed abundantly by evidence brought before the price spreads commission in 1935. It is notable that the price spreads commission, as one of its primary recommendations, proposed that the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission should carry out a rigorous administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

It is unfortunate that certain of the changes made in the act in 1935 had an effect opposite to that which was intended when the legislation was brought down in this house by the government of that day. In the circumstances of the past few years the combines act has not been applied to these conditions in the active way in which otherwise it could have been applied, and it would seem that some business organizations, quite naturally from their point of view, may have interpreted this inaction as a confirmation that their activities did not come within the scope of the Combines Investigation Act. The enactment of this measure and its enforcement will do much, we believe, to restore a healthy competitive condition and to eliminate in large measure price fixing methods which in some commercial fields have operated so decidedly against the public interest.

It follows that the administration of this act will not involve the sanctioning of any selected price fixing agreements either because the prices which may be fixed are likely to prove reasonable or for any similar reasons. As I mentioned a short time ago, it is not the intention of this government to set up machinery which will attempt the task of the regulation of industry or the control of prices. Price competition, it is certain, is a basic essential of a competitive system. No government can or should attempt, under the present industrial system in this part of the world, to decide what are likely to prove to be the reasonable prices for countless commodities and services. On the other hand, if artificial obstructions are removed so that competitive conditions may prevail, prices will tend much more readily to conform to their proper levels as determined by the market's appreciation of their utility.

To effect this needed clearing of the channels of trade it is not considered necessary or desirable to institute any wholesale series of prosecutions of alleged combines. Perhaps at this point I ought to mention that the provision of the previous act which permitted a preliminary inquiry to be made is repeated in the legislation which is now before the house, and that opportunity which is afforded the commissioner to hold a preliminary inquiry is of itself a protection against frivolous or vexatious complaints. Through a preliminary inquiry very often the commissioner may find that there is no sound basis for any further proceeding, and in past experience I think this safeguard has been found most useful. But while there is no intention of carrying out a wholesale series of prosecutions of alleged combines of the nature of an inquisition under this act, as I have said, I should make it perfectly clear also that these amendments are designed to strengthen and fortify the act in order that it may accomplish the purpose for which it was originally designed. We are anxious that these new forms of industrial organizations which operate within the national community shall not be permitted to use the extraordinary powers which come from expansion in a way which will operate against the public interest. It is believed that the Combines Investigation Act, as set out in the amendments to previous legislation incorporated in this bill, will provide the government with an instrument suitable to carry out the purposes I have indicated.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, it may be said that the purpose of the present bill is to widen the scope of the present act; to establish a full time administrative agency; to provide for more suitable and workable provisions with respect to the use of evidence; to facilitate the greater use of publicity as a remedial measure and to provide more suitable and more effective penalties for offences. Finally I would submit that there has been no more appropriate time than the past few years, with the very striking disparity between the loss of income suffered by many and the artificially maintained prices and restrictions imposed by others, to serve as a demonstration of the need for a vigilant application of the sound principles which lie at the foundation of this legislation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out a few moments ago there has been very little time in which to carefully consider the provisions of this statute. However, in the main the statute follows the provisions of the existing law except in particulars to which reference has been made by the minister.

I think there are two or three instances in the bill in which there have been misprints or something has been omitted. For instance, the hon. gentleman referred to the question of patents. Section 32 of the new bill undertakes to deal with patents, and on the opposite page it is said that section 30 of the existing act is amended as underlined. Section 32 as printed leaves out subsections (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) of old section 30, and it does occur to me that section 32 unfortunately has left out what I would regard as the most important part of the old section.

In that regard I should like to point out what was indicated in days past in this chamber, namely that with respect to patents we must proceed with extreme care. Patents involve the idea of monopoly. The very essence of the granting of a patent is that you grant a monopoly. That is stated over and over again as the basis of patent legislation. It will be found that in the provisions of the law as it now stands in section 32 the patentee may be liable to penalties if he unduly prevents or lessens competition in the production or manufacture of goods; obviously therefore the patentee can do neither the one nor the other. I think that section will have to be carefully studied, for I am satisfied that as it is now printed the section is senseless. It merely states that if the owner controls the patent so as to contravene the provisions of section 34 of the act such patent shall be liable to be revoked, but section 34 of this act deals with penalties and fines, not with matters which are as important as was indicated in old section 30. I think all that has happened is that in printing the bill half a dozen lines have been left out, and that difficulty can be remedied by the minister looking into the matter carefully.

There is another point I should like to mention, dealing with the question of the enforcement of the law, and I see the minister is seized of that difficulty. He undertakes to meet it in a given way, but in practice I think the method he has adopted will hardly be found satisfactory. The administration of the criminal law is in the hands of the provinces, and this bill suggests that if the provincial authorities are not anxious to enforce the law a complaint may be laid by someone, a citizen or some other person who is affected; the attorney general of the dominion may be advised with respect to it, and he may appoint someone to deal with the situation. It is quite obvious that there can be no such interference with the provincial powers through our legislation—at least, as indicated in the last judgments of the privy council. It is one of the matters with which I still think this or some other parliament must deal. It is a matter to which on more than one occasion I have directed attention, and I have not been alone. One of the first speeches I heard in this chamber was delivered by the late W. F. Maclean, dealing with the necessity for making provision under our constitution for the enforcement of statutes by the federal power. It will be remembered that in the United States such provision exists. Of course they have federal judges, federal marshals and federal representatives of the Department of Justice who deal with the enforcement of the law of the nation itself, as distinct from those enforced by the representatives of the states.

In this legislation the question of definitions becomes one of major importance. The extent to which the minister may be able to support the view he takes, with respect to some of them, is I think subject to some doubt, having regard to what has been said recently as to the right of the dominion to interfere with purely provincial enterprises or provincial companies which may not combine but on the other hand may have understandings or agreements. I am not going to express an opinion at this time in the matter, but if the minister is prepared to proceed with second reading to-day and then leave it at that point, conceding to us the opportunity to study the bill in the meantime, we will go into details in committee and, I believe, he would serve his purpose. The bill could go to the committee stage, but the committee under the circumstances would not consider it until to-morrow or some following day.

Especially do I draw the minister's attention to the section to which I have just referred, and to those provisions of the statute which contemplate the enforcement of the legislation by the federal power. It is a consummation devoutly to be hoped for, but one the possibility of which under existing constitutional practice I doubt very much, particularly if the latest judgments of the privy council are to be relied upon.

Mr. ROGERS: I rise simply to say I am entirely agreeable to the procedure suggested by the right hon. gentleman, and I would also thank him for his courtesy in facilitating the progress of the bill in the way he has indicated.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, early in February I wrote the minister regarding the action of the Coleman Lamp and Stove Company in refusing to place the Merchants Consolidated Limited of Winnipeg on their wholesale list. I received a letter from him in reply stating that since it was suggested customs duties should be removed so as to permit similar goods to enter Canada free of duty, the question had been referred to the tariff board for consideration. The minister stated he understood the matter was then receiving the attention of the board, and that any representations on the subject should be made to it. While that reply deals with the question whether similar goods are to be allowed into Canada duty free, it does not deal with the question whether the Coleman Lamp and Stove Company Limited have the right to refuse to sell their goods to the Merchants Consolidated Limited, of Winnipeg. Would not that point come under the administration of the combines act? Upon investigation would it not be possible to compel the Coleman Lamp and Stove Company to sell their goods to the other company I have mentioned?

Mr. ROGERS: It seems to me the hon. member's question might be raised more properly when the bill is in committee. If there is any information I can give the hon. member on the point he has raised, I shall be glad to do so at that time. It is conceivable however that the facts as set forth in his letter should be brought to the attention of those in charge of the administration of the act, in order to determine whether or not they come within it.

Mr. BENNETT: One further point I intended to mention, and with the permission of the house I shall do it at this time. When the measure of 1923 was passed the international convention then existing was not the one which now exists. There have been modifications of it. If before the bill is considered in committee the minister would carefully look into the convention, to which we are a subscribing party, for the purpose of ascertaining just what limitations are imposed upon our legislative rights, I think it might be desirable.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon. Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ROGERS: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes.

He said: The amendment made by the senate to the bill is found at page 3, and amends section 8 at line fourteen. The senate has inserted after the word "provide" the words "what terms shall be inserted in the guarantee," so that the paragraph would then read:

(c) Provide what terms shall be inserted in the guarantee for the determination of the amount of loss sustained by an approved lending institution, and the procedure to be followed in making claims in respect of any guarantee given under this act.

The government is prepared to accept the amendment, which, so far as I can discover, does not change the intent in the slightest degree.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology—

For explorations, surveys, mapping and investigations; for publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc., relating thereto; and for salaries and wages of explorers, topographers and others, $366,000.

Mr. BARBER: Could the minister give particulars of the increase in this vote?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The amount of $366,000 is broken down into two parts, one covering explorations, surveys, mapping, investigations and salaries and wages of those engaged in the work, which totals $258,600, and the other covering the publication of English and French editions of reports, maps and illustrations which are put out once the field notes of the survey parties are coordinated and extended.

Mr. BARBER: Is the increase of $16,000 for the extension of this work?

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is made up mainly of statutory increases for those in the permanent service.

Mr. BARBER: What work was carried on in British Columbia last season?

Mr. CRERAR: There were nine geological and six topographical parties in British Columbia last year.

Mr. BARBER: There was some work being carried on in the vicinity of Vancouver and on the lower mainland; has that been completed?

Mr. CRERAR: This work is never really completed. A party will work in a certain area and the work for that area will be completed once the notes are extended and the maps and other information based on the data gathered in the field put together, but when work is completed in one area there is generally another area where it must be continued.

Mr. BARBER: That is just the point I was trying to make. This work was started in the district around Mission City and it will take at least another season to complete the work through to Hope. There was some doubt whether this work would be completed under the topographical survey vote. The district in question is very important in lumbering, logging and mining, and we are anxious to have this work completed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A couple of years ago this parliament voted a million dollars for exploration work in the mining areas of Canada. Could the minister tell the committee how much of that was spent and for what purpose?

Mr. CRERAR: That was the vote passed in 1935?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the information at the moment as to how much of that was spent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was it not spent mostly in 1936?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the greater part was spent in the summer and autumn of 1935. We had another vote last year for $350,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That was a revote to complete the work, was it not?

Mr. CRERAR: No, that was for new work. This is really an extension of the same work.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The $350,000?

Mr. CRERAR: I am unable to give my right hon. friend the information as to how much of that million dollar vote remained unexpended at the end of 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: At March 31, 1936.

Mr. CRERAR: At the end of the period.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How was this vote of $350,000 spent last year, and was it really a continuation of the work started in 1935?

Mr. CRERAR: There were nine geological and six topographical parties in British Columbia; there were two geological parties in the Northwest Territories; there were four geological parties in Alberta; there were five in Saskatchewan, one being engaged in Ottawa in compiling data obtained the previous year; there were five geological parties in Manitoba and five in Ontario; there were five geological and two topographical parties in Quebec; there were four geological parties in New Brunswick; there were three geological parties in Nova Scotia and one topographical party. In all, there were forty-five geological and nine topographical parties, one geological party being engaged in Ottawa.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister consider that the information obtained by these parties justified the expense?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no hesitation in saying that I think the expense is justified. By the terms under which Manitoba and British Columbia came into confederation we have to maintain a geological service for those two provinces. As far as Quebec and Ontario are concerned, both provinces send out parties under their own mines branches. This work is carried on in cooperation with the mines branch at Ottawa in order to avoid duplication.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the Northwest Territories?

Mr. CRERAR: We had two parties operating there last year. Of course, this work is entirely under federal government supervision.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any topographical work being carried on there?

Mr. CRERAR: My deputy advises me that there will be no aerial work carried on under this vote. Some aerial photographic work was carried on under the old department of the interior.

Mr. BARBER: I asked a question a few moments ago as to whether this geological work would be continued.

Mr. HAYHURST: Where are the four geological surveys operating in Alberta?

Mr. CRERAR: I might mention as an illustration of the value of the work done by these parties the circumstances that led to the development of the radium industry in the Northwest Territories. In 1900 the first geological party that ever went into the Great Bear lake area prepared a report upon their explorations, and that report lay in the archives of the department at Ottawa for almost thirty years, until a prospector who was perusing the report was struck with a single sentence in it to the effect that there was evidence of cobalt blue on the shores of Great Bear lake. That led to his making an expedition to Great Bear lake, and carrying on an investigation into the extent of the cobalt mineral, and while doing so he discovered pitchblende ores which had escaped the observation of the geological party thirty years before. That was the beginning of the radium industry in Canada, developed as a result of these explorations of the Great Bear lake area. I mention that as an evidence of the value of gathering this field data, which is available to prospectors who wish to take advantage of it.

In reply to my hon. friend who asked as to parties operating in Alberta, one party was operating in the Edmonton and Peace Hills field, another in the Pekisko area, and two parties in southeastern Alberta, the latter two parties studying the geology more from the point of view of petroleum.

Mr. BARBER: I think last year there was a topographical survey party with headquarters at Mission City on the lower mainland of British Columbia. I understand that another season will complete their work. Can the minister give me any encouragement that the work will be continued?

Mr. CRERAR: That is now under consideration. The officials of the department are now mapping out the season's work, and I am advised that work will probably be continued in that area this year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister tell the committee just in what way and by what methods the personnel of these parties throughout the country is selected?

Mr. CRERAR: The parties are headed by experienced geologists, as many as possible from the department itself. We also secure for chiefs of the parties some help from outside, in some cases professors of geology or mining at some of the universities. Then we endeavour to secure university students who are taking courses in geology or mining engineering, preferably third or fourth year students, because they are interested in the work and it has a direct bearing on the calling which they have selected for themselves in life. The ordinary help is secured in the usual way in the localities where the parties are working.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope the ordinary help is not selected in the same way that the ordinary help for the Post Office Department is selected. Can the minister assure us that he uses a different and a fairer method than the Post Office Department follows in engaging temporary help for the Christmas rush?

Mr. CRERAR: I should have to consult my colleague the Postmaster General to discover the method by which he selects his help. But I assure my hon. friend that we endeavour to get the help locally as far as possible, and I do not think there can be much criticism of the department in that regard.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to say for the information of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that I submitted twenty-six names and got only one appointment, and the appointee was in his final year at engineering.

Mr. SPENCE: I submitted many names and got no appointment.

Mr. PELLETIER: As money is going to be spent for exploration purposes, would the minister tell us if by any chance any money is going to be spent for work on roads leading to mines? Would that be under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. PELLETIER: Under what item would it come?

Mr. CRERAR: Under an item in the special supplementary estimates when they are brought down.

Mr. McNIVEN: I understood the minister to say that four survey parties were operating in Saskatchewan. May I ask in what part of Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: There were four parties in Alberta and five in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McNIVEN: I understood the minister to say that four parties were operating in Saskatchewan and that one party was in Ottawa tabulating the material. Is that correct?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct. There was one party operating in the Fort Pitt area; another at Forster lake in the northern part of the province; another party in southwestern Saskatchewan, studying underground water resources, and another party in southwestern Saskatchewan at Riverhurst, carrying on exploratory work in oil surveys. There was a large party at Goldfields to investigate gold occurrences in that district.

Mr. TOLMIE: Could the minister tell the committee what are the prospects of a profitable development of the magnetic iron ore of British Columbia at Texada island and other points in the province?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend very much information on that point, having nothing about it at the moment. I understand that they are not producing, but that it is a fairly good grade of ore.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has any investigation been made of the deposits on Texada island? They are located at tidewater, with lime and everything else that is necessary, and with coal not far distant.

Mr. CRERAR: Reports have been published on these ores that my hon. friend speaks of, but I have not seen them myself and consequently I cannot speak with any knowledge.

Mr. McNIVEN: Are the reports of these survey parties immediately available, and, if so, where can they be had?

Mr. CRERAR: They can be secured from the director of mines and geology. Of course, it takes a little time to put all the data into the form of a report. The field parties make their observations, and after they return from the field the report is compiled. As soon as available it is printed and ready for distribution. If my hon. friend has in mind some particular reports and will make inquiry of the director of mines and geology he can readily ascertain whether or not they are available at the present time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister tell us something about the portion of the item that refers to forest products laboratories?

Mr. CRERAR: We shall come to that a little later. The item which we are now considering does not relate to that.

Mr. McNIVEN: On the border line between Saskatchewan and Manitoba is the extensive Flin Flon development, and on the western border between Saskatchewan and Alberta are the Goldfields deposits. It is estimated that there are some 8,000 square miles of the Cambrian shield in the northern part of Saskatchewan. That is a most interesting formation, and it occurs to me that if an extensive survey were made this year or in succeeding years there might be some important developments in that area. I should like to know what is the intention of the department as regards survey work in the northern part of Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: Tentatively the department has had under consideration the sending of another party into the Goldfields area, that is in the lake Athabaska region, and also in what is known as the Cree lake area, which is, I am told, south and east of lake Athabaska.

Whether it touches the particular area to which the hon member has alluded I do not know; I am informed that it does.

Item agreed to.

For maintenance of offices and museum; for purchase of instruments, chemicals, books of reference, museum equipment and specimens, and related supplies; for expenses of the Geographic Board of Canada; and for miscellaneous assistance and contingencies, $74,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Will the minister give us a breakdown of that item of expense for maintenance of offices and museum, purchase of instruments, et cetera?

Mr. CRERAR: It includes the maintenance of offices, the maintenance of the museum, the purchase of instruments, chemicals for the mineralogical work and the assaying and the like; books of reference; miscellaneous assistance and contingencies; and the expenses of the Geographic Board of Canada, which has to do with the designation of geographical names. That takes up practically the whole vote. Then there is a small item of $3,000 for museum equipment, and another small item of $1,000 for the purchase of specimens for the museum. That side of the museum work has been left somewhat in the background owing to the necessity of curtailing expenditures as much as possible.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): The annual report of the Department of Mines, March 1936, states that the work of the national museum is retarded by overcrowding.

Mr. CRERAR: I think probably that is correct.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Are there any proposals for the remedying of this condition?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that there has been some rearrangement of the office space, and that the difficulty alluded to in the report has been thereby overcome. We are endeavouring to operate as economically as possible. I think that in some cases our staffs are working under overcrowded conditions, but we are doing the best we can.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
To provide for payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $2,250,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister be good enough to make a clear and comprehensive statement as to this expenditure, showing where the subventions last year went, the extent of them, and what subventions it is proposed to continue? I indicated the other day that I had a communication—in fact I have had several communications—in connection with the matter. There is grave anxiety in the west in connection with the subventions, and likewise there is anxiety regarding portions of the subventions in eastern Canada, particularly with respect to the movement of Nova Scotia coal and the difficulties that have been experienced in connection therewith. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would make the matter clear.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: There has been some anxiety, I believe, about this question of coal subventions. It is not intended to make any change this year in the principle upon which subventions are based. That principle is that the subvention applies to put the Canadian producer in as good a position as the American producer, in certain areas and in certain markets. Obviously if the cost of producing American coal increases and the cost of producing Canadian coal remains stationary, under the operation of the order in council upon which the subventions are based the total amount paid would be reduced. Conversely, if the cost of Canadian coal advances and American coal costs remain stationary, the subventions would increase. Last year there was a slight reduction in certain cases in the actual cash per ton paid by way of subvention. That was due to the fact that American costs had increased, consequently it did not require the same amount to bring about the equalization upon which the order in council applying the subventions is based. When we come to the amount of subventions paid, we did not provide enough money last year. It appeared to be enough in the light of the experience of the previous year, but the expansion in business and the increased shipments of coal left us short in our provision.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister state the amount of subventions paid and to whom they were paid, commencing say in western Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: I find that in the calendar year 1936 the amounts in round numbers were as follows:

Nova Scotia	$1,573,000
New Brunswick	15,000
Alberta	307,000
Alberta-Ontario movement	163,000
Saskatchewan	38,000
British Columbia	113,000

It is paid partly to the railways. I have not the details here, if my right hon. friend means the actual recipients.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that the railways received some, of course, but I should like to have on Hansard a record of the persons or corporations to whom the subventions were paid, and the amounts for the calendar year. The minister can obviously see the reason. The auditor general's report for the year 1936 will not be available until next year, so that this is the only opportunity to secure the information. I can readily understand that the minister has not the information at the moment. We can either let the item stand, or he can give the information later. There are some further questions I desire to ask with respect to subventions, particularly with respect to some of the western subventions and the apprehension some have as to the possible curtailment of them. I was going to predicate my questions upon the answers given to the question I have just asked.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I can have the information available after the six o'clock recess. Meantime we might continue discussion of the item and then let it stand until after recess.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to know the quantities of coal moved as a result of these subventions.

Mr. CRERAR: Nova Scotia coal moved, 1,681,000 tons.

Mr. BENNETT: To Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: It would be to Quebec and Ontario. For instance, a considerable quantity moved to Noranda, I think some 225,000 to 250,000 tons. Then a very considerable amount was moved to the International Nickel Company at Sudbury. In New Brunswick the total tonnage on which the subvention applied was 20,953 tons; in Alberta and British Columbia, the Crowsnest area, 298,000 tons; Alberta-Ontario movement, 65,229 tons.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would make clear how that Alberta-Ontario item is split up. Part of it moved to what I would call the Toronto urban area, and I think it moved as far east as Ignace. It will be remembered that there was provision for the movement as far east as Ignace. I should like to know to what extent it came east to Winnipeg on the main lines, so to speak, and the diversion down to the urban centres of Ontario.

Mr. CRERAR: The figure I have just given, 65,229 tons, is the domestic coal movement to Ontario. The other movement to which my right hon. friend refers is probably in connection with the railway requirements.

Mr. BENNETT: Steam coal.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I shall endeavour to get the information on both.

Mr. MacNICOL: A considerable volume of Nova Scotia coal is imported into Ontario. I use some myself in some of my buildings. The board of education in Toronto uses a lot of it. I wonder what will be the effect on Ontario importations of Nova Scotia coal of the proposed importation of Russian coal. If there is any effect from the proposed importation of 250,000 tons a year will the minister require the additional $300,000 that he asks for in the estimates? Because if Ontario and Quebec are to use 250,000 tons of Russian coal that will mean 250,000 tons less of Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think it will have the effect my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Russian coal has to be sold somewhere, and the price would not permit of its being sold in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CRERAR: The Nova Scotia coal is steam coal. The Russian coal, if any, that will be imported under the arrangement, is anthracite. They do not compete with each other.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the amount of coal produced in Nova Scotia prior to the granting of the subsidies and the amount produced since the subsidies have been in effect? I should like to find out what effect the subsidies have had in increasing the production of coal in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information here. How far back does my hon. friend wish to go?

Mr. HEAPS: Not very far back; just prior to the time the subsidy was granted. What amount of coal has been produced in Nova Scotia since the subsidy has been in effect?

Mr. CRERAR: Subventions have been in effect, as I recall it, for some eleven or twelve years.

Mr. HEAPS: I was wondering whether the subventions have had any appreciable effect in increasing production in Nova Scotia. If they have not, I do not see the use of continuing them. If they have had some effect, their continuance might be worth while.

Mr. CRERAR: There is another angle to that question which perhaps my hon. friend has overlooked, and it is this. Of recent years, say within the last ten years, fuel oil has to a considerable extent displaced coal for the heating of dwellings and also to a certain extent in providing power for driving ships and so on. So if my hon. friend were to base his judgment on a comparison of the coal production in Nova Scotia say twelve or fifteen years ago with the present coal production under the subventions, he would need to take into account several other factors as well.

Mr. HEAPS: That is true, but there was quite a bit of oil in use prior to the establishment of the subventions, and I should think that would be taken into consideration. What I wished to find out was whether these subventions have had the effect originally intended.

Mr. BENNETT: Inasmuch as at least a large portion of the subvention has been paid during the five years from 1930 to 1935 I think I should say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heaps) that but for the subventions the mines of Nova Scotia would have been practically shut up. The reason is obvious. It is not a question of fuel oil alone, as the minister has said. There was another question, that of the prices at which coal was being thrown upon Canadian markets from the United States, and other countries as well. It was impossible, even with the tariff increases that were put in effect, for the coal from Nova Scotia to compete with the fuel that came from Virginia, for instance. All hon. members who are familiar with the cost at which fuel from that locality was being offered for sale to upper Canadian factories will realize the situation, and the subventions barely made it possible under the conditions that then existed for those mines to supply the steam coal requirements of upper Canadian factories.

On Friday last I was talking to a manufacturer who had continued to use Nova Scotia coal. He told me that the pressure to utilize other fuels imported from outside Canada had been very great, but under the circumstances he felt that the action taken by the country was right; he was endeavouring to do what he could to assist, and he gave his reasons, which struck me as being eminently sound. I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction, however, that but for these subventions the island of Cape Breton would have been in a very serious condition indeed. Since it did not result in any political advantage to the particular government that happened to be in power during those years I can speak of it with much more certainty than perhaps I otherwise could. That this is a fact can be amply demonstrated by anyone who cares to take the trouble to look into the matter.

As far as the west is concerned I can only say that but for the subventions the coal would not have moved at all east of, we will say, Swift Current. In Winnipeg they have had a terrific struggle to establish any market for their coal as against coal coming there from the United States. The increase in duty that we imposed upon certain types of United States coal had some effect in decreasing the amount of coal that was imported. Last year substantial quantities of German coal came into this country, and in one or two instances I am afraid it came in under the name of Welsh coal. That, however, is not the type of coal with which we are now dealing, as the minister said a moment ago. We are dealing not with coal of the anthracite type but with bituminous coal. It will be remembered that the United States passed a statute by which they provided that there should be a duty against our lignite if under our tariff we imposed a duty against their lignite, and we did put them on the free list, as will be recalled. There was some very small movement of lignite from what you might call the southern Alberta fields into the states contiguous to Canada, directly south, and, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is aware, there was some movement of coal from Great Britain and other quarters to Vancouver which seriously affected the position of the coal industry of Vancouver island, about which he used to speak so feelingly. I suppose now, under brighter skies and in different days, there is less necessity for the hon. member to direct attention to those hardships. The unwillingness of the hon. gentleman to participate in most debates that involve any reflection upon the present administration would indicate that the skies are much brighter even than I thought. Perhaps this may have the desired effect of getting the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to his feet so that we may hear from him.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Speaker, there is another side to this question, and it is a very tender point to the people at the head of the lakes. This coal subvention constitutes a protection to western coal and a duty on United States coal, and it has resulted in considerable unemployment at the head of the lakes. We have two large coal handling plants there; the machinery in one of those plants costs about three and a half million dollars. As the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, we are under brighter skies now, and I had hoped that these subventions would be very materially decreased and that the coal coming into Fort William might go a considerable distance further west, though perhaps not as far as Winnipeg. Our boats carry wheat east, and formerly they would bring back coal, so that these subventions hit the shipping on the great lakes. We hope the day will come when there will be a considerable improvement in the amount of coal handled at the head of the lakes.

Mr. NEILL: Despite the unkind remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition I will give him credit for having been at the head of the government which first started the bonusing of coal on Vancouver island. I recall very clearly that after the election of 1930 a delegation waited upon the right hon. gentleman, who was then prime minister. That delegation consisted of a man from Nanaimo, a man from Cumberland—who was my late opponent, by the way—and myself. The other two members of the delegation were pressing the prime minister to impose a duty on fuel oil. The right hon. gentleman asked my opinion and I said I did not think that would be effective. I thought the better and more practical way would be to bonus the production of coal on Vancouver island, and my right hon. friend was pleased to say that he agreed with me. That was the procedure finally adopted, and a bonus of only twenty-five cents per ton was provided. Later on it was increased, but it all occurred while his government was in power, and I think if the other parties to the deal had played the game the result would have been very marked. At any rate I am quite free to say that his was the first and only government that did give us a bonus, and the benefits which resulted certainly were substantial.

Mr. BENNETT: And look what happened to him.

Mr. NEILL: Possibly I was more concerned with what would happen to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni than with what might happen to the right hon. leader of the opposition.

I should like to ask the minister for certain information. Some of it he may be able to give me now, and if he has not the rest of it perhaps he will get it while he is getting the other information that has been requested. He has stated that the subvention to British Columbia for the calendar year 1936 amounted to $113,000. I should like to know how much of that amount was paid for coal produced on Vancouver island. I should like to know also how much of that was paid at the rate of fifty cents per ton and how much was paid at the other rate of a dollar a ton, because there are the two rates. Then I should like to ask the minister if there is any danger of an alteration, or any proposal to alter these rates of bonus during the ensuing year.

Mr. CRERAR: With regard to the amount mentioned by my hon. friend, that was all paid on Vancouver island.

Mr. NEILL: And how much was paid at the fifty cent rate?

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I cannot answer that.

Mr. NEILL: The information could be obtained?

Mr. CRERAR: I dare say it could be secured.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any proposal to change that bonus during the coming year?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that has not been under consideration so far.

Mr. NEILL: And to whom was it paid?

Mr. CRERAR: We will secure that information also.

I might say a word in reply to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) a moment ago. In the calendar year 1932 the total production of coal in Nova Scotia amounted to a little more than 4,000,000 tons, and the amount of subvention paid in that year was $710,000. Whether or not it was due to the subvention—and I assume it was an important factor—in 1936 there was an increase to over 6,500,000 tons. Unquestionably the payment of the subvention did have a definite bearing upon the total quantity of coal produced in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HEAPS: May we have similar figures for Alberta?

Mr. CRERAR: In 1931 the output in Alberta was 4,500,000 net tons, while in 1936 it exceeded 5,600,000 tons. In 1931 the total amount moved to Ontario was 23,400 tons and in 1936 it was slightly in excess of 65,000. In 1931 the subvention for the movement to Ontario was $127,000 and in 1936, $163,000.

Mr. HEAPS: It would be extremely difficult to get much information from the figures submitted, other than that between 1931 and 1936 there was an increase. There probably would have been an increase anyway, because 1936 was a better trading year than 1931.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; quite true.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know by what means we may estimate the beneficial effects of subventions to Alberta and Nova Scotia. Naturally I am anxious to see the coal mining industry in Canada in a prosperous condition. I know how bad it was back in 1930, and in years prior to that. I remember having been sent to Alberta about nineteen years ago to make an investigation in the coal mining industry, and at that time very little Alberta coal was being used in Manitoba. I remember that the Alberta coal producers got busy in an effort to capture the Manitoba market, and they succeeded fairly well, without any subvention. As the minister must know, to-day the consumption of Alberta coal in Manitoba is very great; it has almost entirely supplanted the American anthracite formerly used in Manitoba for domestic purposes. I do not see why something along the same line could not be done without these large subventions. True, we have tried to bonus Alberta coal coming into Ontario, but I believe without much success. Had the effort been successful the amount of coal moved would no doubt have been considerably greater.

A few minutes ago the question was raised as to the comparative costs of coal in Canada and in the United States. I am always puzzled as to why the cost of production in the United States is so much less than it is in Canada. In these observations I am not referring to any particular mine or area, but am speaking in a general way. I know there are some mines in Nova Scotia which are expensive indeed to operate—I refer to the mines running under the sea, where costs of operation are extremely high—but there are other mines in that province and throughout Canada where the cost of production should not be any higher than it is in some of the United States mines. Yet one finds that the cost of coal at the mine mouth in Canada is probably fifty per cent higher than it is across the boundary line, and I cannot understand why the difference should be so great. Wages cannot be responsible for it, because the wage rate in the United States is just as high as it is in Canada. I wonder if the minister has any information he can give the committee showing comparative costs of producing coal in various mines of the United States and Canada, because after all if the subvention is based upon the difference in cost of production in the two countries, the first thing the department should find is the comparative cost. Only thus can we gain any intelligent idea as to why subventions must be granted to the coal mining industry in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the fuel board have in considerable detail the information to which the hon. member refers. In order to apply the subventions in accordance with the principle of law governing them, that information must be available. Of course the cost of production varies in different mines in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. This is an exceedingly difficult piece of legislation to administer to the satisfaction of all. In the operation of the subvention we must be guided by the principle involved when subventions were originally granted, and apply it in the most intelligent manner. So far as my knowledge goes, and I am sure in this connection I speak correctly, it is applied without any discrimination.

Mr. BENNETT: Broadly I believe the rate is about one-seventh of a cent per ton per mile; am I correct?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is that the basis on Vancouver island?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is an export basis.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that in Saskatchewan and Alberta it works out to a ten per cent reduction in the freight rate.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the largest subvention, payable from the maritimes to Ontario, was one-seventh of a cent per ton per mile. I may be wrong, because I am speaking from memory.

Mr. CRERAR: I would not be certain of the amount, but I believe payment is based on that principle.

Mr. HEAPS: Arising out of what the minister has just stated to the committee, may I ask if it is the policy of the government to grant the same subvention to different mines in the same province?

Mr. CRERAR: I did not catch my hon. friend's question.

Mr. HEAPS: Would there be any difference in the subventions paid to the different mines in Nova Scotia?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is.

Mr. CRERAR: Is the hon. member referring to Nova Scotia mines only?

Mr. HEAPS: I was taking them as an example.

Mr. CRERAR: The amount of the subvention paid will vary with the cost of getting the coal into a particular market. For instance, the subvention on New Brunswick coal will be less than it is on Nova Scotia coal because Nova Scotia coal is further from the market.

Mr. HEAPS: Let me give an illustration. There are two mines in New Brunswick; in one costs of production are low while in the other they are high. Both mines want to send coal into Montreal. Would the subventions paid to each mine be the same?

Mr. CRERAR: If they were shipping by water, yes; if they were both shipping by rail, the subventions would be the same.

Mr. HEAPS: It would appear that costs of production are not a factor.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not a case of cost of production in two mines which may be located alongside each other in the same province; it is cost of production in the province as against cost of United States coal that would apply.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is it not more the fact that the coal is entering a competitive market? It is possible that coal could go into Montreal without being paid a subvention.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I remember protesting some years ago against certain subventions which were being suggested at that time. They were referred to as experimental rates to enable Alberta coal to be brought into Ontario; the idea was to bring coal through provinces where the temperature goes to forty below to a province where it rarely goes below twenty above. I should like to know if in the payment of subventions we have reached the point where coal from one end of the country under subventions is meeting coal from the other end of the country under subventions, the two coals fighting for the same market. If we have not come to that point yet, I fear we shall reach it some day.

Mr. BENNETT: Not yet but soon.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to find out something about this British Columbia subvention. What is the idea of paying a subvention on coal on Vancouver island when the boats call in there for bunkers? What is the basis of that subvention and is there any sense to it at all?

Mr. BENNETT: In so far as it was initiated by the last government, it is without sense; in so far as it has been continued by the present government, it is highly commendable.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I would not say that; I would say it is without sense in connection with both governments.

Mr. CRERAR: The real basis is the high cost of production on Vancouver island. Perhaps the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) could debate this matter better than I.

Mr. HAYHURST: Naturally we are anxious to get a Canadian market for Canadian coal. Alberta produces large quantities of coal and it would seem that the metal mining districts in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan would be logical markets for Alberta coal. Has the minister any information as to where the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company at Flinflon get their supplies of coal?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand they purchase their coal in Alberta, but I am not certain just where in the province.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do I understand the minister to say that there will be a reduction of about ten per cent, and that that will be based upon mileage as well as upon costs of production? How will that affect shipments of Alberta coal to the east?

Mr. CRERAR: I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is it to be only on a production basis, with mileage not entering into the matter at all?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed it amounts to ten per cent. Obviously, if you are hauling your coal a thousand miles, you will be paying more freight per ton than if you are hauling it only five hundred miles, but the ten per cent would apply in both cases.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to say a word in support of these subventions. I made a special trip to Sydney, Nova Scotia, to ascertain just what these subventions meant in the way of employment for the miners of that district. I was driven out to Glace Bay and Waterford. I asked one of the principal mining men how much coal was being shipped to Ontario and how much employment was being provided through these subventions. We happened to be standing near the railway tracks and just then a train pulled by consisting of thirty-seven cars holding approximately 2,000 tons of coal. On the side of the train was a big poster stating, "Nova Scotia coal for Ontario." It must have taken quite a number of men to mine thirty-seven cars of coal. I asked this gentleman if they were sending out many trains like that one, and he told me that they were. If that train was only one of many, then these subventions must be providing considerable employment for Nova Scotia miners. As I said a moment ago, I have used Nova Scotia coal and I am highly in favour of bringing that coal into Ontario. We ship a considerable quantity of manufactured material to the eastern provinces and in my opinion it is good business to encourage interprovincial trade. I am convinced from what I saw at Glace Bay that the money provided for in this vote is money well spent for Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: There is just one thing wrong with the payment of subventions on coal. The two central provinces benefit greatly from the protection about which the hon. member who just sat down always talks. When those two provinces want to buy coal, the hon. member becomes very solicitous for the miner in Nova Scotia and he wants to have Nova Scotia coal brought into Ontario. He wants Ontario to buy Nova Scotia coal, and he wants somebody to pay part of the freight rate for bringing that coal into Ontario. It seems to me there is something wrong in trying to get it both ways. First, he wants protection on manufactured goods to help out his working men, and then he wants part of the freight paid on coal to help out the working men in the outermost provinces of the dominion. I would say this, that this thing of protection and this thing of subventions are the curse of this country, and the sooner we get rid of them and get relief in both ways, the better it will be for Canadians from coast to coast.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to say a word on subventions. Those who come from Alberta or British Columbia or from the east realize fully that subventions are of great value. In the first place, to deal with what the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) has just said, if this coal is not protected and these subventions are not given, the money which Ontario would spend for coal would go to the United States, and that would be exceedingly poor business for Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Why?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Moreover, the railroads of this country, which are already a serious anxiety to Canada, would lose that traffic. That again is a serious matter. In addition to this, we would be keeping in employment United States working men instead of Canadians in Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. After all is said and done, the only thing that makes this country valuable is the number of people who are living here and who can continue to make a living here. If we once make conditions such that they can no longer make a living here, then they are no longer able to buy goods, and the railroads will lose the traffic from carrying the goods to them. So, in the last analysis, while I do not wish to advocate anything which will bring about an altogether artificial condition, we must grant the fact that it is a sound principle to protect up to a certain point at least.

I come from Alberta, and I know how we look at the matter out there. The subventions have meant a great deal to us.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are some who are inclined to say "sure," but let them remember that Alberta is one of the nine provinces of this dominion, and if we destroy the economic stability of any one province we seriously impair the economic condition of the whole country. Consequently, we must all be ready to give and take, to be open-minded in all these matters.

The coal subventions, let me tell the minister, have meant a great deal to Alberta, and I assume they have meant just as much to the other provinces. It is a matter of great satisfaction to us that these subventions have increased the amount of our trade, and I wish to commend them highly. I regret that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), I think it was, had to report that there was a lack of employment at the head of the lakes because coal was no longer being brought in there from across the line. That is bad, but it goes to show how we can hardly help anyone without hurting somebody else. At the same time we must remember that when United States coal is coming in here, United States miners are mining that coal and United States railways are hauling it. So, on the whole, I think these subventions are to the advantage of the dominion even if it means that the men at the head of the lakes are hurt, as my hon. friend says; but we could probably find some way of compensating them. I would say to the minister that he is following a strictly sound policy when he furthers the application of these subventions; in fact, I would rather be inclined to think that if he increased them to some extent it would still be sound, so that we would not be on a strictly competitive basis with producers outside. After all, it does seem most unsound, when we have such a tremendous amount of coal in Alberta, and when that coal is of so many different kinds, that we should buy coal from across the line. So I do not hesitate for one minute to commend the minister for his activity in this respect, and to urge that he follow this plan in the future to a greater extent even than he has in the past.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I cannot let this opportunity pass without taking exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young). He seems to be deeply concerned about the fact that subvention is paid for the benefit of our coal miners. You can call it a subvention or bonus or whatever you like, but if my hon. friend were to take the time to study the amount of bonuses and subventions that have been given to the wheat growers of Canada, he would find that the subvention on coal is very, very small in comparison. The eastern provinces, make no mistake, have paid their share, and paid through the nose for years, for the benefit of the farmers of the west. I do not like the impression to go out through the country that we in the east are getting something that we do not deserve. The advantage which Canada derives from these subventions—and I say this fairly and honestly—cannot be gauged by the amount of the subvention paid, because it puts into the hands of the miners purchasing power which they otherwise would not have. Without the subvention we could not keep the markets we have. Competition has been so keen in the last number of years that our markets could not have been retained, let alone increased, without the subvention. I can speak for Nova Scotia, and for New Brunswick too, in this matter. They have furnished an excellent market for the wheat products of the western provinces and for their cattle in the shape of meats. There is no better market than our eastern provinces for the manufactured products of the central provinces, a statement which I am sure any manufacturer in Ontario or Quebec will corroborate. Our miners are doing arduous work, and they have to live on the very best food; their work demands it; otherwise they could not stand the strain of producing coal. When we take into consideration what our miners did in the war years, when their manpower was depleted, I think we should all resent a remark like that made by the hon. member for Saskatoon going on the Hansard of this dominion; and in saying that, I speak for the miners all over Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: I would say to my hon. friend that he can never embarrass me by talking about bonuses paid on wheat. I am not in favour of bonuses, no matter where they are applied, and I would like that to be very well understood. There was a wheat bonus during past years when the wheat industry was in danger perhaps of almost being wiped out, and the country came to its rescue under those circumstances. I take it that there will be no division of opinion as to the necessity for aid when such are the circumstances.

Mr. HARTIGAN: We supplied a board to sell your wheat too, and we bought your wheat.

Mr. YOUNG: Not very much. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) takes this attitude. He is strong for protection on goods manufactured in Ontario, and he pleads the cause of the working man.

Mr. MacNICOL: I always will.

Mr. YOUNG: His desire to help the working man is no greater than that of any other hon. member. He wants to help the working man of Ontario. He also professes great concern about buying coal from Nova Scotia. He is not suggesting that there be about $5 a ton duty against United States coal, and that the people of Ontario be made to pay whatever that protected cost of coal might be.

Mr. MacNICOL: The duty is only 50 cents a ton.

Mr. YOUNG: That would be a different proposition altogether. The rest of the country would then have to pay the subventions, and that is not charged up to my friend when he burns his coal in Ontario.

Let me say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Hartigan) that if he will take the trouble to study the production of real wealth in the western provinces during the last twenty-five years, he will be amazed to learn the amount of real wealth that has come out of those provinces. Further, he might study the question of how much these same provinces paid the dominion as a result of burdensome tariffs, our own province alone being charged up with a bill of about $28,000,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the rest of Canada?

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member will then begin to realize what this burden means to those of us who live in that part of the country. We are not opposed to Nova Scotia miners selling all the coal they can. We have no objection to Alberta miners selling all the coal they can. But we ask that these things be done on a basis which does not require the rest of Canada to pay for it all the time. In Saskatchewan, which is an extremely cold province during the winter months, the only satisfaction we have had was an increase some time ago from $2.20 per ton to $2.80 per ton in freight rates out of the Alberta field. But there is no subvention for us; we have to pay the bill. I have paid so many coal bills that I know something about the subject of prices and freight rates. All we are suggesting is this, that this whole matter should be given full consideration and that unfair burdens should be lifted from the backs of those in western Canada who have been bearing these burdens for a very long time. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) rises in his place in the house to ask for subventions, and makes a great plea for what I call protection.

Mr. MacNICOL: Protection for the Canadian worker.

Mr. YOUNG: The other day I read a speech in which the hon. member expressed himself as being very much in favour of the budget in that it represents a downward revision—not so much as some of us would like but a revision in the right direction. Now, you cannot have it going and coming. There is a principle at stake here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am quite aware of that.

Mr. YOUNG: You must apply the same principle no matter whether it be for you or against you, if it is sound. We in Saskatchewan have no more desire to be unfair to our Alberta and Nova Scotia friends than, I am sure, they have any desire to be unfair to us. Let me point out that it is because of the most burdensome protection which has been imposed in the interests of eastern industries that both ends of Canada have suffered as greatly as they have for a long time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask the minister how much money by way of subventions on coal was granted to Saskatchewan last year?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have the information in a few moments.

Mr. TUCKER: While the minister is getting the information, I should like to say that, like other western members who have spoken, I am in favour of as large a reduction as possible of a tariff which has worked in favour of the industrial part of central Canada. We in the west, like hon. members from the maritimes, have come to realize that we can go only a certain distance in the direction of free trade, that apparently we shall always have to submit to a certain measure of protection in this country. As I understand the matter, subventions on coal from Nova Scotia and Alberta are intended to make up in a small measure to those parts of Canada for what they are losing because of the tariff; in other words, it was recognized that those provinces gain practically nothing from the tariff, but lose a great deal, and these subventions are intended to provide some measure of compensation. My opinion is that so long as certain parts of Canada are to benefit at the expense of other parts through our fiscal tariff policy, until the benefits and injuries can be balanced to some extent by a substantial reduction of the tariff, anything that helps those parts which are penalized should have my support. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, may I say that we shall have to recognize the fact that other parts of Canada will demand and receive in the years to come a certain degree of protection.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order: We are not entitled to discuss the budget under this item. The tariff is not the subject before the committee at the moment; the subject is subventions on coal.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Apparently the tariff is before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the point of order of the hon. member for Davenport is well taken. Hon. members have been allowed a wide latitude.

Mr. TUCKER: I am surprised that the hon. member for Davenport rose to that point of order—he of all members—

Mr. BARRY: Will the hon. member explain why every western member considers himself qualified to ask questions and express views as to the sentiments of members from the maritime provinces?

Mr. MacNICOL: Only Saskatchewan members.

Mr. TUCKER: I can answer that: because we suffer from the same fiscal policy that has almost ruined the west as well as the maritimes.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us speak for ourselves.

Mr. TUCKER: The only fiscal policy which will bring this country together is one that will deal fairly with all parts of the dominion. We have had a policy which has assisted the industrial part of central Canada at the expense of the maritimes and western Canada as well as at the expense of the agricultural part of central Canada; in other words, it has benefited only the industrial area of central Canada at the expense of other parts, and that to the tune of roughly $24,000,000 in one year, 1931, from the province of Saskatchewan alone. We are not here to indulge in quarrels between the different provinces. If some provinces are to receive substantial benefits from the fiscal policy of this country, benefits in equal measure should be conferred on other parts of the country. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe the maritimes and Alberta are getting through the fiscal policy of this dominion anything commensurate with what the central portion receives. What I rose to say was that, by means of the commission set up by this government, it is proposed I hope, so to speak, to equalize in various ways the benefits of the fiscal policy of Canada to its various provinces. We from Saskatchewan expect that our provincial government will present to that commission for consideration proposals calculated to give that province a greater measure of fairness of treatment somewhat similar to what has been granted here to the maritimes and Alberta in respect of coal. I hope that hon. members from other parts of Canada will support us in asking for a fair deal for Saskatchewan, since we are no less willing that Alberta and other parts of Canada shall also receive a square deal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, Saskatchewan! Always Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Lethbridge asked a moment ago how much money had been spent in Saskatchewan by way of subventions on coal.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just for last year.

Mr. CRERAR: For the calendar year 1936 the amount was slightly over $38,000. I suggest that as it is six o'clock we should let this item stand. I wish to get the information for which my right hon. friend has asked, and we can resume discussion of this item somewhat later.

Mr. BENNETT: In the meantime the minister will speak a kindly word to those who should be more amenable to discipline than they are.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Will the minister get some information with regard to whether subventions clash?

Item stands.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Lands, Parks and Forests Branch

Dominion lands, seed grain, mining lands, ordnance, admiralty and public lands, salaries and expenses, et cetera, $60,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the reason for such a large decrease in this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: The fact that we are economizing, for one thing. In the second place, the amount of work is being steadily reduced year by year. That is the explanation given me; I asked the same question myself.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister explain what the present position is with respect to seed grain? I thought we were pretty well out of that.

Mr. CRERAR: There is quite a considerable amount in outstanding accounts which are being collected.

Mr. BENNETT: The former government made provision for wiping off a lot of them.

Mr. CRERAR: Not these. These go back to 1908 and indeed further. They are old balances of seed grain advances made by the dominion government in some instances over thirty-five years ago. These claims are being adjusted by commissions which have been set up in each of the provinces for that purpose. The federal government representatives come from the officers of the soldier settlement board. Alberta has one representative; so has Saskatchewan, and I think there is another from Manitoba. Slowly and steadily we are getting these adjustments made.

Then there is the handling of the ordnance lands. Practically all the lands owned by the federal government for federal government purposes, such as ordnance lands and lands used by other departments, revert to the Department of Mines and Resources, when not being used by the departments which originally secured them, and we administer these lands.

Mr. REID: Can the minister tell the committee whether in British Columbia the department is cooperating with the provincial government, for example in conservation and the planting of trees? The provincial government has on foot, extensive schemes, such as reforestation.

Mr. CRERAR: That comes under the next item. If my hon. friend will raise the question then, we shall deal with it.

Mr. SENN: Is there any revenue derived from ordnance lands, situated along the great lakes or in other places?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, there is some. I recall one case particularly, I believe in Halifax, where some ordnance lands were leased to people who wished to use them for summer resort purposes. The basis is 6 per cent of the value of the land.

Mr. BENNETT: And any taxes which may be paid.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, and in some cases the lands are sold, if they are no longer required, and the revenues of course revert to the crown.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much of last year's vote was used?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot answer that question now. We have information covering only nine months of the fiscal year, which does not end until March 31. The expectation is that the vote will be practically exhausted.

Mr. MARSHALL: Has the minister the figures to the end of 1936?

Mr. CRERAR: No, not here.

