HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, August 29, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER RESPECTING CALLING OF HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the house that by virtue of a resolution passed by the house on Thursday, July 14, 1966, Votes and Proceedings page 782, dealing with the adjournment of the house, I caused to be published in an extra edition of the Canada Gazette dated August 22, 1966 a notice calling the house to meet this day, which is as follows:

[Translation]

After consultation with the Government, I am satisfied that the public interest requires that the House of Commons, which was adjourned on Thursday, July 14, 1966, until Wednesday, October 5, 1966, should meet at an earlier time. In pursuance to the order of the House of Commons passed Thursday, July 14, 1966, I hereby give notice that the House of Commons shall meet on Monday, August 29, 1966, at 2.30 o'clock p.m., and transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa this 22nd day of August, 1966.

Lucien Lamoureux,
Speaker,
House of Commons,
Canada.

[English]

In addition, on the same date I sent a telegram to each member of the house containing the substance of the notice.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I also have the honour to inform the house that during the adjournment of the house I received communications advising that vacancies have occurred in the representation:

Of Mr. Chesley William Carter, member for the electoral district of Burin-Burgeo, by reason of being summoned to the Senate.

Of Mr. Charles Ronald McKay Granger, member for the electoral district of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, by resignation.

I have accordingly issued my warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRÉGOIRE—REQUEST FOR CHANGE OF SEAT IN CHAMBER

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which may interest hon. members, that is my decision to sit as an independent, and to ask you to designate another seat for me in the house. This does not mean that I am no longer an ardent Créditiste; far from it. Whenever the discussion will turn to social credit, I will always be ready to co-operate with my former leader and colleagues for whom I still have the highest regard.

The main reason for the change, Mr. Speaker, is that I have decided to favour the independence of Quebec. My choice has nothing to do with the contacts I may have had with English speaking citizens I may have met in Ottawa. On the contrary, I think that during the five years I have been sitting in this house, I have made friends among all groups of members, an honour I consider all mine. Consequently, it is not a question of individuals but one of system and constitution.

To reassure everyone, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I will work toward independence by democratic means as long as we live in the confederation as it now exists.

I will urge my fellow-citizens of Quebec to live as good and honest Canadian citizens, respectful of Canadian laws as long as we have a Canadian confederation. I will disapprove acts of violence and terrorism, but I will devote from now on all my energy to convince democratically Quebec citizens that their best interest is to get out of confederation as it now exists.

Mr. Speaker, I have not taken without due reflection my decision to fight for the independence of Quebec. When I arrived in Ottawa in 1962, I had the conviction that Canada was a country where good understanding would prevail if French Canadians could make themselves understood and if everyone would understand and co-operate.

Gradually and almost against my will, I became more and more convinced, after coming into contact with the facts, that the future of Quebec and of French Canadians resided in Quebec independence.

I conclude by saying, Mr. Speaker, that it is the first time that this is said in the house: Quebec will have its independence, and soon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the request of the hon. member for Lapointe, he can, if he wants, take seat No. 53 or No. 54 as he wishes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING RAILWAY MATTERS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house would expect a statement from the government on the reasons which led us to request you to alter the order adopted by the house on July 14, which you have just read. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the government felt obliged to ask Your Honour one week ago today to alter this order. My regret is, of course, much greater because of the grave national problem which brought us here; the national railway strike.

A general railway strike is a national emergency and if prolonged, as I hope it will not be, could become a national disaster. That, Mr. Speaker, is not exaggeration or dramatization; it is merely a statement of fact, for Canada's economy is dependent on railway transportation.

There are those, Mr. Speaker, who say that parliament should have been called before this strike was called.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: To have recalled parliament before the decision to strike was made would have been taken, of course, as a proclamation by the government that there was no hope of any kind of a settlement between the parties, and it would have represented an interference in an unprecedented way with the collective bargaining process laid down by our law.

Once the strike date was set the government lost no time in calling parliament. We acted on the same day. We knew, of course, that in doing this we were making further bargaining and mediation more difficult, but we knew also that there were only four days for mediation before the date that was set for the strike.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

There are also those, Mr. Speaker, who say we should have had parliament meet on Thursday of last week so we could ask parliament to prevent the strike by legislation. Naturally that course was considered. It has been followed in the past. Apart from the fact that the time was so short between the calling of the strike and the date for the strike, to attempt to legislate last week in the circumstances of that week, to attempt to legislate before Friday noon in our view was not likely to have been an effective course for achieving the objective in mind.

We should not forget and I am sure we do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that under our laws the union leaders have an undoubted right to call a strike and the employees have an undoubted right to go on strike. They are acting, in doing so within the law, as I am confident they will continue to act. We should not forget and we do not forget that the right to strike is a cherished and integral part of our system of free collective bargaining, and neither government nor parliament should abridge, or would want to abridge, that right without the strongest reasons of national interest and public welfare, and not until every effort of persuasion and mediation has failed. This is why we felt that a final attempt at mediation even after a strike date had been set, under the auspices of the Minister of Labour, was not merely justified but was necessary in the public interest. That final mediation did not, unfortunately, avert the strike; it is continuing as we sit in this chamber.

Two alternatives faced the government, as they faced the country. We as a government could have abided by the ordinary law and allowed the strike to continue until the parties finally came to an agreement on their own with all the assistance the government could give them. Or parliament could be asked to intervene on the ground that a promulgation of the strike would do such great harm to the public interest, including the interest of the parties to the dispute, as to constitute a national emergency which justified a departure from ordinary practice and law.

We had no difficulty in deciding that it was our duty as a government to follow the latter course as now being necessary to restore an essential public service with the least possible delay and to get the railways moving again with the least possible interference with the process of free collective bargaining. For this purpose we hope that by agreement immediate consideration can be given to a bill which is now ready and which, it is hoped and expected, will bring the strike to an end on terms which will be just and fair to all concerned and which will protect the national interest.

We have also, Mr. Speaker, a second bill ready dealing with railway matters. This bill has a relationship to certain of the problems bearing on the dispute which brought about this strike, as well as earlier ones, and if it becomes law we believe it will facilitate the success of the negotiations to which reference is made in the first bill.

As members of parliament, Mr. Speaker, we have serious responsibilities to our country as we consider the issues before us. As members of the government we have special responsibilities and as Prime Minister I, of course, have the heaviest responsibility of all. I know all hon. members of the house will discharge their responsibilities at this time in the spirit of loyalty and service to our country which brought us here.

At this time I ask for the co-operation of all hon. members in making it possible for the government to place its proposals before the house for consideration without delay. I believe the strike emergency justifies this request, just as I believe the importance of the legislation deserves thorough and searching debate.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the house will permit me to put again on the record of Hansard words that were used by Hon. George Drew, then leader of the opposition, in 1950, when the House of Commons was facing a similar emergency and was asked by the government of that day to deal with that emergency. Mr. Drew said then:

> What the people of Canada want us to do is get the railways working as quickly as possible. I believe that is the spirit of every member of this house. Collectively those who sit here represent all the people of Canada. It makes no difference what party we support in our own community; we represent all the people. Therefore—

—he added—

> —we here have the great and proud and heavy responsibility of speaking for all Canadians. The well-being and security of the whole Canadian community is our supreme responsibility. When the well-being of the people of Canada is threatened in this or any other way, parliament, and the government, which is its executive branch, must take those steps which will preserve the national economy and the security of the home life of all our people.

It is in the spirit of those words, Mr. Speaker, that I ask for the co-operation of all members of parliament at this time in facilitating and expediting the procedures so we will be able to discuss the legislation before us with a minimum of delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Hon. George Drew, when he reads the words of the Prime Minister, will realize that those sitting opposite by whom he was condemned for so long, use his words today as the cornerstone of their argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recall very well that debate in 1950. The attitude then taken by the Conservative party was that in so far as compulsory arbitration was concerned the party was against it, and members of this party voted accordingly when a vote took place on the motion made by the then prime minister.

I am rather surprised at the general attitude of the Prime Minister today. After the bumbling of his government for weeks I expected that instead of making a provocative speech, an alibi speech, he would have made an appeal not only to parliament but to Canadians as a whole. Instead of that he chose the course of a partisan speech.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; it is shameful that this should be so, with the Prime Minister trying to explain the dilatory uncertainty of a government lasting for weeks on end. That is what they are attempting to do. From the end of July on, everybody except the government knew there was going to be a strike. Everyone in this country knew. It was made perfectly clear on July 11 and 12, after the initial report, that the terms of the report of Mr. Justice Munroe would not be accepted. It is understandable. In his speech today the Prime Minister forgot to deal with the Pearson formula, the 30 per cent basis of settlement which added to the problem of inflation, with the approval of the government, contributed to by its diplomatic forcefulness in bringing about a settlement. That is the reason why we find ourselves faced with this situation. He rushed in; he established the reputation of being the great conciliator, the conciliator who was able to offer everything in order to settle two situations. He made his policy at this time a basis for all requests by labour in all parts of Canada.

We meet in an atmosphere of gravity and crisis. The Prime Minister tried to explain why he and his government waited so long. They knew on August 21, after he returned from seeing the sunset in New Brunswick. He knew that night that the strike was going to be called for the following Friday. Where were the strike committee? They were on strike; none of them were here.

An hon. Member: Gone fishing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Gone with the wind, unable to take action.

Mr. Monteith: Not important to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He tried to explain why they waited until the strike got under way. If they have a formula that is fair and equitable, as he now says, did they not have it then? Why wait until the economy of Canada faces the serious paralysis of which the Prime Minister speaks? They just played around. There used to be a British king known as Ethelred the Unready. Now we have a Prime Minister and a government which richly earn that description.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The excuse is that the government did not know there was going to be a strike. You would not expect the Minister of National Defence to know; he was so busy unifying. You would not expect any viewpoint by him. Surely there must have been some others in the cabinet sufficiently integrated with events to realize what every Liberal newspaper in Canada realized, that a strike was coming and action should be taken.

Why did they wait? Where were the members of that strike committee? I suppose they were looking around, Mr. Speaker, to find what planes they might consider under the new purchase plan whereby tens of millions of dollars of Canadian money is to be wasted on aircraft so that ministers can get around better.

Mr. Monteith: So true.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: In his opening remarks the Prime Minister made it clear that while he asked for co-operation he intended to defend what he and his government know is a course which is indefensible. The responsibility rests on the Pearson government and no one else. They expected that if they sat around long enough the problem would settle itself. Now the Prime Minister tries to explain that indolence and uncertainty, an attitude not in keeping with the tremendous gravity of the problem.

The Prime Minister says we have another piece of legislation besides the bill to deal with the strike per se. We should like to see that other bill. The Prime Minister asks for co-operation. I offer him the most complete co-operation in order to bring this legislation before the house. There has never been any doubt about that. We are not standing upon any technicality. If there are any members of the house who want to prevent discussion taking place by denying unanimity, we will be able to get around it very easily by someone moving the adjournment of the house in order to discuss this matter of national importance. In that way we will not be wasting two days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do hope there is no one in the house—and apparently I am well justified in that expectation—who will do other than agree to give the government the right to proceed at once. We intend to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We intend to go further than that. I am so impressed with the Prime Minister's words, with which I agree, regarding the gravity of the situation that I do not think ordinary hours of sitting are sufficient.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to note the Minister of Labour approves of that suggestion, because he has to share the official responsibility for the failure of this government in recent days. I do not want to single him out because that would be an unjust differentiation. We are prepared to sit longer hours because we want to do everything we can to assist.

We are now asking for a little co-operation on the part of the government. In view of the fact that everything will be done by consent, let us see the bill which the government has in mind in order to implement in part or in whole the MacPherson and Freedman commission reports. There is no reason why this should be held up if there is agreement among hon. members that we see this bill, because this second bill apparently involves a sudden decision. When the Minister of Labour spoke on television he said that in the last two days something had come up of a most unusual nature—consideration of the MacPherson commission report—which changed government thinking. We want to see that second bill, and there is no reason why the government should not make it available at once. Naturally everyone wants to know its contents.

When an order is made in this house requiring men to go back to work I believe that those Canadians involved will do so. In spite of a few who argue to the contrary, labour has been law abiding in this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Prime Minister to let the house see this document that was found in an embryonic stage two days after the strike was called and which represents something, as it turned out, that had not been a previous consideration. We want to know the basis of this legislation. The government by resolution introduced a measure in this regard I believe in March of 1964. It was proceeded with again in September, but died a natural death. We want to see what the government has evolved and the changes it has in mind so we may know who is going to pay what. Is the principle that there shall be non-discrimination in freight rates in every part of Canada to be preserved? We want to know the answer to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are not making a request that is unfair. After all, we are meeting because of an emergency. Rules are going to be put aside, as they should be. There are two bills; let us see them. I made that request on Friday and have been waiting ever since for an answer. Mr. Speaker, we shall co-operate in spite of the fact that we face a government which cannot govern; a government that is helpless in confusion; a government whose inaction which has culminated in this case not only in a crisis for Canada but a crisis of incompetence in the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of the New Democratic Party we cannot deal with the railway strike in isolation. This strike is the culmination of a long process of indecision and procrastination on the part of the government, and if parliament is going to deal with the strike situation at this time it is our contention that it must deal also with the basic causes which have produced the strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: For two years the members of this party have pointed out to the government that unless it grappled effectively with the rising cost of living and the demands for wage increases, labour disputes and strikes would inevitably follow. These strikes have taken place and we are now faced with the largest to date. The fact is that the government has sat idly by for ten months during which there has been no effective collective bargaining between the railways and the railway employees.

Throughout this time the railway companies have stalled. To date they have not offered one red cent to their employees. No mediator was appointed until the strike had been announced and the Prime Minister then asked the Minister of Labour to bring the parties together. No action has been taken on the implementation of the Freedman report, which is a vital factor in providing some measure of job security for the railway employees; and throughout the more than three years that this government has been in office there has been no clear statement of a transportation policy. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that the government could not call parliament to introduce legislation to prevent a strike, but any time in the last three years the government could have done something about the recommendations of the MacPherson report. It could have provided legislation which would have enabled the railway companies to know their financial position and put them in a position where they could have made some definite financial offer in collective bargaining negotiations with their employees.

We contend that the railway strike is merely the top of the iceberg, and that underneath there are great disruptive forces at work within our society. We do not think the government can use the crisis psychology of a strike to force through legislation which will penalize one section of our population. We recognize that parliament must deal responsibly with the strike and with the effect it will have upon the Canadian economy. We contend at the same time that parliament must now, while we are sitting, grapple with the total problem and do something about the causes which have produced this strike and are likely to produce other strikes. If the government is going to introduce legislation to restrict wages and to determine wage rates for a certain group of employees in this country, we want to know what it proposes to do about restricting consumer prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: What does it propose to do about restraining undue profiteering? Are dividends and profits to continue to spiral while wages are to be frozen at some level determined either by parliament or some tribunal appointed by the government? We are prepared to facilitate an early discussion of the government's legislation, but on the distinct understanding that we will also discuss the much wider problem of the economic situation in Canada which has produced this railway strike right across our nation.

We will expect, and I think we have a right to expect and the Canadian people have a right to expect, some statement from the Prime Minister in the course of the next few days with respect to what the government's policy is regarding the steadily mounting cost of living. We think we are entitled to a statement from the Minister of Finance with reference to fiscal policy and the changes in his budget which are necessary in view of what has happened since he introduced his last budget. If the Minister of Finance is convinced that there are inflationary pressures and that there must be some restraint in the economy in order to prevent an overheating, this parliament has a right to see that the restraint does not fall solely upon one section of the Canadian people; this parliament has a right to demand a fiscal policy that will make for a fair and proper distribution of income in this country.

We have the right to insist that the Minister of Labour introduce legislation, while we are here in the next few days, to implement the recommendations of the Freedman report in order that these men who are on strike and who in the last eight years have been adversely affected by technological change will be assured that there will be some consultation and some amelioration of the condition of those replaced as a result of automation. We have a right to expect from the Minister of Transport a clear statement of a sane transportation policy. When I say a "sane" transportation policy, I do not mean an abandonment of responsibility by the government; nor do I mean turning the Canadian people, and particularly the Canadian shippers, over to the tender mercies of the railway companies.

I think volume 3 of the MacPherson report was brought down in July 1962. The government has had ample time in which to outline a policy that would make it possible for the railways in this country to operate efficiently and at the same time pay their employees wages that are commensurate with the wages paid in other sections of our industry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to be as co-operative as possible, but we make two clear conditions. One is that we shall insist upon adequate time to study and examine both pieces of legislation which the Prime Minister has indicated will be brought down. We have no intention of allowing the psychology of crisis that is being built up to stampede or bully us into agreeing to legislation which will have a detrimental effect upon the Canadian people and will operate adversely to the interests of the railwaymen and their families across Canada.

Our second condition is that in addition to the legislation which the Prime Minister has announced, and concurrent with it, we want some statement from the government with respect to the measures they will bring down to deal with the underlying causes that have produced this unfortunate situation. Unless the government does this, any legislation they can introduce now will not solve the problem, will not necessarily end this strike, and will certainly not prevent other strikes in other segments of the economy. The time has come for the government to end government by diplomacy and evasion. The time has come for government by leadership and courageous action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The time has come for the government to deal with the root causes instead of doing what they are asking us to do now, merely put on a patch which will blow off in the course of the next few months so that parliament will be facing another crisis in the matter of the next few weeks or months.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that in our opinion this situation is only part of a much larger economic problem, and unless parliament is prepared to grapple with that problem we will not have solved anything; we will only have postponed the evil day.

• (3:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we are called for an emergency session at Ottawa to consider a most serious situation, paralysing to the Canadian general economy.

Indeed railwaymen are on strike, national railways have gone out of operation, and from all sides we hear people say that the government should have summoned parliament earlier, that the government does not know how to cope with its responsibilities etc. The government was right in letting employers and employees, through their own means of negotiation, seek an understanding which would benefit both the railwaymen and the Canadian economy as a whole. Had the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) been at the head of the government, I dare him to say he would have done better under the circumstances. He himself would have let employers and workers, through their bargaining agents, try in every way to find a solution, to come to an agreement. But it is easy to lay the blame on others.

Mr. Speaker, following negotiations, a conciliation board was appointed and failed as well. This railway employee issue is not a separate one; it is an all-embracing problem. All sectors of the economy are affected, and are in the same situation. The conflict between the railway employees and the national railways did not start today, or even two months ago. In fact, back in 1950, under the St. Laurent administration, certain problems had already arisen. In 1960, under the Diefenbaker government, difficulties also occurred. Both in 1950 and in 1960, why did not those who were at the head of the nation live up to their responsibilities in anticipation of possible events in 1960 or 1966?

Mr. Speaker, we are presently summoned to examine this very alarming situation and the government requires members to make a decision that will end this strike which ultimately will be detrimental to the strikers themselves.

They are the ones who are losing wages, and the farmers and all the social classes in Canada are losing through such a strike.

But, Mr. Speaker, under the pretext that the government must fight inflation, parliament is recalled and two bills will be submitted to the members later on. We have no idea of what is in them. Do they deal with compulsory arbitration or with a definite policy to get the railways to deal adequately with their employees? Do they contain appropriate and reasonable solutions to help the Canadian workers in general? We do not know. But I know one thing, Mr. Speaker, namely that the railway workers and the textile workers are not the only ones on strike in Canada; we have also had farmer's strikes against some provincial governments. As a matter of fact, we have had all kinds of strikes and the most important one so far in Canada, which happened many times, is that of the financiers when they impose credit restrictions and force the Canadian people to live in misery. In the case of those strikes, the government never recalled parliament so that steps could be taken to put finance at the service of the Canadian people, human beings which include the railway workers, industrial workers, miners, settlers, farmers of all classes of society.

Mr. Speaker, the government does not call us back to deal with those strikes, but we are called back to discuss the impossibility of the railways to grant a 30 per cent wage increase. We are now complaining about inflation and its dangers but, Mr. Speaker, the dangers of inflation are not recent; they existed many years ago when, for instance, the government is deprived each year—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is well aware of it—of $1.25 billion in interest only on the national debt. That is inflation, Mr. Speaker. The 11 per cent tax on building materials, that is inflation, Mr. Speaker, and the government is responsible for that.

What is the government doing about inflation? Absolutely nothing. On the other hand, the workers are asked to accept low wages which barely enable them to make ends meet, wages which barely enable them to live decently in a country like ours.

We know that the cost of living is exorbitant, everyone knows that we must do something, but why always do it at the expense of the working classes? That does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that I support the strike which is now on in Canada. No, because I have the deep personal conviction that in the whole world, strikes have never settled labour problems. Usually, and generally, the end of one strike marks the beginning of another. And those who pay for the strike are not the labour leaders who give the strike order, but those who work, the workers themselves. On this point, I call to witness the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) who knows all about this strike. When has a labour problem been settled by a strike? Never.

I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak at any length on this question at this time, because I insist that the government bring down its bills at the earliest possible moment, and let us know what is being proposed to restore order, and not spread disorder nor impose economic or government dictatorship on the workers.

No. But let the government bring down its bills so that we made consider them. That is why we have been called. It is clear that at the same time we will be touching upon the question of inflation while we are discussing these bills, because the bills are directly related to inflation.

But, Mr. Speaker, to enable the government to bring down its bills and to enable us to discuss them according to the facts, then we will be in a position to discuss at greater length the details, the points and the suggestions of the present government.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I say that we will let the government introduce its legislation at the earliest possible moment. This does not mean that we will be giving a blanket approval to the government proposition; not at all. It means, however, that we are anxious to bring an end to this railroad strike, to achieve a settlement because at the present time neither the executives of the Canadian National or of the Canadian Pacific, nor the union leaders are footing the bill for this strike. The strikers are the railroad workers themselves, and the farmers who are left with produce that cannot now be sold for lack of transportation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we hope this strike will come to an end at the earliest possible moment and that is why we are anxious for the government to bring down its legislation so that we may consider it and arrive at beneficial results for the economy of the country as a whole.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we have been called to deal with a national emergency, an emergency that has arisen in the form of a national strike but behind which is a far greater emergency affecting the whole economy and the entire operation of our railroads and transportation system. However, it would be a futile waste of time to delay in dealing with the first crisis. Every day that the trains do not run adds to the burden on the economy and to the hardship caused to innumerable innocent people whose livelihood is dependent upon reliable transportation. The trains must get back into operation and parliament should hear immediately what steps the government proposes to take to solve the immediate crisis and the long-range problems behind it.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Unfortunately, there are third parties who are suffering as a result of this strike. There are the travellers, the fruit growers, the farmers, business people, students and citizens generally of the two island provinces and the entire nation. This has forced the reconvening of parliament. Most important of all is the hardship this strike is inflicting upon those people with fixed incomes who have no way of fighting for their own needs.

In my opinion no one person or group can be held solely responsible for the state of labour unrest in Canada. The demand for more material benefits and the accompanying decrease in responsibility for one's fellow man have been fed by the advertising media which foster dissatisfaction as a spur to sales, by labour leaders who know of no other way to hold their jobs than to offer their men more wages and fringe benefits, by management which has boasted of the wonders of automation in raising productivity, and by a government which has promoted the theme that all the welfare needs of the people should be met by state schemes.

In such a situation it is not surprising that neither labour nor management are prepared to take realistic action but turn to the government to make the difficult decision for them. Such a decision faced the government last spring during the Quebec longshoremen's strike and the threatened strike of seaway workers. The government muffed it and we are meeting in emergency session to pay the price. Compulsory arbitration may be unpalatable to the unions but when their own representative on a conciliation tribunal agrees that there can be no settlement short of government intervention, what other solution remains? Regardless of what has happened in the past and whatever the weaknesses in government action have been, the government must take a strong line now and call upon responsible people in the country to support it. The call has come to us to deal with legislation and we want to see that legislation. We give our assurance of co-operation in dealing with it because it is the national interest that must be considered. If parliament had been called prior to the beginning of the strike, in our opinion we would have been discriminating against the railway unions and their workers. In addition, this action would have been contrary to the basic right of collective bargaining and the the right to strike. This is of particular significance in view of the fact the union leaders have acted strictly according to the rule of law up to this point. They are to be commended for that. The tragedy of the situation has been the failure of the government to take strong action prior to this crisis. It is five years now since the MacPherson report was tabled in this house. In his first Throne Speech more than three years ago, the Prime Minister promised that railway legislation would be brought forward. The Throne Speech in each subsequent session has contained the promise that railway legislation would be implemented. There has been no action.

The railway employees do have a legitimate complaint. They have gone now for eight months without an agreement with railway management. It is my impression that even more important than wage increases are the complaints of railway workers with regard to working conditions, conditions which have been neglected for years. In addition, the cost of living continually goes up and up. However, at this time the responsibility of parliament is to get the trains rolling again, to outline the basic terms on which further negotiations may be based, and to provide a time limit for those negotiations, after which arbitration must take effect.

We have a second responsibility, and that is not only to deal with the railway legislation but to deal with the underlying causes of the strike, namely, the cost of living which is continually going up and inflation which depreciates the purchasing value of the dollar. Therefore we expectantly wait to see the first phase of the legislation that will be brought forth. The second piece of legislation to which the Prime Minister referred is something which I believe will need weeks of study and will necessitate the bringing together of all aspects of the transport industry, labour and management in order that a solution can be worked out. Some positive steps will also need to be taken by the government with relation to financial policy to solve the problem of inflation and the rising cost of living.

We remind ourselves, Mr. Speaker, that we are here to deal with the strike and we must deal with it effectively. We trust the government will now be able to bring forth this legislation and let us get on with it. I believe that the eyes of the nation are upon us. So far as our party is concerned, we pledge ourselves to get on with the legislation.

Mr. Pearson: I know, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules I have no right to speak again. However, there have been one or two procedural points raised and if the house so desires I could deal with them at this time. It might shorten the debate later.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said it would be helpful—I think he used stronger words than that—if members of the house could have the railway bill available to them before the strike legislation is debated.

This seems to be a reasonable request. The right hon. gentleman may recall that I have indicated to him that if the house could forgo debate on the resolution stage of that particular bill, which debate we know is often redundant, pass the resolution and begin debate on that bill on second reading, then perhaps this afternoon we could get first reading of the strike legislation and the passing of the resolution and first reading of the railway legislation. Then we could go on with second reading of the strike legislation and debate it or, if the members felt it desirable to have a look at this legislation for an hour or two, that could be arranged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the Prime Minister goes on, and in order to get at the heart of this matter which is the strike situation, perhaps the Prime Minister would agree that it would be beneficial if we had available to us what I might call the railway bill. There is no reason why we should start in part way and accept the resolution without debate. If the house were in agreement we could have a copy of the bill given to us. We are trying to co-operate. There is no reason why these two bills should not be made available. Otherwise the position is going to be that the government will simply introduce the resolution and then there will be no debate on it. We will not have that information we usually have on these matters. We will be passing something about which we do not know anything.

We might be denied a speech by the Minister of Transport and that might put us into a transport of woe. On the other hand, it might not. What possible reason is there for not allowing us to see this bill, even without following the usual formality? Let us have it and then go on with the strike bill.

Mr. Pearson: There is only one difficulty in following that course, and if that difficulty can be overcome I have no objection whatever to making the railway bill available at once. It is quite contrary to the rules to make a bill available to the house before it has been introduced and given first reading. If the house unanimously wished to change this regulation to make it possible, then that could be done. I suggest that there would be very little delay indeed if the house gave first reading to the strike bill, moved forward the resolution relating to the second bill and then began the debate on the second reading, the resolution stage and first reading being completed, so that both bills would then be before the house. The second bill would be before the house before the first bill had been considered, which seems to me a reasonable proposition.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I again make a suggestion to the Prime Minister in the form of a question? Would the Prime Minister consider the advisability of having the legislation relating to the strike given first reading, the Prime Minister or whoever introduces the bill making his statement on second reading, then adjourning the debate to give members an opportunity to examine both the legislation and the statement of the minister and all its implications, and then moving to the general railway legislation on which we would be prepared to forego the resolution stage? However, if that is not generally acceptable could we have a statement from the minister, either on the resolution stage or on second reading, and then adjourn the house to give members an opportunity to examine the legislation and the statement of the minister? It is important that we have the opportunity to study it. It seems to me that the legislation will be long and complicated, and it would be useful to have the minister's statement on the record before we begin to discuss the legislation itself.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we would be very glad indeed to follow that procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with respect, all that we would have before us would be the Prime Minister's exculpatory statement without any opportunity of replying thereto. Exculpatory statements are something that we have had enough of in the last few weeks. We now want facts and the opportunity to debate them, not a postponement. We do not have to look over this long and complicated document, as it has been described by the leader of the N.D.P. If it is a long and complicated document it would be a most unusual thing for him to know that unless he has had a preview.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion today about the introduction of one bill and the resolution relating to a second bill. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to whether or not the whole question of the railway crisis and the important, special legislation he is going to introduce are to be given priority over other business of the house? I am partial to the proposition that discussion should be strictly confined to the emergency legislation.

These matters involve a great number of points which will require consideration and co-operation. In my opinion this can be better achieved if the Prime Minister will give an indication to the house of what he intends to do during the next few days in relation to the legislation he is introducing. The Prime Minister really has not said whether this legislation is to be considered separately from our regular business or whether we are now resuming the adjourned session. While I realize that orders of the day set out the pattern, I think this question should be discussed and considered before arrangements are made for the future.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to suggest two things. One is that the second bill be circulated so that members will see it before the discussion on the first bill begins. Then the discussion on the first bill, which I call the strike bill, can begin and continue until the bill is decided upon. I think that for that purpose we should waive all the ordinary business of the house because, I quite agree, of its emergency character.

When the bill has been decided upon we can then go back and discuss the railway bill which will have been before members while the first bill is being considered. If that bill commends itself to the house, receives second reading and goes to a committee, I would agree entirely with what the leader of the New Democratic Party said, namely, that we should then begin a thorough and comprehensive discussion of inflation, inflationary dangers and rising costs, matters which are worrying us all.

I also agree with him that wages are only one element, and not necessarily the most important element, in these inflationary pressures. We should go on to discuss that subject. We on this side will make this provision, which I hope will be agreeable to the other house leaders, so that there can be a discussion immediately after the railway legislation has been considered.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, it would seem that there is a general consensus of agreement that both bills should be brought before the house prior to first reading. After all, they are related to each other, so I hope there will be agreement to this course. We could then proceed with our discussion on the first bill. We agree with the suggestion that the Leader of the Official Opposition has made.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand there is general agreement in the house as to the circulation or distribution of what has been called the railway bill even before the introduction of this bill in the house. Is that agreed?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, so there will be no confusion later, I sought to ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. Would he agree that the resolution stage grants permission to the government to present a bill to the house for its consideration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: But we are waiving rights and rules now.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I think what is in order, is to waive debate on the resolution stage so that the government will have permission to introduce and give first reading to both bills. As I understand it, that is the point.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement with the proposition now put forth by the Minister of Public Works?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I think the question at this time is to secure the unanimous consent of the house to bring the two bills before the house. If this was the sole question, I, for one, would agree but the fact is that the standing orders carry new provisions that the house leaders may also agree on setting a time limit on the discussion. If we agree to eliminate the resolution stage, it means that less time will be available to consider this legislation. And if, later, the house leaders unanimously agree to set a one- or two-day limit on each stage of these two bills, it may mean that we, the independents, may be entirely deprived of the opportunity to express our views on either one of these two bills.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, I feel that before the unanimous consent of the house can be given, we, or at least I, should like to know whether it is the intention of the government house leader to proceed in accordance with the new standing orders in such a way as to set a limit on each stage of consideration of the two bills and I should also like to know whether we, the independents, will have the opportunity to speak on these bills which we consider important and on which we would like to have an opportunity to express our views.

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, a question seems to have been directed to me. There have been no suggestions made that the opportunity of a member to debate these measures should in any way be abridged or restricted. It was the procedural matter of getting the bills before the house which was under discussion. There was nothing done by the house leaders that would limit the right of a member to debate either bill.

• (3:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) to make one point clear. He has told us that there has been no consultation with a view to limiting debate at each of the stages. I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works if he will give the undertaking that discussion will not be limited at any of the stages and that we will have the opportunity to speak on these bills.

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: That is a matter for the house, Mr. Speaker. The procedure is there in the rules. I cannot envisage a situation where hon. members would take such a lengthy time in debating either bill that those rules would have to be used. But I would not think of giving any such guarantee on any bill in advance. With debate just started, I cannot see any possibility of this provision being used.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The question for the Chair now is whether we should terminate consideration of the item before the house, which is motions. If there are no further motions, then this matter could be raised under introduction of bills. I would think it is the will of the house that we conclude the item of motions and then proceed to the following item, introduction of bills. Perhaps a motion might be made to that effect.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TABLING OF REPORT OF INQUIRY RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I should like to bring up under motions, if I may.

I am now tabling copies in French and in English of Mr. Justice Rand's report concerning Mr. Justice Landreville. Before doing so I wish to give notice that it is my intention to make a motion in accordance with the rules of the house at the first opportunity for an address to His Excellency praying that the judge be removed from office on the grounds set forth in the report. It is also the intention of the government to refer the motion to a committee of parliament so that the fullest inquiry can be made by parliament itself and so that the judge can be given an opportunity to appear and speak on his own behalf.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave to table the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that the Prime Minister shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Mr. Starr: Later this day.

Mr. Speaker: By consent, later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, we should have some clear understanding whether or not it is to be later this day. We want every opportunity to discuss and examine this bill before we debate it. So far as this party is concerned we would be prepared to proceed with second reading to the extent of having the minister introducing the bill make a full and clear statement. We think, however, that the debate should certainly be adjourned then in order to allow hon. members an opportunity to digest it. Otherwise we shall ask that the debate on the bill be left over until tomorrow.

Mr. McIlraith: Could I ask a question of the hon. member by way of clarification. Would his remarks apply equally if the house were to proceed with the second reading stage to the point of the presentation of the bill by the government followed by the reply by the Leader of the Opposition before the adjournment?

Mr. Douglas: If the official opposition are going to reply I think the other parties must have the same right at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You are holding it up.

Mr. Douglas: It seems to me that before we have the debate on this legislation we should have an opportunity to study it and examine it in detail. If the feeling is that the house does not want to adjourn after the minister has introduced the bill and made his statement, I should think it would be better to leave the debate until tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Why wait?

Mr. Speaker: The question before the Chair is whether, by unanimous consent, the said bill is to be read a second time later this day.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that in conformity with the order of the house it is now in order for me to ask leave to move the first reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

An hon. Member: Four years too late.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling of great unease as to what we are now asked to do by the suggestion of the Minister of Transport. As I understand it, we all want to see the bill and the government is prepared to facilitate that by having it circulated. I suggest that consent should be confined to having the bill circulated for the information of hon. members. I say this because I have very grave reservations that we cannot, without violating the constitution, proceed with the bill as has been suggested by the minister because under the constitution there is a provision to the effect that there must be a resolution before we can proceed with a bill of this sort.

If we were just waiving a rule of the house, that would be different but we would be disregarding a constitutional provision. Therefore I think it would be much simpler, with less danger of creating such a far reaching precedent, if we simply consented to circulating the bill so that we can see it, to which the leaders of all parties have consented.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I fear that the house is going to put itself, or the government, into a very awkward position by following the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops. A resolution, as he well knows, asks the house to decide whether it is expedient to introduce a bill. It has always been the practice that the expediency is based exclusively on the financial conditions of the bill. Unless there were some understanding that we were not to debate the bill on the resolution stage but on second reading, matters would be complicated still further.

I think the suggestion I have made meets the wishes of all hon. members. It is that we formally accept the resolution. I have a very lengthy description of the bill which I do not think I would be permitted to read at the first reading stage but which I had intended to use in committee on the resolution if the committee stage had been held. I would be quite happy, without reading it, to have it circulated with the bill to all hon. members.

The bill itself, I might say, is 68 pages long. It contains nearly 100 clauses, and it is very difficult to get through quickly without a guide of some sort. My suggestion is that we be permitted to deal with the resolution stage and get first reading of the bill. It seems to me that this would in no way abridge any opportunities for debate. Since it seems to be the universal view that it is expedient to have this legislation introduced—maybe it will not be considered expedient to pass it but at any rate we agree it should be introduced—I would be glad to have this mimeographed document, which I assure hon. members is simply a description of the bill in layman's language, distributed with the bill itself. This would help all hon. members to comprehend it. There are plenty of copies of the bill and of this document available, and if we could pass the resolution and then be given leave to introduce the measure I would be glad to make them available at once.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Transport unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to define a national transportation policy for Canada suited to modern transportation requirements and to establish a national transportation authority to effect the objectives of the national transportation policy; to provide for new methods of fixing freight rates and for the rationalization of branch lines of railway and passenger train services; to authorize the payment from the Consolidated Revenue Fund by way of assistance to permit of orderly adjustment to the new freight rate of structures and the removal of other forms of assistance to railways; to authorize the payment of assistance from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to railway companies where they are required to maintain uneconomic branch lines or passenger train services in operation for the public good; to authorize payments to maintain the prevailing level of At and East freight rates on grain; to permit certain grants to be made from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund for a further period of three years beyond January 31, 1967; to authorize agreements relating to the carriage by rail of Her Majesty's mail and members of the Canadian Forces and police travelling on Her Majesty's service; to provide for the administration of commodity pipe lines, extra-provincial motor vehicle transport and water transport within the context of the national transportation policy, and to provide further for other matters consequential upon or related or incidental to any of the foregoing.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make it perfectly clear that in agreeing to the passing of this resolution we are doing so solely for the purpose of seeing the bill and having the opportunity to discuss it. Our agreement to the passing of this resolution does not necessarily constitute an endorsement of the principles of the legislation which is to follow.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is clearly understood and no advantage will be taken of the indulgence of the house to suggest there was anything more than the desire to see the bill quickly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the undertaking which was made originally. Therefore no further undertaking of any kind is necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Thompson: On behalf of this group may I also say that permitting this resolution to go through at the present time does not involve any commitment to or agreement with the bill itself. It will merely facilitate our having the bill before us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENT OF COSTS

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-232, to amend the Supreme Court Act (payment of costs).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I introduce this bill because I am opposed to practices which discriminate against any Canadian people whether on grounds of race, creed or colour, or because of educational differences—by the way, I happen to be one of those who do not possess much education and therefore would suffer from this limitation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: Under our system of law every person has the right to appear in person before the courts of justice and tribunals and handle his case personally. However, if a decision is rendered in his favour he may be unable to be reimbursed his costs, disbursements and reasonable expenses in the same manner as if he had a lawyer handling his case.

The purpose of this bill is to provide that in the Supreme Court of Canada, which is the keystone of our judicial system, the private individual who, after having pleaded his own case, is awarded his costs will be entitled to the same costs as a lawyer handling his own case.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

• (4:10 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS DURING SPECIAL DEBATE

Mr. Speaker: Questions.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it was my understanding that in respect of the agreement given to the introduction of the railway legislation the Prime Minister had agreed that the railway legislation was of an extremely important nature and therefore other business of the house would be suspended until that business had been concluded. But now we are proceeding as though this is a regular session, which I believe is not in keeping with the remarks of the Prime Minister unless he misunderstood the question I asked him. I would like the house leader to give some indication of whether or not the government intends to embark on regular sessional business.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows we are just going through routine proceedings. I assume that in due course, after routine proceedings, we shall get to government orders at which time I gather the legislation in question will be debated. If it is the desire of the house that routine business be suspended today this procedure could be followed, but there has been no such request or suggestion made until now.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand that the hon. member's remarks were meant to apply to routine proceedings. Perhaps he may want to clarify that. It never occurred to me that the agreement was meant to exclude the answers to order paper questions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or anything else.

Mr. Peters: I think we should concentrate on the other legislation and leave the routine proceedings until later. I know we have the routine proceedings before us but we should waive them until these other two matters are settled. I understood that was the agreement. If we embark on the adoption of committee reports we shall be back in a regular session and it will be said that we are not handling the railway strike as an emergency.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I said anything that was misunderstood. I thought I had agreed—and of course all I could do was agree because it was for the house to decide—that we should waive consideration of all legislation until we had finished the railway legislation so that we could go straight ahead with that legislation. I was not of the impression that that covered routine proceedings. That would be a matter for the house to decide, not the government.

If we could carry on as we are now doing today, perhaps the house leaders could get together and see if any further agreement is needed to proceed with the railway legislation. I suggest that if we can carry on today perhaps we can do away with private members' hour, which would give us an extra hour for discussion of the railway legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my understanding that we continue with routine proceedings. Is it an order of the house that we suspend the private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if we could have that order concerning private members' hour extended throughout the discussion of both the strike bill and all stages of the railway bill up to the conclusion of second reading?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

VICTOR SPENCER—AMOUNTS PAID ON DISMISSAL

Question No. 972—Mr. Cashin:

1. What moneys, if any, have been paid or refunded to Victor Spencer by any agency of government since termination of his employment in the Post Office Department?

2. If any moneys were paid, on what grounds was such payment or refund made to Victor Spencer?

3. What civil service pension would Victor Spencer have received had his employment been terminated in the normal way?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. (a) Balance of salary due at time of separation because of vacation leave to his credit and which he had not taken.

Gross amount	$162.27
Less deductions
Supplementary death benefit premiums for 6 months	12.00
Canada Pension Fund	2.92
Income tax	24.32
Net amount of cheque	$ 123.03

(b) Return of superannuation contributions

Gross amount	$4,759.07
Less income tax	475.91
Net amount	$4,283.16

2. (a) Section 63 (1) of the Civil Service Act provides for the granting of vacation pay. At the time his sick leave with pay was exhausted he had eight days vacation pay to his credit. (b) Mr. Spencer was dismissed under section 50 of the Civil Service Act on grounds considered as misconduct under the Public Service Superannuation Act and section 11 (e) of the Public Service Superannuation Act provides for a return of contributions.

3. He would have been eligible for an annual allowance of $1,833.70 less a deduction of $120 per annum covering arrears payments for service in world war II, had his employment been terminated in the normal way.

*BONUSES TO BILINGUAL POLITICIANS

Question No. 1,259—Mr. Allard:

Does the government intend to grant bonuses to political party leaders, members of the House of Commons and senators who use both of Canada's official languages?

[Translation]

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

[English]

BRANCHES OF FOREIGN COMPANIES IN CANADA

Question No. 1,296—Mr. Allard:

1. When a foreign company wishes to open a branch in Canada, must it apply to any federal department or agency and, if so (a) to which one.

Questions

(b) what are the names of the senior officials or of the persons in charge in such department or agency with whom foreign companies must discuss their plans?

2. Under what conditions may foreign companies establish branches in Canada?

3. Is there continuing liaison or a two way information service between the federal government and the provinces with regard to the establishment in Canada of branches of foreign companies?

4. Does the federal government operate publicity or recruitment offices in foreign countries for the purpose of attracting new industries to Canada and, if so (a) in what countries (b) how do these industrial recruitment offices operate (c) what are the standards or principles applied by the federal government or the department or agency concerned to promote the establishment in Canada of branches of foreign companies (d) are there any financial or other instructions in existence in regard to this, and, if so, when were they established?

5. What assistance may the city of Sherbrooke obtain from the federal government or from the department or agency concerned in bringing foreign companies to establish branches within its limits?

6. When a Canadian company or branch wishes to resettle or open a new branch in another province, must it comply with any formalities established by the federal government or by one of its departments or agencies?

7. In 1964 and 1965, how many foreign companies opened branches in Canada, how many in each province, and from what countries?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and my department as follows:

1. A foreign company which wishes to open a branch in Canada does not have to obtain or ask for a licence or other similar authority from the federal government. This is a provincial matter. Subparagraphs (a) and (b) become not applicable.

2. Under provincial laws.

3. Copies of general inquiries received from foreign industry concerning area development benefits and locations of designated areas are referred to the various provincial departments of industry. Any enquiry relating to a specific province is sent on to that province for direct reply. Provincial departments of industry are also advised of any applications for area development benefits received from foreign companies provided such disclosure is agreed to by the companies.

4. The Department of Trade and Commerce, through its trade commissioners stationed abroad, assists foreign industrialists interested in establishing operations in Canada. The trade commissioner processes any inquiries received through the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Industry.

[Mr. Allard.]

5. The area development agency employs a number of officers trained in industrial development and promotion techniques who are available to assist provincial and municipal governments in formulating programs designed to attract industry, whether domestic or foreign, to designated areas.

6. No.

7. Information on the number of foreign companies opening branches in Canada is not available in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

CENTRES WHERE BILINGUALISM REQUIRED

Question No. 1,354—Mr. Ricard:

What are the centres in Canada where the knowledge of both official languages will be necessary in order to hold a post in the civil service of Canada, according to the requirements of the declaration made by the Prime Minister on April 6, 1966, on the subject of bilingualism in the civil service?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I have been given the following information by the Civil Service Commission: Appendix No. 7 to the staffing manual of the Civil Service Commission has been compiled for the guidance of staffing officers in reaching decisions as to the official language composition of the clientele served by any given office. This appendix was submitted as an attachment to the answer to Mr. Bell's question No. 944, Votes and Proceedings No. 33, March 3, 1966.

INDIAN PAVILION, EXPO '67

Question No. 1,379—Mr. Thompson:

1. Did an Iroquois chief claim that the Tekakwitha Island, proposed for a permanent Indian pavilion near the Expo '67 site, was donated without the authority of the Indian council on the Caughnawaga reserve and, if so, is this claim correct?

2. What are the arrangements for the distribution of profits from the commercial aspects of the proposed Indian centre on the island?

3. Have the Indians of the Caughnawaga reserve co-operated with the R.C.M.P. in investigating the activities of certain Montreal business interests in connection with the commercial aspects of this venture?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as follows:

1. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources did not receive any submission claiming that the Tekakwitha island was donated without the authority of the Caughnawaga band council. The alienation of the Indian reserve land can only be authorized in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act and the department did not receive a request to donate land on the Caughnawaga Indian reserve.

2. Chief Andrew Delisle of the Caughnawaga band informed the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources that no arrangements have been made.

3. The R.C.M. Police has not been requested to carry out, nor has it carried out, any investigation with respect to the activities of certain Montreal business interests in connection with the commercial aspects of the proposed Indian centre on Tekakwitha island.

DEMURRAGE CHARGES, VANCOUVER

Question No. 1,403—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. What was the total amount of demurrage paid by the grain companies to the railroads at the Vancouver port for the months of August, September, October, November, December, January and February of 1965 and 1966?

2. What were the total demurrage charges paid by freighters at the Vancouver port waiting at the docks for grain for the same months?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture, Finance, Trade and Commerce and Transport as follows: 1. No information available.

I am informed by the Department of Finance as follows: 2. The time allowed in Canadian ports for ships waiting to load grain for export before demurrage is charged and the rate of demurrage charged, is a matter of contract negotiation between the shipping company and the exporting company. Information with respect to the amount of demurrage charged is not available.

AIR CANADA—FLIGHT ACCOMMODATION FROM OTTAWA

Question No. 1,527—Mr. Mongrain:

1. Has the government received any complaints lately to the effect that there exists at present a shortage of seats on Air Canada aircraft leaving Ottawa for all destinations?

2. Will the government consider adopting measures to improve this service?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. The Air Transport Board has the general question of the availability of seats on Air Canada's routes under review. Air Canada is aware of the shortage of accommodation on certain flights and its purchase of new equipment which is currently being introduced into service should improve the situation.

ADMINISTRATIVE SUPPORT CATEGORY, PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 1,541—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. What occupational groups are in the administrative support category?

2. How many public servants are in this category?

3. What specifically are the new classification and pay plans for this category?

4. As of what date will they be effective?

5. What standards have been used to support the new plans?

6. Has a point rating approach to job evaluation been used in any of the groups?

7. If so, in what groups and what is its basis?

8. What is meant by a holding classification and how is an employee affected in the matter of pay and progress by being placed in such a classification?

9. How many persons in each group have been placed in a holding classification?

10. What is meant by a position being "red circled" and how is an employee affected in the matter of pay and progress by being placed in a "red circled" position?

11. How many persons in each group have had their positions "red circled".

12. What is the procedure available to an employee for review of his position affected by these procedures?

13. How many employees have adopted such procedure seeking review?

14. What has been the result of these reviews?

15. Were the staff associations consulted about the various aspects of the new classification and pay plans mentioned above and, if so, did they agree thereto?

16. What other categories are under study at the present time for classification revision?

17. When is it expected the plans for each of these categories will be approved?

18. As of what date is it proposed the plans for each of these categories will be effective?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Civil Service Commission as follows: 1. Communications Group; Data Processing Group; Clerical and Regulatory Group; Office Equipment Operation Group; Secretarial, Stenographic, Typing Group; Telephone Operation Group.

2. 57,305 positions are being converted.

3. Communications Group: Level 1, $3,242, $3,352, $3,462, $3,572, $3,682; Level 2, $4,116, $4,252, $4,388, $4,524; Level 3, $4,598, $4,750, $4,902, $5,054; Level 4, $4,827, $4,986, $5,145, $5,304; Level 5, $5,281, $5,455, $5,629, $5,803. Data Processing Group: Level 1, $2,613, $2,730, $2,847, $2,964, $3,081, $3,198, $3,315, $3,432,

Office Equipment Operation Group: Level 1, $2,472, $2,582, $2,692, $2,802, $2,912, $3,022, $3,132, $3,242, $3,352, $3,462, $3,572, $3,682; Level 2, $4,116, $4,252, $4,388, $4,524. Secretarial, Stenographic, Typing Group: Level 1, $2,571, $2,662, $2,753, $2,844, $2,935, $3,026; Level 2, $3,123, $3,226, $3,329, $3,432; Level 3, $2,593, $2,709, $2,825, $2,941, $3,057, $3,173, $3,289, $3,405, $3,521, $3,637, $3,753, $3,869; Level 4, $3,834, $3,960, $4,086, $4,212; Level 5, $4,116, $4,252, $4,388, $4,524; Level 6, $4,598, $4,750, $4,902, $5,054; Level 7, $5,281, $5,455, $5,629, $5,803; Level 8, $6,107, $6,308, $6,509, $6,710; Level 9, $7,053, $7,285, $7,517, $7,749. Telephone Operation Group: Level 1, $2,461, $2,562, $2,663, $2,764, $2,865, $2,966, $3,067, $3,168, $3,269, $3,370; Level 2, $2,594, $2,701, $2,808, $2,915, $3,022, $3,129, $3,236, $3,343, $3,450, $3,557; Level 3, $3,436, $3,549, $3,662, $3,775; Level 4, $3,806, $3,931, $4,056, $4,181; Level 5, $4,172, $4,310, $4,448, $4,586.

4. October 1, 1965.

5. Written standards for each group, incorporating category and group definitions, definitions of level determinants, or rating scales, and, except for the Telephone Operation Group, descriptions of bench mark positions were developed by the Civil Service Commission's Bureau of Classification and Revision in consultation with interested staff associations. The standards were reviewed by the Classification Policy Group, which consists of the Civil Service Commissioners, the Secretary of the Treasury Board and the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee on Collective Bargaining in the Public Service, prior to being given formal approval by the Civil Service Commission.

6. Yes.

7. Clerical and Regulatory Group, and Data Processing Group. The factors and the maximum weights assigned to each factor are:

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Clerical and Regulatory Group:	Maximum
Knowledge	350
Complexity	300
Consequence of Error	100
Responsibility for Contacts	100
Supervision	150
	1,000

Data Processing Group:	Maximum
Skill and Knowledge	350
Complexity	300
Consequence of Error	150
Responsibility for Contacts	50

8. A holding classification is a classification established to provide for an employee whose position has been evaluated under the new system as belonging to a group and level with a lower maximum salary than that applicable to his old classification. An employee is assigned to a holding classification in order that he may continue to receive his existing rate of pay and progress in the normal manner to his old maximum rate. The rates of pay holding classifications are not revised. An employee in such a classification is moved to the classification associated with his position when it becomes financially advantageous for him to do so. In the meantime he is eligible for promotion to higher level positions in accordance with the merit system.

9. Since not all departments have completed the allocation of their personnel to the new groups, statistics are not yet available.

10. "Red-circled" positions are those assigned to a holding classification as described in 8.

11. Final statistics are not yet available.

12. The employing departments are informing all employees in the Administrative Support Category of the effects on them of the conversion program. Any employee assigned to a holding classification who feels that the new standards have not been properly applied in evaluating his position is expected, in the first instance, to discuss the matter with his immediate supervisor. If he is not satisfied with the result of this, he has a right to raise the matter with his personnel office. If he is still not satisfied, the personnel office refers the matter to the Civil Service Commission for review by the Senior Classification Review Officer.

13 and 14. No requests for review have as yet been referred to the Chief Classification Review Officer. Employees were not notified of their right to request reviews until after May 4, 1966. They are required to initiate the request for review within 30 days after being notified. No information is available on the number of employees who are processing requests for review at the departmental level.

15. Yes. They indicated agreement with the classification plans. They were not in agreement with the policy of basing the levels of pay for the new groups on the level of pay in effect for the old classification at the time of conversion.

16, 17 and 18. The other categories under study with the expected date of approval of classification and pay plans and the effective dates of conversion are:

Category	Expected Date of Approval	Effective Date
Administrative	Sept. 15, 1966	Oct. 1, 1965
Operational	not established	Oct. 1, 1966
Scientific and Professional	not established	July 1, 1967
Technical	not established	July 1, 1967
Executive	not established	July 1, 1967

JOE BONANNO—VISITS TO CANADA

Question No. 1,586—Mr. Nielsen:

1. Has the R.C.M.P. and/or the Department of Justice any knowledge that the Mafia leader, Joe Bonanno, has been in Canada on a number of visits during the past year?

2. Has there been any communication received in this connection by the R.C.M.P. or the Department of Justice at any time during the last 18 months from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and, if so, on what dates?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of Justice as follows:

1 and 2. No. It is not the policy of the R.C.M. Police to disclose knowledge of individuals entering or leaving the country, unless a charge has been laid, or unless requested by another police force or relatives.

OPERATIONS IN CANADA OF U.S. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

Question No. 1,588—Mr. Brand:

1. Has the Solicitor General any information to indicate that the central intelligence agency has had operatives in Canada during the last year?

2. If so, does the C.I.A. operate in Canada with the knowledge and consent of the government of Canada?

3. Has the Solicitor General knowledge of any critical and unacceptable statements made by representatives of the C.I.A. regarding Canadians who are members of various ethnic organizations and, if so, have any official protests been made to the administration in Washington?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1 and 2. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in the house on May 20, the central intelligence agency does not carry on operations in Canada. There is however a continuing reciprocal exchange between Canadian and United States officials having responsibility for matters of mutual concern in the field of national security. There have been discussions in Canada from time to time with C.I.A. representatives in this context.

3. This question presumably refers to the judicial proceedings not yet completed in the United States involving Eerik Heine. The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in the house on May 6 that the matter was under discussion with the United States and that he would share the concern of the Leader of the Opposition if the facts as they eventually appear warrant the conclusion which the Leader of the Opposition placed upon them.

PRODUCTIVITY INCREASE IN MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,598—Mr. Hees:

1. On what date was the industry branch transferred from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Industry?

2. On what date did the productivity council cease to operate?

3. What was the percentage increase in productivity in the manufacturing industry in Canada during each of the years 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Industry, the Privy Council Office and the Department of Trade and Commerce as follows:

1. October 1, 1963.

2. Subject to section 22 of the Economic Council of Canada Act, the national productivity council ceased to operate on August 2, 1963.

Questions

3. Annual Percentage Increase of Productivity Relative to Preceding Year Manufacturing, Canada, 1961-65:

Year	Output per Person Employed
1965 (preliminary)	4.0

Note: These figures reflect the latest revisions in the index of industrial production. For instance, the 1964 gain over 1963 on the old basis was 3.3 per cent compared with the revised figure of 4.3 per cent.

DEATH AGES

Question No. 1,620—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the average age of death for all Canadians—male and female—for the last year for which figures are available?

2. What was the average age of death for Canadian Indians—male and female—for the same year?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and National Health and Welfare as follows:

1. The average age of death for Canadians in 1964 is as follows: Male, 60.8; female, 64.5.

2. 1964—Male, 33.67; female, 36.82.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE OFFICERS, ONTARIO

Question No. 1,641—Mr. Saltsman:

Have any employment officers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the National Employment Service been examined for the new positions of employment service officer of cities over 30,000 population in Ontario and, if so (a) how many (b) how many have passed exams (c) how many of those who passed possessed university degrees?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Except in the case of the competition noted below, only officers of the National Employment Service have been examined. (a) 645; (b) 446; (c) 65.

Note: A closed competition open to employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Labour, including the National Employment Service, was held to fill approximately 75 vacant manager positions at various offices of the National Employment Service throughout Canada, including seven offices in cities in Ontario with population over 30,000. The classification levels of the positions advertised in this competition range from employment service officer 3 to employment service officer 8.

339 applications were received in this competition; 10 applicants subsequently withdrew, and 329 applicants were considered.

The number of successful applicants in the competition for each level of position is as follows:

Employment service officer 8, 2 (None have a university degree); Employment service officer 7, 2 (One has a university degree); Employment service officer 6, 13 (None have a university degree); Employment service officer 5, 16 (Two have university degrees); Employment service officer 4, 32 (Three have university degrees); Employment service officer 3, 43 (One has a university degree).

*NATIONAL INDIAN DAY DURING CENTENNIAL

Question No. 1,668—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the government set aside a day during the centennial year, 1967, to be known as "national Indian day", so that the deserved honour will be done to Canada's first citizens?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am advised by the board of directors of the centennial commission that consideration was given to the establishment of special national days during 1967 and the idea rejected by the board on grounds it would be improper to single out any one group for such honour, and virtually impossible to provide special days for all groups which make up Canada's social fabric.

NAVIGATION SURVEY, NELSON RIVER

Question No. 1,690—Mr. Stefanson:

Has the federal government carried out a survey on the Nelson river to ascertain if navigation is possible and feasible and, if so, when and by whom was this survey conducted and what are the findings?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Yes, in 1909 by Mr. E. S. Miles. The survey showed that to establish nagivation would be an undertaking of considerable magnitude which could not be economically justified.

NAVIGATION SURVEY, SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Question No. 1,693—Mr. Stefanson:

Has the federal government carried out a survey on the Saskatchewan river to determine if navigation is possible and feasible and if so, when was this survey conducted and by whom and what are the findings?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Yes, between the years 1910-1915 by Mr. L. R. Voligny. A review of the report was made in 1961 at which time it was concluded that there would not be a sufficient volume of traffic to provide significant transportation savings to set against the heavy capital and operational costs which would be involved in the construction of the waterway.

STAFF HOUSING, SPRINGHILL PENAL INSTITUTION

Question No. 1,703—Mr. Coates:

1. Has the government initiated any action to develop new housing in the Springhill area to provide accommodation for employees of the Canadian penitentiary service who will be located at Springhill, Nova Scotia, when the young offenders' penal institution is completed and in operation this fall?

2. Has C.M.H.C. initiated any special action that would be of assistance in providing the required housing for the new personnel who will be associated with the penal institution in Springhill?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Solicitor General and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. No.

2. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have held discussions with officials of the town of Springhill to assure them that the full provisions of the National Housing Act are available to meet the needs of the community.

POLLUTION OF WINNIPEG RIVER

Question No. 1,722—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the federal government involved itself in any way with a study of pollution on the Winnipeg river in regard to pollution of the river in the areas in near proximity both to Kenora, Ontario, and to Pine Falls, Manitoba?

2. If there has been involvement, what action has been taken by the federal government to deal with this problem in these two areas mentioned and have the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba joined in any such anti-pollution program?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by several departments as follows:

1. No. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys operated a water quality sampling station for a few years up to 1962 near Pine Falls. Data were obtained on chemical character of the water but not specifically related to pollution.

2. Not applicable.

ARDA PROJECTS, KAMOURASKA-L'ISLET CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,735—Mr. Dionne:

To date have any projects been submitted to government authorities under the provisions of ARDA by the south shore development board or any other organization representing the constituency of Kamouraska-L'Islet and, if so, how many?

Answer: Ten.

APPOINTMENT OF WHARFINGER, GRAVENHURST, ONT.

Question No. 1,739—Mr. Aiken:

1. Has a wharfinger recently been appointed for Muskoka Wharf on Lake Muskoka at Gravenhurst, Ontario?

2. If so, what is the name of the appointee?

3. How will the wharfinger be paid for his services, and what amount?

4. What person or corporation requested the appointment of a wharfinger?

5. How many persons applied for this position?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. Charles A. Miller.

3. For his services, the wharfinger retains a portion of the tolls and dues collected for use of the wharf at the following annual rates:—100 per cent of the first, $100 collected; 90 per cent of the next, $300 collected; 50 per cent of the next, $300 collected; 25 per cent of the next, $1,800 collected; 15 per cent of the next, $13,500 collected; 5 per cent of any remainder.

4. The corporation of the town of Gravenhurst.

5. Three.

FUEL SUPPLY, HALIFAX AIRPORT

Question No. 1,745—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Who supplies aviation fuel at the Halifax international airport?

2. What equipment does the supplier have available to service (a) Air Canada (b) other users?

3. Since the opening of this airport, has any firm brought to the attention of the government through any of its officials, any comments about the adequacy, or otherwise, of refuelling services?

Questions

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Imperial Oil Limited.

2. (a) and (b) Equipment is not specifically allotted to individual airlines. Available equipment is as follows:—2, 7,000 gallon trailers supply JP 4 fuel; 1, 7,000 gallon trailer supplies JP 1 fuel; 1, 2,000 gallon trailer spare; 1, 4,000 gallon trailer supplies 115 Octane Avgas.

3. Not in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned.

MAINTENANCE COST OF CERTAIN AIRDROMES

Question No. 1,747—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the annual total operating cost to the Department of Transport of maintaining each of the following aerodromes (a) Lac Des Loups (b) La Macaza (c) Bonnechere (d) Muskoka (e) Earlton?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The latest available figures, fiscal year 1965/66 are: (a) Lac Des Loups $18,622; (b) La Macaza, Nil; (c) Bonnechere, $19,032; (d) Muskoka, $26,218; (e) Earlton, $52,134.

SHORTAGE OF COMMERCIAL PILOTS

Question No. 1,748—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is there a shortage of commercial air pilots in Canada?

2. Will the government consider having the Canada Student Loans Act amended in order to permit those citizens, intent on making commercial air piloting their profession, to be eligible for government loans?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and Finance as follows: 1. The situation in this regard fluctuates from time to time but at the present time a shortage exists.

2. The Canada Student Loans Act authorizes the Minister of Finance to guarantee loans to students in need of financial assistance. The loans themselves are made, however, by branches of the chartered banks and by designated credit unions across the country, and only to students to whom certificates of eligibility have been issued by the appropriate authorities of participating provinces. A measure of this nature in order to be effectively administered, must be general in its scope. The act was designed to assist that large body of students who wish to carry on university and other regular forms of post-secondary education. To this end, the act applies only to students who are engaged in post-secondary educational courses and in courses that last throughout an academic year of not less than 26 weeks. While the benefits of the act are available to the large majority of students, it could not be designed to incorporate many special and deserving courses. An amendment specifically to make pilot training eligible is not considered to be appropriate in these circumstances.

FLIGHT DIVERSIONS, HALIFAX AIRPORT

Question No. 1,752—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Have any intended international landings been diverted from Halifax international airport during the next two months and, if so (a) how many (b) for what reason were these flights diverted (c) what action has been taken, or will be taken, to correct the reasons for the diversions (d) was there any discussion regarding such diversions either before or after a decision to divert from Halifax was taken between Eagle-Lion and the Department of Transport?

2. If there were discussions, was any reference made to the adequacy of refuelling services by either the responsible government authority or the affected airline authority?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The following intended international landings diverted from Halifax international airport as reported by Allied Aviation, New York are (a) five (b) three diversions on account of refuelling times, one diversion due flight plan change (no reason given), one diversion due weather, (c) Imperial Oil has already taken appropriate action to ensure adequate availability of fuelling trailers at all times at Halifax international airport (d) no.

2. No discussions re refuelling services.

*REPRESENTATION AT HUMAN RIGHTS CONFERENCE

Question No. 1,756—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the government received a request from the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs regarding appointments to the planning committee of the Canadian conference on human rights that approximately one half of the membership should be women?

2. Has the government agreed to this reasonable request?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. The president of the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs wrote to all members of the government on June 17 asking that women be represented, and I quote:

—in proportion to their numbers in the total population—

—on any such planning committee.

2. The Prime Minister in his reply of June 21 noted that the government was giving consideration to the question of a Canadian conference on human rights in 1968, but that no decision had yet been made and no planning committee established. He offered the assurance that should such a committee be established the interest of women in this subject would be fully taken into account.

*ESCROW ACCOUNT, WORLD WIDE AIRWAYS

Question No. 1,758—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

1. Were certain funds held in escrow by the Air Transport Board for World Wide Airways on special overseas passenger flights and, if so, what disposal has been made of said monies?

2. Were employees of World Wide Airways paid their full salaries prior to disposal of said monies and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Air Transport Board advises as follows:

1. Funds were not held in escrow by the Air Transport Board. At the direction of the Air Transport Board World Wide Airways Inc. were required to deposit in an escrow account with the Bank of Montreal 50 per cent of all advance payments received from international charter groups. On completion of each portion of the charter the company was permitted to transfer from the escrow account into its general funds account 50 per cent of the original deposits.

On August 12, 1965, because World Wide Airways Inc. was unable financially to complete its outstanding charter commitments its licence was suspended and arrangements were made with Nordair Limited to complete these flight. All funds in escrow account to which World Wide had entitlement were paid to that company. Subsequently the funds remaining in the escrow account were transferred to Nordair as partial payment of its costs in completing the World-Wide charters.

2. The Air Transport Board does not have information relating to the settlement of outstanding salaries. The escrow account was established purely to protect the travelling public from failure of the carrier to perform flights for which payment was made in advance of services rendered.

C.N.R. COASTAL BOATS UNDER CHARTER

Question No. 1,762—Mr. Douglas:

1. Has the Canadian National Railway any boats under charter and engaged in coastal trade on the east coast and, if so, how many such boats are under charter?

2. Has the Canadian National Railway any boats under charter and engaged in coastal trade on the west coast and, if so, how many such boats are under charter?

3. Has the Canadian National Railway any plans for increasing its own fleet of coastal boats?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, in the Cabot strait and Newfoundland coastal service. The vessels are on a trip to trip charter and the number varies according to freight commitments which exceed what the railway operated boats can handle. During 1966, the number of boats under charter has ranged from three to fifteen.

2. No.

3. No. However, the federal government has under construction three ferries for subsequent service on the east coast.

DROUGHT AID, OTTAWA VALLEY FARMERS

Question No. 1,767—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. What was the total amount of money spent by the federal government in 1965 in aid of drought-stricken farmers in the Ottawa Valley?

2. How much money was spent in the specific effort of trying to make rain and did these efforts produce any rain?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario are not required under the terms of the agreements, with respect to special cost shared crop loss assistance programs, to provide a breakdown of payments to farmers by areas and final costs of these programs will not be known until the provinces complete the redemption of coupons provided to farmers to secure feed and fodder requirements from suppliers.

During the fiscal year 1965-1966, the province of Ontario presented claims for, and was paid, $3,322,829. The province of Quebec presented claims for and was paid $2,726,902. In addition, the government of Canada made direct payments to some 7,050 Quebec farmers totalling $988,795.

Provincial claims for reimbursement continue to be paid as they are received from the provinces concerned and as funds are available.

Questions

Total amounts paid to June 27, 1966 are: Quebec, $4,219,073; Ontario, $3,700,000; total: $7,919,073.

The total federal cost of these programs will, it is estimated, be $13,000,000.

In addition the net cost of providing emergency water supplies was $21,793.

2. The federal government was not involved in any efforts to produce rain.

EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS, MONCTON AIRPORT

Question No. 1,774—Mr. Coates:

Is it the intention of the government to initiate the construction and expansion of runways at Moncton, New Brunswick, earlier than was otherwise expected in order to provide a suitable landing strip for DC-9 jet service by Air Canada and, if so, when will tenders be called and what is the expected completion date of the runway extension?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The need for extending the runways at Moncton, N.B. to accommodate Air Canada's DC-9 aircraft is currently under study and it is expected that the necessary improvements will be undertaken sometime in 1967. It is not possible to estimate the date that tenders will be called or when the project will be completed until a decision has been reached as to which runway or runways should be lengthened or strengthened.

WAGE RATES ON FEDERAL CONTRACTS, P.E.I.

Question No. 1,778—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Did the federal government receive a request from the Minister of Labour of the province of Prince Edward Island to respect its prevailing minimum wage rates in all federal contracts performed in Prince Edward Island and also for the work to be done on the P.E.I. causeway?

2. If so, is it the intention of the federal government to ensure that minimum rates on federal projects and on the causeway construction will not be below the provincial standards?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Labour as follows:

1. No. But the minister of welfare and labour of the province of Prince Edward Island sent to the Department of Labour's office in Fredericton, N. B., a copy of a minute of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor in Council dated June 7, 1966, applicable to certain provincial projects, with the request that wage rates for federal projects be brought up to provincial government standards.

[Mr. Greene.]

2. Minimum wage rates on all federal government construction contracts are established on the standards set by the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

DISPOSITION OF ST. CHRISTOPHE ISLAND, ST. MAURICE RIVER

Question No. 1791—Mr. Mongrain:

1. Did the federal government assign St. Christophe island, situated at the mouth of the St. Maurice river, to the municipality of Trois-Rivières?

2. If so, under what terms and conditions was this assignment made?

[Translation]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. and 2. The Department of Public Works has approved "in principle" to grant a renewable long-term lease (21 years) to the city of Trois-Rivières regarding a portion of land owned by the department at St. Christophe Island. The lease would stipulate that this piece of land may be used as a public park or for recreational purposes, but cannot be used for commercial or industrial purposes.

We are also proposing to dedicate to the city other parcels of land on Ile St. Christophe as road allowances for accesses or approaches to the St. Quentin Bridge and the Ile Caron Bridge. The proposed transfer would be conditional upon the city assuming the good maintenance of these road accesses to the bridges for the interest of the public and that of our other lessees on Ile St. Christophe.

MAIL TENDERS, R.R. 2, MATAPÉDIA, QUE.

Question No. 1,794—Mr. Keays:

1. Have tenders been called recently for mail delivery on rural route No. 2—Matapédia, Sellarsville, Broadlands and Kempt Road?

2. If so, how many bids were received and in what amounts?

3. Has the contract been awarded and to whom?

4. If not, for what reason?

5. Were there any representations made that the lowest bidder be not accepted?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. The recent call for tenders on Matapédia Rural Route No. 2 closed on June 8, 1966.

2. Two bids were received within the time limit specified in the tender notices: James Randolph Adams, Matapédia, $2,995; William Edgar Downs, R.R. No. 2, Matapédia, $3,200.

One tender was received after the time limit: Arnold Georges Firlotte, R. R. No. 2, Matapédia, $2,950.

3. Yes. To James Randolph Adams at $2,600 per annum to commence September 1, 1966. Original amounts bid were considered to be too high. As provided for in section 26 of the Post Office Act, an endeavour was made to obtain more reasonable offers from each of the two tenderers who had submitted their bids within the set time limit. Mr. Adams submitted the lowest offer.

4. See No. 3 above.

5. No.

C.P.R. "DOMINION—TERMINATION OF MAIL CONTRACT

Question No. 1,798—Mr. Reid:

What was the date on which the C.P.R. gave notice to the Post Office Department to terminate their contract to carry mail on the Dominion train?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): December 31, 1964.

TECHNICAL OFFICERS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,801—Mr. Enns:

1. How many technical officers are there in each of the three armed services?

2. How many of these are engineers possessing university degrees?

3. How many technical officers of each of the three armed services have (a) applied for release since February 1, 1966 (b) have been retired, having reached the compulsory retirement age (c) have been recruited since February 1, 1966?

2. 30 June, 1966: RCN, 188; CA(R), 417; RCAF, 539.

3. Statistics prior to 1 April, 1966, did not reflect this information. However, from 1 April to 30 June, 1966, the following have applied for release: (a) RCN, 6; CA(R), 37; RCAF, 32. (b) 1 February-30 June, 1966: RCN, 16; CA(R), 27; RCAF, 43. (c) 1 February -30 June, 1966: RCN, Nil; (CA(R), 2; RCAF, 6.

PROFESSIONAL PAY FOR TECHNICAL OFFICERS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,803—Mr. Enns:

1. Is there any serious intent to introduce professional pay for technical officers of the armed services?

2. If so (a) when is this likely to occur (b) what categories of personnel will be affected (c) will there be any distinction made between university graduate engineers and non-university technical personnel as regards such professional pay?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): The over-all pay structure and pay rates of the Canadian armed forces are under study now. Until this study is completed and approved, the date of introduction and the categories of personnel which might be affected cannot be determined.

COST OF LIVING ADJUSTMENTS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,804—Mr. Enns:

1. Have any studies been undertaken to determine whether or not there are significant disparities between the cost of living in Ottawa and other Canadian areas where military personnel serve, exclusive of those areas where special allowances are in effect?

2. If significant discrepancies have been found to exist, are there any plans to adjust pay or allowances of the armed forces to compensate for these differences in cost of living indices?

3. If no studies exist, is there any intention to initiate such a survey?

4. What is the official cost of living index for each Canadian forces base in Canada, exclusive of those bases for which special allowances are in effect?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. No.

4. There is no official cost of living index applicable to Canadian forces bases in Canada.

BASIS OF WIDOWS' PENSIONS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,805—Mr. Enns:

1. Are members of the armed forces officially considered to be on continuous duty while they are in the service?

2. If so, are they also so considered for the purpose of computing the eligibility of a widow for a pension?

3. If so, is this fact officially recognized and accepted by the pension board?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. Members of the regular forces are on "service" at all times, but are only on duty when so ordered and are liable to be required to be on duty at any time.

2 and 3. Not applicable.

ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED, BELL ISLAND, NFLD.

Question No. 1,807—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What measures of dominion government assistance have been extended to the people of Bell Island, Newfoundland, who were former employees of the Dominion Steel and Coal Co. mine?

2. How many said employees have been assisted finding employment in Newfoundland?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration as follows:

1. Bell Island has been designated under the manpower mobility regulations as an area in which residents can obtain grants for their transportation, the cost of moving their household effects and resettlement allowances to move to other areas in Canada where there is employment for them.

2. As of 8 July 1966, 29 former employees of the Dominion Steel and Coal Co. Ltd. had been assisted in finding employment in Newfoundland under the manpower mobility regulations.

PENSION CALCULATIONS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,808—Mr. Enns:

1. Precisely what portions of the present pay and allowances of a serving member of the armed forces are used to compute his service retirement pension?

2. Specifically, what would be the pension for an R.C.A.F. squadron leader in the technical branch who has served 30 years and has been drawing eight years of progressive pay up to his normal retirement age?

3. What is the formula used to compute the pension, and what constitutes each element used in this formula?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1 and 3. The rate of pay prescribed in the tables to Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian forces articles 204.21, 294.215 or 204.30, as applicable to officers other than pilots, pilots, and men respectively, and the allowances constituting part of pay as set forth in section 6 of the Canadian forces superannuation regulations. The formula used to compute the pension or annuity of a member of the Canadian armed forces under the provisions of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act is set out in subsection (1) of section 9 of that act. The amount of the pension, or annuity, is arrived at by multiplying the number of years of pensionable service, not exceeding 35 years, by the average annual pay, as defined above, received by the member during any six year period of pensionable service selected by or on behalf of the member or during any period so selected consisting of consecutive periods of pensionable service totalling six years and dividing the product by 50.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

2. In computing the amount of a pension for a squadron leader who has served for 30 years and who has been drawing eight years of progressive pay up to his normal retirement age, the following assumptions have been made: Date of release—30 June, 1966; drew progressive pay at the eight level for the last three years of service, which would permit progressive pay to have been drawn in the rank of squadron leader for eight years. Based on these assumptions the amount of a pension or annuity of a squadron leader with 30 years service would be $5,370 if single and $5,809 if married.

C.B.C. EMERGENCY NIGHT BROADCASTING—LANGUAGES USED

Question No. 1,809—Mr. Allard:

1. Is emergency night broadcasting over the C.B.C. carried out in both languages and, if not, in which language and for what reasons?

2. Is the director of information in the international service of the C.B.C. at Montreal bilingual and, if not, in which language are directions in that service given?

3. At head office of the C.B.C. in Ottawa is (a) the head of programming for both networks bilingual (b) the head of the foreign relations service bilingual (c) the head of the information service bilingual (d) the head of the publicity service bilingual; and, if not, in each case which language does the officer speak?

4. At head office of the C.B.C. in Ottawa, how many bilingual persons are employed in (a) the purchasing department (b) the foreign relations department (c) the personnel service?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Partly (b) No (c) No (d) Partly. All are basically English speaking.

4. (a) One out of three; (b) None; (c) Nineteen out of forty-one.

FRENCH TELEVISION PROGRAMS, STATION CJOH, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,810—Mr. Allard:

Has T.V. station CJOH undertaken at any time with the B.B.G. to produce French language programs and, if so, which programs have been produced since January 1, 1966?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): The licensee of CJOH-TV Ottawa appeared before the board as an applicant for a licence at the public hearing which commenced on June 23, 1960 and undertook to try to produce some French language programming. The station experimented with French language programs for approximately two years. No programs have been produced in French since January 1, 1966.

MEAT SLAUGHTERING REGULATIONS

Question No. 1,811—Mr. Allard:

1. Does the federal government require registration of establishment in each province of Canada where slaughtering and meat trading are done?

2. Does the federal government also require inspection of meat at all levels from slaughtering to sale in retail butcher shops and, if so, what role do federal inspectors play in such inspection and what type of slaughterhouse do they inspect?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No, only meat slaughtering and meat processing plants that engage in interprovincial or export trade. These are required to operate under the provisions of the Canada Meat Inspection Act.

2. No, except in the plants referred to in part 1, where federal inspectors carry out full meat inspection procedures.

PENSION RECOMMENDATIONS, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,812—Mr. Enns:

1. Has the Department of National Defence recommended that pensions be granted to widows of serving members of the armed forces when death is attributable to any of the following causes: (a) having contracted a communicable fatal disease from a civilian neighbour at his place of residence during normally off duty hours (b) having drowned or been killed in an auto accident during a week end (c) a military aircraft accident while the member was either proceeding to or returning from leave and riding in the aircraft as a passenger with no official aircrew duty (d) a heart attack while on the way home after duty (e) having committed suicide during normally off duty hours?

2. If so (a) has the pension board turned down any such recommendation and (b) for what reason?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. When a serviceman dies while serving in the Canadian forces, a summary investigation, or board of inquiry is held to investigate the circumstances surrounding the death. The proceedings of the investigation are forwarded to the Canadian Pension Commission. The Department of National Defence does not recommend to the Canadian Pension Commission what its decision should be when adjudicating a claim under the Pension Act.

2. Not applicable.

DISPOSITION OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS SEWAGE

Question No. 1,813—Mr. Enns:

Is raw sewage from the parliament buildings directed into the Ottawa river rather than into the Green creek sewage plant system and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No. All such raw sewage is directed to the city of Ottawa sewer system.