Mr. SENN: The minister stated that some ordnance lands are sold if they are thought to be no longer needed by the department. Can he state what the general policy of the department is in regard to the sale of ordnance lands? I know that in certain places along the great lakes considerable tracts of ordnance lands are held which, as far as my judgment goes, are of very little value from a military standpoint. Could the minister give a general statement as to the policy of the department in keeping or disposing of these lands?

Mr. CRERAR: The first thing the department has to be satisfied about is that the lands will not be required at any future date for military purposes. Once that is settled, I understand the practice is to get an appraisal of the lands, and if they are under lease the lessee is given the first opportunity to buy at the appraised price. If he does not want them, we try to sell or lease to whoever might be interested. Briefly, that is the policy.

Mr. SENN: I know certain areas along lake Erie. The shore of lake Erie is quite suitable for summer resort purposes. Along that shore there are considerable areas of land which from time to time would have been the subject of negotiation if the department had been ready to sell. I think a considerable revenue might have been derived from the sale of those lands but unfortunately, as far as I am aware, up to the present the department has not considered or approved such sales. I am not a military man and I do not know just what is necessary for defence, but these lands seem to be of very little value to the department. I would suggest to the minister that when reasonable offers are made in these cases, the department might very seriously consider selling some of this land.

Mr. CRERAR: The last six or seven years have not been particularly auspicious ones for selling land or anything else. I think the practice of having a fair appraisal made of these lands and endeavouring to get that value out of the sale is sound. I do not want to put myself into such a position that my hon. friend, for instance, might come along another year and say I had squandered the public patrimony by selling these lands for less than their value.

Mr. BENNETT: I must differ with my hon. friend; I think the minister should hesitate before selling these lands. My experience, in looking into these matters from time to time, was that frequently the crown required a piece of land for a particular purpose, only to find that the land was gone. Take quarantine stations, for instance; take lands that were set aside for one purpose and used for another. To lease them is one thing; to part with them is another. My view was and is that it is highly desirable not to part with the title to lands which have been set aside for the crown, for one never knows when the crown may require a piece of vacant land. If the crown has the title to that land, with the power of resumption on due notice being given, it is able to utilize the public domain without any substantial expense. I have in mind a very definite case in which I saw the crown part with a piece of land; then, some ten or fifteen years later, another piece of land had to be acquired by expropriation. I have in mind a case in which one of our great corporations sold a three-quarter section of land at a fair price and ultimately had to buy it back at three or four times that price, because of changed conditions.

My observation, Mr. Chairman, as well as my experience, is that many of these lands set aside as ordnance lands have become particularly useful to the crown for purposes not at all connected with military operations or necessities. In these days when land is required so frequently for the purposes of the Department of Agriculture and various other departments, I suggest that it might be desirable to establish by regulation a policy that land should be leased and not sold so that the power of resumption on the giving of due notice would be always with the crown. I offer these suggestions to the minister and the committee only as a result of my observations with respect to these lands, and if that is the case during the span of one man's life how important will it become over a period of many years. The retention of land, with the title vested in the crown, in the future will be found a sound policy, and those who desire to lease the land for a period of years under conditions that will protect the interests of the crown may be permitted to do so.

Mr. CRERAR: I may say that I very largely agree with the observations made by my right hon. friend. As a matter of fact, I am advised that the sales are very few indeed; the practice is to lease the land, which I think is the sounder practice. If the lands can be made available in that way to those who may have some use for them for a period of years, whether for summer resort or other purposes, there is a continuing revenue to the crown.

Item agreed to.

Advancement of forest conservation; national inventory of forest resources; investigation of forest conditions and rates of growth, and development of scientific management methods; forest protection studies, technical and economic investigations of forest industries; the operation of forest experiment stations, demonstration forests, and forest products laboratories; cooperative undertakings in forestry and forest products, etc., $268,300.

Mr. REID: I wonder whether the minister would have time to answer my question now. I asked if the dominion is doing anything in British Columbia by way of scientific methods of conservation, in conjunction with the provincial government which, as the minister knows, is very much interested in this question and which is doing a great piece of work.

Mr. CRERAR: The federal department maintains a forest products laboratory in Vancouver, for the purpose of examining into the values and properties of the various types of timber. and their uses in a commercial way. I understand that my hon. friend inquired also if we were assisting in reforestation or afforestation in cooperation with the provincial government. That work is being left to the provincial government, and our activities in British Columbia are confined pretty much to the work done in the laboratory.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make a few observations, and I trust that the committee and the minister will pardon me for speaking so frequently, but I happen to be the only representative on my side of the house from the province of Alberta. Perhaps otherwise I would not speak about these matters.

During my absence I took occasion to look into the work of afforestation and reforestation in New Zealand and Australia. As to reforestation, I think this work may be fairly left to nature, for nature has been better at reforesting countries than man has been. For instance, in the areas which are contiguous to the Gatineau it has been found that over a period of half a century there has been a fair growth of spruce from natural causes, through the seedlings that have been distributed by the winds in the ordinary way. In other areas near these rivers spruce has come to a fair size in sixty and seventy years. Broadly speaking, it requires nearly a century to get the results that are aimed at. Practically every year we denude five million acres of pulpwood and ship the newsprint out of this country, and this is without taking into consideration what we utilize here. Five million acres constitute quite a large area. That is largely on the Atlantic side, though some of that work is done on the Pacific side as well. As I have said, this is a very substantial area, and probably it is increasing.

If we leave reforestation to nature, then the question of afforestation becomes more important. In New Zealand there are private enterprises which have organized companies with large capital for the purpose of carrying on afforestation operations, and they have spent millions of pounds to that end. I passed one plantation in which there were some seven or eight or ten million trees. I went into the forest for the purpose of seeing how they were growing, and I talked to a gentleman who had been in charge of those operations for many years. I brought back with me a board made from a tree that had grown from a seedling in thirty-four years. That was in New Zealand, where growth is very rapid; of course we have no such rapidity of growth in this country. I realize that the distinct difference between reforestation and afforestation is something that we in Canada must keep in mind. There are in this country vast areas of land that might be usefully planted with seedlings, but the division of responsibility between the dominion and the provinces becomes very acute when one comes to consider the matter from any angle one pleases. We have no timber lands now belonging to the dominion, except in the Northwest Territories, and other territories under federal administration. The lands that are being denuded of trees for the export of newsprint are lands belonging to the provinces, and not to the dominion. The question of reforestation is a matter which one would think would engage the serious attention of provincial authorities.

With respect to afforestation, in western Canada we have carried on an educational campaign during at least the last half century. When I first went to western Canada, now nearly forty years ago, seedlings were being distributed every year from the farm at Indian Head, and elsewhere, and the many farms which we now see on the prairies with clumps of poplars about them, forming wind breaks and shelters, were thus protected by the seedlings distributed from the farm at Indian Head. In addition to that farm, there are others from which these seedlings have been distributed.

It seems to me, under present conditions, that is the only work the dominion can properly carry on, for we have no areas to set aside for afforestation. We have no areas over which we may have control, except the ordnance land about which we were speaking a few minutes ago, lands in the Northwest Territories, the lands which are vested in us as part of our experimental farms, and other areas which have fallen into our hands. I certainly believe we should cooperate with the provinces to the extent of our ability, but to suggest that we can undertake a policy of afforestation in the various provinces of the dominion is to suggest that we could interfere with them in the administration of their property, and undertake to direct policies of which they are so jealous, and have been all through the years.

Therefore when we came to the question of afforestation indicated in the item, I was curious to have the minister indicate what he had in mind, and what the break-up of the item might be. If, as is the case in Australia, we had only one central government, the problem could easily be dealt with, but accepting the situation as it now stands it seems to me perfectly clear that all we can do is to give such assistance as is within our powers, by reason of our ownership and operation of experimental farms, and the operation of our laboratories. We have one in Vancouver and one in the east seeking to determine how best we may be able to secure the continuance of what is indeed one of our most wasting assets, namely our timber.

No thoughtful man who has read the history of the United States of America for the last hundred years can fail to be profoundly affected by the situation which has developed in Canada. It is all right to look at those magnificent trees in British Columbia, but when one realizes that some of them were a fairly good size before Columbus discovered America he begins to realize that a policy of afforestation or reforestation will bring no results during lifetimes of many, many generations, so far as Douglas fir is concerned. With regard to spruce, the condition is somewhat different, and with regard to hardwood it is still more different. I suggest that the problem confronting the Canadian people in connection with their timber assets is one of profound importance. The wasting of this great asset, which cannot readily be made available again, is something which should engage the attention of those who reap revenue from it, namely the provincial authorities. We cannot impose our will upon them; much less should we endeavour to do so, but to the extent of our ability I think we should indicate to them, as has been done in the past, through the department which has knowledge of the experiments and knowledge which has come from information gained by representatives at various conventions throughout the world, how we can within a reasonable time secure a regrowth of timber which would be available for use. That has been done in Sweden and in other countries.

For instance, a certain type of poplar may be used for matches. With veneer knives they take many, many thousands of match ends off one particular tree. In Sweden they have done a great deal of work in connection with the reforestation of that particular type of tree, and in this country it seems to me we could do a great deal in the valley of the Ottawa, for instance, where that particular type of tree grows well. But just how one can adjust the federal government into the picture, so as to ensure something like a reasonable return for the effort, is a matter of great difficulty. Certainly I have seen but little evidence on the part of any of the provinces of a desire for the dominion even to suggest to them what they might do. That is the reason I should like the minister to indicate what he means by the item.

Mr. CRERAR: As my right hon. friend has said, it is quite true that the control of the forest areas is now within the provinces. I believe at the present time there is a growing appreciation of the importance of sound methods of conservation and harvesting. The work the federal government carries on under the vote is confined largely to the stations it has established. Perhaps the committee would be interested to know where they are located. There is one in New Brunswick, known as the Acadian forest experimental area, covering an area of thirty-eight square miles. Then at Valcartier in Quebec there is a small one of seven and a half square miles. In the Petawawa area of northern Ontario there is an area of one hundred square miles; in Manitoba there is the Duck mountain forest experimental station with an area of approximately thirty-six square miles, and in Alberta, west of Calgary, there is the Kananaskis station with an area of sixty-three square miles. As I said a few moments ago, experimental work is done at these stations. For instance, study is carried on as to how best the growth of trees may be promoted. Early last summer I had an opportunity of visiting the Petawawa station and observing the work done there. It is carried out along definite scientific lines. In fact, the work carried on by the various experimental stations is of the same kind as that done by the experimental farms of the various provinces.

The data gathered from the experimental work is made available to the provinces and to private owners of timber who are operating pulp-mills, sawmills or other timber processing plants. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that there is a need of impressing upon the people generally the wisdom of sound conservation policies with respect to our forest wealth. It is only within very recent years that the importance of this asset has been realized. Several weeks ago I had an opportunity of attending the annual meeting of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, and in my discussions with the managers of companies connected with the operations I found them very much alive to the need of sound methods not only of harvesting the crop but of maintaining the supply.

What Sweden has done is, as was indicated by the right hon. gentleman, an illustration of what can be achieved by sound methods. Undoubtedly we have been slow in realizing the importance of our forests, but I do believe that in an increasing measure it is being realized to-day. I attribute much of the increased interest in sound conservation policies to the work being done by the dominion in the areas to which I referred.

Mr. BENNETT: And by the Canadian Forestry Association.

Mr. CRERAR: And by the Canadian Forestry Association. The work done by the Indian Head experimental farm in western Canada has been most valuable; it has been mostly along the lines of providing shelter belts and sheltered areas for homesteaders and farmers on what are sometimes described as the baldheaded prairies. This is very important work. Were the country in a more favourable position, I should like to see more money provided for this work. I should like to mention one interesting experiment which I saw being carried on in the laboratory at Montreal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is that laboratory?

Mr. CRERAR: In the university grounds at Montreal. I may say that this building was erected by the pulp and paper people. Experimental work is carried on in the grinding of woods and the various processes in the manufacturing of paper.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not under the direction of McGill University?

Mr. CRERAR: Partly. The experiment in which I was so much interested had to do with the production of a beautiful grade of paper from a mixture of hardwood pulp and softwood pulp. I think such experiments are very valuable. In a general way, that is the work being carried on under this vote, and I have no hesitation whatever in saying that this is one of the most important phases of the work carried on by this branch of the department.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, the minister has partly answered a question I intended to ask in connection with the laboratory, that is where it is located and what work it is doing. I am glad to hear that there is such an institution although I had not known there was. I made a special trip to Madison, Wisconsin, where perhaps the largest forest products laboratory in the world is located. This is a magnificent glass and concrete building costing in the neighbourhood of $14,000,000. The building was erected by the United States government for carrying on general forestry work. Everyone realizes that the manufacture of forest products creates employment for thousands of men, and I endorse whatever the minister has in mind with reference to the preservation of forests, laboratory work and other matters of that kind.

I noticed that at Madison they had seven different departments. The first department has to do with finding additional uses for wood and the elimination of waste in connection with the manufacture of wood products. As someone said a moment ago, there is an enormous waste in this dominion. It would seem as though our supplies of wood were thought to be inexhaustible, but they certainly are not, as one can see when he goes around the country. The second department deals with the strength of woods and the study of what wood could be best suited for particular purposes. I found this work very interesting. For instance, they studied the different types of wood to be used in the making of crates. In many instances a heavy wood is used where a lighter wood would provide better service. Reports are sent out all over the country to manufacturers and the results have been tremendous. I was told that they save the manufacturing industry in the United States an average of $4,000,000 per year.

The third department has to do with the processing of woods, a matter of great interest to the furniture manufacturers. Many improvements have been suggested to these people in regard to the type of dry kiln to use, and they claim a saving of about $10,000,000 per year. A study of construction problems is being made. To my mind this is very important. As anyone connected with the industry knows, steel is making rapid inroads into the realm of lumber. By increasing the use of wood they hope to provide more employment in sawmills and planing mills throughout the country. Another department has to do with the best methods of treating woods to make them more fire resisting. Another department has to do with the ingredients to be used in paints to increase the life of wood.

Does this laboratory in Montreal carry on similar investigations to the best of its ability? I realize that it could not compete with a $14,000,000 plant, but if it is doing any work along this line, it deserves the serious support of this committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I think most of the experiments referred to by my hon. friend are carried on at the Ottawa and Vancouver laboratories. The problems considered in Montreal are those more closely associated with the pulp and paper industry. They make analyses of pulps and consider the absorption of alcohol on pulps. They classify all pulps by selective screening and they conduct studies as to the best methods of grinding woods. They consider all things which enter into and vitally touch the pulp and paper industry. I am informed that, as a result of the work carried on in this laboratory, suggestions have been made which have materially reduced the cost of producing paper. This is a very important matter at the present time. As hon. members are aware, our large market for pulp and paper is in the United States, which country has vast areas of southern pine. We know that experimental work is being carried on in that country with the object of converting those pine woods into pulp and paper. It is, I think, vastly important that we in Canada should keep ourselves up to date in all the information which touches upon this subject; at the same time we should carry on our own experimental work for the benefit of our pulp and paper manufacturers, and that is the work which has been carried on mainly in the laboratory in Montreal.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, just a word on the point mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and also by the minister (Mr. Crerar). I think this discussion is of vital importance to any man who loves a tree and who appreciates the relationship between tree life and human life. Although in this chamber we have not control over the forest resources of Canada except to the limited degree indicated by the leader of the opposition and the minister, we do represent the people of Canada; and if the history of the world teaches us anything it teaches us this, that if tree life goes, human life cannot long be sustained in the area thus denuded. That is borne out on the pages of history. While we cannot control these matters, we can by the words uttered here stimulate in the minds of Canadians a greater regard for the renewing of these resources which are being destroyed year by year and destroyed more, I believe, by fire and insect pests than by the extent to which we are using them commercially. To a very great degree I believe that is true. Nature will do a lot herself if she is given a chance.

I remember during my early life in the west that the tree line was a great deal further north than it is now, particularly in eastern Saskatchewan. The leader of the opposition I am sure will remember that the Canadian Pacific railway main line passing through by Broadview traversed practically bare country thirty years ago, but the trees have gradually crept southward. Why? Because the prairie fires which destroyed them formerly have been stopped by the cultivation of farms. Let us do all we can to stimulate in the minds of our people the need to cooperate with nature in replenishing these great stores which mean so much, not merely in the way of an asset in manufacturing something, but also in relation to the preservation of the means whereby human beings can live in this country. The great problems of erosion referred to by the leader of the opposition, which are so apparent in the United States but are not, as yet, so apparent here, are apparent, nevertheless, in some parts and will become increasingly so if forest growth disappears, and to the extent that we can stimulate public opinion to appreciate the importance of the problem—and it is very largely a matter of individual trees—to that extent we are doing a useful work for our country. I have no doubt that the expression of opinions given here to-night will find an echo across the dominion, and once public opinion is aroused then proper measures must be taken by the proper authorities to deal with the matter.

From the standpoint of this government and of this parliament we can continue to carry on the nursery work, the work in the parks, and the laboratory work to which the minister has referred, but so far as control is concerned that very definitely is in the hands of the provincial authorities, except in areas which are definitely owned outright by the dominion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my voice to what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I think this is one of the most important items in the estimates to come before the house this session. In the past we have not paid as much attention to protecting our forests as we ought to have done. The province of British Columbia had at one time the finest forest, I suppose, to be found anywhere in the world. We thought we had a forest which was inexhaustible, and we thought that only a very few years ago. But from studies and investigations made within the last few years it is estimated, by what is considered to be competent authority, that within twenty-five years the accessible commercial forest in British Columbia will have disappeared. Not only will its commercial value have disappeared, but many evils will have taken the place of the asset we now have. It is largely a matter of protection. I have watched forests grow, and all they want is a chance to grow. I was greatly surprised a few years ago, when I went back to that part of the maritime provinces where I was brought up, to find that what was in those early days cultivated fields is now a forest of trees with some twenty-five to thirty feet of growth.

The leader of the opposition has referred to Sweden. I had an opportunity to visit Sweden and Norway this summer, and one of the things that surprised me, after seeing the desolation caused by forest fires in British Columbia, was to find no such areas at all in Sweden or Norway. If they have any such areas, I did not see them. I was told by people there that despite the extensive use they have made of their forests, cutting the timber for use at home and for export for over a hundred years, the forests of Sweden are greater to-day than they were a hundred years ago. To my mind that should be a lesson to us. Some way will have to be found for cooperation between the federal and provincial governments to preserve what forests we have and to give nature a chance to reproduce so that we may continue to have forests in the future.

I notice that the minister has begun to inform public opinion by radio addresses, and I hope these will continue. Let me repeat, some way will have to be found to get cooperation between the dominion and the provinces in this most essential work that is facing the people of Canada to-day.

Mr. McCANN: May I ask the minister what part of this appropriation is for Petawawa park, and what is the number of employees there? Does the reservation extend across the Ottawa river into the province of Quebec? Is fire prevention a part of the work of the employees?

Mr. CRERAR: The reservation does not extend into the province of Quebec. Fire prevention is one of the subjects under constant study in the forest reserve at Petawawa. It was interesting to me on the first visit I made to one of these stations last summer to observe the methods that are followed in determining the fire hazard; for example, the amount of moisture in the ground under the trees is measured, and as the amount of moisture decreases the fire hazard increases. There are five permanent employees in that station. I believe that during the summer months there is additional temporary help.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How much is the appropriation?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I can give precisely the amount which we have appropriated. A little over $21,000 is down for Petawawa this year.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has said that it is for the most part a matter of protection of forests. I agree with him to a large extent, but on the other hand it must be also a matter of education. For instance, in the province of Quebec we have very rich forest reserves, and the government had for a time the idea of establishing settlers on lots which previously were very rich in trees, but the lumbermen used to cut all the wood before the settlers could reach those lots, and there was no proper division between farm lands and forest reserves. It was a great mistake, the result being that very often settlers were established on lots on which there was no timber; they could not find enough wood on their own lots to build their houses and do a little profitable trade in the wintertime. The most essential thing for sound settlement on new lots is that they should be covered with timber; then the timber can be cut by the settler and provide him with some income during the winter. At present the wood is cut mostly by lumber companies; nothing is left for the settlers and they have to rely upon direct relief for what is, at times, a very poor living. If there could be an arrangement of some kind between the dominion government and the provinces by virtue of which the settlers would be established on well-timbered lots, neither the federal government nor the provincial governments would have to pay anything for relief of settlers. At the present time the condition of the settlers is awful; most of them have been taken from the cities and placed on rocky soil in the forests, far away from civilization, and as a consequence both governments have to provide direct relief. It is an absurd situation, and I hope that some of the money included in this item will be applied to education, including education of the provincial governments, so that they may realize the value of the timber to settlers, and that our forest reserves shall not be destroyed by eager lumber merchants.

Mr. BARBER: I think it is recognized that fire is one of the most destructive elements in our forests, particularly in British Columbia. Will the minister inform us whether his department cooperates in any way with the provincial governments in fire protection? Does it make a grant or use any of this money for protective purposes? I suppose that when the lands were handed over to the provinces, the care of the timber became their sole obligation, but I should like to know whether there remains anything in the way of cooperation with the provinces for the prevention of fires.

Mr. CRERAR: No. Fire protection in British Columbia and other provinces is a matter for the provinces themselves. We place at their disposal all such data and information as we gather, for instance, in our forest experimental work at the stations to which I referred a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: And we make a small grant to the forestry association.

Mr. CRERAR: As the leader of the opposition has stated, we make a grant to the forestry association. The federal responsibility as discharged under this vote is confined to experimental work in these stations and in the laboratories and to the dissemination of information to the public in every reasonable way that we can reach them, concerning the importance of conservation, the need of guarding against fire, and similar matters. It is now fairly well ascertained that a great many forest fires originate through carelessness. Excepting those which are started by lightning, all other causes of fire can be prevented. It may mean a long journey to accomplish this, but we have steadily to work on public opinion to give our people a realization of the importance of exercising ordinary care to guard against fires in our forests.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the department carrying on any experimental work in connection with selective logging? I understand that selective logging is the system followed in Europe, and that thereby they have succeeded to a very large extent in preserving their forests. I do not know of any such work being carried on in British Columbia. In Oregon, in the county of Malheur, east of the coast range, they are carrying on selective logging on very considerable tracts of land and handling the work successfully. By that system they take out what is ripe and ready to cut and preserve sufficient young trees to grow a new crop in a short time. With the high lead system of logging practised in the large timber areas of British Columbia, they break down the trees that are of no use to them, with the result that under the present system very few trees escape. Selective logging consists in taking trees that are old enough and fit to cut, and leaving the others in the forest to grow. Are any experiments along that line being carried out?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the department is carrying on certain investigational work in connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie). The information, which by practical illustration indicates the importance of such methods, is made available in as widespread a fashion as possible. I am certain that among many of the large companies operating in eastern Canada there is a fairly clear realization of the importance of the very point raised by the hon. member. After all, it is simply a sensible way of harvesting a crop so as not to destroy what will be the crop of the future. I can only reiterate that, after all, it is through the impact made on public opinion by the dissemination of knowledge and the application of that knowledge in a practical way on the widest possible scale, as is now being done, that the desired results will be produced.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does the minister not think the time is fast approaching when we should take up this matter in a large way and carry on a campaign of instruction in the areas where forests still remain, with a view of conserving our timber much better than it is being conserved at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion of my hon. friend is probably a very good one, but when I come to ask for an increased vote to spread this work even further we have to take into account various factors. There are many demands on the public treasury. All I can say is that I think we are getting very good value for the money expended under this vote. Personally I should like to see it larger, I hope that in a few years we may be in a position to increase it, and extend the useful work which can be done in that way. Meantime we shall do the best we can with the money at our disposal.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I want to add my voice to those of others who have urged the minister to do all he possibly can to encourage people to respect their forests, and if he can shout loud enough to be heard in British Columbia it will do a great deal of good to Canada. People say that public opinion will preserve our forests. I am afraid that when the lumberman comes to a tree one thousand years old, he thinks very little about public opinion and a lot about his personal profit. They cut down these trees with high rigging and destroy whole forests as they move along, and nothing but a determined effort on the part of the dominion and the province together will set matters right in British Columbia, for that province is fast being denuded of its forests. Students of tree life tell us that the famous fir trees one thousand and more years old will not grow again in British Columbia. The abies amabilis nobilis, as I think it is called, is a tree that belongs to the past, and once cut down has no life to carry on. It is replaced by other and lighter growths, so that if we are to have some of these fine old trees preserved for those who come after us, we must educate now and educate definitely to protect our forest life. I sincerely hope the minister will do all he possibly can to see that British Columbia, of all provinces, knows more about this work.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to say just a few words more, without intruding my views too much on the attention of the committee. I visited the forest of western Australia because I had heard that they were taking extreme care of that great and valuable resource. I found that foresters selected with great care the trees to be cut down and marked them, and then provision was made for planting new trees. That is the jarrah tree and the karri tree. It is true that the governments own the forests, and carry on the operation of or own the mills. In Queensland they own their forests as well, and instead of permitting them to be leased for long terms they provide that a sawmill is licensed to cut so many feet per annum, and that a competing sawmill is not placed there because no more may be cut than the quantity which they allot for that particular place. I suspect that it would be very difficult to get provincial administration in this country to look at matters in that way. One of the difficulties Canada suffers from to-day is that we have built too many pulp-mills for the purpose of meeting the market requirements of the great republic to the south; the result is that the governments of Ontario and Quebec have competed with one another in requiring the construction of pulp and paper mills as a condition attached to the leases of land, and the competition has become so fierce because of overproduction, owing to the number of mills and the limited consumption, that Canadians have been exchanging an old dollar for a new one without any corresponding return for the tremendous losses sustained by the denuding of the forest lands. I said a moment ago that five million acres of land were denuded of trees to provide for the export of newsprint from this country last year.

I think the minister has perhaps gone a little too far in connection with the laboratory. The laboratory at Montreal is operated in a building which was constructed by the pulp and paper association on the university lands, and the late Mrs. Eddy left $200,000 for the establishment of the E. B. Eddy chair in connection with that organization. Professor Hibbert, who came from Yale and organized that staff, is responsible for the experiments carried on. There is no difficulty about the utilization of our wood; that difficulty, I think, we have mastered; our trouble is the preservation of our wood. It is true we are able to improve the quality of our pulp and the production of our papers, but is it not an odd commentary—to anticipate something which may be discussed later—that we are actually paying a drawback on paper imported—

Mr. KINLEY: Of the duty.

Mr. BENNETT: Just so—on paper imported here for the purpose of printing Canadian magazines? The budget provides for a 75 per cent drawback of the duty to be paid on paper, probably made from Canadian products, imported from the United States for the publishing of papers in Canada. That is an illustration, the most outstanding evidence of our failure to measure up to the necessities of the situation as our competing friends to the south have done. I confess I have never been quite able to understand this.

That laboratory deals with utilization, not preservation. Conservation is admirable, but let me go a step further. At Canberra one of the first things they did when they established their capital was to set up a school of forestry. With Mr. Lane Poole I spent as interesting an hour as any I spent while away, looking over an exhibit of the woods of the world, and I found there as fine an exhibit of Canadian woods as could be found anywhere in Canada. But what struck me is the point referred to a moment ago by one hon. member, namely the question of destruction of wood by insects. I was amazed to find the extent to which that problem is being dealt with; the illustrations of it from every part of the world were striking. For instance, in one part of Australia wooden sleepers or railroad ties are impossible because they would be eaten at once by the white ants. In northern Rhodesia they use teak. As soon as the tie is cut is it immersed in a strong bath of insecticide; after it has been boiled in this arsenic solution it is put into boiling tar, and in this way it is made impervious to either the action of the weather or insects. In other places they use steel ties entirely. But when one thinks of that magnificent teakwood being used for that purpose, one has some difficulty in believing that conservation is being carried to the extent it might be.

As to fire, I was astonished at the amount spent in protecting forests from being burnt, and the extent of the precautions taken. They have forest rangers everywhere, telephone communication linking them together; many of our people in Canada are doing much the same sort of work. The minister referred to fires started by lightning, but I am told that, taking the world over, the fires that owe their origin to lightning are probably very few.

Mr. CRERAR: Not very many, but some.

Mr. BENNETT: Careless men, and some- start fires. Measures are certainly taken to guard against sparks from railway engines and guard against sparks from railway engines and that sort of thing. Now could we not do something to take a more advanced position with respect to conservation as distinguished from utilization? In connection with insects and parasites and matters of that sort I think we could give assistance under the constitution, under our broad and general powers in connection with agriculture. But marking trees and carrying on propaganda in that regard would be extremely difficult to accomplish in this country, having regard to the fact, as mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor), that unfortunately people having leases of our forest areas in British Columbia do not in many instances reside in this country; they are absentee lessees, who are now operating leased lands in Canada and shipping the resultant lumber not only to the United States but to various parts of the world. That is a factor which it is beyond our power to consider, except perhaps through an export duty, which we still would have power to impose if we so desired. I remember one gentleman who urged upon me at one time the desirability of considering whether or not the time had come for the regulation of exports from British Columbia in such a way as would prevent the exhaustion of those resources, which exhaustion he believed would occur within the lifetime of his grandchild. That may be an exaggerated view with respect to the matter.

That being so, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister that our only hope of accomplishing anything as a dominion must be through the creation of a sound public opinion. If a campaign such as was suggested by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., were to be carried on, we would have to be sure beforehand that it would not be met with that negative attitude on the part of the province concerned which would make it absolutely useless to make the attempt. That is our real difficulty. For instance, there is the question of the cutting and exporting of pulpwood. Most of our crown leases in the provinces contain a provision that pulpwood cannot be exported, but one has only to read the newspapers to see that in some instances that provision has been relaxed, for many reasons. We had an inquiry into the matter, as I dare say the minister will remember; I have no doubt he was in the house at the time that commission reported. While there is a statute that permits a prohibition to be enforced by order in council, no action has ever been taken to prevent the export of pulpwood, because in practice this has been found to constitute a very desirable market for those who, if it were not for that power of export, would be paid less money than they think they should receive.

Mr. CRERAR: Somewhat less, at any rate.

Mr. BENNETT: The report of the commission was along that line, and the old government—I am not sure whether or not it was in the days of the union government—took power to pass an order in council prohibiting that export. Then there is, for instance, the movement of logs out of this country. I think it will be remembered that during the days of Sir Oliver Mowat certain action was taken in the province of Ontario to lessen that evil as they saw it. I believe some action was taken that lessened the possibility of the movement of these magnificent logs across the sound from British Columbia to the United States and to some, though not to a very great extent, we have endeavoured to limit the movement of logs not only to Japan but also to Australia, in order that in our own country we might have the work of producing the lumber from these logs.

All these are problems that indicate how we might cooperate, the dominion with the provinces, to bring about a result that I think is of the utmost importance. A moment ago the Minister of Finance had something to say about the tree, and I am sure hon. members of this committee have read a great deal about it. Mr. Barker—I think that is the name; it is either Barker or Baker—has written so beautifully about the tree man and the trees of Great Britain as almost to make one feel that they are living things. I know when I see a great tree fall to the ground it always gives me a pang. A tree always seems to be something for which one has a sort of human feeling. Some of the old trees, such as those in the parks around Windsor and the tree beneath which old Lobengula used to sit when he administered justice, recall times so long past and events so important that one almost looks upon them as living things which have taken a vital part in the history of the country itself. Trees have played such a vital part that perhaps as a committee we can do nothing better by this brief discussion than help men and women in all parts of Canada to realize the debt we owe to nature and nature's God for giving us this rich heritage of trees as a trust, not to exhaust within our lifetime but so to utilize that the generations which come after us may have reason to look back with pride upon the fact that we had some sense of obligation and preserved something to them even as the past handed it to us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If next year the minister will ask for a greater allotment of money for this purpose I shall gladly support him, because I feel keenly the need for conserving our forest growth. I know in my own province there are areas that once were covered with trees that are now completely denuded, and frequently those hills are of no value at all at the present time. It seems to me that in many cases we might, in some way or another, gain control of these hilly areas and have them replanted. If we did that, we would be better off both as a dominion and as a province.

There are several matters that have occurred to my mind, which perhaps it would be as well for me to tell the minister about now, because otherwise I might forget. Probably he has thought of all these matters also, but in travelling around the country this summer there were a few things that struck me forcibly. In the first place, in Alberta we suffered great loss because of forest fires which resulted from the extremely dry season. That came to my mind particularly when I saw beautiful areas around the Waterton lakes park and in other districts completely spoiled by fire. Those areas will not be the same again for perhaps one hundred and fifty years. It occurred to me that it might be wise in future for the dominion to take on what I might call an emergency force of wardens who could be transferred from one part of the country to another, so that they might be stationed in that part of the country where there happened to be a drought. I know in Alberta we could have saved great wooded areas of untold value if the fire fighting forces had been perhaps quadrupled just during the two or three weeks or so of extreme dryness. I noticed also, when I went across the line by way of Logan pass, that on the other side of the line they lost very heavily also, so evidently there was no comparative lack of care on our part. It was most pathetic to see these areas; it gave me a pang, as the right hon. leader of the opposition said, to see what had happened to those areas which had been so beautiful just the year before.

Then another matter came to my attention. I heard from one who was intimately connected with the logging business in British Columbia that there are logging concerns which are very destructive in the way they take out trees. One man to whom I was speaking on the subject was a student of forestry at one of the institutions in British Columbia. He told me of one concern that he saw which was destroying six trees for every tree it took out, and this was going on just as quickly as high-powered machinery and organized crews could go through the forest. This gentleman told me that the trees thus destroyed were really more of a loss than the trees cut down, because new trees would grow in place of those cut down but those that were destroyed would stand for many years, unsightly, in the way, simply wasted. I thought notice should be taken of this destruction; it seemed to me that stern measures should be applied, by strategy if need be, to put a stop to that sort of thing, and the words of the hon. member for Nanaimo brought the matter to my mind with even greater force. Something should be done now, before parliament meets again.

I believe the suggestion advanced by the right hon. leader of the opposition would be a good thing. If necessary we might adopt measures that will stop the export of these trees. If we cannot redeem the leases or force these men to sell them back to us in order to preserve these priceless treasures that have been left to us as a heritage which I think we should pass on, we might very well consider taking that step. When I was a university student in Edmonton there were many wooded areas close to that city. I had come from the plains, and I used to tell the farmers there that they would regret some day the wasteful cutting down of trees. I urged that at least they leave a belt eight feet wide along the fence lines, so that they would have wind breaks in time of need. They paid no attention in 1909 or 1910, but surely to-day those farmers are suffering from the very condition I told them about. They denuded the country. During the four years I attended the university there was only one wind high enough to blow off a person's hat, but to-day if one goes to Edmonton he will find drifting snow and soil blown about almost as would happen in the south. They were unwise to cut down so many of the trees.

It used to occur to me that the government would have been well advised in those days to have preserved one-quarter out of every section, and to have refrained from throwing it open for settlement. That ground could have been kept as a kind of permanent reserve, would have served as a home for birds, helped to conserve the soil and to conserve animal life, and would have prevented the denudation of the country to a point where high winds are possible. If the minister has not already taken such precaution, I would suggest it would be well to cooperate with the other departments and see whether or not something like that could be done, so that the great areas which are being opened in some sections may have that protection.

Another point which has occurred to me is this: Areas which once were park lands are being returned to the government because, as we say, the people cannot make good. Perhaps frost or some other factor is preventing them. As the land goes back to the government for taxes, it seems to me that a sort of planned economy would lead the federal government in conjunction with the provincial governments to take steps to take over a quarter of every section, have it replanted and held for the future. Even where the land is not coming back to the government, it might be wise to buy a quarter. There are quarters which are not much good for farming. North of Edmonton I found areas where trees had been cut down, which areas have been shown to be entirely worthless for farming purposes. After cutting the trees down they found there was sand, much the same as is found in some parts of Quebec, with a thin layer of good soil over the top of it. The good soil was quickly exhausted, and all that remains is worthless. The lands could have been redeemed or reconditioned by the provincial or federal governments.

Last year I was invited to go to Shawinigan Falls, where I saw something which greatly impressed me. I am told that the Shawinigan power people are presenting the town each year with a piece of land which has been denuded of trees, but which has been replanted with young trees. It was one of the most pleasant sights I had ever seen to drive out from Shawinigan Falls to see slopes, which had been denuded and would have been unsightly, beautifully planted with trees growing for the delight and profit of the future. Probably we could encourage other companies to do likewise.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

One further point I believe has not been mentioned to the minister. I am wondering whether it would be a good thing for him to go into Banff national park and examine closely the situation with respect to beavers. I believe it is known to hon. members that in some parts of the west beavers have increased to such an extent that they are attacking fine trees and destroying them. We value the beaver, but I fancy a good colony of beaver would be worth less than the plot of trees they would destroy. The matter was brought to my attention quite forcibly by men whose names I should not mention. I thought it would be well to draw the situation to the attention of the minister.

Once again may I express my great satisfaction that the minister is making an effort to conserve our forests. May I state that I am in agreement with hon. members who have expressed enthusiasm for the conservation of our forests, and I would urge that the movement be pressed forward with the greatest of energy so that in future we may preserve and possibly increase our forest wealth.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, for the last half hour the discussion this evening has been interesting, but I should like to advise the minister not to take too seriously much of what has been said. After all, trees are like any other crop. If they are not harvested when they are mature they go to waste, as will any other growth. Not only do they go to waste themselves, but after becoming rotten at the core some of them are blown down by the winds and, in falling, they take other trees with them. The result is that often fire may break out and destroy a whole forest. If trees are not used, except for scenic and beauty purposes, not only will they deteriorate but they will clutter up the land and prevent other trees from growing.

I believe we should encourage the growth of further supplies of trees when those which are now mature are harvested but there is a good deal of sentimentality when we talk about trees, and sometimes the question is not thoroughly understood. A little while ago an hon. member complained that pulpwood had been shipped out of the country. When pulpwood was being shipped out of Canada the men handling it were making a comfortable living. During the past five or six years, when there was no pulpwood going out of Canada and no sale for it, the men who were formerly handling it were taking out firewood and in some cases selling it as low as eighty cents a cord, in order to make a bare living. They were selling firewood at that price where formerly they had been able to get $5 or $8 a cord for pulpwood, depending upon where it was shipped. A Canadian mill would pay $5, whereas an American mill buying pulpwood from patented lands would pay $8 for the same quality.

I do not think this country has any moral right, as indeed it has no legal right, to the ownership of pulpwood. I suppose it has the legal right to restrict export, but I think it has no more moral right to restrict the export of pulpwood by those who own it than to prohibit the export of cattle or hogs or grain or any manufactured goods produced in Canada.

There is something which can be done under the vote, and I am satisfied the minister and his department are doing good work along this line. I believe it was the leader of the opposition who spoke about the laboratory at Montreal, and what it has done. But it seemed to me he appeared to be of opinion that the laboratory had pretty well served its purpose, and that we knew pretty well now how to utilize our forest wealth. There is one part of our forest wealth we do not understand adequately, and that is the question of jack pine in pulpwood, to be mixed with spruce. I know there is a constantly increasing percentage of jack pine, and I would not go so far as to say there are not other woods being added to spruce. If we can devise a formula, or if a scientist at the laboratory in Montreal or elsewhere can devise one whereby a constantly increasing percentage of jack pine, poplar and other woods could be used with spruce, it would be worth all the laboratory costs for maintenance. I appreciate the fact that the department and the minister are interested in this particular matter.

After all that has been said about the exhaustion of the spruce tree, we are finding that it is not correct. Ten years ago there was quite a campaign to secure the prohibition of export of pulpwood from Canada. We have more spruce to-day suitable for pulp-making than we had at that time, because we have not been using spruce much for a number of years. We are oversupplied. At the present time our exports of forest products have greatly increased and, if my memory serves me correctly, are above the previous high record. It is true prices are not as high as we would like to have them; nevertheless the forest is providing a living for a great many workers, and it is helping as much as any other branch of industry to bring Canada back to prosperity. Another reason why there is more spruce or pulpwood is that it has been growing very fast.

An hon. member on this side of the chamber said a little while ago that he did not like to listen to western members talking on behalf of the maritime provinces. I do not want to do that, but I think it is within the memory of many of us here that a noted timber conservationist from the maritime provinces was in the habit of advertising the fact that down there a spruce tree would grow about an inch or an inch and a half in width per year provided conditions were favourable. I know that trees do grow extremely fast down there, but it must not be forgotten that even in the interior, where the winters are longer and the summers shorter and rainfall less—these are the factors that govern the growth of trees—the growth is quite rapid provided fire is kept out of the forests. If we can do that, they will grow fast enough.

I think it was the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who advocated the reforestation of lands which had come back into public ownership. That would be fine provided these lands had been covered with timber at one time, but if an attempt is made at the reforestation of prairie lands which were never meant to support timber, then the effort will be only a waste of time and money. An hon. member stated a little while ago that he was amazed at the destruction of trees in the district around Edmonton and he wondered why the farmers could not have left a strip of trees around their land. Apparently he was under a misapprehension or was not thoroughly familiar with the situation. These trees were probably matured and if they were not cut down or utilized in some other way, they would only blow down. Just as soon as you start in clearing the land, that is what is going to happen. Trees that grow in the middle of a forest have not the long tap roots to anchor them as have trees growing more thinly, and unless they are cut down, and marketed if a market is available, they are simply wasted.

There is another phase to this question. There are dirt highways in the rural parts of western Canada, and even in eastern Canada, alongside of which are many trees. These trees prevent the roads from drying up after a rain and in many cases automobiles and other vehicles are stuck in the mud. These trees serve no useful purpose. Someone else advocated a system of marking trees. I have never been a lumberman, but from my many years of observation I am sure that you will get nothing but grief if you suggest to the lumbermen that a young fellow just out of school should go in and mark the trees which they should cut. He is going to tell such a man to learn his business. It is true that we must have regulations, and we must enforce them, but that is not the way to do it. The question of insect pests is very important. I hope the minister will be able to secure sufficient parasites to combat this menace which is endangering the spruce and other trees of this country.

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) and his statement that trees should be considered as a crop. My experience in New Brunswick has been that three or four crops will be harvested in a year if the lumbermen are not watched. I think the efforts made by this government and the provincial government to preserve our forests have been fairly successful. Our history in New Brunswick shows that at one time our great forests were completely depleted. If it were not for the efforts of the governments of the last few years, we would not have the great source of revenue we now have in our forests. It is not my intention to make a speech on forest conservation, but I should like to ask the minister how much of this vote is being set aside for the development of the area of twenty-eight square miles in New Brunswick to which he referred? I know this area was being developed a few years ago as a relief project but it was stopped last year. I was wondering whether the work is still being carried on by the department and I should like to know what stage the development has reached.

Mr. CRERAR: The experimental station buildings are completed. The total amount appropriated out of this vote for this station is $14,463.

Mr. BROOKS: Are the buildings completed which were to be erected in this area?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the building necessary to carry on the work have been practically completed.

Mr. FAIR: Could the minister give us the damage by forest fires in 1936 as compared with 1935??

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry, but I am unable to give my hon. friend that information. It is a pretty large order. We shall probably have it in time, but we do not have it at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be only an estimate.

Mr. KINLEY: Are the forests of Canada being depleted or is the natural growth equal to the cut made each year?

[Mr. M. McLean.]

Mr. CRERAR: That is an almost impossible question to answer, except by way of a very general estimate. I would hesitate even to pass any opinion upon it.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister not think we should know?

Mr. CRERAR: Probably we should know, but that would involve an extensive survey of the forest wealth of Canada. We do know that there are very large areas in which the trees are growing larger all the time and coming to a point where they will be of commercial value. In lumbering and woods operations the wood most readily accessible is the wood that is taken first. I have flown over much of British Columbia and I know there are great forests inland from the coast. It is doubtful whether on the present basis of prices this wood could be made available due to the cost of moving it out. We know that in the northern parts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and in many parts of Alberta and Ontario there are areas where forests are being produced. This process is going on all the time. I am sure that my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), will recall that thirty years ago in the area between Portage la Prairie and Brandon there could hardly be found one conifer tree of any kind. To-day there will be found little clumps of them here and there, and within a period of years that will again be a forest through the natural process of reforestation, if fires are kept out of it. The companies that are cutting timber, whether for saw logs or pulp, are realizing the value of leaving seed trees. One of the difficulties under the old methods of cutting was, as has been described by several hon. members in the discussion to-night, that a whole area would be denuded of trees; but now trees are being left to reforest the area. All this knowledge is being acquired; some of it comes through the various experimental stations which the dominion government carries on under this vote, and other information is obtained concerning the work done in other countries. The important thing is to drive home to the public of Canada the vast importance of sound conservation policies and sound protection in regard to our forest work. The ravages from forest fires, for instance, are being reduced I think each year. Why? Because our people are more careful than they were when they go into the woods. They have learned that lesson; we must teach it to all.

Ravages by insects and parasites are also being studied. Reference has been made to-night to the ravage of the spruce trees in New Brunswick by a parasite called the spruce bud worm, and its ravages have been very considerable in the Gaspé district in Quebec. There has been discovered in Europe a parasite that destroys the spruce bud worm. These parasites have been introduced into Canada and are being propagated by the entomological branch of the Department of Agriculture in a laboratory at Belleville. As they are propagated they are turned loose in these infested forest areas, and they do their work of destroying the spruce bud worm. All these matters are constantly under review and study, and I believe we are making substantial progress, but the important thing, I repeat, is to bring home to public opinion in this country the part which the individual citizen can play in this great work of conservation.

Mr. KINLEY: I think the minister is quite right in what he says in regard to conservation, but I would not like this discussion to be based upon the hypothesis that we are denuding the forests of Canada, if we are not actually doing it. After all, this is a matter of local concern because the provinces have charge of the forests, and in Nova Scotia this has been a vital question for many years. We have found that fire was a great hazard, that careless logging was a great hazard; but cutting is not the greatest hazard in our part of the country.

I was glad to hear the leader of the opposition say that it was advisable for the farmer to have two markets for his pulpwood. For a time in Nova Scotia the export of pulpwood was prohibited by statute except under licence by the attorney general. But the statute was not proclaimed. The export market is the market that protects the farmer who has pulpwood to sell.

I have heard that in Ontario, for instance, the annual cut does not exceed the wastage. If that is true, we should approach this conservation argument along a little different line. If we are denuding the forests of this country, it is a serious matter. If we are denuding our forests, it might be advisable not to ship so much lumber out of this country, and at the present time we are increasing our shipments of lumber. I think the federal government should be able to say when we reach the danger point with regard to the exporting or cutting of timber in Canada, and until we can do that, we cannot talk intelligently about denuding the forests of Canada.

Mr. McCUAIG: I am particularly interested in the question of reforestation because the county of Simcoe from which I come was one of the first counties in Ontario, if not the first, which started reforestation. There we have a large area of land on which formerly grew very fine forest pine. Here the county of Simcoe started a reforestation system, and when Mr. Drury, who was a citizen of our county, became premier of Ontario, he added his weight to the policy of reforestation in our province. There was an example, as has been suggested to-night, of how once you create public opinion in favour of a thing, it spreads throughout the country. If each of the provinces makes an effort to do its part, it will not be necessary for the federal government to do anything except assist in stimulating that public opinion, and continue its work in forest protection studies, and the operation of forest experimental stations.

As I said, in our county we have a large reforestation area, and now there are several farmers throughout the county who have land that is not fit for cultivation who have gradually been getting small trees from this reforestation plant and planting them themselves, so that to-day as one goes through the county one will see here and there several acres of spruce or pine which has been planted in the last fifteen or twenty years. The planting has gradually grown, and if other counties would do the same and have their own reforestation plants, we would soon have a great development along that line. I wish to add my voice, Mr. Chairman, to what has been said in regard to the importance of stimulating public opinion in this matter.

Mr. TOLMIE: May I ask what is the cost per square mile of planting those trees?

Mr. McCUAIG: I could not say offhand, but I can obtain the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TOLMIE: Thank you; I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. McIVOR: I think the Minister of Lands and Forests in Ontario is to be commended for his policy. When a timber limit is let and the contractor starts his work, he is not allowed simply to take the valuable timber out, but he must take all the timber. I think the Minister of Lands and Forests is to be commended for removing the fire hazard by insisting on the cleaning up of the slash and the brush after a man has taken out valuable timber.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Canadian Forestry Association, $1,620.

Mr. MARSHALL: At the close of 1935 an advisory committee on forestry under the National Research Council was set up by the dominion government. Is there any connection between this advisory council and the Canadian Forestry Association?

Mr. CRERAR: No, there is not. This relates to the Canadian Forestry Association, which endeavours to disseminate information as to conservation policies, fire protection and the like, and it is simply a small grant to assist them in that work.

Mr. BARBER: Is the office in Ottawa?

Mr. CRERAR: In Montreal, I believe.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses connected with the national parks of Canada, historic sites, care of indigents in the parks, the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in the parks and the payment of their remuneration, etc., $1,202,270.

Mr. MacNICOL: Part of the item refers to historic sites. Does that include military sites only?

Mr. CRERAR: No; it includes all historic sites.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have in mind what is unquestionably an historic site. Out at Watson's Corners, in the county of Lanark, Ontario, is a very old library site; if my memory serves me correctly, it is the second oldest library site in Ontario. After the settlement of Lanark county in 1820, Lord Dalhousie, who was a patron of the settlement, established at Watson's Corners a library and gave it a great many books. The original library building has disappeared, but many of the old books remain, in an old building within a quarter of a mile of the site of the original library. In my opinion that site should be marked in some way. The foundation remains, but there is nothing to identify it except a rude sign, which people living in the locality have placed there, stating that it is the site of the original library started about 1820 by Lord Dalhousie. If appropriations are made for marking sites, this is one which, on account of its historic connection with the inauguration of libraries and the dissemination of learning in this province, should be marked.