DREDGING OF ST. MAURICE RIVER

Question No. 1,818—Mr. Mongrain:

1. Has the government of Canada conceded the right to dredge the bottom of the St. Maurice river at the point where it joins the St. Lawrence river to a company which would thus be gathering supplies of sand for making concrete?

2. If so (a) what is the name of the company (b) when and under what conditions was this right conceded?

3. Has the government determined whether the dredging at the mouth of the St. Maurice river may not possibly cause erosion damage to the neighbouring island of St. Quentin?

[Translation]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. No study was made by the department.

*AIR RESCUE SERVICE, VANCOUVER AIRPORT

Question No. 1,839—Mr. Basford:

1. Is the Department of Transport taking action to provide air rescue operations for the tidal flat areas surrounding Vancouver international airport and, if so, what action is it taking?

2. Has the department investigated the suitability of hovercraft for such rescue operations and, if so, what do these investigations indicate?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The question of the feasibility and best method of providing rescue services for the tidal flat area off Vancouver international airport is being investigated by the Department of Transport. In the meantime interim arrangements are that the Coastguard crash boats stationed at the Kitsilano base, a very short distance away from the mud flat area, can be called on for help. In addition light rubber boats are being provided at the airport itself.

2. The suitability of other types of craft for coastguard work generally is also being investigated in this connection.

REQUEST FOR OLD AGE PENSION INCREASE

Question No. 1,721—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Has the government received representations from the senior women's committee for pension increase, requesting an increase in the old age pension to $100 a month and, if so, what has been their reply?

Return tabled.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO DEAL WITH RISING PRICES AND INCREASING COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ascertain from him whether, in view of the frightening acceleration of inflation and the veiled undertaking given by the Minister of Finance last spring that if the then budget did not work out further action would be taken, he would say now that, at the conclusion of the matters that are before us the government intends to bring before the house a supplementary budget that will be effective as contrasted with one that has produced nothing but heartaches?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that when the present legislation has been disposed of the government would be very glad to facilitate an arrangement whereby there can be a discussion of this very important and worrying matter. At that time the Minister of Finance, or perhaps the Prime Minister, will be able to indicate the government's approach to this problem. I cannot go any farther at this moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the determining of prices, wages and the like is a matter within the jurisdiction of the provinces and in view of the fact that co-operative action could be taken between the federal and provincial governments, would the Prime Minister say whether the government will, in view of the very serious inflationary situation which prevails, call together the provinces with a view to ascertaining whether an agreement can be arrived at for co-operative legislation, if I may use that term, on the part of the federal government and the various provincial legislatures.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on September 14 there is to be a meeting between the federal and provincial ministers of finance. This very important matter is on the agenda and will be discussed with the provincial ministers of finance at that time.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has given any further thought to the proposal we advanced last year that the government should set up a prices review board to review price increases with a view to seeing whether or not they are warranted. At that time the government did not accept the suggestion but the Prime Minister indicated that consideration was being given to it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the matter is still being investigated by the Economic Council and this will be one of the matters we will be discussing in the debate to which I referred when our views on this and related matters will be made known.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister could tell us quite clearly whether parliament has been called to consider specifically the bills concerning the railway strike and the new piece of legislation dealing with the national railways and whether the matter of inflation, etc. could be studied when the regular session resumes on October 5? If I am not mistaken, we have been called specifically to look into the matter of the railway strike and nothing else. Could the Prime Minister give us fuller information in this connection?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, beyond what I have already said, that is, that we would be quite willing on this side to discuss these matters of inflationary pressures and rising costs immediately on the conclusion of the debate on the railway bills. It will be a matter for the house leaders to get together in an effort to decide whether that course is agreeable to all parties. If so, we will be able to facilitate this kind of discussion.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister inform the house when he expects to be able to name the commissioner or commissioners who will conduct the promised inquiry into security?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the recess we have had several discussions within cabinet. I am not in a position to make an announcement now but I will just as soon as it is possible.

INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF U.S.-CANADA AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Because of the reason given by General Motors that the lay-off of some 2,600 employees at the Oshawa plant was mainly due to the United States-Canada auto trade pact agreement, would the Prime Minister have a very close scrutiny made of the effect of the United States-Canada auto pact to determine whether it is having a detrimental effect upon the Canadian economy and its work force?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry to deal with that particular point. I might say that I have received a letter from the hon. member on this and related matters, to which I have sent an interim acknowledgement. I hope to be able to give the hon. member more detail on this shortly.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics employment in the automotive industry in Canada for the three month period, January through March of 1964, totalled 69,750. For the same period in 1965 the figure was 76,700 and for 1966 the figure is 88,150. That is an increase of some 20,000 new job opportunities in the automotive industry during the initial period of the agreement. I do think that in respect of over-all employment there is no question that this agreement has operated materially to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? In view of the fact that for the past six years employment in the automobile industry has been rising without this pact, how can the minister now say that the lay-off of 2,600 people is not serious and quote figures to prove that there has been a rise in the employment ranks of the automobile industry?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I did not say the lay-off at Oshawa is not serious. It is very serious indeed, particularly for those concerned. The government, particularly through the departments of manpower, labour and industry, is doing all it can to mitigate the effect of this lay-off. The fact of the matter is that production of automotive vehicles and parts in Canada has been substantially increasing over the past three years and so also has employment. There have been changes in employment brought about by rationalization of the motor car industry which has made it more efficient and consequently able to export. These changes, however, do cause dislocation, but the government has a program designed to mitigate these effects and it is in operation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY STRIKE—CONSULTATION WITH UNION LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the legislation to end the railway strike, which is about to come before the house for debate, is based on recent consultation with labour leaders and have they assured the government that the terms of the legislation will be effective in getting the men back to work?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course it would be improper to discuss the terms of a bill with anybody outside the house when the bill has not been submitted inside the house. There have been discussions in respect of these difficulties with labour leaders as recently as this morning, but the terms of the bill have not been submitted to anybody outside of the house.

POSSIBILITY OF POSTAL WORKERS GOING ON STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the impending strike of postal workers which would be called around October 18, can the Prime Minister assure the house that the government is now taking all possible action to settle the disagreement before the start of this further strike in this country?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to look into this particular matter and discuss it with the Minister of Labour.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE USE OF FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it now the policy of the government to employ force if necessary to dislodge the present government in Rhodesia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know of no basis for that question.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

YOUTH PARLIAMENT—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the regrettable decision of the government not to proceed with the youth parliament in Canada's centennial year, may I ask the Secretary of State whether she would give consideration to reconvening the ad hoc committee at an early date, in view of the fact that this committee recommended the holding of a youth parliament, to see if this whole matter should be canvassed again?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give consideration to that matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF INTEGRATION MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Will the issues raised by Admiral Landymore and others in respect of integration and unification be referred to the committee on national defence and will retired high ranking officers such as Admiral Landymore have an opportunity to be present?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to introduce in the house later this session amendments to the National Defence Act to permit the unification of the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You found out you could not do it without legislation.

Mr. Hellyer: It will be the intention of the government at that time to refer the bill to the standing committee on national defence, and it will be within the prerogative of that committee as to what witnesses it may care to call from outside the armed forces, including retired officers, who may wish to express their opinions.

Mr. McCleave: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister assure the house that no action will be taken in respect of common ranks and a common uniform until the committee has had an opportunity to study the proposed legislation?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we have given an assurance that common ranks and a common uniform will not be introduced, except in so far as user trials of a common uniform are perhaps concerned, until the legislation has been dealt with by the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The only other reservation I should like to mention relates to the fact that the defence staff has been making plans and giving consideration to certain details of this question in order that we will be able to answer fully questions posed by members of the defence committee when it is considering this legislation.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the minister mean that the government has no intention of referring the whole matter of integration back to the defence committee so that witnesses from both inside and outside the services may testify on this and related matters? In view of the events that have taken place since June 22, does the minister say that he will not advise his colleagues to ask for the permission of the house to so refer this matter?

Mr. Hellyer: I have just indicated to the contrary, Mr. Speaker, that when the legislation is introduced we will in fact refer it to the committee so it can hear the opinions of individuals who may wish to express them.

Mr. Lambert: The minister has not said when that legislation will be introduced. Will he consider introducing it forthwith?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated that this legislation will be introduced later this session. This was also indicated in the Speech from the Throne. My hon. friend may have forgotten that fact. This legislation will be introduced as soon as possible.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. May we take it from his remarks that the defence committee will not be reconvened until such time as this new legislation is brought before the house? Must we wait until some subsequent date before—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this question is repetitive, having been asked and answered.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that I never suggested this was not an urgent matter. I merely suggested that the question had been asked and that the minister had given an answer.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to either the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the government be in a position during this part of the session to bring forward its legislation to increase old age pensions and will there be any change in the plan announced on July 14?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's legislative program for this part of the session will be made known to the house just as quickly as possible.

NATURAL GAS

DENIAL OF PERMISSION TO CONSTRUCT LINE THROUGH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister related to his announcement the other day that permission has been denied by the government for the building of a gas pipe line from western Canada to central Canada following a route south of lake Superior. My question is in two parts. Has the government any alternative proposal in order to gain access to the additional United States markets which would have been available had this pipe line been authorized? Does the government have some proposal to assist in holding down the cost of gas to consumers in central Canada and the additional cost of building such a pipe line somewhere north of lake Superior?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be an opportunity to discuss this whole matter very shortly. It is difficult for me at this moment to deal with these specific points, but I will discuss them with the minister concerned.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REPORT ON GOVERNMENT DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can he indicate when he expects to receive the Carrothers commission report on the development of government in the Northwest Territories and when he expects to make this report public?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe I am correct in saying that it is the intention of Dean Carrothers to present me with a copy of this report tomorrow morning. I would hesitate to table such a report in this house until it was available in both languages. Inquiries have been made as to the possibility of obtaining a French translation at an early date. If that should be unduly delayed, I will give an explanation to the house.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

PRODUCTION OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT FOR U.S. USE IN VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Can he inform the house as to the accuracy of the statement that his department has authorized Canadian companies to enter into contracts to supply bombs and military components for use by the United States in Viet Nam?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to the question as it is phrased is no.

Mr. Winch: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are Canadian companies producing supplies under contract for the United States for use in Viet Nam?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, some Canadian companies are producing military equipment for the United States which goes into what is known as United States inventory. What becomes of that equipment once it enters that inventory is beyond the control of the Canadian government.

Mr. Winch: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the reply just given, are bombs being produced in Canada which go into United States inventory?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, when a somewhat similar question was asked before the adjournment it was pointed out that Canadian companies were not manufacturing bombs for the United States government.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD ADMISSION OF MAINLAND CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will clarify the rather conflicting statements that have been ascribed to him and others in connection with the seating of communist China at the United Nations? Does the Canadian government intend to vote for the seating of communist China during the coming session of the United Nations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the basis for the first part of my hon. friend's question. Having regard to the second part, as my right hon. friend knows, that question has already been asked and answered. The government's policy will be announced in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer is about as satisfying as any answer one can get from the minister. Has the government not yet determined what course it will follow in this matter or is parliament to find itself faced with a decision made in New York that has not been brought in advance before the House of Commons?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend knows that his question is not really a proper one in view of the answer I made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just told my right hon. friend that the government will announce its policy in due course and he must accept that. I do not believe he can see any change in the procedure we are following from the procedure he followed. I asked him this question on three or four occasions when he was the prime minister and his replies were in precisely the same practical words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more flattering than imitation and I commend the minister for it; but I say to him that his statement is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, did the minister note the very sensible and realistic statement made recently by Mr. Chester Ronning, who has been described by the minister as a responsible public servant, to the effect that there should be an exchange of ambassadors between Ottawa and Peking and that the People's Republic of China should now be seated at the United Nations?

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Ronning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fairweather: I had the pleasure of hearing both of them over the C.B.C. But does the government not feel now that the time has come to act?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The question has already been answered, Mr. Speaker.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

On the order: Special Order No. 1:

August 29—The Prime Minister—second reading of Bill No. C-230, an Act to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, without unanimous consent the house cannot proceed to second reading of a bill which was given first reading only today. I indicated earlier that we were prepared to give unanimous consent only if there was agreement to adjourn after the main statement had been made by the minister introducing the bill. Apparently that was unacceptable to certain members in the house. We therefore objected and when Your Honour said "Later this day?" we said "No". We certainly made it cear that we were not giving unanimous consent to second reading of this legislation today except under the conditions I specified.

Mr. Speaker: I have to say that I did not hear the negative comments which may have been made when the call was made from the Chair and my understanding is that there was unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly this is a very serious matter and I would not want to proceed unless there were a clear understanding that there is unanimous consent. Hon. members at this end of the chamber will confirm that there was no stout opposition heard from the other end of the chamber when the motion was put by the Chair. Certainly no such opposition was heard by the Chair, and I called the motion as having been carried by unanimous consent. I should like to hear from other hon. members on the point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who objected and I would say I am almost as stout as anyone in the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make a suggestion on this point. In view of the desire of hon. members to study the bill, we might proceed with second reading and adjourn from six o'clock to eight o'clock to give hon. members an opportunity to do so. Perhaps that course would be agreeable to the house.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, this is very important legislation. We have agreed to waive the 48 hours notice; we have agreed to first reading being proceeded with. But I think hon. members are entitled to have the period overnight in which to study this legislation before expressing an opinion on it. There can be no possible excuse for ramming this legislation through without adequate time for close scrutiny and examination. We are not going to be rushed or bullied into passing legislation which we have not had an opportunity to examine carefully. We have only had it put on our desks. It is not simple legislation; it has far reaching repercussions. It will lay down precedents for the future in dealing with labour matters, and certainly members of the house should have the period overnight in which to study it.

On behalf of our party I would say that we are quite prepared to have second reading called if it is merely for the purpose of allowing the Prime Minister or the minister introducing the legislation to make a full statement, but we are not prepared to proceed with the debate today. We think hon. members have the right to study this bill in order that they may make comments which are intelligent and as a result of careful examination. It should not be done on the basis of a very hasty and cursory glance at this very complicated legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am fully mindful of the co-operation we have had from the house in removing some of the procedural difficulties in getting this legislation before the house today. I thought that was made clear earlier. The government has no desire whatsoever to ram through legislation. We appreciate its importance and significance. We are seeking a way to get the legislation dealt with in the shortest possible time consistent with the rights of hon. members to study it and discuss it. My suggestion was an attempt to put forward a formula that might do that.

I am wondering, since the hon. member is not the one who speaks next after the member of the government presenting the legislation, if it would be agreeable to adjourn for a number of hours after that member has spoken to permit the legislation to be studied. I wonder if that course is agreeable to other members of the house. As an alternative we could sit until six o'clock and then adjourn until tomorrow, if hon. members consider that a better course.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could make a suggestion that may find some agreement in the house. The government house leader has suggested that we sit until six o'clock and then adjourn until eight o'clock. I wonder whether the house leader and members of the other parties would agree to adjourn now so that hon. members could have until eight o'clock to look at the bill. This would be useful in following the Prime Minister's remarks respecting the bill. Because of the urgency of getting on with this legislation we could perhaps debate it between eight o'clock and ten o'clock tonight, and certainly the debate will continue tomorrow. I wonder whether this would satisfy hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not find this bill very difficult to understand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am amazed at the attitude of the leader of the New Democratic Party. They have been asking for action. Now there is an opportunity. All this bill provides for is two payments of 4 per cent, or 8 per cent in all, and compulsory arbitration. Nothing else is involved. This is not difficult to understand or debate. Why should there be any necessity to adjourn in order to permit an examination of the bill. It is simplicity itself. All the workers are going to get now is 8 per cent and then there is to be the setting up of a committee of arbitration whose decision is to be final. As I say, the legislation is simplicity itself. In saying that, however, I would point out again that our attitude in the past has always been one of opposition to this type of thing. But there is nothing difficult about the legislation.

Mr. Pearson: What about 1958?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to answer, but the only reason hon. members opposite did not follow what we did in 1960 was that members on their front benches voted against it at that time and they therefore had to sacrifice the needs of Canada to political expediency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he says that the bill before us is relatively simple, very easy to understand, and in fact comprises only two items: an 8 per cent increase and the establishment of a conciliation committee.

Now, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) has been saying for three weeks that the government is slow to take action and is not assuming its responsibilities, and now that we are all gathered here, it is the leader of the New Democratic Party, again, who asks us to adjourn the debate to allow us to study a situation which his group has been well aware of for at least six years. Why should we put off until tomorrow what we can do today? Mr. Speaker, I believe we are gathered here to study these bills, even if the leader of the New Democratic Party were to go to bed at six and sleep until eleven tomorrow morning. He already has an opinion and he could very well express it now; what he is asking for now would only hold up the business of the house.

I support the government which wants the debate to take place immediately, so that we may deal conclusively with these matters concerning the strike and the Railway Act.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Douglas: The necessity for speedy action, Mr. Speaker, does not mean we are prepared to see legislation passed without giving it due consideration and careful examination. We have had this legislation for only a matter of minutes, and to ask hon. members to deal with a matter of such fundamental importance without giving them adequate opportunity to study the bill seems to me quite improper. I think the suggestion made by the government house leader that we deal with second reading now with the understanding that the house will adjourn at six o'clock would be acceptable. This would give us an opportunity to examine the bill carefully. There are many implications in this bill in spite of what the Leader of the Opposition has said. We still recall our experience with reference to the longshoremen's strike when we found, weeks after the supposed settlement, that there was a joker in the deck, and some things came up later about which we had not been told.

We want to study this legislation carefully to see what are the implications with respect to the welfare of the railway men, the welfare of the people of this country and the precedents which we are setting for future action by future parliaments. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is not an unreasonable request to ask that in respect of legislation as important and far reaching as this hon. members be given sufficient time over night to study it and then continue the debate tomorrow. The suggestion of the house leader to proceed with second reading and adjourn at six o'clock is sensible. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that one of the conditions on which we agreed to waive the 48 hours notice was that there would be no attempt to ram this legislation through without being given every opportunity for most careful scrutiny and examination.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, regardless of whether or not we adjourn we are not going to ram this legislation through tonight. A while ago we agreed to suspend private members' hour and go on with the debate. It seems reasonable to hear the Prime Minister's explanation on the introduction of the bill. If we want to adjourn for the supper hour that is fine, but we should then continue with the debate.

Mr. Speaker: There is obviously disagreement in the house. I do not see how we can proceed with second reading of the bill without unanimous consent. We obviously require it.

An hon. Member: We have it.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members say that unanimous consent was given. Quite honestly, this was my understanding, but hon. members of one of the parties represented in this house insist they did not agree to it. I have to accept their word that they did not agree to a debate on second reading. In the circumstances, unless there is agreement now I cannot put the motion.

An hon. Member: Put the motion.

Mr. Speaker: We will put the motion and see what happens.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winkler: Who said "no"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement on the motion or is the Chair to understand that we are not going to proceed with the debate at this time?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I was one of the members who said "no" to unconditional agreement that we proceed with second reading today.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Barnett: I understood at the time that the Leader of the Opposition had not agreed to the suggestion made by my leader that we should first hear the statement of the Prime Minister and then adjourn the debate. It was on that basis that I was one of the members who did not give consent to second reading. It does seem to me that what we need at this point, if I may say so, is a statement from the Leader of the Opposition on whether or not he is now prepared to agree to hear the Prime Minister and then have an adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman and those associated with him are looking for an alibi. They now find themselves in a predicament created by themselves. They are trying to find somebody else to blame. We want to go ahead with second reading with no postponement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It is my impression there is more unanimity now than there was before. Perhaps we should now hear the Prime Minister.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I be made clear as to what procedure Your Honour is following? Does this mean the Prime Minister will now make a statement and that we are now in debate on second reading? We cannot go into debate on second reading without unanimous consent and unanimous consent was not given and is not being given now. If the house agrees to hear the statement of the Prime Minister and then adjourning—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Douglas: —that is all right, but if there is to be a debate following the Prime Minister's statement we do not agree to proceeding with second reading. I want this clearly understood.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member opposing second reading or debate on second reading?

Mr. Douglas: I am denying unanimous consent to proceed with second reading. The house cannot proceed with second reading without unanimous consent and unanimous consent has been withheld.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom?

Mr. Douglas: By the members of this party. I want to make it clear that we are opposing it just as the Leader of the Opposition has made it perfectly clear that he is prepared to go ahead and rubberstamp the legislation of the government.

Mr. Starr: You are speaking out of the wrong side of your mouth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want that statement to go unchallenged. The hon. member speaks as if he had a solution to everything. Let me point out that when he was premier of Saskatchewan 95 strikes took place in that province.

Mr. Douglas: We did not settle any of them by compulsory arbitration.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order; since the members of the New Democratic Party seem to find it very difficult to understand anything, why does the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) not suggest that the house adjourn until October 5?

This would allow the members of the New Democratic Party to study the legislation and find an adequate solution.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Crouse: The suggestion has been made by the leader of the N.D.P. that we delay consideration of this legislation until tomorrow. This is a stand which I, as the member for Queens-Lunenburg, find intolerable. It is indicative of the fact he is unaware of the emergency situation that exists in Canada. I regret to have to say this because he is one member I hold in high respect, but I must say he is using this situation to play party politics at the expense of the citizens of this country.

We have been called here in emergency session to deal with the strike which was called on Friday. We have been called here to deal with a national emergency. In my view the welfare of the people of Canada demands that we take immediate action on this matter. In my province of Nova Scotia we have farmers who are feeding chickens and they are dependent upon the shipment of western grain. If these shipments of grain do not arrive within the next three days, some half million pullets will starve. We have fishermen at sea who must land their catches and who will then be forced to tie up their ships because fish cannot be held indefinitely. We can freeze a certain amount of our catch, but the bulk of it must be shipped immediately while it is still in its fresh state. If we cannot ship our fish, we must tie up our fleet.

I say to the house and to the leader of the N.D.P. that it is time we set aside partisan politics and dealt with this national emergency. I know that the members of my party are prepared to sit here all night and all day tomorrow. If we fail to do this at this time, Mr. Speaker, then we fail to live up to our responsibility. I say this is an urgent matter. Let us co-operate with the government in dealing with this problem. Let us get the railroads functioning and restore service to the people of Canada because that is what they expect us to do.

Mr. Olson: In so far as the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I know that you are in a difficult position because you did not hear unamimous consent being denied by some members who now claim that they voiced their opposition at that time. I recall very distinctly that when the bill was being introduced and given first reading you drew the attention of the house to the fact that it would require unanimous consent that it be proceeded with later this day. I can remember that very distinctly, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that Hansard will bear out my statement. I say, therefore, that while we may have a dilemma on this point of order we have an order of the house that second reading of this bill be proceeded with later this day. I suggest that is what the house decided not very long ago.

Mr. Brewin: I do not wish to prolong this part of the discussion, Mr. Speaker. I was one of those who clearly, if not loudly enough, said, "no" when it was proposed that we should give second reading to this bill today. I want to tell this house that we did so with a full sense of our responsibility to the people of Canada.

Mr. Brewin: We have heard an emotional address by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg who condemns as partisan those who are desirous of cool, calm and collective consideration of the matter before us. We in this party have no intention whatever of dealing with something as far reaching and fundamental as the bill before us without being given an opportunity to consult and to consider and study the matter.

I suggest to all members of the house that if it is their desire to obtain a solution of the grave matter we are discussing they should not get into a panic or become hysterical. They should not say, let us rush this through, let us sit all night, and that sort of thing. I know that feelings are strong but strong feelings and emotional references will not solve this problem as easily as will reasonable, deliberate consideration by parliament. For that reason I say that I support my leader and I support every member of this party. We have no desire to delay this matter but we do have a desire to take the time to take a serious look at something put before us just half an hour or so ago.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask for a ruling from you, Mr. Speaker, on whether in your view unanimous consent is now necessary before I can proceed with my statement on second reading or whether that has been dispensed with because of earlier proceedings?

Mr. Speaker: I must repeat that it was my impression that unanimous consent had been given. However, three hon. members have risen in their places to state they had not given unanimous consent. The Chair has to accept the statements made by those three hon. members. I have come to the conclusion that there has been no such unanimity and no consent. The Prime Minister, therefore, cannot at this time proceed with the second reading of the bill.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. McIlraith: In view of the fact that there is no unanimous consent to proceed with second reading, I regret that I see no alternative but to move the adjournment of the house.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: Before that motion is put, could I make a suggestion which may make it unnecessary for us to wait all evening. There has been a ruling that unanimous consent is now required. Some members of the New Democratic Party have stated they are willing to give unanimous consent provided there is either a statement from the Prime Minister now and then an adjournment or an adjournment now until eight o'clock. They will only give unanimous consent on that understanding, and I can appreciate that. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has said he is not willing to give unanimous consent on that understanding. Surely it is better to sacrifice two or three hours now so the bill can be read than to sacrifice the rest of the day which would be the case if unanimous consent cannot be given.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill stand for second reading until tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Until eight o'clock this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: We would be agreeable, Mr. Speaker, if the house would adjourn now and give us until eight o'clock to examine this legislation, and then proceed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: I ask permission to withdraw my motion and to substitute a motion that the house do rise until eight o'clock and that at eight o'clock it do proceed with second reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Proceedings on the bill will stand adjourned until eight o'clock tonight by unanimous consent. The sittings of the house will be suspended until eight o'clock this evening.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 5.10 p.m. the sitting of the house was suspended until 8 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A it is my duty to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment this evening are as follows:

The hon. member for Halifax, national defence—committee consideration of integration measures.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for the second reading of Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by expressing my appreciation for the co-operation received from all sides of the house which has enabled us to proceed with legislation which was introduced only today. As I said this afternoon, it is legislation dealing with an emergency situation. The urgent and immediate issue that faces this house and parliament at this moment is the necessity of ending a national railway strike with the least possible delay by fair and reasonable legislative provisions.

Though the long-range importance and the far-reaching implications of the failure to settle this and other disputes by negotiation and agreement over the years, through the normal processes of collective bargaining should be, and is being, considered as a matter of great significance requiring parliamentary attention, and is something that will undoubtedly be debated—and should be debated—in this session, nevertheless at this moment these longer range matters are secondary to the necessity of an early decision by parliament on this bill which is now before the house.

It is necessary, however, in putting this bill before the house, and in explaining it, to give briefly the background of developments leading up to the situation which made parliamentary action unavoidable. That, I think, Mr. Speaker, is all the more necessary in view of certain remarks made this afternoon.

This is the fourth time since 1949 that the federal parliament has been asked to consider emergency legislation to deal with a serious strike situation. On three of these four occasions railways were involved, and on the other, in 1958, sea transportation.

Our experience over these years shows pretty conclusively that the processes of collective bargaining in railway disputes are becoming less and less effective in meeting the conditions that exist today. One reason for this—but only one reason—is the fact that present laws restrict the capacity of the railways to manage their business operations and to compete effectively with other forms of transport. The law has prevented them, for good reasons, from taking action which would increase their own revenue. This has resulted in subsidies from government which now amount to more than $100 million a year. To correct the situation the government has introduced another bill dealing with railway matters—the railway legislation bill—which will be debated, I hope, immediately after we dispose of the one before the house.

There is an even more far reaching development which has had a bearing on the weakness, and ineffectiveness, in too many cases, of labour-management negotiations, and that is the importance of job security in the case of technological change. An increased wage has no meaning if the job disappears because of a new machine.

We must find better methods for the negotiation and settlement of disputes in the railway industry, and in other industries; new and improved mediation and conciliation procedures which will take into account new circumstances, new conditions in industrial society; which will more effectively preserve the right of the employee in these new conditions and also adequately protect the national interest, particularly in respect of essential national services.

This is a vital and pressing problem. But at this moment, Mr. Speaker, we are faced, as I have said, with an immediate emergency, and with the necessity of resolving that immediate emergency.

In this connection it is important to recall recent experience in these four parliamentary interventions in labour disputes which I have mentioned, in order to understand the present situation; indeed, to place it in the proper framework for such understanding.

The first parliamentary intervention in the period from 1949 to the present was in 1950, through the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act of that year. That was legislation introduced by the government headed by Mr. St. Laurent to bring to an end a general railway strike which had been going on for several days—seven days, I think.

By that legislation in 1950, employees were required to return to their duties, and an interim wage increase was granted on such return. Negotiations were then to be resumed, and if those negotiations failed an arbitrator was to be appointed. As it happened, an arbitrator was required, or was appointed, and a contract was signed as a result of his arbitration.

The next parliamentary and governmental intervention was in 1960 through the Railway Operation Continuation Act of December 2, of that year. In 1959 the union demanded from the railway wage increases of 17 per cent, plus 12½ cents an hour, vacation and other fringe benefits, to which at that time the railways were unable to agree, and a conciliation board was established on March 31, 1960, under the chairmanship of Justice Milvain.

A majority report was made by that board—by the chairman and the union representative, who was an hon. member of this house. That majority report was made on August 15, 1960. It was accepted by the unions concerned; it was rejected by the railways. "We are not able," so they said "to afford the increase." So, on September 20, 1960, the government was advised that a strike vote would be taken. That was September 20.

The government of that day intervened on November 19, after the union negotiation chairman, Mr. Frank Hall, had announced on November 15 that a strike would take place on December 3 unless a settlement was reached in the 19 days before that date, during which government mediation was taking place.

As a result the minister of labour and two other ministers met the parties to the dispute in Montreal on November 19. There was a subsequent meeting in Ottawa of the parties to the dispute with the prime minister and three ministers on November 26, one week later. These failed to settle or postpone the strike. So, legislation was introduced and passed on December 2, postponing the strike for six months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Introduced on November 29, was it not?

Mr. Pearson: It was introduced on November 29 and passed on December 2. It is interesting to recall that that is about two weeks after parliament met. The Speech from the Throne two weeks before makes no mention of any railway difficulties of any kind.

As a result of that legislation the unions cancelled the strike date. They were instructed in the legislation to postpone that strike for six months, and they did so. Six weeks later, on January 23, 1961, the Prime Minister wrote, asking the parties to resume negotiations. On February 14 negotiations were resumed. Mr. Frank Hall advised the government on February 15 that no progress had been made and that there would be no further meetings. On April 21 the union advised the government that a strike would take place on May 16.

The parties then agreed to meet, and a settlement was reached on the basis of the recommendations of the majority report, the rejection of which, six months earlier, had caused the threat of the strike and the intervening crisis. One wonders why.

Perhaps one explanation of that may be found in the estimates which appeared very shortly afterwards. There was an amount of $50 million in subsidies—

An hon. Member: What are the strikers worried about now?

Mr. Pearson: —and that explains that situation, and it also indicates the length of time it took to resolve that dispute.

There is a third intervention, in 1958, in the British Columbia Coast Steamship Service Act, which provided for a resumption of a coast steamship service operated by the C.P.R., by the appointment of an administrator who was made subject to instructions from the governor in council. This legislation required employees to return to their duties. The terms of the existing agreement were amended to increase the rate of wages by 8 per cent, which was to apply until a settlement was reached. Provision was made in this legislation, Mr. Speaker, for compulsory arbitration by order in council if negotiations, with the assistance of a federal negotiator, failed. Arbitration was not, however, necessary.

It is interesting to compare the provisions of this particular bill with the provisions of the bill before the house.

An hon. Member: How did you vote?

Mr. Pearson: The wording is almost exactly the same, Mr. Speaker. The prime minister of that date, in 1958, said that this was not compulsory arbitration. It was merely making provision for other action if mediation failed, if and when it was required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the right hon. member say at that time?

Mr. Pearson: I do not recall, Mr. Speaker, the exact words of my speech at that time. I have made so many speeches since then. I have no doubt that my right hon. friend and his colleagues in their weeks of pleasant relaxation this summer have been reading all these earlier debates, as I have, too. It is quite easy for us to use them against each other.

That is the background of parliamentary intervention in labour disputes, and the procedures which were followed by the government and by parliament when such intervention was required.

To return to the present situation, negotiations for a new contract were, I believe, begun between the unions and the railways in November of last year. These negotiations were not successful and conciliation boards were applied for. In the event, five such boards were established, three separate ones being required for non-operating employees who had previously bargained as a single group. The five boards were established under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. They were set up without delay after the applications had been received, and any delay in getting conciliation processes under way was due to difficulties in getting chairmen acceptable to both parties.

In my view it would have been wrong and unprecedented, as I indicated this afternoon, for the government to have intervened until these boards had reported and the unions had acted upon those reports. I have just outlined what was done in other circumstances of kind, and this was the procedure followed in 1960 and 1950.

It was understood that though there were five separate boards the unions would act as a group with regard to decisions on any recommendations made in the five reports, and any action which might subsequently be required. This meant that decision and action would be taken only after the last report had been received, and this is, in fact, was the way in which the unions operated.

It is in this context that I would outline first, the procedures and timing followed by the board and, second, the results and recommendations of these boards. Boards 1 and 2, which were under the same chairman, a chairman acceptable to both parties, dealt with the demands of 83,000 of the non-operating and shopcraft employees—about 72 per cent of the employees involved. Applications for these two boards were received on January 27 and March 1 and the boards were established on March 1, the same day as the second applications was received. Union and company representatives were appointed on March 10 and March 15 and confirmed on March 17. Two days later they informed the Minister they had agreed on Mr. Justice Munroe as chairman, and on the same day Justice Munroe was appointed as chairman.

The boards' reports were received on July 4 and the decision to strike was made on August 22—not on August 21 as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, but at noon, August 22, on the Monday. The strike was to begin four days later, on August 26.

There was a third board, presided over by Hon. J. C. A. Cameron, dealing with the non-operating Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Transport and General Workers, about 20,000 in number. The application for this board was received on March 21 and the board was appointed on March 24. The union made its nomination on March 30, the company appointed its nominee on April 1, the appointments were confirmed by the Minister on April 4 and on April 18, almost two weeks later, the Minister was informed of their inability to agree on a chairman. So Hon. Mr. Justice Cameron was appointed by the government. This board reported on August 10, and strike action was decided upon on August 22, the date being fixed, as we know, for August 26.

There were two other boards. Board 4 under Judge Little was concerned with the C.N.R. Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. This application was received on April 15.

The board was established on April 27, the union nomination was made on May 4, the railway nomination on May 6 and the appointments were confirmed on May 9. Again, members were unable to agree on a chairman and on May 26 they advised the minister of their disagreement. The minister appointed Judge Little as chairman on June 9.

The report was received on August 12, the decision to strike was reached on August 22. The same timetable applies to board number 5, also under Judge Little, except that the application was made much later, on May 27. The rest was about the same.

That is the situation with regard to the procedure followed. There was no delay on the part of the government in setting up these boards and none in dealing with the reports when they were received—and they were not received until well into August.

It would in my view have been altogether wrong to have intervened when the first report only had been made. If the government had intervened at that time—though we knew, of course, the difficulties which were being encountered—negotiations within the other boards would have been made virtually impossible; they would probably have ended their work at that time. How could a mediator appointed by the government function with regard to one board while the others which were still working had not yet reported, and conciliation procedures were still going on? This illustrates the difficulty the government faced in intervening until the boards had completed the process of collective bargaining laid down by the law. That was the procedure followed in the other circumstances I have mentioned in 1950 and 1960.

But there were differences in 1960. In 1960 the unions fixed a strike date sufficiently far ahead of the date on which the strike was decided to give the government adequate time for negotiations. This was not the case in 1966.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Tell us why.

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member would exercise that patience for which he is noted, I will try to come to the "why", now that I have disposed of the "what". First, though, I wish to put on record the wage recommendations of the two boards presided over by Mr. Justice Munroe having to do with the two groups of non-operating employees, covering about 72 per cent of all the employees. In making his recommendations for wage increases Mr. Justice Munroe took into consideration, as has been done previously, the comparable earnings in the durable goods manufacturing industries—this has become in recent years an acceptable standard of comparison in affairs of this kind. On the other hand Justice Munroe said—and I quote from his report:

> It may be said that the recent wage settlements in the Quebec longshoring and St. Lawrence seaway disputes should govern my recommendation as to wage increases.

There is no doubt they would have governed any recommendations made by the Leader of the Opposition if he had been chairman of the board. But Justice Munroe went on to say:

> I think not. It should be noted that the employees affected by such settlements are not working in durable goods manufacturing industries; such settlements are not typical or representative of negotiated wage settlements for 1966 and 1967 in such industries or in industry in general; such settlements involved a relatively small number of employees and arose out of special circumstances and facts which are clearly distinguishable. It would, I think, be no more justifiable to consider such settlements as governing factors in my determination than it would be to say that other wage settlements of amounts less than my recommendation which involve larger numbers of employees, of which many examples could be cited, should govern.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In my view—

Added Judge Munroe

> —a national standard, not individual settlements or regional standards, is the proper standard to apply to the national railway industry whose employees live in remote hamlets and in metropolitan areas across Canada. The national standard of the earnings of durable goods employees, adjusted for the factors referred to in my 1964 report, remains, I think, as the sensible standard because those two groups of employees are the most nearly comparable. Such standards has the support of many years of jurisprudence. It would, I think, be unwise to abandon it at this time in the interests of expediency.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, the Chairman—a unanimous recommendation was not thought possible, indeed a majority report was not thought possible—made his own recommendations which would produce an average increase in earnings of more than 44 cents per hour over the two year period 1966-67.

Expressed in percentage terms this came to a 4 per cent increase effective January 1, 1966; a 4 per cent increase effective July 1, 1966; a 4 per cent increase effective January 1, 1967 and a 6 per cent increase effective

July 1, 1967, or a total increase during the two year period, beginning January 1, 1966, of 18 per cent.

Mr. Douglas: At the end of the two years.

Mr. Pearson: A total of 18 per cent at the end of 1967—18 per cent reached over two years. He also, of course, made recommendations for other benefits.

The nominee of the railways on the board rejected this increase as being too high for the railways to carry, and he recommended increases effective January 1, 1966 of 3.5 per cent, effective July 1, 1966 of 3 per cent, effective January 1, 1967, of 3 per cent, and effective July 1, 1967, of 3 per cent, or a total over that two year period, beginning January 1, 1966, of 12.5 per cent.

The nominee of the unions rejected the chairman's recommendations as being too low and he recommended, effective January 1, 1966, 6½ per cent plus 13 cents an hour, and effective January 1, 1967, 6 per cent plus 14 cents an hour, which would have averaged about 25 per cent, with provision for additional increases for certain skilled categories.

In board number 3, under Mr. Cameron, roughly, the same recommendations were made—in fact the same recommendations for wage increases were made as were made by Mr. Justice Munroe, and they proved also to be unacceptable to the unions and to the railroads.

It has been said, and I have to deal with this, Mr. Speaker, because of the charges that have been made, that the failure of these negotiations is largely due to the fact that the government had invited excessive wage demands by allegedly establishing a 30 per cent formula for the whole country in the settlement of the disputes with the longshoremen in Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec, and with the seaway employees.

There is of course, no such general formula, as Mr. Justice Munroe has pointed out; and to give the impression throughout the country that this has been established as a general formula by the government is, I think, both irresponsible and mischievous.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Established by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pearson: In the first months of 1966 there have been lower wage settlements than the two I have mentioned, and there have also been higher ones with which the government had nothing to do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which ones?

Mr. Pearson: I am thinking of the construction workers in Montreal in the spring of 1966, and the plumbing workers in the spring of 1966, who got increases, by negotiations between the employers and the employees, considerably higher than those granted in the two cases I have mentioned with which the government was concerned.

Let us look at the longshoremen's settlement in Montreal, which seemed to receive unanimous approval in the house the night it was introduced, but which has had nothing but criticism from members opposite since that time. The longshoremen were seasonal workers only, and in one area of Canada. There were about 4,200 workers involved and their employment averaged between eight and nine months a year. Further, a considerable proportion of them were part-time workers. Their wages were well below the construction workers in Montreal, and also well below those of longshoremen at Pacific ports. The average work period of these longshoremen was 28 hours a week in Montreal during the period of the year when they were working.

This wage settlement was accepted by the ship owners after a government commitment to introduce legislation setting up a commission which would make proposals for increased productivity in waterfront operations, and an experienced negotiator, Judge Lippe, recommended the settlement that was made. Also, that strike had lasted 38 days and the demand, both inside the house and outside, to end it was insistent.

The seaway employees' settlement—and I admit this was a direct government responsibility—concerned an international operation with Canadian employees. There were only 1,200 involved in that situation, with United States and Canadian employees working alongside each other in the same conditions of living and employment. The demand on this occasion was that in these circumstances the differential was unfair and should be removed—completely eliminated. In the settlement that was reached it was not eliminated; it was reduced.

I recall—and I am not saying this in a critical sense at all—that as recorded at page 6476 of Hansard for June 16 last, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) asked this question:

> Has the government made it clear to the seaway authority that there can be no possible objection to the workers on the Canadian side of the seaway being paid the same rates as those paid on the United States side?

And we could not make that perfectly clear because we did not admit that contention in the settlement that was made. The proposed increases to the seaway employees were recommended to the government by a government industrial inquiry commissioner, Senator MacKenzie, who also recommended them to the unions. The government did not impose that settlement. It accepted a recommendation of its mediator, which it had judged to be a fair and reasonable one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the charge that I have been dealing with was that government intervention in the longshoremen's dispute was responsible for the wage demands made in these recent negotiations, and I want to make one further important point in this connection. It is that when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) intervened in the dispute between the International Longshoremen's Association and the Shipping Federation of Canada on the night of June 11 and June 12, all the matters in dispute at that time had been agreed on by the parties except three, and these three did not concern wages.

One was a provision for a four hour guarantee for each recall of gangs, similar to the guarantee for initial call; the second was overtime of 40 cents an hour commencing January 1, 1966, and the third concerned arrangements for calling members of gangs over the week end for early Monday morning.

When I was called in on January 13 point No. 3 had been cleared away, and the only points which remained for settlement, although they were sticky points, were the first two points I have mentioned, and did not concern hourly wage figures at all. Those had previously been agreed upon. Agreement was reached on these last two points by the I.L.A. accepting the application of the 40 cent increase to all hourly work since January, 1966, regular or overtime, and the shipping federation accepting the four hour guarantee on recall of gangs on the understanding that this matter would be studied by the commission of inquiry which was to be set up.

So, far from imposing a wage level on that particular negotiation, that wage level had been agreed on by the two parties before the government was called in to clear up the remaining three points which did not concern wage levels. I have been waiting for some time to make that point clear.

Now, there was a good deal of talk this afternoon about and, understandably, there will be a good deal of consideration given to the matter of job security in the bill which we are now considering, and perhaps in the subsequent legislation dealing with the railways. This legislation I believe was considered by the five boards to be one of primary importance. On the Munroe board, the union representative asked for a work stablilization agreement with a job security fund. The chairman, Judge Munroe, thought more use should be made of the job security fund which was established following the 1962 negotiations, and which provided for protection for long service employees. He also pointed out that conditions have been improved by recently enacted legislation regarding training and assistance to displaced workers.

The report of Judge Little's two boards dealt with job security at greater length than it dealt with some of the other matters referred to. These two reports, which are in identical terms, in so far as this matter is concerned, are in almost identical terms to certain conclusions of the Freedman report in respect of the successful mediation of current disputes, and disputes in the future.

According to Judge Little's boards—and these are reports signed by all three members of the boards—there were three basic principles involved, in addition to the question of job security. The first question was the railways right, on due notice to the union, to determine and effect technological innovations, both major and minor, where the rights of employees might be adversely effected. The second question was negotiation between the union and the railway of the protective conditions to apply to each and every employee affected in each case. The third point was the modus operandi of resolving such protective conditions in the absence of mutual agreement. The union and railway representatives who appeared before these two boards agreed on one and two above.

I think it is of very great significance that on a board of this kind the railway representative did agree—as he did—to points one and two, and point two deals with negotiation between the union and the railway of the protective conditions to apply to each and every employee affected in each case. They recognize the right of negotiation in changes of this kind. They were not able, however, to agree on point three which dealt with what should be done if they could not reach agreement.

The union representative favoured the retention of the right to strike if negotiation failed. The railway representative favoured—and I quote—final and binding impartial determination, by an arbitrator, if there were such failure. It was apparent, said Judge Little's reports, that the union did not expect this issue to be resolved by the normal processes of collective bargaining and was convinced that the only solution was by way of legislation. The boards then decided that no useful purpose would be served by a specific recommendation. "We believe," the reports say, "that the differing viewpoints will not be resolved by negotiation. The only alternative therefore is legislation." But they added:

> We trust that, when the ultimate decision is made in this regard, those making it will bear in mind the broad implications which it will undoubtedly have for many industries and commodities and will accordingly look beyond the interests of the parties hereto and the mere settlement of one industrial dispute.

Mr. Speaker, the serious study of the Freedman report which is now being made is being conducted with this in mind. The implications for industry generally, and which are of far reaching significance, are being, and must be, taken into account in this study. There must be no unnecessary delay in this work. We must press ahead with it, as we are; but adequate time is required for study because of the great and general importance of the issue at stake. I hope it will not be long before the government will be able to make a report to parliament as a result of the studies which have been made. Changes in working conditions which affect job security represent a vital problem to the worker. It is hoped that difficulties can be resolved in the processes of collective bargaining.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to spend a few minutes on the events leading up to the reassembling of parliament. Although the government did not formally intervene in the work of any of these boards until the boards had reported and the decision taken to call a strike, there had been very useful informal discussions—very serious and useful ones—with the railway union leaders before August 22. I had the privilege of presiding at one of those discussions.

When the decision to strike was taken on August 22—which strike was to begin four days later—the government, as the house knows, intervened formally and immediately. The decision was taken at noon on August 22. That afternoon I wired the parties concerned and proposed mediation through the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister allow a question? Was he not informed of the strike date on Sunday evening, on his return from New Brunswick?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; I was not informed, nor was the decision taken, until noon Monday. The right hon. gentleman this afternoon used the date of August 21 as the date on which we were informed. That does not happen to be accurate. That was the week end which, according to him, I was loafing around Campobello. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, to being an indolent person, but on that Saturday I had work to do in the morning and I flew to Campobello in the afternoon and spent the evening with the Premier of New Brunswick. I spent the following day with the President of the United States and returned to Ottawa in the evening. I spent part of the evening attending a meeting of the strike committee of the cabinet.

That was not exactly a lost week end, Mr. Speaker. I would have been much happier if I could have been spending that week end fishing out in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had the opportunity of going to Saskatchewan and did not take advantage of it.

Mr. Pearson: When the decision was made Monday morning—and we received notice of it at noon—I wired the parties at once and proposed mediation. That offer was accepted. Many things began at once, with which the Minister of Labour was acquainted. At this point perhaps I may be permitted to mention the skilled and valuable assistance that was given by the deputy minister of labour, Mr. Wilson. If I may, I should like to pay a tribute to the deputy minister and other officials in his department who had a very busy summer.

The effort on both sides was and remains, sincere and genuine; there was good will as well as frankness. But the time was so short, and the situation such that no settlement could be reached before the strike date, though a better understanding was reached and some points were cleared up.

Even after the strike began mediation continued, and will continue while this legislation is being considered, in the hope that an agreement might be reached which, even at this last moment, would make it unnecessary. The negotiators on both sides are Canadians who are very conscious of the national interest and the national welfare, as well as the interests of those whom they have been chosen to represent.

I conclude my remarks by giving a short explanation of the bill, as I think I am bound to do, Mr. Speaker. It will of course be dealt with in greater detail by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) either later in this debate or during the committee stage.

The essential provision of the bill is the provision for the immediate resumption of railway services now suspended by the strike. This discharges the primary duty of the government to maintain essential services. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this is the reason why parliament has been called into session.

Equally important, the bill provides for the resumption of negotiations between the parties and reactivates the normal procedures of collective bargaining. The bargaining will be aided by what we hope will be the passage of new railway legislation placing the railways in a more competitive earning position, and by the assurance that the study of the Freedman report is being processed to the point that there will be specific recommendations for the government and from the government before long.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we regret very much that there has not been legislation of this kind in effect in recent years. It would have been easier to conduct these negotiations had that been the case. The right hon. gentleman opposite must understand our difficulty, because in 1960 when he was speaking to the house about railway difficulties at that time, and a strike which had been set by the railway unions, he pointed out that it was then 1960 and that during a six month postponement of the strike it would be possible to receive a report of a commission, and action would then make it possible for the railways to meet increased charges by changes which would be made in their freight rate structure. That was in 1960. I should point out that since that time this government came into office, specifically in 1963, and proposed legislation to this effect was placed on the order paper. This was not brought before the house in 1963, but in 1964 it was debated and the subject matter of a railway bill was sent to the committee where it was very constructively debated for a considerable period of time. It was perfectly clear in 1964 that the bill, as drafted, would not pass the house.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been revised and a lot of discussion has taken place. These revisions are contained in the bill which is now before the house, and in legislation which I previously indicated would be brought before the house during this autumn session.

Let me return to my explanation of the bill now before us. The railways and the unions are required under the bill to continue their negotiations with a view to the settlement of all matters presently in dispute between them. The collective agreements which expired at the end of 1965 are extended until December 31, 1967.

The bill provides that the Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator, or mediators, and he will be in a position to do that immediately this bill is dealt with by the house. These mediators shall endeavour to settle the questions in dispute between the railway companies and the unions. This mediation process will be given until November 15 of this year to bring about an agreement between the parties. A report must be received by the Minister of Labour not later than that date. There is provision, however, for the the continuation of mediation after November 15 if the report shows that favourable progress is being made in negotiations.

The bill makes it possible, as a last resort, as the 1958 bill made it possible, for the governor in council to refer any unresolved matters to a board of three arbitrators. The bill also provides that the governor in council may make regulations to give effect to the decision of the arbitration board. Any decision of this board of arbitrators would be incorporated in the collective agreement, but the parties would of course be free to agree to vary or amend any of the terms of agreement set by the board of arbitrators.

If, which I hope will not be the case, the government should find it necessary to appoint this board of arbitrators, the regulation by order in council establishing the board will be laid before this house not later than five days after the day the regulation is made. In this respect the present bill differs from the 1958 bill, which made no provision of that kind for recognition of parliamentary control over an order in council.

This regulation, as I have just mentioned, would become effective on the tenth sitting day of parliament after the day the regulation is laid before the house, unless before that day the regulation were to be revoked by the house by way of a notice of motion. The mechanics of tabling and of revocation are set forth in the bill.

It is therefore, Mr. Speaker, a very important feature of this bill that the parties are left free to negotiate, with the help of a mediator, and that, if any arbitration is necessary, it will only be instituted by the government subject to an overriding veto of the House of Commons.

The bill includes provision to safeguard the right of the employees now on strike to return to work without fear of being discharged from their employment or disciplined in any other way because of their participation in strike action.

The bill provides for the immediate withdrawal of the notice given by union representatives to their employees calling the strike, which will become invalid when this bill becomes law.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for an immediate increase in the rate of wages in the amount of 4 per cent effective January 1, 1966 and an additional 4 per cent effective July 1, 1966. As I have said, that can be varied, of course, as a result of the negotiation which will follow the passage of this bill.

Consequently, the employees who would resume their employment would be given an immediate increase for the year 1966—and this did not happen in 1960—without prejudice to the position of the parties to the negotiations that will continue to implement the collective agreement extended to December 31, 1967. The amount of the immediate increase represents the figure established by Mr. Justice Munroe and accepted by Mr. Justice Cameron for the year 1966 in the two conciliation board reports, presided over by those gentlemen. Any further change for 1966 and for 1967, as I have already indicated, would depend upon the results of the mediation or the arbitration specified in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, that is essentially the bill which is now before the house for consideration. I think it is a good, fair and reasonable bill and I hope it will commend itself to this house. I also hope that if and when this bill becomes law it will prove to be effective in bringing this strike to an end, because that is its purpose—to end the strike and to continue the process of negotiation in order to reach a fair and reasonable settlement between the workers and the railways, aided by mediation appointed by the government. I hope this will be assisted as a result of the legislation on railways which will be before the house if and when we dispose of this particular bill. In that spirit, Mr. Speaker, I commend this bill to the house and hope it will be effective in achieving the object we all have in mind, namely the ending of this strike.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is 16 years ago today that the then prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, had parliament recalled and introduced legislation with respect to a strike which had been in progress for a period of seven or eight days. Sixteen years thereafter to the day parliament, for the second time, is dealing with a strike that has been under way in this case some three days already. I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on many occasions throughout the years that he has been minister, leader of the opposition and Prime Minister, but I have never known him to labour, as he did on this occasion, in endeavouring to make some reasonable explanation for the dilatory uncertainty, the ineptitude, the chronic indifference of this government to the need of action, as was evident this evening as he spoke.

The Prime Minister recalled the four occasions on which the matter of strikes had been before parliament. He said—and with this view I agree—that Canada expects, all Canadians expect, that the strike will be brought to an end in a proper and equitable manner, fair to the nation and fair to labour. Indeed, I go further than that. Never in all the years that I have followed public affairs have I known a government to be criticized by its greatest admirers in the press for its failure to act before the strike took place. Why didn't they act? Why this attitude of waiting around and hoping that something would turn up. It is because, sir, this government has lost all sense of proportion. Today we have a government that will not act unless forced to do so. It does not make so many mistakes, so long as it is thinking about these matters. It is when it finally makes a decision that the really serious mistakes are made.

Will this legislation in its present form bring an end to the strike? Will the Prime Minister say that as a result of the informal discussions which he and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) had with labour representatives, the labouring men covered by these agreements, those working on the railways, are prepared to return to work on the basis of clause 6(b), which provides as follows:

—each basic daily rate in effect on December 31, 1965, established by or pursuant to the agreement in the case of an agreement binding or entered into on behalf of operating employees by 4 per cent effective January 1, 1966, and an additional 4 per cent effective July 1, 1966.

The actual increase will be 6 per cent. That is an interesting figure when one begins to realize the degree to which the 6 per cent bank interest rate has caused difficulty in recent months. Will the men go back to work? Those in the Liberal party used to be the six bucks boys. We remember them. Now they are the 6 per cent boys. They are offering to the workers far less than was actually offered or suggested by the conciliation board. I ask again: Will these men go back to work? We want them to go back to work. Their families want them to go back to work. The families of many are having difficulty living in a reasonable and decent way because of the inflationary trends in this country.

Mr. Hamilton: Caused by Pearson.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Caused by the degree to which the dollar falls and falls in purchasing power and the government fails to do anything. When we ask for action, the answer from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is always accompanied by that beatific smile. Here it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And he says, "We are looking into this matter." I can see the smile now on the face of the former minister of finance. How he must laugh at what is happening today. He had his difficulties, but they were almost heavenly compared to the difficulties of his successor—and both were equally successful.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With those few generous words, I want to ask this government: Do you ask parliament to say to men, "You shall work" and at the same time say, "You shall work for an increase of 6 per cent"? No amount of evasive circumlocution on the part of the Prime Minister can get away from the fact that he and his government made 30 per cent and 34 per cent the basic increase in keeping with present day conditions. That is what they did. They boasted about the tremendous achievement that had been brought about. Ordinary mortals could not do it.

There were difficulties. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) laboured and brought forth a mouse; but when the Prime Minister got hold of that problem, it grew to 31 to 34 per cent. I say to the Prime Minister that he and his government are responsible in large measure for the tremendous undercurrent within this nation today, for anxiety about the government's uncertainty and, above all, their capacity for achieving settlements. Will the men who are affected go back to work? Parliament has the right to know and to receive an assurance on that. Parliament must not be asked to pass legislation and then find itself challenged. If that ever takes place, this nation will face a situation dangerous to the people as a whole, and completely destructive of parliament. When laws are passed, whether we agree with them or not, those laws are the law of the land.

Are we in parliament to be asked to pass legislation decreeing a 6 per cent increase without knowing what the reaction will be, not of a few people but of many? I said this afternoon, and I have no reason to withdraw it this evening: People who work are generally law abiding. The government speaks of 6 per cent and compulsory arbitration. It is easy to pass laws, but unless they have the support of the people, they will have the effect of adding to the psychology of lawlessness that is more and more becoming an attribute of some democracies.

I implore the Prime Minister to ask the Minister of Labour to tell the house whether this will be accepted. Does he say it is fair? Does he say it is reasonable? If we are going to pass legislation of this kind, we have to have behind it the whole power of the thinking of parliament.

I am not familiar with the operation of unions. The minister of manpower is present; he is familiar with these matters. A week ago Sunday he announced at a political meeting in the province of Quebec that there could be no compulsory arbitration. Both he and the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) are authorities on labour for others. They belong or did belong to a great union which today is challenging national unions through raids for membership, holding out the expectation and hope that with two outstanding members in the cabinet it is better to belong to such a union if you want to get things done. I am glad there is no competition there because everybody said the hon. gentleman is one of those who leads or who has led the competition. If the hon. gentleman is experienced in such matters and wishes to speak, I will give him an opportunity to do so. But let me ask the minister of manpower how will union leaders explain the fact that 6 per cent is good enough, when he was a member of a government which gave its approval and wholehearted support to an increase of 31 to 34 per cent?

That is where the trouble began. I have no doubt whatever, and I have reason to believe this is entirely correct, that if it had not been for the Prime Minister's monkeying with the processes of conciliation in connection with the seaway workers and the longshoremen there would have been no difficulty in securing agreement in so far as the railway unions are concerned.

It is obvious that this nation is in a critical position; but parliament cannot allow itself to be pushed around by a prime minister or a government which, having created a situation and failed to act, now comes before the House of Commons and contends: Whatever our mistakes, our dilatoriness, we now need to pass legislation; the situation is serious. Was it not serious ten days ago? Was it not recognized in every part of this country for several months that there was going to be a strike? If anybody challenges this, I have here some excerpts from Liberal newspapers across Canada, which, without exception, have been warning this government. I do not know what is required to wake this government. Is there something to awaken the lethargy of a government which has refused to act? They have postponed action and procrastinated, and when they finally found themselves in difficulties they have called parliament.

We want to act as responsible members of this nation. Did we not have the right to ask the government, as we have over and over again, to do something? However, I do not know whether what is being done is part of the new Liberal program, under which the Liberals are seeking more labour support and wooing the unions with a newsletter. I do not have time to go into that, Mr. Speaker, but this is courtship of a high variety. In the labour newsletter the Prime Minister is speaking to ordinary men. The heading in the Globe and Mail indicates that the unions are being wooed with a newsletter. Was that part of the preparatory course?

The wooing of any group of Canadians is not in keeping with government responsibility. You do not do it by having the members of the cabinet committee dealing with a labour dispute away on the week end when things are serious. It is laudable to go fishing. I would like to have heard what President Johnson said to the Prime Minister and what the Prime Minister said to him with regard to this question, because the other day the President said he was talking to the leader of a country who said to him, "I only wish I could keep things under control the way you do". The cost of living in Canada is mounting faster than in the United States, yet no action has been taken. It is a frightful commentary when a Prime Minister comes before parliament, on bended knee and says, in effect: Do something to get me out of this.

We want the railways in operation. The economy of Canada is being damaged. A very influential writer has said the government thought a strike would not do any harm if it lasted a week or ten days. A lady, writing in Le Devoir has said the government secured information as to the point to which a strike would not be economically harmful. This afternoon we heard words of warning, sage and strong, brought forward by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse). What about the prairie wheat situation? What about the export situation across Canada? I say this to the government: We offered you co-operation ten days or two weeks ago. We joined with the press across Canada in asking you to convene parliament before the strike began.

What is there in this bill that you could not have had after it became clear there was going to be a strike? Why did you not act? What was the reason? I can only conclude the reason was that you did not particularly care, and you possibly believed if there was a strike it would get you out of your difficulties.

I read now in translation from the article in Le Devoir dated August 25 and written by Evelyn Dumas-Gagnon:

> According to a confidential report submitted to the cabinet a rail strike will surely be serious, but the country's economy can support it rather easily for a week or even for two weeks.

What was the attitude of the government? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) said on August 22 that he hoped the work stoppage could be reduced to a minimum of days. What a hopeless attitude to take. I have already mentioned what the proposed minister of manpower said at Nicolet on August 21. I say, Mr. Speaker, this government stands convicted of a careless disregard of the national interest by not convening parliament.

They are always expecting to do something. Job security is one thing that affects labour men everywhere. They are frightened that automation will reduce or perhaps remove their jobs. This has been the situation during the last two years. Tonight the Prime Minister says: We have ideas on this subject but we are not going to tell you at this time. We have a right to know so that labouring men across Canada will know what the policy is. I look over there at the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), a man with wide international experience, and I can just imagine how he feels after what he said in 1960. I think I ought to recall that to him. I do so, of course, with that natural diffidence that he always displays. What did he say? Well, in 1960, the matter was before the house. We introduced legislation to stop the strike before it started. The Prime Minister has said we had lots of time; he had plenty of time too.

I repeat what I said this afternoon. My information is the Prime Minister was told by labour leaders on Sunday night, August 21, that the strike would start on Friday next. They knew officially on the Monday. The Minister of Labour, in a very attractive television appearance, admitted he knew unofficially on Sunday.

Mr. Nicholson: I did not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I have the record here and I should like to read it for the benefit of the house. I must say it is broken into a lot of sections. They knew and they failed to act. What did they do in 1960? On that occasion the Prime Minister of today said:

> What we are faced with in this legislation is compulsory—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the right hon. gentleman give me the page, please?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will always give you the page.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to follow the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I quote:

> What we are faced with in this legislation is compulsory action—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I think we are entitled to have the reference.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order; I understand that the Minister of Transport is raising a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is that when a reference is made to Hansard it is a courtesy to give the page number so that hon. members may follow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true, and if I can approximate the page, I think he can find it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We know how accurate the right hon. gentleman is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the reference; it is page 349. The minister has the book opened at the right page. You never ask a question unless you know the answer. I continue to quote from page 349:

> What we are faced with in this legislation is compulsory action, compulsory implementation of a minority report.

Then, he goes on to speak about the powers of those who sit opposite today. I continue to quote:

> In the first place, I think we would have been more successful than the government has been in settling this dispute through discussion and agreement.

• (9:30 p.m.)

This is when they were thinking about it. With the responsibility they have today, we now have an answer for that. He continued:

> If, however, we had not been successful in our intervention in settling this dispute by negotiation or agreement, what would we have done in that situation after negotiations between the two parties had broken down? I shall be happy to put on the record what we would have done.

It is interesting to find the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) reading that page because he is realizing how incongruous was the argument of the Prime Minister a few minutes ago.

> First, we would have introduced legislation which would have made this strike unnecessary—

The Prime Minister forgot that, though the Minister of Transport is now studying this particular page of Hansard.

> —because we agree with the Minister of Labour that it is impossible to contemplate the unhappy consequences of a railway strike at this time. Second, we would have based that legislation on the report of the conciliation board, because we do not believe that parliament should compel men to continue to work for wages which are lower than the conciliation board found to be fair and reasonable—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: You gave them nothing at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why, then, is there no incorporation of the conciliation board report for January 1, 1967 and July 1, 1967?

Third, we would not provide for any subsidy at this time, because—

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman has left a lot out.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

—we believe the railways to be in a position to pay the increased wages for the period until the royal commission on transportation makes its report—the Prime Minister has said that that will be by the end of March—and until the government is then in a position to review the whole problem of railway finances in the light of the actions which have been taken. That is how the Liberal opposition would have prevented this strike and in doing so have given justice to the employees without, in our view, prejudicing the position of the railways.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the right hon. gentlemen would permit me to ask him a question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: Sit down, Jack, and make your speech later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege, sir.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will allow the hon. gentleman to ask his question when I have concluded.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question of privilege is a very simple one. When the house is given what purports to be a quotation from Hansard, it should be given in full.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman carefully omitted certain of the words from this paragraph, as has happened on many occasions in the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the usual interruption from the hon. gentleman. When he realizes that he has not any argument, then he brings along one of these phony smokescreens. He will have every opportunity to review and deal in detail with what I have to say, and I expect he will, but I hope more successfully than his leader.

Now, a moment ago I mentioned the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As reported at page 371, of Hansard, he said:

Mr. Speaker, I have followed carefully the remarks made by the Prime Minister yesterday, his observations over television last night, and the third instalment of his speech in this house this afternoon. I wish to say at the outset that the position stated by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday was clear and precise.

So he gives approval to what the Prime Minister of today said on that occasion.

We say this strike should have been prevented.

Those are the strong words of a man who knows his labour problems at first hand.

We would have made sure that a strike would have been unnecessary instead of implementing a minority report, as the government is doing. We would have provided a settlement based on the majority report of the conciliation board which was accepted by the railway workers.

Was the present report accepted by the railway workers?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How much did you give them in 1960?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are dealing with today.

Mr. Starr: We negotiated it and achieved it through collective bargaining.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman settled this almost as completely as he settled some international problems recently. He went on:

For these reasons, if we had been in office, there would have been no strike but there would have been a fair settlement.

These are the people who today occupy the treasury benches.

Mr. Starr: And we have a strike.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are the people who knew how to settle these matters. They now come before parliament. Instead of having parliament meet, as parliament could have met last Wednesday and Thursday, they waited.

Now, sir, the Prime Minister went into some detail regarding the manner in which the government had dealt with this question. Therefore I think I ought to put on the record the balance sheet of pussyfooting by this government.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

On October 28, 1965, in view of the contracts expiring on December 31, three negotiating committees were formed by the unions. In November the railway workers submitted their proposals to the companies. On December 31, 1965 the contracts expired, the companies making no counter proposals on monetary clauses because they said that the cost would be too high.

In mid-March of 1966 the three negotiating committees for the railwaymen asked for conciliation. While all this was going on, the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), made suggestions in the house as to what should be done. There was no response.

On July 6 there were issued the two Munroe reports, that of the non-operatives and the associated shop workers, which were immediately rejected by the union leaders, who called for a strike vote with a recommendation by the leaders that a strike be approved.

On August 11 we had the Cameron report, and immediately the union leaders said a strike should be called in that connection. On August 15 the Little report on the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen was made public. In fact, there were two reports, one for C.N.R. employees and the other for C.P.R. employees. Both sets of employees took a stand against the respective reports and called for strike votes.

On August 17, at a press conference, the Prime Minister informed the nation that the cabinet had the situation well in hand—I ask, whose hand?—and that an ad hoc cabinet committee had been sitting for some time and was preparing plans for every eventuality.

On August 18 and 19 the strike committee sat. On Friday the 19th the Prime Minister's office said that the situation was well in hand, and that the committee has been asked to reconvene on Monday; that a cabinet meeting would be held, if necessary, on Tuesday. What a record of dilatoriness, failure to act, and pretence. Now he comes before parliament and says: "It is a frightful position we are in." And it is. I say again, through you, sir, to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet: You are the ones who made it so.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

In 1960 the Prime Minister said that he could not accept the bill that was presented. I quote from page 350 of Hansard of that year:

> In passing, therefore, from collective bargaining, as we are doing in this bill, to the prevention of a strike by legislation by imposing a compulsory settlement—though perhaps it will be only a temporary one, it is a compulsory settlement—the government is asking parliament to take the responsibility for the scale of wages and the conditions of work of these workers.

Well, sir, there is the situation. I want to refer to the 1960 bill so that there will be no mistake as to its provisions. We pointed out at that time that it was not compulsory arbitration, and every one of the ministers who sits opposite today, who was in the house at that time, voted against it.

What a change in six years. We stopped the strike by our action. The present government has acted as though it did not mind if there was a strike or not. When I listened to the Prime Minister on his national broadcast, I could only conclude that he was trying to find someone to blame for the government's shortcomings. He blamed it on labour; he blamed it on everybody else: Physician, heal thyself.

Sir, the Prime Minister voted against the legislation in 1960; so did the Minister of Transport; so did several other ministers who are today in the house. What manner of consistency is this? Why did they take that stand?

We have been consistent throughout, in our views. In 1950, when 16 years ago today Prime Minister St. Laurent introduced the legislation, he described the national position as being a national emergency. We at that time took a strong stand against compulsory arbitration. We have not seen fit in the passing years to alter that stand.

An hon. Member: It was 15.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, what do you expect will happen when employees find themselves caught in spiralling inflation. In the face of the galloping reduction of the buying power of the dollar where are the workers, those who have fixed incomes to find help?

That is why I said the other day, and I still say, that before we leave here the government must act. Does any one of the ministers sitting opposite realize that in every part of this nation people are aroused over the cost of living? Go down to the market. The farmer is not getting the additional amount. Who is getting that layer of fat, as prices go up, up and up?

I suggested this afternoon that in view of the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces, a conference should be called at once. It could be called. I am sure the provincial governments are aware of the serious situation and of the need of joint action. Unless action is taken we will face over and over again, in increasing measure, the serious consequences which in the past few months have made Canada a country of continuing strikes. There is not a word about this from over there; we just have generalities. We want to know what you are going to do.

Are new arrangements to be made in regard to labour relations? If so, let us act. Could there not be set up by parliament a labour law commission to recommend and have as a responsibility the task of updating and revising labour laws by agreement? On June 13 I suggested that the government set up a commission to review in detail the general position created in employer-employee relations by reason of technological change which I described as a matter of prime importance in connection with the various disputes which are arising. The Prime Minister answered, as reported at page 6299 of Hansard:

> The matter mentioned by my right hon. friend is, of course, one of very great and continuing significance, as we have learned—if we needed to learn—from the dispute that we have been discussing. It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that if the house requires an opportunity to discuss this particular dispute, this will be one of the elements that we will be discussing. I quite agree that it should be considered in its wider context. I think it would be the feeling of the house that the government would give consideration to an examination of the kind suggested by my right hon. friend.

What about the MacPherson royal commission recommendations? They had not been thought of as a possibility until the last few days, according to the Minister of Labour.

The general railway bill, I am glad to hear, will be placed before a committee of the house; for some of these provisions, if carried into effect, would bring about continuing discrimination for all time to come against the western and maritime provinces.

An hon. Member: It is not the maritime provinces at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are not going to settle strike difficulties, and their basic causes, by toughness. You must be fair and reasonable. That is principle number two. Is a 6 per cent increase fair and reasonable?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish the right hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him one question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not think he would.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. It is not because the hon. gentleman has any question which would give any difficulty; it is simply that I want to teach him decorum.

• (9:50 p.m.)

In connection with the recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe, what does the government intend to do about the employee benefit plan? Is the government not prepared to make some allowances? At the present time the employees pay 50 per cent. Is there any reason why they should have to pay that? In connection with life insurance they receive $1,500 in insurance. They have asked for $2,500. The Munroe report recommended $2,000. What is the attitude of the government? Surely some of these questions are worthy of consideration. What about holidays? The railwaymen have a maximum of three weeks holidays after 15 years of service. What is the government going to do about that? When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) speaks I hope he will be able to clarify these dark corners.

What about sick leave? What attitude do hon. gentlemen opposite take on this subject? These are some of the questions which deserve to be clarified and understood, because—and I say this with all the force at my command—when you secure from parliament the power to say to a person "you must work", fairness demands that consideration be shown to the person so directed.

I should like to see a federal labour fact finding commission to be made up of qualified, experienced persons from within the ranks of labour, management and government—which would have the function of providing the basic information upon which negotiations could proceed. This board would be permanently constituted and would produce facts and figures dealing with the relationship between any given industry and the general economy. Such a board, if it had been set up prior to the start of these negotiations would have provided both employer and employees with analyses and reports related to the agreements, without in any way limiting the field of bargaining; it would lay down guide lines within which bargaining would be easier to carry out.

If this were done there would not be the delay which has taken place in this case since December of 1965. When negotiations get under way a great deal of the preliminary work normally done by a conciliation board would be already completed, thus shortening the present time-consuming conciliation process.

Present conciliation procedures are often time wasting and frustrating, and I place this suggestion before the house in the hope that the government may give consideration to establishing a body such as this which would operate continuously, making available full economic and statistical information to both labour and industry at all times.

Now, sir, I say through you to the government that the answer given by the Prime Minister, the defence, the apologia, will not satisfy anybody. It was carefully put together, replete with apologies and alibis. But apologies and alibis do not fill dinner pails.

Mr. Pickersgill: They did not have a dinner pail then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the opposition of that day, now the government, moved an amendment. I wonder whether they recall it.

An hon. Member: Forgotten it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly not the Minister of Transport, because he has the document before him. But do the others recall it? I intend to read that amendment. Remember, these are the people, now sitting opposite, who condemned us for stopping a strike before it began.

Mr. Pickersgill: And giving the workers nothing.

Mr. Starr: They got everything: They got collective bargaining.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today they are to get 6 per cent from the successors of the six-buck boys. What did they do in 1960 when we preserved this nation from a strike and, after a period of time, were able to secure agreement? The Prime Minister says he hopes we will act with the same responsibility as he and those associated with him did. What did they do? They moved an amendment, as recorded in Hansard at page 350—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The right hon. gentleman was speaking, and these were his words:

Therefore, so there will be no misunderstanding or mistake about the attitude of the Liberal opposition, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier, the following amendment: "This house declines to proceed with the second reading of a bill the provisions of which establish a compulsory and discriminatory wage freeze for railway employees contrary to the recommendation for a wage increase made by a board of conciliation appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: No freeze this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are they boasting over there about what they are doing with their 6 per cent, having recently given 31 per cent and their approval of it? Do they boast today about the 6 per cent they provide? Do they boast about the provisions for compulsory arbitration which are set out in detail within this bill?

This is a measure which constitutes the worst kind of compulsory legislation. Let us read what it says. Clause 9(1) provides as follows:

The Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator—

I shall leave out the other words.

—who shall forthwith endeavour to mediate the matters in dispute between the railway companies and the unions and to bring about agreement between them and who shall report to the Minister of Labour, not later than November 15, 1966, on the progress of the negotiations between the railway companies and the unions.

Well, my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Starr) asked for the appointment of a mediator in June. He said, act. But while fear and frustration operated, the government did nothing. Now they come along and say: Appoint a mediator.

Reading further in clause 9, we find this:

(2) If the mediator reports to the Minister of Labour that favourable progress in negotiations has been made, the governor in council may direct the mediator to continue mediation and to make a further report to the Minister of Labour at such time as the governor in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, may direct.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Then clause 10 reads:

On the recommendation of the Minister of Labour . . . the governor in council may make regulations

(a) for referring to a board of three arbitrators appointed by the governor in council . . . such matters relating to the revision or amendment of the collective agreements to which this act applies as the parties thereto may request or as the governor in council may deem expedient—

What is that but compulsory arbitration of the worst kind?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was exactly the same in your bill of 1958.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish you would get over that Smallwood approach. Clause 10 continues:

(b) providing for the powers of the board of arbitrators appointed under paragraph (a), the procedure to be followed for the purposes of arbitration, the form in which decisions of the board shall be set forth and for giving effect to any decision of that board, or by the chairman of the board where no majority decision is reached.

(2) In the event that a board of arbitrators is appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) and decides any matter not agreed upon between a railway company and a union at the time of its decision, the collective agreement to which this Act applies between the railway company and the union shall be deemed to be amended by the incorporation therein of such decision, but nothing in this section shall be deemed to limit or restrict the rights of parties—

Sir, in 1950, the government of which some hon. members opposite formed a part, imposed compulsory arbitration. Again tonight, as so often in the past, the Prime Minister gave vocal support to the maintenance of collective bargaining while at the same time bringing in compulsory legislation that would not have been necessary if the government had acted in time.

Sir, it is ten o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the hon. gentleman speaks, Mr. Speaker, may I recall that I said to the Minister of Transport I would be glad to answer his questions. I am ready.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, since the opposition have indicated their desire to get on with this debate I would ask if the house would consent to permitting the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, don't give me any particular grace.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be unanimous consent for that, because this is a very urgent situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to note at last that the Prime Minister regards this as an urgent situation. He delayed, and dillied and dallied for months, but I am very glad that at last tonight he realizes the seriousness of the situation.

Mr. Pearson: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the right hon. gentleman who has the floor has called it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION—PROTESTS RESPECTING LACK OF BILINGUAL R.C.M.P. OFFICERS

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to remind the proper authorities of the presence in Canada of a French Canadian population. At the time I asked it, my question had to do with the National Capital Commission and unilingual members of the R.C.M.P.

It happens quite often that French Canadians from Quebec or other provinces come here, in the Ottawa-Hull area, and cannot speak to the authorities in their own language even though our constitution recognizes bilingualism, especially within the central government.

Now, we have been behindhand for many years. If we stress that fact, it is neither through ill will nor through discrimination but to find a positive way of making Canada a pleasant country to live in, where the two cultures and the two nations feel equal, especially in this Canadian Mecca, the federal capital, the Ottawa-Hull area. Mr. Speaker, if we raise this question periodically, it is because we would like the government to settle it permanently instead of always putting off its solution indefinitely. It would be easy for two great cultures closer to one another. Well, I am quite willing to give the hon. member for Lotbinière credit for his aspirations and enthusiasm, but I would much prefer to see constructive action, especially as far as this area where we live is concerned. You will find here citizens from all parts of the present government to act along those lines. In various circumstances, it has been said both here and outside the house that the government is in favour of that idea. I recall that during the debate on a bill dealing with culture, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) identified the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) as the man who would galvanize the future of Canada and bring the Canada, from Halifax to Vancouver, and it is most pleasant to live here and to get to know one another. However, we would like the culture and the language of the two great nations to be considered on an equal footing here, in the Ottawa-Hull area.

As far as the R.C.M.P. is concerned, one must not be afraid to state the facts. There have been difficult technical problems and it is quite possible that French Canadians who joined the force in the past with certain aspirations failed to demand that their rights be respected. They realized that to go up within the R.C.M.P., they had to refrain from speaking French, they had to speak English and accept the general understanding that they abandon their language and forego their characteristic.

Today, however, in view of the new dynamism of the French Canadian people which was so concretely expressed in the new orientation taken by Quebec, which seeks to work with the whole of Canada instead of separating from it, we would like the federal government to act. I do not know which minister will reply, but I would like to get a precise answer.

We are often given evasive replies in the house. We always have to come back on the same subjects to get explanations and details. Why could we not, once and for all, get from the responsible minister or the parliamentary secretary an assurance, a firm and definite statement in that respect? I see that the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) is in his seat. He is probably the one who will answer. Well, I hope that for once we will be given in good faith a clear and accurate statement concerning bilingualism within the R.C.M.P. and the assurance that immediate steps will be taken to give the French speaking population the prerogatives to which they are entitled at the federal level of administration.

We do not have the feeling that we are asking for something which is out of the ordinary. We only demand that the rights of French Canadians be respected. Our group does not feel superior to the other but wants to have its own say.

I have often had the opportunity of putting written or oral questions to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) whom I see in his seat. I have also asked questions of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) concerning veterans hospitals but tonight the R.C.M.P. is involved. When can we get a straight answer, a firm policy, an effective policy, here in Ottawa?

When can we obtain justice, when will we achieve equality of the two great cultures?

• (10:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to remind him that his allotted time has now expired.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say that I commend the hon. member for the very moderate tone in which he has dealt with this important subject. I should in all fairness also put on the record the fact that the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) has raised the same point on numerous occasions with members of the government.

I am sure that we require more bilingual members in the R.C.M.P. not only to carry out important duties in the national capital, but elsewhere in Canada. We all agree that an increase in the number of bilingual members will make the R.C.M.P. a better force. At the present time we are supplying as many bilingual members as it is possible.

I am sure that the hon. member who raised this question will be encouraged by the fact that we have increased the amount of advertising in the French newspapers and periodicals in an effort to overcome this difficulty. In conclusion I am also certain that he shares with me the earnest hope that our efforts will be fruitful in this regard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF INTEGRATION MEASURES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to preface my very brief remarks before my analysis of this situation, let me assure the Minister of National Defence that it is indeed most urgent, notwithstanding the indication he has had as a result of a survey of men and officers. The indication I have received is quite to the contrary and represents something of the order of 1,733 communications received which oppose this general area of integration that is of concern.