Mr. CRERAR: I might say that the historic sites which are marked are those selected by the historic sites and monuments board, and the department has nothing to do with the matter beyond providing the money to mark such sites as the board selects.

Mr. BENNETT: It may approve it.

Mr. CRERAR: The chairman, I know, is General E. A. Cruikshank of Ottawa, representing eastern Ontario and western Canada; the members are Mr. James H. Coyne, of St. Thomas, Ontario; Mr. Benjamin Sulte, of Ottawa, representing Quebec and western Canada; Archdeacon W. O. Raymond, Mr. W. C. Milner, of Halifax; and Judge Howay, that was the board some time ago; it has been reconstituted.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of those gentlemen are dead.

Mr. CRERAR: I regret I have inadvertently given some of the names of the original board.

Mr. MacNICOL: No wonder this site has not been marked.

Mr. CRERAR: The present board is composed of: General Cruikshank, chairman; Judge Howay, representing western Canada; Doctor Webster, representing New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; Professor Harvey, representing Nova Scotia; Professor Landon, representing western Ontario and Quebec; the Hon. E. F. Surveyer, representing the province of Quebec. These gentlemen form the historic sites and monuments board. I suggest to the hon. member for Davenport that he could quite properly place before them the merits of the site to which he has referred.

Mr. MacNICOL: The late Senator Andrew Haydon, in his book, the Settlement of Bathurst, refers to it. Some of my own ancestral family settled around there about the year 1820, and some of them were on the library board shortly after that time. Does the department make a contribution to the marking of sites of that kind, and, if so, could it not write to the historic sites board suggesting that this site be so marked?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no objection to bringing to the notice of the board the remarks of the hon. member. But the selection of the site in each case rests with the board, and then the government provides the money to have the site properly marked.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall send particulars to the minister.

Mr. DAMUDE: With reference to this board, is it necessary for historical associations throughout the country—I am thinking of the Niagara peninsula in particular—to make representations to the board in order to have money expended in their areas, or does the minister appropriate this money to different sections of, for instance, the province of Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member could have representations made direct to the board, or he could have them made to the department, which would pass them on to the board for their consideration and recommendation.

Mr. McCUAIG: Approximately what portion of the amount comprised in this item is set aside for the purpose of historic sites?

Mr. CRERAR: Thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. McCUAIG: Are any of these historic sites owned outright by the government, or is assistance just given in respect to them from year to year?

Mr. CRERAR: I should say they are all owned by the government. Sometimes the site is indicated by a cairn, sometimes by a monument; the memorial may take various forms, recommended by the board, but the ownership, so far as there is ownership, is vested in the crown. There may be exceptions where a plaque or plate may be put upon a building; I have observed some myself, but the ordinary monument marking historical sites is the common property of the people.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister received, say within the last six months, any requests from British Columbia to take over any portions of ground as parks, and, if so, which or where?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no recollection of having received such a request from the province, nor have my officers.

Mr. STEWART: This item shows an increase of $114,982. Would the minister explain how this increase arises? Is it through the establishment of new parks, or more intensive development of existing parks, or partly one and partly the other? How does it arise?

Mr. CRERAR: Hon. members who were here a year ago will recall that in the special supplementary estimates we had an appropriation for the establishment of parks in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. This increase is due to the vote being placed in the main estimates this year for those two parks.

Mr. BROOKS: Last year when parks were being discussed the minister in reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said that it was the intention of the department to have a resurvey of the sites in New Brunswick this year. He went on to say: "I hope to be able to come to parliament at the next session and make a definite recommendation as to a site in New Brunswick, and ask parliament for a vote to initiate the creation of a park in that province." I would ask the minister if there is to be a resurvey of areas in New Brunswick, and what the situation is at the present time with reference to the establishment of a park there. The people of New Brunswick are, I think, getting tired of the delay. They hardly know where to place the blame, whether on the federal department or on the local government. Last year the premier of the province I think rather intimated that the delay was due to the federal department. These parks, I understand, are of great value for tourists. We are spending millions in the province for the construction of hard-surfaced roads, and the people of that province would like to see some start made on this national park, in order that we may be able to take advantage of the tourist traffic which is rapidly increasing, and I am sure will increase still more if a park is established somewhere in New Brunswick.

Mr. CRERAR: An examination was made by park officials of several sites in the province of New Brunswick during the past summer and autumn, and they gave a great deal of time and care to the matter. Those sites are at present under consideration by the provincial government. As my hon. friend is doubtless aware, the provincial government in each case has to supply the area which is finally settled upon as the park. Once the site is conveyed free of charge to the federal authorities, the responsibility is on the federal government to develop it. In connection with Cape Breton, for instance, I shall have some legislation before the house a little later making some changes in the boundary of that park. The provincial government found that it was going to cost a good deal to repossess some of the land which the Nova Scotia government had intended to convey to us. In the older settled provinces that is a problem. If the provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick set aside a considerable area as a park, they have to give us a clear title to that area.

Mr. BENNETT: The boundaries were defined in the statute last year.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; that is why I have to come back this session and ask for some changes in the definition of the boundaries. I have no doubt the New Brunswick government is examining the whole question carefully because the matter of cost is involved. There are several factors; there is cost and the suitability of the site for park purposes. As I said, the park officials have made a thorough survey of and an inquiry into the matter in New Brunswick. Half a dozen sites were suggested, but it really narrows down to three or four and they are now under consideration by the government of New Brunswick. Probably they will come back and say: We prefer you to take this site because we can secure title at less cost than for another site. Then it becomes a matter of negotiation between the two governments.

We cannot determine the site of the park, because the province has to deliver the area to us with a clear title.

Mr. BARRY: I should like the minister to tell us why the national park in New Brunswick should be in the seat of the hon. member for Royal, the only Tory seat in the maritime provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: I indicated to the minister last year how strong I thought the claims of New Brunswick were to a park. There is a park in Nova Scotia and one in Prince Edward Island, which is a very small area. As most tourists to get to Nova Scotia, that is, those who do not go there by sea, have to pass through New Brunswick, and having regard to the fact that I was born in New Brunswick, the minister would naturally desire to place a park there. There is the further consideration that we were so poor during the time we were in office that we could not afford to start a park in New Brunswick. Had we been able to do so we should have done it, to be perfectly frank—

Mr. KINLEY: Call it Bennett park.

Mr. BENNETT: I had not thought of that. If the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) were here, he would say that I have done enough harm to this country without having a park named after me. But it seems to me the time has come when a park should be established in New Brunswick. In view of the establishment of a park in Cape Breton and one on Prince Edward Island, putting this off will only make the difficulty greater. I think the minister knows from experience that that is so. As I understand the matter, however, the government here must determine which of several sites they will accept, if several are offered by the provincial government, which may say: We are prepared to supply title for a park at either so-and-so or so-and-so, and then this government must say whether it will accept that site for a park. For instance, in Nova Scotia they offered a site in Cape Breton and the federal government accepted it. Prince Edward Island, not to be outdone by Nova Scotia, provided a small area, and the government accepted it. In New Brunswick there are three areas that I know were discussed; one is in one of the old counties—it is not a Tory county either, which is very much to be regretted in the interests of the nation as a whole and of my hon. friend in particular—there is one in the county of Charlotte and one in the county of Albert. Another area has also been suggested. If I have some prejudice in favour of the county in which I was born, the minister will understand my feelings. I urge the desirability of some action being taken at an early date, because the longer the matter is allowed to go on the more difficult it is going to be for the minister. Of course I should not be concerned about that, but on the other hand I am interested in the results, and I am sure the member of the cabinet from New Brunswick is also very anxious about that park. He knows it will not go to his constituency or any part related to it; therefore he can afford to see that it goes without delay to one of the other places which have been suggested. I do hope the minister will give the matter his most favourable consideration. I quite understand the point he makes; the cost of acquiring the property must be borne entirely by the province, but the province usually offers alternate sites and asks the dominion to determine which should be selected.

Mr. CRERAR: I may say that if the province is not in a position to do that within the next few weeks, I think I shall probably bring in legislation that the site may be determined by proclamation.

Mr. BENNETT: Not by order in council, surely.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes; under the exceptional circumstances of the case, in order to give this park to the province of New Brunswick, and to meet the wishes of my right hon. friend, I am quite willing to recommend that the site may be selected by order in council. We also hope to have an appropriation to cover the cost of the survey work so that it may be commenced this year at any rate.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the appropriation be in the supplementary estimates this year?

Mr. CRERAR: I hope we shall be able to find some money for it. All I can say to my hon. friend is that I am going to do my best.

Mr. LEDUC: I note that in the province of Quebec we have not one national park. Could the minister tell me the reason for that?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, really I have no particular reason to give, except perhaps that the province of Quebec in many of its aspects is a great park all through.

Mr. BENNETT: Quebec has the plains of Abraham, which cost us an enormous amount every year.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, there is the national park at the plains of Abraham on which a great deal of money has been spent, but I would ask my hon. friend not to press me for a park in Quebec this year.

Mr. LEDUC: I do not want to press the minister this year, but I should like to know if it is the province of Quebec that has to make the request of the federal government or if it is the federal government that has to suggest to the province that a park should be established.

Mr. CRERAR: The province has to offer the site for the park and deliver it to the federal government free of charge. If the provincial authorities are in a position to do that, then we consider the question of developing the site.

Mr. LEDUC: I suppose during past years the federal government never suggested to any province that it should supply a site for a park?

Mr. CRERAR: No, not during the past year in any case.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): I should like to ask the minister if my understanding is correct, that the increase of $114,000 represents the additional amount that his department intends to expend on the park in Cape Breton this year.

Mr. CRERAR: No; as a matter of fact the amount that will be spent in Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton this year is more than the increase in the vote, as I told the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) who inquired as to the reason for the increase. The vote for the Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island parks is in the main estimates this year, which was not the case last year. The amount to be spent on these two parks is in excess of the increase in the vote.

Mr. FAIR: Could the minister give us the amount allotted to each province under this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: That is rather difficult. I have not the vote segregated by provinces.

Mr. FAIR: Could I have it for each park, then?

Mr. CRERAR: In what parks is my hon. friend interested? Perhaps I can give him the information in that way.

Mr. FAIR: Wainwright buffalo park; Elk island; Jasper and Banff.

Mr. CRERAR: The amounts appropriated for these parks are as follows:

Banff	$243,000
Buffalo park, Wainwright	53,000
Elk island	20,100
Jasper	127,000

Mr. FAIR: Now could the minister give us the revenue from each of those parks last year?

Mr. CRERAR: The revenue from April 1, 1936, to December 31, 1937, was as follows:

Banff	$111,600
Buffalo park, Wainwright	10,288
Elk island	1,317
Jasper	30,925

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, as we have fallen between the two stools, the wise east and the great west, and we have the coal subventions against us also, I was wondering whether the Fort William district should not receive some compensation. There we have a great waterfall with a 190 foot head. It is not as great as Niagara, but it comes next to it. We have petitioned for a park there; it is right on the highway, and we believe it would be a place of beauty and a joy forever for people from the great east to come out and stop at Kakabeka falls. I hope the minister will pause there some time and feel the thrill of its beauty. Kakabeka falls is one of the beauty spots of our country; it is well worthy of a national park, and seeing that the coal subventions are not helping us out I hope this suggestion will receive consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask the minister whether this item includes expenditures on roads in the parks?

Mr. CRERAR: That would more properly come under the vote for surveys and engineering, I should think, or under any of those items on the next page. The engineering costs come under the next vote.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as it is another vote, it is all right.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask the minister another question: I see there is provision for the appointment of stipendiary magistrates. At Banff there was a magistrate serving without pay, but he was replaced by a gentleman who is able to get a salary. Why is it necessary to do that?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Maybe he was worth more.

Mr. BENNETT: It can hardly be said that is so.

Mr. CRERAR: The present magistrate is also making special investigation into relief cases. He is endeavouring to tighten up a little bit on the relief administration in the parks. Those who are applying for relief work have to make good their case before a board on which the magistrate serves.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the magistrate there now?

Mr. CRERAR: A gentleman named Mr. Hunter.

Mr. BENNETT: He would not serve without salary at one time, and was replaced by a gentleman who did serve without salary —Mr. Wilson I think was the name—but now Mr. Hunter is serving and getting a salary. How much is he being paid for tightening up relief?

Mr. CRERAR: He gets $75 a month, but tightening up on relief is only a part of his duties.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister had any representations from British Columbia asking that Garibaldi park, a splendid mountain area in the coast range north of Vancouver, be taken over by the national parks system? It is my understanding that this matter has been placed before the department by many bodies, and I should like to know if it has been considered.

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion that the federal government take over the administration of Garibaldi park has been made to the department, but so far no action has been taken. Possibly when we complete some of the rather expensive work in connection with the development of existing parks, we might consider Garibaldi, but I have a shrewd suspicion that a great deal of money would be required to complete the roads to the top of Garibaldi park, and it would be much easier to resist the pressure to spend money on a road when the park is not under the control of the dominion.

Mr. GREEN: It would be a great attraction to United States tourists who come up the Pacific highway by the thousands. It is just possible it might be a paying proposition —I think probably it would. Has the matter been considered by the department?

Mr. CRERAR: It has been considered only in a general way. I do not question what the hon. member has said. As a matter of fact last October I flew over Garibaldi park, and I must say that from the standpoint of scenic grandeur it certainly is magnificent. After all, however, we must carry on the work of the department according to the means we have at our disposal. I have no doubt that in due time Garibaldi park may be considered, but I would ask the hon. member not to press it too closely at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: I believe the parks branch is losing a great amount of revenue due to the fact that the Big Bend highway is not yet completed. I am quite sure that when it is completed American tourists will come up to Vancouver, and from there go through to Banff. I should like to know the present position with regard to the uncompleted portion of the Big Ben highway which, as the minister is aware, is the only uncompleted portion of the trans-Canada highway in western Canada, and for that reason also is very important.

Mr. CRERAR: That matter will be discussed under another vote. I may say, however, that there is an appropriation—I have forgotten just how much—to carry on the work on that section of the trans-Canada highway. It is scarcely necessary to remind the hon. member that the federal government is building that section of the highway to relieve the province of British Columbia of expenditures in connection with it. That was done because road building in British Columbia is a costly affair, owing to the rugged nature of the country. Possibly after that road is completed and we complete some other work, we might be in a position to consider claims with respect to Garibaldi park.

Mr. GREEN: When will the Big Bend link be completed?

Mr. CRERAR: 1939, I think.

Mr. GREEN: How many miles are there?

Mr. CRERAR: There is work to be done between Golden and Donald this year. The road from Donald to the Canoe river, including a bridge across the Canoe river, is practically completed. A substantial part of the road between the Canoe river and Revelstoke is completed, and balance of the work will be under way this year. There is some work to be done between Golden and Donald.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister know how many miles?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot give that information at the moment, but I shall have it when the vote is before the committee.

Mr. BARRY: Will the minister indicate how much of the vote is to be spent in each of the provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry we have not the vote set up in a manner which will give that information readily. If I had a lightning calculator here, I could do it.

Mr. BARRY: Can the minister procure it?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; we can procure almost anything.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a rather doubtful statement.

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. gentleman will ask me the question when another estimate is before the committee, I shall have the information for him.

Mr. HILL: From information published in the press of New Brunswick last year it would appear that six sites in that province have been discovered, and of those six sites that at Lepreau in Charlotte county measured up about twenty-five per cent more effective for park purposes than did any other site. I have been over all the sites, and I believe I can speak with authority in stating that the one at Lepreau lends itself to the development of a national park to a greater extent than any other in New Brunswick. In view of the favourable report of the inspector, why was it not selected?

Mr. CRERAR: I have endeavoured to indicate that the matter of selection does not lie alone with this government. One condition in the establishment of a park is that the park area must be conveyed with a clear title by the provincial government, and when it comes to that question I can understand the difficulty with which they must contend. For instance, if much property has to be repossessed there is the matter of settling for it.

Mr. HILL: There is more crown land on this site than on any other in the province.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not familiar with the details, but I am simply pointing out some of the difficulties with which the provincial government will have to deal. That difficulty has arisen in connection with Cape Breton Island park.

Mr. BARRY: Under what vote should I ask the question I asked a little while ago?

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will ask his question on any of the votes for the surveys and engineering branch, I shall be able to give him the information he requires.

Mr. NEILL: Was the request in connection with Garibaldi park, referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), made by the provincial government?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe it was made three years ago.

Mr. NEILL: With all due deference to the hon. member for Vancouver South, I agree with the minister when he says that he thinks the government should go slow in taking over this park because of the fact that it would cost so much money to develop it. The dominion government already have four mountain parks in British Columbia and this would make the fifth. While the officials of the department have not admitted it openly, I believe it is their opinion that they do not want any more mountain parks in British Columbia. What they do want is a seaside park which would provide a variety of entertainment for tourists coming to this country. It would also provide a low elevation resort where the people from the central prairies could come for a necessary holiday. They get upset and debilitated by the high altitude; the women become very nervous, and even the poorest of the tourists have Ford cars in which they could come to this district only four hours from Vancouver. At very small expense they could have a holiday for six weeks, a rest that would be of the utmost value. I do not know what the department has in the east, but it has no seaside park in British Columbia. The area to which I refer is on the Oyster river. This matter has been presented privately if not officially to the department.

To create a national park in this district would cost the department practically nothing. It would not be necessary to build expensive roads as there is already a paved road going right through the district. There are electric lights practically on the premises. There is a wonderful trout stream right at hand and there is something like three miles of the best possible beach. Last year they had a picnic at which 6,000 people attended and the beach was so large that they were hardly noticeable. Back of the beach is a beautiful park-like area where the underbrush has been cut away, leaving only the large trees. A wonderful park right at hand and the only cost to the government would be a couple of thousand dollars to put up tourist cabins and the like. Apart from that, the park would be self-sustaining.

I do not believe this matter has been presented by the provincial government, which shows that they have been lacking in their duty and in keeping their promises. I want this matter to go on record so that the minister will give it serious consideration when it is presented to him. Perhaps it was by certain members of the department who have been retired, but the fact is that the opinion has been expressed to me that the government did not want another mountain park in western Canada, that what they did want was a sea-level park. I do submit that the minister should take notice of this matter against the day when the British Columbia government wakes up and fulfils its promise of offering this park to the government.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, for the past few years I have been endeavouring to bring to the attention of the government the utter absence of national parks in the province of Ontario. With the exception of a few acres on Pelee island, and two or three other little places, there are no national parks in Ontario. This matter was brought to the attention of the government by the late member for Muskoka, Doctor McGibbon. The government, through its various departments, has very heavy investments in land and waterpower sites in the Trent valley, the St. Lawrence valley, the Ottawa valley and on the Muskoka lakes, Georgian bay and lake Simcoe. The late member for York North, Mr. Lennox, also brought this matter to the attention of the government. As I said before, there are a few acres on Pelee island, a few more on the St. Lawrence and in the Ottawa valley, and those are all the national parks we have in Ontario. Ontario has been overlooked absolutely although we pay 40 per cent of the cash taxes of Canada. Every time Ontario wants something, we are always told it comes under another department.

There are a number of beautiful summer resorts along the Trent valley canal which are federal property. If it was any country but Canada, this beautiful acreage of parks and scenery to be found through the Muskoka lakes, on Georgian bay, on lake Simcoe and along the St. Lawrence would be linked up in a general parks' scheme. The Trent canal belongs to the oxcart days. It is used only for a few pleasure boats which can get up as far as Bobcaygeon. All these points should be linked up in a general parks' system. Many of the members of the faculty of the Johns Hopkins university are Canadians and they have their summer homes in Muskoka and these other districts. I have been calling this to the attention of the present minister, as I did to the previous minister, but I cannot make any headway. I think the province of Ontario is entitled to some additional consideration.

In northern Ontario there is a provincial park, known as Algonquin park, and a few other small parks throughout the province, but that is not enough. These other wonderful districts are being allowed to lie wasting and in idleness. Apparently a beautiful countryside means nothing in this country. We could have a modern Switzerland in the Muskoka, Simcoe, Georgian bay and Lake of Bays districts, as can be seen from what has been done at Huntsville. The time has come for us to do something, as the tourist trade is just in its infancy. Two million people came into these Ontario districts last year and we could get four or five million with the winter added if something were done.

The government has a tremendous investment in property and lands in the province of Ontario and its canal systems. There are acres and acres of beautiful countryside; there are many beautiful inland rivers and streams, all of which could be linked up in a really national system of parks such as they have on the continent. All this would prove of great revenue to the government if something were done. Many Americans have beautiful homes in the Muskoka district, and this is just one district in the province.

A bill known as the Borden-Cochrane bill was brought up in 1911 to provide a system of good roads in Canada, but Ontario got little and this matter seems to have been overlooked altogether. These expenditures on good roads would link up our parks' system, as they do across the border. I do not say that the present minister should do it all, but the various departments should be gone over to bring about coordinated effort in that direction. The president of the United States has a large conservation scheme linked up with parks, playgrounds, good roads, and all that kind of thing, and it is providing a great deal of relief work. I am very much surprised to see that there are not in the estimates some votes for relief work in connection with parks in Ontario. The province of Quebec gets $2,750,000, while Ontario gets about nothing, and Ontario will continue to get nothing unless some members from Ontario rise up in their places when the estimates are before the house and ask for something for Ontario in the various departments. I do not ask for anything out of the way at this moment, but I do ask for equality of treatment. Ontario has been overlooked ever since confederation so far as national parks are concerned, while millions are being spent throughout the rest of the country on national parks; yet there is in Ontario land under five or six federal departments of this government lying idle and waste. It is said that the tourist traffic in Ontario next summer will be the greatest we have ever had, and I do ask the minister to be kind enough to look over his own department and have a survey made along the lines I suggest, and as was requested by the late member for Muskoka, Doctor McGibbon.

Mr. CRERAR: I have listened with interest to the observations made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). There are now three national park areas in Ontario. There is Point Pelee park; then in Georgian bay there are thirty islands reserved for a national park; then in the St. Lawrence river there are thirteen islands between Morrisburg and Kingston reserved for a national park. So there are those three national park areas in Ontario.

I appreciate the importance of the observations made by my hon. friend, but I would remind him that the province has to offer the area to the federal government for park purposes, and it must be up to standard requirements for park purposes. Possibly in a few years consideration could be given to his suggestion. I would ask him to bear in mind, however, that they have already in Ontario national park areas in the Georgian bay islands and the islands of the St. Lawrence, which are among the finest scenic spots in Canada, attracting a great many tourists every year.

Mr. CHURCH: I read a return I moved for, brought down in the house along the same line as the minister has now given the committee. I would not give Queen's park in Toronto for one hundred parks like the ones the minister mentions he has now in Ontario. They are worth nothing to the tourist trade and they attract hardly anybody. Here is the province of Ontario contributing 40 per cent of the revenue of Canada, and yet we cannot get a park along the line I have suggested. The minister says he has a few islands for us. Of course, he has a few islands; one is Pelee island, and the others are some small parks and submerged islands that nobody ever visits. The province of Ontario gets nothing. We have no national park system in Ontario at all; we are entitled to something, and I am going to continue to bring this up year after year as long as I am a member of parliament. Little short of an earthquake will wake up this department. It seems to be troubled from the head down with sleeping sickness, and I think a doctor ought to be called in. If a doctor were called in, he would cure this condition. We have in Ontario lake Muskoka, Georgian bay, like Simcoe, the Lake of Bays and other places which for public health are unrivalled, and I think something ought to be done towards creating a national park system in the province of Ontario coordinated with a provincial system and development.

Mr. McCANN: May I ask the hon. gentleman what advantage, if any, there would be in the province of Ontario turning over to the federal government the parks which it has already developed?

Mr. CHURCH: I want a park system like Banff, a national plan.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I inquire from the minister if the federal government makes any contribution whatever to such schemes as the Victoria Park Commission at Niagara Falls?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is there anything in the estimates for historic sites in the Niagara peninsula, such as Fort Erie, Ridgeway and other historic spots all through the peninsula?

Mr. CRERAR: We have an amount in the estimates for historic sites, but whether any of the particular sites my hon. friend has in mind are covered by the item in the estimates, I cannot at the moment say. The commission on historic sites and monuments makes its recommendations to the department, where the historic sites should be marked, and how they should be marked, and we appropriate the money. Whether or not any recommendations are in from the commission covering any of the places my hon. friend has in mind, I cannot at the moment say.

Mr. LOCKHART: I raise the point because along the Niagara frontier the moment you cross the international boundary you are struck with the contrast in the way these historic sites are preserved on the American side. On the Canadian side, at Fort Mississauga and some of these other places, the historic sites are in a most dilapidated condition as compared with the sites on the American side.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that the item which includes provision for historic sites was under discussion this afternoon and it now stands. He will have an opportunity to raise his question when that vote comes up again. Historic sites do not come under this vote.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us some idea of the number of tourists who visited the different national parks last year?

Mr. CRERAR: The total was more than 900,000 visitors, but how they were divided up among the different parks I cannot say. The largest number was at Point Pelee, which must be a centre of very considerable interest. We have not the information at hand as to the number visiting the individual parks.

Mr. GREEN: How does that compare with the year 1935?

Mr. CRERAR: It is up about fifteen per cent.

Mr. WALSH: Following up the question that was asked a short time ago by one of the hon. members from Quebec, may I ask whether I understood the minister correctly that the province must initiate the transaction that would lead to the establishment of a national park within its boundaries?

Mr. CRERAR: That would be one way of getting the thing started.

Mr. WALSH: Has the minister had any correspondence during the past two years with the government of Quebec relative to a park within that province?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no recollection of it during the past fifteen or sixteen months. What happened prior to that I am not in a position to say.

Mr. WALSH: There is no scheme of that kind under consideration by the department at the present time?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no recollection of its having been brought to the notice of the department. There has been no official offer, though there has been an occasional discussion.

Mr. WALSH: I assume that the department would be in a receptive mood if the province took the initiative?

Mr. CRERAR: We should always consider suggestions that came from the province. How receptive the mood would be is a matter on which I can give the hon. member no assurance at this time.

Mr. BARRY: Will the minister inform the committee how much of this money is appropriated to each of the provinces?

Mr. CRERAR: I have under my hand an approximate estimate which was calculated by the director of parks since the hon. member brought up the point a few moments ago: Alberta, about $500,000; British Columbia, $73,000—I am giving round figures—Saskatchewan, $53,000; Manitoba, $55,000; Ontario, $18,000; Nova Scotia, $103,000; Prince Edward Island, $40,000. The larger parks and by far the greater number are in the province of Alberta. That is where the finest mountain scenery in the world is found, and that is where the parks are located.

Mr. CAMERON (Cape Breton): The province in each case must furnish the park. The province of Nova Scotia will have expended close to $1,000,000 to acquire the site of the park there, and I suggest that the department should make a much more generous provision than a little over $100,000 for the current year for the development of that park.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday February 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon the very complete statement he made a few days ago and for the clarity of his exposition of the position of the country with respect to its finances.

I derived some satisfaction from listening to him, for I recall that in his budget speech delivered on May 1, 1930, his only endeavour to make it into a budget speech was to estimate in May what the revenues and expenditures had been during the year ending the previous March 31. I suggested that it was desirable that in this house we should have a real budget speech in the true sense of the term, and on June 1, 1931, I suggested five factors that should be considered in the making of a budget speech. They were: first, that the financial operations of the dominion for the fiscal year should be shown; second, that the balance sheet of the dominion as of the preceding March 31 should be shown, together with assets active and non-active and liabilities direct and indirect; third, that reference should be made to trade and commerce; fourth, that there should be an estimate of the revenue and expenditure for the twelve months ending March 31 following; and fifth, the ways and means which would be adopted for the purpose of providing the necessary revenues to meet the proposed expenditures. It is a matter of some satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, to know that since that date every budget speech has followed that practice. So that I can congratulate the Minister of Finance the more readily in that he adopted suggestions made in 1931.

It does not occur to me that there is any very good reason why we should take any great length of time, considering all the circumstances, in discussing details of revenues and expenditures. There will be ample opportunity in connection with estimates and matters of that sort to discuss questions of expenditures; but presently I shall have something to say with respect to the revenues, and the effect that the raising of them has had upon the capacity of the people to pay.

So far as I can see, the minister was quite right the other day when he said that taxation had been imposed upon the Canadian people to raise a sum nearly as large as, if not larger, than at any time in their history. I can say only this, that it is my firm conviction that any effort to raise from the Canadian people by taxation any substantial sum in excess of $400,000,000 is to put upon them a strain which they cannot bear. I think that is not an unfair statement to make, having regard to our general economic conditions, and the views expressed by economists as to conditions in new countries such as this, and their ability to stand taxation.

In this regard however I should like to revert to just one observation made by the financial critic of the party now in office, when it sat in opposition, with regard to the general raising of taxes. On April 23, 1934, speaking for the then opposition, Mr. Ralston said:

> But if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is looking for the privilege of having it said of him that he imposed taxation in this country surely his ambition is satisfied in the increase of the sales tax from one to six per cent, in the imposition of an excise tax which did not exist when he came into power but which has been put up to three per cent, in the imposition of a two cent tax on sugar, in taking away exemptions from the sales tax, in the reduction of exemptions in the income tax; in these and in every other field of taxation I think my hon. friends opposite will be given full marks and will be held fully responsible when they come to the people of Canada, for having invented and imposed many new and onerous forms of taxation.

I wonder what Mr. Ralston would have said if he had seen the sales tax raised to eight per cent? I wonder what he would have said had he known that this government, which has now brought down two budgets, still retains the same taxation? I wonder what he would have said had he known that hon. members who declared that a three per cent excise tax was another form of protection, as a government in its second budget would still retain that three per cent excise tax? I mention that because it is amazing, if nothing else, to find a government which in opposition so loudly declaimed against the tax on sugar, so loudly declaimed against the increase in the sales tax and the imposition of an excise tax of three per cent, now in its second budget making the declaration that it proposes to make no changes with respect to ways and means for raising the revenue of the country.

With respect to the income tax, charged as we were with increasing it, the minister was frank the other evening in saying that he had increased it slightly. And so all along the line we have the same position.

Now, I was apprehensive, remembering as I did the history of the matter, when the hon. gentleman said he proposed to make no changes with respect to taxation; for I recalled that on the first of May, 1930, standing in the place he now occupies, he reduced the sales tax from two per cent to one per cent, in the face of a deficit in this country, in the face of abnormal conditions, in the face of $24,000,000 less revenue than had been expected in the last six months of 1930, a condition which must have been known; in the face of dwindling trade in every country of the world. Why was it done? Does anyone suggest it was done to balance the budget, when a deficit was known to be inevitable? Was it for any purpose other than merely political, and was it not because of the knowledge that an election was not far off? When I hear that declaration made that we will make no concessions to the taxpayer I wonder if the same idea is in the mind of the minister and the government which pervaded their minds in 1930, and if in due season, when the occasion offers, they will make a great gesture to the people with respect to a reduction of taxation, even as they did in 1930? Those are the facts to which attention I believe might fairly be drawn.

All that may be said with respect to the balance sheet is that we have an increase in the national debt of something less than $100,000,000. If we left out the $8,000,000 to which reference was made as coming from the profits on grain sales, we would have a deficit of approximately $95,000,000. The minister budgeted for a deficit of $100,000,000, and this little windfall of $8,000,000 to which I shall presently refer means that the deficit is $87,000,000 instead of $95,000,000.

I do not propose therefore, Mr. Speaker, to deal at length with the balance sheet items, except to point out that we are increasing by leaps and bounds the responsibilities of the consolidated revenue fund in connection with many funds for which we are really trustees. The minister is not to blame for that. It has been the practice in this country for a generation, if not for more than that, to put into the consolidated revenue fund moneys received for superannuation funds, for annuities, for Indian lands and from the sale of school lands, and they provide working capital for the country, on the theory—

Mr. DUNNING: And the Post Office savings bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and they provide working capital for the country on the theory that whenever called upon we shall be able to repay them. In theory that is unsound. In practice it has been useful. Whether or not having regard to the magnitude of the fund the time has come when we should carefully consider our position I leave it for this house and the future to determine. But I think it only fair to direct attention to the fact, because the sum has assumed very large proportions. I can conceive of a position where it might be difficult to obtain the necessary moneys to meet the demands which might suddenly be made upon the treasury. For instance, with respect to the school fund bonds which we gave some years ago, when the resources were turned over to the provinces, it might have been difficult, if a province had the right to demand that the money be paid, to have paid it readily. It might be difficult, too, with respect to many other matters to which reference might be made.

As to the estimated revenues and expenditures I think it is fair to say that having regard to the forms of taxation to which resort has been had the revenues have shown a buoyancy that was to be anticipated and expected. With respect to the expenditures I shall have something to say presently. But that we had a satisfactory surplus on ordinary account is quite apparent, from looking at the figures, even as the predecessor of the minister had a surplus on ordinary account during his last year of office. The present minister has a much larger one, because he has resorted to other methods of taxation, although the expenditures, as I shall presently point out, are in my judgment out of keeping with the present conditions in Canada.

Then the other question arises, namely the ways and means to be resorted to for the purpose of making good the expenditures contemplated for the next year. I have already pointed out that the minister has declared he has no intention of departing from present taxation, except in some slight items, and that he proposes to maintain the present scale of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, it must be the opinion of most hon. members that the eight per cent sales tax has worked a great hardship upon many people in Canada and that, applied as it is by wholesalers and utilized as it is by the retailer, in the sum total of the price upon which he makes his mark-up, it amounts more nearly to twelve per cent when it reaches the consumer than the eight per cent as enacted by parliament. This is a stupendous tax. As I pointed out last year it is a strain that I do not believe the people of the country can long endure. And when I recall Mr. Ralston's vigorous denunciation of the raising of the sales tax to six per cent I can readily understand why so many complaints are heard from various parts of Canada with regard to the increase to an eight per cent rate. Under normal conditions an eight per cent rate should result in much larger revenues than we are now receiving. I recall Mr. Robb saying that he believed that in normal times in this country every one per cent of sales tax was equivalent to $20,000,000. He spoke of the remission of $20,000,000 of taxation when he reduced the sales tax by one per cent. Having regard to present price levels I do not think under existing conditions the sales tax can be said to be equal to $20,000,000 for every one per cent, but I do believe that under the normal conditions that now prevail in connection with price levels and matters of that kind it is not too much to say it is worth somewhere between $15,000,000 and $17,500,000 for every one per cent. In other words, for every one per cent of sales tax imposed upon the people of this country I think we can expect to realize at least $15,000,000, and perhaps a little more, depending upon the price of goods that are imported. That is a stupendous charge to make upon the Canadian people. I suggest it is a charge which cannot long be borne when, in the hands of the retailer, it is translated into a figure which more nearly approximates twelve per cent than eight per cent.

Closely associated with the raising of revenue is the question of trade and commerce, as has been pointed out by the minister in the speech which he made. Before one deals with that he must realize that the income tax is one of the large sources of our revenue. While the customs tax did not fall last year, it has fallen as being the principal source of Canadian revenue. At one time it was not thought possible that the income tax would yield any such sum as $100,000,000. This tax as imposed against corporations and individuals last year yielded more than that amount. It is difficult to discuss these matters in detail in view of the fact that our figures are for only ten months; however, the estimates of the minister must be taken to be reasonably accurate. I am not objecting to the budget having been brought down at an early date, having regard to the demands made upon the time of the government for other reasons, but it is difficult to discuss these matters as they should be discussed in view of the fact that as to two months we are dealing with estimates and not with realities. I realize the minister had this fact in his mind in making the statements he did, but I am handicapped in what I really want to say with respect to some of these matters.

The income tax collected this year was collected on the incomes of last year. It came to me as somewhat of a surprise that this country had the measure of prosperity that it did have in 1935. Not that I was so greatly surprised in one sense, but I was surprised in view of the statements to which I used to listen from hon. gentlemen opposite. In view of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite when in opposition it seems almost impossible to imagine that this country could have been prosperous enough to produce $100,000,000 from income tax; nevertheless the fact is that the largest sum of money ever realized from the income tax was realized last year.

Mr. DUNNING: The current year.

Mr. BENNETT: The current year, but from the incomes of last year. It is true that there has been an increase in the tax on corporations, but there has been no change in the tax against individuals. The increase in the tax against corporations has not been very large. Corporations whose fiscal year was not the calendar year may have had higher earnings during the latter part of their year than they had in previous years, and this may have accounted for some of the large increase in the income tax. This is a striking illustration of the extent to which a tax which in the early days yielded but a small sum of money has been made to yield a very large amount. Last year I think this was the largest single item of revenue.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the provinces have complained that the income tax is an encroachment upon their jurisdiction. Those who recall the early days of the imposition of this tax will remember that Sir Thomas White in the early part of 1917 declared that he would not impose an income tax because it was something which really was within the powers of the provinces and should be left to them to impose. Later on in the year, before the close of the session, he found it necessary to introduce into this parliament the first income tax, the effect of which was to raise a very substantial sum of money. I can remember that a previous minister on the Liberal side was of the opinion that there might be a division between individual income taxes and corporate income taxes, the provinces to secure one and the dominion the other. I think the view was then expressed that it was desirable that the provinces should secure and collect the taxes on individual incomes, leaving to the federal power the right to recover taxes from corporations. No such division has been made and no such steps have been taken. It is only necessary to point out that the result has been the application of two income taxes in many of the provinces of this dominion. For instance, we have two income taxes in British Columbia, where such has been the case for many years; we now have two in Ontario and in most of the western provinces. But it goes further than that. In reality we have a third income tax because the tax now imposed operates to impose taxation upon the tax itself. The tax itself is included in the taxable income and the levy is made against the whole. Instead of its being double taxation, in reality it is treble taxation.

I suggest to the minister and to this house that the time has come when we must consider this matter. If we are to make this country attractive to new capital; if we are to induce people to invest their money in this country, we shall have to have regard to the fact that taxation is a very important item in the minds of those who are sending their capital to new countries. For instance, I was amazed at the number of people who have gone into Kenya and other districts of South Africa to settle there because the burden of taxation is less than in most other parts of the British Empire. In all new countries great effort is being made to lessen the burden of taxation, not for the benefit of those who are there already, but in order to induce additional people to make their homes there. I received a letter the other day consequent upon a casual observation made by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). He stated that $200,000,000 had been spent in wages in the mining districts of Canada and that about $71,000,000 was all that had been paid in dividends.

Mr. CRERAR: Wages and supplies.

Mr. BENNETT: This gentleman who had been in communication with a western citizen in connection with investments in this country then said, "I am not going to risk my money if it costs that much to make a dollar." It must be known that that factor is ever in the minds of those who are seeking new fields for attractive investments. While it is very unpopular with my hon. friends to my left to suggest that there should be any lessening of the burden of income taxation, you have to choose between two things: on the one hand, the attractiveness of the country for the investment of capital, and, on the other hand, the question of the raising of revenue, or, to use a euphonious term now so current in the United States, soaking the rich. A happy medium is possible. I am certain the minister must have in mind the fact that if we are to develop the great latent resources of this country we can only do it by making Canada as attractive as possible for those who desire to risk their money in its development. Of that I am perfectly certain from my own observation and discussion with those who contemplate making such investments in this country.

I should like to say but a few words with respect to trade, because it is difficult to deal with it in detail in view of the fact that we have an estimate only for the last two months of the fiscal year. There is one point to which I should at once direct attention, and that is that Canada has during the last ten or twelve months marched to a new position in export trade. The League of Nations has supplied us with tentative figures, and from time to time has pointed out that in many instances the final figures are different from the tentative figures; but from the authoritative figures we have now Canada is fifth in export trade for this year, and has been fifth for many years. During the dark days of the depression we lost something of our position, and we were sixth on several occasions; in fact in 1931 we were seventh. This year the minister says we are again in the fifth position, which is the position we occupied last year. The minister says we are fourth. But in so far as official authoritative figures are concerned there has been no change from the position we occupied last year.

With respect to export trade, the answer is so simple that it hardly requires a statement to carry conviction to the minds of those who would know the reason why. From a preliminary statement it appears that France dropped from fourth to fifth place, and we took the fourth instead of the fifth place. The reason for France falling to that position was found in the fact that her gold standard was maintained up until recent months. During the time that she maintained that standard it was obvious that her export trade was falling off; she did lose her position during that period and Canada took her place. But as I pointed out to you, sir, the League of Nations is responsible for these tentative figures, and when the figures for the year are finally compiled we may again be in the position we occupied last year, namely, fifth, with respect to exports, in view of the fact that France's position has entirely changed by reason of the arrangements that have recently been made. I mention that only lest an erroneous impression be left upon the minds of the people of this country with respect to Canada's progress. The truth is there has been great improvement throughout the world.

I shall not refer to the records of the League of Nations with respect to the general improvement throughout the world, although I may read one or two extracts. I was surprised that my friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) in July last made a statement such as this:

> When the present government came into power last fall, steps were immediately taken to remedy the situation and already the dominion has climbed back into sixth position in world trade and the volume of business has advanced month by month.

To say that the dominion had climbed back into a new position in July, 1936, indicates that my hon. friend was not as careful on that occasion as he has been in the administration of his department. That affords me an opportunity to say that speaking of taxation I did venture to ask the Postmaster General if with his bountiful post office revenues he contemplated reducing the postage. That used to be a favorite suggestion from hon. gentlemen on the other side in days long since past, and I thought possibly that with his desire for consistency he might contemplate reducing the postage at the very earliest date, and once more cry "penny post." But I have not seen any signs of it.

With respect to our trade I think it might be well to place these figures upon the record. Since 1932 we have shown a steady increase in our exports to the United Kingdom. In 1932 we had an export trade with the United Kingdom of $178,171,680; in 1933, $258,000,000 odd; 1934, $297,000,000 odd; 1935, $306,000,000 odd; and in 1936, $399,000,000 odd, or nearly $400,000,000. There has been a steady increase therefore in the development of our export trade with the United Kingdom. But I want to point out what I conceive to be an important matter, namely, the steady expansion of our trade with our great sister dominions.

British South Africa in 1932 took from us $4,415,000 worth of goods; in 1933, $5,700,000; 1934, $11,570,000; in 1935, $12,498,000, and last year, 1936, $14,673,000. That is a very remarkable development. That our export business with British South Africa should increase from $4,400,000 in 1932 to $14,673,000 in 1936, is, I submit, a very remarkable record.

If you turn to Australia the figures are even more striking. In 1932 we sold to Australia $7,133,000 worth of goods. Next year it had climbed to $10,208,000 odd; in 1934 it had risen to $16,870,000 odd; in 1935, to some $22,799,000, and in 1936, last year, it had reached the large total of $26,210,712. In other words, Australia had become our third best customer, Belgium being next I think with $23,000,000. That is a very striking and significant record—$26,000,000 worth of export trade to Australia, which has a population of only seven millions. It indicates the extent to which intra-empire trade has developed.

Turning to New Zealand, we sold in 1932 to New Zealand $3,405,667 worth of goods; in 1933, $3,832,688; in 1934, $6,820,707; in 1935, $8,493,347, and last year, 1936, $12,486,-314. I think it will be agreed by all that that is a remarkable expansion of intra-empire business between Canada and Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. I am not unaware of the fact that there is a clamour on the part of these dominions that we should buy more from them. But we could hardly buy from them the things we were ourselves exporting, and they bought from us the goods they did because they could not get goods of similar quality and price elsewhere. That I think is agreed to by all. That is on the export side.

On the import side our purchases from Great Britain have risen from some $93,000,-000 in 1932 to more than $97,000,000 in 1933, $113,000,000 in 1934, $116,000,000 in 1935, and $122,971,264 in 1936.

From British South Africa our imports have not risen to any great extent. In fact, last year we bought from them about only one-half of what we did in 1935. We bought from them in 1932 $4,000,000 worth of goods; in 1933, some $4,500,000; in 1934, $2,800,000; in 1935, $4,700,000 and in 1936 we bought from them only $2,083,101. To some extent that may be explained by the fact that there was almost a complete failure of the Indian corn crop in South Africa, and we having purchased from them in preceding years very large quantities, the result of the crop failure was necessarily reflected in our purchases because then we could not secure our requirements from them. In Australia our purchases were $5,845,000 in 1932, slightly more than $5,000,000 in 1933, $6,330,000 in 1934, $7,395,000 in 1935 and $8,871,119 in 1936. In New Zealand our purchases have certainly increased greatly since 1932. We bought less than a million dollars' worth of goods, namely $855,723 worth, in that year from New Zealand; in the next year $2,013,392; in 1934, $2,936,000; in 1935, $2,-786,000, and last year $4,574,078 worth.

So it may be said that our intra-empire trade has steadily increased, and so has our trade with the world at large because there has been a steady improvement in international trade throughout the world. That is true particularly with respect to the United States. We have increased our exports, we have increased our imports. Hon. members who are here for the first time, if they are interested in studying the development of our trade, will find it useful to look at the figures which indicate the slow and steady lessening of our purchases from Great Britain and the increasing of our purchases from the United States. During all the years since 1870 that process has been going on. Probably it is attributable, not to any desire on the part of Canadians that it should happen, but rather to the proximity of the United States market. Ability to get what is wanted by the use of telephone and telegraph service has made it possible to increase trade with the United States rather than with Great Britain. It is a fact to keep in mind in considering the problem of preferences in connection with British trade.

The summary given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) in a review of the foreign trade of Canada with the United States in 1935 is, I think, a very complete and fair statement of the situation, in fact, it is so complete that I venture to place it upon the record:

> The total trade of Canada with the United States during the calendar year 1935 was valued at $589,926,000, compared with a similar trade in 1932 valued at $432,497,000, in 1933 at $392,545,000, and in 1934 at $521,818,000; the increase in the total trade with the United States in 1935 over 1932 amounting to $157,429,000 or 36·4 per cent, over 1933 to $197,381,000 or 50·3 per cent, and over 1934 to $68,108,000 or 13·1 per cent. Imports from, as well as exports to the United States in 1935 show increases over the years 1932, 1933 and 1934. The imports from the United States in 1935 amounted to $312,416,000, compared with $263,549,000 in 1932, with $217,291,000 in 1933, and with $293,780,000 in 1934; the increase in the imports in 1935 over 1932 amounting to $48,867,000 or 19·0 per cent, over 1933 to $95,125,000 or 43·8 per cent, and over 1934 to $18,636,000 or 6·3 per cent, while the total exports to the United States totalled $277,510,000 in 1935. . . . Domestic exports from Canada to the United States were valued at $265,975,000 in 1935, compared with $162,631,000 in 1932.

The figures given last Thursday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) as to the expansion of trade during the calendar year 1936 with the United States indicate the improved world conditions. I cannot say how much of that may be attributable to the agreement which was made with the United States. I do know that broadly there has been such a development of international trade as has been responsible for improved conditions throughout the world. Perhaps hon. members are familiar with the review prepared by the League of Nations with respect to the general situation of the world at large. It attributes the improved world condition to the fillip given to business by the United States in 1935. If we take the sales to the United States we have in 1936 an increase in exports over those of 1934 of 13·4 per cent—from $358,000,000 to $406,000,000.

Formerly the gold exported from this country was not included in our figures of commodity exports. It will be within the memory of every member of this house that this was not done because in those days gold was dealt with purely as money, whereas it is now dealt with as an export commodity and included in our exports, most of the world, including this country, being off the gold standard. The value of the gold that was shipped from this country in 1935 reached the large sum of $95,000,000. In 1936 the amount was some $70,000,000, but that does not represent the sales of gold in Canada because large quantities are held in trust or shown on deposit for foreign buyers who may utilize that supply as their necessities demand, to meet their requirements from time to time. So that the Bank of Canada and, I venture to say, probably also the Department of Finance, is holding gold that has been sold but does not appear in our figures because it has not been exported.

Mr. DUNNING: But it is paid for.

Mr. BENNETT: It is paid for, of course, but it does not show in the exports of the country because no licence for its export has been issued. Therefore reliance should not be placed on the figure of $71,000,000 as indicating the amount of gold which has been actually sold, as compared with $95,000,000 in 1935, because in point of fact, I believe, the amount sold by this country in 1936 was somewhat larger than in the previous year.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it may be important to read a paragraph or two from The Review of World Trade prepared by the League of Nations, because it indicates what the basis of the improvement in world trade has been:

> The expansion of the foreign trade of the United States in 1935 was probably one of the most important single factors influencing the revival of world trade in that year. The gold value of the total trade of the United States in 1935 was by 14 per cent higher than in 1934, exports increasing by seven per cent in value and imports by as much as 24 per cent. The expansion of trade was particularly marked in the last quarter of 1935, when exports exceeded by 25 per cent and imports by 29 per cent the values recorded in the corresponding period of 1934. The export surplus (general trade) of $235,000,000 which was less than half of that in 1934, was the lowest recorded for the last twenty-five years, with the exception of 1933, when it amounted to $225,000,000.

[Mr. Bennett.]

He proceeds on another page.

> In the face of a rise of 5 per cent in the level of domestic wholesale prices, the price index for import goods remained unchanged, and the increase in the quantum of imports was in the same proportion as that in value. Prices of export goods in 1935 were on the average 3 per cent higher than in 1934, and the quantum of exports thus rose only by 4 per cent. The rise in the prices of export goods was confined to foodstuffs, mainly as a result of the drought in 1934. In consequence, exports of foodstuffs declined in quantum, whereas the quantum of manufactured articles exported rose by about 11 per cent, as shown in the diagram.

The importance of the unfortunate drought in the United States and Canada upon the fortunes of this country cannot be exaggerated. The fact is that the United States bought from us between forty and fifty million bushels of wheat—forty millions at least—and the effect of that upon our general trading position with the United States is, I think, recognized by all who have taken the trouble to look into the matter. The league documents also state:

> The trade agreements concluded with various countries under the reciprocal trade agreements act of June, 1934, did not appreciably influence the aggregate movement of trade in 1935, as most of these agreements (such as those with Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Honduras, the Netherlands, and Switzerland) though negotiated in 1935, did not come into effect before the early part of 1936. It may be of interest to show the trade of the United States with the countries with which such agreements came into force before or during 1935.

Then a short table follows with respect to Cuba, Belgium and Sweden, which I shall not trouble the house by reading.

We have a well defined improvement in general world trade, and it is reflected in the trade of this country as it is in the trade of all countries. It might be well, however, to look at one or two matters which are of some importance with respect to the goods imported into this country, whether dutiable or free. In 1936 we imported into this country from the United Kingdom:

	Value	Duty collected
Under general rates	$ 1,134,817	$ 332,371
Under preferential rates	54,178,146	14,485,614

For 1935 the figures show a very slight change. The total dutiable goods that came in from the United Kingdom in 1935 amounted to $58,836,033 on which we collected duty amounting to $15,389,785, and in 1936 we bought dutiable goods from the United Kingdom amounting to $55,967,230, collecting duty thereon of $14,966,060. Free goods from the United Kingdom in 1935 totalled $52,846,457 and in 1936 $61,907,592.

There was no substantial change in tariffs with Great Britain during those two years. The increased volume of free goods must be attributed to the general development of trade. In fact it will be recalled that during the session of 1935, in the last budget speech of Mr. Rhodes, substantial numbers of commodities were placed upon the free list. They did not seem to be important, yet in the aggregate they amounted to substantial figures. That, then, is the position with respect to dutiable and free goods from the United Kingdom.

From the United States the figures are different. The total dutiable goods in 1935 amounted to $181,157,642, representing $49,624,776 in duty, and in 1936 the figures were $189,838,436, on which duty collected was substantially the same, namely, $49,902,003. The free imports amounted to $129,641,158 in 1936 and $122,482,330 in 1935. The duty collected amounted in all to slightly over $49,000,000 in both years. The difference amounted to less than $300,000. I mention that because it is sometimes important to remember the extent to which free goods are coming into this country. Some of our friends, especially those from western Canada, have the idea that everything that comes into Canada pays a very heavy duty. These figures will help them to realize the extent to which this country is importing goods free. True, of course, the former government did impose a three per cent excise tax, which this government has seen fit to retain, applicable to all classes of goods, whether free or dutiable, except that in respect of Great Britain we took half off one year and half off another year, so that as far as British goods are concerned they are not subject to the excise tax as are goods from the United States and other countries.

This is important because it raises a question that I should like to mention to this house at once. I have frequently been interested in listening to the discussions which take place from time to time regarding what is said to be the payment made by western Canada to Canada as a whole because of tariffs. The figures I have given indicate the extent to which goods come into Canada free. But I should like to go a step further. Foreign trade is regarded by our friends of the government as of the utmost importance. They have from time to time said that without foreign trade this country would find itself in a very difficult position, and they have staked everything on the negotiation of trade agreements with various countries. Now, let us examine the position. The first thing to remember is that our ability to maintain foreign trade depends on our capacity to compete successfully with other countries in the markets of the purchasing countries. The second is that our capacity so to compete depends upon our capacity and ability to produce as cheaply as or cheaper than our competitors. While I am no prophet of evil I desire to point out that from the closest investigation I have been able to make we must face this situation, which confronts us even now. There are nations whose standard of living is entirely different from ours, whose standard of wages is entirely different from ours—not that their wages are low in their countries or that their standard of living is low in their countries, but it is entirely different from ours. Confronted with that fact, we must recognize that the competition Canadian producers must meet is that class and type of competition. We are meeting it now. Great Britain has met it for instance on the east coast of Africa, where she has lost her markets entirely. In other parts of the world that is also true. We must not forget, I submit with all earnestness, the fact that we cannot stake the future of this country upon its export trade alone. To do so means complete and absolute ruin, unless we are prepared to do one of two things, or both, namely, lower the standard of living, or lower the standard of wages. When I say we are confronted with that situation I am not speaking of something that may happen: I am speaking of something that is happening, that has happened, that exists, that has had the effect of driving Great Britain from markets that she controlled and owned as no other country did for years. I know whereof I speak, for I have seen the effect and example of it. You find it in India; you find it on the east coast of Africa, and in other parts of the world.

That raises the other question, and I put it to my friends from the west in particular: the extent to which this market is retained for Canadians by any method that may be devised within reason becomes a primary factor in the prosperity of Canada. That is one of the reasons I am so much interested in the immigration policies of our country. It follows that if we lose our export trade, as we are bound to lose it in part—I say that very seriously—under existing world economic conditions, unless we can increase the number of people whose wants we can supply ourselves, we certainly are confronted with an impossible situation. It is for that reason that I suggest to my friends who are so clamorous with respect to what they say are the tolls paid by the west to the east, that we must try to think in terms of the integrity of Canada. I can see no method by which we can maintain the integrity of Canada if we neglect to realize that export trade is challenged and will be challenged more in the next few years than it ever has been before, because we shall have to meet an ever-increasing competition of wages and standards of living which do not prevail and I trust never will prevail in this country. That is the position which I put to the house at the moment, and it is one that I regard as of tremendous importance.

There are other matters that will come up during the progress of the discussion on the resolutions, and I shall not labour the point longer. But I should like to impress upon my fellow members, as far as it is possible for me to do so, the fact that we are confronted with an actuality and not with a visionary position. Some of us do not always approve of the fiscal policies or the economic set-up of other countries, but I know that in parts of the king's dominions they realize the truth of the statement I have just made. They are putting forth ever-increasing efforts to ensure to their people every possible security from the standpoint of labour by utilizing all the machinery of government to provide for themselves to the extent of their ability. That may be economic nationalism; it may be anything you are pleased to call it, but if we take it that governments are responsible for the welfare and happiness of the people I think it is clear that unless governments can supply the people with work there can be no happiness and no ultimate prosperity. The reason the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has dwelt so much upon the question of work; the reason he has visited these factories and looked into the actual conditions that prevail in order to see at first hand the conditions that exist, has been to ascertain the extent to which work may have been added to or, by reason of the policies that have been followed, taken away.

This leads me to the discussion of the next matter I desire to mention, the trade agreement recently negotiated between Great Britain and Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I were given to the use of violent language I think it would be justified as I look at hon. gentlemen opposite. I wonder if they have forgotten their record with respect to the trade agreement with Great Britain. I am not going to do more than merely recite the facts. An agreement was entered into between Great Britain and Canada, which agreement was presented to this house for ratification, and at pages 72 and 73 of the journals of this house for 1932-33 it will be noted that Mr. Coote, seconded by Mr. Mitchell, moved in amendment that the following words be added to the proposed resolution:

and subject also to establishment of parity of the Canadian dollar with the British pound.

In other words they wanted to tie the dollar to the pound. Among those who rose in their places and supported that amendment were the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); the hon. member who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and every other member of the Liberal party then in the house. Then came the second reading of the bill embodying the agreements, and again members of the Liberal party voted against it. The division will be found at page 92 of the journals of the house for 1932-33. Among those who voted against second reading of the bill I find the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), and the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). In fact it might be well to read their names, in order that they might become immortal:

Beaubien	Howard
Blair	Howden
Bothwell	Irvine
Bouchard	Jacobs
Boulanger	Jean
Bourassa	Lacroix
Bradette	Lapointe

Goulet	Vallance
Hanson (Skeena)	Weir (Macdonald)
Heenan	Woodsworth

Then on the third reading a vote was once more recorded, which appears at pages 116 and 117 of the journals for that year. Hon. members opposite became a little confused with the different agreements. There was the agreement with the Free State. Then there was a little difficulty about the Rhodesian agreement; part of the Liberal party voted for that. Then came the agreement with South Africa and there were some little difficulties about that as well. Then at page 119 I find the vote on the United Kingdom agreement, which was 84 to 42. It is just as well that the names of the immortal crew who manned the ship of state at that moment in opposition to the government should be preserved for history. They were as follows:

Bertrand	Howden
Blair	Hurtubise
Bothwell	King, Mackenzie
Boulanger	Macphail (Miss)
Bourassa	McIntosh
Brown	McKenzie (Assiniboia)
Butcher	Munn

Those were the immortal forty-two. They voted against the United Kingdom agreement, an agreement which now in terms they ask this house to adopt. In order that there may be no question on that point I propose to put the deadly parallel upon Hansard; I propose to compare the paragraphs from the agreement of 1932 and the paragraphs from the agreement of to-day, to show that they are the same; the same in principle and almost identical in words. But in order to endeavour to save their faces they make some change in the relation of the words one to the other, though the principles have not changed and cannot change. I doubt whether, in the long history of our institutions, we have ever seen the spectacle of a government asking within the short period of less than five years the acquiescence and approval of members of the house to a document that was in terms similar in every principle to a document they had voted against just a few years before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there had been a different agreement in 1932 there would have been a different parallel now.

Mr. BENNETT: Ah, yes; if the fox had not been a fox it might have been a cat. It is hardly in keeping with general principles to say that if you had not done that and something else had been done we would not have what we have to-day. What a tribute to pay to those who negotiated the agreement of 1932!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would have had something a great deal better.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we will see whether or not it is better; it is identical.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say we would have had something better.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, Mr. Speaker, I regard that as a great compliment. The right hon. Prime Minister says that if we had been able to do better he would have been able to do better. That is a very nice way to put it. Well, there is this distinction between us: the right hon. gentleman says he did his best and the Minister of Finance says he did his best, and I assume that each in his allotted sphere did his best. I will assume that; it must be so. But the general principles that governed them in their approach to the problem are somewhat different from those which governed us. We were charged with being bargainers and hagglers, and now the Prime Minister says, "If you had only done a little better before, I would have done better." If I had been able to bargain better before, he would have been able to do better now. But I will tell you what the trouble is: he had written a record across the pages of Hansard, for the country to read. He told the people of Great Britain he was opposed to the bargain made by the late government, because they were too hard upon dear old England. He told them he was prepared to give them far more latitude than we had given them—greater opportunities, greater freedom of opportunity than we gave them. Now he says, "Oh, if you had only done better, I would have been able to do better." That is amusing; but it does not end there. Let us look at it for a minute. I will lay the clauses of both agreements section by section upon Hansard so that we may look at them.

In 1919 the Liberal party had a convention, and one of their declarations was that the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff. That was the declaration of the Liberal party made to the people of England. That was the declaration they made to the world. "Give us power and office and we will give you a fifty per cent preference over the general tariff for entry of your goods in Canada." And it did not end there. During the debates in the house, on October 17, 1932, as reported at page 264 the present Prime Minister said:

> May I go a step further and say in connection with that, so that there can be no mistake as to where we stand in the matter of British trade, and the British preference, that we would undertake to give to the trade of the United Kingdom, where goods are imported through Canadian ports, a British preference averaging fifty per cent of our general tariff. If there is anything in this particular agreement that is comparable to that of advantage to ourselves and to British peoples in trade, I hope we will find it out before this discussion is over.

That is the declaration—not away back in the days of 1919, but one that was made when we were discussing the agreements themselves. That was made in 1932. Is it any wonder the British people realized that they had the promise of the Liberal party, and that they would have a fifty per cent reduction over the general tariff as a preference upon their goods? That was the promise given to them at that time. Far be it from me to suggest that the Prime Minister would not endeavour to keep his word in that behalf. I know how anxious he would be that it should be so, how anxious he would be that they should have at least a fifty per cent reduction.

Now I turn to the agreement tabled the other day. I can hear him say, in a moment of great mental perturbation, "I must keep this promise and see that they have a reduction of fifty per cent, so that the farmers in the west may feel that the promise I solemnly made in 1919, repeated in the house in 1932 and again in 1933, has been kept and honoured." And so I look at the document. I turn to item 160 and I find these words:

Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters, lotions, hair, tooth and skin washes, and other toilet preparations containing spirits of any kind (a) when in bottles or flasks containing not more than four ounces each, 30 per cent.

And the old rate was 60 per cent. There is a fifty per cent reduction. There has been no trouble about eyewash. "Alcoholic perfumes and perfumed spirits, bay rum, and cologne"—so the farmer can say the Prime Minister has kept his word and reduced the rate by fifty per cent.

Now for a moment let us consider the agreement. Article 1 states:

The government of the United Kingdom undertakes that goods grown, produced or manufactured in Canada and consigned from any part of the British Empire which are now free of duty, shall continue to enjoy entry free of customs duty into the United Kingdom, subject, however, to the reservations set forth in schedule I appended hereto.

The old agreement, Article 1.

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom undertake that orders shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Import Duties Act, 1932, which will ensure the continuance after the 15th November, 1932, of entry free of duty into the United Kingdom of goods consigned from any part of the British Empire and grown, produced or manufactured in Canada which by virtue of that act are now free of duty subject, however, to the reservations set forth in schedule A appended hereto.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Schedule I, new agreement:

As regards eggs, poultry, butter, cheese and other milk products, the government of the United Kingdom reserve to themselves the right, if they consider it necessary in the interests of the United Kingdom producer to do so, to review at any time the basis of preference so far as relates to the articles above enumerated and after notifying the Canadian government either to impose a preferential duty on Canadian produce whilst maintaining preferential margins, or in consultation with the Canadian government to bring such produce within any system which may be put into operation for the quantitative regulation of supplies from all sources in the United Kingdom market.

The old agreement, schedule A:

As regards eggs, poultry, butter, cheese and other milk products, free entry for Canadian produce will be continued for three years certain. His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, however, reserve to themselves the right, after the expiration of the three years, if they consider it necessary in the interests of the United Kingdom producer to do so, to review the basis of preference so far as relates to the articles above enumerated and, after notifying His Majesty's government in Canada either to impose a preferential duty on Canadian produce whilst maintaining preferential margins, or in consultation with the Canadian government to bring such produce within any system which may be put into operation for the quantitative regulation of supplies from all sources in the United Kingdom market.

Word for word, differently placed. Not one change in meaning; only a transposition of words. There you have the old agreement and the new agreement.

It is true that at page 270 of Hansard of 1932 the leader of the government, then in opposition, made an attack upon this schedule.

Listen to his words dealing with the schedule identical with schedule I in the new agreement which he signed the other day. Listen to this:

The right hon. Mr. Amery, who represented the agricultural interests of Britain at the imperial conference in Ottawa, has made the statement since his return to England that they ought to begin the work of protecting British agriculture immediately, and not wait for any conference in the matter. They have the principle of protection endorsed, and they ought to go ahead immediately with further protection for agriculture in Britain. What does this agreement say? It says that the British government will reserve to itself the right to impose increased duties with respect to all these dairy products. The only obligation with regard to Canada's possible benefit is that a certain margin will be preserved in the form of a preference; that is to say, the duties against Canada and other parts of the empire will not be as high as those imposed on European countries.

Is that right now? It was denounced in 1932, at page 270 of Hansard. It is now submitted to the House of Commons for approval in 1937. His supporters were asked to vote against it, and, obediently responding, they voted against it. Now, asked to vote for it, immediately responsive they vote for it.

Then we turn—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend introduced an entirely new system.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think so, a new system—heads I win, tails you lose. That was the opposition against the government of the day. Then at page 270 of Hansard:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Notice is served in black and white in this agreement that it proposes to impose such duties at the end of three years.

We got free entry for three years certain. There is no certain term here. The Prime Minister of to-day says that that language means that that is the notice they are going to serve, and on which they will pay duties. At no previous time did the agitation with respect to protection of agricultural interests in England rise to the point it has now reached. In its infancy then, it has now developed into almost a tidal wave of sentiment in favour of it. We were told by the present Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition, that England had served notice that she proposed to impose these duties at the end of three years. Now it is the end of no time—any time she feels like it. If the Prime Minister meant what he said then—and surely he did—it means that to-day we have received notice that England intends to impose duties on these products. He went further than that when he said:

Let me answer the hon. gentleman who says they have that right now. What they have not at the present time is the endorsation of hon. gentlemen opposite of the imposition of a duty on agricultural products from this country. They will have that endorsation after hon. gentlemen opposite have given their support to this agreement, and any delegation of Canadian farmers that may go to Britain to protest against anything of the kind will be told, as quick as a flash, "Your own Conservative members in the House of Commons voted in approval of the reservation, indicative of an intention of the British government with respect to the imposition of extra duties on agricultural products."

Just change "Conservatives" to "Liberals" and you have it. Then he proceeds to close with these words, as reported on page 271 of Hansard:

This provision is simply prophetic of the intention of the British government to levy duties against our dairy products inside of three years. I wonder how the farmers of this country will view this agreement as they see the gates gradually closing against their dairy products as they go towards the British market;

With those prophetic words the right hon. gentleman closes his observations. Obviously if they were true then, they are much truer now. We go on to the next page of the agreement. Article 2 of the new agreement reads:

The government of the United Kingdom undertake that the goods the manufacture of Canada enumerated in schedule II appended hereto when consigned from any part of the British Empire shall not on importation into the United Kingdom be subjected to duties of customs higher than those specified in that schedule.

Schedule II covers motor cars, the rate of duty being 22½ per cent ad valorem, and stockings and socks of natural silk at 28½ per cent ad valorem, or eight shillings per pound, whichever is the greater. Reed organs, including harmoniums, are free. That is the new agreement; but did not the old agreement provide specifically the same? I shall not take the time to read it. I come now to article 3 of the new agreement, which reads:

The government of the United Kingdom undertake in respect of the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated in schedule III appended hereto that the difference between the rate of the duties of customs on such goods on importation into the United Kingdom when consigned from any part of the British Empire and the rate upon similar goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country shall not be less than the rates set out in that schedule:

The margin of preference is then indicated in favour of Canada. Schedule III provides for wheat, in grain; butter; cheese; apples, raw; pears, raw; and canned apples. These items were all in the old agreement. Dried fruits was in the old agreement, but it is not in the new. Then there are eggs in shell and condensed milk, both of which were in the old agreement. Honey is a new item in the new agreement. A large quantity of honey comes from New Zealand and Australia. The new schedule contains an item, "fish, fresh, sea," which was in the old agreement. Then there is an item, chilled or frozen salmon, which is supposed to be new. The old item provided for fish, fresh, from the sea. I do not know whether you would say that frozen salmon came out of the sea. Then the new agreement provides for asbestos, zinc, lead, all of which were in the old agreement. A new item in the new agreement is patent leather. With the exception of the one or two new items, all the others will be found in the agreement of 1932. Schedule B of the old agreement provides for wheat, butter, cheese, raw apples, raw pears, canned apples, dried fruits, eggs in shell, condensed milk and unwrought copper. Article 2 of the old agreement reads:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to impose on the foreign goods specified in schedule B appended hereto, the duties of customs shown in that schedule in place of the duties (if any) now leviable.

Is there any difference between the two? I turn to Hansard to find what the right hon. gentleman said about it. Schedule C of the old agreement provides for fresh sea fish, canned salmon, asbestos, zinc and lead. I put it to this house if it is made any clearer when we say frozen salmon?

Mr. DUNNING: Distinctly so.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says that that makes it clearer. Article 3 of the old agreement reads:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom undertake that the general ad valorem duty of 10 per cent imposed by section I of the Import Duties Act, 1932, on the foeign goods specified in schedule C shall not be reduced except with the consent of His Majesty's government in Canada.

Mark you, the new agreement puts the same thought in a different language. The old agreement provided that the ten per cent would not be dealt with except with the consent of the government of Canada, and there was incorporated in the old agreement a provision under which the two governments could mutually agree to change the agreement in any way which was thought desirable. Listen to what the Prime Minister, speaking then as leader of the opposition, said:

"We have fixed certain duties on timber, which has to do with all the work of construction, houses and the like, we have fixed certain duties on fish and other forms of food, and on copper and zinc, and we will not allow these duties to be changed except with the consent not of our own parliament but of the British government." How would we feel? Is there one member of this house who would support that? I venture to say there is not one hon. member in any of the parties who would support it. Then how can we ask the British government to support a measure which we in our own parliament would not be prepared to support if the situation were reversed?

What is the answer to-day on March 2, 1937? Is it any different from what it was in October, 1931? Have conditions changed? I admit that the transposition of words is complete, but the meaning is the same. The right hon. gentleman goes on to say:

But the point of greatest significance in this article is this, and remember in endorsing an agreement we are above everything else endorsing the principles that underly it. This duty of ten per cent shall not be reduced except with the consent of His Majesty's government—where, in Great Britain? No, in Canada. This duty of ten per cent which is being put upon some of the food and other necessaries of the British people cannot be reduced except with the consent of the government of Canada. Can anyone defend an action of that kind?

No wonder the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) smiles. Could anyone defend that action? These are not my words; they are the words of the present Prime Minister speaking in his place as leader of the opposition. I am certain there are a hundred and some old members who are going to defend it to the hilt. Then on page 273 the right hon. gentleman goes on to say:

I ask hon. members to note that article with great care. What is schedule C? Schedule C is timber, fish, salmon, and other fish canned, asbestos, zinc and lead. I have already pointed out that as far as zinc and lead are concerned they are in the same category as wheat, the duty only remains as long as Canada is willing and able to sell in the first instance her supply to Great Britain, and so long as she sells it at the world price, otherwise the duty goes off. Now, as to timber, there is a small duty at the present time and that is being continued. That is practically all schedule C signifies as regard timbers.

Those are the pearly words of wisdom which were spoken by the right hon. gentleman, but the hon. gentlemen who cheered so loudly then will not cheer so loudly now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The application is not the same to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a great change; the right hon. gentleman is prime minister and I am not. At least I am frank enough to admit that there has been that great change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not referring to the agreement. I was referring to conditions as they were at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Conditions are also different. In 1932 the depression was very great, while to-day it is not nearly so great.

Article 4 of the new agreement reads:

The government of the United Kingdom undertake that until the 19th August, 1942, tobacco grown, produced or manufactured in Canada and consigned from any part of the British Empire shall enjoy on importation into the United Kingdom the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco, so long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below 2c. 0½d. per pound, in which event the margin of preference shall be equal to the full duty.

Then the old agreement, article 7, provided:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass legislation which will secure for a period of ten years from the date hereof to tobacco, consigned from any part of the British Empire and grown produced or manufactured in Canada, the existing margin of preference over foreign tobacco, so long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below 2/0½d. per lb., in which event the margin of preference shall be equal to the full duty.

Now the parliament of Great Britain passed the Finance Act, section 7 of which stabilized tobacco duties for ten years, and this new agreement maintains them until 1942, which is ten years from 1932. So there is no change there.

Then I find these words, and they are rather interesting. Even at that the right hon. gentleman did not accept the agreement; it was not satisfactory to him. Listen to this:

They have now an existing margin which the article says may go on for ten years, but only provided parliament does not change it which it apparently has the right to do. Change it? —in what way? "So long, however, as the duty on foreign unmanufactured tobacco does not fall below 2/0½d. per lb." The margin is kept only so long as the duty against foreign tobacco remains at a little over two shillings per pound. If the British parliament decides to reduce that duty the margin of preference becomes equivalent to the full duty, and if the full duty is brought down by shilling or pence, the margin disappears and the rate applicable to British Empire grown tobacco also. Of what benefit will that article be to the tobacco growers? Who will as a consequence of this agreement begin extending his tobacco plantation in Canada in order to supply the British market when at any time the British government, if it sees fit, may reduce the duty on tobacco, bring it down to any point, or wipe it out altogether?

The right hon. gentleman has given this immortality; it is embalmed in the agreement in exactly the words of 1932, and he asked the question: What good is it? I ask it now. Perhaps he will answer it now more clearly that he did then.

The new agreement, article 5—and this is a most interesting one—provides:

The government of Canada, recognizing that it is the present policy of the government of the United Kingdom to promote the orderly marketing of bacon and hams and of meat in the United Kingdom with due regard to the normal development of trade, declare their willingness so far as their power extends to continue to assist the government of the United Kingdom in carrying out this policy and, in particular, to furnish from time to time estimates of forthcoming shipments of bacon and hams and cattle and beef.

As regards bacon and hams, the government of the United Kingdom undertake:

(1) that any duty or levy which may be imposed on bacon and hams imported into the United Kingdom shall not apply to imports of Canadian bacon and hams when consigned from any part of the British Empire;

(2) that there will be no regulation by them of such imports unless the rate at which the trade from Canada progresses towards two and one-half million hundred-weight per annum should become abnormal and such as to endanger the effective working of the system of supply regulation;

(3) that no such regulation would be put into effect without prior consultation with the government of Canada.

As regards cattle and beef, the government of the United Kingdom undertake:

(1) that any duty or levy which may be imposed on cattle or beef imported into the United Kingdom shall not apply to imports of Canadian cattle or beef when consigned from any part of the British Empire;

(2) that, if so requested, they will make themselves responsible for Canadian interests in any International Conference that may be set up to arrange for regulating supplies imported into the United Kingdom and will use their best endeavours to ensure that Canada secures an equitable share in the trade in cattle and beef;

(3) that any agreement for the setting up of such a conference, to which they may become a party, will not provide for any reduction in imports of Canadian fat cattle and beef into the United Kingdom below recent levels;

(4) that any such agreement will recognize that special provision may become necessary for increased shipments of fat cattle and beef from Canada and will provide for specified reductions, if necessary, in shipments of chilled beef from foreign countries;

(5) that there will be no regulation of imports of cattle or beef from Canada unless, after consultation with the government of Canada, it appears to the Government of the United Kingdom that the effective working of a general scheme for the orderly marketing in the United Kindom of meat cannot otherwise be secured.

The old agreement, article 5, says:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to modify the conditions at present governing the importation into the United Kingdom of live cattle from Canada on the lines already agreed upon in principle between themselves and His Majesty's government in Canada.

You will recall the letter from Sir John Gilmour to the Hon. Mr. Weir, then minister of agriculture, in which it was provided that when they had settled on the report that was to be made, the provisions incorporated in the new agreement would become effective, and they did become effective in this country.

Article 6 of the old agreement provides:

His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom declare that it is their intention to arrange as soon as possible after receiving the report of the commission now sitting on the reorganization of the pig industry in the United Kingdom, for the quantitative regulation of the supplies of bacon and hams coming on to the United Kingdom market and undertake that in any legislation which they may submit to parliament for regulating the supplies of bacon and hams from all sources into the United Kingdom, provision will be made for free entry of Canadian bacon and hams of good quality up to a maximum of 2,500,000 cwt. per annum.

Identically the same. But that is not all. Is it beyond the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite who went throughout the country and said, when the farmers were beginning to raise pigs, that it was a mistake, that there was nothing in this agreement for them, that Mr. McLean of Canada Packers, one of their strong supporters, said that that provision in the agreement of 1932 meant over thirty million dollars to the Canadian farmers? That was the position taken by Mr. McLean of Canada Packers.

Let us go a step further. The new agreement, article 6, provides:

The government of Canada undertake that the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule IV appended hereto, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British Empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, shall not be subjected to duties of customs higher than those specified in that schedule.

We have bound ourselves in the new agreement with respect to that matter. Article 6 of the new agreement continues:

The government of Canada undertake as regards goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom other than those enumerated in schedule IV that, under the British preferential tariff, no new protective duty shall be imposed and no existing protective duty increased except after an inquiry at which United Kingdom producers shall enjoy full rights of audience.

The old agreement, article 13, provided:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that on the request of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom they will cause a review to be made by the tariff board as soon as practicable of the duties charged on any commodities specified in such request in accordance with the principles laid down in Article 11 hereof and that after the receipt of the report of the tariff board thereon such report shall be laid before parliament and parliament shall be invited to vary wherever necessary the tariff on such commodities of United Kingdom origin in such manner as to give effect to such principles.

And article 14, of the old agreement:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that no existing duty shall be increased on United Kingdom goods except after an inquiry and the receipt of a report from the tariff board, and in accordance with the facts as found by that body.

And article 15 of the old agreement provided:

His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that United Kingdom producers shall be entitled to full rights of audience before the tariff board, when it has under consideration matters arising under Articles 13 and 14 hereof.

Again the provisions are identical in terms except as to this: a large number of items are not bound in the new agreement that were bound in the old. Why? Because they were articles that were dealt with by the provisions of other paragraphs of the agreement whereby, when no benefit accrued to the United Kingdom, they agreed to drop them. Article after article was so dealt with by the finance minister during the years, by asking Sir William Clark to communicate with his government to ascertain whether there was any reason why the article in question should continue to be bound when it served no useful purpose, and in every instance where no benefit accrued to the United Kingdom they agreed. Those are the circumstances in which these items have been taken out. They are taken out now instead of waiting for cases to arise from time to time. Do hon. gentlemen say that this affords them a wider opportunity for future negotiations? It may, but so far as my knowledge goes there was not a single article in the schedule with respect to which a request was made to the British government, and which we desired to deal with in some other manner, on which they were not ready to meet us if it had not been found beneficial to them, and they did so.

Why is the tariff board eliminated here? Why is there no provision with respect to it? Why is it wiped out when the agreement with the United States provided that the tariff board should prevail? Why is it eliminated when we placed on the statute books last year this section:

In the case of any value for duty which may be established under authority of section 43, other than those provided for in schedule I of the trade agreement signed to-day, opportunity will be afforded for appeal to the tariff board respecting any such value in order to ascertain and make public the finding whether, to what extent, and for what period, such value may be required to prevent the importation of the goods into Canada from prejudicially or injuriously affecting the interests of Canadian manufacturers and producers.

And in section 6 of chapter 19 of the statutes of last year these words appear:

In the case of any value for duty established under the provisions of this section after the first day of January, 1936, any interested person may apply to the tariff board by way of appeal therefrom.

"Any interested person may apply to the tariff board." The United States has the right to go to the tariff board—the United States or any interested person. But in the other instance, so far as England is concerned it does not state what tribunal, or any tribunal; it says, "except after an inquiry at which United Kingdom producers shall enjoy full rights of audience." Why was it left out? Has anyone suggested a reason?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes—a good reason.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is that good for the United States and not for the United Kingdom?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not the same thing at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it may not be the same thing, but it reads the same and sounds the same.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: I judge it is a good deal like the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite towards the Ottawa agreements; it is a little different now from what it was in 1932. The fact of the matter is that this is to be an inquiry, but His Majesty's government in Canada have undertaken under the new agreement that they will not do certain things, that is impose new protective duties—

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: —unless there has been an inquiry and the United Kingdom producers have enjoyed full rights of audience. In the old agreement it is provided that His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that "no existing duty shall be increased"—that is the same thing, if it means anything—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: —"on United Kingdom goods except after an inquiry and the receipt of a report from the tariff board, and in accordance with the facts as found by that body." Why have we wiped out the tariff board? Is it because this combination of tariff experts from three departments—trade and commerce, external affairs, and finance—have thought that they would be far better able to deal with this matter than the board would be? Is that the reason? Is that the reason that the expert draftsmen have so endeavoured to express the same meaning in different language? Here you have the same thing expressed in the old agreement, a provision that the matter shall go before the tariff board. Here you have a provision in the agreement with the United States for an appeal to the tariff board. But in this instance what have we?

Mr. DUNNING: The provision in the United States agreement is not the same.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it says, the "value for duty," and if there is much difference between the value for duty and a tariff as operated by my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) on cabbage and lettuce and cucumbers and asparagus, I do not know what it is. Perhaps the minister will be able to elucidate that.

Let us read what the Prime Minister said in those days. I am not taking the utterances of anybody less than the Prime Minister, not even members of the government such as the Minister of National Defence, whose strong and vigorous denunciation will always be remembered. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, I need not draw attention again to the fact that here it is not the people of Canada that are thought of in this agreement. It is United Kingdom producers who are to have the right to appear before the tariff board. Why have not the producers of Canada and the consumers of Canada the right to appear before the board? May I remind the house in this connection of one important clause in the Tariff Board Act as it now stands, and that is that only those matters are to come before the tariff board which the Prime Minister wants to have placed before it. . .
> I venture to say that if my right hon. friend thinks he has met with success in that endeavour he is very much mistaken. I do not believe that any parliament of Canada—

Note, Mr. Speaker—"I do not believe that any parliament of Canada—"

> —will agree to surrender to any tariff board which is to be regarded as a judicial tribunal the say as to what the tariff in Canada is to be with respect to any commodity whatever.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the whole point.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Well then, the hon. gentleman might explain why he has agreed that an inquiry at which the United Kingdom producers are to enjoy full rights of audience is to determine these questions, rather than the tariff board.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no; the government of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is a very intelligent gentleman, but at times he makes the fatal mistake of assuming a knowledge of the interpretation of statutes which he does not possess. The language is this:

> The government of Canada undertake as regards goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom other than those enumerated in schedule IV that, under the British preferential tariff, no new protective duty shall be imposed and no existing protective duty increased except after an inquiry at which United Kingdom producers shall enjoy full rights of audience.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: The old section was this:

> His Majesty's government in Canada undertake that no existing duty shall be increased on United Kingdom goods except after an inquiry and the receipt of a report from the tariff board, and in accordance with the facts as found by that body.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is the distinction without the difference.

Mr. DUNNING: A very important one.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but here is the amazing observation, in view of this paragraph; let the supporters of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) listen to this:

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that the tariff board of Canada is to be moved into action at the instance not of Canadians, not of consumers who are affected by our tariffs, not of any classes in this country, but at the instance of the British government. In other words we are to have a government of another part of the empire say when our tariff machinery is to be put into motion where it relates to matters pertaining to the tariff board. That comes back to the old question as to how far we want the affairs of this country interfered with by the governments of the other parts of the empire. I venture to say that if we are looking for trouble that is the best direction in which to seek it. If we are going to put upon the British government the onus of moving our tariff board into action, and put upon our own government the onus of having its board take up investigations whenever the British government wish to have an inquiry made, it seems to me we are going out of our way to make difficulties between the governments of the two countries and between the two countries themselves.

Mr. DUNNING: He was a true prophet.

Mr. BENNETT: We are to have another inquiry like the Turgeon commission, with Mr. McRuer, at $150 a day and expenses, reading free trade pamphlets. Is that the idea?

So that is the story up to that point. Then we come to article 7 of the new agreement:

The government of Canada undertake that goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule IV, when not of a class or kind made in Canada and when subject to duties of customs on importation into Canada, shall, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British Empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, enjoy the benefit of preferential tariff margins which, in the case of any such goods, shall not be less than the difference between the rate of duty provided for in this agreement and the rate of duty now levied upon like goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country, provided however that, if the duty on foreign goods becomes less than such preferential tariff margin, no duty shall be levied on the like goods of United Kingdom origin.

Then, article 8:

The government of Canada undertake in respect of the goods the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom enumerated in schedule V appended hereto that the difference between the rates of duties of customs on such goods on importation into Canada, when conveyed without transhipment from any part of the British Empire enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, and the rates upon similar goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country shall not be less than the margins set out in that schedule.

Under the old agreement, article 9, "His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament." You see, the late government were more respectful towards parliament. They did not know they had a certain, solid majority. The government of Canada's undertaking under this present article is without reference to parliament, but the old agreement recited:

His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule, provided that nothing in this article shall preclude His Majesty's government in Canada from reducing the duties specified in the said schedule so long as the margin of British preference shown in that schedule is preserved or from increasing the rates under the intermediate or general tariff set out in the said schedule.

I explained a moment ago that with respect to the articles that were bound the British government had accorded its consent without any difficulty, and I pointed out further that with respect to the items mentioned here we put them on the free list; and when the bill is in committee we will mention the articles that were placed on the free list between 1932 to 1935.

Let me refer now to the language of the present Prime Minister at page 281 of Hansard of 1932.

The feature that is all important for this parliament to consider is whether it is going to adopt the principle of allowing one government to say what the tariff of Canada must be for a given period of time irrespective of what the wishes of the electorate may be. Whether we are to be bound for a term of years to the high tariff rates which a government that may be in office one day and out of office shortly after, may fix. That is the most serious feature of all. When we consider that this is an effort to raise tariffs not only so far as Canada is concerned but so far as other parts of the British Empire are concerned against the rest of the world, this iron clad arrangement of high tariffs existing around the British Empire for a period of years becomes a rather serious international as well as national problem.

Is there any change? Changes in numbers of items, but not in principle. If you have five articles you have the number, and the right hon. gentleman said the thing to remember was the principle that underlies it. The principle is embedded in these documents; for here is the old agreement, article 9:

His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule...

As I point out, this was, as we said at the time, an experiment, and as it became clear from time to time that certain items were not required, reductions were made or they let us deal with them as we pleased, on consent.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to guaranteed margins?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, when England could not supply. Some articles for instance came up during those years which England could not supply at all.

Mr. DUNNING: One or two cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, one or two is sufficient for the principle involved. Whenever it was found necessary they always met our offers. And the right hon. gentleman pointed out that the essential question to consider is the principle involved.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The principle involved at the time was the question of duration. In other words my right hon. friend bound his successors; we bound ourselves but left our successors free.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman might not say with certainty that he bound even himself. A period of time of three years is not materially different from five years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it is.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman made some point about that. He approved of the tobacco item, which he had made, which was a ten year agreement, and which he did not desire to have changed. The fact that the term is three or five years I do not consider to be of great importance having regard to the fact that the government of which he was the head made a bargain with the West Indies for ten years and bound us so that we were not able to deal with the West Indies by reason of that agreement. And I pointed out others in which the same thing was done. So it is not a question of time; it is a question of the essential principle, and the principle is manifested as well by five or six items as by fifteen or twenty.

I have dealt with articles 7 and 8. Article 13 of the new agreement is one to which considerable importance has been attached. The two agreements are substantially the same in that regard. The mandated territories I will take as read—

...the government of Canada shall not be bound to continue to accord any preferences to any colony or protectorate...

Here is what the old agreement said, article 20:

Nothing in this agreement shall prejudice or diminish any of the benefits enjoyed by any of the parties thereto under the Canada-West Indies trade agreement dated July 6, 1925.

The new agreement and the old are identical in meaning, although there has been a change of words. It must have required all the genius that the government could import to be able to utilize these words in a different way by transposition so as to make them fit in differently from the way they were in the old agreement and still mean the same thing.

Mr. DUNNING: The other party to the agreement had something to say.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, but not in the language used here. Now, let us see. It is not as though it ended there. One would have thought that the present Prime Minister would have denounced that, but he accepted it. Let us look at Hansard, page 277:

Let us consider the next article.

And then he deals with the colonies, and continues:

I have not time to go into that matter at the moment, but I invite the attention of the house to the fact that here is a new departure with respect to the whole matter of taxation of colonies and dependencies. Under this agreement the governments are making, so far as the countries of the rest of the world are concerned, a closed preserve of the dependencies and the colonies. Heretofore they have been free to trade with these colonies and dependencies. We on this continent as colonies, sought for years to get freedom of trade, and not to have the government of Britain impose duties for us. Under this agreement, however, we in this parliament who have fiscal freedom in these matters, are to sanction a course which states that whether they wish it or not, these dependencies and colonies in order to provide preferences to other parts of the empire must have certain duties against the rest of the world imposed upon them. There is another principle which I do not believe we in this parliament ought to support for one minute.

And already several days have passed.

I shall not touch the larger issues raised, but it raises further far-reaching questions when we consider what other countries of the world are likely to think, those countries which are not only being shut out of the markets of the British dominions and Great Britain herself, but shut out of the great colonial empire as well, in consequence of the agreements. Those are matters which may well be very carefully considered.

That was the attitude of the then leader of the opposition—that not for one minute should parliament consider it; and now it is embodied in the new agreement which he asks his followers to accept and act upon!

Article 17 in the new agreement is important in connection with the question of time. I reserve my observations in answer to that until we come to the agreement itself. But article 17 reads:

> The agreement will come into force on a date to be mutually agreed between the two governments. On the coming into force of the present agreement, the agreement concluded between the two governments at Ottawa on August 20, 1932, shall cease to have effect. Pending the coming into force of the present agreement, the two governments will apply its provisions as far as may be possible and will consult together with regard to the dates on which particular provisions of the 1932 agreement shall be deemed to have been replaced by provisions of the present agreement. The agreement will remain in force until August 20, 1940. Unless six months before August 20, 1940, notice of termination shall have been given by either government to the other, the agreement will remain in force until the expiry of six months from the date on which a notice of termination is given.

What does the Prime Minister mean by suggesting that this is a three year agreement, if the agreement is in perpetuity unless notice of termination is given by either party? It is an agreement which continues, and the arrangement with respect to the old agreement and with respect to the new will be clearly seen when you contrast the two articles. Article 22 of the old agreement read:

> This agreement. . . is to be regarded as coming into effect as from the date hereof (subject to the necessary legislative or other action being taken as soon as may be practicable hereafter). It shall remain in force for a period of five years, and if not denounced six months before the end of that period shall continue in force thereafter until a date six months after notice of denunciation has been given by either party.

And it continued to be in force, just as the new one will, for a period of years in the absence of notice to the contrary—six months' notice before its termination. So that as far as this agreement is concerned it continued in effect until such time as notice was given for its termination.

There are other provisions of the agreement to which I might apply the deadly parallel, but I desire now only to make a few observations with respect to one or two matters which I consider of paramount importance before we discuss the matter in detail in committee. The agreement makes some reductions in duties. When we get into committee I shall point out that many of them are 2½ per cent. some 5 per cent, some 10 per cent, and of course one of them at least a 50 per cent reduction. But there are two or three outstanding items to which attention should be directed at once.

One affects steel. I shall not go into the details except to point out that this government has bound continuous strip steel. To my surprise I learned this fall when I was away from Canada that there is no strip steel for the manufacture of automobile bodies produced anywhere outside of the United States—I mean for the type of automobile body that we make on this continent. It is true that they will do it in Australia shortly. We cannot secure it except from the United States, and if the prices of automobiles are at a high level in this country it is only fair to say that they will be reduced if the dies are brought here and the bodies pressed into shape from steel entering our markets free. But we are denied that. This is an item in which it has been declared that although we cannot buy from Great Britain strip steel for the manufacture of automobile bodies, because they do not produce it—though they are building a mill—we in Canada cannot get strip steel from the United States because, notwithstanding the fact that they cannot supply it in England, we have agreed to maintain that level of duty.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that when I found myself in Australia last fall it was news to me to learn that the only place in which that particular kind of strip steel was produced was the United States. I thought, of course, that it was obtainable in England, but I found that was not so, though in southern England, near Swansea, Wales, they are now erecting a mill in which strip steel of the type and kind and with the characteristics necessary for the manufacture of automobile bodies will be produced. I saw that steel imported into Australia, though shortly they will produce it there themselves. I saw the dies set up; I saw the presses operate. But we in Canada now will have to pay a duty on that continuous strip steel or bring in the bodies already pressed and shaped, thereby losing that much employment. I confess that I am quite unable to appreciate that point.

I shall reserve the right to discuss the steel items further in committee, because there are certain large principles involved, one of them being that to set up a duty and prevent the free importation of a commodity that is essential for the reduction of the price of the finished article, during the period necessary for the construction of a mill, is new as far as I know. Formerly we had a provision that the duty would apply when and so soon as the Canadian mill was able to supply the requirements of the people.

Let us come now to the question of woollens. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) was once the chairman of the tariff board. He has written more than one book, and his books are always thought-provoking. In one of his books he indicated that twice the parliament of Canada had destroyed the woollen industry of this country, and he gave the years. I looked the matter up when I read this book, because it was of some importance to realize what was the situation when we had to deal with the matter in 1930. It will be recalled that in 1930 we imposed high duties on woollen goods, including a specific duty, in order that we might be able to rehabilitate the woollen industry of this country. At this moment I am not going to deal with the matter in detail; I am only going to point out that the woollen industry is scattered over Ontario and Quebec, in small towns and villages, and that substantial numbers of people are employed. The textile industry as a whole employs very large numbers of people, some sixty or seventy thousand or more. Indeed I believe the woollen industry employs about sixty-three thousand people, though I may be wrong in that figure.

What is the position with respect to the woollen industry? It is in this position, that if it can get a certain proportion of the business it can remain solvent; if it cannot get a certain proportion of the business it cannot remain solvent. Last year, under the old agreement, we gave England forty per cent of our woollen business and the Canadian producer had a little less than sixty per cent. There were some woollens that came from France, Czechoslovakia and other countries, but broadly speaking Canadians had between fifty-five and sixty per cent of the business while Great Britain had forty per cent. So our woollen industry continued to operate. It is in evidence that they did not make any large sums of money. Knitted goods stood in the same position, and hosiery as well. I recall that Sir Robert Borden once said that a woollen factory in Canada was as great an asset to the British Empire as a woollen mill in Yorkshire, and I have always thought that was a sound principle. Certainly it is a greater asset to the Dominion of Canada. If, as seems likely, the effect of these new arrangements will be to lessen substantially the percentage of business that Canadian mills will do in Canada, then they cannot continue to function. Of course that is almost axiomatic, having regard to existing economic conditions throughout the world. It is quite clear that you must have volume in order to be able to manufacture economically and efficiently, and a volume of sixty per cent of the available Canadian business enabled our woollen industry, to use the colloquial language of the street, to get by. If you reduce it substantially they cannot get by. Is that fair, or does England expects us to put ourselves in that position?

I am not one of those who are entirely ignorant of this matter, Mr. Speaker, for I had to do with the negotiation of the agreement of 1932. The position I took then, which I still think is a sound position, was that if an industry was operating in Canada efficiently and successfully I could not create competition that would destroy it. Rightly or wrongly that was the position we took. My right hon. friend has expressed deep concern over what he calls the world situation. I am concerned about the world situation also, but it seems to me that the world situation is secondary to the situation in my own country. That is the position, and that was why the provisions of the agreement of 1932 read as they did. Woollens, knitted goods and hosiery are items which I think it will be found in committee are seriously menaced by the provisions of the new agreement.

Many years ago in this house I placed upon Hansard my appreciation of what I regarded as the sheep industry. I never realized how great the sheep industry might become in a country until I was in Australia. In the twelve months preceding June 30 of last year Australia did an export business of £122,000,000 of which £61,000,000, or just half, came from sheep. They have 112,000,000 sheep in Australia, and they sell practically one-third of the world's merino. They have developed that business to the point where their wool, of course, is the standard of the world. In South Africa I found they had many millions of sheep, I think about thirty million, and in their laboratories they are developing the quality of their wool until it seems to me the time is not far distant when they will become severe competitors with Australia in the matter of quality. There for the first time I saw the artificial wool that has been developed by Italy, and I realized just how insignificant and inferior it was as compared with the real article, for the purposes for which wool is used.

In this country we are in a northern climate, and to me the development of a woollen industry would seem to be important. Twice we have destroyed that industry, as the hon. member for Ontario pointed out in his book, giving the dates when this happened. We have again placed that industry on its feet by securing to it sixty per cent of our domestic market while the other forty per cent, as I say, broadly speaking, has gone to Great Britain. Our imports of textiles from Great Britain made up one-third of our entire imports from that country last year.

Mr. DUNNING: That was all textiles, not only woollens.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; that is what I said. Under those circumstances I do invite the attention of the house to a careful consideration of the items concerning woollens, knitted goods and hosiery.

There is one other article which I think is important, having to do with vegetable oils. I am not going to labour the matter at the moment, but in the agreement we made in 1932 we bound that article at ten per cent. Long before we left office, however, it became painfully apparent that changed world conditions had created a situation which required the closest examination and investigation; for we have been importing into this country tremendous quantities of vegetable oils, and the market we had to the south of us with respect to animal oils has gone. The United States have placed an excise tax against the importation of our animal fats, so that we are no longer able to utilize that market for the sale of our surplus products. The importation into Canada of vegetable oils has assumed a magnitude of which I had no idea until I looked it up a little while ago. The quantity coming into this country is amazing. We have surplus butter and other fats; we are increasing our pig production; we are selling bacon, and we have lard. We used to have a ready market for lard and still ship a large quantity of it to the United Kingdom. The evidence given before the price spreads commission indicated that the profits accruing to Canada Packers from vegetable oils was enormous. I think in one particular year it was nearly one-half of their profits. I mention this because it seems to me we should give this item very careful consideration. It affects our butter and fat production, and our ability to sell it.

There is one other item dealt with in the minister's speech to which I think we should pay some attention, namely that of furniture. I do not propose to do more than say that as there is a strike in the industry at this time, as indicated by newspaper dispatches, it would probably be undesirable to discuss the matter at this time. There are, however, phases of it which warrant the closest and most careful consideration by the government of a situation which now threatens the industry. I pointed this out last year when we dealt with the United States tariff, and I think if the minister gives it careful consideration and attention he will find there is—

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: It is still before the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I know it is. I believe oils are also before the tariff board, judging from the dates on documents I have. I think probably it had been settled, so far as the ten per cent is concerned, before it reached the tariff board. But the minister has referred it to the board.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I make these observations with respect to tariffs not in any censorious manner, but really in the hope that I may be able to suggest to the government the desirability of a more careful study than has yet been made. I cannot but point out that while in multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom, it also follows that too many tariff experts sometimes have the effect of emphasizing the truth of that other old proverb, that too many cooks spoil the broth. I merely mention that in passing.