Men in the service, particularly those in Halifax, largely belonging to the navy and to a lesser degree to the air force and army, require among other things a real assurance from the minister and the government that in the event of legislation being passed by this house which brings about integration in its fullest sense they will be free to decide either for or against re-enlistment without fear of financial, pension or other penalty which may result from re-enlistment on other than a free basis. These men should be free to make this decision because in their minds and in mine such action by this government would be tantamount to nothing less than conscription. The men in the armed forces are really concerned about this. The minister must demonstrate to them that integration will in fact bear out his two premises, first that it will bring about a more efficient armed force, and second that it will save money, which money the minister has indicated could be converted into capital equipment.

The minister must—and again this is a point that has been stressed in hundreds of communications—restore to the services the respect due to the office he holds. He must somehow use every force at his disposal to allay the growing fear and suspicion—and it is a voiced suspicion—that he is bent on pursuing a political course and not a defence one. He must permit those of us in the defence committee to conduct a detailed examination of the progress of full integration and unification to date. The men in the armed services are entitled to such an examination prior to the introduction in this house of legislation leading to integration and unification.

We were denied the opportunity to deal with the effects of integration because of the abandonment of the defence committee hearings some two weeks prior to the adjournment of the house. I might add that this action took place against the expressed wish of the steering committee of the defence committee.

I ask the minister, as I tried to do earlier in the house today, whether he will now advise the members of the house and the people of Canada, particularly those serving in the armed forces, when he will reconvene the defence committee and place before it the question of integration as it has taken place in the armed forces to date. I cannot stress the gravity and urgency that goes hand in hand with this decision.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the first piece of business to be handed to the defence committee this fall is the legislation dealing with integration, the minister will not be able to stop the flood of mail. I also suggest to him that the opinions expressed in this mail will be strongly reversed. I believe it is quite easy to understand why these men are reluctant to express their real and heartfelt feelings about the lack of communication with regard to integration, their loss of identity, and so on. These are meaningful things to the men in the armed forces. Very few of them—and I admit this—are opposed to integration in some form, to some extent. If the minister had not dealt in such a pragmatic way with such a vital area of concern I think he could have achieved the full support of the services.

Today he certainly does not enjoy the full support of the men serving in the Royal Canadian Navy. One of the ways in which he can achieve this is to start telling them what is taking place, why it is taking place, and to demonstrate to them that his premises are accurate. I do not believe them to be accurate and I believe that the sooner this matter is put before the defence committee for a proper and adequate hearing, the better.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) has the temerity to stand in his place and to say that the standing committee on defence was denied the opportunity to investigate the results of the integration processes today. They met for weeks and that was precisely what they did consider. At meeting after meeting, the commanders from the various commands expressed what the integration process had meant in terms of their command, the progress that had been made to date, the savings that had been made, and the savings and advantages which were anticipated in the future. My hon. friend should have asked his party to put him on that committee. I doubt that even yet he has read the evidence of all those meetings at which the commanders were present and at which they gave this report for which he is asking.

Mr. Lambert: There is nothing after June 22.

Mr. Hellyer: This was a full and complete report which by and large satisfied the committee that great progress had been made, that the integration plan has been implemented well so far, that it is on schedule, and that there are real advantages, both from the military standpoint and from the standpoint of saving the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money.

In reply to his suggestion or charge that this is a political operation I should remind him that this policy was laid down as government policy, as the policy of the government of the day, in a white paper presented in March, 1964. The reasons for the reorganization were given there. It was stated that the reorganization would commence with the integration at the headquarters and that this would be the first step toward a single, unified defence for Canada. This white paper was studied by the then special committee on defence and a unanimous report was made to this House of Commons in support of the general policy as outlined at that time.

For some people to make the discovery all of a sudden of what is intended, as if it were news to them, having failed to take into consideration the policy of the government as laid down at that time and as it has been implemented since, is surprising indeed and makes one wonder if as members of parliament they had been as diligent in their responsibility as they should be. I can assure my hon. friend that when the legislation is introduced in the House of Commons later this year and when it is referred to the committee on defence, full opportunity will be given for discussion, that the details of the plan will be outlined, that in the meantime they will have been made available to the members of the armed forces, and that there will be ample opportunity for all hon. members and all interested groups to study it, and to pass judgment in respect of it.

Mr. Forrestall: Are we to wait until Christmas?

Mr. Hellyer: I hope not and I hope the work of the house will be expedited to allow for consideration of this matter.

Mr. Lambert: May I raise a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker? The minister stated that the special committee on defence gave unanimous approval to the white paper. That is patently false. This was a majority report, and the minister is not aware of the views of various members of the committee. Therefore he cannot come forth in this house and say this was a unanimous report.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, August 30, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) presented the second report of the standing committee on northern affairs and national resources and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GEORGE VICTOR SPENCER—TABLING OF COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and French of the report of Mr. Justice Dalton Wells concerning George Victor Spencer.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY STRIKE—UNION POSITION RESPECTING PROPOSED LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say, after his meeting with the leaders of the railway unions this morning, whether those leaders expressed any acceptance of the bill now before the house? What was their reaction to that bill?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): As I indicated yesterday, the processes of mediation were continuing while we were discussing legislation in the house, and it was in connection with those processes that I had the privilege of meeting the union leaders last evening and again this morning to discuss current developments including, of course, the bill which is before the house. But I cannot say anything about those discussions at this moment.

Mr. Starr: Could the Prime Minister clarify the statement he made to the press after the meeting had adjourned, when he said "We have a better understanding of the situation"?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I meant I had a better understanding of the attitude of the union leaders toward certain matters under discussion.

[Later:]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the union leaders' reactions in the last few hours to the bill before us to end the strike I would ask the Minister of Labour, did the government consult railway management and union leaders on the terms of this legislation before presenting it to the House of Commons?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour discussed with leaders of the labour movement certain proposals that might be incorporated in legislation but certainly not the legislation itself. As to the railways management, I cannot speak with any authority on that matter. Possibly the Minister of Transport may have had some discussions with them in this same regard.

Mr. Grafftey: Did management and the union leaders give the government any information on which they based this legislation, which gave the government reasonable hope and assurance that it would be effective?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts as to whether this line of questioning is in order, particularly in view of the fact that this question refers specifically to legislation which is now before the house. It seems to me this is the type of question which might very well be asked when the house resumes consideration of the legislation.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER AT COMING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister on an entirely different subject; I may have something to say about the other subject later. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he is still planning to attend the prime ministers' conference and, if so, whether he is giving consideration to supporting mandatory sanctions against Rhodesia under the United Nations charter.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Whether I am able to attend this conference will depend on developments in the house and in the country in connection with the railway situation. I would regret very much, of course, if I were not able to go. In the circumstances I do not think I should say anything about what I might do if I were able to go, but before the conference opens there would be, I hope, an opportunity on orders of the day or on motions for whoever represents Canada to make a short statement.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I realize that the Prime Minister is most anxious to attend, and it is very desirable that he should be able to attend the prime ministers' conference. I want to say to the right hon. gentleman that anything we can do to make it possible for him to be there for a couple of days will be done; because, I suggest, his presence there is very necessary at a time when the future of the commonwealth might well be in jeopardy unless, in the collective wisdom of the prime ministers, a consensus is arrived at.

Mr. Pearson: I can only say I appreciate very much the attitude taken by the right hon. gentleman. I still hope it will be possible for me to attend this conference, even if for only a couple of days. His attitude, expressed this afternoon, will make this easier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—RECENT DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The right hon. Prime Minister had a recent meeting with the President of the United States in New Brunswick. Did any agreement come out of that meeting or those talks, with regard to Viet Nam or American involvement in Viet Nam or was there any discussion about inflation, which seems to be taking a permanent hold?

[Mr. Lewis.]

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was no occasion to reach any particular understanding at these meetings in regard to our position on Viet Nam and the United States position, because our position is well known to the United States and I think we understand their position. We did discuss many other subjects within the limited time available, some two and one-half hours, and one of these was inflationary dangers and pressures in both countries; because this is more than a national problem.

NATURAL GAS

ALTERNATIVE PROPOSALS FOR ACCESS TO U.S. MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who is the minister designate of energy and national resources. Has the government any alternative proposals to gain access to the United States markets that are denied to Canadian gas producers as a result of the government's decision not to allow the proposed southern route pipe line to be built? Further, has the government any proposals to compensate for the additional cost of delivering gas to central Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, it will not be up to the government but up to Trans-Canada to come forward with alternative proposals.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): As a supplementary question, has the minister received from the premier of Alberta an objection to the decision of the cabinet to reject the decision of the National Energy Board on this matter?

Mr. Pepin: Not personally, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

REPORTED OFFER OF LOW COST LOAN FOR B.C. BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask whether he can confirm, or otherwise, that an offer has been made of a long term loan at low interest rates for the construction of an additional bridge over Burrard Inlet in Vancouver. If so, has this information been conveyed to the government of British Columbia, to the city of Vancouver and the adjoining municipalities?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time this matter has been brought to my attention. I have received no such offer of money either at low rates of interest or high rates of interest.

Mr. Winch: As a supplementary question, has this information been conveyed to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) who made such a statement recently in B.C.?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that it is now approximately 16 months since the Prime Minister referred the question of the high cost of living and prices to the economic council for a special study, and in view of his repeated assurances that he would try to find out the reason for the long delay, can he tell us whether the study is completed, and will we ever see it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to make inquiries into that matter so that possibly we may have the views of the economic council on it before discussion takes place in the house. I have had discussions with the president of the council on this matter within the last fortnight.

CONSIDERATION AT MEETING OF FINANCE MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is not exactly a supplementary question but it is in connection with the problem of inflation. Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister to say whether the government, in view of the very serious inflationary situation which prevails, would give consideration to calling together the provinces with a view to ascertaining whether agreement could be arrived at for co-operative legislation, to which the Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, on September 14 there is to be a meeting between the federal and provincial ministers of finance. This very important matter is on the agenda and will be discussed with the provincial ministers of finance at that time.

Has the Prime Minister's attention been directed to an article in the Globe and Mail of today which indicates that none of the provincial treasurers spoken to had received an invitation from Ottawa nor given any serious thought to this question? Also the provincial treasurer of Ontario, who expressed surprise, said "That is quite a statement". Would the Prime Minister say what is the situation here, when did the invitation go out, and when were the various provincial treasurers made aware of the fact that the agenda had on it this subject?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should ask the Minister of Finance to deal with this matter. He may have the communication before him.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some confusion seems to have arisen out of the exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister yesterday. It is my understanding that what the Prime Minister was answering was a question in a very general form. That question was asked by the Leader of the Opposition, and the Prime Minister was indicating that on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference tax structure committee meeting on September 14 we will be discussing the current economic situation including the problem of inflation.

I should like to make it quite clear that I do not propose to place before the provinces any proposals for the application of wage and price controls.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no question of that raised in any question I asked, but the Prime Minister said "This very important matter is on the agenda". I ask the minister, now that he is speaking and as he is the conscience of the Prime Minister in replying to this matter, whether there is any such question dealing with co-operative legislation on the agenda for the 14th.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think I made that quite plain in what I have already said. The Leader of the Opposition asked a very long and very involved question. I am not surprised that the Prime Minister in answering it might have seemed to answer one of the more obscure aspects of that question. However, let me read what I said yesterday in the letters which I addressed to some of the premiers and some of the ministers of finance, because some of the premiers also will be attending the conference on September 14. This is from the letter which I wrote to Premier Roblin yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When; was it in the afternoon or in the morning?

Mr. Sharp: This letter had been sent out in the morning. I was not able to read the mind of the Leader of the Opposition, and if I had tried to I would not have been very successful. This was done on our own initiative. May I read the sentences:

> The current economic situation lends additional urgency to federal-provincial consultation on fiscal and economic questions. Action may be required to deal with the current economic situation of a nature that would concern provincial governments as well as the federal government. Such action might well have some bearing on the fiscal arrangements we will be discussing.
> I suggest therefore that we consider this question at the start of our meeting.

Accordingly, the first item on the suggested agenda appended is the economic situation and its relationship to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question to clear up some of the more obscure aspects of this question of the minister. In view of the statement made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) to the western Liberal association in Saskatoon that the federal government is leaving resource development out in the cold and his demand that it meet this challenge more aggressively, would the Minister of Finance inform the house whether the question of resource development will be considered at this conference in relation to fiscal policy?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, it will.

AGRICULTURE

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR SURVEY OF DROUGHT AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. So much rumour has been spread around about the abundance of the crop in western Canada that I am wondering whether the drought stricken area northwest of Meadow Lake from Dorintosh west through Peerless to Goodsoil and extending into Alberta has been drawn to his attention. This is an emergency situation and I should hope he would be making arrangements to send a survey team into this area.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I have not had that matter drawn to my attention by the provincial government as yet, Mr. Speaker, but I will be glad to take notice of the hon. member's representations and look into the matter.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Has anything been done about a similar situation which occurred in the area last year?

Mr. Greene: No application has been received to date from the provincial government for aid in this regard.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO EVALUATION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Manpower.

Following the brief that the National Unemployment Insurance Commission Association forwarded to the minister, is the latter in a position to inform the house whether he intends to take immediate action to correct the injustices which have found their way into the National Employment Service employee assessment program.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, out of 626 employees at the National Employment Service in the province of Quebec, 178 were not classified. Our intention is to interview each of the 178 employees and to try and see how we can deal with each case, if possible.

SHIPPING

CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR GREATER USE IN GRAIN SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humbolt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as the minister under whose jurisdiction the Canadian Wheat Board falls. In view of the fact that Russia already has some ships at the port of Churchill to pick up wheat they have purchased from Canada, would the minister consider keeping this sea route open by the use of icebreakers or even submarines so they could pick up the wheat they have purchased even during winter months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although as Minister of Finance I find myself in the extraordinary position of speaking for the Canadian Wheat Board, I really do not have any responsibility for keeping Hudson Bay open. Perhaps this question should be directed to another minister.

Mr. Rapp: I have a supplementary question which I should perhaps direct to the Minister of Transport. Will he give consideration to this matter so this sea route may be kept open, in view of the fact that the Russians have indicated they will make full use of this port even during the winter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I could be frivolous and say that I will use every submarine the Department of Transport has for this purpose, but I do not think that would impress the house. Let me say seriously to the hon. member that the Department of Transport, the harbours board and the Department of Public Works are giving every attention to doing everything possible in order to use the port of Churchill to a maximum. This will be all the more necessary because of the unhappy interruption in service being experienced at the moment.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN CLOSING OF OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the imminent closing of five of the six unemployment insurance offices located in the lower St. Lawrence region, will the minister consider delaying the implementation of that decision until representations from those affected can be presented to him?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, decision in this matter is the responsibility of the unemployment insurance commission itself. However, I will pass on the hon. member's suggestion to that commission. I am sure he will appreciate that many weeks' notice was given by the commission of its intention to act, not only in his riding but in many other ridings in Canada.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the minister wish to indicate that notice was given in the areas in which these offices are to be closed?

Mr. Nicholson: I cannot speak specifically as to the notice in the hon. member's riding, but I do know that somewhere between 50 and 100 notices in this regard have been sent out in the course of the last three or four months.

Mr. Keays: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister to look into this matter further, because it is not one riding that is concerned but four ridings in the lower St. Lawrence, and in none of them has notice been given.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I have assured the hon. member that I will draw his observations to the attention of the commission.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING PENSIO RIGHTS OF STRIKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the statement made by Mr. Ian Sinclair, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that any striking railway workers who fail to go back to work for the Canadian Pacific Railways may lose their pension rights, will he consider drawing to Mr. Sinclair's attention the law on this subject as set out in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I will be pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT IN FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask whether there has been any diminution in the amount in the federal old age security fund since July 15, contrary to information previously acquired from his department.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Winkler: Then could I ask the Minister of Finance the same question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to suggest that any question at this time should be put on the order paper, because of the very special character of the sittings, but it appears to me that it is statistical information for which the hon. member for Grey-Bruce is now asking and I wonder whether the question should be allowed. I should not think so.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SPENCE ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he intends to table at the earliest possible moment a copy of the report by Commissioner Spence, which I understand he now has.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is misinformed, Mr. Speaker. I have not that report.

Mr. Fulton: Has the Prime Minister any information as to when it may be available?

Mr. Pearson: I have no definite information, Mr. Speaker. The Privy Council office have been making inquiries from time to time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CENSORING OF EVIDENCE OF OFFICERS—RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence which I think is of absolute urgency and concerns a matter that requires clarification. Would the minister inform this house whether in respect of officers of the armed services giving evidence before the defence committee of the House of Commons it is correct that their presentations are received by him and censored before they are allowed to be made to the committee of the House of Commons?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe in censorship any more than my hon. friend does. He was present in the committee and knows that there was no restriction whatever in respect of the questions asked and the answers given.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): May I put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence? I should like to ask the minister whether he has noted the regulation prohibiting members of the armed forces to speak French in the air force shops?

What are the department's intentions concerning this regulation?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: To the best of my knowledge there is no such regulation but I can assure my hon. friend that if there is, this is one of the things that will be changed.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the fact that such a regulation has been posted at the Bagotville airport, could not the minister inquire whether such a regulation exists within the Canadian army?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, but I understand that was in the air force, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: This applies to the army and the navy.

[English]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I desired to ask a supplementary question before the previous question was asked. I am afraid I did not get an answer to my question. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, in view of what he just said, whether the information given by a now retired vice admiral that his presentation to the defence committee, made in camera, was censored and certain parts cut out before he made that presentation, is correct. Can we have a direct answer as to whether that was done?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to answer all the questions in respect of this matter when the committee meets.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Answer it now.

Mr. Hellyer: At that time perhaps my hon. friend would like to call the admiral and ask him any additional questions he might care to put. If he will check the evidence that was given the day the maritime commander appeared before the committee, he will find that in his testimony he did give figures with respect to manpower and recruiting, and there was no limitation whatsoever in respect of the questions or the answers.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, please, Mr. Speaker. This is not an answer to my question. I asked, was anything cut out prior to the presentation? Can we now have an answer yes or no from the Minister of National Defence?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: The answer is yes.

Mr. Hellyer: The admiral deleted from his original text two or three references to friendly nations which it was felt would have had rather serious consequences to Canadian external affairs had they been made to the committee.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Were there any portions of the admirable brief—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: —of the admiral's brief, in explanation or exculpation of that slip of the tongue, it was an admirable brief; but in the admirable brief—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I understand perfectly.

Mr. Lambert: Were there any portions of the admiral's brief with reference to personnel matters and morale which the minister indicated should be within the purview only of the chief of personnel?

Mr. Hellyer: I did not make any such indication. I think it was an admirable presentation, and my hon. friend should re-read it.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): My question follows that put to the Minister of National Defence a minute ago by the hon. member for Lapointe concerning the use of French at Bagotville.

The minister replied that there is no regulation prohibiting the use of the French language in the army, but he said a minute ago that in the air force it was probably possible that the use of French could be prohibited.

I should like to inquire of the minister whether he is inclined to take measures so that in Quebec at least, the use of French be respected and recognized even in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: That is what we are attempting to accomplish. It is difficult in respect of this particular question, which I should like to take as notice; but every effort is being made to make those members of the armed forces who come from the province of Quebec more at home in the armed forces and to permit them to use their own language on a greater variety of occasions.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister of defence a very simple question. Did he read the copyright story by Admiral Landymore which appeared in the Toronto Star on July 23 and which reads as follows:

> The section on personnel—wherein I described the actual state of affairs in my command—was thoroughly censored and rewritten—
> The excuse given me for the censorship was that the minister wanted to take a positive approach to the hearings and that mine was too negative.

Is this true or is it not?

Mr. Hellyer: So far as my giving instructions is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is not.

An hon. Member: Who is in charge of the department?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is in charge and the man of authority in his department, or does that authority rest with someone else?

Mr. Hellyer: I have to accept the responsibility for all the actions that were taken.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order.

AGRICULTURE

CREAM—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he tell us what delay is expected before the deficiency payments will be made to cream shippers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have been assured that all the cheques for the first three months to plants that have duly reported under the new program—some of the plants may not have reported—will be out on September 1.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR HIGHER INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the current market situation, which appears to guarantee sales for all the grain that can be handled this year at 40 or 50 cents over the initial price, is the Canadian Wheat Board considering raising the initial price to producers on delivery to country elevators?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, such an increase can only be made by the governor in council under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and various representations have been received from various quarters on this subject. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): On a supplementary question I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he could give us the approximate date on which we can expect a report from the governor in council. Can that information be included in the return to the question asked by the hon. member from Medicine Hat?

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

The house resumed, from Monday, August 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for the second reading of Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, lest anyone be misled by various references made by the C.B.C. to the effect that I would be speaking today and indicating that I had not spoken yet, I would draw the attention of the news department to yesterday's Hansard.

Today I intend to review just a few matters. I do not have anyone like Mr. Lee to write my speeches. We are faced with a very serious situation, a strike which the government of Canada knew, or should have known for weeks, was going to take place. They treated the matter in a casual and irresponsible manner. At no time was there any apparent realization of the tremendously adverse consequences which would follow. The government took the attitude that with a strike under way it would be an easier way of securing legislation through parliament than meeting the certainty of the strike in advance. We in parliament have a tremendous responsibility at this time. We must try to do something to meet the catastrophic possibilities that have followed the actions of a government which in this, as in so many other matters, refuses and has refused to face the facts.

We want the strike to end. In our opinion the two-faced attitude which the government has shown in this legislation will not assure that objective. When the vote has taken place and parliament decides that this legislation shall be the law of the land, all of us will join in calling upon all Canadians to respect and follow the law. To do otherwise would be to undermine the power and prestige of parliament. Parliament's prestige depends upon respect. No parliament worthy of its name will rubberstamp a bill which in its opinion will not be effective.

I will not go into the 6 per cent which is offered under this legislation for this year. However, I will say that the government, by ineptitude and failure to act, has contributed to the breathtaking growth of strikes. A few months ago it settled two strikes, or a potential one and an actual strike, by a carrot in the form of a 30 per cent increase under what I choose to call the Pearson formula. Under this legislation the government is substituting the big stick for the carrot. This kind of attitude on the part of the government cannot but cause differences within this nation.

We are asked to join the government in legislation that will provide further instability, uncertainty and division. One only had to see the government yesterday in the course of the debate to realize that it is in a state of panic, that it is frightened and fearful. It now places the problem before parliament and says: You deal with this in the way in which we want to deal with it. Within the last fortnight I offered on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition our fullest cooperation toward parliament being called at once before the strike vote became effective. There was no reaction to that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Such action would have the purpose of preventing the men from exercising their constitutional rights.

Mr. Starr: What are you doing now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have now heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I say that of course the right to strike is part of the Bill of Rights of this country.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Secretary of State for External Affairs talks of civil rights. I think he has heard the voice of labour from his constituency. I should like to be able to record some of the things that he has heard, even in that area which often hears nothing but what the hon. gentleman has achieved or has in mind. What he has said is very interesting. He was so anxious that all the processes of conciliation should take place. They have. There was ample time between the time the last procedure was completed and the day of the strike for parliament to have been called, but this government would not move. They wanted a strike. They would then be able to go forth in shining armour with a new courage recently assumed and bring about action.

I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), as he spoke in his mellifluous tones to the people of the nation, blaming labour and everybody else but the government. The blame finally rests on a government that has failed to take any action to counter the most inflationary trend in history. The Prime Minister postpones decisions and refuses to act. Up and up and up go prices.

Surely the Prime Minister and the government in providing the 30 per cent formula realized that it would add to the fires of inflation. The Prime Minister said last evening that he had nothing to do with that. He looked in anger in my direction suggesting that I called it the Pearson formula. Does he deny it was the Pearson formula? I will describe that answer as being as convincing as if Einstein had denied that he was the father of Einstein's doctrine of relativity. It has been associated with him. Clearly and definitely the government created this situation. They played around and pussyfooted.

The Prime Minister from time to time dispensed daily bromides. The government was rudderless for days while the threat hung over Canada—that is the "diplomatic" approach. Problems do not solve themselves or disappear by neglect. The government then comes to parliament and produces a bill.

When I came into the house at the beginning of yesterday's session I believed that there would be something effective in this bill which would assure that, if passed by parliament, it would represent a solution to the problem. But what do we find, Mr. Speaker? The government has produced legislation that by no stretch of the imagination, even the imagination of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will provide a fair deal in what is being asked from parliament by the government while the same time recognizing the interests of this nation.

We are in a crisis. That does not mean that members of parliament simply have to bow down before the ukase of a government that brought about in large measure the situation that has developed. Indeed, the whole situation was well summed up in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of August 19 which stated:

> Canada today has many crises. But the greatest crisis of all is the feeling across the country that the government of Canada is in a curious suspense. An absence rather than a presence, a source of inertia rather than a source of energy, a vagueness rather than a guidance.

That sums up the situation very well. That is the feeling of Canadians. In every part of the nation there has been failure to take action dealing with inflation, failure to place the facts before parliament.

Yesterday the Prime Minister answered me with directness. Today he had to have his words interpreted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) so as to tell the House of Commons what the Prime Minister meant when he said what he said. The government does not know where it is going. His answer yesterday was clear and unequivocal, and no amount of playing with words can explain why the Prime Minister of Canada should say that actions were being taken along the line I asked about and then today one of his ministers vicariously gives the answer that they are not.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that when the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) was abroad visiting Australia she made a certain statement in an interview? Far-off thinking sometimes has clarity. What she said was reported in the press under the heading "Miss LaMarsh Fears Canada May Copy U.K. Economic Woes". She went on to say when speaking at a National Press Club luncheon, that recent measures to slow down the economy—she is talking of Canada—may be too little and have been applied at the wrong time and that stronger measures are necessary.

Mr. Woolliams: And where are they?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the right hon. gentleman would not want to leave on the record anything which was incorrect. I think he should know that that story was at once denied from Australia. It did not appear there, although my speech was made in front of all the members of the press gallery in that country. It was denied to the only representative of the press of Canada who got in touch with me in Australia, and I understand a retraction appeared the next day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. lady says that the story was denied and the retraction appeared the next day. I would ask that she table the retraction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should very much like to see it, because that retraction certainly did not receive the prominence that her statement, which was published not only in Canada but in the United Kingdom, did.

Miss LaMarsh: They never do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There has been failure to take action and failure to realize that action was necessary. There has been failure to act, lethargy, uncertainty, division in the cabinet—and I could deal with that at some length.

Mr. Pearson: Well, you are an expert on it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some members over there even left, and I understand there are others who feel like doing so.

Mr. Robichaud: That is not so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will not mention the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) because I understand he may be going to a higher place. The very smile on his face indicates that he is shortly to be elevated to that place from whose bourn no one has yet returned.

Returning once more to the facts, I point out that all through the weeks from July 15 on the government was warned that there would be a strike. On July 15 The Canadian Transportation magazine had this to say:

• (3:30 p.m.)

Parliament soon to adjourn—

It will take at least four or five days to bring the wandering M.P.'s back from their summer cottages and hideouts, and perhaps another two or three days to pass the required legislation. That means the strike will last from five days to a week.

It could conceivably last longer, of course, if the non-op unions decide to defy the legislation. The government doesn't think they will. The consensus of the Pearson cabinet is that the week or so on the picket lines will take most of the steam out of the militants among the railway employees, and that they will be more than ready to heed the back-to-work legislation.

We got no action, only postponement. Then the government produced the bill that was placed before us yesterday. I have not heard of anyone affected by it who gives it even tacit approval. We want the strike to end. We want the government to take effective action that will be fair and equitable. Indeed, the matter was summed up in an editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of August 27 which reads as follows:

The strike which now grips the nation's railways was first invited by the Pearson government, which then acted too late to prevent it.

Ottawa invited the railway crisis in June when it approved wage and benefit increases of more than 30 per cent to settle the Quebec longshoremen's strike and the seaway workers' claims.

It took until yesterday for the Prime Minister to deny this. The editorial continues:

If the railwaymen defied Parliament on such a settlement, they would forfeit their claim to public sympathy.

The settlement being one that is fair and just.

We must trust that, if parliament deals justly with them, they will react sensibly.

I intend to say something about that, something that should have been said by the Prime Minister himself. When he spoke last evening to the Canadian people he should have said something on the subject that above all else is of prime importance at this time.

My life was at the bar. The rule of law must be maintained or our democracy will cease. At this time more than any other the Prime Minister should have told the people of Canada when he spoke yesterday that a breakdown of law and order is taking place. The philosophy is being supported that laws deserving to be broken can be broken, that laws with which individuals disagree can be evaded by direct or indirect action. If we ever accept that proposition, our democracy is gone.

There is a growing problem of disrespect for the law. When parliament has a bill before it such as this, it must be scrupulously careful that the legislation is not of so coercive a nature as to arouse antagonism and worse. The law must have the support of the people as a whole. That is so in regard to matters affecting each of us personally.

On the flag question I took a strong position. Parliament acted, and I have accepted the decision of parliament. Sir, if we come to a situation, by reason of the conduct of a government that is irresponsible in its attitude, where disobedience of the law is brought about, we will have the end of civilized society.

I have said before that those in the ranks of labour, and I have acted for them, are law-abiding. But some in those ranks are aroused today by the cavalier methods adopted by this government. I do not like to say this but the facts must be frankly faced. This government today lacks the moral power to lead the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have failed in this and in so many matters to meet their responsibilities. There are individual ministers who do not come within that category. But in the solidarity or lack of solidarity of the cabinet, there has been a failure of leadership and panic at the last moment.

I say to the government that in every part of the world the psychology of lawlessness and disregard of the law is expanding. There are some today who believe they can flout the law for their own ends when the occasion demands. I want parliament, and I implore the government of the day even now, to bring about amendments to this bill as it stands so that there will not be aroused within this nation a feeling of disrespect for parliament and for the legislation passed by parliament.

It is a serious thing, perhaps the most serious matter that democracies have to face, that in so many countries many are coming to believe that there is no great wrong in ignoring or flouting the law so long as it can be justified on the basis of a personal conviction that the law is wrong. Sir, there is a way to change a law that is believed to be wrong and bad and that is not by breaking it but by changing the law at its source.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was disappointed yesterday in the Prime Minister's speech because he did not then, or when addressing the nation, place before the people of Canada the position that whatever the situation may be, a law will not be passed by parliament unless that law meets those principles of equity and justice that ought to emanate from parliament, the fountain of justice.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The government asks for co-operation. I offered that co-operation and it was spurned, not receiving even the acknowledgement of passing approval. The government went ahead on its own. It got itself into a mess. It got the Canadian economy into a serious impasse. Now it comes before parliament and says: "Whatever we present to you you have to accept. This is what we want done regardless of the equity". That is not the spirit in which problems like this are solved. I say this because I have been greatly concerned over suggestions by various individuals, including one within parliament speaking outside parliament, that the flouting of a law which is not agreeable is permissible and even admirable.

I hope this parliament will act. I disagree with the manner in which the government has acted. This legislation should be redrawn to give justice and equity. In its present form it cannot but result in further divisions within this nation. Sir, I love this institution. Let us not do anything here which will give the slightest encouragement to those who preach the doctrine of civil disobedience. Let us carefully avoid adding fuel to the fires of lawlessness and contempt for the law which are smouldering, not only in our own country, but in other democracies. Even yet, take back this legislation in its present form.

I say to those sitting opposite: You must realize now that it is not workable in the manner in which you have drafted it. Let us work together to secure a fair and equitable law. I am sorry to say I cannot designate this bill as belonging in that category. Let us work together to secure a fair and equitable challenge the Canadian people, those directly and indirectly affected, to support it. We in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition do not intend to make any further speeches on the subject until we get into committee in the event that the house gives this legislation second reading. Disagreeing with the bill, condemning the government which has brought forth this monstrosity, we still say that, if it becomes law, it requires the support of us all because it will then be a decision of parliament, however much we disagree with it.

We tried to co-operate, and for two weeks our attempts were spurned. We are prepared to do so now if the government, in a spirit of co-operation, is willing to withdraw this legislation in its present form. As it now stands it resembles one of the laws of the Medes and Persians. We must bring about a law which will be effective.

I fear that this bill, if passed, will lead to divisions within this nation and help to undermine respect for parliament, something which must be maintained. I know this is asking a lot, but surely the government now appreciates the fact that its indolence and uncertainty, its refusal to face facts when they should have been faced, have brought this nation to a serious position. I say also to the government of Canada: If you are not prepared to co-operate in bringing about a law which will be effective and fair, do not try to condemn those of us who want to see a law on the statute books which will be effective for taking a strong stand when presented with a bill which in our opinion can only cause dissension, strife and separation within the various areas of our nation and spell trouble, difficulty and uncertainty in the days ahead.

Look over the legislation. I have already made some suggestions. We have not yet been told whether the government might give consideration to some of them. I do not intend to repeat them; I referred to them last evening. Provide some fringe benefits. Why have members opposite forgotten the Freedman report? Is it in a pigeonhole along with the other reports which have died a natural death since this government came to office?

Give these people, men and women who work in this nation, some of these fringe benefits. Give them a degree of security of tenure, which they seek, something which goes far beyond the amount of the actual payment made for work done. There is nothing of this in the bill before the house. There is simply a declaration that this is to be the law, 6 per cent for 1966, with nothing on the Freedman recommendations whatsoever. Add some of these things to the bill. Bring about a feeling, as between labour and the nation, that we are interested in their welfare. You will find there is a favourable reaction. I know this.

I have talked to the man who works and to his wife who runs the home—and, remember, there are no earnings when a strike is on. They speak of these things, the little things, the amenities. They ask for changes in regard to those things which make it difficult for them to be as comfortable as otherwise they would be. Make those changes. Incorporate them. Do not let us have this picayune attitude regarding health benefits, holidays and sickness leave. These are amenities, these are social security measures which the workers should have. Give them some of these things. Show that we think and feel for them. If we do this we shall bring about a new spirit within this nation.

I fear for my country with legislation like this. We in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition want to end the strike. We will do anything to assist if the government on its part will show some consideration for these things that are necessary. I know there are some who say, "Why, they are getting so much now." That has always been the story, but taxes today eat up a great portion. The percentage of taxes today over all the areas of government is, I think, approximately 50 per cent.

The cost of living mounts every day and the government sits as a spectator taking the view that something is going to turn up and it is going to be all right. This government will bear a tremendous responsibility before history if it does not now begin to realize that what is being presented here is a bill of such harshness, without those amenities that could easily be granted, that it arouses antagonism. The amenities I mentioned a moment ago are the fringe benefits.

Even yet I hope the government will act. We cannot as an opposition, having implored the government to do something to end the strike—we demanded it should be stopped even before it began—we cannot, under those circumstances, be placed in a position where, without reconsideration by the government, we can give the legislation that support which we would want to give.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house declines to proceed with the second reading of a bill, the provisions of which, in their wide departure from the terms of the report of Mr. Justice Munroe, Chairman of the Conciliation Board, and in their failure to give any assurance of an equitable solution of the problems of fringe benefits or any directions as to the implementation of the Freedman report, do not provide an adequate solution of the current impasse.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order with respect to the regularity of the amendment which has been moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

The principle of this bill is to provide for the resumption of the operations of the railways in Canada. The main purpose of the bill is given in the title, and it has been demonstrated, both in the speech by the Prime Minister and in the speech by the Leader of the Opposition, that this is the principle of the bill. It is a well-established rule of the house that any amendment on second reading must declare a principle that is opposed to the principle of the bill under discussion. In other words, the amendment must assert a principle that is opposite to the principle in the bill.

Mr. Fulton: What authority are you relying on?

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member wishes me to refer to citations, among others there is citation 382 in Beauchesne:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

There are other citations which make the proposition even clearer that an amendment on second reading, in order to be declared regular, must directly oppose the principle provided for in the bill. The main principle here is to establish the resumption of railway operations, and I suggest on that ground that the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman does not meet the provisions of the rules of the house.

I would raise a further objection to the amendment, namely, that there is also a procedural necessity involved in that in moving an amendment on second reading it is not possible to anticipate amendments that may be moved in the committee of the whole. I refer to citation 389 in Beauchesne:

> A motion opposing the second reading of a bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee. Alterations which may be affected by amending the clauses of the bill cannot be moved on the second reading. On the 8th March, 1934, when the motion for the second reading of an act to incorporate the Bank of Canada was under consideration, a member moved in amendment "that all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following substituted therefor—

Farther on the citation reads:

> The Speaker ruled the proposed amendment out of order because clauses of the bill provided that the stock in the bank be allotted to the public and that the directors be appointed by the shareholders. The member could serve his purpose by moving amendments to those clauses in committee on the bill.

I suggest there is one term selected from the report of Mr. Justice Munroe, namely, the wage term, which is included in the clauses of the bill, and it is open to the Leader of the Opposition to vary that particular clause by amendment in committee. It is open to him to achieve the same purpose in committee, but in this amendment he is really asserting that there is a wide departure from the terms of the report of Mr. Justice Munroe. I contest that as an inaccurate statement. However, it is not relevant to the argument on procedure. If there is a wide departure from the terms of the report then it is open to the right hon. gentleman to close the gap or remove the departure by moving an amendment in committee. So I suggest on that ground that the amendment as put forward by the Leader of the Opposition is deficient.

I believe that the same argument could be raised with respect to other items in the amendment, but I simply assert that the amendment does not declare any principle contrary to the main principle of the bill, which is to resume railway operations. That is the first point. If that point is not persuasive enough, I submit that any of the terms posed in the amendment can be effected by possible amendments at the committee stage of the bill. I suggest that for this reason also the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman is deficient.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the argument advanced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare I should like to refer first to the first citation quoted, namely, 382. He appeared to take the position that the only amendment which could be moved was an amendment asserting a principle which is diametrically opposite to the principle in the bill. In so far as he has based his position on citation 382 he has completely misconstrued that citation, because citation 382 at page 277 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, starts with the words "it is also competent to a member." Nothing could make it clearer that this is but one of the alternatives available to members of this house in moving amendments and not, as the minister suggested, the only kind of amendment that can be moved.

In support of the propriety of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition I should like to refer Your Honour to what I am sure you will regard as a very convincing, if not indeed binding authority, namely, an amendment moved by the present Prime Minister when leader of the opposition, on November 30, 1960, as found on page 350 of Hansard of that date. At that time the house had before it consideration of railway legislation introduced by the government of that day dealing with an industrial dispute. This was legislation to postpone that dispute and continue the operation of the railway.

At the end of his speech the then leader of the opposition, now Prime Minister, moved an amendment. This was during the debate on second reading in which he put forward the position and the attitude of the then Liberal opposition. The amendment is as follows:

> This house declines to proceed with the second reading of a bill the provisions of which establish a compulsory and discriminatory wage freeze for railway employees contrary to the recommendation for a wage increase made by a board of conciliation appointed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

That was the sum total of the amendment. Later in the discussion concerning the admissibility of the amendment it was pointed out that it did not contain the operative words with which any such amendment must be introduced, namely, "that all the words of the motion after 'that' be deleted and the following substituted therefor". Mr. Speaker Michener, the Speaker of that day, ruled that this was a technical omission and in effect, with the consent of the house, added those preliminary words and then allowed the motion to stand, to be debated, and to be voted on.

Your Honour will appreciate that the amendment which has first been submitted to the house by the Leader of the Opposition is, in so far as the technicalities or legalities of it are concerned, practically on all fours—not in substance but procedurally in relation to the motion for second reading—with the amendment which was sustained by the Speaker of that day.

In so far as the argument is concerned that the content of the amendment could be moved at various stages in committee of the whole an argument based on the principle ennunciated that amendments on second reading should not be in a form which can be made in committee of the whole—I should like to point out that the strict application of that ruling would apply also to the amendment of 1960. One could have made a technical argument that the content of that amendment might have been made as an amendment to a clause in committee.

Your Honour, however, knows the difficulty involved in moving amendments in committee. In committee you cannot assert a general principle; you must move a specific amendment strictly related to the section under discussion. So I would say now that just as that argument was not used and did not apply with respect to the amendment of 1960, it is not applicable to the amendment moved today.

On the basis of the precedent that was established by the attitude and the conduct of this house itself just six years ago, I have no hesitation in submitting to Your Honour that this amendment is in order and has been sanctioned by the house itself.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I too should like to say a few words in support of the validity of the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. In just a sentence may I emphasize the strength of the argument used by the hon. member for Kamloops in drawing your attention to the amendment that was moved on November 30, 1960, by the right hon. gentleman who now is the Prime Minister of Canada, an amendment practically the same in form as the one now proposed. That amendment was allowed by the Speaker of that day and voted on by the house. It does seem to me that Your Honour will have to give serious consideration to the weight of that precedent.

The second point I should like to make relates also to the use—if I may say so, I think frequently the misuse—that is made of citation 382. The Minister of National Health and Welfare reads citation 382 as though every qualification mentioned therein has to be met by an amendment of this character. I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the word "or" appears half a dozen times. In other words, there are several different things that an amendment of this kind may do, even if it does only one of them, and be in order under the provisions of citation 382.

It is not necessary in all cases for such an amendment to be moved by one who is completely opposed to second reading of the bill. I happen to be opposed to second reading of the present bill as it now stands, but it seems to me that has no relevance to the question of whether or not the amendment is in order. If it is an amendment which states a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, it is in order. On the other hand, if it is an amendment which expresses opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution, it is in order, or if it is otherwise opposed to the progress of the bill it is in order.

I submit that the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition does express opposition to the progress of this bill just as the amendment of the present Prime Minister did in 1960. So far as citation 382 is concerned, far from its being one to quote in opposition to this amendment it is precisely one to quote in support of its validity.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The third point I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention is the manner in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has tried to have it both ways. He argued that it is not possible to raise matters such as the Freedman report and other things of that kind on second reading because they are not relevant to the bill and therefore they cannot be the subject of an amendment on second reading.

Mr. MacEachen: I did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: The minister said precisely that there was no reference in the bill to the Freedman report and therefore it would not be relevant to move an amendment of this kind on second reading. Then he turned around and said it would be possible to do so during the committee stage.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I said exactly the reverse. I said an amendment or change sought during second reading, including anything in reference to the Freedman report, could be achieved during the committee stage.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is demonstrating the point I am trying to make. When he was arguing about the kind of amendments that can be moved on second reading he said this would not be possible because the Freedman report was not mentioned in the bill. He then said that when we reached the committee stage amendments of this kind could be moved. I suggest the minister cannot have it both ways. Either the amendment is relevant or it is not relevant.

So far as the Freedman report is concerned, I submit there is a reference to the matters dealt with in the Freedman report in the bill in that it refers to the issues in dispute between the companies and the employees. Therefore I submit it would be appropriate to deal with this report by amendment on second reading. I submit, as a matter of fact, that when we reach committee stage we will be faced with all kinds of difficulties about details that are somewhat removed from the specific details in the clauses of the bill, but that we have an opportunity to press points of principle when we are debating the principle of the bill on second reading.

I submit there is no question as to the propriety of the amendment at this stage and that we may have difficulty importing new ideas into the bill when we reach clause by clause consideration of it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without spelling it out at any length I submit that on these three counts, because of the fact that the amendment moved on November 30, 1960, by the present Prime Minister was allowed as being in order, because of the authority set out in citation 382, and because of the fact that on second reading we are dealing with matters of principle, we should have the right to vote on the declaration of principle put forward in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in arguing in support of the regularity of this amendment reference was made to the amendment to second reading of the 1960 bill which was moved, as it happened, by myself. As hon. members know, that particular bill prevented workers from exercising the right to strike and, over a period of six months, froze their wages. No increase was given and wages were frozen. Our amendment at that time provided for a wage rate, if such a step were taken, and the wage rate was in accordance with the majority report of the conciliation board. There was a difference in principle. On the other side there was a suggested wage freeze while on this side there was a suggested wage increase.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question? How long is it since he has read his amendment of 1960—because it did no such thing as he has claimed.

Mr. Pearson: You do not like to be reminded of the facts.

Mr. Fulton: You should state your facts accurately.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the point of order I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to citation 393 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, and specifically to all three paragraphs. The first reads in part as follows:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading. It must oppose the principle of the bill.

The second paragraph reads:

> An amendment to the second reading of a bill which accepts in part the principle of the bill and suggests that it may be improved by provisions which can only be moved in committee of the whole is out of order.

The third paragraph reads:

> An amendment which is not adverse to the principle of a bill but proposes that certain provisions be added to the bill cannot be moved on the motion for second reading.

The principle of this bill is to provide for the resumption of the operations of the railways and the early settlement of existing disputes.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not what the Prime Minister just said.

Mr. Turner: There is nothing in the amendment introduced by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition which is adverse to or attacks the principle of the bill. All it does is add certain provisions which in the opinion of the official opposition would improve the provisions of the bill, namely, the incorporation of further items of the Munroe and Freedman reports.

I submit to Your Honour that if that is the opinion of the opposition hon. members will have an opportunity to append suggestions such as they are now making when dealing with the individual clauses of the bill, and I refer specifically to clause 6 regarding the Munroe report and clause 10 and other clauses regarding the Freedman report. With the greatest respect, they cannot have things both ways. They cannot in fact approve the principle of the bill, which I am sure everyone approves, that is, to achieve the resumption of the operations of the railways, a cessation of the strike and a settlement of the dispute, and at the same time move an amendment to the declaratory principle. That can quite appropriately be done during the committee stage when we are dealing with the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I think we have to look at the first few words of the proposed amendment of the Leader of the Opposition which state:

> This house declines to proceed with the second reading of a bill—

The amendment then goes on to spell out a number of reasons why the house should decline to proceed. It seems to me that if the amendment were passed it would have the effect of killing the bill. There is no doubt in my mind about that. The Leader of the Opposition went on to suggest that the government should come forward with a new bill.

It is my opinion that we must also decide whether or not, on the basis of the arguments that have been advanced up to this point, the purpose of the bill is the same as the principle of the bill. I suggest it is not. Surely the purpose of the bill is to put into effect an act which would result in a resumption of the operations of the railways. It seems to me that the principle of the bill involves more than simply that. It involves the manner in which this is to be done.

In the citation referred to by the Minister without Portfolio, citation 393, particularly paragraphs 2 and 3, it is very clearly stated that an amendment to the second reading of a bill which accepts in part the principle of the bill and suggests that it may be improved by other provisions is not in order but must be moved at the committee stage during the consideration of the particular clauses which are disagreeable.

Paragraph 3 of that citation states:

> An amendment which is not adverse to the principle of a bill but proposes that certain provisions be added to the bill cannot be moved on the motion for second reading.

The last three sentences of citation 386 are as follows:

> The house cannot both refuse to give the second reading and refer some provisions of the bill to a committee. It shall have to make its choice. The amendment was ruled out.

I suggest that the question Your Honour must decide is whether there will be anything left to proceed with if this amendment is accepted. I suggest that the amendment will completely kill the bill if accepted and therefore is not in order at this stage.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I submit very briefly that the whole matter is set forth with great clarity at page 530 of the 16th edition of May. This type of amendment falls within the definition of what is called a "reasoned amendment" in the House at Westminster. May says at page 530:

> A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

Then he mentions these three, each of which is alternative:

1. It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

I emphasize "the principles, policy or provisions of the bill." These categories are in each case alternative and in fact are very similar to those contained in citation 382 of Beauchesne. Then May says:

2. It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

3. It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

For each of these three alternatives there is ample authority in the footnotes. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that here you have an alternative situation, that the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in fact falls within No. 1 and that if it does not fall within No. 1 it certainly falls within No. 2.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the comments of the hon. members and of the ministers on the amendment moved by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

I was particularly impressed by the argument that the purpose of amendment is not contrary to the principles of the bill. In fact, the bill under consideration is divided into three parts. The bill suggests, first of all, a suspension of the railroad strike, second, an increase in wages and third, the institution of binding arbitration.

These are the three principles. What is being suggested in the amendment? No purposes are being suggested contrary either to the suspension of the strike or to the wage increase or to binding arbitration.

This is an amendment that adds something and much more could be added. In fact, I am surprised to find it so short. A lot of things could be added to make it into an amendment encompassing other items. And if the government had not yesterday introduced another bill on the implementation of the recommendations of the MacPherson commission, I would not have been surprised if it had been added to the amendment that has been introduced.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment should be rejected because it is out of order and it will only delay the business of the house while Canada is losing $15 million a day. We should deal with the bill at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, we could probably spend two days listening to the pros and cons of the amendment without reaching an agreement. We could listen to citations, have recourse to precedents established in the past, and all this would still not settle the matter. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) has just said that this amendment is not at all in keeping with the principles of the bill under consideration, but only adds to the bill. Reading it, I do not see that the amendment adds anything to the bill; its result would be rather, as the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) said earlier, to kill the bill, since in fact the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition simply says that the bill does not provide an adequate solution to the present deadlock.

The Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting or adding anything by this amendment, as the member for Sherbrooke said earlier, it merely serves to delay the study of the bill.

Now, I think that the principles of the bill are, first and foremost, to put an end to the railway strike. Those principles must be adhered to and if the Leader of the Opposition wants to move an amendment against the principles of the bill designed to end the strike, he should then move an amendment other than the one now before us.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, this amendment is meaningless. It would be a waste of time to call a vote on this matter. If the Leader of the Opposition has nothing else to submit, at least he should let us discuss the bill and refrain from moving such amendements.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to ask for some information The first words of the amendment are as follows:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the bill before us, the word "that" appears at least 75 times, and I should like to know after which "that" the words are to be struck out and the following added. Knowing this, we shall then be enlightened as to the scope of the amendment. Could the Leader of the Opposition give us an answer?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in a position now to express an opinion with regard to the very interesting arguments which have been put forward to enlighten the Chair. Perhaps I may deal first with the objection just raised by the hon. member for Lapointe.

[Translation]

The motion provides that the bill be not read a second time. The amendment does not refer to the bill itself but to the motion for second reading. I believe there is only one "that" in this motion.

[English]

The objections raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister without Portfolio were, of course, of a very serious nature and require appropriate consideration. I have also taken into account all the arguments put forth by other members of the house. I might say right now, to relieve the anxiety of some hon. members, that I feel the amendment should be accepted for a number of reasons.

The first objection raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and supported by the Minister without Portfolio was that this is a reasoned amendment and that a reasoned amendment must be declaratory of a principle adverse to or opposed to the principles of the bill. This objection has been answered effectively, I believe, by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Carleton in that this is only one of the several possible forms of a reasoned amendment.

There is an enumeration, as stated in May's 17th edition at page 527, of the several forms of this type of amendment. The first is:

> It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

Then we find:

> 2. It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.
> 3. It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

The Minister without Portfolio referred to citation 393 of Beauchesne, which seems to be in contradiction to May. This matter was brought to my attention on a number of occasions previously, namely, that there was obviously a contradiction between May and Beauchesne. Consequently a search was made of the authorities upon which citation 393 of Beauchesne was based. This search was not too fruitful. It seems that citations 393 (1), (2) and (3) of Beauchesne constitute the rule as it existed perhaps some years ago. However, it has not been followed more recently. I suggest to hon. members that the rule which should be followed is as expressed in May's 17th edition.

The other serious objection submitted by the hon. ministers, which was supported, of course, by other hon. members, was that an amendment must not be concerned with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee. In relation to this particular objection, the amendment appears to be a borderline case.

Hon. members are aware of the citation in the 17th edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, page 528, which reads as follows:

> The amendment must not be concerned in detail with the provisions of the bill.

I feel there is a distinction to be drawn here. In my opinion this amendment does not refer in detail to the provisions of the bill before the house. For this reason I think I can feel free not to accept the objection of the ministers to the amendment.

We have before us a reasoned amendment and the principle of a reasoned amendment is set out very clearly in Abraham and a Hawtrey's Parliamentary Dictionary at page 162, which states in very clear terms what a reasoned amendment is. It reads:

> This form of amendment seeks . . . either to give reasons why the house declines to give a second or third reading to the bill, or to express an opinion with regard to its subject matter or to the policy which the bill is intended to fulfil.

This language is extremely general in nature and I believe would include the type of amendment which has been moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Lastly, it has been brought to my attention that an amendment in many ways similar from a procedural standpoint was moved in 1960 and accepted at the time. I believe there is no substantial procedural distinction between the two amendments.

For all these reasons and from the procedural standpoint I accept the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that the present railway strike constitutes a crisis for this nation. There can be no doubt that it is having serious repercussions not only upon the travelling public but also upon the primary producers and on the jobs of thousands of workers who depend for employment on parts and materials which are shipped by rail. Consequently, this house is properly seized of the importance of dealing with this matter.

It seems to me equally true that there is no doubt as to why we face this serious crisis. This is one of the government's chickens that has come to roost. The government's failure to cope with the problem of the maldistribution of our national income, the fact that the government has done nothing about profiteering and soaring prices charged the consumers of Canada, have had an adverse affect upon the farmers, the fishermen, the workers, and particularly upon those who have to live on fixed incomes. Moreover, there has been no serious attempt to avert this strike. There has been no genuine bargaining on the part of the railway companies when one realizes that bargaining began ten months ago and that in all that period of time the railways have not made a single offer of settlement to the employees.

The other evening on the national television the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said that certainly the railway employees were entitled to an increase in wages. Both the Munroe and the Cameron commissions said that the employees were entitled to an increase in wages. However, for ten months the railways have refused to acknowledge that any increase at all should be given to their employees. This has been ten months of frustration and resentment. It was inevitable that out of this feeling of frustration a strike would undoubtedly come.

Mr. Speaker, workers do not go on strike for fun. These particular unions, I understand, have no provisions for strike pay. Workers depend upon their weekly wages to support themselves and their families. It is only under the most extreme provocation that workers finally decide to walk the streets. The fact is that in this instance, as in previous railway strikes, the railway companies have deliberately invited a strike because they have used a national railway strike as a means of blackmailing the country into giving them increased revenue Repeatedly over the past half century the railway companies have stalled negotiations and provoked a strike so that parliament would have to intervene. Then they have sent the wage bill to parliament in the form of either asking for a government subsidy or asking parliament to sanction increases in freight rates. We might as well face the fact as to where the culprit is.

In this country the Canadian Pacific Railway has exploited its employees, milked Canadian shippers and raided the federal treasury ever since the day it was born. It has continued to do that throughout its history with the connivance of both the major political parties in this country. We have seen this ritual dance performed again and again. The railways stall, a strike takes place, hysteria is rampant, parliament rams through legislation, men go back to work, some settlement is imposed, and then parliament is told by the railways: You must give us more money to pay the wage bill which you have caused us to incur. This could be called the mating dance of avarice and expediency. Every step is carefully rehearsed and the conclusion is well known in advance. The one thing you can be sure of is that the public is the one that gets ravished.

Of course, the governments we have had, whether they were Liberal or Conservative, have each in turn condemned this practice when they were in opposition and practiced it when they were in office. In 1950 the St. Laurent government introduced compulsory arbitration to settle a national railway strike. This, of course, was opposed by the Conservative opposition.

In 1960, to prevent another national railway strike, the Diefenbaker government imposed compulsory arbitration, and the members who sit on the front bench to your right, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) waxed eloquent about this violation of civil rights and this denial of the basic freedom of collective bargaining. Now we have the same gentlemen introducing another compulsory arbitration law and it is being opposed vigorously by the same party which in 1960 introduced a similar measure.

The unfortunate part about this ritualistic dance is that in every case the government in office at the time has allowed the situation to deteriorate to the point where hysteria and a crisis psychology put parliament in the position that it must pass compulsory legislation and put the Canadian people on the spot where they can be blackmailed into giving the railways more money. It is bad enough,

Mr. Speaker, to have the government's chickens coming home to roost, but it is worse when parliament has to deal with them and the Canadian people have to pay for them.

Over the years both the major political parties of this country have failed to introduce machinery for effective collective bargaining between the railways and their employees. They have allowed the railway companies to bamboozle both government and parliament into introducing compulsory arbitration and then into picking up the tab for any wage increases which may ensue.

Many labour leaders in Canada and the United States have been saying quite openly that the strike is outmoded as an industrial weapon in our modern society, that it has now become a blunt instrument which not only affects the economy but adversely affects even those who take part in it. The only way that strikes can be averted is to set up the kind of machinery that will prevent strikes and which will promote genuine collective bargaining on the part of both parties.

This is not impossible, Mr. Speaker. A country like Sweden has established economic stability without any denial of fundamental rights. That country has gone for more than a quarter of a century without a major strike because there has been provided both to management and labour effective machinery for negotiation and collective bargaining.

However, the Prime Minister may gift-wrap this bill, it is imposing compulsory arbitration. Earlier this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs interrupted the Leader of the Opposition to say that the right to go on strike was a basic civil right. But according to the government, staying on strike is not a basic civil right. For them the right to bargain collectively as to wages, conditions of labour and the terms on which workers on strike will return to work is not a basic civil right. Under this bill the worker has not the right to stay on strike or the right to say under what terms and conditions he will go back to work.

I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to compulsory arbitration. I do not think the government should have allowed itself to get into the impasse in which it now finds itself. But now parliament has no choice but to ask the railway workers to go back to work in the interests of the welfare of the public. In this as in any other case the national interest must take precedence. But that cannot justify trampling upon the basic rights of this group of workers or of any other group of workers.

We in the New Democratic Party believe that it is possible to bring about a resumption of work while at the same time preserving the principle of free collective bargaining.

The government proposes to force the men back to work on the basis of a wage settlement of 4 per cent from January 1 and 4 per cent from July 1 of this year, which over the entire calendar year amounts to a 6 per cent increase. The government leaves the wages for 1967 to arbitration if an agreement is not reached as a result of negotiation. We might as well face the fact that any negotiation under a mediator which takes place between now and November 15 will be a farce. It will be a pointless waste of time. Does anyone think that the railway companies will seriously negotiate when they know that by stalling until November 15 compulsory arbitration will follow? Does anyone think that the railway companies will make a genuine offer when they know that in the event of compulsory arbitration any offer which they have made will become the floor in the consideration of those who are called upon to arbitrate and to settle the final wage bill?

So what the government is doing, Mr. Speaker, is fixing the wages for this year and leaving to the tender mercies of an arbitration tribunal what will be the wages of the railway workers in 1967. I think it is significant that although this legislation contains terms that will fix the railway workers' wages for this year and will leave the arbitration board to fix the wages for next year, there are no provisions for restricting the profits made by the railway companies. Nothing is said about holding down the profits of the railway companies to 6 per cent.

This morning's Globe and Mail carries an interesting item datelined Montreal which indicates that for the first seven months of this year, ended July 31, the profits of the Canadian Pacific Railway amounted to $30,266,322 compared with $22,535,679 for the first seven months of the previous year. That represents an increase in profits in the first seven months of this year for the Canadian Pacific Railway of 34.2 per cent. So the railways have done pretty well.

If one looks at the financial statements of the Canadian Pacific Railway one notices that 1958 was for a long time their banner year in achieving peak railway revenue. But in 1964 this figure was surpassed; it went up to $510 million, a 1 per cent increase. In 1965 railway revenue amounted to $518 million, an increase of $7.9 million or 1½ per cent. For the first seven months of this year railway revenue is up another $29 million. I think it will not be lost on the railway workers of Canada that while the government is asking parliament to restrict their wages to an increase of 6 per cent in the year 1966 no provision whatever is made for restraining in any way the profits which will be made by the railway companies. Nor is there any provision which says that when this matter goes to arbitration the railway companies will be required, in arguing their ability to pay, to take into consideration not only their railway revenue but also the vast revenues they get from their other operations which were started and financed out of the profits derived from their railway operations.

For years it has been a sore point for many of us in western Canada that when we argue before the Board of Transport Commissioners with respect to freight rates the railways insist that their financial ability should be based solely upon their railway revenue. The millions of acres of land they have obtained as a free gift are not included. Their mining operations, their forestry operations, their sales of land, their petroleum operations and their great investment companies are left out of consideration when they argue as to what wages they can pay or what freight rates they should charge. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Pacific Railway for several years has been divorcing its railways operations from its other enterprises. It is looking to the day when some government in Canada will take over the railways and establish a national railway system.

If any government in this country is ever faced with the prospect of taking over the Canadian Pacific Railway, I hope it will have enough sense to take over all the Canadian Pacific Railway's assets and not merely the railway. Those other assets have been built out of the profits which the company has made from its railways and out of land grants consisting at millions of acres of land which it received from the respective governments of Canada.

It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that although the government is now going to impose a settlement on the workers by this legislation, which tells the trade union leaders to order the men back to work, there is no suggestion that it is prepared to appoint an administrator of the railways as we suggested should have been done when the longshoremen's strike went on for so long last spring. The only way that the railway workers of this country will know that collective bargaining under a mediator will be genuine and effective is if there is an administrator over the railways during all that period of bargaining and negotiation.

In this party we believe that the wage increase provided for in this legislation is inadequate and that it will be ineffective in bringing about the result the government desires. The 6 per cent for this year follows the formula proposed by Mr. Justice Munroe and by Mr. Justice Cameron. But the rest of the formula, which was that there should be a further increase of 4 per cent for the first six months of 1967 and 6 per cent increase for the last half of 1967, is not to be found in the legislation. This leaves the determination of what railway wages will be in 1967 completely up in the air, completely at the mercy of a board which has not yet been appointed. I say that because I am taking it for granted that the railways will not do anything effective with respect to free bargaining and negotiation between now and November 15.

The very least that the railway workers had the right to expect was that if they were to be ordered back to work they would be given an increase of 18 per cent spread over a two year period in line with the Munroe formula. In my opinion the government would have been justified in giving them 25 per cent. That would have been less than the workers were asking. Twenty five per cent can be fully justified in the light of wage rates being paid in the durable industries.

The proposal contained in this legislation is scandalously inadequate and indicates the extent to which this government is out of touch with the people of Canada. If anyone thinks that this statement is too strong, I call as a witness the outstanding Liberal newspaper of Canada, the Toronto Star, which says in an editorial in today's issue:

> It's incredible that the government could have got so far out of touch with the mood and need of the railwaymen.

It goes on to say:

> What if they don't go back? A provision of the Criminal Code specifies two years imprisonment for anyone who disobeys an act of Parliament. Can anyone seriously believe that this is going to be applied against 117,000 railway workers?
> No, the government must be rescued from the ludicrous and dangerous position in which it has placed itself and the country.

This is a Liberal newspaper speaking. This is not a critic of the government but one of its supporters, Mr. Speaker.

For those persons who feel that the amendment which has been moved or the speeches which have been made are obstructionist I will read the next sentence:

> The opposition should hold up the bill and fight for a more realistic wage proposal. The right standard is not to be found in the excessive wage increases won by the dock and seaway workers, but in a formula based on wages in the durable goods industries.

The editorial winds up with these words:

> The government's proposal for continued negotiation under a federal mediator, followed by arbitration, if necessary, is pointless time-wasting. There is no reason to believe that genuine negotiation will take place. And considering the sharpness of the railwaymen's discontent, more waiting seems likelier to heat them up than to cool them off.
> It would be far better for Parliament to impose a decent settlement now. That is the way to get the railways moving again, to insure an equitable deal for the workers, and to maintain a degree of respect for Parliament and the law. That respect is now jeopardized by the government's folly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Douglas: Certainly, if Mr. Speaker will take into consideration the time taken by it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he subscribes to the view expressed in the editorial he just read, that this parliament should set wages?

Mr. Douglas: You have done it. You have done it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have not.

Mr. Douglas: I have already expressed my opposition to wages being set by parliament. But I plead with the government that if it is going to set wages, then in heaven's name set decent and reasonable wages.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, who is always fair and reasonable, will permit a second question?

Mr. Douglas: When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate starts to hand out compliments I know there is trouble ahead. Very well.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he can point out any place where this bill sets wages. Does the bill not state a figure and allow that figure to be increased by mediation or by arbitration?

Mr. Douglas: I can save the hon. gentleman sputtering much longer. May I put it in a single sentence. This bill sets the wage at which a man will be required to work and tells him that anything more will have to be got as a result of the finding of an arbitration board in the event that negotiation does not produce a settlement. If that is not setting wages, I do not know what is.

The Minister of Transport, who is sputtering to himself in his seat, is not going to deceive the railway workers of this country into believing they are not being hijacked into going back to work for wages which they do not know. Nor does the minister know what they are going to be. They may get nothing more than is provided in this bill. They have no guarantee of a single dime more than this bill provides, and the minister knows that. Let the hon. gentleman not try to split hairs and wriggle around to get out of the tight position in which he finds himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Douglas: If the minister wishes to make a speech he can make it, but he is not going to take up my time. Unlike the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, I have limited time at my disposal. I want to make a case and I do not propose to have my time frittered away by nonsensical questions. If the minister wishes to make a speech justifying the government's position I am sure we will all listen to it.

The basic weakness of this legislation is that it may not be effective in getting the men back to work. That is the most serious aspect. Throughout the history of this country the labouring people have been among our most law-abiding citizens and I hope they will continue to be so. But if the government wants people to respect the law, then the law must be deserving of respect. If the government wants the workers of this country to hold parliament in high regard and obey the laws, this parliament must be careful to ensure that the laws it passes are just and fair. This law is neither just nor fair.

These men are not unaware of the fact that if this law is passed it will force them back to work under conditions imposed upon them and about which they have no say whatsoever. They are not unaware of the fact that while their wages will be set by someone else, partly by parliament and partly by an arbitration board, the government and parliament are doing nothing at all about setting the price which a worker has to pay to General Motors for a car or to Canada Packers for a pound of bacon, or what a farmer has to pay to International Harvester for a tractor. They know that this parliament is doing nothing about the steady rise in the interest rates which workers must pay for mortgages on their homes. As a matter of fact, instead of doing nothing government authorities have pushed interest rates higher so that today the worker is paying higher interest rates than ever. It is not lost on the worker that he, along with some of the primary producers, belongs to the one group which is having the price of its labour set by someone else while those who control the economy, those in the monopolies and the combines, continue to set what ever prices they please for the products which the consumer must buy.

If this law is to be obeyed it must be a just law in the eyes of those who are affected by it. The government ought to stop and think about this measure. This parliament can pass a law but legislation will not run trains. Only men can operate trains and only men can make the railroad system work. If the government wants the men to go back to work, as we all do, surely it ought to take a little time now and re-examine this measure.

I suggest to the government that it should consult the representatives of the railway unions and be prepared to amend this legislation by setting rates which will be considered a fair minimum and asking the men to go back to work on the basis of those rates. Then the process of free collective bargaining should take place with respect to what is to be added to those rates. I see no reason for imposing compulsory arbitration. If the government would appoint an administrator to act for the railways in these negotiations, if the government would give to the men a reasonable minimum as a basis upon which to return to work, I believe the process of free, collective bargaining would produce a settlement.

I seriously doubt that an imposed settlement will produce the effect which the government desires. Furthermore, may I say to the government that the situation is not being helped by the statement which was allegedly made yesterday by Mr. Ian Sinclair, the president of the C.P.R., who is quoted in one of our more widely circulated daily newspapers as having said that if the men do not go back to work when this bill is passed they will lose their pension rights. First of all, I doubt that he has the legal right to carry out such a threat. But I suggest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and to the Prime Minister that one of the first things they should do is call Mr. Sinclair and tell him that this type of arrogance is only inflaming the situation and can only incite the men to defy parliament and the law.

Mr. Turner: Would the hon. gentleman not agree that Clause 4(b) of the present bill would anticipate and prevent any such action?

Mr. Douglas: There is no need to tell me that. Tell that to the president of the C.P.R. In any event, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner)—and without many other things—is a lot closer to the president of the C.P.R. than I am, and I suggest he talk to him on the telephone, read that clause to him and tell him to "button his lip", if we are to settle this strike peacefully.

There are other matters in dispute in addition to the matter of wages. Under this legislation all questions having to do with holidays, conditions of work, sickness benefits, vacations and job security are to be submitted to arbitration. I take strong exception to forcing workers to accept working conditions which have been imposed upon them by a tribunal of arbitration. These are things on which the workers have a right to bargain and to bargain freely without any imposition.

Lest I run over my time, Mr. Speaker, I shall interrupt what I am saying to propose an amendment to the amendment. Seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) I move:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "Freedman report", the following words:
> "by imposing compulsory arbitration, and by failing to provide for the appointment of an administrator of the railway companies so that there might be effective collective bargaining,"

I move this amendment because not only is the question of wages important but equally important are these fringe benefits and other matters which are in dispute. I refer particularly to job security. The public is not too aware of the fact that over the past ten years the number of railway employees, although they are handling more tonnage, has actually declined by some 30 per cent. Figures for the C.P.R., for instance, show that in 1957 it had 89,720 employees and last year had 66,837 employees, a decrease of over 30 per cent.

Insecurity and anxiety are prevalent throughout our society and nowhere more prevalent than among railway workers. They have seen innovations and technological changes that have wiped out many jobs. They do not know from day to day or from month to month what is going to happen to them. This came to a head nearly two years ago and as a result of some wildcat strikes the government appointed the Freedman commission.

The Freedman report was brought down last year. Nothing has been done about implementing it but now the government, which has already had a royal commission look into the matter of job security and what is to be done about the workers in the event of technological change, is asking us to refer the whole matter back to another arbitration board which will review it again. Surely members of the government who have quoted the Freedman report and the excellent recommendations it contains throughout the length and breadth of the country do not need to leave this matter to arbitration.

Surely the principles affecting the question of job security for workers, the matter of consultation in the event of technological change and the matter of adequate notice to workers of any changes which affect them, ought to be written into this bill. The workers should not have to go before another arbitration board to argue for something which they already won from the Freedman commission. This is why we support the amendment which has been moved by the Leader of the Opposition. We believe that this legislation is deficient in that it does nothing to implement the recommendations of the Freedman commission and to put those principles on the statute books of Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we hope the government will have second thoughts about this legislation. Before this bill is given second reading we hope the government will be prepared to indicate that it is willing to make some of the changes we have recommended. If it fails to do so then it must accept the responsibility if the legislation is compeletely ineffective in getting the men back to work and getting the trains running again.

But I want to warn the government that if this strike is settled, and I hope it will be settled soon, it should not feel that it has really grappled with the causes that produced the strike. If this strike is brought to a successful conclusion and the men go back to work on terms which are fair and just, the government is going to have other strikes and other labour disputes unless it faces up to the fact that in this so-called affluent society the affluence is not fairly shared by all sections of the community.

The government must face the fact that we have still got unskilled workers, underpaid workers, farmers and fishermen who are getting inadequate incomes, and old age pensioners and veterans on fixed incomes who cannot survive in the face of the rising cost of living. The government must face the fact that the present distribution of income in Canada favours certain groups and that the great mass of the Canadian people are not enjoying the fruits of their collective labour.

The government will have to grapple with the problem of bringing wages, prices and profits into some proper relationship that is consonant with social justice. The time has come when we must either revamp the Canadian economy or face the prospect of having other economic crises like that which now faces the country. The railway strike will not be the end. It will only be one in a long series of crises unless we are prepared to face up to the fact that the present economy is an economic jungle in which the powerful are able to take the lion's share and the great bulk of the people have to be satisfied with what is left.

We shall have dislocations and social upheaval in Canada until we are prepared to build a society founded on economic planning and social justice. Let us not deceive ourselves that ending one strike will bring industrial peace to Canada. That will depend entirely upon substituting a planned economic and social democracy for our jungle economy.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we have now before us two amendments to Bill C-230.

The second amendment, that is the subamendment which I just received, has been moved by the N.D.P.; I draw the attention of the N.D.P. leader (Mr. Douglas) who, when he comes in the province of Quebec, speaks highly of the French language, of bilingualism in Canada, to the fact that his amendment is in English and that no French copies are available. The hon. member for York

South (Mr. Lewis) tells me that he did not have time to prepare a French copy, but that is just it, there has been no time for that for too long. That is why we hear people complain not only in the province of Quebec but nearly everywhere When we move a subamendment or an amendment, we take the time to prepare it in English as well as in French because we recognize that all through Canada both languages must be dealt with in the same manner.

Mr. Speaker, the N.D.P. amendment provides the insertion, after the words "Freedman Report" of the following words:

> By imposing compulsory arbitration and by failing to provide for the appointment of an administrator of the railway companies so that there might be effective collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker, that amendment changes nothing or practically nothing to the bill before us. In fact, the bill provides that before compulsory arbitration there will be mediation, there will be a mediator who will consider the whole situation.

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am not clear whether the hon. member for Villeneuve is raising a point of order on the subamendment. If he is not addressing himself to that point, since we have been unable to obtain a copy of it, I should like to reserve our right to raise a point of order with regard to the subamendment. Until we are able to obtain a copy of it, we have no objection to the debate continuing.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I have no objection to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) considering the amendment in order to decide whether or not it is in order.

However, I wish to call once again the attention of the house to the fact that the appointment of an administrator, as suggested by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas), will not settle the labour problem in Canada.

As far as the amendment proper moved by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is concerned, I mentioned earlier that this amendment is more or less meaningless. And if we recall what his government did about labour matters when he was prime minister, and more specifically, regarding the Canadian National Railways in 1960, we find that the Leader of the Official Opposition did not work any miracle at that time. The labour problems were not solved; the national railroad problems were not solved in the least. Yet, today, it is claimed that the Munroe report is not included in the bill, the chairman of the arbitration board indicates not a single efficient method to settle the problems of fringe benefits and gives no indication as to the implementation of the Freedman report.

Mr. Speaker, we are swamped with all kinds of reports. We are stifled under reports from right and left. Day after day, stacks of reports are brought in and the question has never been solved, the problem has never been settled.

On August 16 last, 15 days ago, I handed the press the following release:

> Nowhere in the world has a strike ever settled the labour problem.

That is so true that it always has to be done all over again.

Consider any sphere of the economic activity in Canada and you will see that that is true, be it within the mining industry, the textile industry, the national railways, the building industry, agriculture, be it in any sphere of economic activity in Canada, never have strikes settled the labour issue. It always has to be done all over again. The end of a strike spells the beginning of another.

We are presently considering Bill C-230 aimed at ending the railway strike. While we are discussing this bill, the postal workers' strike is being planned in Canada. The Postmaster General (Mr. Côté), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) are aware of this. After the postal workers' strike there will be another strike. Mention is made today in the press of a strike involving 16,000 men in the Sudbury area. There was a strike not so long ago and the problem was solved; a solution was found at that time. Today we have to start all over again. With the railways it is the same thing.

In 1950, under the St. Laurent administration, there was a nine-day National railways strike. What did the Leader of the Opposition say at that time? Back in 1960, former Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent proposed and obtained compulsory arbitration in spite of opposition reproaches—the Conservative opposition—concerning the railway problem in Canada.

On December 2, 1960, after the Diefenbaker government had the house pass the Railway Operation Continuation Act, which suspended for a period of six months railwaymen's right to strike, that is until May 15, 1961, during that six month period, negotiations went on between employer and employees, and early in May 1961, an agreement occurred between the parties.

In 1966, the same problem arises with much more serious and disastrous consequences for Canada and the Canadian people.

In addition, the threat of a strike—of an inflationary strike-crisis, and everyone is talking about it—the strike or strikes are the result of circumstances, of a political and economic situation which exists in Canada today. What will the government do to solve efficiently once and for all that conflict which has been dragging for almost 20 years? The leader of the opposition in 1960 was the present Prime Minister; he stated then, at pages 446 and 447 of Hansard I think:

I do not intend to try to block or delay passage of this bill at this time by any procedural move. However, before the vote is taken I intend to set out briefly but I hope clearly the sole but significant difference between the government and the Liberal opposition on this bill. We agree with the government that there should be no railway strike at this time.

The same remarks were made last night by the Leader of the Opposition.

We agree with the government that there should be no railway strike at this time. We agree with the government that it has become necessary to prevent this strike which otherwise would start tomorrow morning. We have already made that statement.

We do not agree with the government that the workers involved in this matter should be compelled by law to continue to work at wages below the standard accepted in comparable occupations where strikes are permitted, which standard has been used in negotiations previously.

It is the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, speaking.

Our position is that in compelling the men to remain at work, the bill should also compel the companies to pay wages that a conciliation board, with a chairman appointed by the government, found to be fair and reasonable.

The present Prime Minister said that when he was leader of the opposition.

However, if the government persists in maintaining the bill as it is, we cannot vote to force men to work for wages judged to be substandard by the Milvain conciliation board set up by the government. Therefore the government and its supporters will have to take exclusive responsibility for this unjust method to prevent a strike, which strike, however, we also believe must be prevented at this time in the public interest.

[Mr. Caouette.]

That statement was made by the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition, about a similar conflict at the time when the present Leader of the Opposition was prime minister, on December 2, 1960, as reported at pages 446 and 447 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, today we hear the same thing from the Leader of the Opposition, those very words that were used in 1960 by the present Prime Minister.

We find here on page 345 of the official report for November 30, 1960, what the minister of labour of the time, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), had to say about a piece of legislation providing for the maintenance of railway operation:

At this point, I would refer to the words of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, then prime minister, when dealing with a similar situation in this House in 1950.

That was ten years before.

Mr. St. Laurent spoke against the background of a railway strike which had been in progress for nine days. That strike he described as a national emergency. If continued over a lengthy period of time, he told the house then, it would bring the economy of the nation to a complete standstill.

This legislation, Mr. Speaker, is being brought forward in order to prevent a repetition of a similar national emergency.

That was the then minister of labour, who is now the hon. member for Ontario in the official opposition, speaking. Now, we find that this crisis is repeating itself, this time still more acute. And the then minister of labour said:

In 1950, the emergency was allowed to happen. In 1960, it will not be allowed to happen.

Really, it is edifying to hear today the Leader of the Opposition tell us exactly the opposite of what his assistants said at that time.

—of a strike, at this time would be to throw out of work some 170,000 railway employees. This figure would be doubled by the resulting unemployment of those who depend upon the railways as a means of economic subsistence.

In 1950, for example, in addition to the railway workers unemployed as a result of the strike, some 70,000 workers in other industries were laid off and, in 1960, the figure would be substantially higher. The direct and indirect consequences which would flow from a strike at this time would be disastrous in their magnitude.

That was the minister of labour of that time speaking. This is even more true in 1966. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Ontario then said this crisis should not occur again? Why, following their 1960 legislation, does this crisis recur today whereas according to what they said then, everything was definitively under control and the Conservatives boasted of having settled the railway dispute in Canada?

Mr. Speaker, the labour problem has never been settled by strikes. This does not mean that we do not want better working condition for the workers. We know and realize that, in many cases, the workers do not receive the treatment they deserve.

For example, there are the raises demanded in certain fields or sectors of the economy which may be compared to the starvation wages paid by Ayers to its Lachute workers.

Mr. Speaker, while others help to raise prices in Canada, what about the situation of workers such as those in Lachute who have large families and earn at the most $40 a week?

How can those people live in Canada now? And if those people and those families, Mr. Speaker, find it difficult to make a living in Canada, is it because Canada is not able to produce more than enough goods and services? Is it because Canada lacks natural resources? Is it because Canada lacks intelligent and brave people?

Mr. Speaker, it is the system that is a fault. It is the system which produces strikes. It is the system which is responsible for inflation; and yet the government does not lift a finger to control that system and make it serve those who are ready and willing to develop all the potential in Canada.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the wrongs of the system. And that is why my statement continued.