For the moment, leaving the tariff, there is another matter to which I should like to refer, and that is the question of our financial relations with the provinces. The other day the minister dealt with the matter briefly. In amplification of the position I desired to present at that time I wish to say only this: the determination of a policy, I found by experience, is a matter of profound importance, because the implications of it sometimes are not foreseen. When the minister said to the province of Alberta that he would not help them out of their difficulty by advancing them, through loans or otherwise, sufficient money to enable them to pay their maturing obligations, his statement was regarded as a policy. Many people scattered throughout the province in which I have long lived, as well as people residing in other parts of Canada, found themselves in straitened and difficult circumstances because their investments had been wholly in those securities the market value of which fell to a very low figure, and the interest upon which was reduced to half of what the coupons carried. If that policy is reversed, if it is not applied to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, obviously a situation is created in which the people of Alberta have just cause to say they have been discriminated against. Because if the minister will accept what I think he will, namely that the implication of his refusal to assist Alberta involved the thought that the same policy was to be applied to all the provinces—

Mr. DUNNING: And it was.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: I refused British Columbia and Saskatchewan at the same time and on the same grounds, in connection with the same class of matter.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia have not defaulted. The province of Alberta defaulted.

Mr. DUNNING: If the right hon. gentleman will permit, on the maturity which was the occasion of the default, both British Columbia and Saskatchewan had maturities at the same time and received precisely the same answer.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I am pointing out that Alberta defaulted.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And the others did not. Alberta defaulted because it was unable to secure money from the dominion government to prevent it from defaulting; that was regarded as an indication of a policy which I believe, rightly or wrongly, should not have been put in force at that particular time.

Before resuming my seat there is one other matter to which I must refer, and that is the windfall which the minister received from the wheat board. Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to express myself in moderate terms with respect to this matter. Prior to this government's assuming office there was outstanding a guarantee in these words:

> The minister, in addition, recommends that such guarantee shall become operative and payment thereunder, out of the consolidated revenue fund, of the respective balances, if any, then due or accruing due, shall be made, after Wheat Producers have sold and realized upon all or practically all of such wheat and other grains in its possession or control, and have sold or disposed of all or practically all such contracts for future delivery of wheat and other grains, and application of the amounts realized, less expenses, has been made against such advances and interest, and thereupon the governor in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, shall determine the date at which payments are to be made in pursuance of this guarantee.

The wheat board act provided for the taking over by that board of the wheat held by the wheat producers. They took it over on a given day. Unfortunately under the negotiations they did not take it over as the statute provides. The provision is that it shall be taken over after negotiations, but they took it over in consequence of these words:

> The government herewith makes formal request that the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited transfer forthwith to the Canadian wheat board "all wheats or contracts to purchase or take delivery of wheat in respect of which the government of Canada has given a guarantee" on the terms of my letter November 12, 1935, to you. Stop. A similar request has been sent to Mr. McFarland.

Ultimately the threat was made that if they did not do so, credit would be stopped. That was the threat. It was done under duress, and as a result the wheat was taken over at almost the lowest price at which wheat had sold. Then they came to parliament and asked for $15,000,000 to cover the loss. Parliament voted the money, against my protest. When I read the language of the Minister of Finance with respect to it I am amazed that such language should be used, because he points out that this was a loss which was irredeemable; there was no possible chance of retrieving it.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at the language.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my right hon friend should quote it exactly. It is perfectly true I had little hope.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought I had the book before me, but apparently it has been misplaced.

Mr. DUNNING: The loss was greater by the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BENNETT: He said the loss would be greater. In the middle of the year, without waiting for the end of the crop year, he got $8,000,000. How much more wheat is held? Is there or is there not to be a further profit? If so, how much? It is impossible to say—exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: But it is within more manageable proportions now.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, of course it is within more manageable proportions, but the principle has not changed. That is the story, so far as I can see, with respect to it. I thought I had the volume of Hansard containing the minister's statement, but it is a matter which may be considered later.

I once heard a gentleman say it was difficult to understand any parliament doing what was done last year with respect to this matter. How can we justify having paid out $15,000,000 and getting only $8,000,000 back, with some more to go, the amount of which I do not know? Then we have the government, through the present Prime Minister, claiming at Brandon that they were the real framers of the wheat board act. Speaking at Brandon, the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, pointed out that the Liberal party must take the credit for the wheat board act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some features of it, not the whole act.

Mr. BENNETT: He pointed out that anything that might be of any value was the result of the efforts of the Liberal members of the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is fair.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is fair, then let me ask both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance why it was they made it impossible for the farmers to use it in 1936-37. The language of the statute provided the farmer with an opportunity to have a second market; he could sell to the wheat board and get participation certificates. Through the action of the government of Canada he was prevented from being able to sell his wheat to that board and receiving participation certificates. We now know that not thousands but millions of dollars have been made by speculators in that same wheat. One man told me that his profit was half a million dollars and I know he was stating the facts. Four large buyers took the wheat and instead of the participation certificates being in the hands of the farmers, they reaped the benefit of the rise in price from 90 cents to $1.30 per bushel. It was in the hands of the grain exchange. There is no denying the facts as they are there upon the record. I mention this in passing without going into it in detail, because another opportunity will be afforded to discuss the matter fully.

I am deeply concerned about the operations and the effect of the operations of the wheat board. When I was standing in the place now occupied by the right hon. gentleman opposite, I pointed out that that meant that there were two markets possible, the one being the board and the other the ordinary channels of the grain trade. The farmer had his choice of going to the market and getting participation certificates. If he had good fortune he could participate in the increased price that came about. If wheat went lower, the government guaranteed him the fixed price. He got that price. But he was not afforded that opportunity in 1936-37. Great fortunes have been made while the farmer has had to dispose of his wheat at a price which did not permit his utilizing the machinery of the wheat board.

There is another problem in connection with which I think the hon. gentleman should have given some indication of his views, the problem touching the railways of this country. I am not going to review again the history of these railways. There are two problems of transcendent importance facing this country and one is the railway problem. It was pointed out that the effect of the agreement would be to increase the business of the railways to such an extent that they would be able rapidly to overtake their difficulties. Of course that is not so and it could not be so in the very nature of things. The short hauls would not enure to their benefit to that extent, or to any other extent that would be perceptible. Of course improved conditions have improved the takings of the railways. Take our national railway, for example; there are still three questions which remain unanswered. The annual report of 1935 showed a cash deficit of $49,000,000; the balance sheet shows a loss of $83,000,000, while the bureau of statistics shows the loss of the railways to be $115,000,000. The reconciliation of these amounts has not taken place. The same thing may be said with respect to other matters connected with this one. There is no problem to which the Minister of Finance could give his attention comparable with the problem that arises from the railway situation. There is no problem which is so closely connected with the economic condition of this country.

Another related problem—and it is connected also with tariffs, with the development of our industrial life, with the lessening of the opportunity for men to find work—is the problem of unemployment. In connection with this I propose to say a few words. I have not forgotten the denunciations hurled across the floor of this house during the years that we held office. I have not forgotten the statements which were made during the general elections. I have not forgotten the fierceness of the attacks made upon myself and upon all those who had to deal with the problems then before us. On an occasion such as this I cannot help but refer to the language of the Prime Minister at the beginning of the elections of 1935, when he said:

> Since Mr. Bennett came into office, you have had even stronger reason for believing that unemployment is the most urgent of Canada's national problems. Each year you have seen its menacing shadow creep nearer and nearer your own doors; more and more you have felt its cruel privations in your homes. Everywhere to-day its terrors stalk abroad in our land. I doubt, however, if even this experience has been sufficient to cause you to realize to what proportions the problem has grown in the years of Mr. Bennett's administration. Let me give you the figures of the numbers of unemployed and of persons dependent upon relief, so far as it is possible to obtain them from government records.
> Taking the latest figures on employment supplied by the Bureau of Statistics, it can be shown that, on the most conservative basis, there are to-day over 400,000 wage earners out of work. If we go by the estimates of social workers, labour organizations and labour leaders, we shall not be far out if we place the number of unemployed at approximately half a million. To avoid the possibility of any exaggeration, I shall leave the total at over 400,000.

I have been speaking only of the unemployed. I have said nothing of the numbers on relief. You must be careful to distinguish between the two. Fortunately, it does not follow that, because men and women are unemployed, they go automatically upon relief. Similarly, it must not be supposed that, because men and women are employed for a part of the time, sooner or later, they may not find it necessary to accept relief for themselves and for those dependent upon them for support. Figures on direct relief are available from May, 1932, to May of this year. These figures, which include dependents and those receiving partial and part-time relief, reveal a startling increase, from year to year, of persons who have been compelled to receive state assistance. In May, 1932, there were 597,000 who, in this manner received direct relief. In May of this year there were 1,272,000.

They are, however, far from revealing the true picture. It is not with statistics, but with human lives, that we are concerned. You cannot measure fear, privation and want by any yardstick or adding machine. Who will venture to estimate what the enforced idleness of hundreds of thousands of human beings, and the enforced acceptance of relief from the state by a very much larger number, over a period of two, three, four and, for some, five years, has meant in the way of physical suffering, of mental anxiety, and of human anguish to lives and homes of which there is no record whatever? Who will venture to estimate what the effect of all this may be upon the health and morale of the nation? Is it any wonder that to-day there is widespread unrest and discontent throughout the land, and that, in the case of young and old alike, many are in a condition of despair?

Then followed a statement of the remedy proposed. There was to be the appointment of a commission and cooperation with the provinces which, with the exception of one, were governed by Liberal administrations. The Prime Minister continued:

The services of all departments of the federal government will be made available to the commission in any and all phases of its work. The Liberal party has no reason to doubt that the services of all departments of provincial governments will be made equally available. A guarantee of provincial cooperation is to be found in the fact that, save in one province, out of nine, Liberal governments are already in office.

The right hon. gentleman referred to the movement for a national government, and stated that in his opinion there could be no finer example of a national government than a Liberal government at Ottawa and Liberal governments in all the provinces. The right hon. gentleman then referred to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and myself and concluded by stating that his program was to have a national commission which would be asked by the Liberal government to secure cooperation in dealing with this problem.

I shall now give a short statement of the results. The bureau of statistics defines an unemployed person as follows:

The unemployed person in the following estimate is the person who could tell a census enumerator that he had worked as a wage-earner or that he had a wage-earning occupation, but is at present out of work (not through illness, accident, strike or lock-out, etc.)

This definition excludes the boy or girl of working age who has never worked at a steady job, also the boys or girls on the farm who would be wage earners under better circumstances.

The leader of the government used the figure of 400,000 on which he based his statistics. Here are the figures of the bureau of statistics brought up to date:

1931
May	440,000
June	437,000
July	431,000

The figures for the different months are given, and when we get to August, 1935, the bureau puts the figure at 492,000. The figures for the following months are:

1935
September	455,000
October	435,000
November	479,000
December	546,000

Then coming down to January, 1937, the bureau gives the figure of 500,000. That is the figure that is now given.

Turning to relief, the leader of the government used the figure of 1,272,000, although the bureau's figure is different. Before I come to that, I will give the figures that the leader of the government gave in his speech on October 8, when, nearly overcome with emotion after listening to eight Liberal premiers in the Maple Leaf Gardens, Toronto, he referred to the unemployed as having reached figures for different months of 1,322,668; 1,197,657; 1,103,690, and so on. These figures may or may not be accurate.

At any rate the government came into office and appointed a national employment commission consisting of Arthur B. Purvis, as chairman; A. N. McLean, Alfred Marois, Tom Moore, Mrs. Mary M. Sutherland, W. A. Mackintosh and Mr. E. J. Young. Major Hugh Spencer Relph was secretary; Miss C. Whitton, co-ordination of aid, and Ray Brown, director of publicity. V. C. Phelan, former private secretary of Mr. Heenan when he was minister, was made director of registration. A youth employment committee was appointed, as follows: Alan Chambers, chairman; Robert F. Thompson, Joseph McCulley, W. C. Nickerson, Andre Montpetit.

Sessional paper 128A, filed on January 29, 1937, covers approximately thirty-five orders in council dealing with appointments. We have no record of the amounts that may have been expended for adding machines and the like. But I want this house to take note of what has been done by this government since it came into office to solve the unemployment problem, and when hon. members hear it I think they will have a better appreciation of just what is involved than they now have. First is the order in council appointing the National Employment Commission. Next is an order in council of June 6, 1936, appointing Major Relph secretary of the commission at a salary of $400 a month to be paid from moneys provided by parliament. Then on July 9, 1936, another order in council was passed, and listen to this:

The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, advise that, under the provisions of the National Employment Commission Act 1936, the following persons be appointed to the staff of the National Employment Commission:

Mr. Oscar F. Martin, clerk messenger, grade 2, at a salary of $1,080 per annum;

Miss Betty Brice, stenographer, grade 2, at a salary of $1,080 per annum;

Mr. H. P. Gardiner, head filing clerk, grade 4, at a salary of $1,680 per annum;

Mr. Harry Baldwin, superintendent in charge of relief division, at a salary of $4,500 per annum;

Next is an order in council dated July 17, 1936, appointing Mrs. Hazel C. Binks to the staff of the commission as a stenographer, grade 2, at a salary of $90 per month, effective from and including July 14, 1936. Next is an order in council dated August 1, 1936, recommending that——authority be granted for payment of the sum of $113.66, being expenses incurred in connection with a conference of members of the Canadian Welfare Council, on the question of national registration and classification of persons on relief—the amount in question to be paid from vote No. 332.

Next is an order in council of August 7, 1936, appointing a bilingual assistant secretary to the National Employment Commission and recommending that——Edward Fournier be appointed at a salary of three hundred dollars per month, less statutory deductions, chargeable to vote 332 of the special supplementary estimates, effective upon assumption of duties.

Next is an order in council of August 7, 1936, appointing Mr. John A. Bethune clerk on the staff of the commission at a salary of $1,500 per annum.

The next order in council is dated August 21, 1936, appointing Mr. T. W. O'Neill secretary to executive at $145 per month, and Mary Alberta Veniot, stenographer grade 2, at $90 per month.

The next is an order in council of August 21, 1936, appointing Mr. Phelan as director of registration at a salary of $3,960 per annum —and he is already a civil servant.

Mr. ROGERS: A number of these employees are transferred from other branches.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. The salaries were not, though. Next is an order in council dated August 21, 1936, recommending that authority be granted——to pay to the National Employment Commission the sum of $1,000 out of vote No. 332, as an advance to the commission to cover expenses of individuals or groups whose services may be required by the commission.

Then on August 21, 1936, this order in council was passed, and this is a jewel:

The undersigned has before him recommendation from the National Employment Commission that it is considered that the tabulations of relief scales, etc., first prepared by the Canadian Welfare Council, in 1935, provide information which the commission should have.

That to obtain this information through the commission's own offices would involve not only considerable expense but also loss of time, and that its revision up to date and the incorporation of similar information respecting a number of smaller relief authorities, not dealt with in the tabulations already prepared, can most efficiently and cheaply be secured from the Canadian Welfare Council. The commission considers that a fair estimate of the cost of this revision would be approximately $750 but recommend that $500 be paid to the welfare council therefor.

And where did the information come from? From the bureau of statistics.

Then on August 20, 1936, an order in council was passed appointing Mr. David Shepherd as a special adviser to the National Employment Commission at a salary of $625 a month, to date from September 1, 1936. On September 2, 1936, an order in council was passed recommending the appointment of a youth employment committee, consisting of the following: Alan Chambers, R. F. Thompson, Joseph McCulley, Andre Montpetit, W. Clifford Nickerson, and they are to receive a living allowance of $15 per diem and travelling expenses while engaged on the work of the committee, such allowances and expenses to be in effect from the date of appointment, and to be chargeable to vote 332, special supplementary estimates, 1936-37.

On September 10, 1936, an order in council was passed approving of the appointments which had been recommended of T. W. O'Neill and Mary Alberta Veniot. On September 11, 1936, an order in council was passed authorizing Mr. Thomas Moore to act as vice-chairman of the commission when Mr. Purvis is away. On September 17, 1936, an order in council was passed appointing Miss B. Campbell, stenographer grade 2, at $90 per month, and J. M. Wyatt, supervisor of statistics, registration branch, at $175 per month. On September 17, 1936, an order in council was passed appointing Adelaide Guylist, stenographer grade 2, at $90 per month; Helen Mary Ross, typist grade 1, at $65 per month, and Grace Daniels, stenographer grade 2, at $90 per month.

On September 30, 1936, the board recommended the following appointments:

1. J. F. Fitzpatrick, supervisor, machine section, at a salary of $175 per month, from September 4, 1936.
2. Clerk, grade 4, at a salary of $135 per month: P. Stuchen, from September 1, 1936.
3. Clerks, grade 3, at a salary of $115 per month: K. Marsh, and J. W. Valiquette, from September 1, 1936; Misses L. Corbett and M. Weston, from September 4, 1936.
4. Clerks, grade 2, at a salary of $90 per month: A. J. R. Ash, Miss L. Bonnell, I. Bodie, S. Charet, J. E. Jolin, M. A. Keating, H. C. Manning, E. Richer and E. C. Roquet, from September 4, 1936; C. B. Costello, Mrs. I. Legault, R. W. Scott and R. C. Woolam from September 9, 1936; W. J. Blake, Mrs. A. M. Craik, H. Dunne, Miss M. Ewart, E. R. Jackson, J. Leslie and F. Pain, from September 10, 1936; T. G. Bailey, Miss B. Quilty and C. J. Sly, from September 11, 1936; A. J. Saunders, from September 12, 1936; R. H. Borehan and S. Karam, from September 15, 1936; R. H. Braman, N. C. Donoghue, J. E. Drinkwater, A. G. McLeod, D. Moorman and C. de Salaberry, from September 17, 1936; H. G. Latham, H. L. Osborne and C. G. Parmelee, from September 21, 1936; S. L. Morrissey from September 23, 1936; and E. F. Lyons, from September 25, 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: These are all connected with registration.

Mr. BENNETT: The order in council continues:

5. Office appliance operators, grade II, at a salary of $85 per month: Miss A. Devine, W. W. Lester, G. Chene and Misses H. Calladine, H. Doyle, G. Lanthier, M. McCarthy, M. Martin and Mrs. G. Giroux; Miss S. Donohue, Miss B. Huard and Mrs. H. M. Cairns; Misses J. Andrews, F. Ellard, L. Gouin, M. Noonan, M. Macdonald; Mrs. A. Gagnon, Mrs. V. M. Gorman, Mrs. B. O'Malley; Misses G. Cosgrove and D. Macdonald.

And the following between the dates mentioned: Garneau, Byrnes and Lipman, at $85 per month, as appliance operators.

Then we come to the next order, September 30, 1936, chargeable to the same vote: clerks, grade II, at $90 per month, Black, Ferguson, Fraser, Grainger, Ketchum, Morrisette, Coghill, Coghlan, James, Marselis, Richard, Tank, Lett, Prestly, Richard. Office appliance operators, grade II, salary $85 per month, Dennis, Gallant and McCadden. On October 7, 1936, special supplementary estimate, office appliance operators, grade II, salary $85 per month, McLaughlin, Aubry, and Dumoulin. On October 8, 1936, salaries to be charged as follows: Raoul Landriault, $80 per month, Florence Morris, and Marie Miller, $90 per month.

The minister further recommends that Miss Charlotte Whitton, executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council, be appointed in connection with specialist work on the relief sections of the act, such appointment to be effective from November 15, 1936, to March 31, 1937, at a remuneration of $25 per diem plus actual travelling expenses, same to be chargeable to vote No. 332. Ray Austin Brown becomes a director of publicity for the department at a salary of $4,500 per annum, to be paid out of the same vote subject to the provisions of the Salary Deduction Act, the appointment to date from October 14, 1936.

On November 3, 1936, Mrs. Ferguson of Westville, N.S., Madame Cormier of Montreal, Miss Ruth Low, of Kitchener, Mrs. Walter Lindal of Winnipeg and Mrs. A. J. Currie of Govan, receive appointments from that date. An order of the same date appoints Mr. Arthur Hemming as clerk, grade 2. Then we have Paul Masse, "who has been attached to the staff of the Employment and Social Insurance Commission since April 1, 1936" to be appointed to the staff of the National Employment Commission at a salary of $115 per month; this order is dated November 3. On November 12, 1936, it is stated that a youth employment committee has been formed, and that the members of that committee are eligible to receive, in lieu of a detailed accounting, a living allowance of $15 per day, and that when travelling outside of Ottawa the living expenses of the chairman, Mr. Alan Chambers, may be larger than those incurred by the ordinary members; that his work will involve travelling to various points, and therefore it is recommended that he be paid an increase of $5 per diem more than the other members, to be charged against the vote. On December 17, 1936, the board recommend the appointment of one Wyatt as supervisor of the coding section, whatever that may be.

Mr. ROGERS: It is all connected with registration as provided in the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: It gives as clerks, grade 4, at $135 per month, Stuchen, and Roquet; clerks grade 3, $115 per month, Marsh, Valiquette, Corbett and Weston and Pain; stenographer, $90 per month, Campbell, and a number of clerks, grade 2, and office appliance operators. By an order in council of January

8, 1937, McKinnon and Latremouille are appointed stenographers at $90 per month. On January 8, 1937, the salary of O'Neill, $145, is increased to $200 per month; Gardiner, at $140, is increased to $150. On the same date Maysie Roger is temporarily appointed as supervisor of social statistics at a salary of $115 per month. Then follow, on January 15, Bethune and Landriault, at $160 and $90 per month respectively.

These are the contents of the orders in council brought down to January 15. My purpose in directing attention to these is to show that, instead of utilizing the existing machinery of the bureau of statistics, what has been done is to endeavour to build up another bureau of statistics, with adding machines, with machines for computation and various other equipment, so taking the place of the bureau of statistics. What is more—

Mr. ROGERS: That was looked into most carefully.

Mr. BENNETT: And the information which is utilized by the department itself comes from the bureau of statistics and is handed out by officials who are connected with it. A long distance telephone call comes from Montreal to the bureau of statistics for the purpose of getting information, and it is given as though it were new information by the department over which the minister presides. The bureau of statistics is the place to which one would expect to look for the purpose of getting the information which we require. We have not been permitted, heretofore at least, to have any doubt about the fact that that was the place to which figures were sent from all parts of the dominion for the purpose of enabling information to be obtained. Why build up this second institution? Why establish a second organization? What has this organization done since it came into office?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: What has this commission done? It has employed all these people I have mentioned, from a director of publicity at $4,500 to a vice president, down in Montreal, at $625 per month, and other officials beyond number. I wonder what the right hon. gentleman would have said, had he been in opposition, in face of a record such as this, the supplanting of the bureau which was created for the purpose of providing the very statistics which are utilized to enable this new body to function, and which statistics, I repeat, have been collected and collated by that bureau and not by the organization which has now been set up

The Prime Minister said at the opening and frequently during the course of the last election campaign that this unemployment problem is the most serious of all the problems that engage the attention of the Canadian people.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: That was his view, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) very properly says, "hear, hear." Yet in the face of that statement, and in spite of what was to result from the cooperative effort of eight Liberal governments in the provinces with this dominion Liberal government, we have thus far only the appointment of this commission, and the record of the long months during which it has laboured, at a cost to the country which I cannot yet indicate because I do not know—in this return we have only a portion of the cost. And the Minister of Finance the other day, in the estimates which he gave for the succeeding year, in reviewing the problems with which we had to deal, left that problem to be dealt with by itself.

I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Casselman;

That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to deal with the problem of unemployment.

In so doing I realize that it is the amendment with which the present government in opposition met us when we were struggling with that problem in 1931, 1932 and 1933. It was then that the Minister of National Defence used to wax so eloquent and become so violent in his denunciation of the government of the day. But the amendment embodies the hopes and aspirations of the people of this country who looked to this government, and have looked in vain, for a solution—not an academic principle, by the gathering of figures that already exist, the accumulation of machines which can be worked by paid operators at large expense when we already have the machines and the men working on these matters in other branches of the public service; not the duplication of existing facilities; not the reckless expenditure of public moneys. With confidence therefore I submit that the problem of unemployment, named by the Prime Minister as the most important of all the problems that confront this country—a sentiment greeted with "hear, hear" from the Minister of Justice himself—should be given the freest possible discussion in this house and the policy of the government disapproved or vindicated.

Before I take my seat may I now give the quotation respecting the wheat estimate which I was unable to find. At page 4147 of Hansard of June 23, 1936, the Minister of Finance, in answer to a question I asked him as to why he was putting in a vote fixing the loss at $15,000,000 without knowing what it was going to be, said: "Because the money is going to be lost." That is what I wished to say about the $15,000,000.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to repeal the Employment and Social Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have with us tonight a gentleman who has given his life to the study of labour problems and who is considered wherever he is known as an international expert on the matter. I have before me a book which was kindly given me some years ago, from which I should like to make the following quotation, which appears at page 345:

> Social insurance, which in reality is health insurance in one form or another, is a means employed in most industrial countries to bring about a wider measure of social justice, without, on the one hand, disturbing the institution of private property and its advantages to the community, or, on the other, imperilling the thrift and industry of individuals. Social insurance looks upon industry as in the nature of social service. It regards the owner of land or capital as a capitalist, but also as a public trustee. It looks upon the worker in industry as a wage earner, but equally as a necessary member of the community. It places the emphasis on personality rather than on property, and on life rather than on wealth.

I could proceed further and read more from that book, but I refer every hon. member of this house to pages 335, 345 and 347 of Industry and Humanity, the book written nineteen years ago by the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King). I said the right hon. gentleman was known as an international expert on labour problems. I wonder if in 1935, when he introduced his social legislation, the then prime minister sought any advice from the right hon. gentleman to whom I have referred. I do not think so. Who was the honorary precursor to the big broadcast of 1935, with regard to social insurance in particular? On the first page of the Montreal Gazette of September 20, 1934, several months before the big broadcast of January, 1935, there appeared a great scoop. It was entitled:

> Insurance for Jobless Plan Waits Bennett.
> Premier to Launch Scheme on Return, Pitfield Announces.

That is the very same Pitfield who sold a picture to the Tory government for $45,000.

> Combat Unemployment.
> Success Depends on Provincial Agreement, New Conservative Head Declares.

I wonder who was the Conservative head. I have never seen one. Now let us come to the big broadcast of 1935, and I should like to quote from our esteemed contemporary, the Ottawa Journal. I am not speaking now; this is the big broadcast. Listen to it. The old order was gone; we were seeing the dawn of the new order. This is how the big broadcast put it:

> We are going to do away, as quickly as possible, with emergency relief measures and put in a permanent system of sound and scientific insurance against unemployment.

On February 23 of this year the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said, according to Hansard at page 1137:

> . . . the remarkable thing about this proceeding is that the leadership of this house has evidently passed to the hon. member for Témiscouata.

That statement is so ridiculous that it does not need to be contradicted. In labour matters in particular the leader of the Liberal party is my leader and I am proud to be his disciple. What struck me, however, was that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was adopting the line of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who on March 4 of last year blamed the member for Temiscouata for submitting to this house legislation to repeal the non-existent economic council.

In view of what has been said by these hon. gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote as briefly as possible what the member for Temiscouata has said about the social insurance scheme which was advertised in January, 1935, by the leader of the Tory party, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett). Before that, however, no one should forget that at the time the social insurance bill was introduced into this house the then prime minister stated that it was not a relief measure. Now I should like to give some quotations from what was said by the member who has the honour to address the house at the present time:

This parliament is supreme within the bounds of its jurisdiction, as the provincial legislatures are also supreme within the bounds of their own jurisdiction. There is a supremacy in each domain. There are certain things that this parliament alone can do and there are other things that the provinces alone can do. . . . I am not going to repeat what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), but the point that is to be made in this regard is that it is not because a convention has been signed by Canada that the provinces are necessarily bound by it. We have the proof of this in the fact that the previous government did not take and would not have taken action on that, as was said by our leader, without consulting the provinces.

After having made a careful study of the constitution of this country and of the jurisprudence which interprets it, I have come to the conclusion that no tribunal will declare that the legislation which is now submitted to us is intra vires. Any judge, free from political affiliation, with a free mind, will hold that this legislation is ultra vires of this parliament. . . . This legislation will surely be brought before the courts and there is no court that will declare it intra vires. But in the meantime we shall have elections and the prime minister—

I meant the then prime minister, not the present one—

—his colleagues, his supporters and his ambassadors—

At the time I said "his canvassers"—

—will say: This is what we have done for the unemployed; we have given you unemployment insurance. Forty weeks! In the meantime we shall have elections. For the time this legislation will be approved by the Governor General until the election day, canvassing will have been done throughout the country. After the legislation is declared ultra vires by the courts, the Prime Minister, who will then be leader of the opposition..

The prediction was right.

—if he succeeds in being elected in his constituency—

And he was, because he was not opposed by the Social Credit group.

—will say: This is not my fault; the judiciary have given a wrong interpretation to my legislation—

Was it not said? The quotation is from Hansard of February 18, 1935. I knew the leader of the Tory party well enough to predict two years ahead what he would say when the legislation was declared ultra vires by the privy council.

An hon. MEMBER: Wonderful.

Mr. POULIOT: I know the hon. member for Lanark, and I would make the prediction that he will surely be defeated at the next election.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. THOMPSON: Thank you.

Mr. POULIOT: I continued:

But I did my best;—

The leader of the Tory party would have said—

—I submitted it to the House of Commons; it was passed by the house and by the senate and was approved by the governor general; I can do no more; it is not my fault. In the meantime it will be used as an argument for canvassing people who are in distress.

That was true, because I have in my hand a sample of the canvassing that was done. The gentleman in the upper part of the picture is the present Prime Minister. He is represented as sitting with his feet on his desk. Lower down is Mr. Bennett, the businessman of 1935, with a sheet of paper in his hand. It must have been a speech prepared by Herridge, Finlayson or Brooks of the Bank of Canada. Here we see social insurance, as a means of canvassing people in distress, and showing them a bait which had no value.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member says "hear, hear," but they have to admit it. They should be ashamed of themselves for having used such silly propaganda in Quebec. It is in red, white and blue—three-coloured propaganda. It was used not only against me but against other candidates.

But that is not all. The member for Témiscouata, on this eventful day of February 18, 1935, proceeded as follows:

What I would ask of the Prime Minister and his colleagues is to submit this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to have the opinion of the highest tribunal in this country on it. I will make no motion in that regard, but in view of the decisions which have been quoted by the hon. members for Quebec East and for Shelburne-Yarmouth I want to have the opinion of the judiciary upon this legislation.

Some figures of employment were quoted by the leader of the Tory party showing the numbers employed when the previous Liberal government was in office. If he had agreed to give them, the same figures would have applied to the unemployed while he was in office. Then, poetry was quoted by the leader of the Tory party, and very amusing and interesting rhymes were published in the Citizen. I am sure every hon. member has those rhymes in his scrap book, and I shall not read them. The matter is too pressing.

Then, on March 7, three weeks after the question was first put to the leader of the Tory party, the very same question was put to the then acting leader, as follows:

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the acting leader of the government if he does not entertain a different view from that expressed by his leader, and if he is ready in the absence of his leader to submit this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Sir George Perley answered most graciously as follows:

Certainly not. If this legislation is objected to afterwards possibly someone will take it to the supreme court, but we are not going to do it at the present time.

Then, sir, the member for Témiscouata concluded as follows:

How long will it be before this insurance comes into force? This is only election propaganda, and that is why I denounce it. I was the only one to express myself against it, but if it were to come to a vote again I would do the same thing. I am strongly opposed to it, because it is all humbug, deceit and cant. That is all there is to it. I am afraid of the road to Damascus; I am afraid of those people who have Tory souls and Tory minds, and who are bold enough to call themselves Liberals. Liberalism is a mentality, a doctrine, and to be a Liberal one should be in touch with the people; one should know the sufferings of the people; one should not be a despot, with flatterers all about telling anything but the truth. This legislation is a great joke but it is a sad joke; it is too bad to take advantage of the troubles, the misery and the misfortunes of the people for political capital. It is shameful. If there are some people credulous enough to think this legislation will be of any assistance to the poor and humble people of this country who have suffered so much because of the policies of the government, I have the greatest compassion for them. They will get nothing out of this legislation. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here; I regret very much that his ill health keeps him away, but on the treasury benches we have several of his cabinet ministers who have not the courage to tell him that this legislation, which was imposed on him by his election managers, is of no use and will serve no purpose to the common good of this country. That is why I am so sorry about what is happening now.

The charge that this so-called social legislation was pure political propaganda was never denied. It was that very thing, and that is why every member of the Liberal party, from our leader to its most humble disciple, both in and out of the house, has denounced that vague legislation so bitterly. Sometimes there are compensations in life, and the recent judgments of the privy council would seem to come under that heading. They furnish justification for what was said by the members of the Liberal party when they were denouncing the fake Bennett legislation of 1935.

I should like to draw the attention of every hon. member of this house to Votes and Proceedings of February 10, 1937. I wonder if hon. members have read the judgments of the privy council which appear in these Votes and Proceedings with the care that they deserve? The contentions of the dominion and of the provinces are summarized at page 109. I direct attention to section 9 of article 405 of the treaty of Versailles which is to be found at the bottom of page 110. In that treaty a distinction is made between draft and proper conventions. I quote from page 111 as follows:

In 1925 the governor general in council referred to the Supreme Court questions as to the obligations of Canada under the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and as to whether the legislatures of the provinces were the authorities within whose competence the subject matter of the conventions lay. The answers to the reference, which are to be found in 1925 S.C.R. 505, were that the legislatures of the provinces were the competent authorities to deal with the subject matter, save in respect of dominion servants, and the parts of Canada not within the boundaries of any province: and that the obligation of Canada was to bring the convention before the lieutenant governor of each province to enable him to bring the appropriate subject matter before the legislature of his province, and to bring the matter before the dominion parliament in respect of so much of the convention as was within their competence. This advice appears to have been accepted, and no further steps were taken until those which took place as stated above in 1935.

The obligations imposed by treaty may have to be performed, if at all, by several legislatures: and the executive have the task of obtaining the legislative assent not of the one parliament to whom they may be responsible; but possibly of several parliaments to whom they stand in no direct relation. The question is not how is the obligation formed, that is the function of the executive: but how is the obligation to be performed and that depends upon the authority of the competent legislature or legislatures.

And then on page 113:

It appears that all the members of the Supreme Court rejected the contention based on section 132 and their Lordships are in full agreement with them.

I am sure that hon. members are familiar with these judgments, but I should like to quote further from page 114 as follows:

It would be remarkable that while the dominion could not initiate legislation however desirable which affected civil rights in the provinces, yet its government not responsible to the provinces nor controlled by provincial parliaments need only agree with a foreign country to enact such legislation: and its parliament would be forthwith clothed with authority to affect provincial rights to the full extent of such agreement. Such a result would appear to undermine the constitutional safeguards of provincial constitutional autonomy.

It follows from what has been said that no further legislative competence is obtained by the dominion from its accession to international status, and the consequent increase in the scope of its executive functions.

And from page 115:

In other words, the dominion cannot merely by making promises to foreign countries clothe itself with legislative authority inconsistent with the constitution which gave it birth.

I draw the attention of the house to the following very excellent comparison:

While the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the water-tight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure.

That ruling is the preamble or the prefatory notice to the other rulings given by the privy council. I should like to quote some extracts from the decision of their lordships with regard to the social insurance act, as follows:

In the present case their lordships agree with the majority of the supreme court in holding that in pith and substance this act is an insurance act affecting the civil rights of employers and employed in each province, and as such is invalid. The other parts of the act are so inextricably mixed up with the insurance provisions of part III that it is impossible to sever them. It seems obvious also that in its truncated form, apart from part III, the act would never have come into existence. It follows that the whole act must be pronounced ultra vires, and in accordance with the view of the majority of the supreme court their lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal be dismissed.

It was after reading those judgments that I gave notice of these bills to repeal these enactments. The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) strongly supported my argument when, as reported on pages 1235 and 1236 of Hansard of February 23, he stated that this so-called social legislation was a dead letter and would never be incorporated in the new revision of the dominion statutes.

In order that a piece of legislation may serve its purpose it must be declared valid by the courts. Theoretically I am in favour of social insurance, but social insurance must be established in times of great prosperity in order to secure a larger number of contributors to the insurance fund. But, sir, enactments in this regard must be passed by the proper authority, and when the privy council formally decided that this parliament had no authority to pass legislation of the kind, it meant that exclusive jurisdiction lay within the provinces.

We must be honest with the representatives of labour who come to Ottawa to communicate their grievances to the government. Some of them are advocating social insurance. Let us be frank with them and tell them that they are knocking at the wrong door, that if they want to have proper legislation, legislation that will mean something and that will be upheld by the courts of the land should there come before the courts the case of a contributor refusing to make his contribution, the legislation must be passed by the provincial legislatures. That is clear. Why receive their representations in the matter if we can do nothing for them? Would it not be rendering a service to labour to tell them that if they have any wrongs to be redressed they must go to Quebec or Toronto or Halifax or Edmonton or Victoria, to the capitals of every province, and ask the premiers of the provinces and the members of their governments to consider, and pass if they wish, the legislation that labour asks for? Honesty is the best policy, and members of parliament will be honest with themselves and honest also with the representatives of labour if they pass the bill which is now before the house for its second reading.

I shall not say anything about the commission which has been appointed in virtue of the act which is about to be repealed. When the dried and sterile fig tree is cut, the dead branches fall, and therefore it is unnecessary at the moment to speak of the commission which was supposed to administer that act, but which had nothing to do.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I ask every member to take the trouble to read the rulings of the privy council which will be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 20, of February 10 last, and I am sure that all of them will come to the conclusion that the bill which is now before the house for second reading is timely, is necessary, and should be passed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, now that my hon. friend (Mr. Pouliot) has given to the house the benefit of his views and also his argument with respect to the legislation, each of which presentations has disclosed much erudition and great industry, I hope he will not deem me discourteous if I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. POULIOT: Not at all.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

WEEKLY REST IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to repeal the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act.

He said: My remarks on this bill, Mr. Speaker, will be very brief. I would just refer every member of the house to the Sunday legislation and to the judgments of the privy council already referred to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

MINIMUM WAGES ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, to repeal the Minimum Wages Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that I have time to say a few words on the second reading of this bill. The labour members of the house know very well that the member for Témiscouata was very much interested in the minimum wage legislation for men as well as for women. The other day I saw in a Quebec paper that the provincial government was about to introduce legislation of the kind. That is good news, provided the legislation is well drafted.

May I refer you, sir, to Hansard of March 19, 1935? We have our vindication here now. It is a feast day to-day, thanks to the privy council. First of all, there is something that I do not understand very well. It is that some pillars of light who have discussed this legislation have spoken of conventions. There were no conventions respecting the matter. They were just draft conventions which were quoted to the House of Commons and the Senate as treaties, but actually they were not conventions or treaties, just draft conventions, and they were accepted by the late government after the limitation of time provided in each of these draft conventions had expired.

I refer you, sir, to Hansard of March 19, 1935, and of April 12, 1935, which contain quotations of the communications forwarded by the Liberal government before 1930 to the League of Nations respecting the matter of minimum wages. The member for Témiscouata was fortunate enough to discover those forms in a small book that was in the library. By referring to Hansard one will see that the previous Liberal government had sent to the League of Nations, not their own answer, but the answers of the provinces themselves, thus respecting the decision rendered by the supreme court in 1925 in similar matters. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King) was communicating with the League of Nations he was sending, not orders in council passed by the dominion government, but answers given by the following provinces: British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. The ex-minister of Justice, Mr. Guthrie, could never answer that point, which showed that the late government's legislation with respect to minimum wages was as much a fake as that relating to social insurance. The Liberal government before 1930 was logical, as I hope it is now, and acted in conformity with the views expressed in public by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet. What is the use of passing legislation in the House of Commons and the Senate if it is not enforced by the courts? And how can a tribunal of first instance decide that such legislation is valid when the highest tribunal has decided that it is ultra vires and void? In such matters the decision of the last tribunal serves as a rule of guidance for the lower courts.

On June 28, 1935, the present Prime Minister spoke as follows: On the item—

Administration of hours of labour, weekly rest and minimum wages acts, $100,000.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The government seems now to be showing some concern about the constitutionality of its measures and in view of that attitude I should like to know if the minister does not think it might be wise to consider testing the validity of one, two or three of these acts before entering upon their administration on too vast a scale?

Mr. Rhodes: There is nothing I can add to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said on one or two different occasions when similar questions were put to him by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I shall direct the Prime Minister's attention to this question in the event of his desiring to enlarge upon what he has said previously.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The trouble is that in the early part of the session the Prime Minister did not seem to care much about the matter of constitutionality but during the latter part he has seemed to be greatly concerned. We should like to know just where the government stands now.

Mr. Rhodes: If I possessed the necessary legal background—

And curiously enough he was a lawyer.

—I might attempt to answer the question myself, but not having that I prefer to leave it to the Prime Minister.

Look how meek they were all the time! No spirit of initiative; all under the whip.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I can quite appreciate the fact that no member of the government feels himself able to give an answer.

That was the experience of every Liberal member while the party was in opposition. A very efficient cabinet; everyone should have received an efficiency medal.

Mr. Pouliot: This so-called social legislation was the main issue in the provincial campaign in New Brunswick which ended yesterday and I think the answer was loud enough.

For the benefit of the new members may I mention that once, when the minister of labour in the former government was introducing an amendment to one of his bills, and was asked what it was about, he could not tell. Though he was moving the amendment he did not know what it meant. Many old members can verify my statement. The dunderheadedness of these ministers was something out of the ordinary, yet these are the people who afterwards went around telling labour that they were going to save them. How could they save them if they did not know what they were going to do to save them? I should be scandalized, Mr. Speaker, to read any further.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

LIMITATION OF HOURS OF WORK ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, to repeal the Limitation of Hours of Work Act.

He said: The incident that I have just referred to, the fact that the minister could not give any details about the amendment that he was moving, happened while we were discussing the bill that I desire should be repealed. This also is a fake and a humbug; it never came into effect. I cannot see why it should not be repealed at once.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a point of order. I wish to direct the attention of the chair to the rules. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has prevented the opposition, members of a free parliament, from entering into discussion of the merits of three bills introduced to-night by moving the adjournment of the debate. If practices such as this are to be tolerated, hon. members might as well go home. We should know whether this is to be a free parliament or not. One of the first principles of liberalism is a free parliament and freedom of debate, yet members of the opposition have been prevented by two hon. members on the government side from debating these matters. I wish, as representing the constituency of Broadview, to protest against the action of the Prime Minister in rising in his seat and moving the adjournment, evidently after having consulted the hon. member who moved the bill—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: And preventing His Majesty's loyal opposition from discussing this repeal legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any hon. member has the right to move that the debate on a bill be adjourned. The point of order raised by the hon. member is not well taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that it is the privilege of any hon. member in a free parliament to move the adjournment of a debate. If the hon. member who has just protested had been in his seat at the time that his leader, or rather the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who sits near by, was protesting against the taking up of this legislation, he might not have felt that there was any need to make the protest that he did. The legislation has been before the house previously and will be again; there will be an opportunity for the hon. member to discuss it later; but in the absence of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, each of whom is much interested in this particular legislation, I think I was acting very much on behalf of the opposition as well as of the government in moving the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

NATURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, to repeal the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and the Natural Products Marketing Act Amendment Act, 1935.

He said: I hope the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., (Mr. Fraser) will not complain if I move the second reading of this bill to repeal the Natural Products Marketing Act and the Natural Products Marketing Act Amendment Act. That legislation was silly. Its purpose was to erect a kind of tariff wall between the provinces. The tariff wall around this country was not high enough, so there was to be a new Chinese wall between each province. It was a great invention. I wonder from what country the model of this stupid legislation came. May I draw to your attention, sir, the fact that our legislation is drafted in an abominable way. I have cited the instance of a minister who could not give any explanation of one of his pet amendments and bills; he could not explain anything. How could a judge understand anything when the sponsor does not know anything himself? It is a most absurd situation. As a lawyer who has had much experience before the courts, you, sir, know very well that very often the judges are handicapped in giving their decisions by the obscurity of the law. We do not want legislation of that kind.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on his very bright idea of advertising Canadian products. The farmers should do the same as any merchant or storekeeper, advertise their merchandise and then deliver the goods, sell the very merchandise that they advertise. And any money which is spent for advertising Canadian products will serve a very useful purpose. But, sir, I could tell the house of many incidents which occurred during that discussion, some very picturesque, especially a discussion one night between the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., and the present provincial leader of the Tory party in Ontario. It was most exciting But I shall not insist any more, sir, I hope every hon. member will accept the views already expressed, and by reading the judgment given by the privy council will be convinced that the only thing to do is to repeal this bad legislation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Unless the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) wishes to speak, I shall move the adjournment of the debate. If he wishes to speak, I shall give him the chance.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DOMINION TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION ACT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935.

He said: The other bills are for the repeal of the whole enactment in each case, but this one is to repeal the part of the act which has been declared ultra vires by the privy council. By declaring that section ultra vires the privy council gave a judgment of the utmost importance. It means that without the section which has been declared ultra vires this act is of no use at all. It is like a human being without a heart. That happens often, but a human body should have a heart in it to be normal.

This is going fine. Every bill has made a little progress to-night, and I hope that hon. members if there are any, who have not read the judgments of the privy council will take this last opportunity to do so, before the bill passes the committee stage and third reading and goes to the senate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Unless the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) wishes to speak on the second reading of this bill, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It was my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak to the main motion. Accordingly if I may have the assurance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that my position will not be altered in respect to the main motion, and that my privilege of speaking to that motion will not be lost, I now ask you to allow me to withdraw from the debate on the amendment, with the stipulation that I speak first immediately after the vote on the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly; if my hon. friend does not wish to speak on the amendment but wishes to speak on the main motion, he will have a perfect right to speak on the main motion when the amendment is disposed of. It is quite agreeable to the government that he should speak then.

Mr. CHURCH: This is all part of the Liberal platform of 1919.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I am speaking to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) at the conclusion of his speech this afternoon. In doing so I propose to speak in more temperate language than was used by him, with a greater sense of responsibility than was evident in his concluding remarks, and with a more scrupulous regard for the realities of the situation which confronts our country.

Why was this amendment introduced in the form in which it has been presented to this house? Was it because the leader of the opposition was convinced in his own heart and mind that there has not been a marked improvement in the employment situation in this country during the past year? To that question the only answer can be an emphatic negative. The evidence of economic improvement in Canada does not need to be adduced in the form of elaborate statistics. That improvement is evidenced in practically every statement issued by the bureau of statistics within the past year, by the statements which have been issued and circulated throughout this country by bank presidents, by heads of mortgage corporations, and by those who by reason of their interests and their particular knowledge of different phases of industrial life in this country are competent to speak with authority. There can be no question whatsoever that the employment situation in Canada at this time is substantially better than it was a year ago, and very much better indeed than it was at any time during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were charged with the administration of this country.

Was this amendment introduced, sir, because the leader of the opposition had some constructive suggestion to offer after five years of extravagant futility, in attempting to deal with a problem which he said he would solve or perish in the attempt? I leave it to the judgment of the house whether in anything that was said by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon there was the slightest suggestion of any constructive effort which might assist in dealing with this grave national problem. The one compelling reason for the amendment, as given to this house in the concluding remarks of the leader of the opposition, was briefly this, that he had proposed this amendment because it was the same sort of amendment the Liberal opposition had proposed when his own administration was in power. In other words the leader of the opposition has decided first to misrepresent the unemployment situation in this country and then to use it for the purpose of political reprisal.

I doubt if the records of this house will disclose a more inappropriate amendment to a budget speech or one based upon a more flagrant distortion or misunderstanding of the facts. The leader of the opposition based his amendment chiefly upon a recital of the appointments made to the staff of the National Employment Commission. I shall deal with that aspect of the matter in a few moments, but I have too keen an interest in the problem of unemployment and too high a regard for the appreciation of that problem by the members of this house to subordinate the larger considerations of unemployment policy to a discussion of an aspect of the matter which after all does not go to the root of the question. This administration has been in office since October, 1935. When the late administration came into office it did so on the basis of the most emphatic pledges given by the leader of the Conservative party that he would end unemployment; that he would provide work and not doles; that he would blast his way into the markets of the world. When he came into power on his own statement the number of unemployed in this country was 117,000. When the present administration assumed office and the right hon. gentleman left it, in October of 1935, according to the bureau of statistics the number of unemployed had risen to 435,000. In case there should be any misapprehension as to the improvement that has taken place during the past year at this point I should like to say—and I propose to deal with it more fully later—that the figures of the bureau of statistics for October, 1936, are not 435,000 but 393,000, which I submit is a very substantial reduction in that period of time.

What was the situation when this government came into power? What was the situation as between the dominion government and the provincial governments? Were those relations based upon harmony or were they not shot through with friction from one end of this dominion to the other? What was the attitude of the younger people? What was the attitude that was engendered in the relief camps which were established by the late administration, more or less, I suggest, as a counsel of despair, and which provided as it were a chain of hostels for the unemployed from Nova Scotia to British Columbia? I do not think I need remind hon. members that those relief camps, which at that time had been in existence for a number of years, harboured men of ages varying from eighteen to sixty; men who had not found the work that had been promised them by the leader of the opposition in 1930; men who found in those camps nothing more than a shelter against the storm. Those who entered the relief camps at that time assuredly carried nothing in with them, and with equal assurance it can be said that those who left the relief camps carried nothing out. The camps were organized on the basis of a payment of twenty cents a day to those in them. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the relief camps we found when we came into office were nothing more or less than a blind alley for the unemployed. For the government they were an extravagant luxury. In the final year of their operation the total cost was over $9,000,000. If in the succeeding year they had been continued on the existing basis the cost would have risen to $12,000,000; that is, on the basis of the increased wage allowance which was put into effect by this administration.