The workers themselves are victims of the strikes.

The workers suffer from the strikes. Not only the railway workers now on strike, but many others. The discharge or lay-off of 2,000 miners in Sudbury because the trains are no longer running is a result of this strike. Other workers pay for the strike. The farmers left with their wheat harvest in the west, who cannot ship it: again, workers struggling against the system, results of the railway strike.

We federal members are not deprived of our income and our standard of living does not suffer from these strikes. Neither are the income and the standard of living of labour leaders affected by the strikes. It is the workers themselves who suffer, along with their wives and their children all across Canada. It is they who pay for the strikes. Financiers are not affected by strikes.

When chartered banks are allowed to raise their rates of interest purely on account of the creation of credit, this is legalization of monumental theft in Canada. Those people, the financiers, do not pay for strikes: Proof of this is provided by the fact that the government is getting ready, by means of another bill, to make us accept a raise in the rates of goods shipped by rail which will cause price increases. And do you believe price increases affect financiers?

When prices go up in industry, and industry rakes in 20 per cent, or 10 or 12 per cent in profits, Mr. Speaker, these profits come from price increases just as before. That means the big ones grow, in smaller numbers and small ones get smaller in larger numbers.

This is the financial system in which we live. And the government is not aware of this yet; nor are the labour leaders. They keep fighting with each other. I ask you, is one union better than the other?

I will undoubtedly be accused of being against trade unions and of being a lot of other things, after this speech.

Mr. Speaker, I admit officially that without the trade unions, workers would not be treated as they are today. I admit that unions have rendered immense services to all sectors of our national economy. I admit this has been the case from the standpoint of economy, politics and society. However, labour leaders have lost their heads, they are running around in circles much as a dog runs after its tail. Whenever someone cannot solve his problem he runs around insulting everyone, having no solution to offer. Even while we are debating Bill No. C-230, labour leaders have said this morning that if this bill is passed by the House of Commons of Canada, workers still will not go back to work. The labour leaders have said this; responsible people, people who think they are very important and who think they can make anyone do their bidding through intimidation. Mr. Speaker, no labour leader can make me toe the line by force; I am ready to hold a dialogue with him, though.

My statement to the newspapers went on in these terms:

It is my opinion that certain labour leaders must be brought back to reason, because their sole aim is to sow hatred and general confusion.

What is being done? Labour leaders lay the blame on those who are in the upper wage brackets. They attack those who make profits. Mr. Speaker, federal members of parliament here receive $18,000 per year, expenses included, $18,000 a year. Not one labour leader—and I dare them to deny this earns less than twice that amount. The Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) knows that labour leaders are now better paid than any federal member of parliament.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am being asked a question. I may say that the statement just uttered by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is untrue and as a former president of the C.N.T.U. I have never been paid twice the indemnity of a member of parliament.

Mr. Caouette: It was not an indemnity, Mr. Speaker, it was expenses and such expenses were substantially higher than salaries.

I will give him two examples: In the United Steelworkers of American, two small local leaders in our own area, one in Val d'Or and one in Rouyn—and the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) former president of the C.N.T.U. knew them very well, these chaps from the Abitibi and Rouyn-Noranda region—two local labour leaders, now established in Montreal, at Laval des Rapides, in $45,000 homes. These people are very well paid; they have two cars at their door. Now, I have nothing against people who are well paid and who have two cars at their front door—His and Hers—but I do have a grudge, for instance, against labour leaders who constantly attack private enterprise and call the parties concerned communists or bad capitalists. Small businessmen who operate a store on the street corner are branded as capitalists and small industrials do not even earn in a year what those people make in six months.

That is sheer discrimination and class warfare on the part of some labour leaders in Canada and in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I will give no names but I can bring the Minister of Manpower with me to Laval des Rapides and show him the two houses I have just spoken about.

Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking through my hat and the minister knows that everything is not as it should be. It is so true that when he was president of the C.N.T.U., the minister spoke in the same vein as Marcel Pépin, the present president, does now. Mr. Pépin is not happy with Bill No. C-230 whereas the minister who, as president of the C.N.T.U. was trying to ingratiate the workers and wanted politics to be subdued and become the handmaiden of labour, must now, because of cabinet solidarity, accept to recommend a piece of legislation which offers a 6 per cent increase to the nation's railway workers. The minister is aware of that; it is exactly the contrary of what he advocated throughout the province for 25 years. That is what the minister does here today.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Marchand: I wonder if that is true.

Mr. Caouette: The minister knows it too. He may well look up to see if he has any opposition but it is true.

Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to direct attention to the fact that there should be no interruption or comment of any kind from people in the galleries if they want to stay in the galleries.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like you to repeat in French what you have just said, because the person concerned speaks French very well.

Mr. Speaker: I ask for the co-operation of hon. members to ensure if possible that there is no comment or interruption from the people in the galleries.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, some labour leaders spend their time criticizing salaries and profits and in this house, we hear members of the New Democratic Party speak against profits and high salaries but, Mr. Speaker, profits contribute to foster ambition, to promote private enterprise. Without any initiative, there is no progress. When individual initiative is discouraged, instead of going forward, we go backwards. When I hear members of the N.D.P. talk about profits and high salaries, it reminds me of the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who does not look like a poor man, and of the member for York South (Mr. Lewis), a prominent lawyer—

[English]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is quoting a myth.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, that reminds me of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), a distinguished lawyer of the city of Toronto. Do you honestly believe that the hon. member for York South does not have a better income than the workers of the city of Toronto? It is all very well to speak against profits but the member for York South derives a profit in the practice of his profession. He sells his services; he does not give them free of charge. It is the same for the member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) connected with an important firm of distinguished lawyers in Toronto.

It is easy for well-to-do people to tell humble folk: Well, old chap, we will work for you.

We will force the socialist system upon you, a system which will enable you to live properly, under which you will have security and freedom. The freedom in the hands of the government.

Mr. Speaker, we have had some of those solutions proposed by the government. A while ago the leader of the New Democratic Party spoke about Sweden where everyone works, where there are no unemployed, where people do not have the right to strike now.

Mr. Douglas: Oh, never.

Mr. Caouette: In Russia also, people do not have the right to strike. We went there last year.

Mr. Lewis: You do not know.

Mr. Caouette: In Sweden, it is the same, Mr. Speaker. Let the member for York South tell me since when there has been no strike in Sweden. The government intervenes immediately and it is the government which settles strikes in Sweden.

The hon. member for York South knows that.

Mr. Lewis: I do not know that, because it is not true.

Mr. Caouette: In Russia, the present government was organized by union leaders in 1917 through strikes such as those we now have. They led the workers to believe that with a labour government, a government ruled by union leaders, they would get security.

Of course. Everybody works in Russia. The man, the woman, the young people, everybody is working. We went there last year. We saw women driving steam rollers on asphalt in the streets. We saw women coming out of coal mines wearing heavy helmets on their heads. We saw that everybody was working. How many hours a week? After 50 years of administration, 46 hours a week. Not 40 hours as they call for in Canada, not 36 hours, but 46.

Mr. Speaker, in Russia the salary of a skilled worker is not $4 an hour. Not even $2.37 an hour as the railway workers earn at present. A skilled worker earns $100 a month. As for an ordinary worker, he gets between $60 and $65 per month, and not per week. The standard of living, the cost of living over there is much lower than in Canada. You can get an apartment with three rooms for $15 a month—the leader of the N.D.P. was with me in Russia at that time—but we would not live in those apartments.

For instance, food prices are about the same as in Canada. Clothing is more expensive than in Canada. Electrical appliances, refrigerators, television sets, etc. cost twice as much as in Canada.

As for the motor car industry—we went to Czechoslovakia—I asked the vice president how much a small car cost in Czechoslovakia, that is the small Skoda car, made in Czechoslovakia where the wages and labour conditions are the same as in Russia. The Skoda car sells in Canada for $1,700. For $1,700, we can get a Skoda car. In Czechoslovakia, where the Skoda is made, there were 6,000 employees in the shops we visited, the Skoda sells for $6,200. As a worker earns $65 per month you will readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that not too many Skoda cars are seen in Czechoslovakia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Bicycles with pedals or even without pedals are seen over there. People walk or use public means of transportation, such as buses which run without a hitch.

In the yard of the Skoda plant, the morning we went there, we saw fewer than 25 cars. I asked the president: How is it that your cars are so expensive here and so cheap in Canada and in America? It is quite easy to understand, he said, we produce for export purposes. And he added: "Here in Czechoslovakia, we do not want people to buy cars, for then we would have to build roads and we have many more important things to do. I was told this by the vice president of Czechoslovakia, one night, when we were guests at a party given in our honour by the president of Czechoslovakia, in some castle or other.

An hon. Member: A N.D.P. government in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Caouette: Exactly, an N.D.P. government. Mr. Speaker, these are the systems which the N.D.P. people would like to establish in Canada. We do not want that system. That is the system which some union leaders would like us to have. They would like to take over and become members of the government, just like in Russia, in Czechoslovakia, in Sweden, in Norway, in all those countries. Their standard of living is way below ours. We will be told: Yes, but they are only beginning. Communism has been in existence in Russia for the past 50 years. When we look 50 years back and compare the situation in Canada with that of Russia, we see that the two countries were about even; but after 50 years of administration and development, today I say that we are definitely at least 25 years ahead of Russia with regard to the standard of living. We are ahead of them. We have everything in all our homes—even people who are on welfare here have a better life than workers in Russia. They enjoy more services.

This goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that socialist systems have many things in common. Under such systems the government belittles man at will. Oh, people have security, certainly. When I have a nice little dog in my house, I give it security. I feed it and pet it. I take care of it, but I control its freedom, I am the one who decides when it goes out and when it comes in. That is what they would like to do to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in my communiqué, that handful of labour leaders consciously or unconsciously play into the hands of the communists; they never strike out against the true cause of the political, economic and social unrest, which is finance. They say nothing about that. When interest rates go up, Claude Jodoin does not say a word. Neither do Marcel Pepin, Mr. Laberge or the former president of the C.N.T.U., the Minister of Manpower. They accept the hike in interest rates. Let the minister go and tell that to his constituents at the next election and we will take care of him, Mr. Speaker. We will remind him of the promises he made during the 25 years; we will recall to his mind how he sacrificed himself and gave of himself during the 25 years. He is not the same man since he has joined the Liberal party. Before, I thought he was a good man but not today, Mr. Speaker. Never do those labour leaders get to the true cause of political, economic and social unrest. As I have said, only the Créditistes offer a genuine solution by starting to put finance at the service of man.

An hon. Member: Through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Caouette: Surely through the Bank of Canada, Mr. Speaker. I hear the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette)—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? It is because in 1963, I asked the hon. member for Villeneuve a question, as reported in Hansard on page 63. At that time, I asked to what extent unemployment would be reduced in Canada if Social Credit were to come to power and he answered: One hundred per cent and I enjoyed his reply very much. I will now ask him, if ever we have a Social Credit government in this country, whether all strikes would be abolished in Canada?

Mr. Caouette: I honestly think so, Mr. Speaker, and I shall tell him why. Because on the day when the purchasing power of individuals in Canada is on a par with the true production in this country, at such time, the income of the citizens will never exceed the production in Canada so that inflation will be impossible. Deflation will also be impossible, because the process will be automatic and as the people produce, income rises and as the people no longer want to produce, income diminishes.

Strikes are contrary to common sense, because production is decreased during a strike, and increased incomes are being sought, which is absolutely illogical.

Now to come back to my line of thought, Mr. Speaker. If the solutions offered by Social Credit do not seem logical, what can be said about the solutions offered under the present system which, year after year, every ten and every 20 years bring up the same problem without ever achieving a settlement? After the railroad strike, there will be another.

What we say is that when the worker is sure to have on hand the money or the credit to purchase the products made by him in Canada, then, Mr. Speaker, strikes will disappear but unions will remain to look after the security of the workers, to deal with labour problems which, by that time, will not be monetary problems.

The Social Credit solution is a national dividend based upon our wealth and our riches, a dividend distributed to all, so that each and every one will have a purchasing power conformable to production, and then security and freedom will both be guaranteed to each and every one in our country.

• (6:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: When the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam introduced the subamendment the reservation was made by the Minister of Public Works, I understand, that an argument might be made as to the procedure to be adopted in relation to the subamendment.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I propose to raise a point of order centring upon the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I advance my argument on three fronts.

First, I respectfully invite your attention to citation 389 of Beauchesne, fourth edition. I quote the first sentence:

> A motion opposing the second reading of a bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee.

If I may go to the proposed subamendment, the first sentence contains the words, "by imposing compulsory arbitration." It is my respectful submission that during the consideration of the bill in committee of the whole it would be open to the hon. member, if he so desired, to move to strike out clause 10(2), which would achieve the purpose now proposed by the amendment. If this citation 389 of Beauchesne, is to have any effect whatever, I respectfully suggest that this would be a classic illustration.

The second ground of my argument is contained in citation 202(3). It reads:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment—

I do not think I do any violence to the words of the hon. member who moved the subamendment when I say that it is really an extension of the number of reasons advanced by the Leader of the Opposition in moving the amendment. It is in effect an enlargement by a number of new reasons why the bill should not be read. Therefore it comes clearly within the four corners of citation 202(3), to be found at page 169 of Beauchesne, fourth edition.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the appointment of an administrator would involve a charge upon the treasury and therefore the subamendment cannot be put unless by a member of the treasury benches. For these reasons I respectfully submit that the subamendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word with respect to the points which have been raised by the Solicitor General. He bases his first argument on citation 389 where reference is made to the fact that on second reading a motion must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a repetition of the argument that was advanced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when we were debating the validity of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

It was my contention then that on second reading we are dealing with the broad principle of the bill and that if we wished to object to or to modify that basic principle the place to declare that opposition or modification is on second reading. I submit that the arguments which persuaded Your Honour to allow the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition should persuade Your Honour that the subamendment is likewise in order.

If I may put in capsule form what I have been saying thus far, I submit that citation 389 does not take away from the right which is set out in citation 382, namely the right of a member on second reading, when dealing with the principle, to move an amendment declaratory of some principle that should be advanced before we proceed further with the bill.

With respect to the argument of the Solicitor General based on citation 202(3) of Beauchesne, fourth edition, may I re-read the words he read:

> —it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment;—

Even though this subamendment deals with the basic proposition of the amendment, namely, that the bill does not provide an adequate solution of the current impasse, nevertheless the subamendment does what citation 203(3) permits. It deals with matters that are not covered by the amendment. The two matters referred to are, of course, the reference in the bill to compulsory arbitration and the failure of the bill to deal with the possible appointment of an administrator.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the very citations which the Solicitor General has relied on are citations not against the validity of the subamendment but rather they support the right of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam at the second reading stage to add these other matters to this declaration of principle.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their advice, guidance and assistance to the Chair. I would first refer to the argument put forward by the Solicitor General. He referred to citation 389, which was advanced earlier in argument today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I believe. On this point I am in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This argument was found not acceptable earlier today; therefore the precedent having been set I feel bound to follow it.

I would suggest that the second argument is more to the point. Citation 202(3) of Beauchesne, fourth edition, reads:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

It seems to me on reading the subamendment as proposed that if it means anything it advances something new and suggests a new proposal.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to citation 202(3) of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which is to the effect that the subamendment should deal with matters that are not covered in the amendment. That is so and I accept that proposition. But we must still respect the principle of relevancy as outlined in citation 203(1) of Beauchesne, and even if the subamendment is advancing something new it has to be relevant to the amendment which the subamendment seeks to alter.

For these reasons I think that the proposal advanced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam cannot be accepted at this time in the form of a subamendment.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could raise another point of order which has no relation to the ruling you have just made. Perhaps I might address it in the form of a question to the government house leader. Would he be willing to take the sense of the house on whether it might be desirable to take a little time off to eat?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that would be quite agreeable. It would be a matter of when we should reconvene.

Mr. Starr: We in this party would be agreeable to that, Mr. Speaker, provided we do not rise at ten o'clock but sit until we complete this legislation.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, we are quite agreeable to that. I wish to suggest to the house that we forgo the late show. Tonight there is only one speaker. Instead of going on with the late show, could the house not consider this legislation? I am referring to the bill now before the house. We are agreeable to the proposal to adjourn for dinner.

Mr. McIlraith: Two new points have been raised, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Starr: We are in favour of both.

Mr. McIlraith: One has to do with the proceedings with respect to oral questions under the motion to adjourn. The government is agreeable to forgoing this until the conclusion of the debate on the railway bill.

On the other point, the representative of the official opposition has suggested that we sit continuously until this bill is finished. That is a pretty tall order. I have no objection to sitting after ten o'clock so that there will be no time lost, but to put the matter in the form in which he wishes to put it might involve a long time. It might involve some days. I have had no information from the opposition groups as to the time they expect to take on the various stages of the bill. If they would modify the form of their request perhaps we could deal with the proposition at ten o'clock, or now.

In any event, the suggestion originally made was that we adjourn for a dinner hour and to that we are quite agreeable. I am also agreeable that we consider the other matter at ten o'clock. It seems to me that the suggestion which has been made is sensible and would permit some hon. colleagues who are directly and immediately involved with relation to this bill to have certain discussions, which they must of necessity have, during the dinner hour. Perhaps it would be a sensible arrangement, and we could consider how late we might sit tonight—

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the suggestion that has been made that we sit until the bill is completed I point out that, as the whole country knows, this is a vitally important matter. We are here to deal with a matter where every hour counts. Producers all over the country are being held up by lack of rail shipment. I think the country expects that we continue sitting if we physically can, and I think we can. This party is thoroughly in favour of sitting until this legislation is completed today.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, surely the crucial nature of the business before us requires us to support the suggestion made by the opposition house leader, the hon. member for Ontario. Unless the government wishes to assure us that it will amend the legislation, I think we should follow his suggestion and sit until the conclusion of the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I had risen to ask a question of the hon. member for Northumberland. I accept his proposition about the importance of the bill and the legislation. That is why last night I asked his leader to agree to the house continuing to sit for a few minutes after ten o'clock in order that he might conclude his remarks. I was quite mystified when he refused that very modest and reasonable request. I am now a little more mystified to find that the hon. member for Northumberland is at variance with his leader on that very point. In any event, the whip of that party has had his leader move an amendment to defeat the legislation altogether and kill the bill.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. McIlraith: I just do not understand his now asking to have the bill, which he has just by his amendment sought to have defeated, put through.

Mr. Churchill: You can bring in another one.

Mr. McIlraith: So the remarks of the house leader for the party, which he has made, I think, in a spirit of desiring to get on with the business before us, are difficult to understand in relation to the remarks of his own colleagues in that party. What I should like to return to is—

An hon. Member: You are asking for trouble.

Mr. McIlraith: —the simple proposition whether or not the house wishes to have a short adjournment for the dinner hour. So far as we are concerned we are agreeable to that, and we are quite prepared to deal with the question of how late we should sit tonight and to go along with any reasonable proposition on that score. But it should be something that is responsible and reasonable.

Mr. Starr: In view of the house leader's remarks we withdraw any suggestion that we made previously. We should abide by the rules and sit during the dinner hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order raised by the government house leader, he should not be sore at the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who last night wanted to adjourn at ten o'clock because it took him all night to produce the amendment as colorless and insignificant as the one we had this afternoon; I understand him—

[English]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A it is my duty to inform the house that the question to be raised at the time of adjournment this evening is the following: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Canadian Pacific Railway—reported statement respecting pension rights of workers.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for the second reading of Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees, and on the amendment of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, one point perhaps should be clarified with respect to the remarks made a few minutes ago when an hon. member raised a request as to abandoning the right to debate questions on the motion for adjournment at ten o'clock and using that time for debate on the railway bill.

Mr. Starr: No.

Mr. McIlraith: That point got lost in the subsequent discussion.

Mr. Starr: Only because of your remarks.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, as the member who has the item posted for the late show, I was prepared to surrender it for tonight if we could come to some agreement about the supper hour. Since the hon. member for Ontario has said that the rules must stand, all right, let the rules stand.

Mr. Starr: I made that statement in view of what the government house leader had said.

An hon. Member: We want justice.

Mr. Starr: What does the hon. member know about justice?

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we have an amendment before the house, the subamendment having been ruled out of order. The subamendment brought out a principle which is very important, one of which we should take cognizance. To have accepted it would have meant taking over the right of railroad management to take part in the negotiations which must continue with the railroad unions looking toward a settlement of this strike. In other words, it would be placing parliament in the position of an arbitrator and I am confident that neither the union leaders nor their membership want this. The door must not be closed to negotiation. When parliament acts it is compulsion, whether we like it or not. I should have thought that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), who raised this question, need only look at the situation which exists in Great Britain at the present time and the action taken by the prime minister of that country to find verification of what I have said.

As to the amendment itself, it seems to me it has no other purpose than to do away with the entire legislation which is before us in the form of Bill No. C-230. It would kill the bill. In my opinion this is not the time when such a proposal should even be considered by members of this house.

If there are provisions in this bill which are considered to be unsatisfactory there will be an opportunity to deal with them by amendment in committee of the whole. That is the proper way in which to correct weak points in the measure. Certainly, however, to kill or eliminate the bill which has been presented to us is not a responsible way in which to deal with the crisis which has brought this emergency sitting into being.

Having said this, let me make it clear that we agree there are many faults in the economy and that union members have many legitimate complaints. There are many aspects of this strike which lie, so to speak, beneath the surface, and these can never be dealt with until some of the gross errors affecting the economy have been corrected. Until we have a financial policy which is adequate to care of the economic needs of our country we shall continue to face problems of this kind.

This we admit. But the legislation we are dealing with now, and the reason we are here, concerns the crisis which has been precipitated by the strike action that the railroad unions have taken. To deal with this situation is our first and most important responsibility. That is the number one priority. So let us return to the priorities and deal with them in a positive way remembering that it is the welfare of the nation and the well-being of the economy in general which are involved.

I say again that the immediate crisis which faces the nation centres on the railroad strike. Our jog in parliament is to end that strike and get the railroads running again. It is not our immediate job to conduct an inquiry into the reasons behind the strike or to determine why the strike came about. There will be another time for that.

There is a great deal behind this rail stoppage. Lack of action in the past, poor working conditions and other factors have all contributed. The strike does not reflect any single problem; it is a symptom of something which is much deeper, a problem which the government must recognize and toward the solution of which it must direct its legislative program.

Nevertheless the country cannot be plunged into irretrievable loss and economic chaos while all the rights and wrongs are debated in parliament. The national interest must come first and the national interest at this time demands the resumption of rail services. This is the first priority, though the other factors to which I have referred are admittedly of great importance. I am merely placing first things first.

These contributing factors, the fringe benefits which are involved as well as the over-all picture of a rapidly rising cost of living, can and must be settled later. Today it is the strike which must be dealt with. To stand before this house for more than half an hour and play to union leaders in the galleries is merely to becloud the issue. Let us return to realities.

The legislation before us makes four basic proposals in this strike emergency which has quickly become a national crisis of the greatest magnitude. First, the railroads are to resume operation immediately this bill becomes law. That is why we are here. Transportation is the lifeblood of a nation and unless transportation is performing its function well the whole economy is sick. Second, an interim wage increase has been set at 4 per cent plus 4 per cent as a basis for negotiation later. This does not set the wages. As I interpret the provision this is merely a guarantee of a minimum floor level which the workers can expect from the negotiations which are to take place. It is not to be arbitration in the first instance; it is to be direct collective bargaining.

Should these negotiations end in agreement on a greater amount, that is what the workers will receive. The provision in the bill represents an assurance that there will be at least a minimum. I am bound to agree with this because it is what Mr. Justice Munroe recommended. He recommended 4 per cent for the first six months, 4 per cent for the second six months, 4 per cent for the third and 6 per cent for the fourth half year period. This legislation refers only to the first year because it is expected that the negotiations which are to continue will take care of the second year. That is exactly what Judge Munroe recommended and to try to deceive the public into believing this is only a 6 per cent increase is wrong. It is a 4 per cent increase plus a 4 per cent increase, exactly what it says.

An hon. Member: What is the average per year?

Mr. Thompson: It averages 6 per cent. But the figure was arrived at in the light of the 18 per cent which was recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and to say it is less than 8 per cent amounts to misrepresentation. This is a guarantee of an immediate floor, an assurance which is a reasonable one even though it may not meet the demands of the unions.

I say we must face this second point for what it actually is. In the Ottawa Citizen of today I notice an editorial which is extremely relevant to this legislation. It states in part:

> The increase proposed in the legislation, at 4 per cent from January 1, and an additional 4 per cent from July 1, is plainly merely a point of departure. It is based on the recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe, chairman of one of the five boards of conciliation that sat on the railway wage dispute. The government had to start somewhere, for the men have had no increase in almost three years, their last contract having expired on December 31 last. Justice Munroe's proposal was probably as good a starting point as any.

> But that is evidently all it is. The government is not imposing this increase on either the unions or management as the terms of the final settlement. If the government did impose a wage increase, however large, democracy would be on the way to the graveyard.

Therefore it is not the responsibility of parliament to arbitrate and set the terms of the final agreement between management and labour.

> For if the government could decide the level of industrial wages, it could come down on the side of low wages as easily as on the side of high pay. Union members who have felt the government should take more assertive action and impose a wage settlement, ought to think of the power of government to reduce as well as to raise wages.

In that connection I might refer to the action taken by Prime Minister Wilson in freezing wages. That is what he has done.

> Only the processes of collective bargaining, with government intervention kept at a minimum, can protect the democratic rights of workers.

Let us not forget that.

Third, this legislation provides for continuing negotiations, for collective bargaining until at least November 15, a minimum of ten weeks. If we read the legislation carefully we find there is provision within it whereby if the report made at that time indicates that negotiation is going on satisfactorily it can continue even beyond that date. So in the third instance this legislation is providing for the continuation of free negotiations. For the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to refer continually to this as compulsory arbitration is not correct because compulsory arbitration is something which lies beyond the period of negotiation mentioned in the bill.

In addition to the salary problems there are, as I mentioned yesterday, many other legitimate problems which concern the workers. I am referring to working conditions. Just the other day it was mentioned to me that the cabooses which still are part of freight trains have not yet been equipped with electric lights or toilet equipment. There are many other things which are grievances so far as the workers are concerned and must be considered.

Likewise there is the whole area of allowing for the effects of automation. This should not be part of this bill because it is not the responsibility of parliament to arbitrate in these things. It is part of the negotiations that are continuing and will continue until November 15 and beyond if the results at that time warrant continued negotiation on that basis. But in the event that the results do not a board of arbitration will be set up then whose findings are to be binding.

Free collective bargaining has been the basis of labour-management operations for a long time. It should continue; it must continue. Government's role in the past has been to set rules so that the system would operate fairly and the well-being of the general public would be adequately safeguarded. But the unions and management cannot have it both ways. If they intend to appeal to the government for solutions to their problems—and it is evident that both union leaders and management felt this was necessary—then they must quit paying lip service to free collective bargaining and accept the consequences of compulsory arbitration.

The field of industrial relations is the area in which the government has a new role to play in setting up conditions under which the fruits of automation will be more equitably spread across the nation. Automation has increased productivity tremendously in the production industries. The result is that for the first time we have the money and the manpower to undertake great new developments in the social and cultural fields.

Government does have a responsibility to make sure that this takes place. That is why the suggestion made the other day by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), one which I believe should have come from the government a long time ago, that a labour study commission should be set up is a step in the right direction. There also needs to be a study made of each particular industry to allow labour and management to plan in advance for the changes that are coming.

This is why government does have a definite responsibility in industrial labour relations to bring about consultation in a way which we have not yet seen. Government has this responsibility and it applies not only to the situation on the railways but in the whole transportation industry. Government also has the responsibility in connection with its own legislation to bring together the various aspects of management and technical development in order that we can plan to meet the problems that are inevitable in the future and thus anticipate them rather than being forced into a situation like that in which we are at the present time of having to deal with a crisis that involves the economic well-being of the entire nation.

In this regard I would state that perhaps Bill No. C-230 could have been better worded. There has been some lack of explanation and it requires rewording in some places. The 4 per cent plus 4 per cent formula should have been amplified and explained. There should have been some reference or assurance regarding provision for the results of automation and the government's responsibility in bringing industry and labour together.

I also think there should have been some reference in the legislation to amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, particularly with regard to broader use of the job security fund which was established in 1962. Further, some reference could well have been made to Judge Little's report, a very important report which demonstrates with clarity many of the things that the C.N.R. is already doing in anticipation of future developments.

Yesterday the Prime Minister gave an explanation of why a 30 per cent settlement was justified in the case of the seaway workers and the Quebec longshoremen. Why did he not give it when the settlements were made? Why was there not some reference to it in the television appearance which he made a few nights ago? If this explanation had been given it would have been easy for the labour unions to understand and realize what they felt they were seeking as their just desserts as the result of previous settlements.

Why was there not some mention made of the need for a work stabilization agreement? If the details of fringe benefits are not the job of parliament then neither are the details of working out these things to which I have just referred. Likewise I believe there should have been some mention made in the bill, although it is not our responsibility to work out or implement the details, of the government's intention to deal with the problems of inflation. No one can deny that Canada is heading into a critical inflationary period much faster than is the case in the United States. I think the unions will agree with management and with all of us that we cannot continue as we are.

Let us stop for a few minutes and look at the air lines settlement in the United States which was on a 4.9 per cent basis. There was a great hue and cry in the United States because this was higher than the general increase in the productivity of that country, which is taking place at the rate of about 3.2 per cent, not too different from what it is in Canada. But then it was explained that the airlines has gone ahead at a faster rate of expansion, something on the average of 6 per cent, and that 4.9 per cent as a wage increase was a reasonable, intermediate figure.

With reference to wage increases in this dispute I would point out that it is not the profits of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. which are going to pay for them. They will come out of the pocketbooks of the taxpayers and consumers, and that includes the union workers as well. We must deal with this thing in a rational way.

Management has a responsibility, one which it has not lived up to, so far as the union workers and the general economy are concerned. But again it is not just the wages of labourers nor is it just the profits of management with which we are concerned; it is the cost of living which involves the persons in every household and every taxpayer in the country. I believe it is a basic rule of modern economics that the general scale of wage increases must not exceed the growth of the rate of productivity. The rate of productivity in Canada this past year has averaged nearly 5 per cent. In the United States the projected long-term trend average has been calculated at about 3.2 per cent.

If the cost of living is going up it is reasonable and fair that wages and pensions for those on fixed incomes should go up. This is one of the problems we face in adjusting a forward movement with some kind of harmony so far as the economy and living standards are concerned. Again it is a lesson to us, so far as this strike is concerned, to look at the basis of the strike settlement in the United States in terms of the long-range projected trend with relation to the expansion of productivity.

So long as the cost of living goes up and the purchasing power of the dollar goes down it is inevitable that wages will increase correspondingly. If they do not, then living standards must decline. However, in this instance it is imperative that this wage increase not proceed in any one area or in the general area at a more rapid rate than the productivity of the economy. This morning we read in the press that according to the present trend in Canada wage increases are moving ahead at about double the rate of the productivity growth in the country. This is something to consider when we look at the over-all picture.

Again I mention these things because they apply to the over-all picture and the secondary legislation more particularly. In the first legislation which is before us at the present time we are charged with the responsibility of dealing with the national crisis which centres around the strike. I would suggest to members of this house that it is our responsibility to deal first with the crisis and then discuss these other things. It is imperative that the government present its policies to deal effectively with the inflationary trend and the increasing cost of living. It is imperative that the government take the initiative in bringing labour and management together in a new era of industrial labour relationships. Without this we cannot face the problems which undoubtedly are ahead of us and which we can see across the threshold.

I come back to the point that at this particular moment we are dealing with strike legislation. We have it before us in Bill C-230. I think it is our responsibility to face up to the fact that this emergency demands a cessation of the strike—it cannot continue—and a full opportunity for future negotiation for the benefit of the workers involved in the light of their needs and the ability of the economy. It should not be considered the responsibility of parliament to act as arbitrators except to see that in respect of working groups in other areas there is a settlement similar to that arrived at in respect of the working members of the railroad industry.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that compulsory arbitration as mentioned in the last part of this bill is something which is only a last resort. It is not a club; it is an assurance which must be given to the Canadian people that if necessary this matter will be dealt with by arbitration if the negotiations which are to continue do not come to a satisfactory conclusion. Let us leave it at that and deal with this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Bill C-230, to which the Conservative party has seen fit to move an amendment, I would like to say a few words.

When I was called back here, Mr. Speaker, like all other members of this house, I came to Ottawa with a feeling of increased responsibility because we were faced with an emergency. In the first few minutes of yesterday afternoon's sitting, I think I noticed in most of my colleagues that feeling which made the atmosphere a little dramatic and I was very happy to hear, in the first remarks made, that desire of most of the leaders of the various parties, the various groups in this house, to do the impossible to expedite the settlement of that strike which is so costly for the Canadian economy.

And I naïvely thought—I confess that I have learned something and I still have much to learn—that with all that goodwill, the strike would be settled within 24 hours after which we would set ourselves to modernize the railway act, to deal with the increase in the cost of living and to provide for all the other urgent needs of Canada.

But in the course of the afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I had to sing a different tune when I saw the leader of the N.D.P. (Mr. Douglas) for instance ask for the adjournment until this afternoon, a proposal that seemed totally illogical to me but which could be explained by the fact that N.D.P. members had to hear their master's voice, the financial backer, in the circumstances.

In my opinion, in the face of such an urgent problem, our masters, the masters of members of parliament, are all the citizens of Canada. There are 20 million Canadian citizens who expect us to settle as soon as possible this strike which proves disastrous for our economy. Consequently, every hour counts.

Last night I was also surprised to see that the Leader of the Opposition refused to carry on with his remarks. There may have been extenuating circumstances in his case. I think I noticed that he remained late in his office last night. Perhaps he wanted to examine a little more thoroughly the implications of this bill. It may also be that he wanted to go through the newspaper headlines this morning, for he likes to try the government with editorials from various papers. However, I do not believe that our editorial writers, though I respect them, are endowed with infallibility or have been entrusted with the administration of the country.

I believe this matter is in the hands of the government, and if the government fails, then the electors will have their say at the next election.

Mr. Speaker, these dilatory measures, this waste of time, while workers are forced to remain idle and suffer all kinds of hardships —indeed some railway strikers will not get this week's salary which they badly need— was a shock to me. I was scandalized to see that some members wished to hold up the debate for all kinds of reasons which do not appear to be very serious.

And I would like to add this, Mr. Speaker. I am making these remarks while fully conscious that I represent a working man's constituency, one of the larger labour ridings, and at least until the next election—one of the largest working class constituencies in Canada. I am also fully conscious of the fact that the workers gave me their support at the last election. We have some six or seven thousand workers, members of labour or trade unions; they did not vote for the N.D.P., but for the independent candidate.

So, I believe it is my duty to speak on their behalf. I think I know them because I have been associated with them for the past 20 years and I would like it to be borne in mind that I shall make these few remarks in the light of this awareness of my responsibility toward my workers. I shall be brief.

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who wish to defend representatives of the railways. Like many others, like most of the members in this house, I have witnessed their arrogance and greed, sanctioned by the govvernment, through which they have milked every last cent and through which they want to keep for themselves whatever is paying without giving the Canadian people services equal to those they have received from them. I know that. But I do not think this is the time to discuss that question. We shall have the opportunity of discussing it in detail when we consider the second bill and I shall make it my duty to support any member of this house who seeks to criticize the railways fairly and rightly for their deficiencies.

I am one of those who know that a great number of railway workers are not treated fairly by those companies. I am one of those who have seen the dilapidated condition of railway stations which look more like shacks than anything else. I am one of those who have witnessed the disgraceful treatment to which are submitted certain employees who work, for instance, on new runs and who are housed in filthy box cars where the blankets are only washed every five or six months, where the people lack the basic sanitary necessities.

However, this is not the proper time, I think, to discuss that point. I am one of those also who thought the government was long in dealing with this problem. I was not aware of all the details, I admit, and if the last reports were not received by the government before August 22, it was perhaps difficult to intervene directly in this dispute.

I feel that the two old-line parties, Conservatives and Liberals, should acknowledge their wrongs. There does not exist in Canada a process likely to promote better relations between management and labour and to prevent a new outbreak of disastrous strikes such as we are now experiencing.

But I feel it is not time yet to settle this matter. We may be able to settle it later, but we are now faced with an emergency. I, like everybody else, know that the present inflation is absolutely unbearable and inadmissible, that the cost of living is fast increasing and that the governments must at all costs take drastic measures to prevent such an increase.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is not the time to settle the question, since those who use these arguments are only confusing the situation and using of dilatory measures to prevent the government from settling the matter which is urgent and may prove disastrous.

Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of some of those witch doctors in certain tribes who, on pretext of curing a sick person start by burning various parts of his body, then beat him cruelly, sometimes even bleed him white, and drive him completely mad with an unbearable racket. More often than not the poor devil dies of exhaustion and misery.

Well, I believe that instead of giving the ailing Canadian economy a similar treatment, we should locate the abcess and drain it as soon as possible to prevent the infection from spreading. When this is done we will be in a position to take overall measures to solve all the problems put forward.

Mr. Speaker, I am also one of those who deplores, as has been done a little this afternoon, the cynicism of certain labour leaders who advise their membership to flaunt the law, directly or indirectly, who already encourage them to break the law Parliament will adopt, if it is adopted by Parliament. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it should not be allowed, it is not showing a truly Canadian spirit.

I am surprised to observe that some members of the opposition wanted to make the most of this emergency situation which, to my mind, should require all men of goodwill to unite in this national emergency which everyone recognizes and I believe that a large number could have refrained from comments or from petty politics pure and simple. The common good at stake seems to have been overlooked, Mr. Speaker.

But I think we should adopt this Government bill, even though it is not perfect, because there is nothing perfect in this world. Now, we have to take measures. Had we voted for the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition, to all practical purposes, it would have resulted in the rejection of the government bill and would have caused a further delay of a week or two. Think what this would mean to the economy of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I believe everyone should realize that this is a national emergency. Every one should realize that 20 million people are sending us an S.O.S. to please settle this strike which will affect every area of the Canadian economy.

I think everyone should realize that even the juvenile labour camps now on strike are anxious to find acceptable company but they are not anxious to remain two or three weeks idle and without getting their regular salary.

I think that the compromise proposed by the government is acceptable, though not perfect. It provides for a temporary increase, a small one I know, but which will undoubtedly be raised when the whole machinery of this bill has been put into force. Again, the government orders the parties to negotiate. Therefore, the government cannot be accused of imposing compulsory arbitration. And the government is submitting to us at the same time a second bill which, even though we have not studied it in depth, looks as if it might help solve problems in the railway crisis which is facing us right now, and the government has provided that, in case of non-agreement, there would be compulsory arbitration. Objection is taken to compulsory arbitration and yet, Mr. Speaker, in all fields of endeavour, we turn to compulsory arbitration. When we do not agree, we call on courts of law and accept verdicts. We have to. It is accepted at all levels of society; why would it not be accepted in the labour field, especially when the Commonwealth is concerned, when it has to do with strikes which affect the economy of a whole country and when things have come to such a deadlock that the parties cannot agree.

Otherwise, who will propose the solution, who will find the formula of agreement? I think that in such circumstances the government must assume its responsibilities, adopt measures which, though they may seem drastic, are hoped for today by the Canadian people.

I think that throughout Canada people are getting ready to condemn those who have wasted the time of parliament since it started its deliberations, those who did not understand that it was an emergency situation which might be disastrous. I think I just said that all Canadians are sending to the Canadian parliament an S.O.S. which should be heard by all. And here we take advantage of that situation to indulge in political partisanship, to create difficulties for the government. We will have contributed a little more, Mr. Speaker, to reduce the respect which the people feel for the Canadian parliament, the respect it should have. Otherwise where are we going, Mr. Speaker?

Therefore, I would like to call on the goodwill of all my colleagues and ask them to listen carefully to the voices coming from their ridings. Let them feel the necessity of taking immediate steps to end that strike and to enable those workers, who are on strike and who will not get their regular weekly salaries, to get them as soon as possible under reasonable conditions. I think that the government is giving them reasonable guarantees, and if the government does not keep its word, we will have all the time needed to blame it and to make it clear how it failed to keep its word, Mr. Speaker.

For the time being we must agree to a sacred union and place our confidence in the government, vote them their bill to bring the strike to an end and then, tackle all the gaps and deficiencies in our labour legislation; we will grapple precisely with that problem of the increase in the cost of living. We will tackle all the major problems submitted to the house since yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill calling for the return to work as soon as the legislation is passed, an increase in wages of 16 per cent for two years and compulsory arbitration. I do not intend in my remarks to take the tone taken during this debate by some hon. members who worked hard at setting forth a list of grievances concerning either the slowness of the present government or the 1960 Act which prevented the railway strike, or the 1950 measure bringing to an end a first general railway strike.

What counts, Mr. Speaker, is that we must not get bogged down in the winding paths of yester year, but rather look to the present and consider for the future more efficient structures and legislations in the field of labour and economy. As far as the recent dockers strike, the present railway strike and a possible postman strike in the fall are concerned, it is obvious that we must improve labour legislation, and administrative and judicial organizations. Bill No. C-230 before us sets forth three main purposes:

First, suspension of the rail strike; second, interim wage increase of 16 per cent over two years, for the railwaymen; and finally, compulsory arbitration. During the time at my disposal, I wish to elaborate a little on the bill's triple objective.

The first objective: suspension of the railway strike. Striking is not the normal means of establishing social justice, We must hope that another social measure will take away, as in the case of war, all reasons for its existence. Whether it be a classical strike, as is the present railway strike, a sit-down strike, a management strike, warning strike, slow-down strike, political strike, revolutionary strike, professional or sympathy strike, whether it be any kind of strike. A strike must be used as a last resort with due regard to social justice and Christian charity.

The state may intervene in a strike as protector of the common good. It is true that the wage-earner owns his job. If the wage-earner, by going on strike, decides to temporarily withdraw his services and if the state intervenes to force the wage-earner into going back to work, the state is legislating on a right of ownership, on an actual right belonging to the wage-earner, I agree.

Moreover, the Canadian Bill of Rights establishes the Canadian citizen's fundamental freedoms and his right to ownership.

Must we, for this reason, believe that the state, the federal government or the central government in this case, cannot suspend the right to strike?

The government may, by exception, legislate on this right of ownership if the commonweal makes it imperative and if there is no adequate legislation, adequate tribunals and organizations of balance.

But the government must bear full responsibility for its exceptional intervention, because who is to blame if there is no adequate legislation or tribunals. It is not the fault of wage-earners nor of management. But the responsibility is with the government and the legislators that we are.

In the case with which we are concerned, the present and former governments and the legislators who preceded this government did not create the legislation, the tribunals and the organizations that we require. And that is why, as far as those who have been holding a seat in this chamber for some time are concerned, we are all guilty. We are all responsible for the present situation.

Let us stop putting on one side of the house all the accusations or all the blame. Rather, let us have a better understanding of our great role as legislators. That is the main reason for our presence in this Canadian parliament, to do our main job, as legislators, as the makers of laws, solely for the commonweal and for the disappearance of all social and economic grievances. Let us start immediately to set up the law courts, the legislation and the organizations required.

Is the strike in the public services a move that is consistent with the human and Christian common sense or, if you like, with ethics, since the latter word implies human common sense and Christian common sense. I believe so, Mr. Speaker, every time that it meets the five conditions of the fair strike.

Those five conditions are as follows:

First, exhausting all the effective and existing peaceful means; second, the pursuit of very serious advantages; the third condition of a fair strike is that the advantages sought must be greater than the disadvantages caused; the fourth condition of a fair strike is a serious hope to win; fifth, the use of honest means in the course of the dispute.

Let us make a few comments on this first condition of a fair strike in the public services, namely the exhausting of all existing and effective peaceful means. We know what the peaceful means are: direct negotiation, conciliation, mediation and arbitration.

These are also the requirements to make these measures effective in promoting justice and preventing strikes. A progressive labour law is also necessary.

Those who spoke today have perhaps not stressed enough the gaps in our labour laws. Second, we need competence. Third, we must have impartiality and, finally, more expeditious procedures. Conciliation and arbitration procedures must be improved so that, in settling the different disputes, they may help labour laws to become more progressive as quickly as possible. Otherwise strikes or lock-outs must be allowed to settle conciliation cases, and arbitration will be unable to solve anything, for lack of adequate rules.

In a sense a strike, as we can see in this railway strike, can in its own way hurry the evolution of the labour laws which will finally lead to the elimination of the strike itself.

Employer and employee problems involve many legal angles: natural and positive laws, economic and sociological laws. A mediator or the chairman of an arbitration board who may be competent in one of these fields needs expert counsel in other fields. He should be able, legally and financially, to engage the services of experts according to his needs. This co-operation of competent men would help the evolution of labour laws and produce a greater confidence between the parties and the public.

With regard to impartiality, the separation of the judiciary from the executive and legislative powers should be maintained. A minister of the Crown representing, more or less in the case before us, the employer, that is the railways, cannot be appointed mediator or chairman of an arbitration board.

As to the pursuit of most serious objectives, let us say that the stake involved must be a very great injustice to correct. And, as for the third requirement of a just strike, that the benefits should be greater than the disadvantages, as far as a public utilities strike is concerned, it may be that benefits can be greater than the disadvantages, but such a balance is difficult to achieve in public utilities. It all depends on the character of the public utilities involved. For some people, such benefits will possibly never equal the disadvantages. The union may reduce hardship by allowing certain essential services to be maintained, by resorting to partial strikes rather than to total strike.

As to the fourth requirement of a just strike, the reasonable hope of winning it, let us say that this is a question of common sense. In public utilities, the hope of winning is almost a certainty as far as the unions are concerned because they represent an extraordinary pressure group while the people cannot long be deprived of essential services. But in regard to such pressure, the unions are taking on a heavy responsibility—the people must be spared excessive hardship—true, the unions have some rights, but the people also have rights which can be summed up in the right to essential services.

Public opinion has a major role to play and it may happen that a series of strikes will arouse public opinion in such a way that the people will clamour for legislation to restrict the right to strike. On the other hand, public opinion would be in sympathy with the unions if they were refused truly efficient arbitration to give them full justice.

Where does the responsibility lie for this railroad strike? I do not wish to belabour the point but let us say in brief that to my mind, it is the present federal government and the railroad, indirectly, as I observed at the beginning of my remarks, the previous governments also share in the responsibility, as well as the previous legislators and the labour unions.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has failed, in the present dispute, to take his responsibilities either in calling parliament before the strike, or in appointing sooner a mediator without ties to the executive, that is to say, in the present case, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) who acted as mediator between the employers and the unions while the employers are in a certain sense, related to the government, to the executive; well the mediator could not be considered by both parties, at least by the employees, as a competent mediator, as a mediator capable of looking at the problems objectively and impartially.

Since 1963, the present government and the Prime Minister should have acted to implement several recommendations in the MacPherson and Freedman reports. They should have acted since 1963. As the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) noted this afternoon, we are stifled here in the lap of the federal government, by quantities of reports. Let us take the case of the railroad dispute or the problems of railroad transportation in Canada. It is not a new dispute. We received the last report in 1962 and before that, the two previous ones of the MacPherson Commission for the formulation of a railway policy in Canada. Well, the present official opposition was able to look into the recommendations and study for at least one year, if not more, the first reports, but no legislation was introduced. I understand that at the time the official opposition did not have as much time as the present government, then in the opposition, which came to the fore when those reports were submitted and has governed the country for the last three years. It is fantastic to say and a real shame to note that the persons responsible as legislators of the country have not introduced any legislation to implement the recommendations of the MacPherson Commission or some of them.

Therefore, the second bill tabled yesterday by the Prime Minister is more than four years late. During the nine months of negotiations previous to the present railway strike, the Prime Minister should have followed more closely and alertly the development of the dispute.

How disappointing are the answers obtained to the various questions we put in this house, to the government, to the Prime Minister and to most other ministers. There are some exceptions, because today I got an excellent reply from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) when he gave me the assurance he would look into the 178 cases of injustice in the employment service and that in every case the person involved would be granted a personal interview.

This is a positive answer, a grievance faced squarely which will be redressed without delay. Not later than yesterday I put a question to the Prime Minister. I asked him to tell the house whether he intended to take immediate action to settle the dispute which threatens to bring about most certainly a strike of postal workers on October 18.

That is an impending thing, which is on the threshold of Canadian economy. And again, the right hon. Prime Minister stood up, charming as ever—he always has a very diplomatic and flexible answer, he is conversant with the situation—and answered me that he wanted to analyse the matter and consult with the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté). Well, that is the kind of questions that, during the nine months of negotiations, the hon. members directed to the Prime Minister and to other ministers of the present government concerning the impending railway strike, and we were receiving the same evasive, the same irresponsible answers.

I think the Canadian people have had enough of those ways of administering the country, of that trend given to Canadian politics and the economy. We want action and frankness not only in words but in action, we want the government and public men to grapple directly with problems and to take efficient measures so as to arrive at a settlement before the mountain brings forth all its grievances and all its uneasiness.

The railway companies also, Mr. Speaker, have not assumed all their responsibilities, because they did not offer definite wages and labour conditions, leaving to the central government the burden of paying the bill, of showing imagination and leadership. That is why in that conflict, at the table of negotiations, the ghost presence of the central government could be felt.

In the face of that situation, considering the discussion on the strike in general, on the strike in the public services, the principles connected with the railway strike which must be settled rapidly, as a result of those considerations, it is in order to suggest a few reforms in the part we must play as legislators. That is our main function here in this parliament. We are not here to multiply political partisanships. We are not here to bring up like popcorn being made the positions taken by a political party when in the opposition if it takes the opposite position when in power. We are here to legislate and, in the field of labour, it is urgent, Mr. Speaker, to bring forth reforms.

I want to submit to the attention of this house a few reforms and I would greatly appreciate it if the government would consider them with all the other recommendations and judicious suggestions submitted by other members during the present debate.

First, it is urgent to set up an adequate labour legislation. Second, we need labour-management courts able to decide fairly with regard to professional conflicts.

Third, until we get that appropriate legislation and those labour-management courts, we must leave management and labour free to exercise their defence rights, namely the right to strike or appeal.

In addition, in the process of evolution, civil conflicts are settled today by the courts, whereas at the beginning of the world individuals took justice into their own hands. In the era of the cavemen, if another man stole his neighbour's cattle, there were no courts. The offended party took justice into his own hands: the right to own things. And that right goes with the right to defend oneself and that right must be exercised until the day when appropriate legislation and courts exist. Then the exercise of that right of defence in civil and criminal matters is given to the duly constituted courts which we have today.

That is why I say that the right to strike or lockout is temporary until we have adequate legislation and courts. It is false to think that the right to strike in itself or the lockout is absolute, eternal and unlimited. The responsibility falls on the state and on us legislators to create legislation and labour-management courts.

It is also incumbent on the state to promote the creation of organizations which will create a balance in the economic and social fields between the state, management and labour.

Here is my fourth reform or suggestion. I propose the setting up of a wisemen court which a national management confederation and a general labour confederation should put to work. I am thinking in particular of an organization similar to the labour market commission in Sweden.

That organization which we could set up should take into account our Canadian and constitutional characteristics. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon a few allusions were made to Sweden. I am not talking at all about the political system, socialist or otherwise, of Sweden.

But when we look squarely at the problems, we can take good ideas in every country and every political creed. We can take an idea or a structure which gave excellent results for the common good of a country without for all that accepting the philosophy or political theories of the Swedish government, since that one was mentioned this afternoon, if it is really a socialist government.

There is a wisemen court there which is called the labour market commission. It was created in 1937 between a national management confederation and a national labour confederation.

And I reach this point to say, as I pointed out a while ago, that in this dispute the unions also have some responsibilities, as well as the employers, the management, in Canada. At this time, in the dispute we are facing eight railway companies; on the other hand, we have 16 or 18 unions formed into four union groups. Then, how can we reach solutions with so much division. Well, I believe that Sweden sets an example for many countries, even for Canada. The management, the employers, got together into a national confederation, and the unions forgot their differences, their local or regional peculiarities and grouped together to consider the wider problems in a national trade unions confederation.

And the two organizations of both confederations met and established a basic agreement which has enabled them, since 1937, to set the labour disputes. And thus, since 1937, Sweden has had no strikes. Whether the government of that country be communist, socialist, or capitalist, we have there a wonderful idea which has been applied and I would appreciate it very much if the government and, mainly the management parties and the unions, instead of fighting so much, instead of acting in such an individualistic way would seek to pool their interests. We would have both levels of interest on a national level, with capital and labour meeting together and setting out standards in an agreement as was done in Sweden.

We could also consider renovating here, for instance, in Canada, if it took too long for the good faith of the Canadian labour and management to achieve this organization, the National Labour Relations Board and have it play a similar role.

It is absolutely necessary that there should be established, between management and labour in Canada, permanent structures which would enable them to achieve their goal, to promote better social and economic balance, and to make a contribution to the achievement of the commonweal. And in this fourth reform that I suggest, Mr. Speaker, I would see very favourably the government, in turn, co-operate with the provinces and establish an organization of experts who would analyse eventual disputes, which we can see coming, and who would then keep people informed.

Oh, how Canada lacks objective organizations which would be backed and encouraged by the government and which would comprise university professors, experts in economics, actuaries, experts in industrial relations and in the taxation areas, that is groups of perhaps 12 persons, who would work in co-operation with the provinces as soon as a dispute could be seen in the offing. Those experts would closely consider the question, make a quick assessment of the causes and the unrest and suggest the remedies and then make sure, as an organization, to publicize it throughout the country through television radio and the newspapers.

During conversations I had in a bus—I was going to say in a train, but there are not any for some hours to come—and on the street here, in Ottawa, and elsewhere, I asked several people this point-blank question: What do you think, sir or madam, of the strike—What would you suggest about the railway strike in Canada? Some would have no opinion, others would express very superficial opinions. We do not have the advantage of such an organization.

I know that some members will say that we have the Economic Council of Canada, others are going to say that we have the Quebec economic planning council and, in Ontario, another body along the same line. But the gap is precisely there. We have at the central government an economic planning council working alone and often without correlation as regards the economic planning councils of the provinces. What we need is for an organization to co-operate with the provinces so as to forestall such conflicts. As second point of my remarks, I wanted to deal with the second aspect of this bill, that is, the salary increase.

As mentioned in section 6, the provisional contract provides for 8 per cent a year for two years, that is, 16 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it does not rest with the state to set salary rates in a system of free enterprise. I realize that the government is in a tight corner and has to settle the matter without delay.

That is why, in the face of this nation-wide crisis, I shall vote for the bill. But I am taking the liberty of pointing out that it is not incumbent on the federal government to determine salary rates in a system of free enterprise. Such rates should be decided upon by the immediate employer and the union representatives.

Another point is this. That government and parliament be conscious of the common good and refrain from pursuing electoral goals. I do not know what was the intention of the present federal government in inserting in this bill an increase of salary amounting to 8 per cent; I wonder also on what basis such an 8 per cent increase was arrived at. If I refer to the recent statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), I find that this second indication in the bill is entirely contrary to his warnings about moderation and inflation. If the right hon. Prime Minister and his experts and advisers are really in a position to decide honestly and objectively that the economic and financial situation of the country has reached a point where—the mean salary in the country being, as for the railway workers, $2.20 per hour—in the face of inflation, we should practice moderation and tighten our belts, then a special budget for next fall should be prepared which would increase taxes and add a few more holes in the belt in order that the Canadian taxpayer may feel the pinch since we are living in an inflated economy. If these words were pronounced in all fairness and sincerity, how is it then that a few days later a bill is introduced by the same federal government, which has no jurisdiction on salary standards, announcing an increase of salary in that very bill?

For instance, it would be very amusing, in case the conflict is referred to the arbitration board, if it were decided by the members of the board that the salaries being what they were are corrected to such an extent. This increase appearing in the bill is very amusing. And it would be very amusing, if in the next debate that the right hon. Prime Minister has promised to us on the problems of inflation, and on the increase in the cost of living, it were established after due consideration and an extended debate, that, when some national average is reached, salaries must be frozen. It would be appropriate, however, to permit increase, that is, not to fix a limit for workers earning less than $1.93 per hour in Canada as is the case for the textile workers at Sherbrooke and in important Quebec cities, whose basic rate is $1.18 to $1.59 per hour. These workers are really far from the average rate prevailing in industry in the country, which is $1.93, if I am not mistaken; but with the railways we see already that this average is $2.20. And this is why I say that I will nevertheless vote in favour of the bill, because the situation is desperate; however, I do not approve of this, in other legislation where we could take the time to introduce amendments if we were not facing a national crisis, where the government must determine wages, while this is not its responsibility. This is providing an arbitration procedure before the conclusions are arrived at on the causes of the conflict.

Finally Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on this third objective of the bill concerning compulsory arbitration. This is an exceptional and emergency measure under the circumstances, and consequently not perfect.

We have seen in the past, and hon. members mentioned it, labour leaders who, on many occasions, and over the last few days, have voiced grievances against some arbitration boards in general because they have failed, have not studied seriously the problems; it is true—for those who have followed the whole evolution of arbitration boards—often because political friends or greatly incompetent people were appointed, men who knew nothing about industrial techniques, labour-management relations, people who had no idea of economics and finance, taxation and social and economic problems. Such men were appointed there because they were friends and because they had influence, not because of their intelligence and judgment, but rather because of the roundness of their abdomen.

I agree with the hon. members who submitted grievances; it is because those arbitration boards failed in their duty, because their members showed themselves to be incompetent; it does not mean that the institution is not worthy or is basically faulty; far from it and I admit that under the circumstances it is an organization which must be accepted, a special body, and that the government however, if need be, will give us competent, objective and impartial arbitrators.

The arbitrators should be experts and not members of the government or parliament, to repeat what I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, in order always to make a distinction between the executive, the judiciary and the legislative. The arbitrator should give his decision within a limited time.

I noticed in the bill that the whole thing is to go on through mediation until November 15 and that the mediator must report to the Minister of Labour who afterwards must set up an arbitration board. But no time limit is set, unless I am mistaken and do not understand the wording of the bill. We should find in the bill—and I hope that when it is studied in committee, the government will agree to amend that clause so that a time limit is set for the arbitrators to render their decision; of course, there is a deadline with regard to the arbitrator's decision; it must be given within five days to parliament, then parliament must submit it to the session within the five days which will follow a new session but how long are the arbitrators given, if the matter goes that far, to take a decision? Can they postpone it for two years? Can they let the matter drag on for three years? Well, if the government can give me some assurance as to the wording, I cannot find any provision requiring the arbitrators to make a decision in a given time. I would appreciate it very much if a time limit were set for the arbitrators to hold their discussions and submit their report.

Also, the arbitrators should have the legal and financial capacity and secure advisers. Of course, it will perhaps be pointed out to me that this is not authorized by all the acts referred to in this piece of legislation. If it is impossible to proceed directly, indirect means should be sought. Three arbitrators could be appointed but it could happen that only one who would know all about transportation matters; but, not being an actuary, perhaps he would not be able to work out the calculations. He could have the legal and financial capacity of an actuary who could figure out the total cost of granting such a salary increase or of bringing about such and such results within the Canadian economy.

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Québec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to take a few minutes to give the impressions which I was able to gather from the strikers in my riding during an informative meeting I held last night, and also to make a few remarks which I think appropriate concerning the bill now under consideration in this house.

On the one hand, the general impression I got from the strikers I met convinced me beyond doubt that they had no understanding whatsoever of the meaning of the bill under consideration, because they believed that it actually dealt with the salaries of the railway workers.

In my opinion, this bill—and I believe the salary question is a minor one—deals with only two essential and important points. First, the return to work of the railwaymen, because the strike must end at all costs; second, the resumption of negotiations through a process established in the bill. Thus, the government, in settling the problem of the strike which, of course, must end, was anxious to protect, in spite of everyone and even, I submit, against some members of the opposition and especially the N.D.P., the freedom of collective bargaining, even in the field of the public service. On that point, I believe that all Canadian workers presently on strike must understand me.

[Mr. Allard.]

At the present time the Canadian government has taken care to protect the freedom of collective bargaining, even in the field of public service and railway transportation. Negotiations, of course, provide for a return to work, a sort of sit-down strike, and a salary increase which seems small; however, I believe this is not very important at present since, under this bill, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) will appoint a mediator who will report before two months and a half have elapsed; and consequently, if we are not here, and so that the problem does not have to be brought before parliament, there is a provision for compulsory arbitration because the situation naturally has to come to an end. And even then, the present government, which seeks to respect the freedom of negotiations and, in the public field, the freedom of debate, provides that ten members of parliament may, at the time the arbitrators' decision is handed down, raise the question again in the house to criticize or stress the weaknesses of the decision or, finally, to voice the feelings of workers who could be disatisfied with the conditions imposed in the decision.

But, Mr. Speaker, I really wonder if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has, in his own way, solved the problem this afternoon. He told the government: Your bill is worth nothing. Send it back and introduce another one. What does it mean on the part of the Leader of the Opposition? What have we got in the way of constructive criticism in such an important situation? I respectfully submit that we have absolutely nothing.

As far as the suggestions made by the N.P.D. are concerned, there is opposition to compulsory arbitration. If there is an area in which I think one can logically conceive compulsory arbitration, it is the area of railway transport, where the rates are determined by a government control board called the Board of Transport Commissioners.

And in the case of compulsory arbitration, the government with logic, has upheld the freedom of speech by allowing ten members to rise and the debate to resume and amendments to be moved by the house. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this does not create any difficulty and I sincerely think, because I have spent part of the evening with strikers, that this bill, being logically and objectively set out, seeks to guarantee in the first place the respect of the right to strike, which is a sacred right of the workers, even in the public sector—as I respectfully submit—and also seeks to guarantee the respect of a right for which the workers have paid a high price in the past, often after bitter strike that is the right of freedom of negotiation. And if at this time, Mr. Speaker, difficulties may eventually lead to anarchy, it is because of the confidence the organized workers or the members of the various trade unions have in their leaders, and that problem, I respectfully submit, is of extreme importance. We heard, on the radio and on television, not later than a fortnight ago, that railway workers had said: We walk out this morning. We walk out because we have no longer any confidence in our leaders; our leaders are not accountable to us. Well, then, there arises a problem which is an extremely important one and it is the problem of the democratization within the labour unions. Then the employer will not be able to negotiate with representatives who could explain and further the interests of those they represent. Then, the government, I submit, will have to intervene and impose restrictions which may unfortunately infringe upon the right of the workers at this time, the freedom of collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker, those are the comments that I had to make and I think that this bill contains only two points, that is the return to work and the resumption of negotiations, with the possibility of coming back to parliament if the parties cannot reach agreement. I think all this is the essence of the problem and this, I think, is to the credit of the government which, in spite of the magnitude of the crisis, tries to respect, in spite of the workers themselves, the great principle of the freedom of collective bargaining, even in the public sector.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): A few minutes ago I listened to the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) speaking on the present crisis and suggesting that we should not court the possibility of increasing the pressure of inflation on this nation by granting a wage increase of any substance to the railway workers.

As one who watches the Quebec papers I cannot help compare these remarks with the hon. member's remarks made during the last few weeks in connection with the strike in Sherbrooke involving the textile workers and Dominion Textiles of Canada. Judging by the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke on this issue I would have thought that his voice in this House of Commons would be more sympathetic toward the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who earn their living by working for the Canadian railways.

As most members of the house know, I worked for 12 or more years on the railway. My father worked for 41 years with the C.N.R. This was not uncommon. There are many people in Canada whose first and only job was working for the railways, the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. or the other lesser known companies. There was a time when to work for the railways meant one had a job with prestige, one had security; one had a position of influence in the community. I know that in the depressed years of the 'thirties landlords in the community of Verdun would seek out railway workers, even though they were working part time, to see whether they could rent their flats or apartments to them, because the railwayman then, as now, was synonymous with honesty, integrity and responsibility.

The railwayman no longer holds that position in his community. He is as dignified and honest as ever before but his influence and prestige have diminished. They have diminished, Mr. Speaker, because slowly but surely labour working outside the railways are now the recipients of bigger salaries, and more money per hour, than the railway worker. If I thought tonight that the bill before us limited the railway worker for the next two years to 8 per cent I would be duty bound and morally bound to vote against it. I am one who is of the opinion that an 8 per cent increase is not sufficient wages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: But, Mr. Speaker, neither do I share the opinion of N.D.P. members, who have just endorsed my remarks, that this is the intent of the bill. Rather, as one who has been a union man for many years, I see something much deeper in the bill before us. I see an attempt made by the government to respect and continue the cherished rights of the unions to negotiate their own settlement, and I see the 4 per cent, and 8 per cent mentioned in the bill, as a very temporary settlement of the problems of the railway workers.

Many in my community work for the railway. Many in the gallery tonight are from my community and I know many of the problems facing men who have spent 10, 15 and 20 years working for the C.P.R. I know of their anxiety and uncertainty. I know of the concern of those working in the dining car section, who see national trains shunted away, who at times see an almost conscious effort to discourage passenger service. One can understand, appreciate, and sympathize with the problems of the workingman who is expected to work for the benefit of the railway, when he is confused, as are many in this house, with policies of the C.P.R. that at times discourage passenger service, rather than encourage it.

I think that the railwayman in Canada has been synonymous with respect and maturity for many years because of the fact that the unions that have been charged with the problems of the workingman have been amongst the more mature and responsible in this country, and I do not share the opinion of those who say there is no room in Canada for international unions.

Rather, I think the stability that has been synonymous with the railway movement in Canada is due in large measure to the maturity and wisdom of those men who have taken time out from their normal work to participate actively in the labour movement, and I for one share their anxiety and confusion at the efforts made in some parts of the country to chip away at the authority and jurisdiction of the international unions.

Much effort has been made in the house to confuse not only the railwaymen but also hon. members as to the intent and purpose of the bill. Speaker after speaker has talked about the 6 per cent and 8 per cent in the same breath as he talked about 30 per cent, but each has failed to mention that the 30 per cent settlement of the longshoremen, and the 30 per cent of the seaway workers, is not 30 per cent immediately but 30 per cent spread over a two year period. Until the unions and management begin to finalize negotiations nobody will know what the eventual and total settlement in wages will be for the workingman.

At the present moment we know that if this bill is accepted and the workers return to work there will be an immediate increase for the men. And I presume they will return, Mr. Speaker, although I imagine it is hard for many of them who have gone through nine tortuous months of negotiation, to do so. However, they are members of mature unions which, in the final analysis, know that the laws of the land must be respected. In this respect this bill differs from the bill introduced in 1960. That bill simply froze the salaries of the men; it ordered them back to work with no immediate increase. That is the fundamental difference. This bill provides that if the men go back to work they will get some immediate increase. It provides that they go back and negotiate with the railway until November 15 in the light of the published amendments introduced for adoption, of certain parts of the MacPherson report, placing the railways in a better position to be more liberal and more conscious perhaps of the rights and needs of the workers.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) wanted to know where we got the figure of 8 per cent. That is the recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe to this point, and it is significant that it is a higher settlement than the companies' representative on the board was willing to agree to. I must emphasize, even at the risk of being repetitive, that clause 9 provides for the appointment of a mediator for the distinct purpose of negotiating the increase that I am confident will come as the result of negotiation undertaken in the light of the recommendations that will be introduced, and I mean primarily the recommendations of the MacPherson report.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I must speak on behalf of labour. At first glance it concerns me a little bit that if the MacPherson report is accepted in its entirety, or even partially if it provides for the railways to become more efficient, it could conceivably provide for reduction in the work staff, and thus create more insecurity and anxiety, which leads us on to another historic document with which most hon. members are familiar, the Freedman report.

A month or so before the house recessed I said I thought that in time the Freedman report would become as historic in the annals of labour as the Rand report. I am one member of the house and one supporter of the government who thinks that certain aspects of the Freedman report should be introduced almost simultaneously with any segments of the MacPherson report that are going to provide added revenue for the railways and which—and this is more disquieting for me—could provide for a reduction of the working force.

The time has come for all of us to realize that Canada can only be great and prosperous if all segments of society are respected and their needs looked after. There are too many people in this house and outside it who get up and castigate labour, who point out wildcat strikes and legitimate strikes, but who forget that for every strike that takes place there are hundreds of agreements signed quietly and fairly.

The government must do more than look at company profits if it expects labour in all fields, not only the railway labour field, to be responsible in its demands. We are duty bound to look at consumer prices, increased dividends and record profits. We can no longer treat the problems of Canada piecemeal. I would suggest, of course, that by the same criterion the unions themselves are morally bound to settle their differences with the railways by November 15.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition who I am sure will be along in a few moments. On three or four occasions he pointed out that the railwaymen were responsible people and that he expected they would go back to work, but that he could not blame them if they did not. This reminds me a little of the funeral oration in Julius Caesar when they kept repeating "Brutus was an honourable man". If I was a cynical type and a real partisan, which I am not, I would say that at times I was left with the impression that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition might have been toying with an invitation to the men not to return. I was pleased at the change in his attitude over night.

I would imagine that some of the responsible members from the west who are concerned with the problems of wheat shipments and members from the maritimes who are concerned with the problems of the maritimes may have suggested to their leader that parliament is here to represent the rights of all Canadians, including the farmers and the workers.

The term compulsory arbitration has been bandied about by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I imagine that this is supposed to be synonymous with sin; to a railwayman and a labourman it is. In looking back into labour matters which have appeared in Hansard, as far back as 1950, I was intrigued by the legislation introduced in the House of Commons in 1958 to settle the Canadian Pacific Steamships strike in British Columbia. I know that many members of the house who are here tonight were present in 1958. Those who were here will recall that this strike had existed for many many months and had been very disruptive in the field of communications in British Columbia. The minister of labour at the time, the present member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), was plagued by the problem of settling this particular strike; so he introduced a bill, a copy of which I have here, which was nothing more or less than compulsory arbitration. I do not say this to castigate the hon. member, the then minister of labour, because there are circumstances where compulsory arbitration is the only and the last method of settling a problem.

The main feature of that bill, which was introduced by hon. members who now sit in opposition, was that it gave the union members on strike so many hours to get back to work, at the risk of forfeiting their jobs. Since the summer recess was coming up, that same bill included the right to punish the union men by order in council if they disregarded the government's instructions to go back to work. All the way through the debate at the time hon. members, particularly the hon. member for, I think, Skeena (Mr. Howard) or, if not, his deskmate, kept referring to the fact that this was compulsory arbitration. I mention this because for the benefit of labour and the people in the gallery, the hon. member and other members of the Conservative party have tried to create the illusion that they never stooped to compulsory arbitration legislation. Yet that is what they did in 1958.

Mr. Speaker, I then looked through other papers to see what else I could find—what other examples of compulsory arbitration. I came across a rather appealing and interesting document put out by a member of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Skeena, in July of this year. Because the hon. member had accepted the invitation of the Minister of Labour to settle the dispute of the longshoremen, he proposed, for the better part of a week, to lay on the order paper a resolution to introduce a bill to settle the longshoremen's strike. It never reached the printing stage, but the hon. member was honest and decent enough to send a copy to this party. He did launch the bill in a very grandiose manner with a full fledged press conference graced by no less than the leader of the N.D.P. He proposed to settle the longshoremen's strike. How?—by ordering the longshoremen back to work; that is how.

Mr. Douglas: But at wages the workers had already accepted, and without compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of semantics. I should like to read the explanatory note for the benefit of those who think it is not compulsory arbitration:

Clause 4 of the bill provides that the employees who are—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member who has the floor table the copy of the bill from which he is quoting now?

Mr. Mackasey: It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I will also file a copy of the bill of 1958 which you people introduced in the form of compulsory arbitration. To continue with the explanatory note:

Clause 4 of the bill provides that the employees who are now on strike at the three ports shall return to their work under conditions as enumerated hereunder.

The words hereunder meant on terms more beneficial to the longshoremen than when the strike began. What is fundamental to the whole issue is that it insisted that the workers go back to work under the strength of a bill passed before the House of Commons. Furthermore it says:

Clause 6 provides that the parties shall immediately enter into collective bargaining in good faith and shall make every reasonable effort to conclude a new collective agreement. If at the expiration of 60 days this collective bargaining still leaves certain matters in dispute these matters shall be referred to an industrial inquiry commissioner who shall inquire into the matters in dispute and make recommendations from time to time concerning these matters with the proviso that all such matters be recommended upon by the 1st of June 1967.

In other words this bill of the hon. member for Skeena does precisely what the bill before us does.

Mr. Lewis: Come on; you know better than that.

Mr. Mackasey: Let me finish.

• (8:10 p.m.)

This says that if negotiations—

Mr. Lewis: Do not be sanctimonious. The bill is not the same and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to become involved in a cross-fire with the hon. member for York South. Let me finish what I am reading and then let the people generally and those in the gallery judge for themselves. I have an editorial before me which I should like to read, or at least parts of it.

To refer again to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), one clause suggests that the longshoremen should go back to work with some increase in pay, which is precisely what the railway employees are expected to do. If they cannot settle their differences after they go back to work, the matter is then to be referred to an industrial inquiry commission. Surely that is the same thing.

There was also a time limit set in that bill of the hon. member to the effect that the governor in council could make regulations to ensure the continued operations of the longshoremen, which would expire when a new agreement came into effect. In other words, by order in council regulations could be introduced to continue the operations of the longshoremen—and if that is not compulsory arbitration I do not know what it is. If they decided to go out on strike, then an order in council could have been introduced to prevent them from doing so.

The Vancouver Sun, which keeps a very close eye on the New Democratic Party, had the following to say on June 11, 1966.

Mr. Lewis: And it supports the Liberal party, do not forget that.

Mr. Mackasey: This article states:

"The time has therefore come when parliament and the government cannot further postpone appropriate action to bring the strike to an end."
—New Democratic Party press release issued June 9, 1966, in Ottawa.

In this quotation the N.D.P. was explaining why it was submitting a draft bill to order striking longshoremen in eastern Canadian ports to abandon their legal strike and return to work on terms fixed by the bill.

The underlying principle of the bill, standing in the name of Frank Howard, N.D.P., Skeena, is that damage to the public interest justifies a compulsory back-to-work order.

The N.D.P.'s national leader, T. C. Douglas, was present at the press conference when the release was handed out and subscribed to its terms.

A great many people have long believed that the rights of the public must be asserted by government in cases in which organized labour and employers are unable or unwilling to resume the operation of vital services.

These people may be pleasantly astonished to find an ally in the New Democratic Party, which prides itself on being the political arm of organized labour in Canada. Mr. Douglas and his followers have apparently climbed to a philosophical divide beyond which they can see a responsibility to society as a whole which supersedes an ancient loyalty to a particular group.

That is only part of the editorial, Mr. Speaker, from which I have quoted; but I am prepared to produce it so that interested members can read it to verify that I have not left out anything which destroys the spirit of what I have read.

The point I am trying to make, in referring to the Canadian Pacific Steamship legislation of 1958, is this: It is apparent from the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Skeena that the N.D.P. felt the time had arrived when the rights of the country must be put ahead of the rights of the longshoremen. In 1958 the government felt also that the time had come to put the rights of Canada ahead of the rights of the operators of the steamships in British Columbia.

The time always comes when the rights of the nation must come first. I differ with certain members, however, who think that every time the railway employees feel they should take advantage of the right to strike we must send them back to work, because the rights of the country are paramount. If we expect that year in and year out, contract after contract, union members must assume this type of responsibility, but we must assume the responsibility of making sure that in exercising this responsibility these Canadian workers are not placed in an inferior position as compared to other workers, particularly with reference to wage structures and working conditions. This government and house have a responsibility to these workers to see that an eventual settlement is reached before November 15, and that that settlement is not only equal to what has been recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe, but equitable in comparison with the wage structures and working conditions of other comparable workingmen.

The part of this bill which makes it supportable to me and other labour men in this party is that part which guarantees the right to workers of at least another two months to settle negotiations with employers. There is an amendment now before the house. Anyone who votes for that amendment will be voting for the disruption of rail service. We have heard many members of the opposition parties speak honestly and with feeling about the rights and needs of their particular areas of the country in respect of uninterruptable rail service.

An hon. member from the maritimes spoke clearly and concisely yesterday, echoing the opinion of many members of this house and certainly the sentiments of the fishermen and potato farmers of Prince Edward Island as well as those of wheat farmers of the west. I will be interested to see whether his feeling for his constituents is such that he will vote against the amendment tonight. If it is in the interest of his riding that railway employees go back to work as soon as possible so that trains will again begin to run he cannot afford the luxury of eating his cake and having it too. The rights of the fishermen, farmers and men of industry throughout this land are such that Canada cannot afford a railway strike.

Let me say to the government that I think the time has come when we should stop putting the railway worker in such an unfair position, as a result of which he is required at least every two years to make a sacrifice which the companies and other members of the working force are not prepared to make. These railway employees have always lived in dignity and integrity, and their position should be restored in the community of labour.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, when this house debated the question of compulsory arbitration for dock workers, and again tonight when we are faced with the present bill, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), with whom I spent some very pleasant days recently on a trip to Poland, spent some time searching his soul in public. It is a painful sight to witness one go through the gyrations of mental and spiritual pain as he tries to justify the unjustifiable. The hon. member for Verdun said that when my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), made certain proposals for the settlement of the dock workers strike he had reached the conclusion that the time had come then for the strike to end in the national interest.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Let me say to the hon. member that we agree with the government and with every other member in this house that the time has come now, in the national interest, to bring the railway strike to an end as soon as possible. We do not fault the government for making an effort to bring an end to the strike, and it is obvious that if parliament is to bring an end to any strike it must pass a law which says to the workers: You must go back to work. There is no other way in which it can be done.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

Mr. Speaker, that is not the reason for our strong opposition to the bill before us. The reason for our opposition is that the bill is a mean piece of legislation. It is an ineffectual piece of legislation. It is insulting and provocative to the workers now on strike. It is a piece of legislation to which the government could not possibly have given any intelligent thought and consideration. I would not be at all surprised if before the debate on this bill ends the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson)—who listens to reason—comes in with a new bill that will be much better than the one now before the house. I hope he does. I hope that the representations made in this house, the news in the newspapers of the opposition of the striking workers, which he has read, and the representations made to him yesterday and today by the railway unions will persuade him to change this bill. But I regret with all my heart that for the umpteenth time since I have been in this house this kind of thing is what parliament has to go through, namely, a piece of legislation that has not been thought out, that has not been carefully considered, that does not accomplish what the government intends it to accomplish; and then the legislation has to be withdrawn and a new piece of legislation brought before us.

I say in all kindness to the right hon. Prime Minister that this kind of action on the part of the government, taking one step forward and two steps backward, has got to end. The newspapers have made clear that the workers who are on strike are not prepared to go back to work under this kind of law. I say to this house that no less a person than Hon. J. C. McRuer, for many years the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario and one of the greatest jurists in this land, recently made a speech to the American Bar Association in Montreal. During that speech he said that unjust laws we have in abundance. I am not citing every word he used, but his is a story from the Globe and Mail of August 9, 1966, in which Mr. Justice McRuer said, of these unjust laws:

—some a legacy of other days—

He was referring to the unjust laws that we have in abundance:

—when standards of justice were different than they are today; others forced on us by impatient legislators who are more concerned with rules than justice.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Hon. Mr. Justice McRuer later in his speech said:

Order, like law, to be respected must deserve respect. Disrespect for an order that does not deserve respect ought not to be condemned as degeneration but commended as healthy regeneration.

I suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister that it is the height of folly to place before parliament and the country a law which cannot possibly be accepted with consent, no matter in what other way it may be accepted, by any Canadian with a sense of justice and self-respect. There is every difference between parliament saying that this strike must end and immediately bringing in legislation providing for an adequate settlement of the strike—I will come back in a moment to the role of government in railway negotiations—and the kind of thing we have now, a miserly, mean 6 per cent for the first year of the contract and no guarantee of what will happen afterwards, with supposed mediation which will be fruitless and futile until November 15, ending in compulsory arbitration.

I should like to remind my friend the minister of manpower and immigration, for whom all of us have learned to have respect for the way in which he carries out his duties inside and outside the house, of his important words which are reported in La Presse for August 22 this year. He uttered these words during a political speech in connection with the by-election in Nicolet-Yamaska:

[Translation]

A general railroad strike is a serious thing, but let us not lose our heads. There are also human rights and a government cannot do whatever it pleases.

And he carried on:

When one group is deprived of the right to strike—

—he emphasized—

—who can say where it will stop? Today, the railway employees, tomorrow the postal workers or the longshoremen, and later, the right of association—

[English]

The minister is right when in that same story he said that he appealed to his colleagues in the cabinet to think seriously before imposing compulsory arbitration. He has not yet told us whether he agrees with the imposition of compulsory arbitration which is contained in this bill.

The bill itself, and the defence which the Prime Minister made of it, are based in my submission on two great, serious errors—first, about the nature of railway service in any country, and second about the nature of collective bargaining on the railways. It is nonsense—and I learned this long ago when I was an undergraduate at McGill University studying transportation—in a country like Canada to apply the same standards to railways that apply to an ordinary private enterprise and to look at the profit sheet, whether the railway is publicly or privately owned. The price of Canada's unity—as was stated by a friend of mine, Mr. Pitman, who was a member of this house in 1960, and hon. gentlemen to my right no doubt agreed with him because they were in power—is a transcontinental railway system. This was the way in which this country was built in the first place.

To build a transcontinental railway system we gave the C.P.R. right at the start, if I remember correctly, $25 million in cash and some 40 million or 45 million acres of land from which they have benefited since. It is why we have made special provisions for rates in respect of the Crowsnest pass for the export of wheat, for special maritime rates and other special rates across this country. We have done this because we have realized as a nation that our industry in peace requires these transcontinental railways and that in war they are indispensable.

The error that is made is to attempt to make the railways the same kind of proposition as an ordinary enterprise in this country. It is misleading to this country when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), when dealing with this matter, and the Prime Minister in his speech of the other day, suggest—I am not saying that the misleading was deliberate, but it is misleading the nation none the less—that the new bill and the new set-up will mean no subsidies from the treasury after a while. This is not so. There will not only be subsidies on a reducing scale for the first eight years, if I remember correctly, but also the bill provides a compensation to the railways for losses which they may incur in the course of certain of their services.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) said was that there would be no additional subsidies for the year 1966 and for subsequent years? Is that not what he said?

Mr. Lewis: If that is all he said, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to him. I may have misrepresented him, but if my memory serves me correctly the impression was given to the country by the Prime Minister in a speech which he made yesterday on introducing the bill, and on television and in other speeches, that when the new legislation comes in there will no longer be any need to subsidize the railways; that the railways will from then on take care of themselves. That is untrue and it is misleading. So long as there is a railway system in Canada which treats all parts of Canada fairly, so long will it be necessary to assist those railways, to recompense them for uneconomic services or for services which they will have to provide at less than what the traffic could bear if the regulations were not there.

That is why the Minister of Transport provides in his bill for a freezing of the maritime rates. I am sure the fact that he represents Newfoundland is a mere coincidence, but the fact remains that under this new bill the maritime rates are frozen. Why is that so? It is so because it is impossible to place the burden of the transportation system on the people of the maritimes. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it has been neither wrong nor unwise for the government to have always had something to say with regard to the settlement of wages on the railways, because even the Canadian Pacific Railway is not a private enterprise in the normal sense. No matter how much it is regulated, it must always be regulated for the benefit of the Canadian people.

No one in this house would dare suggest, if he had any sense, that the Crowsnest pass rate be removed because the railways could immediately make tens of millions of dollars per year more if they were able to carry the grain at rates which were even a cent per ton mile instead of the half-cent per ton mile which they are now. When the average freight rate per ton mile is about a cent and three-quarters, the railways carry the grain through the Crowsnest pass at rates established in 1897, and it is right that they should do so because the economy of the country requires it. It is also right that the parliament and the public treasury should give assistance in order that the burden not fall on the farmers alone.

The second error that the Prime Minister made and the government is making is to suggest that there has ever been anything like collective bargaining in railway labour negotiations since the end of the war. It was said with such aplomb as if it were really a matter of fact, although it is sheer nonsense to suggest that there has ever been anything like collective bargaining in railway labour negotiations. The railways just sit down and say "no". I am not guessing; I sat on about six or eight conciliation boards and I remember very distinctly the conciliation board of 1956, chaired by Mr. Eric Taylor and held during one of the most prosperous years in Canada. This was one of the best years for the railways. The railway representatives came before the board and said "We cannot make any offer of money". Mr. Taylor looked at one of the vice presidents of the C.P.R. who was on the witness stand—I think it was the late Mr. Emerson—and said "Mr. Emerson, can you not agree that at least a one-half cent increase might be possible for the C.P.R.?" And Mr. Emerson answered with a straight face, "no". This has been the standard procedure of the railway labour negotiations. The railways sat tight, they made no move either on wages or on fringe benefits, and ever since November 2, 1965 this has been their stand in the present case. As far as I know, and I am sure my information is correct, they have not offered a single cent of increase to the workers up to this very moment.

I ask hon. members and through them I ask the people of Canada: What would anyone here do if he were a member of a union which had served notice ten months ago, and at the end of the ten months not a single cent was offered by the employer? Would he not go on strike? Are the employees of the unions to be condemned for acting in this way in the face of this situation? The fact is that there is no collective bargaining between the railways and the unions. To say "We did not want to interfere with the normal collective bargaining process", as the Prime Minister said yesterday in justification for not having entered earlier into the picture is—and I say this with the greatest respect—sheer self delusion, if not worse. There was no normal collective bargaining process. What he is trying to do today he could have done six months ago. I say to him that six months ago he could undoubtedly have reached a much better settlement from his point of view—not from mine—and much better terms might have been achieved than he is likely to get today, after settlements which have taken place with the dockworkers and the seaway workers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because such is the case in railway bargaining, people who have had to do with the settling of railway disputes came to the conclusion in 1950 and 1952—such as Mr. Justice Wilson in 1950 and Mr. Justice Kellock in 1952—that the only way to be fair to the railway workers and the only way to avoid railway strikes was to set a standard by which the railway employees' earnings may be measured.

It was the railways and not the unions which persuaded those conciliation boards that the proper standard for the earnings of railway non-op workers was a comparison with the earnings of employees of the durable goods industries as set out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. We did this, and I was party to such a decision by boards on a number of occasions. We did this because we had no illusions that the railway workers really had the right to strike. They have it on paper, but every time they try it and every time they threaten to strike, the boom is lowered because a railway strike is so immediately disastrous to the economy of the nation, if it lasts for some time, that everyone knows that at some point parliament will have to step in and tell the boys to go back to work. Those of us who acted on these conciliation boards recognized this fact. We did not utter pious phrases about the right to strike being a sacred right and then propose legislation that takes it away. It is just sheer rubbish to talk about its being a sacred right if you do not intend to let people exercise it. What good is a right if there is no opportunity to use it? The fact is that it is impossible for the country to permit a long strike of the railway workers, a strike which would really give them victory, because sooner or later parliament would have to step in. We realized that and knew that was the case.

The solution to the problem was to set a standard by which the earnings of the railway workers could be measured. The railways suggested it in 1950 and 1952, and when the standard was applied, not totally, not properly or correctly but in some measure, then the railways started kicking against it and ever since then they have tried to destroy what they themselves originally proposed.

What this bill should have done, in my submission, Mr. Speaker, is to have provided a wage for these employees that measures up to the standard provided by the earnings of durable goods employees, properly adjusted in accordance with the sex distribution, the size of the firm, the greater skills in the railway work force and geographical location which favours the durable goods industry. It should have provided not a dribbling "four and four" but a 25 per cent increase in rates over a period of two years, which is clearly what the arithmetic of the standard properly applied requires.

Now, Mr. Speaker, somebody said that if we did that parliament would set the rates. I plead with members of this house, let us not fool ourselves; we are setting the rates, and in the long run the government will set the rates if parliament does not. There can be no settlement in a railway dispute about wages unless the government goes in and assists that settlement, and guarantees the railways a way to meet the settlement. So that whether the dispute is settled here or is settled later, it will be either this parliament or this government which will settle it.

I say that it would have been much more sensible, if we are to pass a law which tells people to go back to work, to have the courage to set the wage increase to which these people are clearly entitled by using a standard which has been established by a number of conciliation boards over a number of years.

There is another problem in connection with the railway force which I feel I must draw to the attention of members of this house. Because of the way in which the increases to the railwaymen have been applied in the past number of years, the gap between the unskilled and the skilled workers on the labour force has continually narrowed. For example, today, in 1966 an electrician, a sheet metal worker, a boilermaker or a carman, people who undertake a five year apprenticeship, have a wage rate per hour of $2.49 and a fraction—less than $2.50 an hour. And these are skilled craftsmen who have had five years apprenticeship. These people are concentrated in the large metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto, and now Calgary, to a larger and larger extent as mechanization on the railways has eliminated most of the roundhouses and replaced them with large modern shops. As I say, these men work in large metropolitan areas where their counterparts in industry—I am not talking about people in construction here, but manufacturing industry—receive between 75 cents and $1 more per hour.

An hon. Member: But for how long do they work?

Mr. Lewis: As long as anybody else in industry, the regular 40 hour week.

An hon. Member: In construction?

Mr. Lewis: If the hon. member had been listening to me—I thought I was speaking loudly enough—he would have heard me say I was not speaking of construction but of craftsmen in industry. I am saying that all of them are earning 75 cents to $1 per hour more.

In this regard there must be some adjustment made. It is important for the welfare of the railways, let alone the men concerned, that these skilled craftsmen be paid the rate to which their skills entitle them, so that they have some pride in and some loyalty to their work, instead of going around embittered, as I know some hundreds and maybe thousands are doing across the country.

Let us not weep for the C.P.R., Mr. Speaker. The fact is that despite regulations and everything else the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made out of its total operations in the year 1964 some 61 per cent more by way of profits before taxes than it did in 1963, and 47½ per cent more in 1964 than in 1963 after taxes. In 1965 the company made slightly less than 61 per cent in profits before taxes, but a great deal more in profits after taxes, namely 55 per cent. Their earnings in the first seven months of this year have been phenomenal.

I say without fear of any valid contradiction that, even without any help from this government, if the C.P.R. were willing to apply the profits made from all its enterprises, which all stem originally from its railway operations, the company could shoulder a 25 per cent increase in the rates without batting a corporate eyelash.

An hon. Member: What about the C.N.R.?

Mr. Lewis: The C.N.R. is a public enterprise. The C.N.R., as the hon. gentleman who interrupted me knows, has been loaded with a debt structure which is antediluvian and completely unjustified. When this government or any government has sense enough to recapitalize the C.N.R., then the C.N.R. will also show a great deal more profit than it does now.

If anybody shouts "inflation" at me, let me inform this house that the difference between the 18 per cent over two years as proposed by Mr. Justice Munroe and hon. Mr. Cameron, and 25 per cent over two years, would amount in total for all railways involved to about $30 million. Thirty million dollars is one sixteenth of 1 per cent of our gross national product; and I would challenge any economist on the other side of the house to tell me that an increase in wages of one sixteenth of 1 per cent of our gross national product will cause inflation.

This bill should have had included in it a solution to the problem of job security among these workers. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is shameful that this bill should in effect send to arbitration a problem which has been studied by Mr. Justice Freedman, —which is what it does. If I am informed correctly, there was a parliamentary committee in 1964-65 which found it necessary to provide for job security; the committee may have been earlier than that. There has been an investigation made by Mr. Justice Freedman who issued a report. Judge Little also told the government that legislation was needed. Mr. Justice Munroe also says legislation is needed. How many more inquiries does the government need? How many more arbitrators does the government require before it carries out the recommendations of Mr. Justice Freedman? A colleague of mine has just suggested to me that perhaps they are looking for somebody who will make the opposite findings to Mr. Justice Freedman. There is no reason in the world why this bill could not have amended the agreement in a way which met the job security fears of the workers.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not want to leave this house with an erroneous impression. Is it not fair to say that Mr. Justice Munroe said that action at this time with regard to the Freedman report would be premature?

Mr. Lewis: Action at this time by him would be premature. That may have been the case; I do not quite know—

Mr. Nicholson: Did he not say that action by the government at this time would be premature?

Mr. Lewis: If he did, Mr. Speaker, then I very strongly disagree with him. Because the one thing about the Freedman report we should bear in mind is this: Judge Little said in his report that there are wide implications. There are not any wider implications than those dealt with by Mr. Justice Freedman, because he dealt directly with the railways and not with any other industry.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, all that I suggested to the hon. gentleman in asking my question was that I was sure that he did not want to misquote Mr. Justice Munroe.

Mr. Lewis: If I have misquoted him then I am sorry. My impression was that he also agreed that legislation was necessary. I cannot recall his saying that it would be premature at this time, but if the minister says that he said that and is sure of his facts I will, of course, accept that. I will look it up after my speech.

In addition to the bill's not containing the provisions I suggested it ought to contain, it does not even give the workers what has been recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and the hon. Mr. Cameron. As has been pointed out more than once on the floor of this house, all that the government does is to give the worker the "four and four" in the first year. There is no guarantee that the railway men will even get what Mr. Justice Munroe recommended for the second year. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, from my practical experience I cannot imagine that any arbitrator would go below that recommendation; but there is no guarantee of that in this bill and there will be no certainty of it.

Furthermore, Mr. Justice Munroe made other findings. He improved annual vacations, provided increased life insurance and made one or two other recommendations. Every one of those should have been contained in this bill. At least the matters I have mentioned should have been in the bill. Then the dispute over the 18 per cent recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and the 25 per cent or so the unions are asking for should have been sent to mediation in order that a just and proper settlement could be achieved. It may be if that were done, the workers would look at the bill differently.

I warn the Prime Minister, if I may, that even if he changes this bill but still gives the workers only 4 per cent retroactivity to January 1, 1966, he will repeat the folly which this bill represents, because the workers are right in rejecting it. Four per cent retroactive to January 1 does not even cover their losses due to the rise in the cost of living, let alone improving their situation. The 18 per cent which Mr. Justice Munroe recommended ought, in my opinion to have been divided; it should have been divided, providing 9 per cent for the whole of the first year and 9 per cent for the second year. If that sort of thing were produced I think the workers might look at this matter.

A great deal has been said in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and a great deal has been written in newspaper columns and other places about labour's part in producing inflation. Let me deal with a number of statistical facts with respect to this matter if I may. In the Financial Times of Canada in the issue of June 13, 1960, there is a column by Robert Stewart entitled: 'Canadian Economy Stronger than Believed". In the column it is stated that a new method of calculating productivity in Canada has shown that unit labour costs—

—in direct contradiction to previous information —have not risen significantly for the better part of 10 years. Unit labour costs are vital to international competitiveness. This relieves fears expressed in the government's budget white paper this year that increases in these costs had endangered Canada's trading position.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that all the statisticians and all the studies made of labour costs in Canada by outside economists and by economists of the research branch of the Department of Labour have in recent years conclusively shown that actually the unit cost of labour, that is the labour cost per unit in production and manufacturing, has gone up very little, and in some cases has gone down, so that labour has certainly not been responsible for inflation.

What we are really suffering from in Canada, I suggest, is not fearful inflation in the economists' sense. What we are suffering from at this time is an increase in the cost of living for ordinary people, an increase in food prices, in rents, and in this kind of thing. These increases are due to the reasons that my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) gave. They are due to administered prices; to increased mark-ups by the chain stores, and to profiteering of a kind which should not take place. This government and this parliament ought soon to do something about it.

I plead with the government, for the sake of this law, and for the sake of this country, to change this bill so that it carries with it some equity and justice. I plead with the government to propose a bill which will give a guarantee of some sort of adequate wage increase to the workers. I would prefer 25 per cent over two years, and something additional for the skilled crafts, who are entirely deserving of it. But at least the government ought to have, in this bill, 9 per cent for 1966 and 9 per cent for 1967; or 8 per cent for 1966 and 10 per cent for 1967. I am not trying to bargain, but I think the 18 per cent that Mr. Justice Munroe proposed, divided almost equally over the two years, ought to be implemented in the legislation, with the difference between 18 per cent and 25 per cent to be later negotiated under an effective mediator.

I plead with the government, Mr. Speaker, to drop the compulsory arbitration clause, for the reasons given by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I cannot call for my proposition a more learned, and a more influential witness. I plead with the government to drop it also for another reason, namely that the period for negotiation provided in the bill is meaningless unless compulsory arbitration is removed.

It would be extremely naïve for anyone to think that the railways would sit down to negotiate, knowing that on November 15 there is going to be an arbitrator in this matter. It would be naïve to think that the railways would move a single inch, because they will know that if they make a proposal higher than 18 per cent, then the unions will go to arbitration and take the higher proposal as the floor. The railways know that, and will not make any proposals unless the compulsory arbitration clause is removed and the government is active and effective in mediation. Then, of course, the railways will have to negotiate sensibly and responsibly, because there will not be the stick of compulsory arbitration at the end. For these reasons, as well as for the general reasons I gave earlier, I urge the government to remove the compulsory arbitration clause.

I think that it is still not too late. I believe this government can produce a bill along the lines of the positive suggestions which I have made which will meet with the support of the strikers—perhaps not entirely—but which will be sufficiently palatable for them to decide that they must obey the law. This is what I want them to do. This is what every member of this house wants them to do. I am not one of those who will hypocritically tell people to accept an unjust law, if I know that if I were in their place, I would not do so myself. I ask the Prime Minister and the government not to force an unjust law on the striking worker, not to put him in the position of having to defy the law because of the strength of his grievance.

There is no worker in Canada more responsible, more law abiding—

Mr. Winkler: Can I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lewis: Certainly.

Mr. Winkler: Is the hon. member suggesting that if this bill becomes law the members of the union should not obey it?

Mr. Lewis: Not at all. I am suggesting exactly the same thing that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition suggested—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: —that he suggested not once, but a dozen times. He told the government that this law would not produce respect—I cannot quote him—that this law is in danger of being not obeyed. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), in the debate in 1960 when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was prime minister, warned the government of that time of the same thing. I have not time to pull out the quotation, but the record shows that the Secretary of State for External Affairs warned the then prime minister that the law he proposed was in danger of being disobeyed. That is what I am saying. I am saying precisely what the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said, that it is wrong to provide a law which is unjust and which will produce disrespect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is just exactly what I did not say. I said that once parliament decides, unless there is to be anarchy and chaos in the country, the law must be obeyed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speeches of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, often with great interest and amusement, though not always with approval. I, too, am for virtue. I agree with this great declaration of his that the law should be obeyed. I agree with that. Everyone is against anarchy.

I remind the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that he said the actual increase would be 6 per cent. He talked of the 6 per cent boys, and of the six buck boys. He then said: "Will the men go back to work?"

• (9:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: That is not what you are asking.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, yes—this is what I am asking.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are backing up.

Mr. Lewis: I am not backing up. The great position of right hon. Leader of the Opposition does not intimidate me. Much as I respect him, just let him take it easy. I am saying the same thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette: That is not what you said.

Mr. Lewis: I say the same thing, and I draw the attention of this parliament to the reports in the newspapers that the men have said they cannot accept this. And I say to the government that neither it nor this parliament—somewhere in the right hon. gentleman's speech this idea is expressed, even though I cannot put my finger on it—should put an act on the statute books which it may be difficult for Canadian citizens to obey, and which some of them have said they will not obey.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Caouette: May I ask the hon. member for York South one question?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent for the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: In the name of the freedom of the workingmen on the railways, or of any workingmen in Canada, the hon. member is strongly opposed to compulsory arbitration. Would he also be opposed, for the same reason, to the compulsory check-off which is entirely against freedom of any workingman who does not want to belong to any union in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to answer the question?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lewis: I think that in courtesy to this parliament I ought to answer a question which is addressed to me, if not always in courtesy to other things. I believe the hon. gentleman asking the question produced a typical antilabour red herring.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Lewis: I would remind him and other gentlemen who are making a great deal of noise—I do not mind; I will wait, if you have patience, sir—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lewis: I would remind them that a compulsory deduction of dues was established in this country in the first place, on the first important occasion, by no less a man than the then Mr. Justice Ivan Rand back in 1945 at the time of the united automobile strike in Windsor, as I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) will remember. I say to the hon. gentleman who asked this question that if he has any reason to doubt my own attitude toward some of these things, it is his privilege. But I, and many members of this house who know Mr. Justice Rand, are certain he would not have approved compulsory deduction of union dues if this was an erosion of freedom. In my own opinion it is not, and I therefore support deduction of union dues.

Mr. Webb: May I ask the hon. member another question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind the house that the time allotted to the hon. member for York South has expired and that a question can be put to him only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Webb: I should like to ask the hon. member whether he was a representative counsel for the union in years past at a fee of some $200, I believe, or $50 a day, though since the unions have been on strike his fee is now raised to $2,000 a day.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Lewis: I answer this question with a smile even though I think this kind of ungentlemanly attack on other members of this house is to be deplored. I merely say that I have not acted for these unions since I was elected to parliament. As a matter of fact, they asked me to act on the conciliation board and I told them I could not because I was a member of parliament. As to any charge for my fees, that is my own affair and the affair of my clients, as other people's fees and earnings are their affair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I can understand the anxiety of hon. gentleman opposite in seeking a vote. My purpose in speaking is to secure a unanimous vote in defeating the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

I realize there is unanimity in the house as to the necessity of railway operations in Canada being resumed. I realize there is unanimity in the desire that the strike shall cease and that the men should return to their jobs. I hope that when this parliament has passed a law, not only will every member of the House of Commons expect his fellow citizens to obey the law, but that every member of the House of Commons will encourage his fellow citizens to obey the law that is passed by parliament.

In 1960 when the Leader of the Opposition introduced his railway legislation, or at least announced his intention of introducing legislation to avoid a strike, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made the following comment:

> Mr. Speaker, we on this side share the Prime Minister's regret, a regret which I am sure is felt by every hon. member of the house, that in spite of the strenuous efforts that have been made in accordance with the best democratic practice it has not been possible to reach an agreement on this important matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has announced that legislation will now be introduced to deal with this question. It goes without saying, as he has mentioned, that whatever legislation is passed by the house will be respected and obeyed by trade union members and anyone else who is covered by it. I think we can all count upon that.

That is the end of the quotation. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that if we cannot count on that in Canada, the result is anarchy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: I listened with great interest to the earlier part of the remarks made by the hon. member for York South and I must say that since the former member for Eglinton was in the house I have not heard the words "nonsense" and "rubbish" repeated so often in a single speech.

I intend in dealing with the issues before the house to consider three aspects of the problem, first, the wage question; second, the pattern of parliamentary intervention in labour disputes and, finally, the Freedman aspect of this rail problem.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), in his skilful speech, attempted to tag 6 per cent on the proposed wage settlement implied in this bill. He has implied, if he has not stated, that this 6 per cent is a creation of the government, that it has no logical or judicial foundation, and he has claimed that it is less than the award of the conciliation board. In fact he said, as recorded at page 7,780 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The actual increase will be 6 per cent. That is an interesting figure when one begins to realize the degree to which the 6 per cent bank interest rate has caused difficulty in recent months. Will the men go back to work? Those in the Liberal party used to be the six bucks boys . . . now they are the 6 per cent boys. They are offering to the workers far less than was actually offered or suggested by the conciliation board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I immediately ask the minister this question. What about the failure to offer that portion beginning January 1, 1967. Why was that not included within this legislation? You are offering less because you are offering nothing for 1967.

Mr. MacEachen: I hope to deal with that aspect of the question later on, but I would say that if there is any impediment in the minds of the workers about returning to work, or any reluctance after this law is passed, it will be, in part, the result of the distortion that has been included in this statement by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, which has been repeated on the radio, over television and in newspapers—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: Take your responsibility.

Mr. MacEachen: —that in the final settlement all the workers will get, and can get, under this bill is 6 per cent. The Leader of the Opposition thinks that is the case and he said so, and it has had an effect on the country. But the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is wrong and inaccurate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert: That is all that is guaranteed under the bill.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the 6 per cent is not a creation of the government. It is not a figure picked out of the air. It is the recommendation of Mr. Justice Craig Munroe as chairman of the conciliation board who made a report to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson).

Mr. Lambert: As part of a package.

Mr. MacEachen: It is also in accordance with the finding of former Mr. Justice Cameron who sat on another conciliation board; and in view of the fact that the 1966 proposal is based on the finding of Mr. Justice Craig Munroe I think we ought to know something about his credentials in this particular field.

An hon. Member: We are not worried about that.

Mr. Ricard: Filibuster.

Mr. MacEachen: In 1962—

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question? Does he not agree that all the bill gives is 6 per cent for 1966?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: Is that not what the minister is saying?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is not what the minister is saying.

Mr. Fulton: Well, what is the minister saying?

Mr. MacEachen: I have indicated to the house that I was dealing with the wage aspect of the settlement and I shall be quite happy at the end of my speech to answer any questions that arise on this particular subject matter. But I appreciate the reluctance of the hon. gentleman to have placed on the record the particular authority of Mr. Justice Munroe in this field because he, Mr. Justice Munroe, was selected by the right hon. gentleman and his minister of labour in 1962 to head the conciliation board of which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) was the union nominee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Munroe reported on that conciliation board and he reported the settlement. How does that square with the comment made by the hon. member for York South a moment ago that the railways always say no, because Mr. Munroe on that occasion produced a settlement in a very complex issue by his work on the board, as I understand it, and reported a settlement.

In 1964, because of the success of this judge in securing a settlement in the previous situation, I recommended him to my colleagues to become chairman of the conciliation board. On that occasion he produced a majority award signed by the hon. member for York South as the union nominee, and that majority award became the basis of a settlement in 1964. This certainly illustrates that Mr. Justice Munroe is a competent person who has a record of success. Unfortunately, in this current dispute Mr. Justice Munroe failed to secure a unanimous report. He failed to secure a majority report, but he discharged his responsibility as chairman of the board and produced recommendations on the wage question and other matters in his report. All I want to argue is that—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why argue the obvious?

Mr. MacEachen: —is that Mr. Justice Craig Munroe had the confidence of the previous government, the present government, the unions and management because he was their nominee in this particular dispute. He has an intimate knowledge of the issues in dispute, as the result of extensive personal experience and successful settlements. I think it can be said, in the words of the hon. member for York South, without fear of valid contradiction, that there is no other person in Canada who could have approached this dispute with the knowledge, experience and judicial capacity possessed by this particular jurist.

Now, is the 6 per cent the creation of the government? May I read from the recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe at page 8, where he says:

> My recommendation is as follows:
> To the hourly basic rates of pay in force at December 31, 1965, there shall be added:
> (a) effective January 1, 1966 add 4 per cent,
> (b) effective July 1, 1966, add a further 4 per cent—

That is his proposal for 1966.

Mr. Fulton: Read on.

Mr. MacEachen: I will be glad to.

Mr. Fulton: Now.

Mr. McIlraith: Just wait a minute.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is the recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe with respect to the year 1966.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. gentlemen that the minister should be given an opportunity to make his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the words of the recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe I refer to clause 6 of the bill which provides in paragraph (b):

> Each basic daily rate in effect on December 31, 1965, established by or pursuant to the agreement in the case of an agreement binding or entered into on behalf of operating employees by 4 per cent effective January 1, 1966, and an additional 4 per cent effective July 1, 1966.

That was the point of reference used by the government. The hon. member for York South says that we ought to accept his point of reference. But he was not charged with the responsibility the chairman of the conciliation board had. I believe the government was duty bound to accept the objective judicial finding of the most experienced person in this field as a basis for its proposal.

An hon. Member: Then why did you not accept it?

Mr. MacEachen: I think that if the right hon. Leader of the Opposition calls us 6 per cent people, then he ought to bear in mind the undue castigation he is making of the chairman of this conciliation board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: As I stated at the very beginning, the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition has had its intended effect, because there has resounded throughout Canada the impression in the minds of the workers that 6 per cent is the final and last amount. That is incorrect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I pointed out that the recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe had not been incorporated in this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I pointed out. I now give the minister an opportunity to answer. What offers are now being made to the union by the Prime Minister or by another member of the cabinet over that which is now before parliament?

Mr. Pearson: You will find out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament is dealing with this matter and it is being changed outside.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am quite anxious to pursue this point to clarify the situation because—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Answer the question.

Mr. MacEachen: —this is an interim settlement for 1966 and because it is a provisional settlement—to use the words of the Minister of Justice on another occasion, referring to the 1958 bill. It is a provisional interim settlement for 1966. The parties are free to change this figure through the process of mediation provided under this bill.

The second inaccuracy made in the statement of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is that the wage rates for 1967 are not covered in this legislation. I want to tell the house, Mr. Speaker, that the government carefully considered whether it would include a provision in the bill providing for the Munroe award for the year 1967. That was a choice open to the government. It rejected that course—

Mr. Churchill: No confidence in the judge.

Mr. MacEachen: —because it took the view that the maximum opportunity ought to be left to the parties to work out an agreed settlement for 1967, and failing that there is the solution of the dispute between them by arbitration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The lamest excuse we have heard tonight.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) this afternoon accused us of destroying collective bargaining by imposing compulsory arbitration. His deputy leader told us that it does not exist. Maybe they ought to get together to reconcile their own differences.

The reference to 1967 is a clear illustration that the Leader of the Opposition has distorted beyond recognition the provisions of this bill with respect to the wage settlement. It is absolutely clear that Mr. Justice Munroe recommended a settlement of 18 per cent for a two year period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not put that in the legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Anyone who has any understanding of collective bargaining, as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has, will readily agree that it is unrealistic that any settlement reached through agreement or arbitration will be less than the total wage package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, past experience teaches that—

Mr. Fulton: Does the bill say that?

Mr. MacEachen: —and I am satisfied that if the Leader of the Opposition had used the percentage of 18 per cent, as he would have been entitled to do on the basis of past experience, the effect among the workers in Canada would have been entirely different.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I accept the right of any hon. member to disagree with this bill; but I do believe it is totally irresponsible to misrepresent what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: If it is so good, let us vote right now.

Mr. MacEachen: I am satisfied that anyone who reads the proposals of Mr. Justice Munroe and looks at the proposal provided for 1966, and who examines what has happened in previous mediations and arbitrations will reach exactly the same conclusion I have reached and which the hon. member for York South obviously has reached. I wish the hon. member for York South would get up and say it, and tell the workers that this is a total settlement ultimately as prescribed by Mr. Justice Munroe.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I have explained the reason the government chose to provide a provisional settlement for 1966 in the expectation that the parties ought to be given a further opportunity to negotiate and mediate. The right hon. gentleman has to appreciate that approach because in 1960 he ordered the men back to work empty handed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much is the government offering today?

Mr. MacEachen: He ordered the men back to work empty handed and he said: We are placing our total reliance on collective bargaining and on mediation, and his confidence was justified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much are you offering today?

Mr. MacEachen: His confidence was justified because negotiations reached a settlement of that dispute. We have provided, as we stated was our policy during that earlier debate, for an interim settlement on the basis of the conciliation board award and left the remainder of the issues, including a settlement for 1967, to the parties. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition attacks us for having taken the wrong course. What is he asking us to do—give nothing as he did?

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much was offered this evening by the Prime Minister?

Mr. MacEachen: My purpose in participating in this debate tonight, Mr. Speaker, is to assert what must be obvious to any person who examines this bill and examines the reports of the boards, that 6 per cent is not the final settlement: It is a provisional interim settlement for one year.

An hon. Member: Then it is 6 per cent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Six per cent here and 30 per cent there.

Mr. MacEachen: I am not embarrassed by that kind of comment because I began by using this 6 per cent figure produced by the Leader of the Opposition.

May I continue my remarks by referring to a second aspect of the problem, namely the pattern of parliamentary intervention in previous disputes. Honesty, I am sure, must compel us to admit that when parliament intervenes in the settlement of a dispute the processes of free collective bargaining are abridged. There is no doubt about that. When parliament must act to reach a settlement, as it has done on three former occasions the processes of free collective bargaining have failed, have broken down, resulting in parliament stepping in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister answer a question?

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that on the basis of a careful examination of all the past precedents, and there are only three of value to us—unless we refer to the Skeena precedent, which never became a full-blown precedent—they teach us that this bill succeeds as well as if not better than any other that has been introduced in the house in reducing to a minimum the impact of interference in collective bargaining, respecting the rights of the workers, because it is based on an appropriate judicial finding.

It is instructive to look at the 1958 and 1960 bills brought forward by the previous administration. First, with respect to the wage aspect, the 1958 bill introduced either by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) or by the Leader of the Opposition prescribed a wage settlement of 8 per cent. The union men had been on strike for 68 days. If I reproduced the words and the mood of the Leader of the Opposition I could only say they failed to act—for 68 days they failed to act.

One should read clause 4 of the bill which prescribed an 8 per cent settlement, in spite of the fact that the chairman of the conciliation board in that case recommended a settlement of 25 per cent, union representatives 31 per cent and the company 17 per cent. The government chose 8 per cent because the stewards union, one group in the bargaining complex, settled for 8 per cent.

That bill provided for compulsory arbitration by governor in council. I do not know what conclusion to draw from the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). They both argued that, once there is compulsory arbitration, negotiations fail.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. MacEachen: We have only two cases to illustrate this, one of which proves the hon. gentlemen right and the other of which proves them wrong.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: The one proves them wrong because a settlement was reached without compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. minister say where—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the one precedent—

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister where—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has the floor. If the minister wishes to permit a question perhaps he will indicate his permission.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister indicate where in the context of the statute of 1958 he finds a provision for compulsory arbitration by governor in council? There is provision for the appointment of a board of arbitration, but not for the acceptance of an order of the governor in council.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, clause 7 of Bill C-42 as passed by the house in 1958 provides that:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations.
> (d) for referring to a board of three arbitrators appointed by the governor in council such matters relating to the revision or amendment of an existing collective agreement as the parties thereto may request or as the governor in council may deem expedient, including the fixing of the term during which the new collective agreement shall operate—

Mr. Fulton: Surely that is by arbitration. That is very different from what you said.

Mr. MacEachen: If I have misled the opposition I apologize. What I am suggesting is that this bill gave authority to the governor in council to refer matters to a board of arbitration, the result of which arbitration would determine the collective agreement.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what you said.

Mr. MacEachen: That is exactly what is provided for in this present bill with respect to arbitration, except that we respect the parliamentary authority by giving parliament the opportunity, if it sees fit, to revoke any order established under this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not understand why hon. gentlemen opposite pound their chests in all righteousness about this bill, in view of the fact that the 1958 bill included precisely the same provision for compulsory arbitration except for the fact that it did not provide for parliamentary revocation of any order in council made by the governor in council. So I do not know that conclusion you draw from that. You draw one conclusion, that this bill is just about as good as any bill produced by the opposition; and for hon. gentlemen opposite to describe it otherwise is an act of hypocrisy.

In 1960, which is the other case, the Leader of the Opposition produced a bill in the house ordering the men back to work.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the strike began.

Mr. MacEachen: Before the strike began. He ordered the men back to work empty-handed, with no wage increase whatsoever.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We did not make any offers such as were made this afternoon by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Zero.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There were none of these under-the-table deals.

Mr. Winkler: No 30 per cent deals, either.

Mr. MacEwan: Read on.

Mr. MacEachen: I think the point has been driven home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition brought in a bill to stop a strike before the right to strike had been exercised. He ordered the men back to work and he sent them back empty-handed, without a red cent. I do not know why today he left everything to free enterprise and is asking us not only to fix the wage rates for 1966 and 1967 but to fix fringe benefits, to establish the recommendations contained in the Freedman report and to legislate a total settlement covering every aspect of these collective agreements, when the course he followed was to legislate on not a single item; and he sent the men back to work.

Where is the consistency, when the amendment before the house proposed by the Leader of the Opposition castigates us because we have failed to include fringe benifits, have failed to legislate every item of the Munroe awards and have failed to legislate the Freedman report? How can the Leader of the Opposition square this amendment with his own conduct as prime minister, when he brought in the bill and refused to legislate in respect of a single item, a single term of a single collective agreement? All I am trying to prove, Mr. Speaker, is a very simple thesis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That black is white.

Mr. MacEachen: I am trying to prove a simple thesis, namely that nobody on the other side of the house ought to find any fault with this bill on any of the grounds that have been put forward against it, if they want to be consistent with their past conduct; because it is a fact that any government that intervenes in the process of free collective bargaining is bound to take steps that can be criticized, and easily criticized, by any opposition party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the 30 per cent formula?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to say a word or two about the Freedman report because I realize it is a very important issue in this dispute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, before the minister continues, would he accept a question? I have paid his remarks the attention they deserve. The minister has stated how wonderful this bill is. Will he now tell the house whether the Prime Minister or any other minister of the government, while parliament sits, is offering to raise the ante to the unions far and above anything that is included in this bill?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I can answer that question at once. The right hon. gentleman, as usual, has been deceived by his headlines. No offer has been made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: "No offers have been made." Does the Prime Minister say—he dare not deny it—that he did not make offers this very evening?

Mr. Winkler: Whom have you been negotiating with?

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) says that he knows an offer has been made today. I challenge him. I deny it, and I say he has no right to interject statements of that kind when the Prime Minister of this country has said that no offers have been made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I would like to ask a question, then: Whom have they been negotiating with?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should have order in the house. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. McIlraith: The continuous breach of the rules by the official opposition.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I said when I began that I wanted to say something about this bill in connection with the problem raised by the Freedman report. I believe it is wrong to state that the bill makes no provision for a determination of the Freedman-type issue. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) made explicit something that is implicit in the bill, namely that there is provision for the arbitrator to deal with this particular aspect of the dispute which we face at the present time. The concern of, especially the trainmen, and others involved in this dispute is understandable with respect to the problem posed in the Freedman report. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I have expressed fully my views on the Freedman report and the kind of guidepost it will establish in the field of industrial relations and labour relations in Canada. This problem cannot be ignored. It is a fact that there is concern among the workers that the institution of technological change during the life of a contract may have consequences in respect of their job security. They have urged that they have an opportunity to negotiate on these changes during the life of an agreement.

Mr. Justice Freedman in his report made the proposal that the ideal solution of this problem is to permit the parties, the unions and the men, to work with proper procedures to cope with the problem. This is Mr. Justice Freedman's principal recommendation. He says that if this fails, legislation can be considered along the following lines: An arbitrator will be appointed to determine whether any change contemplated during the life of the agreement is a material change. Then if he concludes that it is not a material change, management is entitled to institute that change. If he concludes it is a material change, it is to be negotiated at that time or at the end of the agreement. That is Mr. Justice Freedman's proposal.

Hon. gentlemen will have read another report involved in this problem, namely the report of the conciliation board headed by Judge Little. In my view there is an encouraging conclusion with respect to the Freedman report in that particular aspect of the conciliation board report, because there is a large degree of agreement between the union representative and the management representative on the way to cope with the Freedman-type issue. It has not been fully resolved but encouraging steps have been taken, and there is no doubt that further encouraging steps will be taken on a voluntary basis.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: Did the Little commission not recommend legislation in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: I regret I have to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Keep up the filibuster by yourselves.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister not have unlimited time under standing order 31?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will rise only if the Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has terminated his remarks. I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. MacEachen: My time is up.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to suggest to the house that in view of the fact no one in our party has spoken for the past six hours, we should allow the previous speaker to continue and that we should then continue the debate beyond ten o'clock in order to give hon. members on the government side an opportunity to continue their filibuster of their own bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Fulton: On the understanding that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will not continue his remarks I wish to rise on a question of privilege with relation to something he previously said. He was quoting from the report of Mr. Justice Munroe and I asked him to continue reading the paragraph. It was certainly my impression from the remarks made by the minister that he had concluded the paragraph. I was therefore hesitant in suggesting there was something further. I wish therefore to place on the record the full paragraph from which the minister was quoting. It appears on page 8 of the report and reads as follows:

> My recommendation is as follows:
> To the hourly basic rates of pay in force at December 31, 1965, there shall be added:
> (a) effective January 1, 1966 add 4 per cent,

That is where the minister stopped reading. The paragraph continues as follows:

> (c) effective January 1, 1967 add a further 4 per cent,
> Daily, weekly and monthly rates shall be increased in an equivalent manner.

The minister read none of the subsequent provisions of that paragraph, all of which are material to the consideration before us and all of which are referred to in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition. It was a deliberate attempt to pretend to the house that the recommendation stopped there.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the subsequent remarks which I made clearly illustrated that these further percentages were included. If I did not read them, I intended to read them. They should be part of the total picture, the total 18 per cent that will likely be the ultimate basis of the settlement.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I move that this house continue to sit today until eleven o'clock.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I would agree to the motion only if the minister would alter it to read "until a later hour" because I think every opportunity should be given to the government if it wishes to filibuster its own bill. We are willing to sit as long as the government continues talking, in order to vote on this bill and reach a decision on it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the members of this party would object to sitting beyond ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: This is an emergency.

Mr. McIlraith: Standing order 6 (2) provides that:

A motion that the house continue to sit after the hour specified in section (1) may be made at any time without notice. If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places and if 10 or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion.

The motion is not debatable.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. minister for his assistance. I was about to read standing order 6 (2) to hon. members. It was done on my behalf. Hon. members know the rule; it is that if any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places and if 10 or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The motion, of course, is not debatable.

Mr. Douglas: I am not debating the motion, Mr. Speaker. I just wish to say that I objected on the ground I feel the government should have time to consider the recommendations we have made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rule does not provide for explanations as to why an hon. member objects. He can only rise and object. Is there an objection? If so it will be registered by hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Let us get back to work.

Mr. Speaker: If 10 hon. members rise, the question shall not be put.

And more than ten members having risen:

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it seems that every time I am on the floor I hear this roar of a filibuster from the other side.

An hon. Member: You have never been up before.

Mr. Fawcett: There is too much filibuster. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think perhaps I am better qualified to speak for the railroaders than anyone else in this house. It is quite obvious that particularly some of the hon. members on the other side do not want to hear a railroader's point of view. However, I will put it on the record. I was a railroader for 25 years and I have worked with other railroaders. For 15 years I represented one of the unions participating in this strike. I therefore think I am qualified to give some explanation regarding my knowledge of this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that there are too many conversations taking place at the present time. This makes it difficult to follow the speech being made by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Fawcett: May I call it ten o'clock? Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fawcett: My colleague tells me I will have to say I am a railroader all over again. I can do so, but I can assure hon. members that when I come back tomorrow I will probably tell you this all over again as well. My colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) as well as my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) both made the remark today that railroaders do not like strikes. Mr. Speaker, I think it is now ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39(A) deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING PENSION RIGHTS OF STRIKERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I addressed a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) on the orders of the day this afternoon and it is in connection with this matter that I should like to say a few words, in the hope that he might amplify the answer which he gave. The answer was in itself satisfactory but I do feel—

Mr. Nicholson: Will the hon. member permit a question? I think I am reasonably familiar with the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to which the hon. member made reference. Would he draw my attention to the particular section which he would like me to invoke as a result of his question today?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I certainly intend to do that if the minister will just wait for two or three minutes. I am sure he will understand that any hon. member in this house who has had a long connection with the city of Winnipeg could not but ask the question I did today with considerable feeling.

In the year 1919 we had a strike situation in Winnipeg as a result of which a great many people suffered for many years, and many of them are still suffering. We experienced one of the greatest injustices that ever resulted from a strike situation. I am referring to the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway cancelled all pension rights and privileges that had been earned by its employees up to the time of that strike. It went further and provided that from then on no one over 40 years of age could re-enter the pension plan. The total result, as I say, was that for many years there was a great deal of suffering, and there still is for many older men who have retired from the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Because of this injustice the matter was brought up on the floor of the House of Commons for many years by my predecessor, the late Mr. Woodsworth, and I carried on the effort when I came here to try to get the government to do something to restore those pension rights.

We were not able to have that accomplished, but two things did result. One was a report prepared by an esteemed civil servant, who has been in the gallery both yesterday and today, and I see is still there tonight, Mr. Harris Johnstone, on the whole question. This report was made as a result of an investigation ordered at my request by Mr. Mackenzie King, and the report made it clear that the action of the C.P.R. was wrong. But the government still took the position that there was nothing it could do about the 1919 situation.

However, as a result of our efforts in this matter, as a result of Mr. Johnstone's investigation and report and as a result of the battles on the floor of the House of Commons, we did persuade the Liberal government of that day, under Prime Minister Mackenzie King, to put an amendment into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation

Act. As a matter of fact, it was one of those rare occasions when a private member's amendment was accepted. Although it was subamended to some extent, the heart of the amendment, as I proposed it, was accepted and it is still incorporated in the act.

May I refer the minister to section 4 (3) (b) of the act. I do not need to read all of it, since some of the words are not relevant, but let me read the significant words:

> No employer . . . shall deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work after the 1st day of September, 1948, as the result of a lockout or while taking part in a concerted stoppage of work due to a labour dispute where such lockout or stoppage of work has been enforced by the employer or called by the recognized representative of such employee, as the case may be, after all steps provided or contemplated by law have been taken through negotiation, collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration to settle such dispute or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act.

I must say that the wording of that section as it was passed is a lot longer than it was when I first moved the amendment to the statute, but surely the sum and substance of the amendment is very clear. I submit that when it was passed by parliament, parliament knew what it was doing. It did not want the 1919 situation ever to be repeated. It did not want workers to lose their pension rights because they went out on strike, particularly if they went out on a legal strike.

I read in yesterday's Toronto Telegram the terrifying item of news that Mr. Ian Sinclair, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has threatened that if employees of that company fail to go back to work in the event of the bill which is before the house being passed, they will lose their pension rights. It is this law of the land, which stands against the loss of pension rights to any workers who have gone out on a legal strike, that I should like the minister to convey to Mr. Sinclair.

I appreciated the minister's answer this afternoon when he said that he would send it to Mr. Sinclair; and I appreciated his inquiry tonight as to the precise section to which I was referring. I would point out to him that clause 4(b) of Bill No. C-230 to which the Minister without Portfolio referred this afternoon is really not very helpful because it does not cover what might follow from now on. But the section in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to which I have referred does cover the situation, the men having ceased work because of a strike that was legal in every respect.

For any company to threaten that these employees might lose their pension rights is a defiance of the law. It is turning the clock back 50 years in a way, I am sure, this parliament would not stand for. In fact, I believe if by any chance there were any defect in the law, the government would want to correct it, so that no pension rights will be lost because of the present strike.

I would appreciate the minister's underlining his willingness to make it clear that this law must be obeyed.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased this afternoon to say that I would draw to the attention of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway the pertinent section of the act which has been referred to. Although I have no knowledge, or personal knowledge whether the statement attributed to Mr. Sinclair was in fact made, if the hon. member who has just spoken assures me that such is the case, that it was made, I of course would not hesitate to draw the section to his attention.

Mr. Knowles: It is in the press, in the Toronto Telegram of yesterday.

Mr. Nicholson: I will be very pleased to draw Mr. Sinclair's attention to this particular section.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, August 31, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE ALEXIS CARON

TRIBUTES ON PASSING OF MEMBER FOR HULL

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will be saddened to learn, as I was saddened and distressed to learn, of the passing this morning of our colleague the hon. Member for Hull, Alexis Caron, a friend and valued comrade over the years and, for a time, my Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Caron, as we all know, was a man of kindness and generosity with an alert understanding of human nature, its weaknesses and its strength. He was a very great individualist, an unyielding and eloquent fighter for those causes and principles in which he believed; a man of sturdy independence, a man who served his country and his party well; he was whip of our party in the House for some years, as hon. Members know. He served his city as Mayor. He served his province as a member of the legislature to which he was first elected, I believe, in 1935. And he served his country as a member of this Parliament, always with diligence and honour, over many years.

He will be very greatly missed. We knew he was in indifferent health but his death came both as a surprise and a shock, and I should like to extend to his wife, Mrs. Caron, and to his family our very deep and heartfelt sympathy.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is on occasions such as this that we in the House of Commons, separated by party considerations, realize we have so much in common; a relationship that is only possible in a democracy, a relationship between those who disagree with each other politically that does not cause our friendships to be limited by the places in the House in which we may sit.

I join with the Prime Minister in the expression of deep sorrow on the passing of Alexis Caron, a man who, as was stated by the Prime Minister, served in all fields of public life; as Mayor of his city, as a Member of the Provincial Legislature, and as a Member of the House of Commons for many years. He was a man of strong personal feelings, one who expressed himself in a way that could be understood and with equal facility in both languages on those matters about which he felt keenly. The Prime Minister said he was a man of independent thought and action. I think that describes him very well. He regarded his position as a party follower as not inconsistent with a degree of independence when decisions were made with which he was not in full agreement.

On behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition we join with the Prime Minister in extending our sympathy to the widow and members of the family, as well as to the Prime Minister and the associates and confrères of Mr. Caron for so many years in this Chamber.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is always a matter of regret when we learn of the passing of one of our colleagues, irrespective of the party to which that colleague may belong. In the New Democratic Party we got to know well the hon. Member for Hull, Mr. Alexis Caron. We knew him particularly when he was government whip and came to respect him for his independence and for his strong sense of conviction. As a man who had a long and useful public life I am sure he will be missed by his constituents and by the political party to which he belonged.

The members of this party would like to associate themselves with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in extending our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Caron and the members of the family, as well as to Mr. Caron's colleagues in the House.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, like all the hon. members in the house, I was most surprised at noon to learn that the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Caron) had suddenly left our group, our assembly and his family.

Even though we, on this side, did not share his ideas and convictions, we witnessed the courage with which he expressed his opinions frankly and sincerely. Even toward his own colleagues and his own party, Mr.

Caron never feared to state his ideas publicly and intimately, wherever he was.

So we must extend to Mrs. Caron and the family, our deepest sympathy in their great loss. I think all the Members of Parliament will keep a lasting memory of the late, lamented Alexis Caron.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we in this party wish to associate ourselves with the expressions of sympathy and regret which have been uttered by the right hon. Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leaders of the other parties. We were shocked to hear of our colleague's passing. We had learned to know him as a man of convictions, and a champion of his constituents and those causes which were dear to his heart. We will miss him from our midst.

Our sympathies are extended to Madame Caron, her family and, yes, to the Prime Minister and the members of his party. We share with them their sorrow at the passing of the Member for Hull.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOUSE

MOTION TO EXTEND SITTING HOURS THIS DAY

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 6(2) I move that this house continue to sit after six o'clock on this day.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to remind all hon. members of the terms of standing order 6(2):

> A motion that the house continue to sit after the hour specified in section (1) may be made at any time without notice. If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places and if ten or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, at the beginning of this session and the consideration of this important legislation, we in this party offered to sit without regard to time until consideration of the bill was completed. Unfortunately this proposition was rejected. At ten o'clock last Monday night when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was speaking it was suggested he continue until he had completed his remarks—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Starr: I am talking about this motion which has been submitted here, and it is relevant to what has transpired.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows the motion is not debatable. It will be embarrassing and will cause difficulty if the hon. member is allowed to make a statement or explanation at this point. I am wondering whether this might be done after the motion has been put. Since this standing order was adopted by the house it has been the practice that there should be no comment on the motion. Certainly the rule provides that there should be no debate.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I presume the minister in asking for this permission is serious in his request. I therefore ask for a clarification as to what he intends to do, because I think it will make some difference. Is it the intention that the hours of sitting tonight be the same as last night or the same as on one of the other days, and if so would he specify which day so that a decision can be made? In my opinion it is not possible to make a decision with just this request.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention that we should continue to sit continuously after six o'clock to finish this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in view of what was said yesterday during this debate as to the time at which we should reject or approve the measure before us, there was some misunderstanding which I think needs clarification. I rise at this time on a question of privilege in view of the fact that on Monday evening when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on behalf of this party offered to sit until we had completed the bill—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member is now rising on a question or privilege.

Mr. Starr: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. At ten o'clock, during the remarks of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, a representative of the government proposed that the house sit until he had concluded his remarks. In view of the fact the government had rejected the proposal that we sit until the bill was completed, there seemed to be no point in sitting longer than the regular hours at that time.

Only one member of this party spoke yesterday during this debate whereas four Liberals and two members of the N.D.P. took part, with another one having the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my suggestion that the hon. member is now manoeuvring around the rule which specifically states that there shall be no debate on the motion now under consideration. Obviously the hon. member is now debating the motion proposed by the minister, in an attempt to explain why he either supports or disagrees with it.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I shall now outline specifically my question of privilege. We are happy that the government has now accepted the suggestion we made on Monday, and we are prepared to sit until this bill is completed.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is put in a difficult position when an hon. member makes a statement such as the hon. member has just made because in effect he is debating the motion, and the Chair must then recognize other members who wish to take part or make other comments. With the co-operation of all hon. members I will consider that a question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member, although perhaps he has no prima facie case of privilege.

Let us now return to the motion which has been proposed. If ten or more members do not rise at this time the motion carries.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the minister to consider a supper recess for one hour, and at the same time some cut-off hour? Perhaps we could discuss the latter suggestion at ten or eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Douglas: I am not suggesting that the minister agree to a cut-off hour at this time. Perhaps a conference could be held later, at which time we could agree to a cut-off hour, rather than allowing the debate to continue all night.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am content to agree to a one hour adjournment for dinner, perhaps from six to seven. I will also agree that at midnight we should consider a possible adjournment hour if we are not making good progress at that hour and it appears that we will be unable to finish within a reasonable time. I hope, of course, that we will have completed the business now before us before that hour.

Let me make it clear that the motion I intend to put will not be varied except as to the provision for the dinner hour. I will give an undertaking to consider a cut-off hour at a later time.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, unless I am mistaken, when this house is grieved by the loss of one of our colleagues it is customary to adjourn for the remainder of that day. In view of the desire on the part of everyone to have the measure now before us passed as quickly as possible I am wondering whether the house will agree to take all the votes immediately and then adjourn out of respect for the late hon. member for Hull. I might add that we in this party are agreeable to this procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair could be advised by the government house leader what the motion is that should now be put to the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I move:

That this house continue to sit after six p.m., subject to an adjournment for a dinner recess from six to seven p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, let it be recorded that I stood, anyway.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT DELETING PROVISION RESPECTING HABITUAL CRIMINALS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-233, to amend the Criminal Code (preventive detention).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code by deleting from it section 660 dealing with habitual criminals. I am sure that when this section was enacted it was considered that its provisions would be used very sparingly. The fact is that in recent years in Vancouver, to mention one city, in the neighbourhood of 50 or 60 people have been sentenced under this section to what is in effect life imprisonment. I think this section should now be removed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Questions

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS AUTHORIZING GUARANTEES TO BANKS, AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS, ETC.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to authorize Export Credits Insurance Corporation to issue unconditional guarantees to banks in connection with transactions insured by the corporation under sections 13 and 21 of the act; to authorize the corporation, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to enter into agreements with foreign governments in connection with transactions entered into under section 21A of the act to reschedule or revise payment arrangements in respect of debts owed to it under that section; to enable the aggregate liability to the corporation at any time in connection with transactions under section 21A to be increased from four hundred million dollars to five hundred million dollars; and to provide further for certain consequential changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WAR SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND FORESTRY UNIT

Question No. 834—Mr. Tucker:

Is the government giving consideration to having members of the Newfoundland overseas forestry unit, who served in world war II recognized as war veterans as were the Newfoundland and other Canadian foresters who served in world war I?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes.

CATTLE USED FOR EXPERIMENTAL PURPOSES

Question No. 1,522—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. Has the federal government any cattle being used for experimental purposes on private ranches or farms?

2. If so (a) how many head of cattle (b) on whose farms (c) what has this program cost the federal government to date (d) what was the average cost of wintering these cattle last winter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes, the Department of Agriculture does own cattle used for experimental purposes and which are located on a private farm.

2. (a) 65; (b) George D. Brown, Pakenham, Ontario; (c) Operating costs for period January 4, 1965 to July 4, 1966—$25,000; (d) $92 per head, approximately.

IMPORT PERMITS FOR CHAROLAIS CATTLE

Question No. 1,629—Mr. Fulton:

1. Since July 1, 1963, how many permits or licences to import Charolais cattle into Canada have been issued by the government?

2. What is the name and address of the individual or organization to which each such permit was issued, and how many cattle of each sex were covered in each permit?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. None. Permits issued for the importation of cattle specify the country of origin but not the breed of cattle. However, since July 1, 1963, 67 permits to import cattle into Canada have resulted in the importation of 109 Charolais cattle from France.

2. The names and address of individual permit holders is considered by the department to be confidential information. The sex of animals to be imported is not prescribed on permits to import. The permits referred to in 1 above were for a total of 122 cattle.

ARDA PROJECTS, WATERLOO SOUTH CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,643—Mr. Saltsman:

1. Have any projects been approved under ARDA affecting the electoral district of Waterloo South?

2. If so (a) what are they (b) what was the objective of each (c) what was the cost of each?

3. Are there any projects affecting this electoral district now under consideration?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. Yes.

2. For an area of 7,000 sq. miles including the electoral district of Waterloo South—air photography for present land use mapping approved with a federal contribution of $12,250. This project approved under the Canada land inventory will provide federal ARDA with air photos flown in 1966 for interpretation of present land use in preparation of present land maps for Ontario.

For two areas of northern Ontario and the counties of Waterloo and Brant—agricultural soil capability inventory for 1966-67 approved with a federal contribution of $56,330. This project approved under the Canada land inventory will provide information on agricultural soil capability in Ontario for use in our national land capability inventory and as a basis for land use planning decisions in our ARDA programs.

A farm enlargement and consolidation program for all agricultural areas of Ontario has been approved with a federal contribution of $3,600,000. This project is to acquire land as it becomes available on the market, for consolidation and development into larger economic farm units, either by sale or lease to farmers who have demonstrated good managerial ability in their present operations and require additional land for a more viable operation. Land not suitable for agriculture will be used for forestry, wildlife, or placed in conservation reserves. It also contains provision for the retraining and re-establishment of some of those displaced by the program.

3. No.

PUBLIC WORKS EXPENDITURES, LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 1,711—Mr. Irvine:

What amount was spent by the Department of Public Works in the city of London for each of the years 1963, 1964 and 1965?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1963-64, $466,038.17; 1964-65, $343,269.88; 1965-66, $465,148.35.

STUDIES OF GREAT LAKES POLLUTION

Question No. 1,741—Mr. Irvine:

1. What research projects is the government and its agencies undertaking with regard to pollution studies and surveys, and causes of and remedies for pollution in the great lakes?

2. What other bodies, corporations or agencies are studying this problem?

3. What sums (itemize) has the government considered for the above projects?

4. What boards or commissions have direct or indirect control or interest in pollution in the great lakes and what are their programs?

5. Are any of the following techniques contemplated by the government to encourage industry to curb pollution (a) special research grants for studies to avoid pollution (b) tax incentive to build or counteract pollution control systems on industrial work beds (c) civil action against industries discharging pollutants?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): 1. There is a coordinated plan of research, by agencies of the Canadian government and government of the province of Ontario, concerning pollution of the great lakes. In general, the federal government is directing its studies toward the body of the lakes and the cause and distribution of pollution that does or may cross the international boundary. The Ontario agencies are primarily concerned with the origins of pollution on land, their effects in the great lakes and their control.

Specific federal government studies include the circulation of the water; properties of the water including chemical impurities, their concentration and probable destination; rate of mixing and diffusion in the lakes; the effect of nutrient chemicals (phosphates, nitrates, etc.) on the excessive growth of algae (eutrophication) and means of alleviating such eutrophication; study of the health hazards from domestic sewage and other wastes originating on land or in boats and means of its control.

2. The Ontario Water Resources Commission is the body primarily responsible for water pollution control under Ontario laws. It conducts research to define the sources and kinds of pollution entering the lakes from industry, municipalities, agricultural drainage and small boats, the distribution of this pollution and the properties of such pollutants and their control. Under the International Joint Commission reference this work has been expanded with financial aid from the federal government.

The Great Lakes Institute of the University of Toronto is conducting surveillance surveys and special research studies of the great lakes under contracts and grants from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Fisheries Research Board, National Research Council, and the Ontario Water Resources Commission. It is provided with transportation in the ship Port Dauphine by the Department of Transport.

Other agencies: In the United States, many federal and state agencies and universities are conducting programs on the lakes, related to pollution and other scientific studies. Among them, major activities are in progress by the department of the interior, federal water pollution control administration; the U.S. lake survey; and the U.S. bureau of commercial fisheries. The University of Michigan, Great Lakes Research Division is a major contributor among the universities. Activities by the individual states are increasing but are somewhat limited, as yet.

Through direct contact with the above agencies, by liaison through the International Joint Commission and by scientific meetings, exchange of information and program planning are achieved on an international basis.

3. During the current fiscal year the funds supporting great lakes investigations are: Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, $800,000; Fisheries Research Board, $250,000; National Health and Welfare, $300,000; International Joint Commission, $308,000.

Under cost sharing, the Ontario Water Resources Commission is reimbursed through the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission for approximately 50 percent of their costs. Expenditures for subsequent years have not been critically considered by the government and itemized sums are not available. It can be anticipated, however, that sharply increased amounts of money will be required in both the operating and capital votes to meet federal responsibilities.

4. The International Joint Commission. The governments of the United States and Canada referred the following questions to the International Joint Commission for investigation and report:

Are the waters of lake Erie, lake Ontario and the international section of the St. Lawrence river being polluted on either side of the boundary to an extent which is causing or is likely to cause injury to health or property on the other side? If so, to what extent, by what causes and in what localities? What remedial measures would, in its judgment, be most practicable and what would be the probable cost?

The International Joint Commission established the international lake Erie water pollution board and the international lake Ontario-St. Lawrence river water pollution board to undertake, through appropriate agencies in Canada and the United States, the necessary investigations and studies. Canadian members of the boards are officials of the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Mines and Technical Surveys, Fisheries and the Ontario Water Resources Commission. United States members similarly are federal and state officials. The boards drew up a coordinated program of the investigations, surveys and studies required to answer the questions referred to the International Joint Commission, together with an allocation of the work among the several participating agencies to avoid duplication of effort. This program was approved by the commission and, in Canada, is being carried out by the individual agencies and departments as described herein. Co-ordination of activities in both countries is achieved through these boards, which report periodically to the International Joint Commission.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Federal government agencies having an interest in pollution in the great lakes, and their programs are:

Department of Mines and Technical Surveys: Three branches of this department, the marine sciences branch, the water research branch and the geological survey branch are co-operating in the current year's program. This department is concerned with studies of the main body of lake Ontario and to a lesser extent lake Erie, concerning the physical and chemical characteristics of the water. This includes investigations of circulation, and current patterns, mixing and diffusion of pollutants, temperature distribution, bottom sediments—water interface relations, air-water interface phenomena, seismic and airborne geophysical techniques.

The Fisheries Research Board of Canada, under the Minister of Fisheries, which is conducting research on eutrophication of lakes (i.e. the changes brought about by enrichment from pollutants) and means of controlling it.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is conducting research on the health hazards of various pollutants, their sources and distribution in natural waters, and the means whereby they can be suitably treated or otherwise controlled.

The National Research Council through its associate committee on water pollution research is promoting research in universities on specific water pollution problems and the means of improving abatement measures and assessing the significance of pollutants in water; is encouraging training of people in pollution control technology, and is encouraging industry to conduct research and control of pollution from industrial sources.

The Canadian committee on water pollution, formed in February, 1966 by direction of the Privy Council office, provides a forum where federal and provincial agencies can exchange information, co-ordinate their efforts and ensure that all necessary research is being properly planned.

The United States-Canadian great lakes study group is a committee of United States-Canadian engineers and scientists who meet semi-annually to review and co-ordinate all programs dealing with studies in the great lakes.

5. (a) The National Research Council has given a grant under the industrial research assistance program for this purpose. The associate committee on pollution research of the National Research Council has the matter under active study. (b) The question is not understood. The government does grant concessions on income tax for special research purposes and gives assistance and loans for sewage disposal purposes. (c) Such action is the prerogative of the province.

*GUIDE LINES RESPECTING POLICE INTERROGATIONS

Question No. 1,760—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Is the government giving consideration to enactment in the Criminal Code of guide lines respecting police interrogation of suspected wrongdoers and the enunciation of revised principles to be applied in determining the admissibility of confessions?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of guide lines respecting police interrogation of suspected wrongdoers is within the terms of reference of the Canadian committee on corrections which will report thereon in due course and the government will carefully consider the committee's recommendations. It should be noted that in the meantime guide lines are continuing to evolve from the decisions of the provincial courts of appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. The principles to be applied in determining the admissibility of confessions are also continuing to evolve from such decisions, and while the government is not giving immediate attention to a legislative revision of such principles the question of such a revision is on the list of matters to be studied in the Department of Justice.

* APPOINTMENT OF FEMALE DELEGATE TO HUMAN RIGHTS CONFERENCE

Question No. 1,765—Mr. Irvine:

1. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs received representations from the National Council of Jewish Women requesting the appointment of a lady delegate to the Canadian conference on human rights scheduled for 1968?

2. If so, when were such representations made?

3. What procedure will the government follow?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to 1 is yes.

The answer to 2 is on June 7, 1966.

The answer to 3 is as follows. The matter of holding a Canadian conference on human rights in 1968 as part of Canada's celebration of the international year of human rights is under active consideration, but no decision has yet been taken to hold such a conference. It follows that no appointments of delegates have been made. The minister responsible for this subject is the Secretary of State who, as a lady, I am sure will take fully into account the opinion of women and women's organizations in such matters.

MARITIME ENGINEERING TRAINING

Question No. 1,780—Mr. Allard:

1. What is the system of maritime engineering training put forward by the Department of Transport?

2. Does this system attempt to eliminate stokers and oilers on diesel powered motor ships and steamships?

3. Do Canadian maritime regulations require only one man to be on duty in the engine room?

4. Does the Department of Transport issue permits to non-qualified and non-certificated sailors to allow them to work as engineers and, if so, how many such permits were issued in 1964 and 1965?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Apart from the Canadian Coast Guard College, the Department of Transport has no direct system of maritime engineering training. The several maritime engineering training schools throughout the country are conducted by provincial authorities and assisted through the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, administered by the Department of Labour. The Department of Transport supplies these schools with technical advice and guidance when required.

2. No.

3. Section 115 of the Canada Shipping Act requires one certificated engineer in the engine room at all times. Section 407 of the act requires ships to be manned with a crew sufficient and efficient from the point of view of safety of life; and, pursuant to this provision, it may be necessary that more than one man be on duty in the engine room at any time.

4. When a ship is exempted under section 137 of the Canada Shipping Act from the full requirements of section 115 of the act, such exemption is always conditional upon there being employed a designated individual to whom a permit has been issued by the department after an oral examination has satisfied the department he has adequate experience and knowledge to perform the duties.

Questions

The numbers of permits issued are as follows:—

	1964	1965
Permits issued to uncertificated engine room personnel	371	444
Permits issued to certificated engineers to act in a higher capacity	245	288

*OPERATIONAL STRENGTH, DESTROYER ESCORTS

Question No. 1,783—Mr. Bower:

Are Canadian destroyer escorts maintained at full operational strength at all times and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The complement of Canadian destroyer escorts in peacetime is established by taking into account the tasks which they may be assigned in the performance of their role as operational units of the fleet. All Canadian destroyer escorts in commission are manned at this complement level at the present time with the exception of H.M.C.S. Terra Nova which has a reduced complement during the period that her operations are restricted to the conduct of trials on new ASW equipment. When destroyer escorts are taken out of commission for protracted refits or conversion they are not manned. In addition, certain destroyers may be placed in reserve and manned at reduced levels or unmanned.

*ABILITY TO FULFIL NATO COMMITMENT

Question No. 1,787—Mr. Bower:

Is Canada in a position to fulfil her commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to provide a complete division in the event of an emergency in western Europe?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is yes, Canada is in a position to provide the balance of a division to NATO in the event of an emergency, in accordance with the terms of the commitment.

*R.C.A.F. PILOTS IN NON-FLYING CAPACITIES

Question No. 1,788—Mr. Bower:

Are any qualified R.C.A.F. pilots employed by that service in non-flying capacities and, if so, how many?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The answer is yes, 659. Employment of a number of pilots in ground positions is necessary in order to meet a requirement for pilot qualifications in certain staff positions and to facilitate individual career development.

CONSIDERATION OF ALLEGATIONS RESPECTING QUEBEC COURTS

Question No. 1,789—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Is consideration now being given by the Department of Justice for an independent investigation to be held into certain allegations made by Edward J. Sommer of Montreal, P.Q. as to the dipsosition of certain actions by the Quebec Superior and Appeal Courts?

2. If the answer to part 1 is no, was the question of holding such an investigation ever considered during the past two years and, if so (a) who was asked to conduct the proposed investigation (b) for what reason was the proposed investigation not proceeded with?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): 1. No.

2. No. (a) Not applicable; (b) The complaints are outside federal jurisdiction, relating as they do to property and civil rights and the administration of justice within the province.

WATER SUPPLY, MIDDLE RIVER INDIAN RESERVE, N.S.

Question No. 1,819—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

What are the plans, if any, of the Department concerned for the provision of an adequate water supply system for the Middle River Indian Reserve?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. The Indian affairs branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources plans to repair or replace the existing unserviceable hand pumps on the 12 drilled wells, to proceed with an engineering study and cost estimate for a water distribution system, and to request the necessary funds in the estimates following the completion of the engineering study.

STATUTE REVISION COMMISSION

Question No. 1,827—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Who are the members of the statute revision commission appointed pursuant to chapter 48 of the statutes of Canada 1964-65, and who has been designated as chairman?

2. What progress has been made by this commission in the arrangement, revision and consolidation of the Statutes of Canada?

3. When is it anticipated that the report of the commission may be completed?

4. Is it the intention of the government to attempt to bring the new Revised Statutes of Canada into effect as from the 1st day of July, 1967?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): 1. The Minister Justice, Chairman; E. A. Driedger, Q.C., Deputy Minister of Justice; J. Miquelon, Q.C., Deputy Registrar General; R. Bedard, Q.C., Associate Deputy Minister of Justice; D. S. Thorson, Q.C., Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice; J. W. Ryan, Senior Advisory Counsel, Department of Justice.

2. All the current public general statutes have been consolidated in manuscript form in both the English and French versions except for a few chapters enacted during this session of which separate printed chapters are not yet available.

Preliminary revision work has been done on over 350 public general statutes in both languages in manuscript form up to, but not including, the enactments of the present session.

3. The commission is attempting completion for 1968 but this will depend on factors not under the control of the commission, for instance, the number of amendments and new acts enacted by parliament at the resumed 1966 session and the 1967 session.

4. The commission is attempting to complete its report to include 1967 enactments so that the revised statutes can be cited as the revised statutes, 1967. The 1st day of July, 1967, is not a practical date for that purpose.

* PROSECUTION OF COMPANIES UNDER COMBINES LEGISLATION

Question No. 1,829—Mr. Orlikow:

Regarding the answer to starred question No. 1,229, will the Department of Justice recommend to the court that the same firm measures applied to the Tilko picketers be also applied to the officials of the four companies who pleaded guilty on March 1, 1965, to violation of the anti-combines legislation and who were also convicted under the same law in 1958 when a prohibition order was granted?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the order referred to in the hon. member's question was granted in 1958 and applies only to acts or things done after the time it was granted. In the shipping containers case, in which the four companies referred to pleaded guilty on March 1, 1965, the charge covered a period ending in 1954, which is prior to the date of the order. In these circumstances there would be no breach of the order.

ENTRY POINTS OF COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN GOODS

Question No. 1,835—Mr. McCleave:

1. By what places of entry have goods from the British West Indies, or Commonwealth Caribbean countries, entered Canada (a) by categories (b) by value, in (i) 1955 (ii) 1960 (iii) 1965?

2. Did the recently concluded conference in Ottawa result in changes or concessions as to the means of transportation by which these Caribbean countries could place their products and goods in this country and, if so, what changes or concessions?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Information requested is not available as import statistics by customs ports for 1955 and 1960 are in toto only, and are not broken down by countries or by categories. These data are not available for 1965.

However, the following information may be found in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics publication entitled "Trade of Canada Summary and Analytical Tables, Volume I", (‡65-201), copies of which are located in the Library of Parliament or any public library: Table 13—lists total imports by customs ports—for calendar year 1955, see pages 60, 61, 62 and 63 of the 1955 edition; for calendar year 1960, see pages 74, 75, 76 and 77 of the 1959-60 edition. Table 19—lists imports by main commodity groups, by country, (including Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras, Bahamas, Barbados, Jamaica, Leeward and Windward Islands, Trinidad and Tobago)—for calendar year 1955, see pages 74 and 75 of the 1955 edition; for calendar year 1960, see pages 102, 103, 104 and 105 of the 1959-60 edition.

2. The protocol to the 1925 trade agreement signed by the government of Canada and the governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries at the conference provides for the waiving of the requirement that goods must be shipped directly from the Commonwealth Caribbean country to a port in Canada in order to qualify for preferential tariff access.

PUBLIC SWIMMING POOLS, NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 1,837—Mr. McLelland:

1. Has the government a policy governing the construction of public swimming pools in our national parks?

2. Has the government considered construction of a heated, regulation-size, swimming pool at Waskesiu in the Prince Albert national park?

Questions

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. The National parks policy states that: Swimming pools are acceptable in parks which are listed in category (a) or (b), except where there is adequate natural swimming. In each case their acceptability should be determined by the nature of the park, how it is to be used or intended to be used and the need.

(a) Parks which are basically scenic and nature parks. This includes Banff, Jasper, Yoho, Kootenay, Glacier, Mt. Revelstoke and Cape Breton Highlands. (b) Parks which are basically family holiday parks with a variety of activities in addition to their natural features. This includes Waterton Lakes, Prince Albert, Riding Mountain, Fundy, Terra Nova and Prince Edward Island.

2. Yes.

COST OF ADMISSION TO SWIMMING POOLS, NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 1,838—Mr. McLelland:

What regulations govern the price of admittance which can be charged the public at swimming pools in our national parks?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. The National parks general regulations.

BANANA IMPORTS FROM WEST INDIES

Question No. 1,841—Mr. McCleave:

1. What has been the amount of the banana imports from the West Indies into Canada during the last 10 years, by years?

2. What is the approximate percentage of the values of such imports brought to Canada through (a) ports directly (b) overland across the border, during the last 10 years, by years?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Imports of bananas and plantains from the West Indies into Canada during the last 10 years are as follows:

Imports from the West Indies

Calendar Year	Quantity Lbs	Value $'000
1956	—	—
1957	76,800	4
1958	—	—
1959	—	—
1960	—	—
1961	—	—
1962	—	—
1963	1,891,652	96
1964	189,554	6
1965	64,124	3

2. (a) and (b) No statistics available.

[Mr. McLelland.]

MUNICIPAL PARKING FOR HOUSE OF COMMONS PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,853—Mr. Caouette:

Is the federal government at present negotiating with any Ottawa parking lot owners or with the municipal authorities of the national capital for the construction or reservation of a parking lot for the use of House of Commons personnel, and (a) if so, which companies are concerned (b) if not, does the federal government intend to do so immediately?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No.

CONSTRUCTION OF PARKING LOT FOR HOUSE OF COMMONS PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,854—Mr. Caouette:

Is the Minister of Public Works at present negotiating with any companies or contractors for the construction of a parking lot for the use of House of Commons personnel (members and employees)?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No.

PARKING ADMINISTRATION, PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 1,856—Mr. Caouette:

1. Who is explicitly and implicitly responsible for the administration of parking areas on parliament hill?

2. What are the functions and duties of each of these people?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1 and 2. The Department of Public Works designates the areas to be used for parking purposes by each of the following: The House of Commons, The Senate, The Privy Council and the Department of External Affairs. The Speakers of each House, the Clerk of the Privy Council and the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs administer the particular areas designated for the use of the Houses and these departments.

PARKING PERMITS, PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 1,857—Mr. Caouette:

1. How many people are affected by the latest decision about permits for parking on Parliament Hill?

2. How many permits have been cancelled as a result of the aforementioned decision?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. The number of people affected is not known; however, the number of parking spaces has been reduced from 667 to 339.

2. See Part 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COST OF FEDERAL ADVERTISING

Question No. 1,044—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the cost of advertising placed by the federal government, department by department, in each of the past five years?

2. How much of this advertising was placed in daily newspapers, magazines, radio, television, etc.?

3. What advertising agencies handled this advertising in each of the past five years, and what fees did they receive?

4. Were a number of advertising agencies asked to tender bids on the proposed government advertising and, if so, which ones?

5. What standards were used in deciding the choice of the advertising agencies actually used in each of the past five years?

Return tabled.

SUBSIDIES TO TRANSPORTATION AGENCIES

Question No. 1,447—Mr. Reid:

1. What direct subsidies have been granted to Canadian transportation agencies by the federal government since 1945?

2. What was the reason for each of these subsidies?

3. What is the reason for continuing them?

4. How much has been paid out in total under these programs?

Return tabled.

COMPLAINTS ON TELEVISION PROGRAM RESPECTING MOTOR CAR SAFETY DEVICES

Question No. 1,463—Mr. Scott (Danforth):

1. Did the government or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation receive any representations, communications, complaints or otherwise from the automotive manufacturers or anyone on their behalf concerning the program carried by the television show "This Hour Has Seven Days" dealing with the question of the installation on motor vehicles of safety devices?

2. If so (a) what was the nature of the representations, communications, complaints, etc., received by the government, and in reasonable detail what was the government's response, if any (b) what was the nature of the representations, communications, complaints, etc., received by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and what in reasonable detail was the reply of the corporation to them?

Return tabled.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY SPECIFICATIONS

Question No. 1,464—Mr. Scott (Danforth):

1. Has the government or any of its agencies received representations from trade unions involved in the automotive industry, or anyone on their behalf, with regard to the question of safety specifications for motor vehicles?

2. If so (a) how many government departments received representations and what were the names of such departments (b) who made such representations and what, in reasonable detail, were the form and substance either written or verbal of such representations including the identification of the persons making them (c) in reasonable detail, what was the nature of the government's response, if any, to such representations?

Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS SUPPLIED TO SCHOOL LIBRARIES

Question No. 1,545—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Do the Queen's Printer and the federal government send free copies of their publications to universities, colleges and school libraries?

2. If so, to how many universities, colleges and school libraries do the Queen's Printer and the federal government send them?

3. Do the Queen's Printer and the federal government send their publications to the colleges and school libraries of Lapointe county?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion No. 144 is acceptable to the government

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 126, 146 and 155?