First of all I want to say, to make it clear beyond peradventure, that when this government came into office and I first went to the Department of Labour there was no problem that gave me keener concern than the plight of those single unemployed men in the relief camps of this country. I had a strong feeling.

based upon my knowledge of conditions in those relief camps and my knowledge of the sense of frustration and despair which was developed by them, that the best way to deal with the relief camps was to close them as quickly as possible. On the other hand, in this case not following the policy which on occasion, I suggest, was followed by the leader of the opposition, it seemed to me that we should not make our judgment blindly; that we should get some collective thought upon this problem and, through collective thought, find some definite objective, some determined road. So we appointed a committee to investigate relief camps in Canada, and that committee, I suggest, was composed of men who had not only a keen appreciation of all the problems involved in the administration of relief camps but who also had an equally keen appreciation of the human elements involved. On that commission we had the head of the employment service of Canada; we had Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, a former member of this house, and we had a man who had not been closely connected with government in other years but for whom I have a very high regard, Doctor Bradwin, president of the Frontier college. These men made their investigation and in due course presented their report. The report confirmed the view which I suggested a moment ago I had formed in my own mind as to the disposition that should be made of the camps. They proposed that these camps should be closed as soon as possible. They stated in the most emphatic terms that unless they were closed they would tend to become institutionalized, and that in their opinion the relief camps in their structure, and particularly in the attitude of mind which they developed in the youth of this country, were alien to the spirit of this young dominion.

So, upon the basis of that report, we determined to close the relief camps, and we set a date as an objective. Almost a year ago we declared that we believed it would be possible to close the relief camps by July 1 of last year. I do not hesitate to tell the house that there were those who said it could not be done, that it would lead to riots, to disturbances and to a serious dislocation of business. Despite those forebodings we felt that our objective was correct, and because we believed that we believed also that the way would be found to realize it. It was so arranged that through the provision of employment upon special maintenance work on the railways, about 10,000 of the men in the relief camps were given an opportunity for employment in the summer months at the prevailing rates of wages for the type of work it was proposed they should do. Almost 1,000 others were absorbed into farm employment. Many others, through the assistance of the employment service, found employment in other directions. As I have said, the camps were closed, and about 10,000 of the men in them were transferred to remunerative employment. To this time the camps have not been reopened.

Naturally at the conclusion of the work upon the railways during the past summer the government was confronted with the issue of what next should be done to deal with the single unemployed. In our decision as to what should be done I should like to make it clear that the government had the advice and the very useful assistance of the National Employment Commission, which this afternoon was condemned by the leader of the opposition. We believed it would create a much more wholesome atmosphere for the single unemployed and transients in various parts of the country if we could direct them into employment connected with the great primary industries of the dominion. In conjunction with the provinces we worked out the details of the farm employment scheme. I should like to make it very clear that in the conception and execution of the farm employment plan the National Employment Commission was of the utmost assistance to the government.

I have before me figures covering farm placements in the last few months. Some 46,000 placements have been made under the farm employment plan in the various provinces where it is in use. I have it on good authority that in Saskatchewan there is not a single unemployed man now available for farm employment service. I also have—

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister permit a question? When was this farm placement scheme begun, and how many were placed in each year since the beginning?

Mr. ROGERS: The estimates of the Department of Labour are not now before the house; when they are I shall be very glad indeed to give all that information, for the enlightenment of the hon. member. If I had it now, I would give it with equal readiness. I should say however that the present scheme is a development of a previous scheme, and in my own mind that is one of the merits of it. After all, we have sought to learn by experience in dealing with unemployment. Unfortunately there was not as much record of the experience of hon. members opposite as one could have wished, but so far as the scheme was in operation and had proved to have merit, we built upon it. I think we can say we have improved upon some features of it.

Mr. STEWART: You have not changed very much, though.

Mr. ROGERS: As I have said, under the farm employment plan,—and the supplementary plans, under which some 5,000 additional men were employed, particularly in forestry work in British Columbia and Manitoba—during the last few months there have been placements of some 50,000 men. Previously there was an aimless, drifting group of single unemployed men in various parts of the country, and more particularly in the western provinces.

I am not speaking about something of which I am ignorant. Fortunately some months ago I had the opportunity of travelling through western Canada. I have seen the single unemployed at their work on the railways. I have talked with them; I have seen them gathered in queues at soup kitchens in Winnipeg and Edmonton. I know something of what years of insecurity and idleness have done to their morale, and I suggest the leader of the opposition would have been far more sensible of his responsibility at this time if, instead of holding up to this house the record of staff appointments to the National Employment Commission, thereby suggesting that the government had not dealt with the great national problem, he had at least touched upon some of the details, some of the broad principles lying at the base of the policies we have put into effect.

Another problem which confronted the government when it came into office was the relationship between the dominion and the provinces and municipalities, particularly with respect to the exact apportionment of costs of unemployment relief. I shall not go into the historical background of that aspect of the unemployment problem. However I do want to make it as clear as possible to the house that, by reason of the very structure of our government under the federal constitution, there is, as it were, inherent antagonism always capable of being brought to a head, because of the apportionment of financial responsibilities in relation not only to unemployment relief but to social services generally.

When we took office we found the provinces and municipalities believed they were facing a very serious crisis if the dominion government at that time did not give them further assistance—and remember that at that time sentiment and economic conditions in Canada were quite different from what they are to-day—

Mr. DUNNING: And only sixteen months ago.

Mr. ROGERS: Sometimes I wonder if we realize the extraordinary change that has taken place within the last few months, particularly in respect to the sentiment of the people. At that time many provinces and municipalities harboured the well-grounded fear that if they did not receive a greater degree of assistance from the dominion government in connection with unemployment relief they would be forced into bankruptcy. Again we did not make our judgment blindly; rather we called the provinces into conference and discussed the matter with them. Upon the basis of what they told us, and of what came to us from the mayors' conference which met in Montreal at about the same time, we decided it was in the interests of a proper administration of unemployment relief, and in the interests of maintaining a proper relationship between the dominion and the provinces, that at least during the critical period the dominion should assume a larger proportion of the costs for unemployment relief. We acted accordingly.

As a result of that action I believe pressure upon many municipalities was lifted. As a result of it the serious pressure on some of the western provinces, which had been felt through years of drought, was relieved. Through that action we established a basis for a much more satisfactory handling of some of the broader aspects of unemployment and relief. Subsequently when we believed the greatest pressure had been relieved we determined that there should be a downward adjustment of relief grants from the dominion to the provinces, and we have followed that policy carefully. In getting the problem into a clearer perspective we are at this time receiving the assistance of the National Employment Commission. It has been announced that by reason of the marked economic recovery in the past year the dominion government is now entitled to accept a lesser degree of financial responsibility for unemployment relief. Here again I would emphasize that we are proceeding along the lines of making these readjustments upon some rational basis and in such a way as to ensure for us the continued cooperation of the provinces and the municipalities.

I would not suggest for one moment to this house that the problem of unemployment and relief, either in its human or its financial aspect, can be liquidated within a few months. I know something, as I think all members of this house do, of what might be termed the residual problems of the economic shock through which this country has been passing since 1930. There are great and grave problems of readjustment. There is not merely the restoration of morale among the single unemployed—that in itself is a most serious and important matter—but there is also the providing of the means by which these young men who have perforce lived a life of idleness in recent years can gradually be brought back into the economic life of this country in a manner to enable them to recover their independence and their self-respect. That is our objective; that is our determined road.

When we came into office we found that the government of the day had made a practice of cooperating with the provinces in works programs designed as a measure of relief for unemployment. In making our arrangements with the provinces during the past year we inserted in the agreements for the first time a clause requiring that a specific proportion of the number employed upon these works should be taken from the relief rolls. We worked on the principle, which I believe is a sound one, that relief works should reduce relief rolls. If relief works do not reduce relief rolls, they are misnamed and I doubt the wisdom of continuing them.

I do not suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite were oblivious to this aspect of the question. I would not suggest for one moment that they were not equally anxious to deal with it. There is no such thing as a monopoly of human sympathy and compassion. We may differ in our policies, but I doubt whether any of us in this house differ greatly in our desire to deal in the most satisfactory way with this matter of unemployment and relief. At the same time, the previous agreements with the provinces did not stipulate that a fixed percentage of those employed on these works should be taken from relief rolls. We made that stipulation. Forty thousand men were employed upon these works during the past year and at least 20,000 were taken from the relief rolls, thus reducing the burden on municipalities from one end of the dominion to the other.

I come now to the issue, if we can call it such, raised by the leader of the opposition this afternoon. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman appreciated fully the example in dialectic he gave the younger members of this house, myself included. The right hon. gentleman was introducing an amendment regretting that this government had failed to deal adequately with the unemployment problem, and three-quarters of his discussion of the unemployment problem was a recital of staff appointments to the National Employment Commission. I am going to deal with that question here and now, having first discussed the broad considerations of policy which to my mind should have been dealt with by the leader of the opposition.

The National Employment Commission was set up last year under legislation passed by this parliament. That legislation provided for a commission of seven members and for two advisory committees, one known as the youth employment committee and the other as the women's employment committee. I do not think anyone who has given any study to the problem of unemployment relief can fail to realize that these two committees were called upon to deal with what might very properly be termed special and all-important aspects of the question. Provision was made in the act for the payment of such fees and travelling expenses as might be decided upon by the governor in council. Two members of the employment commission have served without remuneration, and one of these was only reimbursed for his travelling expenses. Only three members of the commission may be said to have given nearly all of their time to the work of the commission in recent months. The youth employment committee has been making a study of its particular problem only in quite recent months, and the same may be said of the women's employment committee. This commission did not differ actually in structure from other commissions which frequently have been appointed in this country to deal with problems less grave.

I have here a complete statement of the total expenses of the National Employment Commission to date. I propose to place these before the house in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to what this commission has cost this country up to the present time. In doing this I should like again to object to the method employed by the leader of the opposition to create an impression contrary to the facts. I am not suggesting that he knew the information he gave was contrary to the facts, but there was no doubt as to the impression he sought to convey. He read lists of names which were repeated time and again.

Mr. DUNNING: The same names.

Mr. ROGERS: The same men were reemployed, because they were employed only temporarily. In some cases their employment had to be renewed after a period of two months. The right hon. gentleman neglected to state that a number of the officials attached to the National Employment Commission were seconded from the civil service of Canada. He neglected to say that two special advisers were employed only for a very limited period. The employment of one of these advisers ceased on March 1, but I do not find fault with the right hon. gentleman for not having that knowledge. I simply want to have the record clear on this point. Every commission called upon to deal with a problem as complex as that of unemployment and relief is obliged to have a personnel which will enable it to deal quickly with vast and difficult questions. The correspondence coming into the National Employment Commission has been such as to require the continuous services of a staff of seven stenographers. I doubt if anyone listening to the leader of the opposition this afternoon would have concluded that there were only seven stenographers. I am sure that the impression he left was that there was an almost endless procession of stenographers passing into the National Employment Commission. That is not the truth.

The total expenditure to January 31, 1937 for the members of the National Employment Commission is $18,066. I ask the house, Mr. Speaker, if the impression left by the leader of the opposition this afternoon is in accord with that statement.

I come now to the youth employment committee, a committee consisting of five persons, dealing as I have said with a most important problem, a problem of considerably more importance to this country, I would suggest, than the royal commission set up by the leader of the opposition to deal with the Chignecto canal. This commission for a long time failed to make a report, and some of its members, I submit, did not know that the Chignecto canal was a physical possibility before they were appointed to that commission. The total expenditure for the youth employment committee is $8,951.51. That includes travelling expenses, and in the nature of things, if one wants to understand something of the problem of the single unemployed, one cannot do it by sitting in an office here in Ottawa. Does anyone seriously suggest he could?

As to the women's employment committee, the total cost has been $2,916.

Coming now to the complete personnel of the commission, including as I have said not a few officials, and including those higher officials who were seconded from other departments of government, a number from the Department of Labour, the total cost of the personnel is $16,888.89. Does anyone seriously suggest that such an amount is out of line with the functions imposed upon a commission which is charged with the responsibility of dealing with a problem which all of us recognize as the most urgent national problem?

Then, with regard to the question of registration, the leader of the opposition read through the names of many who are employed on registration. He suggested that that work of registration could be done by the bureau of statistics, and ought to have been done by the bureau of statistics. I should have liked to assure him, if he were here, that he can be quite certain that the members of this administration, including the Minister of Labour, are as anxious as he is to avoid duplication and to bring about economy in governmental expense. This question of registration was so pressing, following the setting up of the commission, that I asked if this work could not be undertaken by the bureau of statistics. It was discussed with the bureau of statistics, and the information was that the bureau was dealing, as the house will be aware, with the results of the census of the western provinces, and that it would have been impossible for the bureau of statistics to undertake the work of registration without themselves having to employ additional assistance to do it. There was further the question of the use of machines for sortation purposes.

I wish I could impress upon the members of the house, and I am particularly sorry that the leader of the opposition is not here, that what is designed through a registration of the unemployed on relief is not the tabulation of figures received from the bureau of statistics; it is rather a reregistration of the unemployed on relief throughout this country, and we have it upon the evidence of the provinces and municipalities across this dominion that that very registration of itself had the effect of considerably reducing the numbers on relief. The very fact, in other words, that people were compelled to give complete data with respect to their application for relief operated as a deterrent upon the few—because I suggest they have never been in the majority—who have been on relief rolls without entitlement in recent years. I myself would not doubt for one moment that the full cost of reregistration, amounting to $40,596.32 up to January 31, 1937, has been more than compensated by what has been saved through the process of reregistration.

We took the ground, Mr. Speaker, before we came into office, and we take the ground now, that if anyone is going to deal with this many-sided, complex question upon the basis of long-term policies, it is essential that the dominion government shall have before it at all times the means of measuring the magnitude of the problem, the means of securing those elements in the problem which will permit its division, as it were, into separate and distinct problems, each of which can in due course be attacked by its own technique, and by its own appropriate governmental or private agency. It was with that in view that this registration was undertaken, and as I have said, that duty was imposed by the statute upon the National Employment Commission.

The leader of the opposition has suggested that the National Employment Commission had done nothing but employ this list of persons whose names he placed upon Hansard this afternoon. Was there ever a more unfair statement made in this house? It is within the knowledge of all members of this house that only a few weeks ago the home improvement plan was introduced and received the approval I think of all sides of the house as a measure not only of home improvement but of increasing private employment in this country in the building trades. That plan was submitted to the government by the National Employment Commission. I am not going to suggest that the plan itself sprang full-born from the mind or minds of the members of the commission. It was modelled in some measure upon legislation successfully followed in the United States for similar purposes. But I do suggest to the house that the success of that measure, as it has achieved a success today, and the increasing measure of success which we believe will come through this year, will be due in very large measure to the kind of organization which has been set up across this country upon an entirely non-political basis.

I would also mention that a very large program of publicity in connection with home improvements throughout the country is being financed without a single cent of expense to the Dominion of Canada. The National Employment Commission has raised a fund amounting to nearly half a million dollars, which is being used for promotional work in order to bring about the success of the home improvement plan in all parts of Canada. Not only that, but in all of the large cities of this country and in many small cities and towns there have been established, through the efforts of the National Employment Commission, voluntary committees who are throwing their whole effort into this task of stimulating employment in the building trades. Again, I think one can say that that kind of nation-wide cooperative effort was rendered possible only by the National Employment Commission. I feel certain that it could not have been put into effective operation by any department of the dominion government. May I say also that in dealing with all matters pertaining to unemployment and relief during the past year I have had the counsel and advice of the members of the National Employment Commission. The country has had the benefit of that kind of continuous collective thought upon this problem which must be given to it if we are to make successful headway in overcoming the dislocation of the past few years.

In what I have said I have not intended to deal with this subject upon a narrow partisan basis. I think members of the house will agree that when the National Employment Commission bill was before this chamber a year ago no word of mine was responsible for raising this question in political terms. We have approached the question with a keen sense of our obligation to deal with it. If you ask me whether I am satisfied with the results, my answer is no, I am not satisfied. I am encouraged, I am confident, but not satisfied. No government in these days can become satisfied with what it has done in relation to unemployment and relief. I have, I think, as keen an appreciation as anyone can have of our responsibility in trying to meet that problem upon terms which will enable this country to realize its highest destiny. I would ask the house to believe that it is my conviction as Minister of Labour—and it is only as such I have the right to speak—that the National Employment Commission has already served a very useful purpose in dealing with that question, and that, regardless of whether its work should be brought to an end in two months or six, it still has much to do in order to give us that guidance which is necessary to develop both short and long term measures to deal with this problem with a complete sense of national responsibility.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I am ill prepared at the moment to deal effectively with the important issue brought to the fore in this debate by the amendment and by the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Nevertheless as I listened to the minister's remarks I felt that certain claims advanced by him should not pass unchallenged. I consider it my duty on this occasion at least to give the evidence that has come into my possession with regard to the circumstances of single unemployed men in this country, and particularly in British Columbia—evidence which has been gained through close and intimate contact with these men during the latter part of last summer and during the autumn of 1936. I consider it not only a privilege but a duty to advance a plea on behalf of these single homeless young men and women, and to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the statistics do not tell the whole story. It is most unfortunate that on this occasion the minister should have been compelled merely to defend the work of the employment commission on the basis of the statistics which have been secured. I propose to deal with this matter from the standpoint of human values rather than that of statistics.

I was present in the house when, last session, the minister dealt with the problem of the young men then in relief camps across the dominion. He announced that on July 1, 1936; it would be possible to close the relief camps, and that he had a solution in view. He proposed to solve the unemployment problem of these young men with the plans he was then about to table; he said they were on the road to success, that he was going to place them on a work and wages basis during the summer months, and he tabled the agreements entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railway Company. I regard it as most unfortunate that during last session we had not sufficient time properly to analyze the terms of these agreements. Even the terminology employed was most unfortunate. It recites that His Majesty's government proposed then to "deliver" approximately ten thousand young men, able and willing to work, to the railway companies, these young men to be subject to dismissal for cause and required to accept the discipline imposed upon all the other extra gang labourers. The phrasing was most unfortunate, reminding one of the old indentures of bondage; and a form of bondage it proved to be, for these men were actually "delivered," ushered out of the relief camps and delivered to the railway companies, and when any of them attempted to escape the servitude imposed upon them by the terms of these agreements they were almost branded as criminals.

At the same time the minister gave solemn assurance that the railway companies would undertake extra maintenance of way and betterment work; that they would not attempt to replace the regular maintenance crews with the men from the relief camps. From personal observation I must say that this assurance was violated at many points by the railway companies. Men taken from the relief camps were placed on regular maintenance work; they displaced the regular maintenance crews in many districts across this country, and were required to do heavy maintenance work for which they were poorly prepared.

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. member will permit me, I do not feel that I should allow that statement to pass without some correction. We obtained definite assurances that the work done by the men who came from the relief camps was in excess of the normal maintenance work being undertaken by the railways during the past summer. Subsequently we received assurance that not only was that true, but that the additional maintenance program which was inaugurated with these men from the relief camps made possible the employment of about two thousand railway men who theretofore had been unemployed.

An hon. MEMBER: That is correct.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am well aware that the minister received that assurance from the railway companies. I am also aware that at the time those agreements were to be carried out, the minister, in the performance of his duties, was absent from the country. But I may tell hon. members that in visiting the small towns in the interior of British Columbia, and even on the prairies, many men told me that for the first time they were compelled to go on relief because they had been released from the regular maintenance work on the railways, work upon which they had depended season after season for their livelihood, to make way for the men from the relief camps. I submit that the evidence is that only too many men on regular maintenance crews were displaced by men from the relief camps. May I also point out that many of these men, when I questioned them, swore that they left the relief camps prior to the date of these agreements to which I have referred, hoping to secure employment on the regular maintenance crews; that they did secure such employment and while engaged in that work were discharged when the men from the relief camps appeared on the scene. They were unable subsequently to get employment with the extra gangs. The evidence through the prairie towns and the towns in the interior of British Columbia pointed conclusively to the fact that the railway companies violated the terms of the agreement in that respect.

The minister stated at the time that the men would be placed upon a work and wages basis. Upon investigation it was found that work and wages meant working ten hours a day for twenty-five cents an hour, in spite of the terms of the agreement.

Mr ROGERS: I am sorry to interrupt, but if my hon. friend will permit me, I have here a report of the work, and I think this ought to be corrected, for it is important. Our information is that in addition to those actually employed on the maintenance of way work the total number of those employed under the terms of the agreement in supervision, operating steam shovels and work trains, and paid directly by the railways was, for the Canadian Pacific Railway, 1,132, and for the Canadian National Railways, 1,000, a total of 2,132.

Mr. MacNEIL: I cannot see that those figures upset the argument I am advancing. I repeat that my information was gleaned from the men themselves who testified that they were actually doing regular maintenance work, from men who were actually released from employment on regular maintenance crews, and those who were in charge of relief and welfare activities in the various towns to which I have referred.

I stress the point of work and wages. The agreements were worded in such a way as to offer loopholes which under the conditions which prevailed were taken full advantage of by the railway companies. In only too many instances the men worked day after day for ten hours a day at the rate of twenty-five cents an hour, doing heavy arduous work for which they were poorly prepared, and in many gangs men were dropping right and left through exhaustion. Only too many men who were casualties were compelled to leave the gangs before the termination of the period of employment, and subsequently were discriminated against in the provinces in which they applied for relief. This work and wages basis of twenty-five cents an hour was in direct violation of the laws regulating working conditions and wages in some provinces.

Under the terms of the agreement the railway companies were to receive reimbursement for wages so paid up to a sum not exceeding $3,000,000. According to the statistics tabled by the minister this session, approximately $2,600,000 was paid under these conditions. In addition the railway companies were to receive a loan of approximately a million dollars to sweeten the bargain. I cannot refrain from bringing to the attention of the government and hon. members the effects of this agreement, chiefly because the minister at that time emphasized the importance of relying upon private enterprise for a solution of this problem. What happened as a result of this reliance on private enterprise? It certainly was a grand deal for someone, but not for the men. The railways got a straight gift of approximately $3,000,000 worth of work performed; the men got increased hardships and faced destitution at the opening of last winter. In addition the railways received reimbursement for transportation in moving gangs back and forth. It was arranged that they should receive reimbursement for medical aid, and deductions were made from that pitiful pay of twenty-five cents an hour for board, lodging, blankets, and medical aid. The maximum term of employment was something like 1,248 hours, and I defy any hon. member, taking the maximum wages that might be received by any individual and deducting therefrom the amounts charged by the railways for board and lodging, blankets, medical aid, et cetera, to arrive at a sum that would keep body and soul together for the succeeding winter. In fact I found on personal investigation that many men left the gangs with sums not in excess of $30 or $40, and those who were able to work the full time left with very little in excess of $100. Out of this they were required to pay their own transportation back to the points from which they came. So that it was not in any sense a solution of the unemployment problem as affecting these young men.

Towards the end of the summer I happened to be in the interior of British Columbia, and everywhere I saw these young men on the freight trains passing through the divisional points with their meagre belongings in small packs on their backs, working their way along, endeavouring to secure employment in the harvest fields, or a little later in the apple orchards of the Okanagan, or the tomato fields, and then moving on towards the coast in the hope of securing employment in the woods of British Columbia. They were making an earnest endeavour to gain whatever benefits were possible from casual employment on the prairies and in the interior of British Columbia as opportunities arose, following this casual employment from district to district. Everywhere they were establishing little jungle camps as bases of operations, following, shall I say, the lure of propaganda appearing in the newspapers at that time to the effect that at many points in British Columbia unemployment no longer existed. They had every inducement to move in that direction because of the advertising carried in the daily press with regard to the prosperity of various sections of British Columbia.

Subsequently a large number of these young men gathered in Vancouver. They were unable to secure employment, unable to get relief, because in moving from relief camps to the work on extra gangs, and subsequently in search of casual employment, under the regulations they were deprived of all rights of domicile. It was estimated at one time that something like 3,000 young men were footloose in Vancouver. In an effort to present their claims to the authorities they organized. Being without work and unable to obtain relief they were facing destitution. It has been alleged that these activities were fostered by subversive organizations. My investigation of the matter led me to a different conclusion. I found these young men organizing in a very efficient and democratic way, meeting almost daily, electing their own leaders by the usual democratic procedure, and determining their own policy. From my knowledge of the calibre of these young men I say that they were not of the type that might easily be led by persons actuated by ulterior motives. Mainly they were recruited from the cities of eastern Canada, boys from seventeen to twenty-five years of age, who had not formed any very definite opinions with regard to political policies and were simply seeking some opportunity of solving their own acute problem. They organized and attempted to make representations to the authorities. The civic authorities were unable to accept any responsibility. For that I cannot blame them, because they were faced with a large number of men for whom they could not provide. The provincial government likewise denied any responsibility, and representations were made day after day to the federal government asking that some action be taken to deal effectively with this problem. No effective answer could be secured. The men were desperate. They attempted to organize an appeal to the public of Vancouver, and on one occasion they marched to Hamilton hall, where single men received their relief. There an unfortunate riot occurred. I cannot with propriety comment on the circumstances of that riot, which have been dealt with by the courts of the land, but of this I am convinced: in planning to present their claims in Hamilton hall the men originally did not intend to engage in or incite a riot. Unfortunately two young men were sentenced to spend two years in the penitentiary as a result of that disturbance.

The organized group proceeded to place their case before the public in Vancouver. They appeared on street corners soliciting alms, holding out tin cans with signs stating that they were homeless, without work and without relief. The public of Vancouver responded very generously, but for reasons best known to themselves the civic authorities decided that this was a breach of the law, and the men were arrested in large groups. Day after day, thirty, forty or fifty men would be picked up, taken to the police station and charged in the Vancouver police court. They may have been guilty of a technical breach of the law; usually they were charged with vagrancy under section (d) of the vagrancy section of the criminal code, but actually their only crime was that they were without food and shelter and without opportunity for employment, and that they had the courage to state their needs in a public place. Up to that time no response had been received from the federal government; no escape from their predicament had been offered. They had no recourse, actually, but to take the course that was taken, to appeal publicly and in an organized way for funds. The funds so secured were handled in a businesslike and efficient way; they were distributed among the men in such a manner as to provide each man with two meals a day and a bed.

Subsequently I was invited by the men themselves to appear on their behalf in the Vancouver police court. In attempting to carry on this work I interrogated the men individually and gained a close knowledge of the circumstances and life history of each man. I have these records under my hand, the lists of the Vancouver police court and my notes taken in each individual case. I mention that to show that I have definite knowledge of their circumstances. Of the large number of young men I interviewed approximately seventy per cent were Canadians, from good Canadian homes, and the majority of these were from eastern Canada. A small percentage of the men had come from the United Kingdom, encouraged to do so under various immigration schemes. They were denied the right of domicile in British Columbia. An attempt was being made to compel them to accept transportation to other points in Canada, but at that time no assurance was given to any man that if he accepted that transportation he would fare any better at his destination. For the majority of them to accept such transportation would have been suicide. They had no clothes except those in which they stood, usually consisting merely of a pair of pants, a shirt and a sweater. It would have been suicidal for them to face the severity of winter in eastern Canada in such garb.

Mr. FINN: No boots or socks?

Mr. MacNEIL: The hon. member for Halifax inquires as to their boots and socks. Very few of these men had socks, and after they had tramped through the Okanagan in search of work the condition of their boots beggared description.

Approximately 140 men were sentenced in the Vancouver police court to varying terms of imprisonment ranging from two months to six months. That was before I appeared in court on their behalf. When I interviewed the police magistrate, the chief of police and others concerned, all of whom offered me their very courteous cooperation, they stated very clearly not once but several times, publicly from the bench, that this was not a crime problem. They did not desire to deal with it as a crime problem; it was a problem of unemployment which never should have been referred to the police authorities. They were looking anxiously for some solution, and at that time they stated that they were making the most emphatic representations to the federal government asking that definite action should be taken. Day after day the men were arrested and charged in police court. Through the cooperation of the social welfare agencies temporary maintenance was secured. When I could assure the police magistrate that temporary maintenance would be provided the men were released on their own recognizance pending action by the federal government. Those who had arrived in the city of Vancouver only a few weeks previously were sentenced; an additional sixty men were sent to Oakalla prison farm.

The ironical and tragic part of it was that when these men were questioned in court it was represented that they had the opportunity of taking advantage of the farm placement scheme. The magistrate would say, "Are you willing to accept work on a farm at $5 a month and your board? If you stay long enough you will probably get $7.50 and your board." At that time no provision had been made in the province of British Columbia for the employment under the farm placement scheme of men whose domicile in that province had not been established under the regulations, nor was any assurance given those men that if they accepted transportation to any point elsewhere in Canada they would be given employment under that scheme elsewhere. Furthermore, as subsequently disclosed, at that time no definite agreement had been arrived at with the province of British Columbia in respect to a farm placement scheme. As a matter of fact a survey of the farmers in that province had been made, and only approximately fifty-five farmers stated that they could possibly employ men under the terms indicated in the proposed agreement.

So, through the cooperation of the social welfare agencies in the city of Vancouver, and to some extent with the provincial government, temporary maintenance was provided. Several hundred men at that time were rescued from going to gaol. Later, when the minister returned from Europe and visited the city of Vancouver, I must say as very much to his credit that he received the men with courtesy and sympathy, and within twenty-four hours announced to them that he had entered into a special agreement with the provincial government relating to forestry projects. The men accepted the agreement. They were somewhat discouraged by its terms, but nevertheless they accepted it; they immediately registered, received temporary relief and thousands were placed in employment on the forestry projects. But something like 160 young men continued to serve their terms of imprisonment in Oakalla. The delay of the federal government resulted in that tragedy. They were compelled to associate and fraternize with hardened criminals from the underworld. Not once but several times I had definite evidence that young men from good Canadian homes in the east were approached by hardened criminals and asked to engage in the easier life of crime. I consider that a great tragedy.

I mention this to-night because in a way it dramatizes that which has been happening to the young men for whom the minister claims adequate provision has been made. They are now engaged in the forestry projects of British Columbia, and are not securing the advantages of training. I think it may reasonably be suggested that men engaged in forestry work should be given the advantage of technical training in the science of forestation. Adequate facilities exist for such training. Nevertheless they are engaged under distressing conditions merely in the arduous work of clearing trails, most of which lead to valuable mining properties and various timber limits now operated by large interests in British Columbia. The men are not yet on a work and wages basis. It is true that for each day they work they receive a larger wage than they formerly did in the relief camps under the Conservative administration, but when we consider the wages paid and the period for which these wages must provide we find that they are working for a sum actually no greater than the amount they would receive if, in the province of British Columbia, they were granted the relief to which a single man is entitled.

The relief camps are not closed; many of the camps in British Columbia have been reopened. In the constituency I represent the camps which were operating prior to July 1, 1936, are again operating under practically the same conditions, and the men are engaged in exactly the same work as before. Slightly different arrangements exist as to the payment of wages, but they still work at relief rates without any hope for the future and without any solution of their problems. My information is that those who have accepted placement under the farm placement scheme are in an equally hopeless position. Even as before, they are suffering frustration and hopelessness with regard to the future.

It would be grossly unfair if I did not mention the single homeless women. It has been forcibly brought to my attention that the plight of single homeless women is even more serious. Upon investigation I have found there had been a similar migration of young women to the coast, particularly from the burnt-out areas in the prairie provinces. Upon application to the various social welfare agencies some secured meals and shelter for a couple of days, but after that time they were cast out. They were denied relief by the provincial authorities. Although so far as the men were concerned the minister accepted responsibility for waiving the regulations as regards domicile in British Columbia, enabling all those in the province prior to November 15, 1936, to receive the advantages of forestry work, no equivalent provision was made for the young women who took part in the same migration. Their plight was pitiful in the extreme. Incident after incident was brought to my attention of young women from good homes and of excellent character who had to spend night after night in railway depots, who had to wander here and there begging for employment and living under most tragic circumstances. No provision could be secured for them, because they could not establish domicile in any particular province. They fell between two stools because of the dispute as to responsibility which was carried on between federal and provincial authorities. They were left as outcasts.

While I would not suggest that the character of the majority of these young women could be questioned—in fact I have reason to believe the great majority were of excellent character—it is nevertheless true that failure to deal adequately with the problem has contributed seriously to other problems. My conclusions on that score are corroborated by people holding official positions. The problem of the unmarried mothers is becoming more acute; the problem of illicit alliances is more acute, as all social welfare workers know. Young girls compelled to leave their homes in eastern Canada and in the prairie provinces are panhandling, as we say, on the skid-road for a meal, and the price of a bed. It is a most pitiful situation. Furthermore, the problem of venereal disease is becoming more acute, as many are unable to obtain treatment. No doubt this economic situation is a contributing factor to the serious aggravation of social problems. The fact that disturbs me is that young women on every hand are being exploited in the most vicious fashion by unscrupulous employers. It is well known that there is a chain of protected bawdy houses throughout the interior of British Columbia, and that the recruiting of inmates for these houses is being conducted in certain sections of Vancouver city from among this class of women.

I should be remiss in my duty if I did not make a most earnest appeal to the federal authorities to accept responsibility for the protection of young women who find themselves in these unfortunate circumstances. I have said that the relief camps are not closed, and that the plight of the young homeless men is as serious as it was on July 1 of last year. I believe the minister was not quite fair to himself or to the work in hand when he claimed so substantial a measure of improvement. When we delve beneath the surface, when we contact human beings in circumstances with which they must contend and when we actually interrogate men and women we realize their plight is as serious as it was before, and that never was it so imperative that definite action be taken.

In many sections of British Columbia the relief camps are operating on exactly the same basis as before. Young men are without hope. The work is not even as well organized as it was before. No assurance has been given that upon the conclusion of work on these projects they will be cared for. Worst of all, the measure of recovery which is claimed by the minister has not provided any large measure of additional employment opportunities for these young men. They are without training; they are eager; they are keen, and they are of a good type, generally speaking, but they have not had the advantage of equipping themselves mentally or physically for employment opportunities, if such opportunities should be offered by employers of labour. This is particularly true of the young women. Under the minister's present policy and the plans which have been sketched for the benefit of the house they are largely the victims of unscrupulous exploitation by employers of labour. They are being used, as cheap labour, to the disadvantage of other workers and, worst of all, they are being denied the opportunities they have a right to expect from this nation.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, now that the subject matter of the debate seems to have switched to the matter of unemployment, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is, with one assistant, holding the fort for the government, perhaps I may be excused if I defer my remarks with regard to the annual statement of Canada's affairs until the main motion is presented.

I was interested to hear the Minister of Labour say a little while ago that great progress was being made in connection with the unemployment problem, that some 435,000 unemployed had been reduced to 393,000, and that this extraordinary change had taken place in the last six months or so. But, learned man that he is, the Minister of Labour realizes that this extraordinary change happened not only in Canada but the world over. You know and I know that in every part of the civilized world to-day we are seeing a recovery—yes, a recovery stimulated to a great degree by artificial means. In Canada, as in other parts of the world, there has been a certain impetus to employment from that very source. When you compare the present figure of 393,000 unemployed with that of 435,000, the minister will realize that he has fallen short on the job entrusted to him.

Large works expenditures have been made in the country to the south of us. Tremendous damage has been done by floods in the Ohio and Mississippi basins; the destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property has occurred, and all these things create employment. I hesitate to mention the subject matter of a previous debate—I shall not do it in that sense—but no one knows better than the minister's colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), who is holding the fort for the government, that billions are being spent in the little isles overseas on armaments. Over a five year period Great Britain has budgeted for an expenditure of $7,500,000,000. The first white paper brought down provides for an expenditure of $2,000,000,000. What does all this mean? It means employment, not only in Great Britain but throughout the colonies. We will benefit by that. One commodity which sold on a basis of £25 10s. per ton last year jumped to £29 on November 15, £32 on December 15, £39 in January, and recently the price rose to £45. This gives an idea of the shortage in raw materials of all kinds and indicates the extent to which Europe is scrambling to acquire both raw materials and finished products. All of this creates more work.

I hope the minister realizes the extraordinary changes which have taken place. Is this the child which owes its parentage to him? Throughout the whole world there is a great rush on the part of all countries to get into a position where they can take care of themselves. The minister must realize we are sitting on a volcano. We are going to have an eruption one of these days and then there may be a world catastrophe. I hope the minister does not assume that his government is responsible for this extraordinary change which has occurred in the armament situation.

The minister objected very strongly to the methods used by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in arriving at his deductions. I rather enjoyed that. It was just about on a line with the crocodile tears the minister was shedding a little while ago when he spoke of the broken down morale of all these people and how we must save them. Hon. gentlemen opposite have no monopoly of sympathy for our fellow men; it belongs likewise to the rest of us. When the minister was shedding his crocodile tears, they were not for him alone; they were for all of us, because we all claim to have feelings of sympathy for our fellow men. I do not think it becomes my learned and academic friend to take to himself all of that sort of sentiment. Some of us who employ a few men know something about this matter. I hesitate to interject a personal reference, but I give employment to 150 men. I have not discharged one man in twelve years; I know them all and they all know me. "Vote for Joe, the man you know."

The government has established a National Employment Commission. I have been hearing of government by commission for most of the sixteen years I have been here. I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his seat this evening. This commission is a little different. It finds its own funds for its own propaganda. The minister referred to the fact that it has found half a million dollars. Being in business, I very often set a sprat to catch a mackerel, or throw a little bread on the waters knowing it will come back tenfold. I am not in the paint or roofing business; if I were I would subscribe to the fund. I am not in the kind of business that has to do with the rebuilding and improving of homes. I am not trying to be critical of the methods used; I am simply trying to give the house an idea of what is being done.

I rather appreciated the comments of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when he pointed out a few of the danger signals which should be observed. I shall defer my remarks on this matter until the main motion is being discussed, but I should like to suggest that as these danger signals have something to do with unemployment they should receive consideration. They are all around us. They are present on the stock market. There is a fixed price for gold; the costs of production are rising day by day and there is bound to be a collapse in that direction if we are not careful. The production of armaments cannot go on indefinitely, and when it slows down, look out for trouble. Perhaps the minister was wise in reducing his works program, but he had better get ready for another works program. He had better continue the policy of taking relief workers off the relief roll. Of that I shall say something a little later.

I come now to the main subject. We were supposed to find something within the confines of this budget to help the unemployment situation. Not finding it in any degree, but rather finding something which retarded employment, we moved an amendment to the main motion. There are a number of reasons why I propose to vote for the amendment, some of which I shall try to enumerate.

The budget shows the sales tax to be the greatest revenue producer. It is estimated that it will produce $115,500,000, and that, plus stamp and manufacturers' taxes of $38,000,000, gives a total of $153,500,000 or 33·97 per cent. I ask the Minister of Labour in the absence of the finance minister: does the sales tax help the unemployment problem? When the sales tax and the manufacturers' tax in 1929 brought a revenue of $81,500,000, or only 18 per cent, just a little more than half of what it is bringing to-day, the present leader of this government, who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment, rose in his place and said, as reported at page 2706 of Hansard of June 16, 1931, with respect to sales taxes—and I say, Mr. Speaker, that the sales tax does not help solve the unemployment problem:

> What do they disclose? They disclose that the burden of taxation is being placed upon the backs of the people least able to bear additional taxation. . . . What there is in the way of loss of revenue from such exemption will have to be made up by taxes raised in another way. Where does my right hon. friend expect to get most of his taxation?

The present Prime Minister was addressing his remarks to the present leader of the opposition.

> Where does my right hon. friend expect to get most of his taxation? He expects to get it out of the sales tax and from the excise tax of one per cent on everything that comes into this country. What does that mean? The sales tax, as we all know, bears most heavily on the great mass of the people—

He repeated that twice, yea like Peter he repeated it thrice; so if I do the same I shall be forgiven. He said:

> The sales tax, as we all know, bears most heavily on the great mass of the people. . . . and that additional burden is placed on the great body of the people through the sales tax and the excise tax of one per cent on everything imported.

The sales tax in those days was 4 per cent, and it produced $85,000,000. To-day it is 8 per cent, and it produces $153,000,000. It is just double to-day what it was then. Therefore if these words of the present Prime Minister were true then, they are doubly true to-day. Further down on the same page he said:

> Talk about the "death knell of protection"!

He was referring to 4 per cent sales tax

> This is the death knell of everything in the shape of freedom of trade.

If that was true then, it is doubly so to-day. The point I want to make is that this tax does not help solve the unemployment problem.

In like manner, Mr. Speaker, there is another tax that does not help solve the unemployment problem, namely, the income tax, and on that I should like to say a few words. Demagogues like to speak of the income tax in derogatory terms. I have seen them standing on a chair on a street corner and heard them shout: "Soak the rich!—Make them pay!"

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: Somebody says "hear, hear," and I say hear, hear, in respect to that group of coupon-clippers and non-producing income receivers who do not do their fair share in promoting our national economy. But as to the group of industrialists, whether the industry be agriculture, mining, fishing or manufacturing, when they want to put their funds back into their own industry for purposes of expansion they have to pay a 15 per cent corporation tax, which was increased 1½ per cent last year by this government, while that great body of our citizens, the non-producing income receivers were subjected to no such increased tax upon their incomes. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in this regard the present government did not contribute to the solution of the unemployment problem.

Let me explain that a little. You go into your banker with a statement which is just on the dead line, not red, not black. You tell him that you did a million dollars' worth of business last year, and that you want to spend $100,000 on extensions and improvements. Remember that the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, not once but five times: Let us have betterments and improvements. You go into your banker just before you have paid income tax on any interest you earned, even though you may have lost that income when your total balance sheet for the year is made up. What does the banker say? He says: I am sorry, but you cannot borrow any money on capital account.

Suppose you had earned $50,000, and had paid income tax. Still he would say to you: Be careful that you spend none of our borrowed money on capital investments of any kind, or, as the Minister of Finance said, on betterments and extensions of industrial plant and equipment. The bank will tell you: Do not spend any of your money on extensions of that kind. Why? It is bad banking practice, first of all, of course. Why, in the second place? Because you have income tax and corporation tax to pay, and you have to pay cash, right on the nose. If you want to do something for the relief of unemployment, we do not do in this country as I am told they do in Sweden and some other parts of the world, where, when a man does spend money on betterments and extension of plant, as the Minister of Finance urges, some exemption is given on that portion of his earnings which is reinvested in his own business. Five times during his speech the Minister of Finance urged that money be spent for these purposes. Let us encourage the industrialists, I say, Mr. Speaker, to reinvest their money in improvements and extensions of plant by affording them some relief on that portion of their income that is reinvested in industry, and tack the tax on to the non-producing section if you wish.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the increase of industrial income tax does not help the unemployment relief problem. The collection of industrial income tax has a tendency to make for more unemployment. We find that since 1929 to date there has been a substantial increase in the income tax collection, running from $58,500,000 in 1929 to $102,000,000 to-day.

There is a group of revenue taxes which is collected by the Dominion of Canada which to my mind does make for more employment, but we find that the collection from that group of taxes has remained at the same figure for the last four or five years, and is now only half what it was in 1928 and 1929. I refer to customs import duties, and I want my free trader friends to mark this particularly. I make the statement that the imposition of customs import duties tends to make for more employment at home for our own people, producing their own goods. I know it is an old argument, but let me give you the figures. What is happening to our economic position to-day? Our customs import duties for 1929 amounted to $185,000,000, and excise taxes $63,000,000, a total of $248,000,000, or $55.25 out of every $100 of taxation that was collected. But to-day we are collecting only $81,500,000 in customs import duties and $45,000,000 in excise taxes, a total of about $127,000,000, or 28·09 per cent of the total taxation collected. In 1929 $55 out of every $100 came out of a tax which relieved unemployment; to-day only $28 of every $100 comes from a tax which helps unemployment. The balance of the national taxation, $71.91, comes from the class of revenue taxes which does not help to reduce unemployment but rather increases it. Take one per cent off the sales tax and let those of us who are in industry be given a chance to spend our earnings on plant improvement and plant extensions and see if we cannot help take up the slack in employment. These are some ways, Mr. Speaker, by which unemployment could be relieved, but if care is not taken to mend a system under which 70 per cent of the taxes comes from the group of revenue producers which do not aid employment, and if within the next two or three years the artificial stimulus which to-day is being applied the world over begins to collapse, it will be necessary to revert to a system of taxation which makes for more employment.

A few minutes ago the minister stated that 46,000 boys had returned to the farms. To do what? To go to work. And where is the work? It is on the dairy farms. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not here. I have his permission to go ahead and say whatever I wish. That is the privilege which is enjoyed by those of us who take part in the budget debate, so I hope hon. members will understand that I am not taking advantage of the minister's absence in making the observations I wish to make during the next fifteen minutes. To use his own expression, he said "go to it"; we understand one another. These 46,000 boys have gone to the farms. They will milk cows and do chores, as we all used to do, or at any rate, like to say we did. They will bring in the milk and turn it into butter, and they will sell that butter. They will fatten for sale steers and hogs. But what will they do with the fats? On June 20, 1936, our good friends in the United States placed a tax on all fats going into that country of three cents per pound, in addition to the then existing duty of half a cent, making a total of 3½ cents per pound. For the last sixty or seventy years the markets for these products have been Chicago and New York, which set the prices for this continent. Even while the government was negotiating its treaty with the United States the agricultural bloc at Washington were framing the Bailey amendment to the 1936 United States revenue bill, imposing a duty of 3 cents per pound against produce of Canada which had been going into that market for the last sixty years, and thereby cutting it off over-night. What can be done about it? Nothing? While that was going on in the United States our fellow citizens in the empire have been busily producing, in Nigeria, the Straits Settlements and Ceylon, millions and millions of pounds of vegetable oils and shipping them into this country free of any duty and any tax. In 1933 the amount was 119,000,000 pounds; by 1936 it had risen to 224,000,000 pounds. The United States has imposed taxation of five cents per pound on cocoanut oil, four cents per pound on palm kernel oil, and three cents per pound on palm oil. Their action, which was taken in June of last year, tended to back up into the world's markets a billion pounds of vegetable oils. England is terribly worried about it. The Minister of Finance when he was in England was worried about it, and the world at large is concerned about it from this general angle, that the vegetable kingdom is fast replacing the animal kingdom. If the situation has caused anxiety in the world generally, we in Canada, which is an animal producing country dependent more on animal than on vegetable products, have cause to be doubly concerned and promptly to bestir ourselves. What is happening is that the product of these vegetable oils is replacing the production that these 46,000 boys and many more of whom the minister has spoken are trying to dispose of, and it is doing so by leaps and bounds. Today we have a record surplus of butter; 25,000,000 pounds of butter in Canada requires a market. I am pleased to see that the Prime Minister has come in, because I want him to get the full significance of this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could hear the hon. member when I was outside.

Mr. HARRIS: The Prime Minister says he can hear me outside. Mr. Speaker, I wish you would open these windows so that the whole of Canada would hear. I was just saying that the Minister of Labour has placed 46,000 boys on the farms of Canada. At the same time, as I pointed out, we in this country have a surplus of butter of record proportions; and since the United States, applying their so-called reciprocal methods of conducting affairs with Canada, and exhibiting their usual generosity, have seen fit to place a duty of three cents per pound against our animal fats, and from 3½ to five cents per pound against the vegetable products of all the British colonies—because Britain owns most of the countries producing vegetable oils—we in Canada are suffering greatly from the inroads of vegetable oils into our Canadian market. In the next two years our butter producers will find themselves in a very difficult position if the Minister of Finance does not carry out the suggestion which is indicated in his budget speech, where he says:

> The tariff board will have ready in the near future reports on other matters referred to it, and it is expected that these will be received in time for consideration by the government while the house is still in committee of ways and means.

I hope that this committee sits long enough to receive the reports on these questions from the tariff board. The evidence runs to 500 pages; there are forty items. The dairy farmers in the house number over one hundred, and if you multiply one hundred by forty speeches by five hundred pages perhaps we shall miss the coronation ceremonies but we may be able to receive the report, in the terms suggested in the budget speech, and be able to give considration to it in the committee of ways and means.

Now, as to the merits of the case itself, a tank steamer from Nigeria called the Swartzemmer, landed at Sorel in September of last year with 7,800,000 pounds of vegetable oil. It was entered on the records as vegetable oil "not for food," in like manner as 195,000,000 pounds is entered on the records of the bureau of statistics as not for food. But immediately we find it made into food. That is something which ought to be checked up. Only 8,000,000 pounds entered for food, and last year we produced 103,000,000 pounds of edible shortening, sold to the housewives and bakers of Canada. The 195,000,000 pounds entered "not for food" was refined and sold, at least 70 per cent of it, for edible purposes.

Getting back to this tank steamer at Sorel, 7,800,000 pounds was discharged in a few hours through a large pipe line into a tank on the docks. What does that mean? My Saskatchewan friends, how much butter do you produce? Twenty-three million pounds a year. In the seven winter months you produce 34 per cent of 23,000,000 pounds, and 34 per cent of 23,000,000 pounds is 7,800,000 pounds. The same weight of fat was on that steamer at Sorel as the 40,000 dairy farmers in Saskatchewan produce in seven months. Do you get the significance of that? If you do not, let me give you the full measure of this traffic. Imagine thirty tank steamers. If you cannot imagine that, you know what a tank car looks like; imagine forty-five trains of fifty cars each of 100,000 pounds capacity entering Canada—each and every year—one hundred and three million pounds of that production replacing the natural wholesome industry of this country, the butter fat industry, which makes work for your 46,000 boys who were put out on the farm replacement scheme.

It was requested that consideration be given to some amendment. The hearing before the tariff board closed on December 11, so that there has been plenty of time for a report. It should have been within the competence of the board to bring that report down. This parliament should sit here long enough to get that report and take some action on it, not only because of the situation between ourselves and Nigeria and other countries, but more particularly on account of the action taken by our reciprocating friends of the United States in placing an excise duty of three cents per pound against our product going into that country. If I had another hour I could tell the house how in the Nigerian climate they only have to shake down palm nuts from a tree, throw them into a pit and let them rot, press out the oil and then carry the oil to a tank steamer on the border of Nigeria. The tree does not need feeding as your cow in Saskatchewan does. They do not have to house the palm tree in Nigeria as you house your cattle in Saskatchewan. The native climbing the tree does not tear his trousers getting down, whereas our farmer friends in Saskatchewan must be clothed in the winter time. I could enlarge on all these differences between their civilization and ours, but that would perhaps be wasting time. They are empire colleagues of ours and they take this trade and our empire friends take this trade. But let me finish that other story. When he gets these nuts down out of the tree the meat on the outside gives 60 pounds of fat and the inside kernel yields 40 per cent, while the poor man who strips the cow only gets 3½ per cent of fat out of his milk. This is a matter that should be given consideration.

Some will say: That is all bound up in the empire trade agreement; why was not something done about it before? In 1933 the traffic was only 91,000,000 pounds, but in four short years it has grown to 224,000,000. The act of the United States in this regard has brought the matter forcibly to the attention of the National Dairy Council of Canada and they are greatly alarmed about it. The opportunity to do something about it should be seized. The Britishers who received these cargoes of nuts on the west coast of England to the amount last year of 1,762,000 long tons do not mind what tax or duty you put against that product as long as you give them the preference. A preference of ten per cent a few short years ago diverted all that trade of pressing to the United Kingdom. The presser there is content,—it is on the records somewhere—provided he gets his margin of preference.

It may be argued: But you will raise the cost of living, the cost of these shortening and other products by the amount of duty you put on. That condition does not obtain in the United States to-day. I have under my hand five copies of invoices of which I took photographs in New York two weeks ago, of the Ward Baking Company, sold to their bakers, and I found the price to be 11¾ cents, whereas Proctor and Gamble of Hamilton sold it the same week in Kitchener at 13 cents. In Columbus, Ohio, another firm sold a half-carload at 12 cents a pound, while at the same time, to another firm in Canada, a similar product, 100 per cent vegetable, was sold at 11¼ cents a pound. It was sold in Chicago at 11¾ cents and in Hamilton at 13 cents. And mark this carefully; let our baker and consumer friends get this idea clearly in their minds. Right on the body of this invoice, which shows the price to be 11¾ cents per pound, is a clause which says:

> If the Bailey amendment is found to be unconstitutional and if this processing tax or excise tax or duty is collected back from the government, then we will reduce the price of this invoice accordingly and return to you the collection we made from the government less the incidental cost of collection.

What does that mean? That means that the manufacturer there gets 7¼ cents for his product that he sells to the Ward Baking Company in Chicago and in Columbus, Ohio, while our baker here is paying the full 11¼ cents or 13 cents as the case may be. So that argument falls to the ground. True, to an extent it would add a little to the cost. But there is another observation that I should like to make. The revenue resulting to this country if the government saw fit to do just seventy-five per cent of what the United States did on June 20 of last year—it became law on August 20, 1936—would amount to $9,449,000, according to the rebuttal evidence put in at the tariff board hearing a few weeks ago.

But it may be said, the material would not come in then. It would still come in, but not to so large an amount. I remember in this house twelve or fourteen years ago hearing the representations made with regard to oleomargarine. In those days we were worrying about a production of 5,500,000 pounds. To-day we are faced with a production of 103,000,000 pounds, which will increase to 120,000,000 pounds this year. In those days we were not worried about a surplus of butter and finding a market for it. To-day we have a surplus of 25,000,000 pounds.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Time.

Mr. HARRIS: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) says "time." I will take my remaining five minutes to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THE BUDGET—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR SITTINGS OF MARCH 4 AND 5

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house would allow me to put a motion that will ensure the debate continuing on Thursday and Friday if necessary. I move:

That standing order 28 respecting the committee of ways and means be suspended for the sittings of Thursday, 4th March, and Friday, 5th March, 1937.

If this motion were not adopted the Speaker would leave the chair on those days and the debate could not proceed.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.03 p.m.

Wednesday, March 3, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1937-38

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, was presented by Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1936-37

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when the supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1937, will be laid on the table?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer definitely. Of course the departments concerned are attempting to get their figures together in sufficient time before the end of the fiscal year to cover everything. I expect to get along with the work as fast as possible, and will bring down the estimates as soon as I can.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EXPENDITURES IN THE YUKON

Mr. McCULLOCH:

1. What was the total amount provided by the estimates for 1935-1936 for expenditure for all purposes including salaries for the Yukon?
2. What was the total amount expended from said estimates in the Yukon in the said fiscal year?
3. What is the population of the Yukon?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. $568,081.54.
2. $541,619.65.
3. The population of the Yukon on June 1, 1931, was 4,230.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION—SALARIES AND LIVING ALLOWANCES

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw):

On page 344 of Hansard, members of the National Employment Commission are shown as having received certain sums of money as salaries, and on page 833 of Hansard, the same members are shown as having received identical sums as living allowances.

1. Were these sums paid to members of the commission twice?
2. What was the total paid to each member of the commission, for all purposes, during the period in question?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.
2. Total received for all purposes, A. B. Purvis, nil; A. N. McLean, $1,141.07; Alfred Marois, $2,446.75; *Tom Moore, $228.95; Mrs. M. M. Sutherland, $5,590.93; W. A. Mackintosh, $2,196.98; E. J. Young, $4,559.05.

* No salary paid to commissioner Tom Moore as a member of the National Employment Commission as he is in receipt of a salary of $9,000 per annum, less the 5 per cent deduction, as a member of the employment and social insurance commission.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What was the date of appointment of each member of the National Employment Commission?
2. What was the amount of travelling expenses and living allowance paid to each member?
3. Does the $20 per day salary paid to certain members of the commission include Sundays and holidays?

Mr. ROGERS: I desire to file a corrected answer to this question which appeared in Votes and Proceedings of February 5, 1937.

1. May 15, 1936.

2.

Name	Travelling and actual expenses	Living allowance
A. B. Purvis	Nil
A. N. McLean	$1,141 07
Alfred Marois	603 75
Tom Moore	228 95
Mrs. M. Sutherland	2,151 93	Nil*
W. A. Mackintosh	771 00
E. J. Young	1.538 25

3. The $20 a day is subject to the Salary Deduction Act. They are paid only for days on which they have actually worked.

* No provision for living allowance under the act.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION—YOUTH COMMITTEE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the members of the National Employment Commission's youth committee, when were they appointed, and for what purpose?

2. What remuneration do they receive, and allowances or travelling expenses?

3. What has been the result of their work, and to whom do they report?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The youth employment committee is a special committee of five (5) members of the national advisory committee, appointed by P.C. 2242 of the 2nd September, 1936, under Section 9, Subsection 2 of the National Employment Commission Act, 1936, as follows:

Date of appointment:

Allan Chambers, of Victoria, B.C., Chairman, July 4, 1936.

Joseph McCulley, of Newmarket, Ontario, August 11, 1936.

Rev. R. F. Thompson, of Toronto, Ontario, August 11, 1936.

Andre Montpetit, of Montreal, Quebec, September 2, 1936.

W. Clifford Nickerson, of Halifax, N.S., September 2, 1936.

2. No remuneration. A living allowance of Fifteen dollars ($15) per diem, payable when away from home on the business of the committee, which covers all travelling and living expenses except transportation.

3. The committee reports to the national employment commission and, to date, has made two (2) main and three (3) supplementary reports.

GOLD IN THE TREASURY, PURCHASED, AND EXPORTED

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. How many ounces of gold are now held by the Canadian government, (a) on behalf of the treasury; (b) on behalf of the Bank of Canada; (c) on behalf of foreign governments; (d) in the dominion mint; (e) is there any gold still being held by the chartered banks of Canada either in bullion or in currency?

2. How many ounces of gold did the dominion government purchase during the twelve months ending on January 31, 1937?

3. What was the average weekly purchase by the Canadian government of mined gold during the three months ending January 31, 1937?

4. How many ounces of gold were exported by the Canadian government to, (a) the United States of America; (b) the United Kingdom; (c) all other foreign countries?

5. What is the amount of gold being held by the United States of America and the United Kingdom and foreign countries to the credit of the Canadian government?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. (a) January 31, 1937—105,458 ounces, of which 103,432 ounces were held as reserve against Post Office Savings Bank deposits; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) January 31, 1937—176,218 ounces; (e) yes, $41,094 held in Canada and $955,459 held elsewhere as at December 31, 1936.

2. 3,637,143 ounces.

3. 74,566 ounces.

4. 12 months ended January 31, 1937: (a) 1,776,385 ounces; (b) 225,522 ounces; (c) nil.

In addition, gold sold by the government in the twelve months ended January 31, 1937, and held by the Bank of Canada for clients abroad, amounted to 1,466,249 ounces.

5. Nil.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—SUBSIDIES

Mr. TUCKER:

1. What subsidies or other assistance by way of land grants, cash grants, exemptions from taxation and otherwise have been given by the federal government of Canada to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company since its incorporation?

2. What is the estimated total value of such subsidies and assistance in cash to date?

Mr. HOWE:

1.

Dominion cash aid, including subsidies to main project and to acquired lines and leased lines	$ 53,417,889 00
Book value of lines constructed by government and transferred to C.P.R.	37,791,435 00
Cash consideration for lands given up by Canadian Pacific Railway	10,189,521 00

Total cash subsidies and financial assistance	$113,629,044 46

Of the unemployment assistance, items (a), (b) and (g) are grants while the other items are subject to repayment as follows:

(c) Repayable on demand (without interest) as soon as more than 5 per cent paid in dividends.

(d) Repayable on demand (without interest) before any more dividends are paid on common stock.

(e) Repayable $100,000 per annum commencing 1938, with interest semi-annually at 4 per cent.

(f) Repayable after two years in 13 instalments. No interest for two years. Then 3 per cent on balances outstanding.

(h) Loans repayable in five annual instalments to 1942, with interest at 2½ per cent.

Dominion land grants, Canadian Pacific Railway—all lines, 26,108,988 acres.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Act (44 Vic., Cap. 1, 1881) and the contract of October 21, 1881, for the construction of the railway provided for the admission, duty free, of materials entering into construction, for certain restrictions as to competing lines for a limited period, for certain exceptions from taxation of the property of the railway, and for the taking of materials from public lands for construction purposes. Particulars of these provisions will be found set out in sections 10, 15, 16 and 19 of the contract, which is of parliamentary record.

[Mr. Howe.]

*BROADCASTING OF HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

Mr. TUCKER:

1. What would be the annual cost of broadcasting the debates of the House of Commons from the short wave station situated in Ottawa?

2. Has the government given consideration to the desirability of broadcasting such debates in this way or otherwise?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that the government does not think it would be advisable to broadcast the debates of the house.

CORONATION OATH

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What changes, if any, have been made in the coronation oath to be taken on May 12 next?

2. Was Canada consulted, and what reply was given?

3. Did the government ask for any changes? If so, what are they?

4. Will any correspondence with His Majesty's government of Great Britain and Canada on the subject be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The coronation oath taken by His Majesty King George V on June 22, 1911, was as follows:

"Archbishop. Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the respective laws and customs of the same?

King. I solemnly promise so to do.

Archbishop. Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?

King. I will.

Archbishop. Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by law? And will you maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the Church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established in England? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of England, and to the churches there committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges, as by law do or shall appertain to them, or any of them?

King. All this I promise to do."

The coronation oath to be taken by His Majesty King George VI on May 12, 1937, is as follows:

Q. Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the other territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?

A. I solemnly promise so to do.

Q. Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?

A. I will.

Q. Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God and the true profession of the gospel? Will you to the utmost of your power maintain in the United Kingdom the Protestant reformed religion established by law? And will you maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the Church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established in England? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of England, and to the churches there committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them, or any of them?

A. All this I promise to do.

In view of press reports, it may be added that the King's Title, which was settled by proclamation issued under the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act of 1927, does not appear in the form of coronation service, and has not been changed in any way.

2. The Canadian government was consulted and concurred in the changes applicable to Canada.

3. The Canadian government did not initiate the question but expressed the view that the phrasing of the first section of the oath as formerly administered was not in accordance with the existing constitutional relations, and that it would be appropriate that each of the members of the commonwealth should be enumerated.

4. It would not be in accordance with established practice to table the correspondence, which indicates the views of other governments.

CALGARY BARRACKS—SAND AND GRAVEL

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. How many cubic yards of unwashed pit run gravel have been used on the roadways of the government barracks at Calgary, Alberta, and what is the price per cubic yard for same?

2. How many cubic yards of washed sand and gravel have been used in surfacing the roadways at the government barracks at Calgary, Alberta, in concrete work, and what is the price per cubic yard for same?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. 1,165 cubic yards at 90 cents per cubic yard.

2. 1,227 cubic yards of washed sand at $2.50 per cubic yard. 3,057½ cubic yards of washed gravel at $1.50 per cubic yard.

SOCKEYE SALMON TREATY

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the Fraser river treaty been ratified by the United States government? If so, on what date?

2. If ratified, was it subject to any reservations, and, if so, what?

3. Will the suggested reservations, if any, be submitted for consideration by this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No. On June 16th, 1936, the Senate of the United States gave its advice and consent to the ratification by the United States of the convention between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser river system, signed at Washington, May 26th, 1930.

2. This resolution of the United States Senate was passed subject to the following understandings to be made a part of such ratification:

"(1) That the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission shall have no power to authorize any type of fishing gear contrary to the laws of the State of Washington or the Dominion of Canada;

"(2) That the commission shall not promulgate or enforce regulations until the scientific investigations provided for in the convention have been made, covering two cycles of sockeye salmon runs, or eight years; and

"(3) That the commission shall set up an advisory committee composed of five persons from each country who shall be representatives of the various branches of the industry (purse seine, gill net, troll, sport fishing, and one other), which advisory committee shall be invited to all non-executive meetings of the commission and shall be given full opportunity to examine and to be heard on all proposed orders, regulations, or recommendations."

3. These understandings, which under existing practice and precedents constitute clarifications or interpretations upon administrative aspects, appear to be not inconsistent with the principles and purpose of the convention; accordingly the question of their submission to parliament, which confirmed the convention in 1930, does not arise.

HON. C. P. FULLERTON

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the third paragraph of the last question on the second column of page 1052 of Hansard of February 17, 1937, was the remunerative payment of $30,000 given to Honourable C. P. Fullerton, K.C., paid by the Canadian National Railways or by the dominion government?

Mr. HOWE: By Canadian National Railways.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HALIFAX, N.S., GOVERNMENT OWNED WHARVES

Mr. ISNOR:

1. How many government owned wharves are in the county of Halifax, Nova Scotia?
2. How many of these come under control of the Department of Transport?
3. At what places are they located?
4. How many of the above wharves have regularly appointed wharfingers?
5. (a) What are the names of wharfingers; (b) what was the revenue receipts by each wharfinger for the fiscal year 1935-36?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

EMPLOYEES OF CANADIAN RAILWAYS

Mr. LECLERC:

1. What is the number of employees on the railways of Canada, according to the following categories: locomotive engineers and firemen, conductors, conductors of parlour-cars, conductors of sleeping-cars, employees of dining-cars, trainmen, maintenance of way employees, and others?
2. (a) What is the hourly rate of pay, and the average number of hours that the above classes are employed monthly; (b) how many hours daily are these employees paid at the regular rate; (c) how many are paid time-and-a-half, and how many double-time?
3. What are the average monthly salaries of the above-mentioned classes?
4. How many railway employees are out of work at the present time?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

HALIFAX, N.S., COAL IMPORTATIONS

Mr. BROOKS:

What quantity of coal, other than Canadian, was imported by water through the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, from October 1, 1935, to December 31, 1936, information to be tabulated under the following headings: (a) date of arrival; (b) name of vessel; (c) consignee; (d) number of tons of coal; (e) grade; (f) value for duty; (g) duty paid, including sales tax and excise; (h) country in which coal produced?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Certain of the information asked for would, if given, disclose the private business of certain importers. That would be contrary to established practice. There is no objection to giving the remainder of the information, and, subject to the qualification I have indicated, I would ask that the question stand as an order for return.

VANDERHOOF-MANSON CREEK, B.C., ROAD CONTRACT

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Did the federal government approve of a project to build or improve the road between Vanderhoof, and Manson Creek or Finlay Forks, British Columbia, in conjunction with the provincial government of British Columbia?
2. What work was done on this project last year?
3. What funds has the federal government indicated as its share to be spent on this project?
4. What sum has already been spent?
5. What sum is still available to be spent?
6. Through what channels has the government contributed to this project?
7. Who recommended that this project should be approved?
8. How much work has been provided for, for this coming summer on this project?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled herewith.

MANSON CREEK, B.C., MINING PROPERTIES

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Are there any mining properties in the vicinity of Manson Creek, British Columbia, within a hundred mile radius?
2. If so, (a) what are the names of the companies; (b) the names of the directors and managers?
3. What mines are in operation?
4. What claims have been filed?
5. By whom have claims been filed?
6. Has the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company any property of any nature in that district?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled herewith.

PREFERENCE TO CANADIANS IN CIVIL SERVICE OF ALLIED COUNTRIES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 120A (reference No. 43), tabled February 15, did the Department of the Secretary of State ask the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs "whether the dominion government ever tried to know if any allied countries of His Majesty during the great war had accorded a preference to Canadian candidates in their civil service, and, if so, when"?
2. If so, when?
3. Did the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer that question?
4. If so, what was the answer, and why was not such answer included in the above-mentioned return?
5. If not, why?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

LIEUT.-COLONEL W. ARTHUR STEEL

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the statement of the government at page 758 of Revised Hansard of March 4, 1936, that Lieutenant-Colonel W. Arthur Steel's pension would have been $1,975.38 per annum as of 1st April, 1936, if he were sent back to the Department of National Defence before being retired, or $3,520 per annum as of 1st April, 1936, if retired while still seconded by the Department of National Defence to the radio broadcasting commission, although there was no statutory provision for the superannuation of members of said commission,—

1. Was he retired as radio commissioner?

2. If so, when, and was he still seconded at that time?

3. If so, what total amount did he pay for his superannuation from the date of his appointment as radio commissioner, October 1, 1931, until his retirement?

4. How much does he receive per annum from the date of his superannuation?

5. Is he the same Lieutenant-Colonel Steel as the one of which the government has said at page 1052 of Unrevised Hansard of February 17 of this year, that he had not been granted a bonus, an extension of salary payment, or any kind of gratuity?

6. If so, what is his age?

7. If not, what service did each of both Lieutenant-Colonels Steel render to the Dominion of Canada, and in what capacity?

8. In case of the death of the former, how much will his family receive per annum?

MAJOR GENERAL A. G. L. MCNAUGHTON

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the statement of the government at page 759 of revised Hansard of March 4, 1936, that Major General A. G. L. McNaughton's, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., M.Sc., LL.D., pension as ex-chief of the general staff would have been $4,800 per annum, as of July 4, 1936, if he were sent back to the Department of National Defence before being retired, or $9,000 per annum, as of July 4, 1942, if retired while still seconded by the Department of National Defence to the National Research Council as president of such council, although there was no statutory provision for a pension to be paid to the president of the National Research Council,—

1. Is he still seconded by the Department of National Defence to the National Research Council?

2. If not, was he sent back to the Department of National Defence, and when, and in what capacity?

3. If so, why, and what is his present salary?

4. What total amount will he have to pay for his superannuation from the date of his appointment to the National Research Council, June 1, 1935, until the date of his superannuation, July 4, 1942?

5. What will be the total of his salary as president of the National Research Council during that period of seven years, one month and three days?

6. What is his age?

7. If he is not sent back to the Department of National Defence before July 4, 1942, what will be the total amount of his superannuation per annum?

8. In case of his death on or after that date, how much will his family receive per annum?

PREMIUM ON CANADIAN DOLLAR IN RESPECT OF PAYMENTS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. POULIOT:

What premiums were paid yearly to United States from 1930 to 1935 inclusive, when Canada's dollar was at a discount and her debts had to be met in gold in New York?

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. How many civil servants receive a salary of less than $1,000: (a) in the inside service; (b) in the outside service?

2. What number of civil servants receive a salary of between $1,000 and $2,000: (a) in the inside service; (b) in the outside service?

3. What number of civil servants receive a salary over $2,000, grouping them by grades of $1,000 until the maximum salary is reached: (a) in the inside service; (b) in the outside service?

Mr. RINFRET: I suggest that this question be passed as an order for return, with a reservation as to the possibility of supplying in its entirety the information asked for.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BRITISH FAMILY SETTLEMENT SCHEME

Mr. MacMILLAN:

For a copy of: (a) correspondence exchanged between the provincial government of Saskatchewan and the Prime Minister of Canada regarding a resolution passed by the Saskatchewan legislature on February 27, 1936, in favour of a resumption of British family settlement in Canada: (b) correspondence exchanged between the Premier of Saskatchewan, or the provincial government of Saskatchewan, and the Prime Minister of Canada regarding resolutions in favour of an early resumption of British family settlement in Saskatchewan, passed by the Saskatchewan immigration and settlement convention, held at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, on September 23 and 24, 1936.

VETERANS' ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I should like to inquire of the government when the report of the veterans' assistance commission will be laid on the table?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The minister is not in his seat at the moment, but I shall direct his attention to my hon. friend's question.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) reads as follows:

This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to deal with the problem of unemployment.

We in this corner of the chamber will support that resolution. In fact, had the leader of the opposition not moved his amendment, we would have moved one along those lines.

It would seem that the attitude of hon. members toward this great question of unemployment is to no small extent determined by the place in which they sit in this house. It was not so very long ago that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) moved a similar amendment. In 1935 he moved the following amendment to the motion to go into supply:

This house regrets that, notwithstanding the specific promises made prior to the election of 1930, and many times since reiterated, and despite the fact that extraordinary powers to deal with unemployment have been repeatedly secured from parliament, the present administration, after nearly five years of office, has not yet submitted to parliament any definite or effective policy to deal with widespread actual unemployment or distress which continues to be Canada's most urgent national problem.

At that time we supported the amendment, and if the Minister of National Defence moved a similar amendment to-day we would give it similar support. But he has not moved it, and so far as we can learn, the government, of which he is a member, has taken no action to deal effectively with this great problem, which he then stated—with which statement I agree—was Canada's most urgent national problem.

Not only did the present Minister of National Defence take that position, but I find that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was also very anxious to have this problem dealt with promptly. On February 5, 1935, he moved:

That this house is of the opinion that when it is moved into committee of supply priority should be given consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour in order that opportunity may be afforded for an immediate discussion and consideration of conditions of unemployment and distress at present existing in all parts of Canada, and of the measures required to cope therewith.

The present government has been in office for well on to two years—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A year and a half.

Mr. DUNNING: Sixteen months.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The present government has been in office for sixteen months; we are now in the second session, and nothing has been done to cope effectively with the problem of unemployment. The Prime Minister is reported in Hansard on February 12, 1935, as follows:

In the House of Commons on April 29, 1931, at page 1113 of Hansard I am reported as follows:

"As unemployment is incidental to industry as it is carried on to-day, I believe some system of insurance against unemployment is absolutely necessary and should be provided."

That was in 1931. Then on the next page: "—having regard to the problem of unemployment before us at the moment, a problem that we know is going to recur from time to time, the government should immediately consider how a system of unemployment insurance can be made applicable to meet such a situation."

That was not sixteen months ago; it was in 1935, and the right hon. gentleman was referring to the attitude of the Liberal party in 1931. Proceeding to discuss certain constitutional difficulties, he said:

There is an opportunity for an immediate step to be taken by the federal government to provide a measure of unemployment insurance. No question of constitutionality can be raised with respect to it.

If there is an immediate step that can be taken without incurring any constitutional objections, I wonder why the Prime Minister has not taken it, or has not indicated in any way that his government proposes to take it. Thus we see, Mr. Speaker, that when the Liberals were in power before, we had to join with the Conservatives in urging that something be done about the then increasing problem of unemployment. The Conservatives were put in power pledged to deal with this very problem, and then we in this corner found ourselves allied with the Liberals and gladly supporting any motion they brought forward urging action with regard to it. Again the government has changed, and to-day we find ourselves backing a Conservative motion.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that throughout all these years the situation has not changed fundamentally. Only a few months ago the Canadian Welfare Council issued a statement on the relief outlook in Canada. I suppose most hon. members were supplied with this pamphlet, and I wish to read a few significant paragraphs. It is a document which was prepared by a non-partisan organization and one that cannot, I think, be said to be in opposition to government policies. After reviewing the situation province by province, this statement is made in connection with the drought situation in the west:

The western tragedy has affected relief loads in all the western cities sending them high again, though Winnipeg, because of the transfer of heads of families from direct relief to relief works, has not moved sharply upward as might otherwise have been anticipated.

I would ask the house to note this statement:

As it is, quite apart from drought relief, the loads look as if they would stand (as at the first of December) at a figure representing 6 per cent to 8 per cent increase over comparable 1935 totals. As dependency grows in the western drought areas an even heavier increase may be expected. In fact, were all those now aided through special works projects, farm placement, etc., included, the number of persons receiving assistance, directly or indirectly, may even rise to a figure as high as 12 per cent above last year's totals at this time.

Mr. ROGERS: Unofficially estimated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: An unofficial estimate; quite so.

Mr. ROGERS: And incorrect.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then it is very strange, if this estimate is so incorrect, that one who I believe was very largely responsible for making the statement should be borrowed by the government to help carry on the work of the unemployment commission. Here is another statement made by the one guilty of such great inaccuracy:

Though relief scales in numerous municipalities in Canada bear no relationship to minimum subsistence needs, others, especially in the larger centres, while admittedly conforming with minimum standards only, exceed, for the man with more than three or four children, full time or average earnings when employed at prevailing rates in unskilled and semi-skilled pursuits.

That is just a little sidelight on the low wages and low standard of living prevailing in Canada. Apparently official bodies fear to give a decent dole, fear to give adequate relief, because the relief granted, small as it is, might approximate the wages that are paid semi-skilled and unskilled workers in their ordinary vocations.

One more passage, in which reference is made to special problems:

The homeless man who is not absorbed in farm placement or in heavy manual work projects because of unsuitability, age or handicap; the aimless, restless youth who has never known employment or sees no hope in temporary occupation or "made" work; the increasing number of displaced, older single women; the growing problem of the non-resident individual or family shoved from municipal pillar to provincial post and back to emergency relief or private charity; and the mounting percentage of burned out war veterans seeking something to eke out the veterans allowance.

I quote one more paragraph:

Relief costs not only are not decreasing but increasing as persons long without income, whether on relief or idle, face complete depletion of their resources and seek the meeting of their needs from social assistance. Also, as economic dislocation continues, families of younger workers and therefore smaller in numbers come on the relief lists, and this smaller average number in each household tends to raise both the average and per capita costs. An upward movement in the costs of some foods is directly affecting relief costs, while the need for medical and health care for thousands on relief is forcing municipality after municipality to some experiment in providing such services at public cost. State medicine looms on the horizon as a problem that is no longer academic.

These extracts—and they come from an impartial source and one that has been quite close to the problem across the country—give some indication that fundamentally the problem as we face it to-day does not differ from the problem as it has presented itself in past months and past years.

Take my own city of Winnipeg, in which of course I have a very special interest. A series of articles on the relief situation appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press in the latter part of November. The articles were based on interviews with those in charge of the giving of relief. I quote:

According to Alderman Paul Bardal, chairman of the civic unemployment relief committee, there have been exactly 24,511 families in receipt of relief from the city since the dawn of the depression.

Again:

Forty per cent of the people of Winnipeg have been on relief at one time or another during the past seven years.

Still further:

The largest body are the common labourers, of which there are 1,636 on family relief. There are 883 office and mercantile workers, 865 skilled construction workers, 711 formerly engaged in transportation and communications, 523 from manufacturing industries, 221 domestic and related services, 74 professional men, 57 from farms and dairies, 25 from mining, logging and fishing, 8 policemen, 2 firemen, and 89 who have never worked at any regular job.

Such a great variety of occupations are represented by those on relief as to suggest the diversity as well as the extent of the problem. I would suggest that the schemes which have been outlined to us this year or which were undertaken last year by the government simply do not touch the major number of the classes to which I have just referred.

In these family cases a very serious situation is developing. I can remember the time in my own city when it was considered almost necessary for each family to have a little house of its own, but to-day we find large numbers of houses of six or eight rooms converted into apartment houses to house from five to six or eight families. It has become almost the rule that families are placed in one or at most two rooms. I think any hon. member will recognize that we are thereby building up slums of a very serious kind. The relief departments say that they cannot help this, that they must keep down the rents and can afford only so much for the relief budget, but that does not prevent the development of a very bad state of things in houses which are so overcrowded as these. One has but to step into a police court, or, perhaps better, into juvenile court, to observe the results of the long continued unemployment which the country has experienced,—fathers discouraged, loafing around the streets; mothers dragged out, not knowing what next to do; boys and girls with no regular work, though they are out of school. Utter demoralization is coming to the homes of many of our people. It is a condition which we must face, and I think it is not taking advantage in any way of our position in the opposition to hold the government responsible for dealing with this problem.

I was disappointed in one statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in one of his earlier speeches. Speaking on January 21, he said:

> Moreover, sir, I still believe in the virtue of thrift, I still believe that a man in the full flush of his manhood has not merely the right but the duty to himself and to those who depend upon him to set aside in any manner which seems good to him a portion of the proceeds of his labour to-day in order that he and those dependent upon him may not later be dependent upon the state.

Of course we would all agree with a general sentiment of that kind, but the fact is that for years past tens of thousands of heads of families have not been able to provide even for the current expenditures which their families require, and when the depression came they found themselves, as we put it, right up against it. Thrift? It is fine to talk about thrift when there are opportunities of exercising it, but the fact is that a great many to-day have no such opportunity; they are dependent upon others for jobs, and if the others are not providing jobs they are helpless. I would commend to the notice of the Minister of Finance some observations by Oscar Wilde:

> Sometimes the poor are praised for being thrifty. But to recommend thrift to the poor is both grotesque and insulting. It is like advising a man who is starving to eat less. For a town or country labourer to practice thrift would be absolutely immoral. Man should not be ready to show that he can live like a badly-fed animal. He should decline to live like that, and should either steal, or go on the rates, which is considered by many to be a form of stealing. As for begging, it is safer to beg than to take, but it is finer to take than to beg. No, a poor man who is ungrateful, unthrifty, discontented and rebellious is probably a real personality, and has much in him. He is at any rate a healthy protest.

I think we have to remember—

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend will do me the justice to admit that on that occasion I was not speaking of the poor or of those on relief, but was advocating that those who had saved should not be deprived of their savings.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether it is worth while to quote the preceding remarks of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wonder!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall do so if it is desired.

Mr. JACOBS: In the interests of truth.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is the preceding paragraph:

> I have little more to say, Mr. Speaker. All history teaches us the appeal which proposals of this kind have to the ears of men and women who are experiencing great hardship. There never has been in any modern country a time of hardship which did not have as a part of its phenomena a development of so-called monetary reform which always received for a time in all countries very wide support. In some countries the effort was made, with results that are written large on the pages of history, results which drove the common people of those countries further into the mire than they were ever driven by any depression. In other countries, notably the great republic to the south, the agitation for monetary inflation lasted in various forms for a long period of years. It was never successful. I would not use the term "monetary reform" because I do not regard inflation as monetary reform. I regard uncontrolled inflation as the worst kind of monetary reaction. It is destructive.

Then came the paragraph to which I alluded.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But that paragraph does show acceptance of things as they are. It suggests that those who have succeeded in making money should be able to hold on to it, quite regardless of the conditions round about, and it entirely ignores the fact that for the last seven years large numbers of people have not been able to lay up anything for the future, in fact have not been able to meet their present obligations. I have often thought of the words of Edwin Markham, "the long, long patience of the plundered poor." To-day those who are described and treated as near-criminals are essentially "the plundered poor." The various and arbitrary arrangements of society deprive a great many of them of the chance to earn a decent livelihood.

Last Christmas season the front pages of our newspapers were filled with stories of the destitution which prevailed in nearly all our cities. The Red Cross and relief agencies of all kinds were making appeals; there were stories of dire need. On the other hand, within a week or two afterwards the press was filled with stories of greatly improved business. The bankers' association and individual banks issued statements along these lines. Hidden profits of the textile industry were disclosed. Talk about stealing! The man who steals a loaf of bread, even the man who makes relief a racket in order to get a little more for his family which is inadequately clothed or fed, is in my judgment nothing like so great a thief as he who evades taxation and puts away profits out of which he should have contributed more largely to government revenues. The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) deprecated the use of the slogan, "soak the rich." I do not know that it is a very good slogan, but I would point out that the present practice is to "soak the poor." It has been done very effectively over a long period of years. Surely the time has come when we should adopt a different attitude. I invite the attention of the house to the principles of a program that was placed a few weeks ago before congress by the President of the United States. They are contained in a front page editorial in the Halifax Herald, and it seems to me highly significant that a newspaper of that stamp should emphasize declarations of this kind:

1. We must find practical controls over blind economic forces and blindly selfish men.

2. As intricacies of human relationships increase, so power to govern them also must increase—power to stop evil; power to do good.

3. We have always known that heedless self-interest was bad morals; we now know that it is bad economics.

(4) We are beginning to abandon our tolerance of the abuse of power by those who betray for profit the elementary decencies of life.

(5) The lowest standard of living can be raised far above the level of mere subsistence.

(6) The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little.

That latter clause I should like especially to urge upon the house. The Prime Minister will probably rise and point to the constitutional difficulties, but surely we have gone far enough and long enough with the employment question to recognize that essentially it is a matter of national emergency. If we had a few thousand people left destitute by a great flood there is no doubt whatever that the spectacular character of the appeal would lead to millions being poured forth in order to succour those people. The trouble is that we have had this problem of unemployment with us so long that we have forgotten its seriousness.

How have these constitutional difficulties worked out? The dominion says that under the British North America Act this is primarily a provincial problem; and the provinces take the position that since they themselves are in a bad way financially the matter becomes primarily one for the municipalities. The municipalities in the west are almost bankrupt and therefore cannot cope with the problem. It has been recognized, in the announcement that a commission to study the financial relationship between the dominion and the provinces, that the present set-up is not satisfactory. It seems to me that the announcement of the appointment of that commission is in itself sufficient proof that the provinces are not financially in a position to deal with the situation. That being so, it does seem to me that while commissions are investigating and reporting—and until such time as we can get some modification of the British North America Act—the poor people of Canada, who after all are citizens of Canada, ought not to be allowed to suffer.

Surely I should not have to refer to the position of the Liberal party on this question of unemployment, but in order to refresh their memories I would call attention to a leaflet which was circulated before the last election in which the policies of the Liberal party of Canada in relation to some immediate outstanding problems were set forth. Speeches by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the House of Commons on February 27, 1935, were quoted as follows:

Unemployment of First Concern

The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

That is the first section. I ask: Can the Liberal party claim that the present commission is in any real sense a representative national commission? The personnel of that commission was indicated to the house yesterday by the leader of the opposition. Can we say that it is a thoroughgoing representative national commission? I think not. We find, therefore, that that commission is not a body which is devoting all its time to this matter; rather it is simply an advisory commission that reports to the minister. I doubt whether we shall have an opportunity to discuss in detail what that commission is doing. In fact, I do not know whether we shall even have an opportunity to hear a report as to what the commission really proposes. The commission is simply a departmental adjunct. Can this be said to be carrying out the announced policy of the Liberal party? Let me read again:

As permanent measures the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade;—

They may say that they have done that, but let me quote further:

—and to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance.

"A national system of unemployment insurance." It may be that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice will immediately take the ground that in view of the report of the judicial committee of the privy council the government have not the power to set up a national system of unemployment insurance. They might have known what the result might be of any appeal to the privy council in this regard, but the fact is that prior to making the appeal they decided upon this as one of the fundamental Liberal policies. I know that in the United States this question of state versus federal jurisdiction has been a problem, and we have always considered that residual power was with the individual states. But notwithstanding that, they seem to have been able to put through a large measure of social security. That could be done in Canada; for as I have said again and again in this house, I believe the old saw is true, that where there is a will there is a way. But the present government has not only scrapped, or taken such action as led to the scrapping, of the unemployment insurance measures which were introduced by the previous government, but in addition to that it has failed to indicate in any way whatever that it is about to introduce any system of unemployment insurance which might avoid the constitutional difficulties, or to provide any substitute.

It would not be so bad if we had an adequate system of relief, but such does not exist. We are faced with a very serious difficulty in having a Liberal government in power at the present time. In the first place the Prime Minister always resorts to the constitutional difficulties, and if they do not serve then he has recourse to the old laissez faire policy: we must not interfere with private industry, and so on. Between these two it is extremely difficult to get action—and action is what we need in Canada to-day, especially in dealing with unemployment. I want to give one other clause from the Liberal party's statement of its position prior to the last election:

The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property. It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth, with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

These are lofty sentiments, and it is no doubt the enunciation of these lofty sentiments, coupled with the failure of the previous government to solve the problem of unemployment and other outstanding problems that face our country, that led to the election of the present Liberal government. They may sit back in their seats happy in the thought that they will not be disturbed for several years yet, but I submit that they cannot be relieved of the responsibility of making some effort to carry out the definite pledges which they made to the electorate only two years ago.

In respect to a matter of this kind, since all hon. members individually are anxious to do something to relieve the distress of their fellow citizens, and finding ourselves continually bombarded with pleas for help from people living in the various communities from which we come, surely the time has arrived when we can sink our party differences and get together in a real effort to solve this grave problem. I have said before that from the standpoint of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation we do not think unemployment can be fully cured short of fundamental changes in our economic system. Hon. members opposite believe that it can. They say they have no mandate to bring in socialism. Very well, but surely we can at least all unite in an effort to bring relief to those in distress. As long as many incomes are large, and profits increasing, and there are those in our midst able to live lives of luxury, we have no right to permit any government to claim that there is no money to provide the necessities of life for those in distress.

I cannot close without reminding the house that it is these considerations among others that made us protest the other day against increasing military expenditures. Since the Minister of Finance finds it possible to raise money for matters of that kind, he ought to find it possible to raise enough to provide adequate food and clothing and shelter and some little hope in life for those who for the past four or five or six years have been suffering the hardships consequent upon unemployment and who do not know what to do next. I urge upon the government that even now it is not too late to make adequate provision for the needs of these people.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) deliver his budget speech in this house I was pleased to know that this country has emerged so far out of the depression. But when he had finished I was thoroughly convinced that any improvement in our economic condition was not due to the policies of the present administration, but rather had taken place in spite of them.

It is greatly to be regretted that at a time, when the country is emerging from a depression, a budget should be presented which strikes such a serious blow at industry and does nothing at all for the agriculturist. The alterations that have been made in the trade agreement with the United Kingdom will to a great degree hurt the manufacturers of this country, and there is no provision in the budget to relieve the dairy farmers of the ever increasing importations of vegetable oils. In 1936, 158,000,000 pounds of these oils were imported into Canada from countries such as Egypt, China and Manchuria, where labour is very cheap. These oils cost about 2½ cents a pound in the country of origin. They are refined in Canada by a chemical process which costs very little, and tremendous profits are being made from their sale. From these imported oils 81,000,000 pounds of domestic shortening was made and sold last year, and the remainder of the oil was disposed of to the soap factories, thus coming into competition with our butter, lard, and other animal fats.

The Canadian market could quite easily absorb all the butter, lard and tallow produced in Canada. Last year we had an exportable surplus of 10,000,000 pounds of butter, and we exported 20,000,000 pounds of lard. But we made a market in our own country for 81,000,000 pounds of domestic shortening manufactured from cheap oils imported from foreign countries. This domestic shortening is a greater menace to the dairy farmer than was the sale of oleomargarine which the government saw fit to prohibit. The United States have placed a duty of 4½ cents a pound on imported vegetable oils, in order to protect their farmers, but the markets of Canada are left as a dumping ground by the present administration. The sale of domestic shortening is depressing the price of butter and lard and thus has a tendency to lower the value of hogs and cattle.

In discussing the budget and the proposed amendment it is well that we should review the results of tariff changes in the past in order that we may be better able to make wise provision for the future. In the final analysis tariffs are nothing more or less than instruments in the hands of governments whereby they may regulate international trade, so that countries with different climatic conditions, higher standards of living and higher rates of wages may be able to compete successfully in their home markets with manufactured goods from countries where climatic conditions are better or where the scale of wages and standard of living are much lower.

Let us go back to 1913. In that year the United States permitted agricultural products from Canada to enter free of duty, thereby giving Canada a much better trade agreement than that contained in the reciprocity pact of 1911, which the people of Canada so definitely rejected at the general election of that year. From 1913 to 1921 Canadian agricultural products entered the United States free of duty. But between 1921 and 1930 the markets of the United States were closed to the Canadian exporter, and during those years a Liberal government was almost constantly in office in Canada. The result of the closing of those markets is readily seen from examination of the trade figures. In 1921 Canada exported to the United States $74,000,000 worth of agricultural products. In 1930 that export trade had fallen to $4,000,000. That was a result of nine years of Liberal administration and this was the condition that existed when the Conservative government came to office in 1930; the markets of the world were closed to the Canadian exporter and there was an adverse balance of $100,000,000. The government which came into power in 1930 immediately set to work to secure markets for the Canadian exporter. Treaties were signed with several countries; the empire trade agreement signed in Ottawa in 1932 gave Canada for the first time in her history a preference in the British market. Ever since confederation successive governments have endeavoured to secure a preference in the British market for the Canadian exporter, but they failed, despite the fact that for many years Canada had given the mother country a preference in this market for certain commodities. The trade agreement signed at Ottawa in 1932 will go down in history as one of the great achievements of the Canadian people; it will rank with confederation and the building of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Every major development in Canada has been engineered by the Conservative party. Whatever little assistance the Liberal party gave Sir John A. Macdonald at confederation, we know the bitterness with which they opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. We know that members of that party stated on the floor of the house that it would never pay for the grease on the wheels, yet it has developed into the greatest transportation system in the civilized world. Hon. members who were in the house in 1932 will recall how bitterly the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) opposed the empire trade agreements and he stated many times that if he were returned to power he would repeal them. True, to some extent he has weakened them, but he dare not repeal them.

Reduction of tariffs does not necessarily mean cheaper goods for the consumer, but it does mean lower wages to the worker and very often higher costs to the consumer. In 1897 a Liberal administration placed binder twine upon the free list with the result that about twenty small factories in Canada which were manufacturing binder twine were forced to close down. Up went the price of binder twine. Last year this administration drastically reduced the tariffs on farm implements and furniture. Up went the price of farm implements, and to-day furniture is selling in Canada at a price higher than it was a year ago. Higher prices are the logical result of curtailed volume of business; there must always be a greater profit on a smaller turnover. The former government made an agreement with the implement manufacturers that prices were not to be raised to the farmers, on the condition that the manufacturers were to be protected in their home market. To that agreement the manufacturers adhered.

When a man buys an article in a foreign country he is sending his money to pay foreign labourers and to build the foreign institutions. When he buys an article manufactured in Canada he spends his money to pay Canadian labour and to build up Canadian homes. I think hon. members will agree it is the duty of the head of every household to see that those dependent upon him are properly housed, fed and clothed. I believe this government is making an honest endeavour to better housing conditions in Canada. We are producing a surplus of every kind of food which can be grown profitably in Canada, but what about clothing ourselves? Half of our people are walking about to-day clothed in garments imported from foreign countries. If we had succeeded in clothing ourselves to the extent we have succeeded in feeding ourselves there would not be an idle man or woman in Canada. Moreover we could give employment to thousands of men and women who would be pleased to make Canada the land of their adoption.

Industry must take up the slack in employment, and in doing so it will be creating markets for agriculturists. It has frequently been argued that goods should be manufactured in countries which either possess or have easy access to the raw material, but I suggest that is not so. For instance, let us consider the silk and tin industries of the United States. Not a pound of raw silk or a pound of tin is produced in any state of the union, yet in the manufacture of these commodities they have built up some of the largest industries in the world. That has been done by placing heavy duties upon manufactured articles and permitting the raw material to enter free of duty.

To talk about lower tariffs and free trade at this time is just as foolish as to talk about disarmament when the whole world is an armed camp. Even Great Britain, which until a few years ago made the proud boast that her ports were open to the commerce of the world, was forced to protect her industries and throw to the winds the moth-eaten garment of free trade which could no longer protect her citizens.

I regret very much that the government has seen fit to reduce the tariffs on textiles. There are about five hundred textile mills in Canada distributed over 275 municipalities. These mills employ 63,000 workers, almost fifty per cent of whom are women. They have an annual pay-roll of $84,000,000. The factories which are manufacturing primary textiles are situated in our smaller towns and villages. In addition we have about 2,500 manufacturing establishments known as the secondary textile industry, or the industry engaged in needlecraft. That part of the textile industry employs 116,000 workers and has an annual pay-roll of $90,000,000. The textile industry does not pay as high wages as many of the heavier industries, but the work is steady and during the depression the towns fortunate enough to have textile mills suffered less from unemployment and paid less for relief than was paid in towns and cities where heavier industries were located. This is a cold country, and the woollen industry should be protected against importations from countries with more favourable climatic conditions, and where the standard of living and scale of wages is lower than it is in Canada. Until such time as the Canadian people learn to clothe themselves to the same degree as they have learned to feed themselves, conditions will not greatly improve.

I have before me figures showing average wages paid in textile factories of Great Britain and Canada. They are as follows:

	Great Britain	Canada
Girls ..	8·90 cents per hour	20 cents per hour
Women.	14·83 " "	24·42 " "
Boys ..	10·38 " "	20·23 " "
Men ..	28·23 " "	37 " "

The average wage in Great Britain, apart from wages paid to office and sales staffs, stood at 16·90 cents per hour and 30·19 cents per hour in Canada. In many European countries where textiles are manufactured the rates of wages are as far below those of Great Britain as those of Great Britain are below those of Canada. It is the duty of every government to encourage its people to feed and clothe themselves, not only in their own economic interests but also in order that in time of war they may not be cut off from their supplies.

In 1930 the tariff rate on textiles was materially increased, and in the years that followed there was a marked reduction in the price of textiles to the consumer. During the depression the textile industry proved to be the salvation of eastern Canada. At a time when many of the heavier industries were closing down or reducing their staffs, between 1930 and 1935, the textile industry increased the number of employees by twenty per cent. Had this industry not received the increased protection given in 1930, many of the mills could not have survived the depression and thousands of their employees would have been forced on relief.

The textile industry of Canada uses annually $8,000,000 worth of chemicals, dyes, oils and soaps, most of which are produced in Canada. The industry spends $1,500,000 for the manufacture of packing boxes and $3,000,000 for the purchase of electric power and it is estimated that for every ton of manufactured goods shipped out of a textile mill, thirteen tons of coal, raw materials, supplies of one kind and another and machinery go into the mill. This means a double haul for our railroads. When we buy imported goods, the railroads haul only the finished product, which is just one ton in every thirteen.

Eighty-five per cent of the capital invested in the woollen and knit goods industry in Canada is Canadian, the other fifteen per cent being divided between Great Britain, France and the United States. The textile industry is one of the oldest in Canada and deserves well of the Canadian government because it has played an important part in the development of this country. The economic and social life in many of our towns and villages is dependent upon the local textile mill. Not only do these mills give employment to many heads of families, but they employ large numbers of girls from the time they leave school until they are married. If these girls were not employed they would be charges upon their respective families.

I am at a loss to understand the attitude of many of our western members toward the tariff protection afforded the industries of eastern Canada. The western provinces are constantly coming to the federal government asking for assistance, which assistance must be paid for largely by the industries they seek to destroy. I am sure every one sympathizes with the western provinces in their present distress, and it is only right and proper that the federal government should come to their aid. Their present state has been brought about by circumstances over which they have had no control, the successive failure of their crops. However more new wealth has been produced by these western provinces in the last fifty years than by any other part of Canada. If that wealth had been properly handled it would have been sufficient to tide them over any ordinary difficulty.

Ontario and Quebec, where the great majority of these protected industries are located, pay seventy-five per cent of the taxes collected in Canada. I ask this house: How long are Ontario and Quebec going to remain a pair of placid milch cows to be stripped dry to pay the bills of provincial governments over whose expenditure they have no control? I have always been opposed to one government taxing the people and then passing the money over to another government or to some other body to spend. The government that taxes the people should be responsible to the people for the expenditure of the money. In all fairness I say it is high time that these western provinces were told quite frankly that they must put their own houses in order to balance their budgets and live within their means.