I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

CONSTRUCTION OF COLUMBIA RIVER DAMS

Motion No. 126—Mr. Herridge:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all notes or other documents or correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United States with respect to the building of dams on the Columbia river in violation of article 2 of the Oregon treaty of 1846.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): To the best of our knowledge no documentation of the kind referred to in motion No. 126 exists.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) heard the explanation given by the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

POLLUTION OF RED RIVER

Motion No. 144—Mr. Schreyer:

That a humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of any communications exchanged in the last five year period, between the government of Canada or any agency thereof, and the government of the United States or any agency thereof including the International Joint Commission, with respect to the problem of water pollution of the Red river and particularly with respect to any testing that may be carried out to determine the degree of pollution.

Motion agreed to.

OBJECTIONS TO SHOWING OF FILM ON SEALING

Motion No. 146—Mr. Flemming:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all letters, telegrams and memoranda of telephone conversations between the Prime Minister and/or any other minister, and the Canadian High Commissioner in London, which authorized the High Commissioner to raise objections, successfully, to the showing of a 1964 Canadian film depicting the cruelties of sealing in Canada which the newspaper the Observer had included in the wildlife exhibit it was sponsoring.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that no communication of any kind was exchanged between the minister, the department, and the high commissioner in London requesting or authorizing the latter to raise objections to the showing of a film on seal hunting at the Observer wild life exhibition.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN INDUSTRY MINISTER AND R. M. WHICHER

Motion No. 155—Mr. Loney:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence dated since November 8, 1965, between the Minister of Industry and Ross M. Whicher, M.P.P. Bruce.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. C. M. Drury: This motion is acceptable.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY STRIKE—REPORTED STATEMENTS RESPECTING RETROACTIVE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the interviews carried by the C.B.C. last evening by Mr. Gordon, president of the C.N.R. and Mr. Sinclair, president of the C.P.R, were to the effect that no provision had been made under either the legislation now before the house or the legislation to come for the payment of extra amounts in so far as they are retroactive, is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether the statements were correct?

Will he tell the house at the same time whether these recommendations or similar ones were made to him by these two gentlemen and what is the reaction of the government thereto?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my view there was nothing said on the program in question which interfered in any way with the desirability and the possibility of implementing the legislation now before the house, if the house adopts that legislation.

The railway representatives, when they called on me yesterday, did indicate they might have some difficulty in carrying out this legislation because of revenue considerations. They outlined their position to me, Mr. Speaker, and I said I would look into it.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Further to Mr. Sinclair's remarks wherein he stated that the second bill before the house does not provide any extra money for the railways that they do not already possess, does the Prime Minister wish to revise his opening remarks about the relationship between the two bills, and state whether he still intends to proceed immediately with the second bill?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to revise my remarks. I suggest to Mr. Sinclair that he read the bill a little more carefully.

Mr. Starr: That applies to Mr. Gordon, too.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; I am sure Mr. Sinclair is noting these remarks. Is it still the intention of the government to proceed immediately with the second bill?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, immediately after we can get passage of the bill before us.

RAILWAY STRIKE—UNION REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he has received from the representatives of the railway unions a letter dated today, a copy of which had been sent to each of the party leaders as well as to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) asking for a reconsideration of the legislation before the house in order that the members of these unions might comply with whatever action parliament takes? May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has received such a letter and whether he is prepared to make any statement regarding the question contained in it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the letter in question was left in my office shortly after 2.20 p.m. At that time I was in conference with some of my cabinet colleagues. The letter was delivered to me just before I came into the house, and I understand it was made public before I was able to read it. I will naturally, without delay, give it the consideration which the importance of the subject matter and the positions of those who signed the letter warrants.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister seems to have read those letters, one of which comes from Mr. McLoon, chairman of the strike committee, in New Brunswick, and the other from Messrs. Smith, P. Kelly and T. W. Read.

Does the Prime Minister not feel that both letters mean about the same thing, that is they constitute an anticipated defiance of the act which may be passed by parliament and of public order in this country? It is blackmail of a sort. Could the Prime Minister tell us what action he intends to take with respect to that blackmail or that invitation to break the law of the land?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: I do not recall having received such a letter as that to which my hon. friend refers. It was not delivered to me. The first letter referred to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, as I have just indicated, was put into my hands just before I came into the house. I am going to study it immediately.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

ZAMBIA—POSSIBLE FAILURE OF PRESIDENT TO ATTEND CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that relates to another crisis confronting the Commonwealth and particularly the countries of Africa. Will the Prime Minister tell us whether he has been in communication with the Prime Minister of Great Britain or the President of Zambia, and whether the situation that may be created by the action of the President of Zambia is to be dealt with prior to the meeting of the prime ministers next week?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have been in communication with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom with respect to the forthcoming conference during the last two or three weeks. I have been in communication also with the head of the government of Zambia during that period. As a matter of fact I wrote him the other day urging him to attend the conference, where I think his presence would be most important and valuable. I had hoped that he would be there. I have not heard from him since his decision was announced yesterday not to attend the conference.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

R.C.A.F.—MAINTENANCE OF AIRCRAFT USED TO TRANSPORT PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker. Will a court of inquiry be convened to investigate the circumstances concerning the lack of performance and subsequent emergency repairs prior to and during the flight of the service aircraft transporting military cadets from Winnipeg through intermediary points to Vernon, British Columbia and return?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact the minister is taking the last question as notice, would he inquire into whether there are sufficient qualified service personnel to service and maintain DC-6 aircraft presently used by the R.C.A.F. in a manner conducive to highest standards of air safety?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not believe we have any DC-6 aircraft.

Mr. McIntosh: They are used to transport troops.

Mr. Hellyer: The Yukon is not a DC-6; it is a modified version of a British aircraft.

Mr. McIntosh: The aircraft used presently by the R.C.A.F. to transport personnel.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CONSIDERATION OF WAGE AND PRICE GUIDE LINES AT FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): My question is based on a reply the Minister of Finance gave yesterday to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, when the minister stated that the federal government has no intention of proposing a set of wage and price controls at the forthcoming meeting of the provinces. I should like to ask the minister if the federal government is considering proposing a set of wage and price guide lines at that meeting?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): When, as I hope will happen soon, an opportunity occurs to debate the general economic situation and inflationary pressure which now exists, I hope I shall have an opportunity of expressing a view on this matter.

Mr. Grafftey: I simply ask the minister, apart from the forthcoming debate, if at the present time the government is considering a set of wage and price guide lines.

Mr. Sharp: This subject has, of course, been under consideration by the government over quite some period. It has been referred also to the Economic Council of Canada, and the fact that there has been such a long delay in that report being presented is perhaps the best indication of the very serious difficulties involved in applying the principles of guide lines in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. He is apparently looking into numerous solutions to the inflation problem. Has he thought or is he thinking about applying the same methods used by the labour government in England to check inflation in that country?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is not in order.

Mr. Sharp: I hope we do not have to deal with such a situation in this country.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR LOW COST LOAN FOR B.C. BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Finance of which he has knowledge; and with your permission, sir, I am advised he is prepared to answer at this time. If a request is made, will the province of British Columbia be granted a long term federal loan at the government borrowing interest rate and the provision for delayed repayment, for the construction of a bridge and approaches across Vancouver harbour, under provisions similar to those granted by the federal government for the construction of a bridge and approaches at Saint John, New Brunswick?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Although the minister may have expressed his willingness to answer the question, it is purely hypothetical and is not in order.

INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Irvine (London): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that a federal-provincial conference has been called for September 14, has the Prime Minister received the report of the Carter commission in either official language?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, it has not been received yet, Mr. Speaker, but we have been pressing the commissioner to get it before us with the least possible delay. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance has had any word in the last few days.

Mr. Irvine: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of previous statements made by the Minister of Finance, that he or his officials have seen certain chapters of this report, may I ask if those chapters have been made available to the provincial treasurers?

Mr. Sharp: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked this question because there was a reference in a newspaper column the other day to the suppression by the Canadian government of the Carter commission report. I was very happy that Mr. Carter clarified the position in a letter published in the Globe and Mail, in which he said:

> It is only fair to point out that there is no suppression by the government and in fact there continue to be a few chapters which are not entirely completed . . .
> I write this letter only because I consider it quite unfair to charge the government with withholding a report which they have not yet received.

Even if we wanted to show the report to the provincial governments, we do not have a report to show them. I think it would be quite inappropriate to show those draft chapters which, for the reasons I have given the house, have been seen by my officials.

Mr. Irvine: I am wondering, then, if the minister would like to enlarge further upon his statement of January 24, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE SECURITY

PROVISION FOR DELIVERY OF OLD AGE PENSION CHEQUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if, under the circumstances with which we are confronted, he has made provision for the delivery of the old age security pension cheques.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not understand the import of the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winkler: It is simply this. If the strike with which we are dealing in any way inhibits the distribution of those cheques, has the minister made provision for their distribution?

Mr. MacEachen: I am sure the procedures that have been followed in the past will be followed in this case.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

GRANT TO STANLEY RYERSON FOR BOOK ON CANADIAN HISTORY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, as the minister reporting to this house for the centennial commission. I am wondering if the minister is aware that the centennial commission has approved a grant of $2,000, under the commission's centennial publication assistance program, to one Stanley B. Ryerson of Toronto, reputed editor of the Marxist Quarterly, as a centennial project for a book on Canadian history on the theme of "Canada, the Unequal Partnership"? If so, is she satisfied with the propriety of such a decision?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In answer to the first part, yes, I am aware of it. In answer to the second part, no, I am not very happy about it.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask a supplementary question. I am wondering if the minister would be prepared to table a statement outlining the criteria used by the selection committee in assessing applications under this whole program?

Miss LaMarsh: I would be happy to do that if the rules so provide, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF SITTINGS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue based on correspondence from members of local 12 of the letter carriers union of Vancouver, British Columbia, from Ontario members, and other members of this union in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I need not tell you that the minister is just dying to answer.

Can the minister inform the house when the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on employer-employee relations in the public service of Canada will resume its sittings? Can the minister inform the house whether opportunity will be provided for the postal workers to make representations to be excluded from Bill C-170 and to be included under the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I would not want to be responsible for the minister's untimely demise, I will allow the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain I shall die if I do answer, but I may if I do not.

With respect to when the committee will meet, it is of course up to the chairman and the members of the committee as to when that committee will be called together again. With respect to the other part of the question, as to whether postal workers will have an opportunity of making the representations mentioned, this again is up to the joint committee of the House and the Senate. I understand, however, that all civil service organizations will be given full opportunity to make representations to this joint committee.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF PARKING PROBLEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): In the absence of the Minister of Public Works may I address my question to the Prime Minister. My question pertains to a strike which may take place among newspapermen, members of parliament, House of Commons staff, employees, and anybody else concerned with respect to parking on parliament hill. It is to prevent such a strike that I draw this matter to the Prime Minister's attention. Will the Prime Minister look into the restrictions which have been imposed in this matter and see whether an equitable solution may not be found, which could be satisfactory to all persons concerned?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to set up a conciliation board.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister not take into account the views of many who feel that the parliament grounds have never looked better?

Mr. Pearson: I certainly will, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Herridge.]

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF ORGANIZATION BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say whether Bill C-178, having to do with government organization, under which ministers and departments get new names, has yet been proclaimed? If not, can he say when it will be proclaimed?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has not been proclaimed, but that has not interfered with the implementation of the bill. When the Governor General returns to Ottawa shortly we hope to be able to proclaim this bill formally. That will be in a few weeks.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR RETURN OF ALL INCOME TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the forthcoming federal-provincial conference on taxation.

Can the minister tell us whether he has received a request from the Quebec government asking that 100 per cent of the revenue accruing from the personal income tax be handed over to that province? Does the minister intend to comply with this request of the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I have received no such request.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the fact that the Yukon territory has been without a commissioner since June, can the minister inform the house when an appointment will be made and whether the appointee will have the local authority and autonomy desired by the citizens of the Yukon territory?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that no appointment has been made to the commissionership since the retirement of Mr. Gordon Cameron. I expect that an appointment will be made at an early date.

I had noted the recent visit of the hon. member, in which he suggested that nothing had been done in the Yukon since 1952. I want to tell him that a number of things have been done, including the payment of a large number of bad debts incurred during the time he was in charge of the department.

We hope that an appointment will be made in the matter of a very few weeks. I think no harm whatsoever has been done in the interregnum.

Mr. Starr: Who is going to pay your bad debts?

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering whether the minister was accurate in mentioning 1952 as the date. I think he must have drawn that particular year out of a hat. Could he not answer the latter part of my question, which I think is most important, as to whether the appointee, when and if he is appointed, will have the local authority and autonomy which is very urgently requested by the citizens of the Yukon territory.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I quoted 1952 from the press. I was not responsible for the confusion of the hon. member.

The second point of the hon. member's question deals with additional responsibilities with respect to the territories, which I anticipate will be undertaken in amendments that we intend to bring before the house as soon as possible.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate when we might expect the Carrothers commission report.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I am now in possession of a copy of the report on the government in the Northwest Territories—the Carrothers commission report. It would be my intention to table it in the house at once, if we had the French translation. We are making inquiries as to how long that will take, and if it should take an undue period of time I shall ask permission of the house to table the English version, with the commitment of having the French version tabled as soon thereafter as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BAR ASSOCIATION REQUEST FOR COMPULSORY BREATHALIZER TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question for the Minister of Justice which has to do with the traffic death toll on our highways. Will the minister give consideration to the appeal made yesterday by the Canadian Bar Association, with respect to the establishment of compulsory breathalizer tests for impaired drivers?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the department has given this matter considerable consideration in the past. Among other things, it has been following quite closely the work of the Canadian Bar Association in this matter. At one period it was rumoured that the bar association had withdrawn the resolution because of some technical difficulties. It was only this morning that I saw in the press report that the resolution had been accepted. I can assure the hon. member that we will look into the resolution very carefully.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Can the Prime Minister tell the house when he expects to receive the Laurendeau-Dunton report on bilingualism and biculturalism?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, but I hope before the end of the year.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

REASONS FOR REDUCTIONS IN STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Could he inform the house whether the announcement that 25 employees of the Royal Canadian Mint are to be laid off at the end of September is the result of the government's tight money policy?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Not quite. The reason some workers are being laid off from the mint is that the mint has caught up with the demands for currency.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REGULATION AND CONTROL OF DRUG LSD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): My question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has consideration been given to the regulation and control of the drug LSD.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MATTERS TO BE CONSIDERED AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether later this week, and before he leaves for the prime ministers' conference in London, the house might have an opportunity for two or three hours to hear from him regarding various matters which will come before that conference and, in particular, what will be the attitude of Canada toward the situation in Rhodesia.

He will recall that when embargoes were imposed and sanctions applied, we took the stand they would never be effective, and the government held the other view. I ask this question because of an article by Mr. Edmonds, at one time I think a close associate of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) who contends that only the use of force will bring about a settlement in Rhodesia. That is a serious suggestion to make and one which I think parliament would not accept.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the view I stated the day before yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I wish it had been stated to Mr. Edmonds, who occupied a very close relationship with the minister and was often his lead. I would ask the Prime Minister whether something along these lines might be achieved.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will discuss the matter with the government house leader and he will perhaps meet the other house leaders to see whether it could be arranged. I myself would welcome the opportunity of discussing these important questions, though I would point out, as the right hon. gentleman knows, that a final decision on such an important international policy could only be reached by the government in light of the reports we get from the sanctions committee of the commonwealth in London, and also in light of the statements made and the policies put forward by other members of the commonwealth. Subject to that, I would welcome the opportunity for a discussion of this matter.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): In view of the interruption I heard from him I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will give a clear answer to the question he was asked on August 29. The question was put in these words by my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt): "Is it now the policy of the government to employ force if necessary to dislodge the present government in Rhodesia?" In reply the minister gave this vague answer: "I know of no basis for that question."

Never mind talking about the basis of the question. Let the minister tell the house whether it is government policy to advocate the use of force in Rhodesia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think my reply was very appropriate.

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I address this question to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman say when the federal-provincial conference to deal with education is to be called?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am not sure of the exact date. Perhaps the Secretary of State will be able to tell me the exact date of that meeting—whether it has yet been fixed. She will inform me and I will inform the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Chatterton: In view of the general expectation of students that the government's student loans and scholarship bill will be available in September, can the Prime Minister say whether consideration will be given to introducing that bill at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to give consideration to that.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Further to that, there is the matter of legislation dealing with increased per capita grants to the universities as announced by the Prime Minister in his letter to the premiers dated January 17 last and printed as an appendix to Hansard on February 10. Since that legislation will cover among other things the university year 1966-67, and with the opening of the universities close at hand, is this not a matter of very great importance and urgency?

Mr. Pearson: I certainly appreciate both the importance and the urgency of the matter, but as the right hon. gentleman knows this was a subject on the agenda of a federal provincial meeting which was to have taken place in Victoria, British Columbia, in July. For reasons which the Leader of the Opposition will appreciate, that meeting had to be postponed. I cannot remember the exact date when it will be held, though I have been asked the question; I think it is toward the end of September. But I will check on that immediately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF INTEGRATION MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether it is the intention or aim of the government at this time not to refer the events which have taken place since June 23 to the standing committee on defence for futher review.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Minister of National Defence dealt with this matter yesterday, and I think it is highly proper that these questions should be referred to the committee on defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question period has expired.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, August 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for the second reading of Bill No. 230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees, and on the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): In rising today to take part in the debate on the bill now before the house I hope I can make some small contribution toward a solution of this serious problem which is facing the country today. I hope that perhaps in some small way I can influence someone on the government side to take a second look at the measure which is before us and make some reasonable changes in it.

As I speak today, I am not speaking, as the phrase goes, off the top of my head. I am speaking as a railroader with 25 years of active experience on the railroad. I am also speaking as a representative of one of the unions involved in the strike today—the operating union, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. I was a representative for them for 15 years, and their representative in matters of legislation for four years. I have been closely associated with the railroads and with the unions throughout my period of service in the industry, so I think I can speak with some authority on the railroad problem and on what the railroaders are thinking today.

I shall be a little kinder to the railway companies than was my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who stated, in effect, I believe, that the railway companies did not negotiate. I would say that I deplore the very negative approach they take toward collective bargaining. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in making this statement I am being very kind to them.

There is clear evidence of this negative approach in the fact that this is the fourth time the government has had to intervene in railroad labour-management disputes. It is also proof that the railroads are not approaching collective bargaining in the same manner as collective bargaining is generally carried on between industry and labour. This has been my experience both as a railroader and as a union man.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) last night. He spoke with sincerity. I would have to agree with a good part of what he said, but I cannot be as optimistic as the hon. member in respect to the railroads sincerely getting down again to negotiations with the unions in order to bring about a better settlement. This legislation contains no hope of that. I am satisfied the railroad companies are going to stand pat and take their chances on arbitration. This may be a personal opinion, but my experience with the unions gives me a good foundation for making that statement.

I would also like to tell the hon. member for Verdun that it is not a matter of the railroaders not properly understanding the provisions of Bill C-230. Rather, it is a case of their understanding too well the attitude of the railway companies in the matter of collective bargaining. This is the problem. They have no faith in the companies resuming negotiations and giving them any more than is outlined in this bill.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said one of the problems in the railroad industry concerned the lessening gap in the pay structures for skilled and unskilled workers. I am quite sure my colleague did not intend no imply that the so-called unskilled workers are overpaid. The point he was trying to make was that the pay differential between skilled and unskilled workers was not enough. In this connection I do not think the railroads are fair in classifying skilled and unskilled workers. I feel certain many unskilled workers could be classified as highly skilled workers.

My experience lay in the operating field, but my sympathy goes out to the non-ops because I believe they have suffered more discrimination in the matter of inadequate pay. The problems of the operating groups are numerous, but they are different from those of the non-ops.

The section foreman is one of the most important people on a railroad, yet in a sense he is looked down upon, even though there is no more hard working man in the industry. He must acquire a good understanding of basic engineering. He is responsible for the proper elevation of tracks and other work which, if not done properly, could contribute to accidents, injuries and possibly death. Yet his take-home pay is a national disgrace. All through the years these people have been deprived of a proper income. Many of them are now being pensioned off and because of their low rate of pay their pensions are totally inadequate.

Railroad bridge and building crews are also highly skilled workmen. They build bridges. They do all the heavy work in the construction. They maintain them. They build houses and even do cabinet making. I believe their services are not recognized in the proper manner.

I can give an example of their wage rate. One constituent of mine was with the C.N.R. bridge and building section. He took his pension two years earlier than required and got a job in construction which paid him $1.78 more per hour than he was paid when working on the railroad, plus $2.60 a day travelling expenses. This is adequate proof that the railroaders are underpaid. Freight and express workmen are another group which is badly underpaid. I can cite the case of an express clerk who is married and is trying to rear his family on take-home pay of less than $300 a month. Another clerk with 15 years seniority has take-home pay of approximately $280 per month, and he is a marrried man with five children. Is it any wonder that such people are hostile when they think the government would consider such a measly increase as is offered in this bill?

I quite understand that hon. members on the other side of the house have said that this is an open-end formula, that it involves only an interim payment; but from my experience in negotiations with the railroads I have a strong feeling that. if the bill passes unamended, it will be many months before the workers get an additional raise. The increase offered by the bill is meagre and does not alleviate the position in which railroaders find themselves today.

Railroaders are the most maligned of people. No others in industry have been criticized so much for feather-bedding; yet it is rather odd that railroaders are being made redundant and can still be responsible for a national crisis because they walk off their jobs.

I do not wish to take the time of the house to explain the pay structure of the operating crafts. No one would be much the wiser if I did because it is one of the most complex formulae to be found anywhere. In it there is real inequality. I agree that many of the operating people, if they hold good positions in freight or passenger service, can make a reasonably good monthly wage. But by the same token there are many more who, due to the complex wage structure, are subject to very low wages if they do not have the seniority required in order to hold a decent job.

Just as an example, while these men work on a mileage basis, if they are working on jobs where mileage does not accumulate and where there is less road mileage than 100 miles involved, their rate is $2.09 an hour. Under circumstances where a man is forced on a job, I think this is a very unrealistic wage in this day and age. If he works on a run of over 100 miles, he is paid by the mile and receives $16.35 for every 100 miles. This inequality does not exist because the men want it. It does not exist because the unions have not tried to do something about it. It exists because every time the unions attempt to have something done about it the company will go along with the discussion but will not do anything about it. They do not want to bring the poorly paid man up to the rate of the better paid man: They want to bring the better paid man down to the level of the lower paid man. This is the only time they want to negotiate on this.

Time after time our unions have tried to do something about this inequality and bring about a more simplified pay structure. The companies are more concerned with trying to cut the wages of the higher paid workers, and therefore they never get off the ground so far as this particular subject is concerned. The yard conductor switchman always works on an hourly basis. His rate is $2.66 an hour. I would say that on the average a yard conductor's service with the company would be anywhere from 20 to 40 years. When a man has put in 20 to 40 years on a job, has the skills required to perform that job properly and is required to take the responsibility for the involvement of machines worth hundreds of thousands of dollars and goods worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, I think $2.66 an hour is absolutely outrageous. When you add the 6 per cent on to that it is hardly worth mentioning.

Last night I listened with interest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He too seemed to be optimistic that when the chips were down the companies would sit down to negotiate. I should like to remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that at the time a unanimous report of a conciliation board was more or less forced down the company's throat, this was government intervention too. Even though the conciliation board was unanimous in recommending a formula for settlement, the company would have no part of it, and at this time too it almost resulted in a crisis.

Therefore, I must reiterate what I said before. I am not optimistic that if this bill is passed there will be any very decided improvement for the workers for a great time to come. I can see months of delay and frustration while the men get more bitter all the time.

I should like to refer also to what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) said with regard to the Freedman commission report—that is, that the recommendations of the Freedman commission report should be referred for negotiation between the companies and the unions. I am not criticizing the hon. member for Red Deer, because as is the case in respect of a majority of people, I am quite sure he does not understand that the only reason there was a wildcat strike on the Canadian National Railways is that the unions for years have tried to have written into their contract the same things that are recommended by the Freedman commission report. In this regard they have not met with any success. This is the only reason there was a wildcat strike on the Canadian National Railways.

This time again, when the unions and the company were trying to negotiate there was a proposal from the unions that the recommendations of the Freedman report be part of the contract. The company turned thumbs down on it; they absolutely will not negotiate. The only way it is going to be put into effect is by government legislation; make no mistake about that.

Like all union members I am opposed to compulsory arbitration. I do not think it solves anything. If we ever get to the point where all these disputes go to compulsory arbitration, management will not settle at any time; they will sit back and gamble in the hope that when it goes to compulsory arbitration they will get the best of the deal. Without criticizing arbitrators, our people do not have confidence that when the company goes to arbitration it does not get a little the best of the deal. This is another thing which is bugging the railroaders today.

The point I wish to make most clear is the fact that it is not because the railroader does not understand Bill C-230 that he is so upset today. It is because he does understand how the companies have been negotiating for the past 16 years since the strike of 1950. It is my opinion that never since 1950 have the companies sat down and negotiated in good faith. Perhaps there has been some token negotiating, with the understanding in the back of their minds that eventually there would be government intervention and that if there is government intervention they would have the government on the spot; either the taxpayers would have to pick up the tab or the government would have to step in and relieve them of some of the burden which they find, or pretend to find, too heavy to bear.

I am not going to argue the point about inability to pay. I recognize the fact that railroads perhaps are not in as favourable a position as is most industry when they have to provide additional wages. I should like to say very strongly, however, that I do not think the Canadian Pacific Railway has a good argument in respect of inability to pay. So far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, if they were not burdened with an unrealistic debt which I think costs in the neighbourhood of $60 or $70 million a year in interest, I feel they could not plead inability to pay either.

To a great extent the position the railways find themselves in today is their own fault. It is only in the past few years that the railways have got off their behinds—if you do not mind my saying that—and have tried to modernize. They wanted to sit there and let somebody else carry the burden for them. I do have a little optimism. In the past few years I think they have tried to get back into the transportation field and have tried to compete on a fair basis. However, I still suggest that the railways can blame themselves to a great extent if there is inability to pay today, so far as railroad operation is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, from the start I never intended to take up too much of the time of the house. I should like to say something in conclusion, and if this gets out to a lot of the union men I might not be too popular with them. I should like to have it clearly understood, however, that I do not in any way subscribe to defiance of the law, under any circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fawcett: I say this very sincerely, and I say this having in mind my own experience. I was involved in an illegal strike two years ago. The issues at that time were not as great, perhaps, as they could be in this case if the situation were to get out of hand. Our defiance was token defiance against our employer and not against the government in that particular instance. It was very forcibly driven home to me at that time that there is a very thin line between sound reasoning and unreasonableness. There is a very thin veil between democracy and anarchy, and the lack of a few sensible people in the right places at the right times may lead this country into difficulties which may take months to resolve.

• (4:00 p.m.)

For the reasons I have outlined I should like to go on record as one of many who implore the railway employees to obey the law regardless of circumstances. On the other hand I should also like to implore the government to change Bill C-230 to make it more acceptable to those involved, because as it now stands it is not acceptable. I hope when this bill reaches committee consideration the government will be prepared to accept certain reasonable amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate at the very beginning, but as it apears that it will be longer than expected, I will take a few minutes to state part of my views and also add to the sauce offered to us by the government as well as the opposition. I would like to add some spice to the main speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). After hearing the voice of those two parliamentary leaders, we finally have a rather tasteless and stale sauce. Perhaps another cook might improve the taste.

The more I consider the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and that of the Leader of the Official Opposition, the more I find they are the same.

When we take the time to read carefully the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in favour of the bill before us, we are carried back a few years when a similar situation occurred and the argumentation of the government in office to settle the problems at that time was put forward.

As for the Leader of the Opposition, he does exactly the same thing. He gives us a history lesson, the conclusion reached is that what the other has done at the time he was either in the opposition or in power. After the history lesson, the conclusion reached is that when they are on the government side, they are both the same, and when they are on the opposition side, they are also both the same. To protect the rights of the workers, their interests, their welfare, both were better in opposition. Mr. Speaker, why do we not take these two parties and put them where they would be most productive, both in opposition, and bring to power a third party that would come up with a settlement once and for all, since both of them are better in opposition and since, when they change sides in the house, they also change their argument as easily as they change their shirt.

That is the problem and it never changes, but that will not truly solve the problem facing the country today. It was bypassed in the past and there will be more pussyfooting about without a final settlement. If the necessary measures, if effective and essential measures were taken to settle the problem of the railroad workers' strike, the same formula could possibly be applied to settle the many other strikes with which the country is faced at the present time. Such, Mr. Speaker, are my observations not only as concerns this discussion, on this particular bill, but ever since I have had the opportunity of sitting in this house.

[English]

The railway strike affects all spheres of the Canadian economy and productivity. We must ask ourselves why this strike is taking place and why the many other recent strikes have taken place. We must realize that more strikes are imminent because we are travelling a vicious circle. As salaries are increased the cost of living increases, and this is inevitably followed by more strikes for higher wages to compensate for the rise in costs. This cost of living is spiralling higher and higher and we have no idea when it will stop.

Provincial governments are not happy about the situation. I am sure that if this situation existed 50 or 60 years ago counterparts of men like Mr. Ross Thatcher would have come to Ottawa with six-guns to settle these problems with the prime minister. Housewives all over the country would like to go after the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) with rolling pins because of the high cost of living.

Why does the Prime Minister not have solutions to these problems? Perhaps it is because he spends his time looking for more peace prizes. I do not know what the Prime Minister intends to do to correct the existing situation, but I do know something has to be done. Let me add my grain of salt to this sauce in the hope that it will gain some flavour. Let me express my opinions in the hope that the government will pay attention and find in part at least some answer to the difficult problems which now face us.

Let us consider what the railway employees think about the bill now before us. Apparently it does not satisfy them to any great extent because it does not grapple with the problem. Some of the men on strike do not particularly want an increase in income, but would like an improvement in working conditions and facilities. Another group does want an increase in salary and is not particularly concerned about working conditions. Perhaps part of the reason for this difference of opinion relates to the various classifications in which groups of railway employees find themselves. No one can convince me that the means and needs of the presidents, vice presidents, executive vice presidents and managers are the same as the means and needs of the common section workers, station agents, ticket collectors or switchmen. They are in different categories. They might not have the same needs. We have not distinguished between these two classes of workers. There is the labouring section, part of which needs higher wages. We are offering these men 6 per cent, which is probably not enough. But if this 6 per cent were applied in the right quarters, it would be enough and the cost to the government would not be any greater. In this event 6 per cent would probably be sufficient and would satisfy the workers who need better working conditions but not necessarily higher wages.

I have in mind the trainman sitting in the caboose at the back of a freight train. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that these men still have the same living quarters that they had when the first train was run in Canada? They have not any toilet facilities, except the open air; the back end of the train is used for this purpose. If it is too cold and these men have to use whatever facilities there are inside the caboose, I do not know what they do.

Coal-oil lamps are used on these trains; the companies will not tolerate any kind of generator being used. The lamp is taken out to work by the trainman and he takes it back when he returns to the shop. On some of the super continental trains the cook is running around in a little space perhaps 5 feet wide and 15 feet long for 8 or 10 hours a day. He is preparing 700 or 1,000 meals a day. Where are his sleeping quarters? He sleeps on top of a dining-room table or in the baggage compartment with a couple of hens or pigs to keep him company, and the pigs are grunting all night.

These are examples of the working conditions of some of the men employed on the railways. Another type of railway worker leaves the station with his packsack, overcoat, flashlight and lantern. If he had to carry all this equipment once or twice a year, it wouldn't be too bad; but he does this two or three times a week over a period of perhaps 30 years. When these men are working around the station they are not able to walk between the cars; they have to crawl underneath the train. The cars are not separated, and as a result this worker has to crawl underneath them carrying all his gear. It would not be too much trouble to separate them and allow the workers to walk between the cars.

This is what I mean when I refer to bad working conditions; and these conditions can be improved. A raise in salary will not improve the working conditions of the man working on the freight train who is forced to use open air toilet facilities at a temperature of perhaps 40 degrees below zero, in broad daylight. If there were a reclassification of jobs, and working conditions were improved, you could give an increase in salary to the men who need it, and better working conditions to those who need them. In my opinion more railway workers would be satisfied if this were done. This is one aspect of the problem that the government and the commission provided for in the bill, if it is ever passed, should stress, namely improved working conditions and equitable, just remuneration.

I am worried about this 6 per cent because, as always, this money comes from the Canadian citizen in the form of taxes. The government may well be worried about inflation at the moment because every time they increase wages to settle a strike, whether it be on the railroad or anywhere else, the cost of living immediately increases. If the government is worried about inflation, why do they not take other measures to solve the situation? If one course can only lead to disaster, why not take another? Good grief, Mr. Speaker, there must be other measures that could be taken. There must be men in the government capable of working out a more satisfactory course. When hon. members opposite go around the city, they change direction. Why don't they do the same thing in order to solve our economic problems, whether they be connected with operating a railroad or a country. It does not surprise me that we have strikes, because this government cannot even operate the parking area on parliament hill. If this is so, how can we expect them to run a railroad?

Instead of giving just 6 per cent to workers who need a higher increase, and hollering and yelling to the country that they cannot give any more because of inflation, the government should have considered this result when they came out with the 11 per cent tax on building materials. The cost of living went up as a result of that tax, and it will probably go up after we have dealt with the bank legislation this fall. In the minister's bill there is no limit on the interest rate chargeable on loans. The government raise the ceiling on interest. These things increase the cost of living, but we have not as yet had a strike in the banks. I know railroad men who work in shacks, but every bank manager I know has a big office in which to work. If the money obtained from increased interest were used to raise the salary of bank employees, I would not say a word; but I know where this money is going.

Raising the ceiling on interest rates has increased the cost of living, but the government does not talk about inflation when dealing with the financial sector of the economy. However, to the worker they say, "Be satisfied. Don't complain too much, because a salary increase will cause inflation." This is the sing-song we have been listening to for years, and it is about time the government changed its attitude in this respect. They should try shooting with the right arm instead of the left. If they did this they might hit the target sometimes.

To improve our economy in the future the government will have to divide the public part of the economy from the private. Until they do this they will be faced with a wall of trouble every day. Our interest on our national debt is about $1 billion a year. Doesn't this contribute to inflation? What does it add up to per capita in Canada? The government should finance the public sector of the economy interest free, or at operational cost. This might very much reduce the tax paid by Canadian citizens. Every time the government imposes a tax, the cost of living goes up.

The job of this government is to see that the needs of every individual are met. Not only must we improve production but we must improve the ability of the individual to purchase that production. In my opinion the government has failed to realize this aspect of the problem. They must see that the purchasing power of the Canadian people is at all times not more or less than the goods we are producing. If a proper balance is not maintained in this regard you will have either inflation or deflation. If you have inflation, you are off-balance, so get back into balance and take measures to achieve this end.

When I speak of the public sector of the economy I refer to the financing of bridges, railroads, schools, roads and projects undertaken by municipalities and provincial governments. When any level of government wishes to undertake a public project, it should be financed interest free because these governments are providing a service to the country. This is not production but it is a service from which the producing, private sector of the economy benefits.

After a road has been built it begins to depreciate, but we pay interest on the total amount of money originally borrowed to build the road. This is what causes inflation. You build a road; it costs $1 million and you commence repaying the loan. Immediately after the road has been built, it depreciates. You borrow $1 million to build the road, you pay interest at perhaps 5 per cent for 20 years and at the end of that period you have, in effect, paid for two roads because you have repaid the original loan of $1 million and the interest has amounted to $1 million. That is $2 million for the basic value of a $1 million road. There is inflation there and by the time the road is paid for it has outgrown its usefulness. To whom is the interest paid? I would like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to get up and tell us to whom this interest is paid. We may then start on the road to success and not on the road to bankruptcy, which is so often the case—or the road to credit restriction.

On May 31 of last year when I told the Minister of Finance, when he reduced the reserves in the chartered banks from 8 per cent to 7 per cent, that he was the originator of the restriction he called me a prophet. I would like the minister to refer back to the words I said on May 31, 1965. Maybe I was a prophet; but he was a fool. This may not be parliamentary language but it is still common sense. All we have here is common sense, and I think we realize that very well.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have the other matter regarding the private sector of the economy. I believe that the government should assist private companies which are borrowing money with interest, because that service is being paid for.

If I were to go to a bank to borrow money so as to continue the production of my company, the interest would not be included in the cost price. There will be salaries, depreciation of machinery, basic goods prices and interest. That is why the government could counterbalance the difference between national productivity and purchasing power so that the Canadian people at all times can make the best use of purchasing power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of what I have said I wish to present to this house the following subamendment, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted:

The government is neglecting to undertake the necessary measures so that at all times the railway employees and all Canadian citizens may have incomes according to the national productivity of this country by using the facilities of the Bank of Canada as may be necessary.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in view of this subamendment I counsel the government to look attentively at the dual economy existing in this country, because national productivity is increasing at a rapid pace and should be given due consideration. It is logical that the capital of the public sector in our economy should be used to finance the production of the private sector, and it is just as logical to invest private capital in the public sector of the economy. They should be financed totally and entirely one from the other. Until the government has given thorough consideration to these points we are doomed to face more strikes, more credit restrictions, more uneasiness and unhappiness in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With reference to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) I would like to refer the house to citation 203, subsection 1 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 171 which reads as follows:

203 (1) It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

Division

This may be read as also applying to a subamendment. The reference made in the subamendment to national productivity and the use of the Bank of Canada is not at all relevant to the amendment now before the house.

May I also refer the house to citation 202 subsection 3 at page 169 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It reads as follows:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

This is so, provided of course that it is relevant to the bill.

I suggest to the hon. member for Mégantic that the subamendment which he moved is not relevant to the bill and brings out matters which are not included in the amendment now before the house. I therefore declare the subamendment out of order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the main motion?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): You will have a lot to explain, my friend. You will have to explain the unexplicable.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one is not always paid back in the same coin, since I have always listened in silence when the hon. members from the other side of the house spoke. I hope to be treated with the same politeness during the few minutes I shall take of the time of the house.

Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps normal, and the contrary might be difficult to explain in view of my past involvement with the unions, that I should at least make some remarks before such important legislation is passed by parliament.

The bill now under consideration, Mr. Speaker, involves problems of great importance for the labour world and even for society as a whole.

This is not the first time that railway disputes finally come before the parliament of Canada. This has been discussed at length; there have been at least four such disputes and it is the fourth with which we are dealing here in parliament and which will have to be settled more or less directly by the House of Commons. Yet this procedure is not normal, since we have to pass legislation to settle the dispute. The railroad workers, the employers in the railway industry are covered by the Industrial Relations Act just like all the other employers under the jurisdiction of the federal law. This law established the procedure for the settlement of disputes.

This procedure applies to the railways as to all the other industries covered by the law. It provides for a negotiation period, and also makes other provisions. It also provides for a conciliation board or a mediator if the dispute is not settled directly. When this legal procedure is exhausted, the law stipulates that a legal strike may be declared. What the railmen are doing now is exactly what the law allows them to do. Not only does the law allow them to do this, but they have no other recourse in a dispute.

How is it that in their case, Parliament is always forced to intervene? The obvious reply is that the Canadian economy is seriously hampered. It is quite true.

Other strikers also use their right to strike and thus affect the public weal. There was a postal strike that affected the public interest and Parliament was concerned with the postal strike. There was the longshoremen's strike and there was concern too, over this strike, its consequences, and intervention by Parliament was asked for. And if, tomorrow, our airlines were paralysed, the people and, possibly, the members, would probably call for the intervention of Parliament. That is to say that, on one hand, the Canadian people through their Government, recognize that railroad workers, longshoremen, Seaway employees have the same rights as others and that, having the same rights, these workers may organize and may also strike.

But in all these areas, and in a growing number of areas, strikes affect the commonweal.

Now if the fact that public interest is involved becomes grounds for Parliament intervention, I say that Parliament will have to intervene constantly more and more.

In the case of the railroads, it seems clear to me and every one is agreed, even those among us who are closest to the labour unions have agreed that a railroad strike cannot last indefinitely. It had to be settled; that is to say the workers could not be allowed to extend their full economic strength to achieve an agreement. As soon as this is admitted, and I believe that our friend from York South (Mr. Lewis) admitted it yesterday, and rightly so, and I shan't take him to task for it, as soon as it is admitted that workers in an industry cannot go to the utter limit of their rights and their strength, it means that the right to strike is being questioned in this particular area. This means that such employees do not have the same rights as others. Normally, as it was mentioned in this house, I think, a strike is not simply the fact of going out on strike, to act jointly it is going to the very end of our strength in order that at some time, the balance of economic pressures brings about an agreement between the parties.

Everyone appears to be denying railwaymen the right to strike. This is an extremely serious problem. And when reference was made on a few occasions in this house to my speech in Nicolet-Yamaska, and rightly too, the fact is that I was not surprised that the government did not take action any sooner. I would have been surprised that a responsible government, seeing that the fundamental rights of hundreds, thousands and eventually hundreds of thousands of workers were at stake. Let the government take the time, try by all possible means to get the parties to come to an understanding, so that none of their rights be restricted, limited, or denied altogether. It seems to me that this is normal procedure. To be sure, there were those who cried out, as soon as they saw their interests being threatened, their own interests,—they often confuse this with the public interest—they cried out: "Good grief, stop the strike, stop the very threat of a strike. Why does parliament not convene before the strike occurs?"

One thing must be made clear, Mr. Speaker, and this is that the power of negotiation of a trade union does not lie only in strike action, but also in the threat of strike action. You know that more contracts are negotiated through strike threats than through strike action itself.

Therefore, if we were all to decide upon intervention in the railway strike, we could at least, Mr. Speaker, have given the railwaymen a chance to make use of this strike action threat as a means of negotiation. By what right should we have denied them even this? Criticism of government action, Mr. Speaker, on the basis that it did not take action soon enough, in view of the problems that a strike may cause, has no serious foundation; any strike brings forth problems, Mr. Speaker, I know of no strike that does not cause trouble. But if we must draw the line, where should it be drawn if we want to respect the fundamental right of workers, which is the right of association?

Between us, Mr. Speaker, people do not associate for association's sake; they do so to strive for a common aim and in labour unions the pursuit of such an aim implies a certain bargaining power. When a labour union is deprived of the right to strike and of every means of action, the fact that union members are grouped together does not confer them any power. Their only power is that all union members can at a given time deprive their employer of their services. This is their only power, otherwise let them group themselves in leagues of mutual contemplation, but not in labour unions. The right to strike is closely related to the right of association. That is why any intervention in this field should be very cautious and we should refrain from intervening hastily because a few people feel threatened. There is no doubt that the railway strike is hurting the workers. There is one thing, however, that the Canadian people should learn. The public will learn that if all citizens are to be on an equal footing and to enjoy the same rights, it will have to do like any other employer and suffer the consequences. If the Canadian people are unable to do so, a special piece of legislation will have to be passed in order to protect the workers to ensure that in no circumstance they will be placed in a more unfavourable situation than the population as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that if the buses or rather, eventually, the subway were to stop running in Montreal, all the people would be annoyed. Hospital services were interrupted in Quebec and everybody was annoyed. I could not say to what degree the packers' strike could affect the Canadian market, but I know that it can annoy a lot of people. It becomes a question of determining at what point rights are curtailed because their exercise becomes a public nuisance.

That, to some degree, was the meaning of my remarks. I did not state that we should not act fast enough. Indeed, suppressing the strike. On the contrary. I am one of those who claim that in as vast a country as Canada, it is probably impossible for a railway strike to paralyse the whole economy. Yet, if we decide to take action along those lines, we must know how we can protect the rights of those who will be affected by the restrictions we want to impose. That is the price of democracy, the price of freedom.

Some people come and tell me that we did not act fast enough. Indeed, supressing the rights of workers by a stroke of the pen, that is not serious. It can be done overnight because all those who are economically "in" do not suffer from it. It is easily done, the thing is settled, even if at the expense of others and following improper negotiations, but that does not matter.

I think the people of Canada can and do understand under the circumstances the attitude of the government which sought to allow for a maximum of freedom and for a maximum use by the employees of their right of association. That is what we tried to do.

I have another remark, Mr. Speaker. I have realized—indeed, hon. members did that much earlier than I did—that it is impossible to negotiate a collective agreement in a parliament. I realized that. We have here only a few items and you can see what takes place. If we had the whole collective bargaining with the provisions and the wages, the hours of recall, time and a half, shifts structure, there would be no way out. I do not think anyone considers that seriously. At a given time there may be an unusual intervention as the present one, but that cannot become normal practice.

Mr. Speaker, that is why, without being requested by anyone, neither by the government nor others, I believe we will have, at a given time and as soon as possible, to consider together that labour relations legislation, especially in the vital sectors of the nation to find out how those conflicts can be settled regardless of government intervention while respecting as much as possible the rights of the workers.

I believe it is essential that we come to that; otherwise we will always be in a situation such as the one which confronts us now.

We were told yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that the negotiations were not carried out as far as the conflict between the railway companies and their employees. That is quite possible; I was not present; and I do not have the experience in the operation of railways that certain of my colleagues have. I understand that that is not done; because when you are always under the threat of parliamentary intervention, it is certain that the parties will try to evade their responsibilities and leave the decisions to a third party. Then that is an irregular method. Now, which is the right one? There are many methods we can consider but it is obvious that it is not when there is a conflict and in a hurry that we should decide what will be the legislation in that field and how we consider together the settlement of conflicts in the fields I just mentioned.

We were given yesterday a few examples of countries where that seems to be well organized. Reference was made to Sweden. I believe the leader of the Ralliement Créditistes (Mr. Caouette) said that in Sweden the government intervenes in every strike. Obviously, when he went to Sweden he did not waste his time studying labour legislation, because undoubtedly nowhere are government interventions rarer than in Sweden. There is practically no labour legislation in Sweden. The only regulation there is is the one established by a very powerful employers' association and by a trade-union association, also very strong.

Therefore, it is a very special situation. The labour union, which is called the LO in Sweden, has an extremely powerful influence on its affiliated unions. Most of the time negotiations are conducted on a national scale; LO in Sweden, that is the labour union, has to deal with an extremely powerful management organization which not only speaks for the employers but which can make decisions binding upon them. LO even has a strike fund to resist and to help an employer when the latter is engaged in a dispute and has the support of the organization. There is nothing like that here in Canada. First of all, over there the powers are centralized, here they are decentralized; over there they have a management association representing employers; here there is no such thing, or rather there are too many of them.

Therefore, in Canada, if you want to talk to management, you have to talk to ten, 15 or 20 management associations. On the other hand, you have a labour movement which is unified and also highly disciplined, not only in its structure but also so far as the authority given to the central organization is concerned. And if I had to find fault with the Swedish labour union, it would be precisely that it wields too much control over its affiliated locals. In any case, the example of Sweden, which was given by one in a very appropriate manner and by the other, of course, in a very inaccurate manner, cannot help us very much unless conditions in Canada change completely.

In any case, with regard to that intervention in the exercise of the right to strike or the right of associations, I understand that it is a delicate matter, and I hope it is the last time that parliament is called upon to do what it is now doing. I hope that we will find a way to allow the labour unions, even within the public service, to exercise their rights without Parliament having to intervene, because there are so many considerations which have to be taken into account then. I am not saying that it is dishonest; it is normal because what is more normal than for a political party to think of politics? What is more normal than for the opposition parties to think of taking over and for the government to want to stay in office? There is nothing unusual in that. Therefore, if the interests of the workers and the employers are caught in that network of conflicting interests, it means that we will be forever living in anarchy. Allow me to give you only one example.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke yesterday of 25 per cent. I have not made up my mind whether it is fair or not at this time and I use his figure; another party, even the government, could simply say, to put the hon. member for York South on the spot: we will offer 27 per cent. He will look like a reactionary. But negotiation on that basis makes no sense at all. I think a more rational basis than that must be found and that we must avoid mixing what must not be mixed.

What are the formulae? There may be some. In public services, especially where the government invests money, should the government, for instance, at a given time, attend the negotiations and play a more active part in them? Are there any other approaches to this problem? I hope we will have an opportunity to discuss them.

We have before us a bill the effect of which is to ask, indeed to order, the railway workers on strike to go back to work. Surely, this is a very serious decision for any parliament to make. This is the fourth time that the same thing is being done directly or indirectly.

We were told that this bill provided for an average increase of 6 per cent, that is 4 and 4, or 8 per cent at the end of the year, but this averages out to 6 per cent over the year. This is true and perhaps I am one of those who insisted that provision be made for that increase in the bill. And I will tell you why; we could have proceeded in two different ways; in view of the fact that, as the hon. member for York South indicated, the strike cannot be allowed to last indefinitely, we will have to find a solution and this is one. The solution he proposed himself is not a solution, since it can be assumed that even with his administrator failing agreement, the matter will be referred back to parliament. Something must be decided; either we legislate directly, that is that we negotiate in the place of the parties, or we refer the dispute to arbitration. Now, negotiation is impossible in parliament. There remains that second alternative.

Then in what spirit was that done? It was done not in a negative spirit, to try and limit what the railway workers could obtain. On the contrary, it was to give at least a first guarantee, and at the same time an indication that the government wanted the majority report to be implemented. For it could have been done as it was done in the past, by referring the whole dispute to arbitration. I believe that was done under the Conservative government. I have no particular grievances in this connection. I do not know under what circumstances that was done. It can be done that way, but we thought that in view of the fact that we restricted the workers' right, they should at least have a guaranteed increase, as recommended by Judge Munroe for the year 1966.

Only, let me tell you one thing. Mr. Speaker, it could and would be serious if I were convinced that the inclusion of the 6 per cent figure in the bill means that employees will be limited to 6 per cent and will not get at least what Judge Munroe recommended, that is 18 per cent. I would be against the bill, yes indeed.

Rightly or wrongly—Pardon me but I cannot hear—

Mr. Lewis: Where is the guarantee?

Mr. Marchand: One minute, Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. member for York South. Where is the guarantee? There are various kinds of guarantees. You can have a legal guarantee in which case a provision is inserted in legislation specifying that such and such a thing is to happen. That is a legal guarantee. But you can also have a moral guarantee which is often stronger than a legal one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand: Anyhow. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South can protest if he wants to but he knows just as well as I, or any person who has been involved in negotiations, that when a precedent has been set or when an arbitration report has been submitted concerning a public service and that the government indicates that it accepts the report and has tried to do so in such a way as to leave the people the greatest degree of freedom possible, that is a guarantee.

Let me say to the hon. member for York South that if I happen to be negotiating with Price Brothers in Kenogami, after the International Paper has agreed to a 15-cent increase, it is strange but I feel I am in a better position than if I had a guarantee written into the law.

Mr. Speaker, it is certain that if an 18 per cent wage increase is granted the Canadian National Railways employees, that the employees of any railway which is not affected by the strike will get the same increase. This has always been the case in the trade union world, and I hope that those who are aware of this will not question a reality which is a fact of life in the trade unions.

Mr. Grégoire: Does the 18 per cent guarantee in the case of the seaway set a precedent? Does it constitute a moral guarantee?

Mr. Marchand: Then, Mr. Speaker, there is no guarantee. There is a contractual guarantee given the seaway workers, since they negotiated for a 30 per cent increase. Another was given to the dock workers. This constitutes a guarantee for these people, no doubt about that. However, there is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this sets a precedent for those who are in the same position, a precedent which may be invoked and which carries considerable weight. All union members know this is so, as long as things are compared on the same basis. Such is the world of labour and that is the reason why I was in favour. The situation is surely more serious and I understand this point; it may be the point I understand best. When we are faced with a moral pledge such as that one, at a union meeting, and a union member asks the union delegate the question: "Is it sure that we are getting our 18 per cent increase under that bill?" The delegate may well answer, in complete honesty: "That is not spelled out in the bill." And he would be right, because it is not clearly stated in black and white, surely.

So then, it is a question of good faith. One needs only to see how those who are responsible for the legislation interpret those terms. That is all. I am simply telling you without insinuating that those who interpret it in another way are dishonest—that, by interpreting it in this way we are being honest. And I know what that means. I am convinced besides that, that time will show the member for York South that this is what will happen.

So this is the problem, Mr. Speaker. I believe that we have in this bill all that is needed for the settlement of the railway worker conflict. The interpretation of the terms is surely simpler for the union members; this is to be considered, and if union members are apt to be misled, union leaders will not be in a position to state, without fear of being wrong, that this is so.

Now then, if we are really of good faith and if we believe in those who make the pledge, then union delegates may well assure railway workers that the 18 per cent increase mentioned in the Munroe report is provided for in the bill, and that they will get it.

It is absolutely wrong, Mr. Speaker—and I am trying to speak as moderately as possible—to interpret the bill or to let it be interpreted as it now is in some circles, in other words as limiting the raise of the railwaymen to 6 per cent.

I have received dozens and even hundreds of telephone calls from railwaymen who said: How come we will only get 6 per cent for 2 years? Where did they get this? Who told them so? Perhaps newspapers, television, union representatives who did not want to take that responsibility, but anyhow, quite a few railwaymen in Canada think this bill contains a maximum increase of 6 per cent. And that is false.

If all sorts of speculations are going to be made, all I can say is what I have understood of the bill. Since I have participated in this debate and I made this statement in public, you can check all those things, and as we will probably meet again, let us say my statements can be checked.

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, I am still sorry parliament had to reconvene in order to settle a specific dispute.

As soon as this dispute is settled, I feel it is urgent that we attempt to look into the whole problem of industrial and labour relations in the public sectors where the public interest is directly involved. It will be impossible to evade the issue by trying to find excuses.

As I said earlier, even with the formula of the member for York South who suggested the appointment of an administrator, while I can well imagine that such an administrator may not succeed in settling the dispute, and since he said the strike cannot last very long in those circles, a solution will have to be found some day. Either it will last, or it will not, and if it does, by what means can it be definitely settled? I am not suggesting that this formula is ideal, but let us say that nobody has found an alternative, and I think that sooner or later, in view of the concentration of industry, in view of the fact that more and more groups of individuals, of workers, through sheer numbers, have a power in the strictest sense of the word, exert an exorbitant power in relation to other groups, the question will be to know how all this is going to be regulated. It is not a fact that all workers are miserable as far as their economic power is concerned.

The railway employees have surely a greater economic power than the textile workers. Mr. Speaker, 5,000 textile workers have been on strike for five weeks in Quebec. People who earn very low wages, much lower than the railroad workers. Parliament did not meet, no one tried to alert the members or the government to settle the dispute. They could die a slow death.

Other groups, because they are important, obviously, immediately alert the population. We will have to try to see how all this can be balanced, how the same approximate degree of rights can be given everyone in regard to the public good.

This is an opportunity, this could be an instance where an attempt should be made to discuss in a serene atmosphere, not to find out if what was done ten years ago is better than what is being done today or what will be done tomorrow.

One thing I know for sure, Mr. Speaker, whatever the party sitting on the right side of the house, when the same problems come up, the same solutions will have to be considered. In the United Kingdom, Mr. Wilson has to consider the very solutions other parties had to consider when they had to face the same problems and I do not blame him at all. I understand.

When the whole British overseas trade was paralysed, if the strike had lasted another month, which could have happened under the right to strike, the consequences for the British people can be surmised. It is well known that all kinds of means were resorted to in order to end the strike. There was no intervention by legislation as we are doing, I quite agree, but if all such means ever come up for discussion, it will be realized that there are means other than legislation which are strangely more effective than legislation.

So, from all angles, the problem is a serious one. It is unfortunate that it cannot be discussed in a more serene atmosphere. There will probably be such an opportunity, but this is not it. However, this is a real problem and no government can side-step it.

Now we may be asked why legislation was not passed earlier? Simply because in this field as in others, we must be guided by experience and we must have gone through certain things in order to avoid future mistakes.

It is normal for this country to go through such experiences. Others may yet be gone through. It is normal that the people become aware that some areas are vital for the population and that the whole population is concerned that everyone be versed in all areas, because one day the people themselves will otherwise suffer.

If we share the views of those who stated in this house that the relations between the railway companies and the unions were not normal, meaning that the negotiations were not normal, then the established practices are obviously somehow paralysing negotiations in this field. The best course to take must then be found. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this fourth great railway dispute may teach public opinion in Canada not to be panic-stricken and, as soon as one group wrongs another one, say that it must definitely be deprived of its rights, but those rights should be restricted. The people must know to what extent they may affect people's rights for, as I said earlier, if we deprive a group of its rights, I do not see why, under the same principle, another group might not lose its rights the next day. And so, from one group to the next, we would eventually abolish the right of association itself. For the workers, Mr. Speaker, this right of association is not a luxury, but probably their most fundamental right in a democracy.

The right of association, Mr. Speaker, was the instrument whereby the workers managed to improve their lot to the extent to which they have, and whereby they managed to prevent, oppose or resist their being exploited. This is a basic right for workers. We were cautious. It took a long time. The government assembled and parliament reconvened. If the government had met 15 days ago to tell the railwaymen not to strike and if it had produced a settlement, it would have been called a strong and powerful government, but it would have restricted the rights of the workers. No, I am not interested in that kind of power. As for those who want to wield it and would have liked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to take this attitude—which, fortunately, I do not think lies in his temperament—I think they are wrong to ask this, because any member of the government or of the opposition who appreciates people's rights is a worthwhile person in public life. Such a man is important to us.

I shall not review all the labour disputes involving the railways, especially as regards the official opposition. First of all, it would be a serious tactical error, since it has already been done in a masterly manner and it would also be a waste of time for the house. But surely, this bill does not go further than any action taken by the present government, by any Canadian government.

On the contrary, it probably does not go as far, because special precautions are taken to settle the dispute. If ever an order in council were passed to establish compulsory arbitration, parliament itself would have its say and could vote to give an additional assurance that arbitration would not take place in the dictatorial manner a few people favour.

There is no doubt that this bill restricts the exercise of the right of association, since it asks the workers to go back to work. This bill restricts the right of association, since arbitration will eventually be necessary, if the house agrees, but in this field it is probably the most sensible bill ever brought before the house and the most respectful of the rights of the workers. I am convinced that after the committee stage, all the workers represented by the Canadian railway unions will accept the decision of parliament with the feeling that they have been treated fairly and that their fundamental rights have been respected.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

• (5:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that the minister's time would end at 6.02. Does the minister wish to call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I do not usually speak as long as this, and my text does not extend so far but there are nevertheless some points to be made. I think that in the area of labour relations, as in areas where, shall we say, the public good is at stake, I believe that there should be some way in this house to achieve unanimity on certain fundamental questions. I am thinking, for instance, of the questions arising out of the relationship between French and English speaking Canadians, which are basic questions. I believe that Canadian political parties, unless they learn to protect at least some basic factors, are not being helpful to the country.

In this area of disputes affecting the whole nation, there is no disparagement for a political party although opposed to the government on many a point to say: Public interest is at stake, we will agree so that the people may feel protected by their government and so that, in this case, the workers may feel that their rights are being preserved.

This does not mean that we should agree on all points. It means that, in a national emergency, a government may, by rights, be in a position to expect some support from all who have faith in the country.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock I now leave the chair pursuant to special order made earlier this day. The sitting will resume at seven o'clock.

At six o'clock the sitting of the house was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. In speaking I am fully aware of the responsibility of the occasion and also of the breach my few remarks will make with customary tradition and parliamentary practice. But after cogitating for three days and listening to the debate in this chamber I have not been able to resolve my conflict of conscience with the consensus of my caucus.

Frankly, as a new member one of the pressures I have felt most has been the pressure to conform whereby independent judgment and objective judgment are subject to the pressure of the necessity of loyalty to party and party principles. I think the caucus is at times a collar around the necks of many members. It chokes the expression of independent thought and judgment. However, caucus and the solidarity of caucus are most necessary when dealing with the ordinary issues of party politics, the issues which make elections and party platforms.

We are not in that situation today, Mr. Speaker. We are in a situation which, as everyone in this house has admitted, is a national emergency. Having wrestled with my conscience for the last few days, appreciating and respecting the views of my colleagues who sit on this side of the house and realizing that my words will not find favour with them, I still feel that a national emergency transcends the ordinary customs and usages of this parliament, an institution which was here long before I came and which will be here long after I go. These words of mine will contribute but a ripple to the parliamentary process.

The merits of the bill have, I believe, been fully canvassed by speakers from all parties. There can be no doubt that the measure is inadequate. We in this party have tried to remedy those inadequacies by means of an amendment. Having voted for an amendment designed to bring home to the government the weakness of this legislation, I might be accused of inconsistency if, the amendment having been defeated, I were to vote in favour of the bill.

But I am not much concerned about the parliamentary ploy or about formal parliamentary logic in this chamber. As I say, I believe the bill is inadequate. I believe the workers have a right to be concerned. I can understand the union leaders saying it is not acceptable. On the other hand, the only vehicle we have left following the defeat of the amendment is the bill which is now before the house and I believe the people of Canada want that vehicle to move.

This is a government bill. There may be problems in implementing it. If there are, they will be problems which the government of the day will have to face. I do not think that for the purposes of this bill we should be greatly concerned about the implementation of certain portions of it, the outcome of the conciliation procedures and so on.

In the circumstances I suppose the easy thing for me to do would be to abstain from voting. Mr. Speaker, the charge which this government has to face time after time is that it has abdicated its responsibility. I do not believe that by abstaining when the vote is called I would be discharging my personal responsibility. That is why I rise tonight to say in a few words why I am supporting this bill.

It has been said that caucus is sacrosanct and that you cannot break its rules unless you cross the floor of the house. I suggest this is not the case. There is not a single member in that caucus who voted for the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and very few members, I imagine, would want to vote for him after tonight. But the people of my riding have the right to know where I stand if, perhaps in a unique situation, I vote with the government on this occasion. I do not in this crisis as an opposition member accept the philosophy that the secrecy of caucus should shield my stand.

It has been suggested that the speaker tonight is playing Judas Iscariot to his party or to his leader. I came to this parliament as a party follower. But I also came here as a parliamentarian in my small way and I feel that the importance of this issue is such as to set aside these implications and transcend loyalty to party and to leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: What swayed me the most is something which happened today, the fact that we all received letters and telephone calls from interested parties, including union members, who, before any bill has been passed, are suggesting there is a real question whether or not it will be obeyed. Mr. Speaker, either the rail bill goes through or we have anarchy. In my view—and this is one of the fundamental reasons I am speaking tonight—a divided parliament at this time is an invitation to divide the country and is perhaps sowing the seeds of internal dissension among those who will be affected by this bill when it becomes law.

There have been those who have said it will not work and will not be followed. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is the government's responsibility. This is the only vehicle they have brought before us for ending the strike. We have condemned it in many ways. In fact we moved an amendment to it. If the bill fails then the government fails in discharging its responsibility, and I suggest, as did the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), in that event, and it would be most unfortunate to have such a chaotic situation in the country, that the government would have to resign for its failure to implement government policy.

There are others who are cynical and ask, "Why speak out? This is a bill that is going to pass anyway." But if speeches ever mean anything in this house this is one occasion when they should. If there ever was a time in a parliamentarian's life and, speaking personally, in my short parliamentary life, to speak from conviction and principle, it is now.

There are those who feel quite legitimately and very strongly that this bill usurps and negatively affects the workers' rights. There are also those who feel that the companies are too big. These are problems, but parliament in itself is not the collective bargaining forum. Mediation is to be established by virtue of the legislation before us. This is the course the government is following on this occasion, and with the conviction I have in my conscience I believe this is the time to speak out, to translate one's strength and courage behind the curtain to one's conviction in the chamber.

No one wanted the strike but we have the fact of a strike, and after all the wheat and chaff were sifted we were called here to resolve it. There are those who feel that the bill will not work and some have said, perhaps protesting too much, that union members may not be law-abiding. I think this bill leaves the workers as the underdogs. They have been the underdogs for many years, but I would hope the union leaders would be prepared to carry on for one more year or at least six months while conciliation and arbitration processes take their course as they have in the past.

I think that in many respects this parliament could be called a parliament of phantoms. In it there are potential leaders who shadow-box continuously, hesitant to take strong stands and lead rather than be led. I think the Munsinger, Spencer and other issues, which confused and confounded the public and brought disrespect on parliament, are but small seeds which grew out of the fact that all too often we are phantoms afraid to speak out.

In this strike situation this bill is the only vehicle we have to work with. I personally have resolved my conscience to the fact that there is a strike and that this is the bill with which the government hopes to settle the strike. We have the strike and we must resolve it, but my view runs counter to those who continually say parliament is supreme and who in the next breath worry whether this bill, when passed by parliament, will work and worry about what the men will do. In the light of the many telephone calls we are receiving with implied threats, and the letters, being placed before us before parliament acts, I suggest that those who, on the one hand, talk about parliamentary supremacy and, on the other, wonder whether parliament's decision will work are already admitting defeat. Surely parliament is still to govern even though at times its law, in the national interest, is unpalatable.

The principle upon which I stand tonight is that I still believe parliament is supreme, and when the chips are down, the dust settles and the debate ends, I hope the divisions will heal. I hope the responsible union men in this country will feel likewise, swallow yet another bitter pill and put up with another mediation process with the conciliation report as a guide which may bring much more to them than this bill provides.

It was for those few reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I felt I had to indicate why I am going to vote for this bill.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I listened with amazement to the eloquent speech made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand). I was amazed at how quickly, in a period of less than a year, the tiger of the labour movement has become the tame pussycat of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: The former president of the C.N.T.U. knows very well that what counts in a union contract is not the words spoken by the union leaders or the promises made by management representatives. What counts in a union agreement is the words which are spelled out in writing in the contract, just as what counts in a law passed by parliament is not the speeches made by ministers explaining the bill, or by members of the opposition or government supporters, but what is written into the law.

For the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to stand in this parliament and tell hon. members and the railway workers of Canada that there is a moral commitment that the workers will get at least an 18 per cent wage increase as a result of the bill is nonsense. And the minister, before he came into parliament, would have known it was nonsense.

It would be easy to attend here this week and not say anything. It would be easy to let this bill pass second reading. It would be easy not to propose any amendments in the committee stage and let the bill pass, as no doubt it will today or tomorrow. But, Mr. Speaker, we have a responsibility to ask ourselves what will happen then, and I want to say that I believe this country will face the greatest crisis it has ever faced in its history in peacetime.

Hon. members can read the newspapers as well as I can, can listen to the radio and watch television as well as I can, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) the other night, will the railway workers of Canada obey this law and go back to work, has in fact been answered and answered very clearly. It is now obvious that the passage of this bill today, tomorrow or Friday will not mean an end to the work stoppage. It is obvious that the strike will continue.

I think all hon. members have received copies of a letter written today to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) by the four top spokesmen of the railway unions involved in this dispute. Because they are honourable, because they are respectable, because they have always co-operated with parliament, with governments and with the people of Canada, and because they have seen their members' wages drop behind the wages of other workers, as I shall demonstrate in a few minutes, I think we ought to take their letter to the Prime Minister very seriously.- What do they say in the letter which was sent to the Prime Minister today? I wish to put it on the record:

A meeting of some 80 representatives of unions involved in the railway dispute this morning unanimously instructed us to inform you in the strongest possible terms that the legislation now before Parliament is totally unacceptable.

The position taken by this meeting was based on reports which we have received from all sections of the country. We feel our responsibilities, both to the workers we represent and to the country, very seriously. We ask that you and your colleagues give most serious consideration to making amendments which would make this legislation acceptable and avoid putting the railway workers of Canada in a position in which they are likely to ignore parliamentary action.

Yours Sincerely

It is signed by R. C. Smith, W. J. Smith, W. P. Kelly and T. W. Read.

The leaders of the railway unions know of what they speak because I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that just as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), who spoke just before I rose, has received calls and communications from his constituents who are railway workers, so also has every member of parliament who has railway workers in his constituency. I have before me a copy of a letter sent by the secretary of the Winnipeg strike committee of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks to their regional representative. I wish to put it on the record because it indicates very clearly what will happen if this legislation is passed. It is addressed to Mr. H. E. Duncan of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Western Canada Strike Committee:

Dear Sir and Brother,

Please be advised that the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks etc., Winnipeg Strike Committee, instruct you to convey the following message to our vice president, Bro. E. F. Downard.

"The local chairman representing the following lodges, 11, 49, 613, 629, 671, 1117 and 1487, which compose the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks etc., Winnipeg Strike Committee, are opposed to any directive from our grand lodge officers or the negotiating committee of the seven international associated non-operating railway unions which would return us to work under the pending legislation proposed by the federal government and which would not establish parity with the recent settlements made to the longshoremen and seaway workers".

Mr. Speaker, the intent of that letter is crystal clear. I suggest to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that the workers of Winnipeg are certainly not more militant than the workers in Montreal or Quebec. The railway workers of Winnipeg are disposed to ignore this legislation when it is passed and to stay out on strike. What will be the result? I do not have to tell members of parliament that if this strike is not resolved, and resolved quickly, millions of bushels of wheat which are stored on the prairies and must move to Vancouver and to the lakehead if we are to meet our export commitments will not move. I do not have to tell members of parliament that thousands of tons of nickel and copper which are being stored at Sudbury and Thompson and at other mines across Canada will not move and that lay-offs will begin in the next few days. I do not have to tell members of parliament that tons of paper and pulp products will be in a similar position. Announcements already have come from various parts of Canada to the effect that thousands of workers will be laid off in the next few days. The consequences of an illegal strike which may last weeks cannot be calculated.

Why are the railroad workers, who have always obeyed the law until today, so aggravated? Why are they so determined, determined to the point where they are making it clear they will ignore the law? It is not so many years ago that Mr. Frank Hall, the former leader of the railroad workers said—I am speaking from memory and may not be quoting him word for word although I think the general content is correct—"the law may be an ass but we will observe the law." What has changed? It is not difficult to know what has changed. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who has such a wonderful record—I want to change that—who had such a wonderful record as a militant, courageous, intelligent labour leader asks the workers of Canada to accept an agreement which gives them 6 per cent this year. What does that mean? It means 13.23 cents an hour. The newspaper columnists have had a field day. We have been told by that great columnist Lubor Zink that if the railway workers get what they want they will get an increase of $3,000 a year. The 13.23 cents an hour works out to $274.64 for this year. That is what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is asking the railway workers of Canada to accept. He is asking them to accept that when workers in unions which he represented have been able to secure increases of 30 to 40 per cent per annum.

I am not being critical of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I give him credit. But does he forget that his workers, the C.N.T.U. workers of Hydro-Quebec closed down the hydro for several months until they received an increase of I think 30 per cent in monetary benefits and another 10 per cent in fringe benefits? Does he forget that the steel workers in Hamilton yesterday ratified an agreement which gives them an increase over three years of 78 cents an hour, when their salaries already were substantially more than the wages paid to the railway workers? The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso), who I think was the chairman of the labour caucus of the Liberal party, and the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), in the face of the kind of increase which was gained yesterday by the steel workers have the gall to ask the railroad workers to go back for 13.23 cents an hour. Is it any wonder the railway workers are dissatisfied? Is it any wonder they are angry? Is it any wonder that the railroad workers in all likelihood will defy the law and continue with an illegal strike? I think the wonder is that they have not done so before now.

What do the railway workers about whom we are talking get? A myth has been created in this country that the railroad workers get fantastic amounts of money. The average wage among the 120,000 workers who are involved in the strike is $2.22 an hour. If any member of parliament wishes to use a pencil and calculate what the annual wage is, since the railroad workers work 40 hours a week he will see that the average wage of the workers concerned is $4,516 a year. Yet their demands are the demands which are unreasonable, the demands which if granted will breach the dike which we built against inflation. So this special legislation has to be passed.

I spoke of the average wage of the workers. I do not know whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration knows this, but some of the maintenance of way employees on the railways will receive in 1966, if we are going to pass legislation controlling their wages, the magnificent wage of $1.25 an hour. The only reason they get that much is because this parliament passed legislation requiring that minimum to be paid. How can we with any kind of justice, sense or compassion ask workers who are already being underpaid to accept this substandard agreement? What are these workers asking for in the way of an increase? They are asking that they be paid a wage based on a formula devised not by themselves but in the first instance by the railway companies and then by the conciliation board. This wage rate was based on the durable goods standard.

What does that standard involve? It involves a formula which, if used, would mean that the workers would be paid the same average wage as workers in other basic Canadian industries, including the steel, automobile and lumber industries. That is all the railway employees are asking the companies to provide.

If these workers were paid on the basis of the durable goods standard they would not receive the 18 per cent increase to which Mr. Justice Munroe referred. In this regard let me suggest that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did not know whether a 25 per cent increase would be fair because he felt that if someone proposed a 25 per cent increase someone else would raise that to 27 per cent. When he was a labour leader I am sure he read the documents prepared on behalf of the workers to explain their position. The 25 per cent figure comes from the durable goods standard as adjusted for the year 1966.

It must be made crystal clear that there is no mention in this bill of the 18 per cent figure referred to by Mr. Justice Munroe. He based that figure on his findings of 1964 when he adjusted the durable goods standard and reduced it by 7 per cent because of the inability of railway companies to pay the full amount. The suggestion that railway employees should be paid a fair wage rate on the basis of the adjusted durable goods standard is a suggestion based on a sound principle which deserves the support of every member of this house.

It may be that the government feels it cannot go that far, but I should like to ask why the government did not do what the Toronto Star, a responsible newspaper proposed, which would guarantee the railway workers an 18 per cent increase with the difference between 18 per cent and 25 per cent, as suggested by Mr. Justice Munroe, representatives of the railway unions and the conciliation board, to be negotiated at the bargaining table at a later date.

This is what was said in the Toronto Star in an editorial in the edition of Monday, August 29. I shall just quote two paragraphs:

> A liberal version of the "durable goods" formula—based on wages in the automobile, steel and furniture industries—would give the railwaymen an increase of 25 per cent over the next two years. A more conservative interpretation of it, by chairmen of two conciliation boards which sat on the current dispute, would yield 18 per cent.
> It seems obvious that the government offer will have to be in the higher part of this 18 to 25 per cent range in order to tempt the men to return to work.

Obviously the Prime Minister did not listen to that advice given by the Liberal Toronto Star.

Parliament is asked from time to time to be responsible. These workers are being asked to be law-abiding, reasonable and responsible. Let me pause for a moment to digress. Members of parliament talk about the responsibility of Canadian railway management. Let us consider what the Ottawa Citizen of today stated in this regard. The heading of the article is "The Railway Strike" and the subheading is "Workers Must Wake Up to Facts—Gordon". Let me suggest that it ill behooves the president of the C.N.R., who receives a salary of $75,000 a year, to lecture the workers of the C.N.R. who are making an average wage of $4,500 a year. Perhaps if we took a little of that $75,000 a year away from Mr. Gordon some of the fat would come off his belly. Similarly, the president of the C.P.R. receives a large salary, between $90,000 and $100,000 as reported by the C.P.R. to the security and exchange commission in Washington.

The Toronto Telegram yesterday quoted the president of the C.P.R. as saying that workers of the C.P.R. who might remain on strike after this legislation was passed would forfeit their pension rights. Surely that is not the way to settle a dispute. Surely that is not a reasonable appeal to workers to be law-abiding. That type of action is tantamount to waving a red flag in front of a bull and Mr. Sinclair ought to know better than that.

I have talked about the wages of railway workers and about wages paid to other workers and the increases other unions have been able to obtain. Generally workers in Canada in this day and age have a fair education and are able to read newspapers. Some of them even subscribe to the Financial Post. They know that while the companies for whom they are employed cry about how poor they are and how Canada is pricing itself out of the markets of the world as a result of the completely ridiculous demands of workers, the profits of these companies have never been as high as they are today.

Let me give a few illustrations showing the increases in profits received by some of these companies in recent years. The Imperial Oil Company had a profit after taxes of over $86 million, which represents a 26.8 per cent increase over its profits in 1962. Consolidated Mining and Smelting, which is owned as hon. members know by the C.P.R., made a profit of $53 million in 1965, which represented an increase of 130 per cent from 1962 to 1965. International Nickel made a profit of $143 million, which was an increase of over 52 per cent in the same three-year period. The Steel Company of Canada made a profit of over $43 million, an increase of 43 per cent in that three-year period. Those are the facts. That is why the workers of Canada, including railway employees, are demanding their just recompense from these industries. That is why the railway workers of Canada will not, in my opinion, go back to work even though parliament may pass this legislation.

Mr. Tardif: Is that what you are hoping for?

An hon. Member: Let them stay out.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: I resent that remark by the hon. member for Russell because any member of parliament who knows how close to the margin these workers live and who knows anything about working people would not suggest that they go out on strike. If workers go out on strike it is because they have come to the conclusion they have no alternative but to defend their elementary rights. If the hon. member for Russell does not believe me, he should have listened to the high-sounding and flowing oratory of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration before the supper hour. When it came to specifics the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did not say much, but about the general rights of workers the hon. member for Russell can learn a good deal from that minister, if he can learn from anything, and I have some considerable doubt about that.

An hon. Member: He would not learn anything from you.

Mr. Orlikow: We have here a bill which provides that by legislation the railway workers of Canada must go back to work. The railway workers asked in their negotiations for a pay increase and the bill provides for a pay increase of 6 per cent. I do not want to take up too much time in re-emphasizing what other members of this party have said, but there was no real collective bargaining because both the C.P.R. and C.N.R. refused from the beginning to offer a single cent. They refused from the beginning to make a single concession to the workers whom they employ.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is a group of workers, 22,000 of them, represented by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen who did not in their negotiations, and have not to this day, asked for a single penny more. They did ask that their collective agreements with the railway companies be amended to provide that there be written into those agreements clauses implementing the recommendations made by Mr. Justice Freedman with regard to the right of railway unions to have a say about material changes in the working conditions of the workers they represent. For those 22,000 workers who asked for implementation of the Freedman report there is not a single thing in this legislation except that under its terms they get a pay increase for which they did not ask. How ridiculous can this government be?

We heard some very fine words from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and the supposed Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), who has been conspicuous by his silence in this debate, although one would think that in a matter of labour-management relations this minister should be speaking for the government. We have heard some excellent speeches—I could almost say some excellent sermons—about the wonderful principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Freedman. But as usual, as is customary with the Liberal party, all we get are words.

This is not a new matter, Mr. Speaker. This matter was discussed in great detail by a parliamentary committee which met several years ago and brought in a unanimous report recommending action. This matter was gone into in great detail by Mr. Justice Freedman in the hearings he held after the illegal work stoppages carried out by railwaymen across Canada. After very extensive hearings and receiving representations from management and labour Mr. Justice Freedman made a report which has yet to be implemented by the government. Many statements have been made that the government is studying the report, giving it active consideration, favourable consideration, sympathetic consideration, and we are told that we will get action in the near future. I have the feeling that we will get action on the Freedman report, if it is left to this government, about as quickly as the people of Canada have had action on the medicare promises made by the Liberal party in 1919.

Not only did Mr. Justice Freedman hold hearings and make a report but there was a conciliation board headed by Mr. Justice Little. That conciliation board brought in a unanimous report. What did the conciliation board say? They said it was time the government passed legislation to spell out the rights of the employees in the railway industry to be consulted and to have a say about changes in working conditions which affect them in a material way. What action has been taken in regard to that report? We are told again that action will come. I suppose the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration could have told us that there is a moral commitment on the part of the government to take action in respect of this report. But moral commitments are not part of labour-management negotiations and agreements. Moral commitments can be, have been and will be ignored by railway management in the future as they have been in the past.