The farmer and the manufacturer should not be flying at each other's throats. They are partners in the development of this country. The prosperity of the farmer and the prosperity of the industrialist are inseparably bound together. The farmers best market is the men and women employed in industry. After all, the textile industry is a creation of the Canadian government. There would have been no textile industry in Canada had it not been for the encouragement and the protection given by successive governments. Surely this is an inopportune time to curtail the activities of this industry in any degree when all classes of our people should be earnestly united in an honest effort to cure our economic ills, of which unemployment is the chief.

Investigations into the textile industry have shown certain unethical practices on the part of the silk and cotton industries, but nothing has been laid to the charge of the woollen industry. We find in the budget that the silk and cotton industries have received the minimum reduction, while the woollen industry is practically crippled. Can this be because the silk and cotton industries have behind them the money barons of this country, while the woollen industry is mostly privately owned, the mills being scattered throughout the small towns and villages? Whatever may be the cause, the budget has not treated the woollen industry with common British justice.

Under the old tariff Great Britain had forty per cent of the textile market in Canada. The manufacturers in Great Britain are jubilant because they have prospects of dominating the Canadian market under the provisions of this new agreement. Many of our textile men are discouraged. A manager of a large textile mill told me this week that when protection was given in 1930 he thought that Canada wanted her textiles manufactured in Canada. He came over from England and made large investments. They employed a large number of Canadians and spent considerable money, but he told me that if they could get nearly the amount they had invested, they would go back to England. He seemed to think that Canada had decided that she wanted her textiles manufactured in Great Britain. That is the spirit dominating our textile business to-day. It is a great pity, because it is one of the finest and oldest industries in Canada.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I shall confine my remarks at this time to the subject matter of the amendment. This question of unemployment has been threshed out for years on the floor of this house and we are no closer to-day to a solution than we were seven or eight years ago. I believe the reason for that is that the problem has constantly been regarded as a temporary one. I am convinced that the problem of unemployment is a permanent one, and that unemployment will gradually increase as the years go by. If it had not been for the dictators of forced labour creating another war scare, unemployment in Canada to-day would be just as bad as, if not worse than, it ever was. I believe the reason why we are not making any progress in solving this problem of unemployment is chiefly because we cannot agree, to begin with, on fundamentals. We start off on false premises. The first thing we have to settle is this: What is the object of the economic system? Is it to provide goods and services, or is it to provide jobs? Judging by the remarks of those who support the orthodox point of view, the purpose of an economic system is to provide jobs. But speaking from the point of view of the new economics, I maintain that the purpose of an economic system is not to provide jobs but to provide a maximum amount of goods and services with a minimum amount of work and trouble. Because of the increasing use of solar energy on such a vast scale as we see to-day, human energy is almost unnecessary.

The remarks of a goodly number of the members of this house would lead one to believe that the machine has practically nothing to do with the unemployment situation. They would lead us to believe that unemployment is due to some maladjustment of trade or to tariffs and so forth. I should like to put on Hansard a few facts to show that the reason why our people have not jobs to-day is because the machine has taken their place. There have already been placed on Hansard a considerable number of statistics to illustrate this fact, but I think hon. members are inclined to forget them; therefore I want to place on the record a few figures to show that it is a physical impossibility to employ our people in industry to-day to such an extent that they will be able to earn enough income to buy the products of industry.

I quote from a pamphlet entitled "For All Things Are Yours," by Clive Kenrick. These are the statements he makes as to the extent to which machines have taken away the jobs of men and women, along with their pay envelopes:

In the Chevrolet foundry, Saginaw, United States of America, output advanced 290 per cent in ten years, but they eliminated 13,872 men and increased the output 5½ times per square foot of floor area.

The London Brick Company have an excavator controlled by one man electrically, excavating 30,000 tons of clay per week.

At Corby, Messrs. Stewarts and Lloyds are moving ten tons per minute with a super Hercules excavator 100 feet. . . .

The core-blowing machine using compressed air has made 200 cores an hour with unskilled labour instead of 80 per day by a skilled man. . . .

In the steel and iron trade we are now doing with one ton of coal what a few years ago took three tons.

President Roosevelt's N.I.R.A. committee on the automobile trades reports, among many other marvellous increases of efficiency, that in 1930, 250 men finished 100 motor blocks in unit time. Now in 1935, 19 men finish 250 blocks in the same time. Six years ago, 3 skilled machinists could do a job, requiring accuracy with ·0005 of an inch; now one unskilled man does it.

Welding machines now enable three men to do what 18 did six years ago. . . .

The first automatic factory appeared in the United States of America in 1915, and since 1920 they became more common. At Baton Rouge an oil refinery plant was modernized, displacing 1,000 men, and the whole control brought into the office for a few men to control by push buttons.

Continuing, he says:

To-day we have the totally automatic in traffic regulation; the telephone; gas manufacture; pumping controlled by the pressure in the mains; gas lighting; electric lighting by clockwork; thermostatic control of all heating, whether hot-water, gas or electric. The electric eye can be used for a thousand and one different objects and do practically anything that a man can do: keeping the feed water level in a boiler; start and stop machinery; sort articles at 90 a minute; automatically control the size of articles on a grinding machine; soften water to the correct degree; count the number of microbes in a culture; select colours; see through smoke; and with remote electric control, aeroplanes, submarines, etc., can be directed; and if we liked we could plough, cultivate and harvest our wheat by the same methods.

That applies not only to the industrial plants of nations, for the same thing is true of agriculture. With reference to agriculture the same writer says:

Now we have motor ploughs and combine harvesters. The ploughing and harvesting of wheat is carried on with only one man to more than a thousand acres. On a 907-acre farm in Norfolk, now it is fully mechanized, four men are employed instead of forty. In the Vale of Evesham in market gardening where ten men were employed on 20 acres, since the Rototiller was used only six are required.

Also he has something to say with respect to the poultry industry of to-day. Twenty-five years ago hens laid seventy-two eggs a year; now they lay one hundred or over, a forty per cent increase, and the good poultryman expects two hundred eggs per bird. To-day there are cows, British Friesians, giving ten gallons of milk per day. A young bullock of eighteen months is now ready for market; it does not take three years. Rothansted's experimental station states that in 1852 sixty-five men were required to complete the harvesting of an eleven-acre field of wheat in one day; now only four men are required. In 1934 England had more acres cultivated than in 1933 and raised more produce, but employed 27,000 less men. Reports upon the mechanization of agriculture show to what extent the machine has displaced man, making it increasingly difficult for labour to find work on the farms. We know that about 225 bushels of maize can be and have been raised per acre. The highest yields obtained by the Indiana corn growers' association have risen between 1914 and 1933 from 100 bushels to 165 bushels per acre. This yield is increasing at the rate of 2½ bushels a year. If all the progressive farmers in Indiana continue as at present until they get a yield of 200 bushels, the 180,000 farmers who in 1930 farmed four and a half million acres will shrink to 23,400 farmers farming just over half a million acres, or a deflation of 86 per cent.

A few more facts with regard to agriculture. In cane sugar production on the Kilauea plantation in Hawaii the sugar crop was increased between 1922 and 1932 by 116 per cent with 12 per cent less labour. Now, after eighty years' striving, a cotton-picking machine has been perfected. This machine is simplicity itself and does in 7½ hours the work that a labourer does in eleven weeks. It will liberate ninety-five per cent or more of the negro labourers. One last fact with regard to agriculture. From the evidence of what has already been done, we know that a balanced diet for the seven million inhabitants of New York city can be grown on 309 square miles, that is on an area equal to that of the city itself, and that this can be done by 6,500 labourers, or less than one man per one thousand inhabitants. It is easy to see, then, that we are on the verge of a revolution in agricultural technique. It depends upon how we behave whether we have in the agro-biological and the power machine age a pair of devils to curse or a pair of fairy godmothers to bless mankind.

In the face of these facts, I should like to ask hon. members how can any government, any commission or any individual ever hope to employ all the unemployed in industry? It is just hoping against hope; it is a physical and a mathematical impossibility. Not only is it physically impossible, but it is also undesirable. Last evening the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) suggested that there was reason to be alarmed over the fact that the vegetable kingdom would displace the animal kingdom in the near future. I should like to place on Hansard a little more information on that point, not to indicate that the fact referred to by the hon. member is anything to be alarmed about, but to show the immense strides that are being made in technological work in this country and the world at large. It will not be long before manual labour in the production of the articles necessary to keep the bodies and souls of our people together will be almost entirely unnecessary. I have here an article which describes the experiments which a California university professor has carried out in the attempt to farm without soil. The hon. member for Danforth suggested the possibility that farmers would not need to raise cows because of the substitution of vegetable fats for animal fats. According to this article, farmers will be able likewise in the future to farm without soil. It is only because I believe that this advance in the realm of agriculture is of such vital importance and will play a very important part in agriculture in the future that I put this article on Hansard. It reveals the enormous possibilities of the immediate future. It is an article which appeared in the Sunday Mirror magazine on September 20, 1936, and is entitled: "Farming without soil. Monster plants, huge harvests, no crop failures or pests. It's all the work of a California wizard who is showing farmers how to get along without farms and bringing cityfolk a new era of abundance." The article reads as follows:

If you've never seen a tomato plant twenty-five feet high, loaded with great crimson tomatoes, and bearing a seasonal yield of fourteen pounds per square foot of ground—

Or a tobacco plant as large as a tree; a tobacco plant 22 feet high, with giant leaves which would make several cigars apiece—

Or corn so tall that you would need a step-ladder to get up to where the ears grow and almost need a derrick to lower those ears to the ground—

Or giant roses half a foot across, but each bloom fragile and perfect; dahlias as big as your head, if your head's that big; potatoes of perfect size and shape running 2,500 bushels per acre—

Why, if you haven't seen any of these things, and aren't inclined to believe in their existence, hop the next plane to California and inform yourself on the strangest thing in technological improvement that has ever been developed in the whole history of farming—namely, soil-less agriculture.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Soil-less agriculture is the invention. And the revolution is here. What it will do, how far it will go, in its effect not only upon plant growing and farming, but upon human life and the whole economic set-up of tomorrow's world, it staggers the imagination to guess.

When first heard of a couple of years ago, soil-less agriculture was only an experimental stunt. This summer it has arrived. Nurserymen in California are using it to grow young plants for commercial sale, and already it has revolutionized the nursery branch of the farming and floral industries.

Far-sighted economists well may tremble at the prospect. Soil-less agriculture can end scarcity forever. It can turn the cities into farms. It can also compel almost every farm in the United States to be abandoned as an outdated, old-fashioned, inefficient thing.

Soil-less agriculture is the invention of a genial, retiring, rather elderly college professor at the University of California in Berkeley, California: Doctor W. F. Gericke of the Department of Agriculture. Doctor Gericke's amazing invention makes land unnecessary.

Doctor Gericke doesn't even like to talk about the terrific thing he has worked out. He does say anybody can do it if its done right, and he issues a word of warning not to ask him questions about it at this time, by mail or otherwise, because his early experiments are in the final testing stage. When his formulae are fully complete and fool-proof, he intends to release them to the world for general use. If this scientist didn't feel humanitarian about it, he could probably become food king of the world!

But what he does tell you and show you is suprisingly simple. Soil, when you come to think of it, is good for only three things. It holds a plant erect and keeps it warm; and it supplies the needed chemicals to its roots. Those chemicals, as most people know are mainly forms of nitrogen, potash, phosphorus, calcium, magnesium, and small amounts of iron, copper, aluminum, etc.

If a man thrives on scientific diet, why can't a plant? That was Doctor Gericke's starting point.

So he has a simple arrangement of trays which are shallow tanks. They are eight inches deep, thirty inches wide and around twenty feet long. They are mounted on hurdles so you don't have to stoop. They are either in greenhouses or outdoors; those in greenhouses, naturally, can be more fully controlled as to temperature, pests, pollenation and lighting.

Water is in those tanks, filling them, and in the water is a bottle containing a mixture of soil chemicals. The different mixes for different plants are, so far, the secret of Doctor Gericke and the nurserymen who are working with him. The bottle is uncorked and the stuff dissolves gradually.

The tanks are covered with chicken wire, right at the surface of the water. On the chicken wire is piled several inches of packed straw, sawdust, shavings, excelsior. Moisture creeps up into it from below as into the wick of a lamp. Seeds are planted in that fibrous pack, germinate there, the roots reach down into the water and drink their fill. The plant grows—and how!—and the sawdust holds it upright and keeps the roots warm. The water, too, may be warmed by electric heaters, if necessary; and artificial sunlight may beat down day or night.

In regular soil, a plant has to do a lot of work hunting for its nourishment and the whole process is chancy. This work and those chances being eliminated, along with such little items as the "damping off" fungus, drought, frost, insects, blights, summer and winter, and even night and day!

Doctor Gericke has raised potatoes, beets, carrots, lettuce, and all other ground crops. His potato yield ran 2,560 bushels per acre. A normal yield is 116 bushels.

His colossal tomato vines, three stories high, have yielded 352 pounds of ripe, superior fruit per 25 square feet of tank space. That is 236 tons to the acre; a normal yield is five tons!

Doctor Gericke's tobacco crop would make the South look sick; his corn crop is a joke on the Middle West. His Gladiolus plants grow nearly five feet high. And everything else is in proportion. One wonders—why conserve soil? And will rural America ultimately be of value only for bridle trails and golf courses?

I have placed these facts on Hansard to show that what we have to become reconciled to is that the technological advancement of our age has eliminated the necessity for manual labour. Manual labour is almost no longer necessary in industry to-day, and since men are unable to find jobs, since there are no opportunities for work because of the presence of the machine, there is only one way in which men can obtain the wherewithal to purchase the product of the machine and that is through the creation of purchasing power, claims upon wealth, by the government, issued to those who have been eliminated by the machine. I know of no other way in which the problem of unemployment can be solved.

As I have already said, the object of our industrial system is not to provide jobs; it is to provide goods and services. It is therefore the duty of this government to see that there is brought into existence a system of distribution which will equitably distribute the product of the machine amongst the people of the country. There is also a philosophical side to this question, and that, I believe, is what causes more difficulty than anything else in settling the question of unemployment. I cannot understand how hon. members can fail to see that so long as we use the machine it is absolutely impossible physically to find jobs for men in industry.

The problem narrows down philosophically to this question: Is a man who does not work entitled to eat? On first thought a great number would say, no doubt, certainly he is not. What I asked was not, is a man who does not wish to work entitled to eat, but, is the man who does not work entitled to eat? All are agreed, I think, that a man who refuses to work is not entitled to have protection and provision. But to-day our position is such that for many men it is no longer possible to obtain jobs, no matter how anxious and desirous they may be to do so. Because the machine is the product of ideas which have come down to us through the ages, and all men have inherited these ideas alike, they are all entitled to the product of the machine. And because the machine has taken away their job and their pay envelope they are entitled to the product of the machine even though they do not work. Unless we become reconciled to that fact this house will never solve the problem of unemployment.

There is a great deal to be said about this subject of work and unemployment, and I do not wish to prolong the debate unduly, but it is such an all-important subject that it deserves to be discussed from every point of view. The problem we face in this country to-day is that of educating the people in how to use leisure. When we talk about work we must remember that there are two kinds of work, voluntary labour and involuntary labour. Because of the machine it is no longer necessary for men to be engaged in forced labour, as was the case before the advent of the machine and the power age. Forced labour is at a minimum to-day as far as the production of the necessities and luxuries of life is concerned. To-day the machine has become the slave of man. And because the machine has freed man from forced labour he has spare time on his hands. But the evil of spare time to-day is that it is time for which there is no pay. If the benefits of the machine were equitably distributed it would be possible for all people, poor as well as rich, to have a good proportion of leisure time each day. In fact it has been estimated that if we used the machine to the fullest possible extent and capacity there need be forced labour only for those between the ages of twenty-five and forty-five, and they would need to work only four hours a week. That time would be sufficient for them to produce all necessities as well as luxuries, not only for themselves but for everyone else.

That is the extent to which the machine has taken the place of manual labour to-day. Consequently if the benefits of the machine were equitably distributed everyone should be able to enjoy leisure and a good deal of it. Contrary to the opinion even of many members of parliament, an age of leisure is not a loafer's paradise. Leisure is not synonymous with idleness. Maurice Colborne says that idleness is the opposite of overwork. Leisure is the opportunity of opportunities for voluntary work. Why do men apply themselves most diligently to their work in the earlier years of their careers? Simply in order that they may be free from forced activity in their declining years and be able to indulge in voluntary activity such as travel, study, sport, et cetera. The lazy man has never been the problem in history; it has always been the extremely ambitious man, the man who having made his first million wants the next one, the man who wept because there were no more worlds to conquer; these are the men who have been dangerous to society, not the lazy men. Man is born with the creative urge, and is constantly desirious of expressing that instinct in various ways. The sand castle of the child, the boat whittled by the boy, are expressions of the desire to create. Men and women find happiness in making home, a garden, or in some other hobby. It is not only an economic law that our present financial system violates, but a law of human nature. Our present financial system deliberately destroys the creative urge in man, the God-given power that stamps man with the image of his creator. The incentive which causes men to work to-day is the lowest possible. It is based on money, not on achievement. Man with his high ideals should be ashamed of such an incentive. Why do the ancient civilizations of Babylon, Egypt, Crete, Greece and Rome stand out so prominently in the history of mankind? Simply because, having been freed from all menial tasks by slaves, men had the opportunity of giving full expression to their creative instinct.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. KUHL: If I may conclude in one sentence—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. KUHL: I should like to have been able to develop the idea of leisure and the enormous possibilities for our people in an age of leisure. I trust I shall have that opportunity later.

So far as the question of unemployment is concerned, I do not believe that the present government has taken any adequate steps to deal with it as it should be dealt with. I believe that so long as the present government or any government in the world insists that the object of an economic system is to find jobs, we shall never solve the unemployment problem. And because I believe that I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak to the amendment introduced yesterday by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I realize that we are discussing a question which, of itself, confronts the people in divers and, at times, insidious ways—the question of unemployment. The amendment itself deals with the question of unemployment, not with that of employment. May I read it?

That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to deal with the problem of unemployment."

Mr. Speaker, I postulate right here that there is not a member of the house, regardless of whether he be a member of the government or not, but who can vote for this amendment. Measures may have been tried by the government, and steps may have been taken, but there is not a man in the house who, if he looks squarely at the figures and faces the facts of unemployment, can say that these measures have been effective. No effective measures have been taken to deal with the problem of unemployment.

Let us look at the record. The figures I shall use are compiled by the bureau of statistics. In May, 1931, there were 440,000 unemployed in Canada; in February, 1933, there were 713,000; in February, 1934, there were 584,000; in February, 1935, there were 552,000, and in October of 1935, when those who were propounding the "great principles of Liberalism" were sounding their clarion call from coast to coast, and referring in no uncertain terms to conditions in Canada as they saw them, there were 435,000 unemployed. Then, in December, 1936, there were 502,000 unemployed and in January, 1937, 500,000.

Mr. ROGERS: Has the hon. member the figures for January, 1936?

Mr. MASSEY: I have the figure for January, 1936; it is 556,000. In the course of my remarks I purpose dealing with that slight reduction of ten per cent from the preceding January.

I have, too, a voluminous table which lays out in exact detail the summary by months of numbers reported by provinces as having been afforded relief from May, 1932, to January 31, 1937. The figures are given per month and are divided mainly into two parts dealing with direct relief, and other relief projects. Under direct relief there are the subdivisions "not including dried out areas" and "dried out areas." Then, each of these two subdivisions is further subdivided into heads of families, dependents, individual cases and total. Under "other relief projects" the subdivisions are as follows: Single homeless; provincial works; trans-Canada highway; municipal works; farm placement; federal works; movement and assistance of settlers, and relief settlement. Then there is a column showing the grand total of all the categories I have listed.

Picking the figures at random, let us look at February, 1933. In that month there were 1,533,842 on relief; in February, 1934, there were 1,491,059; in February, 1935, 1,433,891; in September, 1935, 965,286; in September, 1936, 1,029,156 and in January, 1937, 1,301,530.

In view of these figures it is difficult to understand how any hon. member who faces the facts therein disclosed can vote against the amendment as it is worded. The test of any effort is to be found in its results, not in the theory that motivates it or in the neatness of the applied pedantry. After all, if there is a job of work to be done, the effectiveness of the attempted work is to be found in the results. That fact hon. members must admit. The amendment states that the government has failed to take "effective measures to deal with the problem of unemployment," and in the face of the figures I have just placed on Hansard I am sure the feeling is widespread throughout the house that no matter what the measures may have been, no matter how sincere may have been their motivation, and no matter anything else, in the result they have failed.

Last evening the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in a speech to which I listened with great care, spoke as he always speaks—well. I have read his speech to-day; I have read it carefully, and it seems to me that he dealt with the problem of employment rather than with that of unemployment. The amendment deals with unemployment. The theories of employment are perhaps better known to the minister than to many hon. members, but the fact of unemployment, increasing as it has since September of last year, is one known to every hon. member.

Mr. ROGERS: It does that every year, from September.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, there is the seasonal change. But on the other hand, when the minister asked for it a few moments ago, I placed upon Hansard the figure for January, 1936, which indicated a decrease of ten per cent, with which, as I said at the time, I expect to deal as I proceed.

During the course of his budget speech, referring to employment, the Minister of Finance made these observations as reported at page 1216 of Hansard:

> The disheartening aspect of these figures, however, is the obvious failure of employment to keep pace with the striking gains in business activity previously reported. Partial explanation of this is to be found in the substitution of full-time for part-time work and in the taking up of the "slack" which previously existed as a result of redundant staffs maintained by many employers who were reluctant to dismiss employees not really needed. For the rest, the explanation rests upon the progress of invention and the improvement in technical and managerial processes. To this extent it is a phenomenon which is usually met with in the early stages of recovery from depression. As it indicates an increased efficiency in the productive mechanism, its results are not to be deplored. Its ill effects are temporary; in the long run it increases employment by cheapening production and expanding consumer purchasing power. As recovery gathers momentum, increases in employment will tend to conform more closely to expansion in business activity.

It is well understood that employment or reemployment lags behind a rise in business activity. It is just as though unemployment were a large block to which was attached an elastic band in the hand of returning prosperity. If that hand is moved quickly, the block remains comparatively still until suddenly it jumps forward to the hand and meets it. Employment lags behind a rise in business activity. If there be a rise in business activity and if there be unemployment, then some artificial stimulation must be given to unemployment as a whole in order to maintain an even basis between the increased business activity and employment. During the course of his remarks, the Minister of Finance stated, as reported on page 1213 of Hansard:

> An obvious indicator of the general state of our economic health is the volume of dividend distributions by corporations. It is gratifying to report, therefore, that reliable estimates of profits for the past year were the highest since 1930, and reveal an increase of more than 13 per cent over the 1935 total.

With that I do not agree. During the last few years I think we have come to a greater realization of the intrinsic value of human values and human feelings. In these days we should not consider alone figures which may be introduced in a budget speech. We must not consider alone figures relative to unemployment; we must try to see what is behind those figures. Therefore, it seems to me that the real indicator of economic progress in Canada is not to be found on paper but in the number of the unemployed and the living conditions under which those men and their families are compelled to live. The only test of economic progress in Canada is to be found in our standard of living.

The Minister of Labour stated last night that while he was not satisfied with the progress that had been made, he was encouraged by it. I think there are many hon. members of this house who will agree with the first part of that statement, that they are not satisfied, but there are many who are, to phrase it mildly, discouraged by the continuing ghastly figures of unemployment. During the course of his remarks we listened to many statements with reference to the "broad aspects of the unemployment problem" and the "broad principles" that were to motivate the National Employment Commission. What are those broad aspects? What are those broad principles? If we spread ourselves out so broadly and so thinly, as we seem to be doing, the aspects and the principles may be broad, but they are not such as will cure unemployment. We are not interested in theory; we are interested in practice. The government is charged with a direct responsibility. We are not challenged as a parliament to study the wide application of broad aspects and broad principles. This parliament should seek, as this country does demand, direct results. It is results that count.

The minister placed upon Hansard the cost of operating the National Employment Commission to date. He stated that the members of the commission have received to date as salaries and travelling expenses a total of $18,066. The total expenditure for the youth employment committee have amounted to $8,951.51, and for the women's employment committee, $2,916. The total cost of personnel so far is $16,888.89, while the full cost of registration is $40,596.32. The complete total cost is $87,418. No statement was made by the minister as to the cost of calculating machines, office rentals and the like.

Mr. ROGERS: That was all included in the cost of registration.

Mr. MASSEY: I am relieved to hear that. A total of $87,418 has been spent so far by this National Employment Commission. For what? The minister listed some alleged accomplishments of the commission. We listened with a great deal of interest to what he recited as the returns for this $87,418. With a flush of pride the minister announced that 46,000 men had been placed under the farm placement scheme. That was started by whom?

Mr. BENNETT: A continuance of the old plan.

Mr. ROGERS: Developed from it.

Mr. MASSEY: Developed from what? From the old plan set up by the late government.

Mr. ROGERS: I made that quite plain.

Mr. MASSEY: Did this recent development really require $87,418? I compliment the minister to the degree that he could have done the job himself just as well. It did not need an expenditure of $87,418 to improve that plan.

Then the minister referred to the fact that approximately 5,000 men had been placed in the forests of British Columbia. The National Employment Commission was no doubt responsible for the Ottawa agreements and the United States trade agreement! There is a natural absorption of labour in the coming of good times. British Columbia received many benefits under the empire trade agreements of 1932. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite over and over again with triumph that the lumber industry of British Columbia received extraordinary benefits under the United States agreement. Looking through a pamphlet issued by the bureau of statistics giving a number of items affected by the Canada-United States trade agreement, as far as exportation from Canada is concerned, I find certain figures concerning in part at least British Columbia forests and dealing with Canadian exports to the United States. A comparison of the 1935 and 1936 figures is as follows:

	1935	1936
Piling	$ 19,900	$ 36,500
Plank and board softwood	7,555,800	11,284,100
Shingles	7,271,800	6,027,600
Wood pulp	22,290,300	26,504,500
Newsprint	70,957,500	83,545,900
Total	$108,095,300	$127,398,600

The increase amounted to $19,303,300, or 18 per cent. Is it not possible that a very substantial proportion of these five thousand young men went to work in the forests of British Columbia as a result of that increase as well as the substantial increases consequent upon the Ottawa 1932 agreements? Did it take the combined efforts of $87,418 worth of national employment commission to place these five thousand men?

During the course of his remarks the minister also referred, with no small degree of emphasis, to the removal of a great blot that had besmirched the escutcheon of Canada. He did not use that language, but he no doubt had it in his mind when he referred to the relief camps. He told us how these relief camps had been closed. He was speaking of the National Employment Commission at the time—

Mr. ROGERS: I was not speaking of the commission at that time.

Mr. MASSEY: Not at that particular time? I thought the commission was in his mind all through his speech. You could see that he was haunted by it. I recall very clearly in this chamber last session, prior to the setting up of the National Employment Commission the minister telling the story of the closing of the relief camps. He referred yesterday to the men who had worked on the railways last summer, and he was followed by the member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) who gave the house facts and figures from his own experience as to the results. I am forced from my own experience, Mr. Speaker, to agree with my hon. friend from Vancouver North that the results have been far from satisfactory, and the results this summer were unsatisfactory so far as the young men were concerned. The railways benefited very much by what was done, but the young men did not benefit at all so far as I have been able to see. Where have these men gone since the railway work was finished? The member for Vancouver North told us last night where some of them had gone. When I was in Calgary and Edmonton in November, 1936, responsible persons informed me of their worries in regard to these young men who were floating into their cities. Vancouver tells the same story. The same story can be told in the east. The city of Toronto could tell the same story. Is this an achievement of the National Employment Commission? Is this what we received for $87,418?

Then the minister referred to the home improvement plan. I have already spoken of the home improvement plan in this chamber, and I see no reason why I should recall any remarks that I have made concerning it. It is a step, but it is a small step, in the creation of work. The results to date, in spite of the high pressure that has been put on the home improvement plan, as a result of the efforts of $87,418 worth of commission, have been about $1,500,000, I believe. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. ROGERS: Close to $2,000,000, I think.

Mr. MASSEY: Getting close to $2,000,000, and that after a half million dollar advertising campaign, every dollar of which was subscribed for the good of the cause.

The right hon. leader of the opposition yesterday afternoon placed upon Hansard what he called a "deadly parallel" between the 1932 agreements and the present agreement with the United Kingdom. If time permitted this afternoon I could place upon Hansard a deadly parallel between the United States home improvement plan and the Canadian plan. Our home improvement plan was lifted bodily from the United States—with a few changes, I admit—and brought to Canada. Did it require $87,418 worth of commission to lift that plan from the United States? Again I compliment the minister to the extent of saying that he himself could have prepared the Canadian plan.

Mr. ROGERS: But not the organization across the country.

Mr. MASSEY: Not perhaps the organization across the country, but certainly if the plan is as worthy as he thinks it is, the provinces, which are so "emphatically Liberal," as we have heard over and over again, and the municipalities, would have rejoiced to cooperate with him.

In the course of his remarks the minister made a statement which rather interested me. He said:

> Again, I think one can say that that kind of nation-wide cooperative effort was rendered possible only by the National Employment Commission. I feel certain that it could not have been put into effective operation by any department of the dominion government.

That I think is a reflection on the minister's own department and on the Department of Finance. I am sure hon. members on both sides of this house have a higher opinion of those two departments than that. I do not see that it requires in any way, shape or form $87,418 worth of commission to copy and set up and operate the home improvement plan.

And what was all the minister was able to place before this house as having been accomplished by the commission so far? I have referred to the 46,000 placed on farms under the farm placement plan which was inaugurated by the former government, and to the 5,000 who have gone into the forests of British Columbia as a result of improved conditions. I have referred to the fiasco of the railway labour plan of last summer, and to the so far inept home improvement plan, inept so far as creating work is concerned. That is all we have to show for our $87,418 worth of commission.

The minister also referred to the fact that registration throughout the municipalities had been carried forward with great effectiveness, so much so that many of those who were on relief were found to be unworthy of relief, or were found not to be in a position of necessity to continue on relief. The minister put it this way, that when they were called to census they did not have the courage to respond. But that registration was not done by the commission, Mr. Speaker; it was done by the municipalities and paid for by the municipalities, and the registration of those on relief, if the minister had required the total figures, could have been completed in the bureau of statistics. Surely the figures could have been sent in to the bureau from the municipalities, totalled, and handed to the minister. Then the statement I read at the introduction of my remarks in regard to those on relief, going back to 1931, is a clear statement of fact relative to relief rolls. Surely the minister will admit that it is a fairly efficient statement; and what further information was necessary to the minister in regard to his great plan to cure unemployment? The minister has before him constantly figures as a result of the activities of his own department, and there is a basis upon which he could work and plan. The registration, I repeat, was carried forward by the municipalities and not by the commission; the Labour department's own figures are adequate; why then the need of $87,418 worth of commission to supply him with duplicate figures and statistics?

Let us examine another aspect of the situation. We listened with a good deal of interest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) as he introduced his budget, and may I say, as I have risen in my place to speak on the amendment rather than on the budget, that I have not yet congratulated the Minister of Finance upon his excellent presentation. After he presented his budget we saw headlines in the daily press about this "cheerful budget." I have not seen any references to the cheerfulnes of the minister, which might have been more apt. But the cheerfulness, if any, of the budget was unquestionably based on the trade figures. Exports, the minister reported, were up twenty-three per cent; imports were up fifteen per cent, and hon. members pounded their desks to express their approbation. Let us examine the figures for just a moment.

In 1935 our exports to the United Kingdom amounted to 37·2 of our total exports, and our exports to the empire amounted to 43 per cent of our total exports. Then 43·4 per cent of our exports went to the United States. The year 1936 presents an interesting contrast. Our exports to the United Kingdom had increased by 2·2 per cent, to 39·4 per cent of the total, and our exports to the empire had gone up by two-tenths of one per cent, to bring the figure to 43·2 per cent. Exports to the United States had dropped by 3·3 per cent to 40·1 per cent. We have been told that our trade with the United States has increased—which it has—and looking through the figures supplied to me by the bureau of statistics relative to trade I note that the increased total of the 1936 trade as compared with 1935 trade to the United States represents 13·3 per cent. As one looks through the United Kingdom trade figures one notices there an increase of 34 per cent under the old Ottawa agreements. Thus, under the new agreement with the United States there was an increase of 13·3 per cent and under the old Ottawa agreement with the United Kingdom there was an increase of 34 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, times are getting better as far as trade is concerned, but who am I or who is the Minister of Finance or who is any hon. member of this house to face an unemployment situation wherein there are, in round figures, 1,300,000 people on relief and 500,000 unemployed; to stand up and say "times are getting better in terms of trade" and not go further and present a program for the amelioration of unemployment? I submit that the general betterment of Canadian conditions to date has been not because of government action but chiefly in spite of government inaction.

What tools have been used to decrease unemployment? What tools, outside of the United States agreement, have been used to increase employment?

An hon. MEMBER: Quack remedies.

Mr. MASSEY: There have been the Ottawa agreements. There has been the general rise in world conditions. With neither of these things has the present government had anything to do; the former, as the leader of the opposition so ably pointed out yesterday, was bitterly opposed by those who constitute the present government. Of course Canadian conditions are better, but unemployment continues at the ghastly high pitch at which it now is. And why? The reason, it seems to me, is obvious—the result of Liberal policy to attempt to develop Canada outside of Canada. The defects of that policy have never been more ably demonstrated than they are to-day, when trade outside of Canada is increasing yet unemployment refuses of itself to decrease.

On page 1426 of Hansard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is reported as having said, last evening.

> It has been announced that by reason of the marked economic recovery in the past year the dominion government is now entitled to accept a lesser degree of financial responsibility for unemployment relief.

Those words frightened me when I heard them. What does the minister mean by "accept a lesser degree of responsibility" for the burden of relief? He refers, I assume, to direct relief paid out in dollars. The unemployment situation, Mr. Speaker, is not going to be cured by the continual paying out of dollars. A return of good times—within itself seemingly an act of God as far as this present government is concerned—may fall into the lap of this government and permit them, when an election comes, to go to the people and say "see what we have done," though actually they have done nothing at all. But no possible increase in good times can substantially or fully reduce unemployment automatically. Therefore, if the government feel that they are getting to the point where they can accept lesser responsibility as far as the burden of relief is concerned, that indeed is bad news for the people of Canada. I listened carefully to the minister's statement, and heard him say, as reported at page 1428 of Hansard:

> We took the ground, Mr. Speaker, before we came into office, and we take the ground now, that if anyone is going to deal with this many-sided, complex question upon the basis of long-term policies, it is essential that the dominion government shall have before it at all times the means of measuring the magnitude of the problem, the means of securing those elements in the problem which will permit its division, as it were, into separate and distinct problems, each of which can in due course be attacked by its own technique, and by its own appropriate governmental or private agency.

I have said in this house before, and I repeat, that surely the problem of unemployment is stark and obvious. Surely it is not necessary to delve down deep into figures and splash about in a bath of statistics and have machines running in Montreal and Ottawa and this, that and the other kind of mechanical appliance pouring out figures, figures, figures, in the face of so stark and obvious a reality. Even when this $87,418 worth of commission brings in its report, what happens?

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing.

Mr. MASSEY: The Votes and Proceedings of January 29, 1937, contain the following among other questions and answers in connection with the employment commission, asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

> How many reports upon measures and means in respect to the employment of youth have been made by this committee?

Referring to the youth employment committee of the National Employment Commission. The answer is:

> Five reports have been made to the National Employment Commission.

The next question is:

> When were such reports made?

And the answer:

> August 6, August 25, October 9, 1936, January 6, 1937 (two).

Five reports on youth have been made so far to the $87,418 worth of commission. Now where is the legislation? What is the value of the reports? What is going to be done? Some of us who are privileged to have personal acquaintance or friendship with the members of the committee know that they—many of them—have not been idle, that they—many of them—have done their work to the best of their ability. These reports have been sent in to the minister, but what has been done? We listened with a great deal of interest to the speech from the throne, and in it the youth legislation forecast for this session. Where, oh where is that legislation? Wherein is the value of this youth committee of the National Employment Commission? Reports? Yes, but nothing is done. And there is so much to be done. No one can deny that much can be done. Why was something not done long ago, during these past months, these seventeen months all blank, bleached and barren of legislation to cure unemployment?

The one who is now the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking during the course of the campaign, on August 6, 1935, as reported in the Evening Citizen, laid out a program to cure unemployment. He said:

> The program to which a national commission would be asked, by a Liberal government, especially to direct its attention, with a view to ensuring co-operative effort, would include necessary projects already commenced or previously undertaken, such as: public works, buildings, and municipal improvements; the extension and improvement of highways, and the elimination of level crossings; the provision of airway facilities and ground services; large-scale schemes of afforestation, aimed, amongst other things, at preventing those conditions of drought and soil drifting which follow upon the absence or wholesale destruction of tree life.

Where is any of these things, seventeen months after? The one who made those remarks was given the responsibility of government by the people of Canada, and was given it upon the basis of statements such as these. What has been done? Surely afforestation is a crying need. It does not require $87,418 worth of commission to tell the minister that that should be done. He knows, he must know that at the rate of cutting in Canada as of 1928 and 1929 the available forests of this country will be done away with in forty years. These are careful estimates, not haphazard figures. Surely the minister can look to Sweden and see there the effect of what has been done there in the way of reforestation: that Sweden to-day, after eighty-six or eighty-seven years of serious and concentrated cutting, has available sixty per cent more timber than it had eighty-six years ago. The minister knows the value of reforestation. He has already admitted it in this chamber. Does he have to wait for this $87,418 worth of commission to report? Perhaps the commission did report. What has been done? Where is the legislation? Why the delay?

I spoke in this house about a fortnight ago in connection with housing. The resolution was introduced and duly debated; it was talked out, and it now rests, comfortably or otherwise, in the boneyard. Surely the project of housing is one which must have the full attention of the minister. It should not require $87,418 worth of commission to tell him what has been done in other countries, or to assist him in gathering together those eight outstanding gentlemen who, as Liberal premiers of provinces throughout Canada, were to be assembled in glorious concatenation, and out of which delicious and harmonious gathering there was to be born that which was to be delectable to the nation as a whole. Where is this Liberal prodigy? What is being done to-day? Where is all this cooperation? Nothing is done!

One may travel through the cities of the country and along our highways and find menacing grade crossings. What is being done towards the elimination of the grade crossings menace? Within my own riding there are grade crossings at Jones, Greenwood and Woodbine avenues; also in my political neighbour's riding at Victoria Park avenue, all a distinct menace to the city. This year the estimates contain an item of $19,000 for Toronto to provide, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) says, "revolving doors for the post office." What of those projects that could be carried forward to give employment and at the same time bring about an improvement in our cities? Let me refer to page 445 of Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member that he has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. MASSEY: I appreciate the tolerance of the house, Mr. Speaker, and will say in conclusion that I was about to quote the Minister of Labour, who in a debate in this house, said that it would be necessary to gain the full cooperation of the provinces before much can be done. That is the pronouncement, as far as this session goes, of the Minister of Labour with respect to the unemployment situation. We can do nothing until the provinces are ready to cooperate. What a hopeless state of affairs for the industrial worker to contemplate! How long before the British North America Act will be amended?

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): I wish to say a few words on the amendment, and in the first place to point out one or two things to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). A year ago, as I remember clearly, the Minister of Labour, discussing Canada's greatest problem, said that it was to be attacked on all fronts. This group has endeavoured from time to time to indicate the direction in which we must go and to point out to this house that there can be no solution of the problem that faces the people of Canada until such time as there is definite monetary reform. It seems strange that to-day the Minister of Labour has not all the facts before him, and I have wondered since this debate began whether he has taken the trouble to go through the soup kitchens of western Canada, whether he has been in the city of Winnipeg for instance, or Edmonton, or Calgary or Lethbridge, and seen the price we are paying in Canada for the so-called depression.

In the last few days we have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who has spoken in glowing terms of Canada's recovery; he has told us that those old happy days of prosperity are coming back. May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the prosperity has not been felt by the great mass of people whom we refer to as the unemployed. In the last six years we have spent more than one billion dollars for no other purpose than to give relief. In my opinion it has been a wanton waste, nothing more or less; and I say that neither this government nor the previous government has contributed to the solution of Canada's greatest national problem, unemployment. I say that because we have the physical evidence before us of human waste and moral degeneration. I wonder how many members of the Liberal party have ever gone into the mission relief camp in Ottawa, not more than half a mile from here, and seen the wanton waste of human life. Have they ever watched the eyes of men, human beings, and thought that after all, questions of dollars and cents should be submerged and human values be allowed to predominate and be uppermost in our consideration?

I suppose I can speak with greater confidence—I am sure I can speak with at least as much authority as any member of this house—on the question of unemployment. What happened in 1930 when the Conservative party was elected? At that time we were promised that unemployment would vanish if they were elected and so for five years we waited patiently. I do not believe there is any section of Canadian society that is more docile, more patient, than the unemployed, and I am going to use a word now which may shake the feelings of some here or impinge upon their dignity; I have wondered, as I have looked into the eyes of the people in the soup kitchens of Canada, whether revolution after all was such a great wrong. We are in the process of one now, and I recognize the necessity of a transitional period. But I say to the government that they have contributed nothing yet to the solution of Canada's greatest problem, not the question of unemployment but the demoralization, the lost hopes of a lost generation. That is what we have lost.

The Liberal government still fails to realize that it is not a question of work; it is a question of the Canadian people coming into the inheritance which is theirs, and rightly so. You cannot measure the price of the depression in terms of dollars and cents. On many occasions in this house members have risen on the government side and said, or at any rate implied, that the good old days would return, that prosperity would come again by the age-old route of the expansion of external trade. The Minister of Finance, last year as well as this year, told us so. In very jubilant tones he says that prosperity has returned to Canada. The question I ask is: Prosperity to whom? To the under dog, to the mass of the Canadian people, to those who are down and out, to the people who have left our schools and colleges and universities? No, not to them. Canada is losing more to-day than it ever lost—not in dollars and cents, but in talent, in culture, in all the things that go to make a nation.

Last year the Minister of Labour proposed to this house that a commission be set up, and it was set up, and registration of the unemployed was carried out. But to what effect? Did it tell us the number of unemployed in Canada? Did it tell us the number of people who no longer have the right to live?, Of course not. All it did was tell us the number who are on relief. But if we are to get to the bottom of this problem we must divide the unemployed into many categories. There are people who are married and have families dependent on them and who are compelled to go to relief officers, skilful men who have contributed and will in the future contribute to the development of Canada. There are the single unemployed. There are those who are coming out of colleges and universities, and, greatest number of all, those not registered; I refer to the farmers' sons who to-day are living on the farms but if conditions were normal would be in industry.

What was done in Great Britain? While there may be many shortcomings in their legislation to provide for the unemployed, this government could learn a great deal from Great Britain. What would happen in this country if there was a demand for skilled labour to-morrow in the same volume as in the years 1926-27-28? It could not be found. In 1925 or thereabouts they set up in Great Britain trade schools throughout the country and taught trades to the unemployed. Then when the building boom came along they were absorbed into industry. I am not saying that is a solution, but I am suggesting to the Minister of Labour that this could have been done by the Canadian government, who have spent a billion dollars and have received nothing for it.

The unemployed of this country are a liability. The Minister of Finance has told us of our increase in volume of trade; according to him our trade has increased by more than twenty per cent. I am not encouraged by that, because there is a story behind it, and I want to take a few minutes to tell the Canadian public what that story is. If the price of wheat and of agricultural products in Canada had increased because there was a natural demand for those things, we might well say that the Liberal government had accomplished at least something. But that is not the fact. The reason the people of Canada to-day are enjoying a higher price level for their products is the demand by other countries for the products of Canada. That demand has arisen not because the purchasing countries have increased their ability to consume goods, but because there is the fear of war; other nations are storing up goods, preparing for the inevitable day when war will come and every nation in the world will be affected by the conflagration. Any hon. member who has given ten minutes' serious study to these things must know that.

As I conceive the duty of government it is to have a long range view of these matters, and, recognizing that this is a transitional period, to see the things which they must do during the period of transition and of inflation —so unwelcome to the Minister of Finance, although he is a party to it—with a view to preparing and constructing for the future. I say that four years from to-day Canada will enter its greatest depression, and not only Canada but every nation in the world. I say that for this reason, that unemployment is not and never was a problem. Unemployment is a sign of progress. Every unemployed man in Canada has a right, just as surely as the man who holds shares in an industry, to share in the benefits that accrue from increased production and the application of science to production. The little group in this corner may receive the sympathy of some hon. members on the government benches because of the difficulties that confront us, but I know the day will come—not because it is desired by the Liberal government, but because it will be thrust upon them—when monetary reform will be seen to be the logical answer and the only answer to the problems which confront the Dominion of Canada.

I wish to commend the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl). He placed before this house facts, something which is not always done. He endeavoured to show the house that production was increasing, but the Minister of Finance also told the house this year and last that in spite of the increased volume of production unemployment is not decreasing as we might expect it should if we were living in the happy days of twenty years ago. I am convinced as a member of the Social Credit party of Canada that in the not far distant future the government side of the house will be lined with monetary reformists. We appeal to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister, when we know that certain things must be done in the way of social services, and the question arises, "Where is the money to come from"?

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 4, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, QUEBEC

Mr. POULIOT:

1. How many applications did the Civil Service Commission receive for the position of inspector of weights and measures which was advertised in the province of Quebec in 1936 (examination No. 25111)?
2. Were those who made application called upon to pass an examination?
3. If so, what was the number of eligible candidates?
4. Has an appointment been made?
5. If so, upon what date, who was appointed, and what is his address?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. 104.
2. Yes.
3. Fifty-eight took part in the examination. Ten were successful, and six names were placed on the eligible list.
4. Yes.
5. February 1, 1937—Mr. Lucien Brousseau, 213 de la Reine St., Quebec, P.Q.

[Mr. Poole.]

CENTRE BURLINGTON, N.S., WHARF

Mr. PURDY:

1. What was the total amount of expenditure in connection with the repairs to wharf at Centre Burlington, Hants county, during the year 1935?
2. Who was the foreman in charge of the work?
3. To whom, and what amounts were paid for the following: (a) wages; (b) materials; (c) supplies?
4. What was the original estimate of the cost of the work?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. $1,184.66.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE—INSURANCE RATES ON WHEAT

Mr. TUCKER:

1. What was the average amount of insurance payable in respect of a full cargo of wheat being shipped to Liverpool in a ship of 5,000 tons gross using the Hudson Bay route (such as referred to in (2) of the answer to question No. 4 on the orders of the day, February 22, 1937), in each of the years 1932 to 1936, inclusive?
2. What was the average amount of insurance payable on a similar ship and cargo using the St. Lawrence route carrying a full cargo of wheat to Liverpool during each of the years 1932 to 1936, inclusive?

Mr. HOWE: The insurance on the hull of a ship of 5,000 gross tons, valued at $250,000, capable of carrying about 300,000 bushels of wheat was about as follows, the English pound being taken as worth five dollars, Canadian, in all cases:

	Churchill Aug. 10th to Sept. 30th	Churchill Oct. 1st to Oct. 7th	Churchill Oct. 8th to Oct. 15th	Montreal May 15th to Nov. 15th
1932	$8,750.00	$9,625.00	$10,937.50	$1,250.00
1933	8,750.00	8,750.00	10,937.50	1,250.00
1934	7,500.00	7,500.00	9,375.00	1,250.00
1935	5,625.00	5,625.00	7,031.25	1,250.00
	Aug. 5th to Oct. 10th		Oct. 10th to 15th
1936	5,625.00		7,031.25	1,250.00

The above figures for Churchill are for ships not equipped with gyro compasses for each trip made into the Bay. For ships equipped with gyro compasses the comparison would be about as follows for each trip of the ship:

	Churchill Aug. 10th to Sept. 30th	Churchill Oct. 1st to Oct. 7th	Churchill Oct. 8th to Oct. 15th	Montreal May 15th to Nov. 15th
1932	$7,500.00	$8,250.00	$9,375.00	$1,250.00
1933	7,500.00	7,500.00	9,375.00	1,250.00
1934	6,250.00	6,250.00	7,812.00	1,250.00
1935	4,687.50	4,687.50	5,859.35	1,250.00
	Aug. 5th to Oct. 10th
1936	4,062.50	.....	.....	1,250.00

Ships are charged about $500 for the rental of a gyro compass for a trip to Churchill.

The insurance on hulls is fixed by a committee of the Imperial Shipping Committee, and the above figures cover all usual losses, including total loss of the ship.

The insurance on cargoes is free to competition among underwriters, and while the Department of Transport has no definite information about the charges, they are understood to have been about as follows:

	Churchill %	Montreal %
1932	1¼	¼
1933	1¼	¼
1934	1	¼
1935	1	¼
1936	¾	¼

With wheat valued at $1 per bushel, these rates would mean that the following insurance premiums were charged on grain:

	Churchill	Montreal
1932	$3,750 00	$750 00
1933	3,750 00	750 00
1934	3,000 00	750 00
1935	3,000 00	750 00
1936	2,200 00	750 00

The above rates mean that the insurance on the hull of a vessel out of Churchill in 1936 amounted to about 1.87 cents per bushel, and out of Montreal to about .42 cents per bushel. The insurance on the cargo out of Churchill in 1936 amounted to ¾ of 1 cent, and out of Montreal to about ¼ of 1 cent per bushel.