This bill is deficient in a very serious way because the government has refused to implement the very clear recommendations of Mr. Justice Freedman. I should like to read just one paragraph from the official summary of Mr. Justice Freedman's report as contained in a press release. I quote from page 3, paragraph 5:

> Assuming voluntary agreement between the parties is not possible for the purpose of giving effect to the commission's recommendation, legislation would be required. Either the Railway Act or the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act could be employed. If the latter were used it would be possible to provide, by an appropriate amendment, that any technological innovation, development, or change proposed by the employer which would materially and adversely affect the working conditions of the employees should either be deferred for negotiation at the next open period or be dealt with in the same way as if it were a provision falling within the scope of subsection (2) of section 22 of the act.

It would not be difficult, if the government had the will to do so, to include in the bill before us a clause spelling out these rights. But as usual the government, faced by the opposition of the railway companies, faced by the opposition of Mr. Gordon and Mr. Sinclair, has been afraid to act and has not acted. I said when I began my speech, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the railway workers of Canada will ignore this law and will continue their walk-out.

An hon. Member: That is what you wish.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Orlikow: I have not said that I wish it. I have said that in my opinion this is what will happen. I think it behooves the Prime Minister, and it is the responsibility of the government, to face up to this possibility which was spelled out pretty clearly, I think, in the letter to the Prime Minister I quoted earlier, signed by the leaders of the four railway unions.

If the railway workers stay out on strike, what can the government do? What will the government do? Will the government call in the troops? I see the former secretary of state nodding his head, apparently in approval and indicating that they will. Will that get the trains running? Will the government prosecute the workers? Can you send thousands of railway workers to prison? Is that what the government proposes? Is that what the government will do, a government in which we have the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who was president of the C.N.T.U., and the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) whose brother is secretary of the C.N.T.U.?

Less than two months ago the hospital workers of Montreal, who are affiliated with the C.N.T.U., were on strike. I suggest that that strike was as inconvenient and as serious for the people of Montreal as the railway strike will be for all the people of Canada. The Quebec government went to the courts of Quebec and got an injunction ordering the hospital workers to go back to work. That order was as much a part of the law of Canada as this legislation will be when it is passed today or tomorrow. The hospital workers of Montreal and their leaders in the C.N.T.U. ignored the injunction of the court until they got an agreement with which they felt they could live.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the problem and the crisis with which this government will confront the people of Canada by insisting on a bill whose provisions are considered by the railway workers of Canada as unfair and unjust, whose provisions they equate with class warfare and class injustice, and whose provisions I am sure they will ignore. I say that when that happens this country will be faced with mass civil disobedience.

I do not want to see that happen and I do not think it needs to happen. The railway workers of Canada have been law-abiding citizens. They want to continue to be law-abiding citizens but they are sick and tired of being second-class citizens. They want the same rights as every other worker in Canada, the same rights about which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration spoke so eloquently before the dinner hour. They want the same kind of wage rates that other workers in Canada have, and this bill, Mr. Speaker, completely fails to give them that.

I urge the Prime Minister and the government to amend this bill so that the agreement with which the railway workers of Canada are being asked to live by legislation will be an agreement whose terms and wage rates they can accept. If the Prime Minister does that, then there is still time to avoid what I believe will be the greatest crisis this country has ever faced.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member who has just spoken permit a question in view of his references to the durable goods standard? May I ask him whether he has read the reports of Mr. Justice Munroe and hon. Mr. Cameron in connection with these disputes?

Mr. Orlikow: I have read them. Let me begin by saying that it is good to see the Minister of Labour is still with us. He has been conspicuous by his silence during this debate. I have read Mr. Justice Munroe's report—

Mr. Nicholson: And also Mr. Justice Cameron's report?

Mr. Orlikow: —and Mr. Justice Cameron's report. I indicated during the course of my speech that I feel that what the railway workers of Canada are entitled to is not the durable goods standard about which Mr. Justice Munroe speaks and which he says would mean an 18 per cent increase but the adjusted durable goods standard referred to by the nominee of the railway unions on the conciliation board, Mr. Crow, which he estimates would mean a 25 per cent increase.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a second question? Has the hon. member forgotten that Mr. Cameron in his report cites as the authority for the durable goods standard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who spoke in the debate last night, and said on page 14 of his report:

> Mr. David Lewis, the nominee of the unions on the board concurred in the report—> —of the chairman and in the report of his additional observations stated in part as follows:

This is from the the 1958 report.

> "I do not ignore the evidence of the differences between the railways and durable goods industries, so fully and properly set out and commented upon by the chairman in his report."

I will skip a few lines. It then continues:

> "In view of the history concerning the question of an appropriate standard of comparison it would be highly regrettable if the unions were asked or forced to abandon the durable goods standard."

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Minister of Labour that that lecture should not have been given to me because I believe in the durable goods standard but should have been given to Mr. Donald Gordon who, having first proposed the durable goods standard, went away from it as soon as the conciliation board accepted it in principle. Since then he has been talking about every other kind of standard but the durable goods standard. I want to say that it was after 1958 and after the hon. member for York South sat on that board that Mr. Justice Munroe amended his concept of what constituted the durable goods standard.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I intend to intervene only briefly in this debate and I rise on this matter because I come from a constituency which has a particular interest in this work stoppage as it seriously interferes with one of its main industries. The soft fruit industry has been fairly successful this year following a year of natural disaster in which the industry had a very poor crop. It would be a most unfortunate situation for those in that industry if in this following year they now had a man-made disaster that denied them a return on their work and their crop.

We have heard a great deal about letters that have been sent to the various members of parliament and I know that other representations have been made not only from my constituency but from other areas clear across this country that are caught in the same kind of squeeze. They are reminding us that the task for which we were called together was to see that the railways resumed operations.

I would like to remind some of the speakers who have participated in this debate that caught between the big unions, the big companies and big government are millions of small Canadians who stand to suffer a great deal if this strike is continued for any length of time. It is not only the soft fruit industry that will face hardship but also any constituency with an agricultural base or with a tourist or lumber industry.

The effects of the strike cannot be allowed to continue for any length of time. I know that the railway workers have legitimate complaints. We have heard of them in many of the addresses that have been given. I know for example, that the inability, in spite of all the talk in this house, to restore the Dominion train on the C.P.R. has probably left them with less faith in this institution than they had before. Nevertheless I think the situation, bad as it is, has been made worse by the sort of misrepresentation of the terms of the bill which has taken place in this house in the last days. I think this is one of the things that the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) referred to, and I should like to congratulate him for having the courage to make the speech he did this evening.

I do not intend to take any great length of time. We in the Social Credit party are concerned about the economy of this country and the need to get the railways running. We feel that the figures mentioned in the bill are interim figures. We feel that the bill contains provision for mediation and, if necessary, for arbitration, and that the figures it contains by no means represent what will be attained when the dispute is finally settled.

Though we will vote for second reading of the bill we intend to move an amendment to clause 6 when we go into committee on the bill which will write into it the additional figures of 4 per cent, plus 6 per cent referred to in the conciliation report. We feel that the bill could spell out a little more clearly the moral commitment that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration expressed in his address earlier. It is our intention to support the bill on second reading and to move the amendment I have mentioned in the committee stage.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am interested to find a number of people here who are greatly concerned about everybody else in the country except the railway workers. I realize that the people the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) represents are very likely to feel strongly about this matter. I also realize that the prairie wheat farmers are likely to feel the effect of the situation. But I should be much more impressed if representatives of those bodies of workers were to be found in Ottawa standing shoulder to shoulder with the railway workers demanding that this government treat the railway workers with fairness, because they should realize that the railways of Canada are as much part of the equipment of their farms as the equipment used on their fruit farms—their combines or tractors—or the equipment used on prairie wheat farms. They have as much responsibility as anybody else to make sure that that railway equipment operates satisfactorily.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that no one who will look with an objective eye at the wage scales of the railway workers, which have been placed on record in this house and have been revealed in hearing after hearing, can have any doubt whatever that railway workers in Canada have not been getting an adequate living standard. What have they been offered? We were told today by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that the government has a moral obligation to see that the workers will eventually get 18 per cent. What does this mean? Does this mean that the arbitrators who are mentioned in the bill are merely to be puppets of this government and that this government will tell them what they are to do? Or does it mean, Mr. Speaker, that the care exercised by this government not to include the 18 per cent in the bill was intended to make quite sure that 18 per cent should be the ceiling and not the floor? There seems to be no other interpretation that can be placed upon the matter.

We listened to an eloquent speech before supper. It was probably the most eloquent speech this house has ever heard. I wish I were capable of similar eloquence, but it was the saddest speech that I ever heard. Because, Mr. Speaker, what did we hear? We heard the great Minister of Citizenship and Immigration telling the railway workers to go back to work with 6 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He was deciding that railway workers could carry the load for the rest of the workers of Canada.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It was the saddest thing I have ever heard in this house. I heard a potentially great man bogged down in the muskeg of the Liberal party. "There have been moral commitments," I heard, Mr. Speaker. "Moral commitments." As my colleague from York South pointed out when he spoke, the railways of Canada—

Mr. Marchand: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think that is a complete misrepresentation of what I said.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, is it possible to misrepresent the minister when he is standing up in support of a bill that says precisely that, and when he is saying what he is saying as a member of the government? Is that misrepresentation? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the minister was trying to misrepresent what he said—

Mr. Marchand: Read the bill.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We have read the bill, and we do not need any double-talk about moral obligations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all members of this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will both hon. gentlemen sit down, please. The Minister of Labour rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: I rise on a question of privilege that affects every member of this house. I would ask the hon. gentleman who has just been speaking to find anywhere in this act a reference to 6 per cent. He has been challenged on that. Six per cent is not mentioned in the bill. It begins with 4 per cent. It is 4 per cent and later it will be 8 per cent. I point this out because I think that the hon. member asked for the record to be kept straight.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I assume that the Minister of Labour is capable of doing simple arithmetic.

An hon. Member: Are you?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If he will use simple arithmetic he will find that the increase over the year, with a 4 per cent increase starting in January and a 4 per cent increase starting now, more than half way through the year, comes, at a generous estimate, to 6 per cent. If he does not know that I suggest he had better learn his arithmetic again. Really, my life is too short; I have not enough years left to try to educate these cabinet ministers. That is a great undertaking anyway.

My colleague from York South yesterday pointed out that the railways of Canada are a public service upon which every citizen in Canada depends. No one can disagree with that. But I want to put this to you, Mr. Speaker. Have you and I and other citizens of Canada the right to demand that this public service shall carry on at the expense of those who work in the operation of it? Because this is what we are asking today. Do you feel you are going to rest easily with your conscience when you remember what was told to you this afternoon by the only man in this house with personal experience of railway operations. You did not have the courtesy to listen to him, but he told you of workers, married men with children, who are getting less than $300 a month and whose wages will be increased by this formula by some $200 a year. Are you going to feel very happy about that? Will you feel very happy about that because of the great public need to have this transportation service in operation?

I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of the story that is told of the bishops of the Anglican church in the House of Lords in Britain. They were trying to do away with child labour and with having children clean chimneys. The bishops said, "If we do away with this child labour, who will clean our chimneys"?

You are saying: "Let our railway workers starve; otherwise who will transport our goods?" That is what you are saying when you refuse to give them the sort of living standard that Canadian workers have a right to expect.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sick and tired of economic illiterates standing in their places and prating of the dangers of inflation from wage increases. I am sick and tired of people with axes to grind who manage to use economic illiterates—and we have many of them reporting the proceedings of this house—to spread the idea that increases in wages cause inflation when, as anyone who has any knowledge of the subject knows, it is not increases in wages that cause inflation; it is the frustration of that intention to redistribute wealth which demands of wage increases amount to that causes inflation. If those who are in charge of our industries were prepared to allow real wage increases to take place, and not to frustrate them immediately by actions which depreciate the monetary value of those increases which are granted, there would be no danger of inflation. It is simpler to blame the worker, and for simple-minded people it is very simple to do that.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is time we looked at the whole question of the relationship between the distribution of wealth in Canada and inflation. I suggest to you, sir, that while it is true that no wage increase ever yet caused inflation, on occasion perhaps some wage increases, I grant you, may cause a maldistribution of wealth. However, you cannot correct that until you have convinced the Canadian workers that everyone in this country is paying his full share into the national pot from which all of us draw our sustenance.

I want to suggest to hon. members opposite that when you are through with your panic, when you have stopped being frightened that the railroads might not run for a few weeks, you will have to sit at home and justify yourself for having forced these workers back to work at a miserly increase. This will have been done because you were afraid, because your government was frightened by the two big, fat gentlemen I saw in the corridor this afternoon. These are the people who have frightened the government and frighten the government much more than some poor little railroad worker getting $280 per month. He would not frighten anybody, even in the mass, until he decides to act in conjunction with others. Then he frightens everybody.

Everybody gets in a panic. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come in this country when we have to deal with the whole question of the distribution of wealth and not deal with it on an ad hoc basis as each crisis occurs. We have to decide, for instance, about the railroads. They are a public necessity. I do not know what they would cost but I know that they can be operated only if those who work on them have a decent, living wage. I do not know what that would cost, but I am not concerned. If it is $200 million, $300 million or $500 million, that is the price we have to pay. I suggest that this government had better summon the courage to see that these funds are available. When they have done that, I suggest they take a further step and not leave it to the heads of the railway companies to handle these funds because they might find, for instance, that the Canadian Pacific's share had been shovelled into that handy hip pocket known as Canadian Pacific Investments into which the directors pour so much that it is now the third largest in Canada and into which the directors of Canadian Pacific have poured the pension fund on which Mr. Sinclair has said the workers are not going to be allowed to draw.

I suggest this government should have the courage to take steps to provide the money to see that there is a decent livelihood available for everyone engaged in this essential public service. They should take further steps also to see that they have control of the way in which the money is expended. This is the only way in which you are going to persuade the railway workers they are getting a fair deal. This is the only way you are going to persuade workers all across our country that they are getting a fair deal.

I say this to the trade unions. It is time they took another look at their function. It is time they realized they should embark on new functions, new duties. They should have a share in the decision making and accept a share of the responsibility for the operation of the industries whose decisions they have helped to make. This must be done if we are going to have political and economic peace in this country. We will not get it by this sort of business, this business of ramming a bill through in panic, terrified that the House of Commons may take an extra hour in dealing with it, otherwise the economic roof would fall in. Some of us might not be able to take that trip or perhaps some shipment will be held up. It is better to send the workers back to work at $280 per month than to have that happen.

You and I and our fellow citizens are the ones who will have to foot this bill, and we should be made to foot this bill by a government with some courage. I am convinced, sir, that if the Prime Minister could summon enough courage to lock his door to Messrs. Gordon and Sinclair for a while and, speaking bluntly to the Canadian people, tell them that in order to operate this essential rail service it is going to cost them so many millions of dollars and therefore they are going to pay that many more millions in taxes, he would have the support of every right-thinking Canadian.

Those are the things that we should be considering in this house rather than ramming through legislation in a panic. I do not know whether the workers are going to go back to work. I would think it doubtful myself, but perhaps they will. However, if they do go back to work they will go back with a festering sore in the heart of the labour movement of Canada. If you think this is the end of the story, you are deluding yourself because this same situation will come back again and again to haunt us. We have to face this issue. We have to realize it is not good enough to say we must get the railways back into operation.

It is not good enough to put the railways into operation unless those who are doing the work are getting a living of which you and I can be proud, not ashamed as we must be tonight. I would urge the Prime Minister when he speaks, as I understand he is to do in closing this debate, to give us some indication that he has some realization of the dangers and pitfalls that lie ahead. It has always seemed to me that we have in this house two experts in the creation of chaos. I have been in this house quite a long time, and the sad part of it is that most of the worst mistakes and bumblings of our Prime Minister stem from his amiable, human qualities, human qualities that unfortunately the leader of a country cannot afford. In fact, I should like to put it in blunt, rude terms that a Prime Minister has to be capable on occasion of being a bastard. It is unfortunate that our Prime Minister is unable to be that particular sort of person. I might say in passing that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) does not suffer from that disability. It is a sad thing, and I say this in all sincerity. I know, I have a fellow feeling for the Prime Minister.

It is difficult to take decisions that are going to create antagonism. It is difficult because all of us want to put off decisions; all of us hope that somehow our troubles will go away. They do not. It does not matter if our troubles do not go away, but it matters tragically if the troubles of a Prime Minister do not go away because they come back to haunt him and the unhappy people he leads.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to begin, Mr. Speaker, by thanking my hon. friend who has just preceded me for giving me such amiable and eloquent advice. I can assure him that at least I am quite aware of the fact that problems are not just going to go away and that there are lots of pitfalls ahead. I will do my best to deal with them in a way which perhaps will not satisfy him but may at least not destroy that amiable relationship which he has with me personally.

I feel it necessary in closing this debate to make as clear as I can the purposes and objectives of the government in submitting this legislation to the House of Commons. The legislation has been given the examination it deserves over the last few days. We have seldom had legislation dealing with a more critical matter in peacetime than that which is now before us, the second reading of which we shall soon be deciding.

As I say, I wish to set out as clearly as I can, and as unprovocatively and objectively as I can, the purposes and objectives we had in mind in this legislation and in the policy which is responsible for this legislation. I think it is important to do this, Mr. Speaker, because of misinterpretations which have been given—as I believe them to have been misinterpretations—and wrong interpretations which have been made—as I believe them to have been wrong—with respect to the meaning of the legislation and its clauses, which in my view could have the effect of misleading and confusing those who under this bill would be required to resume their duties.

Whatever we may think about the principles and purposes of this legislation it is of the most vital importance that those who are concerned directly by it should know exactly what they are being asked to do and why they are being asked to do it by this parliament which represents all the Canadian people. That is if the bill secures second reading; if it does not, that is a very different matter and the measure before us disappears and, no doubt, the government with it.

I believe these misinterpretations I have mentioned are especially misleading with regard to the wage figures in the bill for 1966 which have been put forward as indicating that these are somehow the final figures, the final increase that these 120,000 men affected by the legislation can secure in the next two years.

Let me mention, Mr. Speaker—and I intend to be brief this evening—the objectives of the government in putting forward this legislation. The first, of course—and this is the reason we are here—is to get the railways into operation again with the least possible delay. Believe me, this is not our only problem in regard to railways. It has been pointed out during this debate that there are many things behind this particular emergency which must be dealt with, the importance of which has been underlined by the emergency itself. And it is possible both nationally and internationally in a period of crisis to do things one could not otherwise do for years when the urgency is not there, and perhaps we shall be able to move faster and farther in making certain changes in economic and labour legislation generally than we could have had we not been faced with the necessity of dealing with this emergency now. I hope so.

The second objective is to assure the workers of an immediate increase in wages retroactive to January 1, 1966, not a final settlement but an immediate increase, provisional and tentative, to be adjusted by processes laid down in the legislation. I recognize, and I am sure all members in the house recognize, that the railway workers, to whom this country has owed so much ever since this country was formed and the first railways were built, are entitled to an increase in their wages. There is no difference of opinion about that.

Mr. Pearson: The third objective is to interfere as little as possible with the normal process of free collective bargaining notwithstanding the emergency we face which has resulted in parliament intervening in this matter. I admit that much of this so-called process of free collective bargaining in recent years between the railways and their employees has been, as I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) described it, a kind of ritualistic dance. I know this is true, and this is one of the things we shall have to do something about. We have been saying so for a long time. Nevertheless the principle itself of free collective bargaining is worth affirming, even in this situation.

The fourth objective is to ensure that any agreement arrived at by the intervention of parliament through legislation, a procedure which is adopted only as a last resort, will be fair and reasonable to the workers affected by it and, of course, to the railways as well. As far as the first objective is concerned, parliament is being asked in this bill to order the railways to resume operations, and direct the employees to resume their duties.

Next, provision is made for an immediate provisional and interim increase in wages. The government did not feel, Mr. Speaker, that either the government itself or parliament should set the standard even for an interim increase, though I believe this was done in 1950. We felt that some objective, judicial standard must be followed and that is why we decided to ask parliament to provide for an immediate provisional increase for 1966 of 8 per cent, 4 per cent to be effective on January 1, 1966 and 4 per cent to be effective on July 1, 1966.

Why did we select those figures? We did so because they are to be found in the reports of the chairmen of two of the conciliation boards, Mr. Justice Munroe, and the chairman of the only other conciliation board which made a report on these matters, Mr. Justice Cameron. We made this selection because of the long experience and high repute of the gentlemen who made these recommendations, their experience in making determinations of this kind, which I think has won the approval and respect of all who have had anything to do with this question. We selected these figures for 1966 also because on previous occasions when parliament has been obliged to intervene the reports of conciliation boards have been accepted as a basis for action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we could have put the whole of the wage recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe and Mr. Justice Cameron in the bill, the wage recommendations for 1966 and 1967. We did not do that, Mr. Speaker, after a great deal of consideration, because of our third objective which was to reduce legislative determination of a specific wage figure to the minimum required for fairness to those concerned with the processes of collective bargaining.

When we made this decision, 1967 was four months away. The legislative provision for 1967 would not have come into operation for another four months and we felt, and very sincerely felt, that it would be better and more advantageous to the employees themselves to have a further opportunity for bargaining before a legislative determination for a future year should be made. I confess quite freely that one cannot be too optimistic about the results of such collective bargaining in the light of the experience of the past with which we are all familiar, but we felt the right to bargain further should not be denied to the parties and we still can hope for results in the form of an agreement by negotiation.

Reference was made earlier this evening, and I thought a rather unpleasant reference, to the fact that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) had not been around much and had not taken part in this debate. Normally the Minister of Labour would have taken a very active part in this debate, and I would have been very happy indeed if he had been able to wind up the discussion on second reading. But the Minister of Labour was asked by the government to mediate in this matter from August 22 on and he has been doing that. As I pointed out in my first intervention in this debate, this mediation has been going on while discussions were taking place in the house. It is still going on and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is very heavily engaged in that work of mediation and, being a mediator, did not see it as an appropriate course for him to take an active part in what was bound to be a very controversial debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Our fourth objective, and this is as important as the others, in the long run perhaps the most important, was to make sure, as far as we could make sure, that any settlement reached would be fair and reasonable to the parties. We believed in the light of experience, in the light of the fact that we had specified the Munroe award for 1966, and again I repeat in the light of experience in past years, that there would be no doubt in anyone's mind who knew anything about this experience that any arbitrator would provide no less for 1967 than the Munroe award for that year.

In other words, we had no doubt that the total increase over the two year period would be less than the 18 per cent reached in the four instalments recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and Mr. Justice Cameron. Since we had ourselves asked parliament to say that the men were entitled immediately to what Mr. Justice Munroe recommended for 1966—and that of course can be adjusted by the mediator as well as any figure for 1967—we felt sure, and we still feel sure, that no arbitrator would settle the matter for less than Mr. Justice Munroe recommended for 1967.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that though we thought other people would also understand this it has been misunderstood by many—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —due in large part to interpretations given and representations made as to the meaning of this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I think it is regrettable that these misunderstandings should exist, and undoubtedly they do exist across the country from coast to coast among workers who are on strike.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Pearson: I have indicated one reason, because of the interpretation made—I have not even said misinterpretation—and because of the representations made—I have not even said misrepresentations—an impression has been created which is not based on the facts of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we should clear up these misunderstandings, and I am sure we will when we come to the committee stage of the bill.

There are two other matters I should bring to the attention of the house because a great deal of attention has been devoted to them in the debate. We have been criticized for including a provision in this bill, even though it is a qualified provision, for compulsory arbitration. As I have just said, it is not possible to be overly optimistic about the results of mediation, although we hope the result will be good, and therefore we put a provision in the bill for alternative arbitration. We did this in the exact terms of the 1958 bill passed by the previous government, something which was made clear last night by my hon. friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). But we did add protection against arbitrary action by order in council through specific provisions in the legislation for review by the House of Commons and reversal if the House of Commons so decided.

It has been insisted by some hon. members, including the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), that the provision for arbitration makes mediation meaningless. I am not as pessimistic about this as he is because experience—and this has been mentioned in the debate—has proven that is not necessarily so. There have been two cases where provision was made for arbitration, one by writing it into the bill itself and one by making provision for arbitration in the bill subject to government action.

In one case in 1950 mediation failed and arbitration was used. In the other case, 1958, arbitration was not required even though in that situation the interim award given was much less than that which had been recommended by mediators before the government stepped in. So the record does not bear out the pessimistic conclusion of my hon. friends who are opposed to this legislation and say that arbitration will make mediation meaningless.

I should add that in the case where arbitration was used, in 1950, the provisional wage increase in the legislation was not merely confirmed but was increased.

Mr. MacEachen: From 4 cents to 7 cents.

Mr. Pearson: I believe that our qualified and protected provision for arbitration will introduce into this legislation a desirable element of decision, of finality, which I think is very important.

• (8:40 p.m.)

If we did not have the arbitration provision and if mediation did fail, what could we do? We would be exactly where we are now. Parliament would have to be called into session again or if parliament were sitting parliament would be asked to consider new emergency legislation to deal with the situation created by the failure of mediation, and we would have to go through this all over again. So, Mr. Speaker, I think we were not ill advised to put into the legislation in the circumstances the provisions which we did put in for arbitration if mediation fails.

A good deal has been said in this debate, and quite rightly, about the Freedman recommendations and the relation of those recommendations and the references to them in the conciliation board reports to the legislation before us. The Freedman report makes very clear—I referred to this in my first statement—that this is a difficult, complicated and far-reaching question with wider implications than for any single industry.

The recommendations of Judge Little's reports in this matter I think are very significant and very important because in those recommendations—and so far as I know this is the first time there has been this kind of agreement—there appears to be agreement between the representatives of the railways and the representatives of the unions that there should be negotiations between industry and labour before technological changes which have an important effect upon employment are put into operation. That is an important principle and we must implement that principle. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is an objective which we must do our best to achieve.

Judge Little went on to say this. I have quoted these words before but they are important enough to repeat:

> We trust that, when the ultimate decision is made in this regard, those making it will bear in mind the broad implications which it will undoubtedly have for many industries and commodities and will accordingly look beyond the interests of the parties hereto and the mere settlement of one industrial dispute.

In this connection I have mentioned already that the Department of Labour has been investigating the Freedman commission recommendations so as to be able to make a report to the government in respect of how and why they should be implemented or not implemented in their entirety. I had that report placed on my desk this afternoon. I hope that within a few days the government will have an opportunity to discuss it and decide how we can most quickly bring it before parliament.

I would also point out—I know hon. members know this—that there has been a committee of the Economic Council consisting of labour and employer representatives investigating the subject of technological change and unemployment. This committee will be reporting to a national council on labour-management relations early in November which is being called by the Economic Council to deal specifically with the effect upon employment of technological change. Therefore progress is being made in this matter. In the mediation, and if required in the arbitration provided for in this legislation, this is one of the matters which should be considered along with wage settlements and other matters. I hope it will be considered and I hope that further progress may be made as a result of that consideration.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, those are the objectives we had in mind in putting this legislation through the house. I have no reason to be defensive about this legislation, and I am not. In the circumstances I think it is a good bill for the purposes it is meant to serve. But I know, of course, that it is not perfect legislation, and there have been some suggestions made during this debate which undoubtedly will be considered in committee. I hope as a result of the consideration which we will be giving to this bill in committee shortly that we can make good legislation even better. I hope we can all rally around the kind of bill which comes out of the committee, even if it is not satisfactory to all members of the house, and it will not be, because when this legislation passes it will be the will of the parliament of Canada and if it is the will of the parliament of Canada I know the law-abiding citizens of Canada, as they always have done in the past, will obey it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the right hon. gentleman a question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question with reference to his statement that the railway workers apparently had been misinformed regarding the true facts in this bill. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether, in meeting with the leaders of the railway workers, he has explained fully the bill and if so why is it, according to the letter they sent today, that they still seem to be dissatisfied with the legislation?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the railway leaders are misinformed about this bill. I think they understand it. They may not be satisfied with it but I think they understand it. However, I believe there are a great many people in this country who do not understand it and who have been misinformed about it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a further question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister permit a further question? I of course will sit down if he will not.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Brewin: He apparently is a little more polite than some of his supporters.

Mr. Monteith: That is obvious.

Mr. Brewin: The Prime Minister has said that in the committee stage it will be possible to clarify the misunderstanding which he says exists as to the intent of the bill. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether an amendment will be introduced by the government in the committee stage?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, the Prime Minister has concluded the debate. It seems to me that the hon. member is not asking a question but rather is continuing the debate which I assume has been concluded.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, what I want to know and what I think the members of the house want to know, in order to help them decide how to vote on this measure, is whether it is regarded as possible by the government that an amendment may be brought in guaranteeing, as part of this law, that the recommendations of the conciliation chairmen will be included in the final settlement as a floor below which the decision of the board of arbitration cannot fall?

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Pearson) which was agreed to on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Charlotte who is sick.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. Pursuant to standing order 78 (1) clause 2 of the bill will now be considered.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few general observations on the subject. When I spoke earlier I said that so far as Her Majesty's loyal opposition was concerned we wanted the matter brought to a vote at the earliest possible date. We have followed that course throughout—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I heard the right hon. gentleman correctly when he said that on clause 2 he proposed to make general remarks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. McIlraith: If I heard him correctly I think the situation is that the rules provide for general remarks to be made on clause 1.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the minister is not suggesting that general remarks on this question are not to be allowed? Surely he is not taking that view now?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not mean to restrict the right hon. gentleman. I was drawing his attention to the fact that he began by stating something which is directly contrary to the rules and to the practice which has been followed in the house since the rules were amended. I respectfully drew his attention to that fact so as to find out what he had in mind, because the rules are explicit on the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I draw your attention to the amazing propensity which the hon. gentleman invariably reveals when he is afraid of argument—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want to do something to make this monstrosity work.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want to make suggestions regarding the bill in general and the minister is not going to throttle the committee. Let that be clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Let us obey the rules.

Mr. McIlraith: I was not attempting to throttle the committee. Far from it. I was attempting very respectfully to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman, who has been in this house for exactly the same length of time as I have, to the rules and practice of this house which I hope he would not wish to deliberately flout.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: I was very respectful to the high office he holds in this house, as may be judged from the form in which I drew his attention to this matter, but if he is going to become abusive I would respectfully, Mr. Chairman, ask for a ruling on the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman raised the question immediately I began to speak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, are the trained seals in full howl?

The Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My purpose in rising, until interrupted by the hon. gentleman, was to make some suggestions. If Your Honour wishes to rule against any argument being advanced I will await that ruling.

The Chairman: I must refer the committee to standing order 78(1) which reads as follows:

> In proceedings in committee of the whole house upon bills, the preamble is first postponed, and if the first clause contains only a short title it is also postponed; then every other clause is considered by the committee in its proper order; the first clause (if it contains only a short title), the preamble and the title are to be last considered.

I was not a member of the committee which drew up this standing order, but I am informed that the intention of the committee was that consideration in committee should begin with clause 2 and that any general discussion should take place subsequently on clause 1.

May I also refer the committee to standing order 59(2) which states:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to understand what you have in mind because I see that under clause 2(1)(a) we are going to deal with the following:

> "collective agreement to which this act applies" means a collective agreement between a railway company and a union that expired on December 31, 1965, the renewal or revision of which was the subject of proceedings before a conciliation board the report of which was received by the Minister of Labour in July or August, 1966.

Is Your Honour ruling that we cannot discuss the collective agreement in a general way? Are we to be placed in the position where the government is afraid of argument and intends to apply closure in this way on a matter of transcendent importance to the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am amazed that the minister in question, the government house leader, should have raised this matter. What are they afraid of? A discussion of a collective agreement? What is the reason for the objection?

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I want to repeat that apparently the right hon. gentleman did not hear my remarks. He started his remarks by saying he wanted to engage in a general discussion of the bill and I respectfully drew his attention to the rules of the house. He is now attempting to discuss clause 2, and so long as he discusses this clause, which is quite wide as he will observe—I am glad he has now read it—that is another matter. But I did feel it my duty as house leader in this somewhat difficult matter that is of the utmost urgency—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are trying to block discussion.

Mr. McIlraith: —to raise this point in order to permit the right hon. gentleman to correct the error of his opening remarks which were in direct contravention of the rules and practices of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the government house leader spoke on a question of privilege. I think it should have been on a point of order, and I would like to speak on a point of order relating to the matter he first raised. Since he and I have been in this house it has been the practice in the house to permit general discussion on the first clause of a bill in committee.

Mr. Byrne: There have been changes.

Some hon. Members: Shut up and listen.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: I am perfectly well aware that I said the first clause of a bill in committee. The first clause of this bill to come before the committee is clause 2.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: The new rule makes no reference to limitation of general discussion on the first clause to be taken up in committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends do not agree with that or they would not laugh again in that unrestrained and stupid manner in which they laughed a moment ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Fulton: I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that if it had been intended to change the practice and custom of the house the rules would have made it clear that that change was intended.

Mr. Byrne: What does that mean?

Mr. Fulton: It simply means that instead of taking up clause 1 of the bill first in committee we take up clause 2, but the new rule says nothing about changing the practice and custom of the house in permitting a general discussion on the first clause of the bill to be taken up in committee. As the Leader of the Opposition himself has pointed out, in this case, as is the case in many bills, it so happens that clause 2 is quite a general clause.

Mr. McIlraith: Then he can discuss it very fully and widely.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend is agreeing that it is a general clause and a general discussion may be permitted. If that is the case, what are we arguing about? Is the government attempting to limit discussion on this clause? This is all we are trying to establish.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, unless you rule first that the new standing orders, which are silent upon the point, have changed the custom of the house with respect to general discussion on the first clause to be taken up in committee—and you have to make that specific ruling—and unless, second, you say this clause is so limited that there can be no general discussion, then surely it is open to the Leader of the Opposition to make general remarks on the subject matter of the bill. I suggest that if hon. members opposite will restrain their rude laughter we will make much more progress than with the present attitude they are displaying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with a completely different matter. I am not entering into the discussion that has taken place. I would like to ask the right hon.—

Mr. Olson: I would like to speak on the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Kamloops.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Olson: I would like to say that I have no disagreement at all—

Mr. Fulton: The point of order was raised by the government house leader.

Mr. Olson: I have no disagreement with the Leader of the Opposition entering into a discussion on collective agreements because that is part of clause 2 but, Mr. Chairman, I think that the statement of the hon. member for Kamloops must be challenged when he says that under the practice of the house the first clause considered by the committee, provides an opportunity for general discussion on the whole bill. When the committee on procedure considered this matter and its recommendations were adopted by the house, the provision that is now contained in the new standing order 78 was put there for the precise purpose of preventing repetition, on the first clause of a bill, of the debate that had just taken place on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: When you couple the provisions of standing order 78 with the provisions of standing order 59, as the Chairman has just done, it is certainly clear that it was intended to mean, and I think it does mean, that there shall not be a repetition of the same debate that was concluded on second reading.

I do not want to say any more than that, but I thought it was necessary to remind hon. members in this instance that these changes were made for the purpose of preventing repetition of debate. As I say, I can see no valid objection to the Leader of the Opposition entering into a broad discussion respecting collective agreements because this clause deals with a collective agreement, but in my view that does not include a general discussion of all the other clauses in the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, if we remember well, this is a new standing order intended to begin consideration of a bill with clause 2, and enabling us at the end, to revert to clause 1 and to the preamble of the bill, as you explained, a while ago, and I sincerely believe that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) knows the standing order very well. I think the Leader of the Official Opposition should adhere to the rule as every other member of the house here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: He may, during consideration of clause 2, argue about collective bargaining as much as he likes; however, he cannot, as he said at the beginning of his remarks, enter in a general discussion of the bill or of the principle of Bill No. C-230.

Opportunity to do that will be given to him at the end when we revert to clause 1 and to the preamble of the bill. However, in the circumstances, I think that the house leader of the government is perfectly right, and the Leader of the Opposition knows it well. He cannot blame the government in the circumstances. He has to adhere to the standing order agreed to by the house as every member should do, regardless of their political affiliation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (10:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, apart altogether from the arguments made by the hon. member for Kamloops, I should like to refer Your Honour to the fact that clause 2 of this bill is an interpretation section, and I think a very cursory examination will disclose that the very terms defined and referred to are contained, I would suggest, in every clause of the bill which we are considering. Despite any ruling which you, sir, may see fit to make in respect of the first part of the argument, I would suggest to you with great respect that it would be almost impossible in examining clause 2 not to be free to deal with and discuss any part of the bill.

If the government had chosen to rely on its interpretation of the rule, clause 2 might have become clause 3, but being where it is I submit that Your Honour would find it very difficult indeed to close off the most general argument and discussion on this bill.

The Chairman: Order. May I refer hon. members to the Journals of the house for the year 1964-65 and to the report of the committee on standing orders presented to the house on Wednesday, October 7, 1964:

> Your Committee believes that it would be more appropriate for the first clause of a bill, when it contains only a short title, to be considered by the committee of the whole house after the other clauses have been considered rather than at the beginning of the committee stage. It also believes that this would make it less difficult to apply to the debate on such a clause the rule of relevancy set out in Standing Order 59(2).

As I said to the committee before, I was not a member of that committee and have no knowledge of what its intention was. But even if I did have such knowledge I must be guided by what is referred to me by the house. I read to the committee standing order 78 and also standing order 59(2), and I state again that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in commencing, my statement was to the effect that I intended to deal generally with this matter. There is no way in which a member can deal with the subject of the collective agreement referred to in clause 2(1) (a) other than to discuss generally the bill and its effect. I am amazed by the attitude of the government in endeavouring to prevent the opposition placing before the house and the country suggestions regarding the conciliation board report which will make this bill workable. That is what we set out to do in order to bring about a return to work.

The government has now commenced to realize the fact that the monstrosity it produced is in grave danger, if enacted into legislative form, of being ineffectual and inoperative. From the very beginning we took the stand in the face of the serious crisis facing Canada that we wanted to have the government realize that this bill in its entire form will not bring about, with that certainty which we expect and hope for, the object desired by all of us.

As I listened to the Prime Minister this evening I could not but conclude even he is beginning to realize this bill will have to be changed materially if in this House of Commons we are to achieve the purpose and objective we all have in mind. It is of interest that the collective agreement was, of course, dealt with at length by Mr. Justice Munroe, Mr. Justice Cameron, and Judge Little. Suggestions were made concerning what should be done. The government totally disregarded the major portions of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe.

Last evening I listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the House of Commons, and on the national television—I have never seen a person in such difficulty—trying to prove to the people of Canada that 6 per cent equals 18 per cent. He was on a greasy pole. Even with his capacity, his power of language and his attractive personality he was in difficulty. He was not able to establish that 6 per cent for 1966 represents the kind of offer that parliament should make under the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We told you that at the beginning. We said, withdraw this bill and produce one which will work. The government claims that the bill in this form, clause 2 and the succeeding clauses, represents the epitome of perfection. Yet, while asking parliament to pass it, the Prime Minister has a mediator working on it in the person of the Minister of Labour; and he himself has met with representatives of the railway companies and also of labour because of the objections to the way in which the Munroe report and the other reports were being implemented.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam spoke of the ritualistic dance. The government has to do that dance again. They have had to back down on almost every piece of legislation they have ever introduced and they will have to back down on this piece of legislation. As we said they would, they will have to reform it and amend it to make it effective. Everybody says that now. The Prime Minister says that somebody does not understand what his bill means. Well, I am surprised to hear that. They do not understand it. They have been led astray. Who led them astray?

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: You did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We did not do that.

Mr. Pickersgill: You did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I knew that sooner or later the hon. gentleman was going to say that, so let us read what was said today. I do not know any of these labour leaders who—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order. Even by the very wide interpretation which was given to the new rules by the hon. member for Peace River one could not follow the procedure now being attempted by the right hon. gentleman. I have a good deal of respect for the mind of the hon. member for Peace River, but I think the particular things contained in clause 2 and the desirability of amending them are the only things now debatable. Surely we cannot interpret the rules to allow discussion of anything possibly contained within the ambit of clause 2. If any other member of the house tried to do what the right hon. gentleman is doing I suggest it would not be tolerated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman having incited others to break the law cannot be expected to abide by the rules himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. No one, not even the perpendicular pronoun who has just spoken, can make that sort of suggestion, and I demand an immediate withdrawal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I demand a withdrawal.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to withdraw anything that the hypersensitive Leader of the Opposition wishes to have withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: I withdraw the statement and I do so willingly. The right hon. gentleman, having got himself into a terrible mess by opposing this bill, is now trying by a desperate stratagem to extricate himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the right hon. gentleman should be obliged to abide by the rules.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. Although I think my purpose has been accomplished I do so to protest against the Minister of Transport taking the opportunity of a point of order to make a speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I trust, sir, that the matter is practically closed, but that was my purpose in rising. I appeal to you, as I may again in the future, to prevent hon. members, who have no defence, from attempting to make that defence under the guise of a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I may continue and speak on this point of order now that the hon. member has made a speech under the guise of a question of privilege. Let me say that I feel we must all obey the rules of this house. When we are dealing with clause 2 we should deal with that clause and its contents rather than with letters from union organizations and other matters that are totally extraneous to this clause. I suggest, sir, that even the right hon. gentleman, in spite of any interpretation that has been advanced, should be obliged, like the rest of us, to obey the rules of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Order, please. The standing order which the Chair must accept as a guide in this matter is standing order 59(2) which states:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I ask members of the committee to be guided by that standing order and to co-operate with the Chair in getting our business done as quickly as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and I hope that the message you have spelled out has permeated the cranium of the hon. gentleman. I was dealing with the attitude we are taking and our desire to have action taken by parliament that will be effective.

The implementation of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe was, generally speaking, completely ignored. Instead of following those recommendations the government decided, and the Prime Minister said this was a decision taken after deep consideration had been given to the matter, not to go beyond the first of January, 1967, but to leave these matters for further consideration. I have stated, and I repeat, that the form of the legislation before us would provide a 6 per cent increase for the workers for 1966. That is supposed to be acceptable, according to hon. gentlemen opposite. All I have to say is that the outstanding labour leaders of Canada do not need a lesson in reading ordinary English from ministers trying to escape their responsibilities for having produced such a bill. These labour leaders do not require any lesson in simple ordinary English, and its interpretation.

Mr. Chairman, I had just reached the point at which I intended to place before the committee those views expressed today in a letter to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on another point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a much more serious point of order. It is a well established rule of parliament that the debates in this house are carried out by members of this house, and that nothing may be introduced from outside the house—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am now speaking on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member is now speaking on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is this—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order, please. There is already a point of order before the house.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Then I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is a very simple one.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Under our rules we are not permitted—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order, please. I understand the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege and I would ask him to present it as briefly as possible.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My question of privilege is a simple one. If the Minister of Transport wishes to speak about the rules I would ask that the Chair and the Minister of Transport recognize one simple rule. Before he pops up and down like a yo-yo to speak in the house he should be recognized by the Chair. That has not been the case on the last three occasions he has spoken. He was not formally recognized by the Chair. While I am on my feet perhaps I may remind the house that if the snake pit becomes active again it will not bother me.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it is a well established rule that we cannot present opinions of others from outside this house as part of our speeches, when they relate to the debate that is currently before the house, unless we accept those opinions and make them our own. If the right hon. gentleman is prepared to endorse every word that is in that letter, there is no objection to his using it; but if he is seeking to bring persons from outside the house into the house to participate in our debates, he is offending against the most fundamental of all the rules of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying a moment ago, the government says that these outstanding leaders in the labour movement of Canada cannot read or understand. Last evening the Minister of National Health and Welfare was on television. He was followed by Bill Smith, an outstanding leader, a responsible leader, who was most emphatic and said in effect that the argument of the Minister of National Health and Welfare was nonsense and what was being offered was 6 per cent—just that and no more.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true, and you know it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does anyone suggest that across this nation those able to read this bill could come to any other conclusion? The government knows now that they have not been able to fool anybody with this legislation. I am hoping that the government will be prepared to make the necessary amendments so as to assure that this legislation will be effective. I mentioned that a letter had been written to the Prime Minister of Canada, and copies were sent to the various members mentioned, including the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport is a little hurt by what was said in this letter. He knows what these labour leaders said, but he does not want the Canadian people to know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This letter was directed to the Minister of Transport among others, or at least a copy of it. It begins "Dear Mr. Prime Minister," and it is dated August 31.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think we should have a ruling on whether the right hon. gentleman subscribes to the contents of that letter. If he does not subscribe to its contents, he has no right to read it. If he is prepared to support the opinions expressed in that letter, I have no objection because it is quite according to the rules. But the right hon. gentleman knows what that letter contains and I should like him to have the courage to get up and say that he agrees with the sentiments expressed in the letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to indulge in any competition with the hon. gentleman on that question. I simply say that the letter is a statement of fact. I cannot understand the attitude of the Minister of Transport. I am sure it is disturbing to the Minister of Labour to have this voluntary help that is being given to him by the Minister of Transport, who does not know anything about the subject.

The letter says: "Dear Mr. Prime Minister,"—I got as far as the date before.

> A meeting of some 80 representatives of unions involved in the railway dispute this morning—

That is today.

> —unanimously instructed us to inform you in the strongest possible terms that the legislation now before parliament is totally unacceptable.

That is something that we in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition contended from the beginning. We told the government that. The next paragraph says:

> The position taken by this meeting was based on reports which we have received from all sections of the country. We feel our responsibilities, both to the workers we represent and to the country, very seriously. We ask that you and your colleagues give most serious consideration to making amendments which would make this legislation acceptable and avoid putting the railway workers of Canada in a position in which they are likely to ignore parliamentary action.

That letter is signed by R. C. Smith, W. J. Smith, W. P. Kelly and T. W. Read. We have been telling the government this. We did not know the view of the labour leaders, but we knew this legislation would not work. Yet the government decided to bulldoze it through. They were just going to do it in a big way. Now they have to have a sober second thought. I refer, of course, not to the question of sobriety but just to the thought. The government must now begin to realize that something has to be done. They had an opportunity tonight when the hon. member for Greenwood asked the Prime Minister the simple question: Are you going to do something about it? The Prime Minister would not answer.

What kind of government is this? They proceed by bits and pieces. We said this legislation would not work. We asked them to do something about it. We asked them to give consideration to some of the other recommendations contained in Mr. Justice F. Craig Munroe's report. Mr. Justice Munroe recommended certain ancillary matters. He recommended that effective January 1, 1967, the plan should be revised to provide $2,000 of life insurance for each participating employee, instead of $1,500, and to provide weekly indemnity payments of $50 as heretofore, the cost thereof to be shared equally by the railways and the employees, provided the present arrangement whereby the cost of $1,000 of life insurance and $10 of the weekly indemnity would continue to be borne by the special fund under the plan until exhausted. He recommended the institution of a prescription drug plan and a dental care plan that should be deferred for further consideration, after the institution of medicare. He did not recommend cumulative paid sick leave.

What have the government done? They have produced a plan that is meaningless and then say that the people have been misled. If you can tell me that more than 6 per cent is offered, when 4 per cent will be paid from January 1 and 4 per cent from July 1—

Mr. Nicholson: Eight per cent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well now, who said, "Eight per cent"?

Mr. Nicholson: It would be 8 per cent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not amount to 8 per cent. It is 8 per cent in respect of a certain portion of it, but it is actually a 6 per cent rise, no matter what manner of mathematical ingenuity you try to perpetrate on the people. You cannot fool them with this kind of nonsense. These men are not fools. They can read. They cannot be bluffed by informing them that the government are actually carrying out those terms. Why did the government not carry out those terms?

Mr. Pickersgill: Those are the terms.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This course was adopted simply because the government thought they could get away with it. They speak about messes. I have seen their faces in the last couple of days, and if ever a government qualified for being in that position, they do. Never before were they in such a position, and they know it. They have to back down; they have to make another of those fantastic retreats. They have to do this and cannot get away from it. They talk about that dance; they have to do it.

This is what we have been asking the government to do from the beginning. We said: prepare a bill that is fair and reasonable and will have a chance of acceptance. You gave the seaway workers 30 per cent. This was approved of by the government of Canada. The Prime Minister, with his usual jocularity laughs about this; but the seaway authority would not act without cabinet approval.

The government must act now, and I would like to see them rise at this time, not in a spirit of defeatism, not on the defensive, as the Prime Minister said—

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. You have recited the rule of relevancy to the committee three times, since the right hon. Leader of the Opposition began his discussion.

Speaking on another point of order, I said, and I think hon. members agreed, that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has the right under clause 2(a) to discuss the definition of a collective agreement, but since then we have listened to him debate the whole field from the Munroe report to the seaway workers settlement, etc., all of which, in my opinion, is quite beyond the provisions of standing orders 78 and 59 (2). In spite of your attempt to persuade the hon. gentleman that he should stick to the rule of relevancy it seems to me that he has gone completely beyond the matter under discussion.

Under clause 2(a) we read the head note: "Definitions. Collective agreement to which this act applies." This is an expression that is used in many sections of the act. Clause 2(a) reads as follows:

> "Collective agreements to which this act applies" means a collective agreement between a railway company and a union that expired on December 31, 1965—

The only subject matter under discussion is whether or not that definition means precisely what it is intended to mean. If the right hon. gentleman has anything to say concerning an amendment to that definition on collective agreements, then I think he is quite in order; but whether or not we will succeed in bringing the right hon. gentleman back to the rules of this house I am not quite sure. However, I think it should be registered that he has gone completely beyond the traditions, practices and rules of this house in the discussion of a specific clause in committee. I hope that even if he does succeed in continuing his speech, he will not be setting a precedent by repeating a debate that was concluded and voted on by this house only a few minutes ago.

I therefore wish to register my objection so as to avoid setting a precedent in any further speeches that will take place.

The Chairman: I can only quote to the house again standing order 59(2) which has been given to the Chair and which reads as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I would also ask members of the committee to co-operate with the Chair in seeing that the rules of the committee are obeyed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have been here a long while and I do follow the rules. The hon. gentleman from Medicine Hat always reminds me of that chap who helped a Roman emperor whenever the latter found himself suddenly in difficulties. The hon. gentleman is the government's assistant, its chore boy and water boy.

I want to see this bill improved; does not the government? Is that the reason they are objecting? Do they want to push this through and not make the necessary changes? We say: You have to make changes.

Mr. McIlraith: Get on with it, then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot get away with this. You can howl me down when I say you must make changes. The Opposition has contended from the beginning that this legislation will not work. You know it now and you have got to back down. You have to join in what has become the ritualistic dance of the present government: You go forward a bit, then back up, and then go in another direction.

These interruptions do not bother me at all. I enjoy them just as much as you enjoy them.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course, this hon. gentleman's capacity for thinking at all does not bring him within the ranks of those about whom I was speaking.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege.

I have always felt that I could consider the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) a past master of parliamentary procedure. During the two and a half years I have been sitting in this house I have always looked upon him as an expert in parliamentary procedure and I am in no way impressed by his attempts to ridicule me.

Nevertheless, my feeling is that he who has been sitting here for 25 years should rather set an example to be followed by the younger members of the house.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I said the hon. gentleman is one of the most able in the house, and if I said anything that is disturbing to him I assure him it was not designed to be hurtful. I think a great deal of him as a fine parliamentarian, in his own way.

Now, sir, all I want to do on this occasion is to ask the Prime Minister to let the House of Commons know now what changes he plans to bring about. We want this legislation to be effective. Almost every newspaper in Canada contends that what has been done here is not fair and reasonable. The Toronto Daily Star says "Ottawa rail offer isn't enough".

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, this very article to which the right hon. gentleman is now referring was read yesterday in the house. The very purpose of the rule to which reference has been made by the house leader was to avoid debate that has already taken place on second reading. We are now getting exactly the same material which we got in the debate on second reading.

Mr. Churchill: That was a fine contribution to the debate.

The Chairman: I do not think there is any need for me to read again to the committee the relevant standing order, but I would again ask the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and other members of the committee to assist the Chair by obeying the standing orders as they are given to the Chair.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I make it simple so that the Minister of Labour will understand me. May I ask him now: Are you going to bring about changes? Are you going to assure us that the collective agreements will be amended by this act in such a way as to preserve the security of Canada, while at the same time giving justice and equity to the workers? It is as simple as that. I know that the minister is anxious to rise and say that he will do so. If he will only do that, we will eliminate a great deal of discussion. We told you this would not work. It has been put together for the purpose of bluffing the workers and the people. We want the strike to end at the earliest possible date. We want an effective act passed by parliament. We want an act that will not permit, condone or invite evasion on the part of Canadians to whom it will apply.

I now give the Minister of Labour an opportunity, with all that great experience he has had beginning with the 30 per cent increase, to tell us what he is going to do about this question. He knows that the situation across Canada is serious. The government tries to pretend labour men have been misled by argument in the House of Commons. If it had not been for our stand you would not be willing to make any changes. I understand that now you are prepared to follow the usual course as a result of the strong representations made by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition as well as by members of the N.D.P. You realize that what you placed before the house will be a nullity unless you make alterations.

I ask you, are you going to do it or are you going to go ahead bullheadedly and put through this legislation regardless of the consequences? We ask you, will you amend it? Will you bring in recommendations to amend it? The Prime Minister reads a paper at a time when people all over Canada are wondering and are seriously concerned about the economy of Canada as well as the preservation of the rule of law within Canada. I say if you are going to put the bill through—and you have the allies to put it through—then having put it through I warn you, as I warned you before, this legislation will have to be amended to indicate a degree of fairness which has been missing up to the present moment.

Mr. Pearson: I doubt, Mr. Chairman, that I will be able to follow the chaotic excitability of the right hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat in the discussion of clause 2 of this bill in committee. I remind the committee that we are facing a grave national emergency and that second reading of the bill has been carried. We have decided to sit here, if it will accomplish anything and nothing has been accomplished up to the present, all evening in order to deal with these clauses one by one. There is no doubt that some of the arguments advanced by the more reasonable members of this house have been worthy of consideration. Points have been raised outside the house that are worthy of consideration. I said that during the committee stage we would look at the bill clause by clause and where clarification or change was necessary we would make it.

The right hon. gentleman has tried to exploit this situation, of course. He has made the most he could of it in a narrow, partisan way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it partisan to want fairness?

Mr. Pearson: The reason for this is, no doubt, that he is interested in ending the strike, but I wonder if he is not even more interested in ending the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister and the government have done that effectively without assistance.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the right hon. gentleman has confirmed that he is more interested in ending the government than in ending the strike. However, we are interested in ending this strike and getting the men back to work on fair terms through a bill which will commend itself to them. If hon. members in this house can produce improvements to this bill, we will consider them, and we have some improvements to make ourselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The opposition got results.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I tried to rise on a few occasions. I gathered from the speech the Prime Minister made in closing the debate on second reading, and I gathered from the remarks he has just made, that the government does have some amendments in mind. I have been trying to rise to my feet, Mr. Chairman, to suggest to the right hon. gentleman or the Minister of Labour, whoever is piloting the bill, that it would be of great assistance to all of us in this house if we knew now what amendments the government has in mind. I hope that from now on we can get down to work.

There is surely no purpose in our sitting here with amendments to various clauses of the bill, as we are doing, if in fact the government has in mind suggesting amendments to those clauses. We will merely become confused if we go through the bill clause by clause and get these amendments one by one. I have not been long in the house but I have practised law, as others here have, and everyone knows quite well that the clauses of a bill relate one to the other. In order to understand the bill and the act which is to follow, you have to have the entire thing before you. In this way you can see the relationship of one clause to another. It will save a great deal of unnecessary argument, it will save a great deal of unnecessary recrimination, of which I suggest we have had more than enough, if these amendments are produced. I plead with the Prime Minister and the minister not to keep these amendments secret and produce them one by one but let us have all of them now so that the members of the house may know what the revised bill is like.

I expressed the hope on behalf of my party, as did my leader and others, that there would be changes. I am delighted to hear there are some. I only hope they are adequate. I appeal to the Prime Minister to give us all the amendments now so that we may know what the revised bill is like.

Mr. Nicholson: It has been drawn to the attention of the house already, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken very little part in the debate during the last three days. I think there are good reasons for that. I have had the opportunity of listening to the representations made by persons directly concerned every day since the bill was first introduced. I have no doubt that the leaders who signed the letter to which reference was made by the right hon. gentleman do understand the bill. However, there are approximately 120,000 railway employees in different parts of Canada who are getting distorted and garbled versions of the bill.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare made it quite clear, and I think if you refer to the introductory remarks of the Prime Minister on Monday night of this week you will see he indicated also, that we were accepting in principle, as a provisional item in the collective agreement, the recommendations that were made on wages by Mr. Justice Munroe and concurred in by the other chairman, hon. Mr. Cameron.

Not only have representations been made to me and to others—I have no doubt some have been made to hon. members on both sides of the house—as the Prime Minister has pointed out, some very worth-while suggestions have been made in the house in the course of the debate. Only this afternoon the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke intimated that his party was going to move an amendment and make a worth-while recommendation. I might say that I have stated more than once of late to responsible labour leaders that if the bill needed clarification it would be clarified when we got to the committee stage.

I should now like to advise the house that in response to requests which have been made to the government I intend to move when we come to clause 6—hon. members might look at line 29 on page 3 on which clause 6 appears—that after the words "January 1, 1966" the word "and" be deleted and that after the words "July 1, 1966" in line 30 the words "an additional 4 per cent effective January 1—".

The Chairman: Order, please. For the last half hour we have been referring to clause 2. I recognize that there has been a request for the Minister of Labour to give this information but if this information is to be given in respect of clause 6 I would ask whether there is unanimous consent of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now we are getting down to something.

Mr. Nicholson: Going back to what I was saying, after deleting the word "and" we shall, as I have suggested, add "an additional 4 per cent effective January 1, 1967, and an additional 6 per cent effective July 1, 1967". Then, Mr. Chairman, consequent upon that amendment, if it is accepted by this committee, I intend to move that the preamble of the bill be amended to make a consequential change in lines 15 and 16 by deleting the words "for terms and conditions of employment for the year 1966". It would then be necessary—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister please repeat that? I did not get what he said about the preamble.

Mr. Nicholson: In lines 15 and 16 of the preamble the words "for terms and conditions of employment for the year 1966," and the comma are to be deleted.

Mr. Fulton: Is that an alteration?

Mr. Nicholson: It is just a deletion. It has been pointed out that doubts have arisen as to the amounts, the additional amounts to be received. I would make it clear that the preamble as amended would read:

—for the resumption of the process of negotiation and mediation and for the final settlement of terms and conditions of employment for the years 1966 and 1967;

These are the two amendments that I propose to move. I could give hon. members the reasons why they are being made, but to expedite the business of the house and save time, I am now giving notice of my intention to so move.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am quite certain that every member of the committee will welcome the statement made by the Minister of Labour. It is profitless to discuss why he made it and who has won the debate. One could indulge in this sort of argument, but we can all draw our own conclusions from what may be said. I do not think we should waste time in deciding which side may congratulate themselves for it.

I congratulate the minister and the government for having made a sensible move with which we concur and which we have been urging for some time. I am sure that both the companies and the employees involved in this dispute will be gratified to have the assurance just given by the minister of the incorporation of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Craig Munroe, so that there will be this increase as a condition of resumption of employment.

There are one or two other matters which I should like to raise with the minister at this stage, since we are now proceeding by co-operative agreement, with reference to certain points that were raised earlier. I am going to put them forward as matters for consideration and I hope that the minister and his colleagues will give consideration to these points. I am not now demanding an absolute undertaking. That would be improper. But I do hope that the points will be given immediate consideration and that we may have some assurance, either by way of amendment in the committee stage or by way of assurance from the minister, that they will be embodied in the instructions to the mediator. I hope either one of these courses can be adopted.

It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that of almost the same if not equal concern to the employees as the matter of wages are the conditions of work or what one might call fringe benefits on the one hand and the recommendations of the Freedman report on the other. I am not suggesting for a moment, and it is not the position of this party for one second, that everything demanded by one side in the dispute has to be conceded before operations or negotiations are resumed. May I make that clear. On the other hand, I should like to make very clear that it is my view that the men who work have very legitimate and real concern in that at the moment they have no assurance that any consideration will be given, or that any bargaining in good faith will be undertaken with respect to those two very important aspects or areas of employment.

What they are asking is not that parliament should write the details of a settlement into this legislation but rather that we should undertake to these men that as a condition of their resuming work the mediator will be directed, and indeed will be required, to give attention to these matters and to have the parties bargain in good faith with respect to those two areas that I have mentioned. If we could get some assurance from the minister and the government either by way of amendment or statement as to what will be the policy that will be laid down, as it were, to the mediator with respect to the matters that he must take under consideration and mediate, I think that would complete the assurances and the improvement, if I may put it that way, of the bill.

There is another matter I should like to mention which relates particularly to the operating employees as distinct from the non-operating employees. It is very complicated and I find it difficult to express precisely. I do not want to take up too much of the committee's time. I know there will be discussions, and this matter is of very real concern to that particular group of employees.

It is a fact that under the legislation enacted in 1965 known as the Canada Labour (Standards) Code these men are to be placed on a 40-hour week whereas in the past they were on a mileage basis. There are great complications confronting them on the railways in the transition from the current basis of employment to the hourly basis. I am told by these men and their representatives that in the whole course of negotiations they have been unable to obtain any assurance that the transition from the one basis of employment to the other will not result in a substantial reduction in their basic pay. Indeed, I am told that what they presently earn and the mileage they put in, if translated into an apparent hourly rate and then translated in turn into a 40-hour week, would produce a figure which would result over the year in an average reduction in basic pay amounting to as much as $1,500 a year. So what they have asked is an assurance that their new hourly rate of wages on the basis of a 40-hour week will be sufficient to provide the equivalent of what they are now earning, and that the question of an increase should then be the subject of negotiation, as are the other matters, in accordance with the amendment to be introduced by the minister.

They tell me they have been unable to get any assurance that they will start with their present basic aggregate take-home pay. The result is that they are represented as asking for as much as a 40 per cent increase. This is not what they are asking. They are asking that they should start at the same basic aggregate pay as they are now receiving and that this should then be subject to increase as provided in respect of all the other wage increases. If an assurance along these lines could be given I know it would go a long way toward settling the concern of the operating employees in the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. I realize it will be difficult to put this proposal into legislative form, so I am not putting it forward in the form of an amendment. However, if the minister could assure us that the mediator would be instructed that this would be the basis upon which negotiations would start so far as this union is concerned, the purpose of my intervention would have been achieved.

In making this proposal I do not pretend that I am an expert and that my word is the last word on this subject. I do so on the basis of the discussions I have had with the men who work on the railways and on the basis of my very real desire to see that the legislation we pass in this house, while not based on the dictates of either management or labour, may nevertheless be calculated and expected to command support and contain provisions which we ourselves know to be fair and to meet the basic requirements upon which it is just to demand a return to work. I hope we may be given some such assurance by the minister.

Mr. Nicholson: I think the quickest way to answer the constructive observations made by the hon. member for Kamloops would be to refer to clause 9 of the bill which states:

1. The Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator or mediators . . . who shall forthwith endeavour to mediate the matters in dispute—

That is, the matters in dispute in all five of these conciliation proceedings. The subject to which the hon. gentleman has just referred, the problem of the railway trainmen having to switch from a mileage basis of pay to an hourly basis and a 40-hour week, is well understood by me and my department, I can assure him of that. We had to deal with a somewhat similar situation, though it was not actually related to mileage, during the truckers' strike earlier this year in Ontario, and I can assure the committee that in the instructions we are giving to the mediator or mediators the problem of the railway trainmen with regard to the take home pay will be included. Obviously time is important in these considerations and because we have a series of these matters to deal with, we may have to appoint more than one mediator to get results before November 15. We hope this will not be necessary but if it is, we intend to do so.

With regard to the Freedman report, the committee already has the assurance given by the Prime Minister earlier this evening and when we reach the relevant clause later I am sure this matter can be cleared up.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express to the Minister of Labour the thanks of this party for his compliance with the request of my hon. friend from York South by informing the committee with regard to the amendment he proposes to move when we reach clause 6. I think this will shorten the debate in committee and will have the effect of making this legislation more palatable to the railway workers.

I would say to the minister that this is not merely a matter of clarifying the situation for the railway workers. The reasons we in this party have been pressing the government to put into the legislation at least the formula recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe, the chairman of the conciliation board, are twofold. First, the workers will know that they have the guarantee that they cannot get less than the conciliation board recommendations, recommendations which, by the way, they had rejected. Second, and even more important, it means that in future mediation, negotiation or arbitration the formula will become the floor and anything which the arbitration board may award will be in addition to it.

On the other hand, if the formula had not been provided in the act the men might have had to fight in negotiations and fight before an arbitration tribunal to get even the recommendations of the Munroe conciliation board. It is therefore most important that the workers should know that whatever a tribunal may recommend they will not get less than a formula which they have already rejected.

By introducing the amendment which he is going to introduce the minister will at least have removed this feeling. I hope he will be able to persuade the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to vote for it, because they made speeches saying how much it would interfere with free negotiations if we inserted in the bill the formula for 1967 which had been proposed by Mr. Justice Munroe. Now that they have had the rug pulled out from under them, and all their eloquence wasted on the desert air, I hope they will take it in good part and support the amendment.

It should be made clear what this will mean. It will mean two 6 per cent increases in 1966—

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Douglas: —and in the second year of the agreement it will mean a further increase bringing the total to 18 per cent at the end of the two year period. That is the minimum which the men know they will get, and they have the hope of getting something more in mediation. This is not a clarification. It is a new principle, and we are glad we will now have a legal commitment rather than a moral commitment. I know that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who signed hundreds of agreements, did not like moral commitments. He wanted them down in black and white.

In considering further amendments I would ask the minister to give some thought to the second point, namely that Mr. Justice Munroe made certain recommendations with reference to fringe benefits. He rejected some things and recommended others. I see no reason why those recommendations should not also become the floor for negotiations, and if necessary for arbitration.

If the government is prepared to accept the financial and wage recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe it should also be prepared to incorporate in the bill the fringe benefit recommendations which the conciliation board thought were fair and reasonable.

With reference to the point made by the hon. member for Kamloops, before this bill passes committee stage we will want something much more specific with respect to the implementation of the recommendations of the Freedman commission. It is unfair to ask these men to submit to further negotiation and arbitration something which has already been referred to a royal commission from which they got a favourable decision. If they had got an unfavourable decision they might have been reconciled to arguing the case again; but having got a favourable decision from the Freedman commission they are entitled to have it written into the law, so that with respect to future technological changes they will have some guarantee of advance notice and consultation.

If they do not get that, then the steady decline in the number of men engaged on the railroads will continue to cause anxiety and insecurity. The minister could do a great deal to make this legislation palatable and ensure its quick passage if he were prepared to give us something more specific with regard to the implementation of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Freedman.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) quoting the amendments he proposes to section 6 of the bill, providing in 1966 for an increase to the railway workers of 4 per cent in January and 4 per cent in July so that 6 per cent is gained for the year 1966, the minister adds to the bill that on January 1, 1967, another 4 per cent will be granted and 6 per cent on July 1, 1967. This means that for the first part of 1967, the railroad workers will receive a 12 per cent increase and that at the end of 1967 for the latter part, they will receive 18 per cent.

The original bill left the door open to negotiations between the parties involved. Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring the following fact to the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Labour: this 18 per cent increase was recommended by the conciliation board before the strike started.

Now, members of parliament were called to a special session to be asked to offer exactly what the conciliation board offered and today, the N.D.P. members, as well as the Conservatives, thunderously applauded the Government decision to include the full amount, in the bill, that is 18 per cent over two years.

Mr. Chairman, I think the workers, the employees of the Canadian railways will be left holding the bag. The strike could have been avoided if the labour leaders had been responsible Canadians and had accepted the conciliation board offer. There would be no strike today, the workers would not have lost any wages and would not be worried and we would not have heard the statements of certain leaders that the workers would not go back to work for anything less than a 30 per cent increase.

Mr. Chairman, this increase had been offered—

Mr. Marchand: I should simply like to inform the hon. member that if the workers had agreed, the railway companies would not have accepted it.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, when the conciliation board suggested 18 per cent, were the railways ready at that time to negotiate on the 18 per cent proposition.

Mr. Marchand: No.

Mr. Caouette: It has been stated here in the house, that the conciliation board felt that 18 per cent was reasonable, while railway union leaders demanded 30 per cent, and that the government and the railways were told the men would not go back to work unless they obtained 30 per cent. This statement was made by Mr. Hall, in Montreal.

Mr. Chairman, I believe and I maintain the whole set-up was planned by people in the government—

An hon. Member: Under the table.

Mr. Caouette: —under the table to be sure, between government people and labour leaders. This business was planned behind the backs of the national railway employees. There is a limit to playing behind these people's backs.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that we will later have the occasion to debate these amendments. We will wait until clause 6 comes up for consideration. Everyone now seems to agree that the 18 per cent increase should be accepted and hopes that all workers will go back to work tomorrow morning. We will debate another clause dealing with compulsory arbitration, and we will undoubtedly refer back to it before the end of today's sitting.

Mr. Chairman, these were the remarks I had to make concerning suggestions being made at present by the Minister of Labour and I feel we are laughing at railway workers in Canada.

• (11:20 p.m.)

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I understand we now are proceeding by agreement to provide the minister and others an opportunity to indicate what amendments they intend to introduce in the course of studying this bill clause by clause. My purpose in rising now is to make the suggestion to the minister that perhaps there are some defects in the amendment he suggested to clause 6, and also to inform him that I have before me an amendment in both English and French, saying essentially the same thing, which was prepared last night and this morning. I think this amendment takes care of the defects. The reason I bring this up now is that I should like to send it over to the minister after explaining the defects and what I think will improve some of the defects in his amendment. I should like to send this over to him for his consideration between now and the time when he will move his amendment when we reach clause 6.

If I understand the minister correctly, he suggested that in line 29 of clause 6 he would add the 4 per cent effective January 1, 1967 and the 6 per cent effective July 1, 1967. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest to the minister and the Prime Minister, the sponsors of this bill, that at the present time the wording above the two subclauses says that "the conditions of each collective agreement to which this act applies are amended forthwith." In other words, if he adds those other two raises in 1967 to what already is written there, it does in fact amend forthwith the collective agreements which are defined as the collective agreements which expire on December 21, 1965. I do not believe that was the intent of what the minister wished to say. I believe in his explanation he suggested he wanted a minimum guarantee of retroactive pay for 1966, which was already in the clause, and that he wanted the minimum guarantee for 1967 but did not want it limited to that.

I suggest that if it is amended forthwith as the clause now says, then of course it becomes a part of the law and is amended. I suggest also the clause should be amended to state that it is a minimum, and that is all—in other words, that the increase shall be no less. I know it could be argued that that was what the minister intended in his amendment, but I think there still could be some confusion. Perhaps the mediator and arbitration board would have some difficulty if there was a subsequent amendment, because it says "forthwith".

Therefore, to get around this problem, so that the railway workers across Canada will know that this is intended as a floor, and a floor only, clause 6 should be amended by adding the following new subclause, and of course it would be called subclause (2):

(2) the terms and conditions of any amendment or revision of the collective agreements to which this act applies, determined under the provisions of Sections 8, 9 and 10 of this Act shall provide at least—

And the reason I mention those three sections is that section 8 deals with the requirements that there shall be further negotiation; section 9 deals with the appointment of a mediator and the powers of that mediator, and section 10 deals with the appointment of an arbitration board in the event that no agreement is reached under the provisions of 8 and 9.

I continue:

—an increase to each rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1965, established by or pursuant to the agreement in case of an agreement binding or entered into on behalf of non-operating employees, of not less than 4 per cent, effective January 1, 1967, and of not less than an additional 6 per cent, effective July 1, 1967.

That wording is necessary for a number of reasons, but it is a repetition of the wording used in the present clause 6(a). I discussed this matter with the law officers of this house earlier today, and other legal authorities who are familiar with railway legislation. They advised me that an additional clause, the same as in the two paragraphs in the first part of clause 6, is necessary to provide for what is referred to as operating employees. The reason is that one says "each rate of wages" and the other says "each basic daily rate". There is an important difference between those in the existing collective agreements and the ones which did expire on December 31, 1965.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that I may be helpful to the minister, I should like to send that proposed amendment, both in English and in French, to him for his consideration between now and the time he makes the motion. This might enable him to improve what he suggested he was going to do. He suggested that another substantial amendment is required in the preamble. I believe it is necessary and I take no exception to the proposal he made.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I bring to the attention of the house that there was unanimous agreement that we foresee an amendment to clause 6. May I suggest to the committee now that we continue with the consideration of clause 2.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister that I have here some T-4 slips which certainly contradict much that has appeared in the press and on television. The minister may not know that in the year 1965, in August, the C.N.R. discontinued the commission to the railroad agents. Originally this commission was given as an incentive to the agent to promote and solicit business for the railroad. In August 1965 this was discontinued. As a result of this many of our agents on the C.N.R. today are receiving less wages now than they did in the year 1964. I should like the minister to look into this.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—railway services to be resumed

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, we now are discussing clause 3 of the bill and I have some comments I wish to make. This afternoon I voted against the amendment, and I voted in favour of the motion for second reading of the bill this evening. I cast my votes on both occasions with the firm intention to speak on clause 3 when we reached our consideration of it in the committee stage. I should like to ask the ministry to consider deleting from clause 3 the words following the word "existing", namely, "and employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies". Those words mean but one thing and I do not believe they should be left in an act passed by this parliament. Those words mean in effect forced labour or slavery. I for one cannot support clause 3 in its present form. I believe the purposes of this clause can be achieved even when those words are eliminated. By their deletion the clause would then read:

• (11:30 p.m.)

> Forthwith upon the coming into force of this act, every railway company shall resume operation of the railway and subsidiary services the operation of which is suspended by reason of the strike now existing.

There has been a lot of purple prose thrown around this chamber to the effect that when this bill becomes law it is likely the labour unions will not observe it. Some have said that anyone who makes reference to that suggestion is inciting people to break the law. I do not believe for one moment that if the labour unions refuse to observe this act in its present form they would be anarchists. I believe they would be sensible and intelligent men deciding they would not work under terms presented to them by the railways by whom they were formerly employed. Surely these men have the right to choose their employers in this country of ours. I cannot support that clause which states in part that employees now on strike shall resume their duties. Who in this case is forcing whom to work?

Today I was doing some research regarding this situation and I was enheartened by something I found that was said on August 30, 1960, 16 years ago by Hon. David Croll, a former member of this house representing the riding of Spadina, Toronto. It is disturbing to me as a Liberal member to read a record of 16 years ago and find that what we will be doing by adopting this clause is following a precedent. We find that this was done 16 years ago by a former Liberal government. Surely what was done then was a precedent which we are now asked to follow.

Hon. Mr. Croll stated on August 30, 1950, as recorded at page 39 of Hansard of that date:

> Speaking in this house yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was careful to make it very clear that this bill is not to be considered a precedent; . . .
> To me those are very comforting words; yet in principle I consider this a dangerous bill, less because of what it attempts to do now than because of what in other hands it might be made to do hereafter.

Hon. David Croll, as it turned out, was quite a prophet.

I was in Saint John, New Brunswick, during the past week end and I found a Canadian Press dispatch from Corner Brook, Newfoundland, in the Saint John Evening Times-Globe of Saturday, August 27 which read as follows:

Premier Smallwood went on television here Friday night to explain why the government has not granted recommended pay increases to 90 non-professional workers at Western Memorial Hospital as the workers voted to strike in defiance of a government statement that such action would be illegal.

They passed another resolution "that Premier Smallwood be condemned for refusing to grant recommended wages to hospital employees and also for threatening to enact legislation to outlaw all hospital strikes in Newfoundland.

Mr. Smallwood, in his television address, said the government would have to approve wage increases to a total of 38 other hospitals in the province similar to those being asked by Western Memorial employees if these were granted.

A conciliation board June 14 recommended increases ranging from 5 to 25 per cent for the employees. The union at first had asked increases up to 50 per cent but reduced its demands and approved the conciliation board report, also agreed to by the hospital's board of directors.

. . . the government invoked a section of the Labour Act to declare "an emergency in respect to Western Memorial Hospital."

A proclamation made public while the union was making final plans for the strike Wednesday night said "any strike or lock-out or other action in the dispute" would be illegal and compulsory arbitration was being imposed.

As Mr. Croll said 16 years ago yesterday:

—in principle I consider this a dangerous bill, less because of what it attempts to do now than because of what in other hands it might be made to do hereafter.

I have given you a current example as to what is being done in other parts of this country. I should not like to see this federal government establish a precedent, even though in 1950 Mr. St. Laurent said that what was being done then would not be a precedent. In 1966 we are repeating what was done at that time. Men are being told that they shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies. Where is there a distinction in this regard, when we are telling men that they will resume work at their occupations as was done in 1950?

I have in my hand an interesting book I obtained from the parliamentary library entitled "The Slave in Canada" written by Hon. Renwick Riddell, a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. At pages 56, 57 and 58 one will find that the honourable justice pointed out that in 1793 a bill to abolish slavery was introduced in Upper Canada, and Upper Canada today is Ontario. Slavery was abolished by an act passed on July 9, 1793, and there is an interesting paragraph in the preamble of that act which states:

No . . . person who shall come or be brought into this province . . . shall be subject to the condition of a slave or to bounden involuntary service.

We now have a Liberal ministry which suggests by clause 3 of this bill that employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with these railway companies. What will happen if these employees decide they do not want to resume their duties with these railway companies? Are they to be called anarchists? In my opinion they are exercising the very proper right to make a decision as to whom their employers shall be. God grant them the ability to make a proper choice in this matter.

Since the Minister of Labour has been good enough to indicate in advance certain proposed changes that he will make I suggest that it would be very easy for the ministry to delete from clause 3 the following words:

—and employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies.

If we force the railway companies to resume operations and they do not obey, we can impose penalties. Not one railway company in this country operates without one or more charter or licence authorized by this parliament. Penalties can be invoked against the railway companies. On the other hand, if railway companies announce their intention to resume operations and striking employees do not report for work, surely that is a choice on the part of the employees who may be faced with sacrificing their pension rights, severance pay and other benefits. I see no point in keeping in this clause the words:

—and employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies.

• (11:40 p.m.)

The Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, on Friday, August 26, the date the strike took effect at noon hour, carried an editorial parts of which I should like to read. The editorial has a bearing on the point "shall resume the duties of their employment." The Telegraph-Journal says:

The union members can argue their legal right to strike, but as Canadians they have no moral right to disregard the consequences to the nation. They have no right to price fellow Canadians out of world markets and, inevitably, themselves out of jobs.

If a worker wants to price himself out of a job, that is his choice. It is not up to the Saint John Telegraph-Journal to rule on that point for him. The editorial continues:

> They have no right to seriously impair or destroy the earning capacity of innocent people whose livelihood depends so completely on rail transportation. They have no right to deprive sections of Canada of a vital link—and no section will be harder hit than the already struggling Atlantic provinces. They have no such rights.

In the name of heaven, does the economy of Canada depend upon driving the noses of railroaders into the dirt and telling them they have no rights, that they are second-class citizens? They have the same rights as every other Canadian and those rights should be guaranteed them. I do not want to see a slavery clause imposed on them such as "and employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies."

I do not wish to prolong the debate, Mr. Chairman, but I shall refer to this question again when we come to discuss the preamble of the bill, at which time I understand we will have an opportunity to speak a second time. I would simply ask the ministry to delete those final words of clause 3 and bear in mind that when the time and labour of one person are, by any means not purely voluntary, the property of another, the former is a slave and the latter is a master; and and I do not want to see parliament in the guise of a slavemaster.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the hon. member that the point he has raised was carefully considered by the government and the law officers who advised us in this matter before the clause was finalized. I realize the significance of the hon. gentleman's remarks with regard to similar legislation passed in 1950, but I would point out that if this clause is accepted by parliament it will direct the railway companies to resume operations, and our problem was and is, how can the companies resume operations if the employees now on strike do not resume their duties? The one thing goes with the other.

In addition I would draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman—and I only do this to emphasize and bring home my point—that in clause 4 of the bill certain obligations are placed upon the companies. They are not allowed to refuse people who want to resume their duties after having gone on strike. If the legislation does not provide that they shall resume their duties, you are in trouble because the companies are ordered to do something and they would have no men to operate their railways. This matter was considered by parliament in 1950. In that case—and I have read and re-read the section many times—every employee who was on strike was to return to the duties of his employment. The wording of the section was "shall return to the duties of employment." We believe that the word "resume" is preferable with regard to returning to duties. I might also point out that the government in power in 1958, when the return to work legislation was passed with regard to the British Columbia ferries, also used the expression that the company "shall resume operation and the employees on strike shall return to their duties."

Mr. Ricard: They could not operate otherwise.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes. Hon. gentlemen opposite unanimously accepted that wording in 1958 and several of them are still in the house. I would assure the hon. gentleman that we are making no attempt to return to slavery. All we are trying to do is to introduce workable legislation.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister whether he has taken into consideration the fact that a man could return to his place of employment and immediately tender his resignation. This would have the same effect as if we made the correction proposed by the hon. gentleman; they could return to work and then quit.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this, of course, is probably the most important clause in the bill because, although I do not go as far as the hon. member, it makes it necessary for the company to resume operations. Then, of course, the terms of the Criminal Code will apply if the workers do not return to work. I believe this is where the difficulty has arisen with the government. As my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, we may on a temporary basis have stopped this strike by legislation but we have not really solved the problem facing those in the labour movement, particularly those employed on the railways who have been faced since 1950 with no negotiations and government intervention.

I think the government will have to do many other things. I am very pleased they made the change but I regret that they did not do it several days ago. If they had many of the things that have been said would not have been said and the terms of the Munroe report would have been adopted, including such things as the recommendations in respect of automation which is a matter that is plaguing many workers on the railroads.

The minister has not dealt with this point, but one of the unions involved, namely, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, has not asked for a specific wage increase but has concentrated on the other problems affecting the workers in the union. These problems have arisen over a period of time and have resulted in a lessening of morale to the point where morale on most of the railways just does not exist. This is a responsibility of government and is something they will have to think about.

This legislation is a solution for today only. I believe the government will have to do many other things. You may impose compulsory arbitration and say that a man will work for such and such a wage, but you will find a deterioration in the work performed by the employees to the extent that the railways will not be operating with any degree of efficiency. This, of course, will once more result in wildcatting and many other things that take place on the railways.

I think the government has some assurance now that a legitimate effort will be made by the union leaders to get the workers to return to work. I think it would have been idiotic if the union leaders had gone to their membership and said "We ask you to return to work", when by law they would have to say, "Our obligation under the law is that we must tell you the terms of the act, which are that the government now demands that you go back to work." In my opinion this would have resulted in a very serious situation.

If the government thinks that the amount of money they are recommending, which I think is pitifully low for all railroaders, will solve the problem, they are wrong. I believe that if the government wanted to be at all reasonable they would have immediately implemented some of the recommendations contained in the Freedman report in order to solve some of the major problems of automation and the effect it is having upon the operation of the railroads.

In my own area, for instance, the Ontario Northland Railway operates. I fail to understand how this railway comes under the bill before us because it is owned by the provincial government. The employees do not pay unemployment insurance because they are pseudo civil servants. Yet they also come under this legislation. It is interesting to note that automation on that railway in the last ten years has caused a reduction from 10 or 11 freight crews down to 5. It is true that some of the workers on that railway make $6,000 to $7,000. I asked one of them what his basic rate was. To use an example, in my area a brakeman running from Englehart to Cochrane, 112 miles, gets $16.17 for that trip. At the other end he lays over for 9 hours.

The hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) mentioned the conditions of work of these people. I will not go into that again but let me say that the cabooses on those trains are 50 years out of date and the working conditions are atrocious. The workmen have to cook their own meals on a coal fire or else go downtown to eat. They get no allowance except that which is granted to them in the revenue exemption under the Income Tax Act. The workmen on that railway lay over in Cochrane, make their return run in 8 hours and 58 minutes and are away from home for 27 hours altogether for which they receive the grand sum of $32.34. This amounts to considerably less than $1.50 an hour, not counting the lay-over time.

Of course the workmen will not be paid for the lay-over time and unless they have a girl friend or some other attraction the time is lost to them and the money they get for this trip amounts to only $1.80 an hour. Most people do not know that railroaders on the Ontario Northland Railway may be in some ways better off than those working on the Canadian National Railways, because their maximum runs in most cases are 4,000 miles or 40 days at 8 hours a day. For those 4,000 miles, which of course are not guaranteed, they will make the magnificent sum of $577.60. I grant you that if they work on extra shift, provided that is possible, or if they stop longer than the average which is 12½ miles on through freights per hour, they get additional pay, but there are few people working in any industry in Canada that get less than $1.80 an hour. The railroaders may have two occupations on their job and their productivity has allowed that railway to reduce their freight crews from the 11 of 10 years ago to five now.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that if this government is really interested in railroading they will have to give consideration to many of the problems that are facing the railways. The problem is not only restricted to wages because, as I have already said, one of the major unions did not ask for any specific increase in wages but for a settlement of other matters.

Under this clause the government is asking the workers to go back to work, but in return they must give the workers an assurance that some of the problems facing them will be dealt with by the government. One of the things we should consider very shortly is the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway and, even more important, the situtation of the Canadian National Railway. We owe so much money on the C.N.R. that if I owed that much on my automobile I would give it back to the finance company and start all over again. We have a debt that we do not always pay, let alone paying anything on the principal. I think we will have to decide which of the two railways operating side by side we want in the national interest.

I think the Prime Minister is familiar enough with the problems of the railways in his area to know that it is not the increase in wages that will count today but the cost of living now and in the future. If the worker buys a two-year contract he knows full well that he will receive over a two-year period not 18 per cent but 10.5 per cent and his cost of living can only rise in that period of time. He should therefore be granted an escalator clause based on the cost of living which will at least allow him to maintain what the government is willing to provide.

I do not think the railroader is a slave because he can always quit his job, and I have talked to many who have said they are ready to do so. However, what the government perhaps fails to realize is that many of the railroaders today are young and have no seniority.

While travelling on a passenger train not long ago I was surprised to find that the conductor had a great deal of difficulty in telling what the next station was going to be. He told me he had been an employee of the C.N.R. for only six weeks. The job of conductor on a passenger train was the lowest grade they could give him. My colleague says he might have learned the stations but maybe he was so busy making change and selling tickets that he was confused about what he was doing.

As a trade unionist, Mr. Chairman, I am as opposed to this clause as I am to compulsory arbitration because both carry an implication that negotiations are not possible, that they will not be engaged in and that the government has no interest in them. The Ontario Northland could solve this very easily by making the railroad workers in Ontario full-fledged civil servants. I do not know what they will do about the Nipissing Central which operates in Rouyn and Noranda. Maybe my colleagues from that part of the country would consider that aspect. We are almost reaching the stage at which the railroad worker is becoming a civil servant. For the past 16 years we have been negotiating for him by legislation and therefore I think the government will have to consider these matters seriously. They would meet with a great deal of sympathy on the part of the workers if they were able to give some indication as to what they intend to do in respect of the cost of living as it affects these workers as well as by stating their position regarding some of the problems of automation that are particular to that industry and that are causing a great deal of concern.

The railways, Mr. Chairman, do not seem to care. In spite of the fact that the Ontario Northland has half the freight crews it once had it is handling more freight than it has ever handled before. It is interesting to note that although the supervisory positions on the Ontario Northland Railway have increased three to four times—there are more chiefs than Indians—this situation is not unique in the case of that railway and is even more acute on the C.N.R. This is bad for morale and bad for the operation of the railway. The unnecessary increase in bureaucracy that is inevitably taking place is the responsibility of the government and should be seriously considered.

I do not want to take up any more time except to say that I think the government is not fulfilling its role by simply intervening in this dispute. I believe that if the government is to play a role in this field it will have to give consideration to the various problems on which the railway workers cannot negotiate. I am afraid that if the government does not do this the situation will become chaotic. The government should face the problems that the railway workers have and which the leaders of the railway workers have particularly. For the first time the leaders are finding the workers breathing down their necks. The young workers on the railroads have no respect for most of their leaders and no understanding whatever of the problems faced by their leaders in negotiations or by those in responsible positions in the company or in government in this instance.

There is going to be considerable chaos in these unions. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is well aware of this problem and could give the government a great deal of advice upon it because he to a great degree helped to develop it. It is a problem that has reached very serious proportions and one which the government is going to have to consider. If they are not willing to make further concessions, and I do not suggest that those concessions be all in this bill, then we will be faced with a serious problem. The government ought to have a committee of this house, either the labour committee or the transport committee, consider some long-range solutions to the problems facing railway workers as well as the railways themselves.

If the government is not willing to consider this matter in committee, where there is time to call witnesses and hear representations, then it is my opinion they are going to be faced with this same problem every four or five years. The government has to face the problem because the workers are not able to negotiate with the companies through their bargaining agents. The companies can hide behind a façade by saying that the government is regulating their revenues and therefore they are not free agents. I do not know whether the government is prepared to do this. I strongly urge the Prime Minister, who is aware of the problem now having talked to the unions and the companies, that he showed give serious consideration to going into each section of the problems affecting transport workers in this country. A detailed study of the whole matter could be made in a committee. I hope he does consider this matter of including an escalator clause based on the cost of living so that the workers will be guaranteed the wage increase that the government has seen fit now to recommend.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could ask the government house leader if the time has come, as he indicated earlier today, when we might look at the clock and assess the situation? I believe this afternoon, when the house agreed to sit beyond six o'clock, questions were asked as to how long it would be. I believe the government house leader said that at midnight he would be glad to look at the clock and assess the situation. I wonder if it would not make good sense, in view of the progress we have made, to adjourn until some time later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. McIlraith: When I made the motion at the opening of proceedings today for the house to continue sitting after 6 p.m. a question was raised and I expressed what seems to have been a forlorn hope that the bill would be through all stages before midnight. I did undertake in specific language, however, that I would consider a cut-off hour at a later time. Unfortunately, we only seem to have passed one clause, the interpretation clause. I wonder if the house would be willing to complete the discussion of clause 3? Perhaps an order could then be made concerning the sitting tomorrow, say at ten o'clock in the morning. Perhaps we could then continue to sit until we have completed all stages of the bill. Perhaps we could rise in a few minutes when we have completed this clause.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to get the sense of the house on that point before making a decision.

Mr. Starr: Yes, we would agree to that.

Mr. Douglas: I think the suggestion of the minister is an admirable one but I understood clause 3 had been passed, Mr. Chairman. If clause 3 has not passed, then we have to wrestle with that clause. However, when we get to clause 6, which is fairly complicated and about which there are many technical questions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: Some members who are shouting have not even read the bill and do not understand what is in it. I want to suggest that three or four o'clock in the morning is not the time for careful examination of legislation as important as this. I think the minister's suggestion of adjourning now and reassembling at ten o'clock in the morning makes sense. We could consider this matter properly tomorrow. My experience has been that the longer the hours the shorter the tempers, and we are not going to make much progress.

Mr. Thompson: We would like to carry on and go through with this. This is an emergency with which we are dealing. Six weeks ago I spent several days in the British parliament and for two of the three days they sat until the early hours of the next morning considering issues that were not as serious as this. I do not see why we cannot continue.

Mr. Nicholson: Clauses 3, 4 and 5 are tied together. Clause 6, however, is related to a different matter, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The hon. member for Medicine Hat suggested a short time ago an amendment to clause 6 which must be carefully considered. I have been trying to follow the debate but I cannot consider the merits or otherwise of his suggestions having been able to give them only a cursory glance. They should be considered and discussed with my colleagues. If we could deal with clauses 3, 4 and 5 tonight, then surely we could adjourn until ten o'clock tomorrow morning.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: Do I understand it is agreed that we continue until we have considered clauses 3, 4 and 5 and that at that time we will rise and report progress and have an order made by the house that we meet tomorrow at ten o'clock and continue through?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cowan: I do not wish to engage in any cross-fire with the Minister of Labour but he made some comments after my previous remarks to which I should like to refer.

An hon. Member: On what clause?

Mr. Cowan: Clause 3.

An hon. Member: Clause 3 has been carried.

• (12:10 a.m.)

Mr. Cowan: It has not. I point out that in making his remarks the minister stated that in 1950 there was a similar clause in the act, and I was well aware of that. I have read the clause several times. Did the minister not read Prime Minister St. Laurent's statement that 1950 was not to be taken as a precedent? I do not believe that changing the word "return" to "resume" has eliminated the fact that 1950 is being taken as a precedent. I also point out that I do not agree that two wrongs make a right. I was not in this house in 1950 but I can assure you that, had I been, I would have taken the stand of Hon. David Croll on this matter now under discussion. Since two wrongs do not make a right, I would ask that we do the right thing in 1966 and that we do not forget the fact that we are making a precedent out of an act which Mr. St. Laurent said was not to be taken as a precedent.

In addition, the minister points out that this clause is similar to one brought in in 1958. This is about the fourth time I have been told by members of the Liberal cabinet that they are doing something which is exactly the same as was done by the previous government. I ran in 1962 against the government of the day because I did not agree with its policies and I thought that the Liberals could do a better job. I ran against the same government in 1963 because I thought we could do a better job. There are quite a few Liberal members of this house who are getting fed up with hearing Liberal cabinet ministers tell us that this is just the way the previous government did things. Then why did we oppose them?

Mr. Grafftey: What is he like in caucus?

Mr. Cowan: May I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that Hon. David Croll said, as found on page 41 of Hansard for August 30, 1950:

> Compulsion never removes the cause of the strife. Forced obedience against the will of those concerned sows the seeds of bitterness and resentment and in the end aggravates the very condition it was sought to cure.

I say to you, as members of the ministry, that it would be best to eliminate the words "employees now on strike shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies". Clause 4 will not need to be altered in any way and we will get rid of this forced labour or slavery clause. It does not affect clause 5. I sincerely ask the ministry to eliminate those words that will cause concern to the men now on strike, because I do not believe that that concern should be caused them.

The question has been asked by the Minister of Labour: What will happen if the men do not return to work? I could name a score of industries where the workers are on strike but which are still in business. They have engaged other employees. Are we going to force these men back to work because, when the railways announce that they are open for business, the men on strike may not go rushing back to the gates? I am opposed to compulsory labour.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it recorded as an order of the house that we sit tomorrow—

An hon. Member: Today.

Mr. McIlraith: —at ten o'clock a.m. and continue to sit until Bill C-230 has been completed through all stages.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the house agree that it will meet again at ten o'clock—

An hon. Member: On Thursday, September 1.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —on Thursday morning and continue until the bill has been completed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I understand that under standing order 6 we require a motion to adjourn the house now. I move, therefore, that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 12.15 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 1, 1966

The house met at 10 a.m.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

TABLING OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING GRANTS TO AUTHORS AND ASSOCIATIONS

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yesterday one of the hon. members from Edmonton asked if I would table in the house the regulations which have been issued by the centennial commission with respect to grants to authors and associations, and I indicated I would be glad to do so provided it was in compliance with the rules of the house. By consent I am now proposing to table, in English and French, copies of the brochure on the grants program containing those regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

MATTERS TO BE DISCUSSED AT FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he in a position at the moment to express a view as to the general attitude that Canada, as represented by him, will take at the forthcoming Commonwealth conference of prime ministers? I am not asking him for a particularization but for an assurance so there will be no misunderstanding that, as far as Canada is concerned, there will be no resort to force, participated in by Canada, in respect of the Rhodesian situation.

We have not been able to get a definite statement in that regard and it is an assurance that I hope the Prime Minister will be able to give. At the same time, may I again suggest to him that he advise us that he will represent Canada at that conference. I think it is most necessary that the Prime Minister be there. If there is anything we can do so that he or the government will not be prejudiced by his absence, we shall do it. I want to see the Prime Minister at that conference.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the most important thing that could be done to make it possible for me to go to the conference would be to get the railway strike bill disposed of in the house as quickly as possible so that the national emergency might, we hope, be resolved without delay. On that point perhaps the right hon. gentleman would permit me to postpone the statement that he has understandably requested until tomorrow at the opening of the house, when perhaps I could say something.

In the meantime today I think we should carry on with the railway legislation. That will give me a few hours to make sure of what I can say on the eve of such a very important conference, especially in regard to the use of force, on which we have already stated our views.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said he would like to wait until tomorrow, and that is fine.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party I wish to say that we certainly hope it will be possible to conduct the business of the house so the Prime Minister can represent Canada at the Commonwealth conference. I think it is extremely important that he be there with his long experience in international affairs and with the very considerable prestige which he carries in Commonwealth circles.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in making his statement tomorrow it would be possible for him to indicate whether Canada would support the idea of having sanctions imposed by the United Nations under the aegis of the UN charter, in the event the Commonwealth prime ministers become convinced that the type of sanctions now being imposed have proven, and may continue to prove, ineffective.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in a statement of this kind I would wish to include all relevant pieces of information; I would like to tell the house everything I possibly could about the economic aspects of this problem which is so important. Having regard to the fact that we are on the eve of a conference, the position of the commonwealth nations at that conference will have to be worked out in the light of the decisions taken by them there. My hon. friend knows that the adoption of a rigid position before a conference sometimes is a handicap in obtaining agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I also hope that the Prime Minister will be able to attend the commonwealth conference, in the interest of the country, of the commonwealth and of all member countries.

I believe the question of inflation will be discussed during that conference since inflation is rampant in Great Britain, as well as other commonwealth countries. The same situation prevails here in Canada.

Now, can the Prime Minister tell the house whether he intends to suggest, during the discussions, a comprehensive review of the financial system, which seems unsuitable in the circumstances?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would think this is a subject which will not be on the agenda at this conference. It may come up, however, in discussions among the delegates from the countries all of whom are concerned with and affected by this problem. But there is a meeting of the International Monetary Fund in September and that specifically, definitely and importantly is on the agenda. All the countries will be represented at that conference by their ministers of finance.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada.

In view of the statement by the Prime Minister, a while ago, that a meeting of the members of the monetary fund will be held in a few weeks, is it the intention of the minister to include among the delegates to this important meeting, an exponent of the Social Credit doctrine.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Pearson.]

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY STRIKE—UNION POSITION RESPECTING AMENDED LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shoud like to address another question to the Prime Minister. In view of the acceptance last evening of the amendment to the railway bill which is now before the house, is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether the union leaders will also accept that? Is there any assurance that if parliament passes the bill there will be no question of general civil refusal to accept it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the union leaders or all the people of Canada, but I have confidence in the law abiding character of the Canadian population. I also have confidence that the union leaders will discharge the duties imposed on them in this bill, if and when it becomes law.

UNITED NATIONS

REPORTED INTENTION OF SECRETARY GENERAL TO RELINQUISH OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the imminent expiration of the term of the secretary general of the United Nations and the reports that he will step down, I wonder whether the minister or the government has approached U Thant with the thought in mind that he should carry on. Have the government or the Secretary of State for External Affairs used their influence in an attempt to convince U Thant that he should remain in office?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the secretary general is to make a statement some time this morning about his intentions. The government, through the Prime Minister and through myself as Secretary of State for External Affairs, has urged the secretary general to carry on in his post. There is widespread support throughout the United Nations for his continuation in that difficult and important task. I think I reflect the views of all members of this house and of the people of the country generally when I say that I sincerely hope his statement this morning will not close the door on the possibility of urging him to continue the difficult and responsible job that is his. U Thant has won the confidence of the people of the world, and this occasion affords us the opportunity of confirming our view in this regard.

NATURAL GAS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PIPE LINE DECISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and in view of previous answers to the hon. member for Medicine Hat and myself. Because of the special legislation now before the house I am not asking that the minister make a statement now, but at an appropriate time will he make a statement as to why the pipe line route from western Canada to points in eastern Canada and the United States was vetoed by the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a statement of that kind was made when the decision was taken and made public. I will be glad to table that statement in the House of Commons. No doubt there will be an opportunity to debate and discuss this matter at a later date.

WATER RESOURCES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS FROM ADDITIONAL STORAGE ON KOOTENAY LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the honourable and gallant Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the International Joint Commission's order of approval for an additional two feet of storage on Kootenay lake, primarily to meet the needs of the Kaiser Aluminum Company in the United States via Cominco, did the Canadian government assert its rights to the additional downstream benefits that will result from this storage and, if not, why not?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question put to me by the gallant and chivalrous gentleman.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the questions being asked and the concern being expressed is the Prime Minister now in a position to reaffirm the government's intention to have medicare in effect by July 1, 1967?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we complete consideration of the railway legislation it is my intention to make a statement in the house about the priority attached to the other pieces of legislation to be dealt with during this part of the session. The medicare legislation will be included in that list.

PENITENTIARIES

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION UNTIL JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Is it the intention of the minister and his department to call for any further tenders for the construction of minimum, medium and maximum security prisons before the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate can report on this matter, having regard to its terms of reference as authorized by both houses?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it may be necessary to proceed with some of the steps outlined for the ten year plan. But it will be up to the committee to study these plans and report back to the house. At that time the recommendations of the committee will be taken into consideration.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. The minister said it may be necessary to proceed with some plans. He has given a paradoxical answer in that some plans may be proceeded with but the committee will make a study and a report. Will the report be considered before plans are carried out?

Mr. Pennell: I am not in a position to give that undertaking, Mr. Speaker. The medium security design has received almost universal approval from all enlightened groups in this field. In my respectful judgment it would be a mistake to withhold proceeding on the ten year plan in so far as this design is concerned.

[Translation]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC—EXTENSION OF TELEVISION SERVICE IN CHIBOUGAMAU REGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that a certain number of people will be able to receive colour television broadcast to-day, is the Secretary of State in a position to tell us whether the residents of the towns of Chibougamau and Chapais will at least be given the privilege of receiving without costs black and white broadcasts?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this question is not of extreme urgency in the present circumstances.

[English]

TRADE

REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST FALSE ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the President of the Privy Council and ask whether the government has received a request from the Retail Merchants Association of Canada "seeking tougher federal . . . laws to shield the public from false and misleading advertising," as reported in the Globe and Mail of August 30. If such a request has been received, what action will be taken?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I take notice of this question and answer it tomorrow morning?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the action that the government and parliament are taking regarding the wages of railway workers, will the government now reconsider the matter of improving the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is not a matter that by any stretch of the responsibilities of the Minister of Transport would come within his jurisdiction, but I will bring the matter to the attention of my colleagues at the first opportunity.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister also telephone Mr. Donald Gordon?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is quite probable that Mr. Gordon will get the message without the necessity of any telephoning on my part.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBLE ALTERATION OF FEDERAL EQUALIZATION PAYMENT FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, following the meeting he had with Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan regarding the possibility of salvaging part of the $35 million that Saskatchewan stands to lose under the new federal equalization payment formula, the government has given any consideration to alterations in that formula as projected; and did the minister say, as reported by Mr. Thatcher, that he would do his best to put the position of the government of Saskatchewan before his colleagues? Has the minister anything to report in this connection, and in particular will he give an assurance that the government has not yet arrived at any final decision on the question of alteration of the formula for equalization payments?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the final words of the Leader of the Opposition in part but not wholly. What we have not finally agreed upon is what proposal to place before the premiers, so it is not necessary for us to make any alterations in any formula that has been put forward. We did ask some of our officials to visit the provincial capitals and discuss with them certain principles. Out of this Mr. Thatcher drew the inference that there would be no payment to Saskatchewan, but such was never intended and I do not think the province of Saskatchewan is going to find its position so drastically altered in any proposal that we place before the provinces.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a supplementary question which I wish to direct to the Minister of Finance. In some of the tax sharing agreements there has been a provision that a province will not get less under any new formula than it enjoyed under a previous agreement. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to retain such a provision in the agreement which he is going to submit to the provinces?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker; and I would question the interpretation that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has put on previous tax sharing agreements. However, in any event no such assurance will be given to any province. There has been a great change in the relative position of the provinces of Canada partly owing to the excellent administration of Mr. Thatcher since he came to office. There has been a great improvement in the financial position of Saskatchewan which cannot help but be reflected in the tax equalization payments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it because of appreciation for the excellence of the Thatcher administration that the Prime Minister did not visit Saskatchewan on the occasion of the meeting of the Liberals of the three western provinces?

COAL

ACTION TO BE TAKEN FOLLOWING ASSISTANCE REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the matters concerning the Nova Scotia coal industry are still under active consideration. If so, will the government announce its intentions in this respect?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): They are under even more active consideration than when the last question was asked concerning this matter, and I have no doubt that a conclusion will be reached very shortly.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, possibly the Prime Minister could explain to the union, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare, what "very soon" means, since the $25 million grant was supposed to be made available last November.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DAMAGE TO SALMON SPAWNING GROUNDS BY LOG RUN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to address my question to the Minister of Fisheries. I would like to ask him whether the government of British Columbia, despite its preoccupation with another matter, since the house last sat before the recess, has clarified or revised its position on the very important matter of resource management arising from the driving of logs on the Stellako river. In any event, can the minister inform the house as to the position of this matter at the present time?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that since the house recessed in July I have been in communication with the two British Columbia ministers concerned. We have decided to have a meeting in the near future at which we will discuss this matter, and I am sure we can arrive at satisfactory conclusions.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATION ACT

PROVISION FOR RESUMPTION OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS AND SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE

The house resumed, from Wednesday August 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-230, to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 6—Terms of collective agreements amended.

• (10:30 a.m.)

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, last night I announced that when clause 6 came up for consideration I intended to move an amendment. I am sure that hon. members will understand, after the clear statement made by the minister of health and welfare and the further statement by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, that the intention was to implement the Munroe recommendations. I have never had any doubt in my mind, as Minister of Labour, nor have the officials of my department that in the end the 18 per cent recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and later concurred in by another experienced chairman, Hon. Mr. Cameron, would constitute a floor, I therefore move:

That clause 6 be amended by deleting the word "and" after the words "January 1, 1966" in line 29, page 3, and after the words "July 1, 1966", in line 30 and add, "an additional 4 per cent effective January 1, 1967, and an additional 6 per cent effective July 1, 1967."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour stated that never in his mind nor in the minds of his officials was there any doubt that the basic amount in respect of the increases recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe would be carried into effect. He added that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had spoken with such clarity that there could be no doubt. Their clarity, however, was not produced until the opposition took a forceful and definite stand on this question.

I felt rather sorry for the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other evening as he spoke on television. He produced almost—I do not know what you might call it—a magic explanation whereby 4 per cent and 4 per cent actually added up to 18 per cent. It was a remarkable example of what a man can do with figures, but nobody believed him. I do not think he believed it himself.

Last evening—and it is not for me to exacerbate the finer sensibilities of the minister—he was the picture of a person who had landed in a position that was, to say the least, uncomfortable. He was joined by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in a way that—well, it was an amazing performance. There they were for a moment speaking for the government, and the next moment they were flat on the floor. Even Cassius Clay never imagined knocking out two ministers within a few minutes. While yet the light holds forth to burn, the worst of sinners may return. They are lining up now, and an amendment has been moved.

How much discussion would have been saved if this government had proceeded in this way from the beginning. They did not fool anybody. They did not delude anybody. Why did they bring in the bill in the manner in which they did? The government was thinking about this and the Minister of Labour was convinced that ultimately it would be attained, but he could not have told his colleagues. He did not tell parliament. He could not, though, because he was more or less denied the opportunity as a result of his position as mediator.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Why wasn't this done? This is exactly what was recommended by these commissions. Were the government trying, by failing to accept the Munroe recommendations, to bring about a strike? Did they hope for a strike? Well, if they did not, and I only hope they did not, they did everything they possibly could to bring it about. They could not have adopted a formula that would have been more successful to bring about a strike than they did.

Now then, this was something for which we fought, and we were ridiculed. We were called obstructionists; we were going to be responsible before the Canadian people for daring to take a stand, but we took that stand. We realize now once more the power of parliament and the power of public opinion. The government had to back down. It is not a new position for them. This is a government that has followed that course; but it is difficult to discuss questions in parliament when we are discussing matters which the government wants to change while pretending that what has been presented is the best available.

I ask the minister this. What additional plans has the government to provide the assurance or at least the hope of job security? I should like to see this bill made an effective bill that will bring the men back to work. There is no question whatever that the law of Canada must be obeyed, or we are ended as a democracy. The formula now incorporated in the amendment, however, was put before the unions and almost overwhelmingly rejected. We must not allow ourselves to be placed in the position that laws passed by parliament shall first receive the approval in anticipation of any person or group of persons. Otherwise parliament simply becomes an instrument in the hands of institutions or individuals outside of parliament.

Recognizing that as a sound principle—to do otherwise, of course, would admit that parliament is not sovereign or supreme within its jurisdiction—I would first ask the minister this question. Has he every reason to believe that if this amendment is accepted—and we press for it—it will mean the acceptance of the laws of parliament without any equivocation? That is something on which we ought to have an assurance.

The government has turned a somersault. What it tried to do was to provide this "four and four", or this 6 per cent, for the year 1966. But they did not get away with it owing to the opposition of two parties in this house. Public opinion forced a change. Therefore, because of its material importance, I ask that parliament now be made aware of what has passed in this connection.

Second, will the government, realizing as it does that this very recommendation has been turned down, also place before us as part of this bill certain of the fringe benefits in connection with job security, recommended by the several commissions, and also the recommendations of the Freedman report which can be, in the opinion of the government, implemented?

I would think that if the government wants to bring together this nation in a dedication to unity in our industrial and national life—and in this regard there is a terrible responsibility upon us—then parliament must not produce a bill that is challenged in anticipation. I am not going into the details of what I have in mind, but I would say this. I do not like using the word "implore", but I would implore the government to offer something more than this one provision—a provision which has already been turned down—so that labour in all parts of Canada will have removed from its mind and heart the fear of a continuing reduction in jobs by reason of automation. We have to accept automation; to take any other stand is to try to hold back the advances of time.

I make this appeal not in a partisan way; I make it for the purpose of trying to do something to assure that the laws passed by parliament will be carried out. You cannot pass laws if there is a national feeling that those laws are lacking that degree of justice and equity which should characterize the laws of parliament.

I would ask the government to make a declaration in this regard. We do not want to place the parliament of Canada and the House of Commons in the position where a law fails to bring about not only support for the legislation but a feeling of amity, coupled with the desire to fully co-operate.

I believe if the government would just add the expression of a general principle regarding this important matter of job security, the matter of sickness, holidays, and so on, without going into any detail in relation thereto, this would go a long way toward placing before the Canadian people the unity which this parliament must try to achieve, the government now having finally agreed with the contentions raised by this party from the very beginning in the opening speech, the only speech made on the subject from our side. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that together we will be able to bring about a statute that will assure a degree of peace in respect of the industry to which this legislation applies, and I therefore ask the minister to give consideration to what I have said. I do not want to go into detail. I ask not for a simple declaration of hope and expectation in relation to the negotiations, but for a declaration of principle, namely that in negotiation certain general principles shall be accepted. If we are given that, then if this bill becomes law, as it is apparent it will, we will have behind it not only the prestige and power of parliament but as well the general acceptance of all Canadians, labour and non-labour alike.

Mr. Nicholson: I do not wish to embark on a contentious debate at this point but I am somewhat at a loss, because last night I understood that the hon. member for Kamloops was speaking for his party, and in the course of his remarks which appeared in Hansard at page 7921 he said:

> I congratulate the minister and the government for having made a sensible move with which we concur and which we have been urging for some time.

Then on page 7922 the hon. gentleman made a statement which I think is somewhat different from what the Leader of the Opposition proposed this morning. As reported in the first paragraph and subsequently on page 7922, the hon. member for Kamloops said:

> It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that of almost the same, if not equal concern to the employees as the matter of wages are the conditions of work or what one might call fringe benefits on the one hand and the recommendations of the Freedman report on the other. I am not suggesting for a moment, and it is not the position of this party for one second, that everything demanded by one side in the dispute has to be conceded before operations or negotiations are resumed. May I make that clear. On the other hand, I should like to make very clear that it is my view that the men who work have very legitimate and real concern in that at the moment they have no assurance that any consideration will be given, or that any bargaining in good faith will be undertaken with respect to those two very important aspects or areas of employment. What they are asking is not that parliament should write the details of a settlement into this legislation but rather that we should undertake to these men that as a condition of their resuming work the mediator will be directed, and indeed will be required, to give attention to these matters and to have the parties bargain in good faith with respect to those two areas that I have mentioned. If we could get some assurance from the minister and the government either by way of amendment or statement as to what will be the policy that will be laid down—and so on.

An hon. Member: That is what he said just now.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Kamloops said "or statement from the minister". Again, at page 7923—and I do not wish to become involved in an argument at this stage—I said, as reported:

I think the quickest way to answer the constructive observations made by the hon. member for Kamloops would be to refer to clause 9 of the bill which states:

1. The Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator or mediators . . . who shall forthwith endeavour to mediate the matters in dispute—

That is, the matters in dispute in all five of these conciliation proceedings.

And I then gave the assurance which was asked for, and I thought that it was satisfactory to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this. Why not place in the bill that general principle which has been enunciated? What we say in parliament is not effective when it comes to the interpretation of statutes. I am not asking for details. I am in no way tied down to the draftsmanship of the following, but I am asking that something along these lines should be contained in the bill, something in addition to that which is presently provided. For example:

—and that part of the collective bargaining to be undertaken shall include provision for discussion and negotiation between the railways and the unions concerning work changes elimination of jobs and general working conditions which may be affected by the introduction of technological or other changes.

As I say, I am in no way tying the government or the members of this committee to the wording or to the actual changes which should be made. I am simply asking that we should say, as a principle of parliament, that these are things which we believe to be of material importance. I do this because both industry and labour would then realize that these are matters which should receive first consideration. They are the responsibility of parliament.

The minister says he accepts the general principle. He says he has given an assurance of this by his words in this house. Surely he realizes—and this is in no way critical of the minister—that when different ministers say different things it becomes important for the average person not to misinterpret one or the other. I am simply asking that the government give consideration to incorporating within the statute something along the lines I have suggested so that when this bill becomes law we shall not need to look back and see what the minister said in Hansard at page 7923 or whatever page it is. How ridiculous that would be. Instead, we would have in the legislation the enunciation of the principle which he supports, as he stated in the quotation he has made, as being a general principle acceptable to parliament. We would be able to say "This is the law".

As a result of our stand a change has been made from the 4 per cent and 4 per cent to the actual terms recommended by Judge Munroe. I know that something sacrosanct attaches to the words the minister may have spoken. I agree with what he said. Let us incorporate this principle in the statute so that nobody need go to the words of one minister or another to know what is to be done. In saying this I am in no way casting aspersions on the complete integrity of the minister, but the hon. gentleman cannot speak for parliament. He can only speak for himself and, we expect, for the government.

I am asking that the principle concerning which the minister was quoting himself with approval as a stand dedicated to it should be incorporated in the legislation so that it may be known to everyone in this country who looks at the statute, rather than appearing on some page in Hansard where a declaration of that principle is made.

Mr. Nicholson: I should like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that the legislation already provides in subsequent clauses for precisely what he has suggested. With regard to technological changes, I gave an assurance last night as reported at page 7923. I said:

With regard to the Freedman report, the committee already has the assurance given by the Prime Minister earlier this evening and when we reach the relevant clause later I am sure this matter can be cleared up.

Mr. Lewis: I rise to say a few words on the amendment which is proposed because I believe there are some matters which it would be useful to have on record.

To begin with, I wish to say we welcome the amendment the minister proposes. Like others in this committee, we were intending to move such an amendment had this not been done by the government. I welcome it, regardless of the motivation, or the occasion, for its production. But I respectfully and urgently suggest to the government and to the Minister of Labour in particular that we are not likely to make the change any more acceptable to the workers by insisting on something which is not the case, namely by insisting that it is merely a clarification of what was already in the bill.

It is nothing of the sort unless the minister has some other amendments in mind. It is a change in the principle of the bill, and that it is a change in principle is evidenced by the statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other night and by the words used a few moments ago by the Minister of Labour. The latter explained, when the amendment was moved—and I am not a shorthand writer—that neither he nor the officers of the department had any doubt that eventually the 18 per cent would be accepted.

What the minister has in mind, and what the Minister of National Health and Welfare surely meant the other night when he said he had no doubt 18 per cent would be the ultimate basis of the settlement, was that the 18 per cent was to be a ceiling. That is what the minister had in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Lewis: I suggest there is no other way of reading the words of the minister and the words of the Minister of Labour just a few moments ago.

Mr. Greene: May I ask the hon. member a question. I wonder if he could tell me whether he agrees with the words of the hon. member for York South, as recorded at page 7846 of Hansard of August 30:

Mind you—

—speaking of the Munroe recommendation—

—from my practical experience I cannot imagine that any arbitrator would go below that recommendation—

Mr. Lewis: That was a very charming way of asking the question, and let me inform the Minister of Agriculture that I intended in about two seconds to refer to that statement. I was going to refer to it when making some remarks on the statement made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Of course I said it then, and I say it now.

I also said, if the minister had read on—though I am not accusing him of deliberately leaving it out—that there is not any guarantee in the bill. But now there is a difference between the two situations. I am not making this point for debating purposes. If the government wants to look on every remark that is made in that light it may do so, but I am making the point that the bill, as amended, will be more acceptable to the workers rather than before when the government tried to suggest to them that the 18 per cent was guaranteed even though it was not in the bill. Now they know they do not have to start arguing about that before a mediator.

The difference between the bill previously and the amended version is that the previous bill meant that when the unions and railways got together to negotiate, the railways would have taken the position that they could not afford any money for 1967. The unions would then have made their particular demands and the argument over the 10 per cent already recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe would have started all over again.

That is a terribly important difference and members of the government will do their bill, and their action in amending it, a great deal more good and will make the bill much more acceptable if they stop trying to save face, something which is not very important, and point out to the workers that the change which has been made is a change in principle and a change in effect. Then the workers will see that what the government has done was done with sincerity and that its intent was to end the strike in a proper way.

That is why I make this appeal to the government. Do not say this is merely a clarification, because then the men on the line will say "If that is so, we cannot get any more." It is the right of the railway workers to negotiate for something over the 18 per cent which they have already rejected and against which they went out on strike. That is important in order to persuade them to go back to work and obey the law properly.

That is why I welcome this amendment, not merely because it achieves the 18 per cent but because it sets 18 per cent as a guaranteed floor, and the striking workers may hope that they will be able to persuade mediators and arbitrators to increase that and therefore the strike will not have been in vain with respect to the wage item.

Mr. Marchand: You stated that the workers went on strike on the Munroe report. Is that what you said?

Mr. Lewis: I said that they rejected the recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe and went on strike against them.

Mr. Marchand: But they did not go on strike on Mr. Justice Munroe's report, because it was never offered to them by the companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: May I say without, I hope, being insulting, that the distinction which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration just made is precisely the kind of casuistry in which he engaged in his speech yesterday; pure sophistry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question. He said, if I heard him aright, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare said this 18 per cent would be a ceiling. Would the hon. gentleman in fairness, and without sophistry, give us the precise reference in Hansard that bears that out, because I cannot find it.

Mr. Lewis: I very carefully gave the actual words which the Minister of National Health and Welfare used. I did it from memory but I am confident he said this would be the ultimate basis of settlement.

Some hon. Members: Basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman read the minister's words instead of putting his interpretation on them?

Mr. Lewis: I am not going to engage in that kind of discussion. I am going to put something before the committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak while this impolite and completely unacceptable behavior on the other side takes place. If they are going to shout I am just going to stand still, because I do not propose to engage with them in the undignified sort of shouting match in which they like to engage.

I want to say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who indicated yesterday that he had forgotten some of his experiences, that if the union committee had been willing to accept the 18 per cent recommendation of Mr. Justice Munroe, the likelihood is that the union nominee would have signed it and we would not now be in this position. Therefore, if the union nominee did not sign it and the unions did not accept it, this means they struck against the particular recommendation that was made.

I listened yesterday to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with admiration and sadness; admiration for his great eloquence and passion, sadness that they were used to make an elaborate and agonizing rationalization for a position that must have been untenable to him. Each one of us feels he has to do the things he believes himself impelled to do. If that is what the minister wanted to do it is, of course, his right. During the course of his speech, in reply to an interjection of mine, he said there are two kinds of commitments, one a legal guarantee and the other a moral guarantee, and he waxed eloquent about the second.

There was once a labour leader in this country, a man now dead, whose name was Silby Barrett. He was a miner with a definite, characteristic way of speaking. He used to tell us that when he was engaged in negotiations and the employer said to him "You don't have to write everything down, we can have a gentleman's agreement," his reply—and I am using his rather picturesque language—was, "Every time an employer says that to me, I says to him a verbal agreement ain't worth the paper it's writ on."

Lest anyone think Mr. Silby Barrett was wrong I remind the committee that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration talked a great deal about precedents. Let me draw to his attention a precedent recorded in Hansard. In 1950 there was a railway strike, and among the union groups involved were hotel employees and water transport employees and their organizations. During the time the bill to end that strike was before this house in 1950 the C.C.F. members at that time, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late member for Vancouver East at that time, and Mr. M. J. Coldwell, drew to the attention of the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, that a section of that act was ambiguous and ran the danger of leaving the hotel employees and the water transport employees out on a limb, and that they would not be treated in the same way.

• (11:10 a.m.)

In answer to these charges raised by members of the C.C.F., Mr. St. Laurent, the then prime minister, at page 75 of Hansard for August 30, 1950 said:

They—

Referring to the hotel employees and the water transport employees.

—are not being discriminated against in any way. The government, in the bill which it recommended to parliament, has treated them in the same way as the other unions, namely, as one unit; and everything that binds the arbitrator with respect to any one binds him as much with respect to those two small groups as it does to the others.

Later on in his remarks he said:

It may be that they would agree on different terms of contracts or on different arrangements.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interjected and said:

Let us have this clear. The Prime Minister just said that the arbitrator is bound in his dealings with the hotel and water transport workers in the same way as in his dealings with the others.

He said something more and in answer to that Mr. St. Laurent said that he would not like to discuss those details. The hon. member had referred to some details. Mr. St. Laurent continued:

... but in the recomendation we made to parliament and in the bill itself we have attempted to treat as one unit all those involved in this dispute. On all of the points in which we have provided expressly, we have stated the arbitrator cannot undo what we are doing.

The unions came before the arbitrator, Mr. Justice Kellock. At the very beginning of the discussion the leader of the railway unions, Mr. Hall, drew his attention to the statements of the prime minister. Mr. Justice Kellock in connection with the principles of the interpretation of statutes said:

The principle is that you get what parliament intended from the statute, that the statute is the collective decision. You do not take what some individual said in discussion.

As a result, when the award was brought down by the arbitrator the hotel employees and water transport employees received a smaller wage increase; their contract was for a different term, and they did not get the 40 hour week which the railway workers got. That is your moral guarantee, made at that time in all good faith, I am certain, and with the utmost sincerity, I am certain, by the prime minister of that day. When you interpret a statute the only kind of guarantee is to have it in the statute. That is the reason I am glad the government has accepted the representations made not only in this house but made to the Prime Minister and perhaps to the Minister of Labour by the leaders of the railway unions involved.

Mr. Marchand: If you are trying to demonstrate that the moral guarantees do not exist, how then can you make the statements you have made?

Mr. Lewis: I did not say they do not exist. I demonstrated to the minister that they are not in all cases adequate, and that when you are dealing with a piece of legislation which is going to come before a tribunal which is going to have to interpret it, it is not only inadequate but is irrelevant. The arbitrator may say that he is not bound by what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration says. He may say that the minister is a very fine gentleman but that the principles of interpretations of a statute are that the statute speaks for itself. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that it be in the bill. If it is not in the bill it is of no effect at all, and the most flowery and eloquent words of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—and there were many of them—cannot possibly persuade any arbitrator that that is what the law is when in fact it does not say it.

Another reason I welcome the amendment is that it now can become, and I hope it will, the floor rather than the ceiling, and that the unions will be able to negotiate—and I hope they will succeed in the negotiation—something above that. Last night the Minister of Labour quoted from a conciliation board report which I had signed to the effect that I supported the durable goods standard. The other day I indicated that in my opinion the only way to avoid the possibility of strikes in the railway industry is to set up an objective standard by which the terms and conditions of work for railway employees are measured. We must have an outside comparison and that comparison must be—as I have said on many occasions and in a number of reports which I either wrote myself or which the chairman wrote and I signed—one which makes it clear that the employees of the railways are not subsidizing public policy. As I indicated the other day in respect of the new Railway Act it will be inevitable for decades to come that the railways will be required to carry certain freight at rates less than they might otherwise charge and will be required to carry on passenger services which in their view are uneconomic.

We will require that because Canada requires it. It is right that they should do so. But so long as we require it, so long also will it be necessary for all the people of Canada to make it possible for the railways to carry freight at less than the charge they would otherwise make. There is nothing wrong with the public treasury making that possible. That is the only way we can have a transportation system in Canada. We cannot run it any other way. Therefore over the years that I have been a member of railway conciliation boards, we have taken the position, which I think is a correct one, that you must have an outside standard of comparison, one which gives the railway workers an adequate return and decent conditions so they are not required to subsidize the decisions of public policy for Canada as a whole.

The durable goods standard was chosen. I hope members of the committee may forgive me if I put some of this history on the record. The durable goods standard was chosen, in the words of Mr. Justice Kellock in 1952, because it was comparable, he said, "as nearly as may be". At that time the comparison was between the average of the hourly earnings of all the non-op employees and the average of the earnings of all employees in the durable goods industry. This was in 1952.

As I suggested the other night, only in one year since 1952 have the railway employees been in a parallel position to that of the durable goods standard, namely in 1953. You will find this in the report of the union nominee, Mr. Crowe. Every year since then they have been paid between 4 per cent and 5 per cent below the durable goods earnings. The research worker for the railway unions informed the board of conciliation that according to his calculations this 4 per cent to 5 per cent below the standard, which they were told they ought to be able to enjoy, was equivalent for each of the 120,000 employees involved to $2,700 over the period.

Why were they below the durable goods standard? This also is of interest and it will take me only a minute or two to put it to the committee.

• (11:20 a.m.)

In 1954 the railway unions, looking at the situation in Canada—and this is the trademark of railway employees to some extent—found that the railway workers, except for a pension plan which was as good as most pension plans in the country, had none or almost none of the other fringe benefits. They had no statutory holidays in their contract, no medical plan and no sick leave provision. They decided in 1954 that they would ask for some of these fringe benefits. Being responsible unions—and some of their members have said to me that they are a little too responsible about this kind of thing—they decided to ask for fringe benefits only and not a wage increase, because the fringe benefits were going to be costly if they were to be granted. The result was that between 1952 and 1956, for four years, the railway workers did not receive a single penny by way of a wage increase. That put them below the durable goods standard to a substantial extent.

When the board of which I was a member looked at the situation in 1956 the chairman decided—and I must say that rather reluctantly but in logic I had to agree with him—it was impossible in one fell swoop to wipe out the entire gap and an award was made that still kept them below the durable goods standard, and this situation was perpetuated.

What in effect has happened is that the railway workers and their unions have said in 1966, with the economy going full blast, with the railways' earnings at the highest level in their history making considerable, indeed, huge profits, this is the year they must catch up and get themselves in a position of real comparison with their likes in outside industries. In order to make the durable goods standard not only comparable "as nearly as it may be", but more comparable so that the comparison is really like with like, the unions proposed, and to me it is thoroughly logical, that the durable goods earnings be adjusted in respect of certain differences between the mix of the durable work force and the mix of the non-operating work force. This would justify a further increase in my opinion of 25 per cent. Thus I say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that in proposing a 25 per cent increase the other day—I was not bargaining—I did so because it seemed to me that what Mr. Crowe recommended, on the basis of the evidence of the unions, was entirely logical and right.

I could spend a good deal of time insisting, as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has done, that the government caved in or gave in, and I agree with that position; but I suggest to him and to all other members of the house there is nothing I could add that would give the point more emphasis. What is important at this time—and I appeal to the government with all the seriousness I can command to believe that what I say is valid, now that this amendment has been made—is to make sure it is acceptable to the workers. In addition to the Freedman report and the other things that have been mentioned, the thing that will make it acceptable to them is a clear admission by the government and a recognition by parliament, by the news media and by the people of Canada, that what the law now provides is that the railway unions have a right to come before a mediator or arbitrator to seek a 25 per cent increase or an increase anywhere between 18 and 25 per cent.

I appeal to the government not to insist that the purpose of this amendment is a mere clarification. It is not just that; it is a fundamental change in the principle of the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Lewis: The government must frankly admit that. I can say to the government members and other members of this house that in conversations with some of the railway union leaders, even since last night, I have pressed upon them that they should emphasize this fact to their members so the present bill is clearly understood and the action they may take, and I hope it will be the right action, is consonant with the present bill. I urge upon the government that they can help to make this bill acceptable if they recognize the fundamental change in principle their amendment has produced. In this way the workers will believe, rather than what they formerly believed—a belief which I shared, which other members of my party shared and which we had the right to share—that the government wanted to make the 18 per cent a ceiling—

Mr. Pearson: Oh, no.

Mr. Lewis: The Prime Minister says "Oh, no". I have never done anything but pay tribute to the Prime Minister's honesty. If the government did not intend what I suggest but intended what the bill now says I am delighted that at last he did what he intended to do. I am not going to prolong this kind of exchange, but it is just a pity that this was not made clear earlier. The result has been a development in the minds of the striking workers, whatever the reason may be—I am not speaking from guesswork—which will take a little work by the leaders to remove and change. The government can help remove and change that fear by frankly recognizing the fundamental change which is now in the bill. Never mind what was in the mind of the government; the fundamental change that is now in black and white in the bill should be admitted.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, —

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could be allowed to finish unless the Prime Minister is rising to ask a question. Because of certain words in clause 7 which may cast some doubt on whether a mediator or arbitrator will have the power to increase the per cent increase—I am not going into this in detail now because I would be out of order—I intend to move an amendment when we reach consideration of clause 10 in order to make it absolutely clear that nothing in the bill limits or restricts the powers of the mediator or board of arbitrators to award increases in addition to what is set out in the amended clause 6. I hope the minister will accept such an amendment so the workers will know beyond all doubt that this is precisely what the government intends, and will not have to read through all the sections of the act to find that out.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the fears the hon. gentleman has expressed are apparently based on an invalid and unwarranted interpretation of what the minister of health and welfare said the other evening. I will not paraphrase or interpret what he said; I will read a part of his statement as it appears in Hansard at page 7852. The minister, speaking about this particular provision in the bill as it then existed, said:

> It is a provisional interim settlement for 1966. The parties are free to change this figure through the process of mediation provided under this bill.

Surely that is clear enough. That process applies to any amendment covering 1967, and that should be obvious. If there is any doubt about that we should remove that doubt at once, but how can there be any doubt in view of what we have said? At the same page in Hansard the minister is reported as having said:

> —it is unrealistic that any settlement reached through agreement or arbitration will be less than the total wage package.

This bill provides for a provisional settlement for 1966 and 1967 as recommended by Chairman Munroe. The parties are free to change this by mediation and, if mediation fails, by the arbitration process provided in the bill. When hon. members talk about the minister's statement being that this represented a maximum, which I think was the expression used—

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: A ceiling.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, a ceiling. When hon. members say the minister's statement was that this represented a ceiling, there is nothing in the minister's statement that justifies this.

Mr. Pickersgill: In fact the reverse.

Mr. Pearson: Quite the reverse, as I have just indicated. I regret very much that that interpretation has been given to the minister's statement and therefore given to this amendment, because it is an entirely unjustified interpretation.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I learned a long time ago, and I am sure the right hon. Prime Minister learned it long before I did, that when people argue about the interpretation to be placed on words it is rather an endless exercise. Let me merely say to the right hon. Prime Minister that whatever was in the mind of the minister, when the bill said—as it did—4 per cent effective January 1, 1966, and 4 per cent effective July 1, 1966, and said nothing more, it was perfectly legitimate to conclude that the fight after the bill was passed would be to get the additional 10 per cent instead of trying to get above it.

The workers were right to fear this wording, and I tell the committee without any hesitation that this is what I feared, and I saw myself arguing this question before the arbitrators. I have had the pleasure of arguing against the present president of the C.P.R., Mr. Sinclair, on a number of occasions; I have had the pleasure of arguing against other C.P.R. and C.N.R. counsel and—

An hon. Member: "Pleasure"?

Mr. Lewis: Well, Mr. Chairman, all lawyers enjoy arguing. After all, as hon. members heard the other night, that is what they are paid for. I have argued with those gentlemen and I know as certainly as anything that when the parties came before the arbitrator the railway would say that the law provides 4 per cent and 4 per cent, he was bound by that, and nothing could be offered for 1967. Instead of arguing before the mediator and arbitrator the question of increasing the 18 per cent, all the energy and attention would have been centred around getting the 10 per cent already recommended.

No one can deny that. That is the reason for the justifiable fear on the part of the unions. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said—and I would ask that nobody shout out his words because I know them as well as anyone—after the hon. member for Kamloops spoke, as is to be found on page 7856:

> Mr. Speaker, the subsequent remarks which I made clearly illustrated that these further percentages were included. If I did not read them, I intended to read them. They should be part of the total picture, the total 18 per cent that will likely be the ultimate basis of the settlement.

I fully realize that the word is "ultimate"—

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, would my hon. friend mind telling me what he is reading from?

Mr. Lewis: I am reading from Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: What page?

Mr. Lewis: Page 7856, the right hand column, fourth paragraph from the bottom. I will read it again:

> Mr. Speaker, the subsequent remarks which I made clearly illustrated that these further percentages were included. If I did not read them, I intended to read them. They should be part of the total picture, the total 18 per cent that will likely be the ultimate basis of the settlement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): "Basis" of the settlement.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate—

Mr. McEachen: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lewis: May I conclude my sentence?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lewis: May I conclude my sentence?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has risen on question of privilege.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry. I didn't hear him.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I object very strongly to the use being made of this excerpt from the Hansard report.

An hon. Member: Did you say it?

Mr. MacEachen: Of course I said it. I said the 18 per cent would be the ultimate basis of the settlement. What is a basis? It is a foundation, not a ceiling. The hon. member is trying to suggest that the foundation is the ceiling. I made it absolutely clear in that statement that 18 per cent was a basis, a foundation for negotiation and arbitration. The amount could be increased above that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: I also said, as is reported at page 7852 of Hansard:

> Anyone who has any understanding of collective bargaining, as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has, will readily agree that it is unrealistic that any settlement reached through agreement or arbitration will be less than the total wage package.

What am I talking about? I am talking about a foundation, not a ceiling, and I object very strongly to the hon. member for York South making this obvious misrepresentation and distortion of my argument of the other evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I am not surprised that the minister objects. I have had the experience of saying things which I later tried to explain away.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I have had to do it and I imagine that every hon. member of this house has had to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I sympathize with the minister about placing himself in that position, particularly since he made a speech with great eloquence and passion arguing that the bill was absolutely all right and needed no change, and now finds himself in the position where a change has been introduced which according to him was unnecessary. I can quite understand that he feels uneasy and uses strong language like "misrepresentation" and "distortion". I tell the minister that he can use any language he likes. I believed when I heard those words, I believed when I read those words, that they meant the minister intended that 18 per cent would be the settlement. If that was not his intention I am very glad to hear it was not. When I said what I did I was not misrepresenting, I was not distorting; I was saying what his words produced in my mind and what I know they produced in the minds of the railway unions and the labour people who were listening to them.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lewis: If the minister wants to engage in an argument, we can do that; but everybody has said this bill should be passed as soon as possible and I do not want to delay it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I am not interested in pursuing this matter further, Mr. Chairman, except to repeat what I said, namely that the minister will serve the purpose of the amendment better by admitting that the amendment to the bill now makes the position clearer than it was before. It makes clear what he says he wanted to say, namely, that the 18 per cent was the floor and not the ceiling. If the minister and I agree on that fact, I am ready without any hesitation, for the sake of ending the strike, to stop accusing him of doing one thing or another. The important thing is—and this is my reason for referring to this matter—that the minister and his colleagues not undo the possible good which they did by the amendment by insisting that it was always the same thing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Agreed. Let us go on.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Stand on your desk after this, Allan; it's harder to pull the rug from under you.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks on my own behalf and on behalf of my party, on the amendment to clause 6 which we hoped for whole-heartedly.

I shall not take too much of the time of the house, because too many speakers have done so since last Monday. I believe that if Canada's population had seen certain shows in this chamber, it would be very sorry for the behaviour of this house in such a case. It seems to me that the situation in Canada is too serious to engage in politicking, to play with words and to try and get out of a bill a meaning that is not in it and to try and gain popularity to the prejudice of labour and industry and of all those who call us on the telephone all day long to ask us to bring this strike to its conclusion.

Mr. Chairman, as far as our party is concerned, we have done all we could; only two of our members spoke and they simply expressed our general views on this strike and on what we expected of the government.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) told us that the question of wages and working conditions could not be wholly dealt with by this house. According to what we have heard in this house these last few days, I agree with the minister one hundred per cent that if a collective agreement had to be drawn up, it would take at least, two years, especially in the atmosphere now prevailing in this house.

I think that if political games could be stopped on both sides, discussions would be a lot more simple. But, unfortunately, you cannot prevent a politician from playing politics any more than a doctor from practising medicine.

One thing we can prevent, however, is excesses. And heavens knows that we have had our fill of excesses since Monday, Mr. Chairman; I hope the house will show some sense of responsibility so that the bill will be passed by this evening.

However, things would have been much simpler if the government had introduced clear legislation instead of getting lost in implications, clause 6 is a striking example. In fact, if the government had inserted in the bill right from the start what it was finally compelled to put in by way of amendment, the Minister of Manpower would not have been exposed to ridicule following the famous speech he made to try to make us see some moral sense in Bill No. C-230.

We understood his remarks to mean that he wanted to leave the final decision to those who are truly responsible and that was not so bad but it is even better when the legislation spells out that the immediate increase will be the basis of future negotiations and not a moral ceiling, as stated in the original bill and as claimed by some hon. members. It is mostly that point which caused 75 per cent of the misunderstanding and useless discussions.

Under the amendment, railway workers will then get an increase of 4 per cent retroactive to January 1966, another one of 4 per cent retroactive to July 1966, a third one of 4 per cent in January 1967 and an additional one of 6 per cent in July 1967. Contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others who seek to reap a political advantage from this, the amendment was not moved at the suggestion of the opposition; it was just simply proposed by the various boards.

That is why I stated at the beginning of my remarks that the debate could have taken only one day if the bill had been drawn along the lines of the board recommendations. It will remain for the mediators and the two parties concerned to make the final adjustments. If those terms had been as clear as they are now, we would already be considering the second bill.

But something else has me puzzled, since I met the members of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway and Transport Workers which has 23,000 members. It is a wholly Canadian union but affiliated to the American Railway Workers Unions. That group is completely opposed to increases on the present percentage basis, because once again that favours the highly-paid people.

Mr. Chairman, I have here the brief submitted by the Canadian Brotherhood which reads in part as follows:

> The requests made by the Brotherhood are as follows
> that all wage rates be increased by 90 cents per hour—
> —that an employee with at least two years of service must not be laid off, etc.

The brief deals with working conditions, but our concern as regards clause 6 of Bill No. C-230 is the financial terms; therefore, I will not wander from the subject, like the Leader of the Opposition did so well last night. I will keep to the salary conditions. And to prove it, Mr. Chairman, the said 18 per cent which those who really need it, that is the small wage-earners, will get is equivalent to 20, 25 or 30 cents per hour, whereas the highly-paid people will get $1, $1.10 and $1.15 more.

I submit that it is precisely about that class of workers that we should think. To get a concrete example, I questioned a few workers. For instance, a clerk with a family, who has been working for the C.N.R. for 20 years, today earns $360 a month, for 174 hours of work, that is $2.05 per hour.

Another employee, who looks after the maintenance of a passenger train, earns $1.90 per hour after 15 years. An engineer earns $2.25 per hour after 40 years, and should he have an unfortunate accident like the one I mentioned last winter in my region, because he has to work under inadmissible conditions, the authorities of the C.N.R. hasten to give him a ticket. Another operating employee with 25 years experience earns $170 per week. It is a good salary, but he works 96 hours a week, which means $2.10 per hour. I would like to give you a host of cases in those classes of workers where clearly ridiculous salaries are paid, without talking about the conditions in which they have to live.

If you study the situation seriously, for some of them, the salaries are not adequate and for others, working conditions are not what they should be. On the matter of salaries, I prefer the proposal made by the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees, namely an increase of 90 cents per hour instead of 18, 20 and even 30 per cent. I will go even further, Mr. Chairman, and say that to be fair and to give a equitable increase, that increase should be limited to wages of $12,000 or less, in short, no increase should be allowed to those earning $12,000 or more, but 90 cents an hour should be given to those earning $12,000 or less. I think the proposal would be a great deal fairer.

Would the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) tell us whether that brief has been discussed during meetings with unions. It appears to have been ignored completely, since not a word has been heard about it since Monday. Were the voices of those trade-unionists who are, after all, 20,000 in number, neutralized under the power of American unions? I would like to know the views of the Minister of Labour in that respect.

As far as the requests of the Brotherhood are concerned, I trust their voices will be heard in committee and that the next mediator will allow the small ones as well as the big ones to have a say in the matter. We are, therefore, expecting the report which, according to the bill, will be submitted to us on November 15, 1966, to put forth proper claims.

In the meantime, everyone should assume his responsibilities because Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that in that whole matter parliament is not alone responsible for this state of affairs.

If we consider the Canadian National authorities, the chairman, the directors, who are 11 in number, the administrators who are 23 or 24 in number, we wonder whether they are not responsible for the disaster. That is why I also ask the Minister of Labour, the cabinet which appoints those persons, which is responsible for them, to try to find out whether they treated the workers as they should have, whether they did not instead remain undisturbed in their ivory tower and left the workers struggle with their poor wages and abject working conditions.

I think the culminating point of all that matter is to be found more with management than with the workers. We now have a group of administrators who seem to consider only the fabulous salary. When we consider, for example, $75,000 a year, apart from expenses, which amount to about $100,000 for the president of the Canadian National, will someone tell me that the chairman of the Canadian National is greater, more competent, has more responsibilities than the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson)? And yet he is paid twice as much as the Prime Minister! Well, this is a democracy—I am told he is more competent—and I have to consider the position to which he was elected by the people, but, I think that if Mr. Donald Gordon were running in an election, he would not receive 250 votes. When we compare the salary of that man with that of the leader of Canada, I say that not one civil servant should draw more than the leader of Canada. And here, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the cabinet to the fact that that race for salaries must come to an end. Is there some collusion between them, because not a word is heard, not one blame is made, and that in any crown corporation. Take the C.B.C. it is the same thing. They raise their own salaries. At the end of the year, they have a deficit. When they have a deficit, when they are in trouble, as we have just had with the workers, then they come to us and say: Sirs, you are the friends of the people, come and protect us, come and pay the deficit, go before the union members and help settle our mistakes, while we continue to take it easy.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Minister of Labour, of the cabinet, of the whole cabinet and of parliament to these blood-suckers who are mocking us, mocking parliament with their catastrophic salaries and who help put crown corporations in the red. And we accept that. Yes, we accept that. No, Mr. Chairman, I say that this state of affairs must cease and that all should assume their responsibilities. If the responsibility for the current strike lies with the authorities, let them be judged and if they have to be fired, let them be fired. That is all. For there is not a man better prepared than the president and the directors responsible for C.N.R. transport more qualified to deal with the worker. He is in a position to know what he needs, to know the conditions, and to set him up in a humane position, in a social environment where the worker will enjoy life.

That is the duty of those who have been appointed by the government and who are responsible for the Canadian National. It may be nice to hold a job, to have all the salary and refuse all responsibilities. Mr. Chairman, I say it is the responsibility of the cabinet to look into this and force those in charge of crown corporations to settle the working conditions of labour, the working conditions of crown employees, and if they cannot agree, let us throw them out.

Throw them out. Period. Being uninformed about the detailed organization of these companies, members of the house are unable to form an opinion. That is why, as I said earlier, the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Marchand) was right in saying that it was not up to the members of the house to deal with collective bargaining because they were not qualified to do so. It belongs to those people. Let everyone exercise his rights, carry out his own duties and mind his own business.

I ask the Minister of Labour to consider this aspect of the problem during the committee stage and stop bearing down the members right and left. Some people claim that we are not settling the strike. But really, how can we go about settling a strike? What is the use of a disagreement between employers and workers? What business is it of ours, logically? If every man assumed his responsibilities, if C.N.R. authorities assumed their responsibilities, there would not be any strike, because, after all, we are politicians and in studying this matter, we realize it is simply ridiculous to linger over the question of salaries of the railway workers, because we pay a salary to those who remain idle and allow the workers to starve, those who operate the railways.

In addition, those people are constantly badgered by five or six inspectors and auditors. I note that top management comprises approximately one third of the employees. They are greenhorns, just out of university who come to inspect. I saw in my area three inspectors conduct a little investigation during a week at the railway station—I shall not give any name because they will get after them—and where the agent could have done much better than they did at no cost at all. But I would not have liked to pay the bill of those three puppies who strutted around town for a week.

There must be an end to this with regard to the C.N.R. I saw two employees working on the tracks and three "foremen" supervising their work. Well, now.—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe that he is entering into various administrative details whereas he should be speaking on clause 6, more precisely, dealing with wages.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I believe I was precisely speaking of wages. Clause 6 deals with wage increases. I therefore say that present wages are completely inadequate; that is why I wish to call the hon. labour minister's attention and that of the cabinet on this matter. They will most probably hold a committee meeting, and when the committee discusses the matter I would like them to be aware of the opinion not only of the authorities, of the American unions, but also of that of a 100 per cent Canadian union, the Canadian brotherhood of employees, with a strength of 23,000 members.

I therefore hope that the hon. minister will seriously consider what I have just said.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, we hope that the railway authorities will consider the MacPherson report which is not at all favourable to the workers and we also hope they will be honest enough to read and try to put into practice the Freedman report, which is much closer to the workers.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we will find in this report the solution to all strikes across Canada, in the coming years.

• (12 noon)

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, last night when the Minister of Labour announced his intention to move an amendment to clause 6 when it was reached, and then read the words of the amendment he intended to move, I suggested there were some defects in the wording if it were meant to give effect to what the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Prime Minister were saying would be the intent of the amendment. As I read the amendment today I see there are still two serious defects in the legal terms which are required by statutes in order to achieve what I think the government and I am sure all members of the house hope will be the effect of the amendment.

In the first instance, I think the purpose of amending clause 6 is to provide a 4 per cent increase effective January 1, 1967 and an additional 6 per cent on July 1, 1967, not to amend the collective agreements which expired at the end of December, 1965. The clause put forward the minimum figure for arbitration purposes if arbitration becomes necessary.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is right or proper to suggest that the intention is to amend clause 6 so as to change the collective agreements by statute and fix that percentage as the amount of the increase. Surely if we are to take seriously the statements which have been made by ministers both yesterday and today—and I hope I can take them seriously—this is to be a minimum figure, not a fixed amount.

There is one other serious defect in the wording of the amendment, and it is this. While it speaks of an additional 4 per cent effective January 1, 1967 and another 6 per cent on July 1, 1967, I suggest it is possible, in view of the present wording of the clause, that some individual employees may not receive an 18 per cent increase. I suggest it is possible that the mediator or arbitration board could interpret the wording as setting an average increase of 18 per cent. Some employees might only receive 14 per cent or 12 per cent while others might receive over 18 per cent, but it would average out to 18 per cent. Since in my view that result is possible—and I have consulted some competent people in this matter—I think this would be a breach of faith so far as the workers are concerned and a violation of what is intended.

There has been far too much misrepresentation, if you want to call it that, or at least misunderstanding, up to this point of the debate about what parliament intends to do in connection with this dispute. Surely, Mr. Chairman, having now reached the stage where it seems that all parties agree that the intent of the amendment is good, we should use language which will avoid any breach of faith when the final arbitration decision is handed down, if things go that far.

I know there are differences in the amounts which should be granted to various categories or classes of employees. I think there are some who in justice should have relatively larger increases than others. But I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, to the government and particularly to the Minister of Labour that there is room above the 18 per cent minimum figure to make these adjustments. I do not think this parliament should now, after we have had all this difficulty, approve an amendment which will in fact legally allow an average increase of 18 per cent rather than provide an increase of 18 per cent as a guaranteed minimum to every single employee coming within the two categories under the collective agreements which are discussed in clause 6.

After the indication was given last night that this amendment would be introduced I telephoned a number of representatives of the labour unions and told them I thought they could tell their members that each one of them, if they went back to work, could expect to receive nothing less than at least an 18 per cent increase. They replied that if other considerations were referred to the mediator or arbitration board, relating to other fringe benefits, the question of job security and so on, they were of the opinion that the employees would probably accept them, would obey an order of parliament and would go back to work.

I think if we ask them to do that the language which is used should make it so abundantly clear that there can be no misinterpretation and none of them will find themselves three or four months from now with an increase of something less than 18 per cent; that this figure of 18 per cent was meant to be a minimum and that some employees would receive more than that figure. It would be disastrous for parliament to leave the impression that we are passing a law to guarantee this minimum if it does not turn out that way. As I said before, there is room above the 18 per cent for those categories of employees needing special consideration.

I implore the Minister of Labour to do something about this situation. I have looked at his amendment and considered various means of moving a subamendment which would correct it to give effect to the proposal I have been making. It would take some time to do this because I think the proposal should be spelled out in detail so the mediator or arbitration board would be bound by it.

What I ask now is that the minister withdraw this amendment. This is the simplest way of handling the difficulty. If he wishes, he can have my amendment and move it himself. I do not care whether I move it or not. I believe it spells out what is intended. To support this contention I could quote from the speech made last evening by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I will quote a paragraph from the report which appeared in today's Gazette:

> At one point, Mr. Marchand declared that if he were not convinced, utterly convinced, that the strikers could be certain of a wage increase interim settlement of "at least" 18 per cent, "I would oppose the bill."

Surely this means 18 per cent for each individual worker. The report of the minister's statement continues:

> There was, he said, a "moral guarantee" to the railwaymen that nothing less would be available.

Then the Prime Minister himself is quoted as giving a similar assurance. In other words there is no thought that the total increase over the two year period will be any less than 18 per cent reached in four instalments, as recommended by Mr. Justice Munroe and Mr. Justice Cameron. I believe this is what is intended, and this is what the legislation should make clear. I do not have a copy of Hansard for yesterday—copies may be available now, but I could not get one a few minutes ago—but in today's issue of the Globe and Mail I see the following:

> The Prime Minister told the commons that the government bill ordering an end to the strike had always been intended to ensure the minimum 18 per cent pay boost recommended by two conciliation boards.

Surely this means that the increase applies to every single employee and that the figure is not to be an average of 18 per cent so that some employees would find themselves given less. On this point I could quote further from the speeches by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It seems abundantly clear that every employee can expect a minimum of 18 per cent, but this is now what could be the effect of the amendment. I should like the minister to give this house a firm assurance that this amendment will guarantee every single employee a minimum of 18 per cent; or does he say it is only an average that we are talking about?

Again I ask the minister to do the simplest thing; to withdraw this amendment and bring in another which does meet the point I have raised. The amendment I have prepared says:

> That the terms and conditions of any amendment or revision of the collective agreements to which this act applies, determined under the provisions of sections 8, 9 or 10 of this act, shall provide at least an increase of not less than 4 per cent and not less than an additional 6 per cent for the two respective dates in 1967.

We have had enough confusion, enough delay, misinterpretation and misunderstanding. Let us not now make any mistake concerning the terms which are binding on the arbitration board as a result of the instructions in this legislation. I ask the minister to make the changes for which I have been arguing.

Mr. Nicholson: I wish to thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat not only for his remarks this morning but for his contribution to the debate last night and for the material with which he supplied me. What disturbs me about the suggestion put forward by the hon. gentleman is this. We now have a formula produced by Judge Munroe and concurred in by Hon. Mr. Cameron, that is, 4-4-4-6. No one would disagree with the conclusion stated by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I might refer to the clear statement made by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Mr. Olson.]

There is no doubt that over the two years they are going to get at least 18 per cent. There is not the slightest doubt about that. What is bothering us is this. I have had discussions with several union leaders, and in commenting on the Munroe formula some of them expressed the thought that in collective bargaining with or without a mediator, or in further discussion, they would like to be free to consider changes in that 4-4-4-6 formula. For example, they might want it to be 5 and 5 or 6 and 4.

This amendment, which is based on precedents established by the St. Laurent government in 1950 and by the Diefenbaker government in 1958, puts in the provisional amount and leaves it open to the parties to negotiate further. The unions themselves have stressed the desirability of flexibility, the possibility of changing the percentages to be found in the bill.

However, in deference to the reasoned approach of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, and because I believe the situation he envisages can be covered more effectively in an amendment to clause 10 rather than to the clause now under consideration, I will be quite willing to make a suggestion. Let the parties mediate. Let them continue to negotiate, and if they wish to vary these things by negotiation, let them be free to do so. But the suggested amendment makes it clear that if arbitration becomes necessary there will be nothing less.

I suggest that we stand clause 6 for the time being, and I shall ask the law officers and the officials of my department to give this further study. I would even be pleased to have the hon. member for Medicine Hat discuss the matter with them. I believe that we must give the parties flexibility, if they decide by genuine collective bargaining that they would like to vary these terms, while at the same time making it clear that if it comes to arbitration nothing less than 18 per cent will be granted.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I would have no objection to an amendment to clause 10 that would give effect to the points I have been arguing. Could the minister tell us now before we pass clause 6 what amendment he intends to move to clause 10?

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, my suggestion is to stand clause 6 until the law officers have had another opportunity of looking at clauses 6 and 10 together.

Mr. Olson: I accept that, but I want to make it as clear as I can that I personally, in view of the commitments that have been given, cannot accept any formula that would allow an arbitration board to have flexibility to make an award for any individual employee that would be less than the guaranteed 18 per cent minimum.

Mr. Nicholson: I do not want to prolong the debate. The hon. member's argument is persuasive. It has also been made by others. A commitment has been made by the government through two of its ministers, and since the sitting began this morning a proposed amendment to clause 10 has been sent to me in the chamber. I would like an opportunity to consider it further. I think it will accomplish the very purpose we have in mind to ensure the necessary flexibility, but if by chance arbitration does become necessary there would be no reduction in the basic and daily rates recommended by these two gentlemen. Therefore I suggest that we stand clause 6 and consider it jointly with clause 10.

Mr. Nugent: I cannot see the purpose of standing clause 6. In fact I cannot see the value of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. A clear reading of clause 6 shows that automatically on the coming into force of this law each rate of wages and basic daily rate is amended by increasing the amounts on the set dates. Each contract and each rate is automatically increased by the amount set forth. The workers may negotiate and get more, but these changes are clearly spelled out. I cannot see any force in the argument put forth by the hon. member.

Mr. Brewin: The minister has suggested that an amendment to clause 10 is being drafted and has asked the hon. member for Medicine Hat to suggest amendments. Would he consider amendments suggested by other hon. members, because I have drafted an amendment to clause 10 which I believe meets this and other related problems.

Mr. Nicholson: I said that during the course of this debate a draft of a proposed amendment has been prepared. I would be glad to read that proposed amendment but I would like to have an opportunity to study it further.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is an amendment to what clause?

Mr. Nicholson: To clause 10, which says that any board of arbitration appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) shall not provide for reduction in any daily wage rate or basic wage rate suggested in clause 6.

We want to come out with something that will leave no doubt in the minds of the men when they are invited and encouraged to go back to work, but if as a result of further useful negotiation some of the unions may want to split one way and some another—if they want to try for a 5-5 or 6-4 formula—they must have the necessary flexibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say the argument advanced by the minister seems to be well founded. It is clear and definite, and in my opinion the suggested amendment would certainly cover the situation. To stipulate that in every case a certain course should be followed with the various unions would be to make a masquerade out of the proceedings. I wondered how an amendment could possibly cover the situation. I think this one does, and I do not think it requires very much examination.

Mr. Brewin: In view of the suggestion that this matter be considered further I would like to put on record an amendment to clause 10 which I drafted and propose to move. It would add the following as subclause 1(c):

> Providing that if the decision referred to in paragraph 10(b) is less favourable to the claims of employees in respect to terms or conditions of employment than the recommendations made by the chairmen of the boards of conciliation in respect to collective agreements to which this act applies, then the said collective agreements shall be revised or amended so as to comply with the said recommendations.

The effect of this would be not only to deal with matters of wages but to cover the point that the recommendations of the chairmen of the boards of conciliation would provide a level below which the final terms of settlement could not fall.

Mr. Nicholson: I must confess that I think such a suggestion would be contrary to the thoughts which I expressed last night and which were expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops, reflecting the position of the official opposition, that this course would be incorporating fringe benefits in legislation. There must be room for further negotiation. You would also be using not only the wage package, but also the fringe benefits as the springboard.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I would be glad to give further consideration to the suggestion, but I must say that my first reaction to it is not favourable, because again one of the parties would be getting the best of both worlds, and in a matter of collective bargaining you have two sides to consider, not just one. However, I will give the matter further consideration and we can deal with it when we are considering clause 10.

Mr. Baldwin: If the minister is going to consult with his legal advisers I should like to make the suggestion that we might have an amendment to clause 6 or clause 10 to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, by adding a further subclause in these words: Provided, however, that in the result the aggregate of the minimum increase to be figured by any employee—and I am using "employee" within the terms defined in the act—for the period January 1, 1966 to the end of December 1967 shall not be less than 18 per cent.

Mr. Nicholson: I will be glad to consider that suggestion. I must say my present view is that I am inclined to favour the suggestion prepared by the law officers who advise my department. I will be glad, however, to consider whether this is preferable to the one we have.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, since the minister will be considering this proposed amendment to clause 10 may I point out that unless there is some clarification concerning clause 7, so far as I am concerned the suggestion of the officers in his department does not cover the entire field. So far as it goes I think I agree with him that it is the simplest way to guarantee that it cannot go beyond the 18 per cent. I think this is simple language which the workers will understand; but what confuses me is that there is language in clause 7—

Mr. Nicholson: Can we discuss clause 7?

Mr. Lewis: There is language in clause 7 wich may be interpreted as meaning that the arbitrator cannot go above the figure. That is what I am concerned about.

Mr. Nicholson: I thought we agreed that clause 6 would stand and that we would look at clause 7.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that clause 6 and the amendment thereto stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allard: No.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I understand that I may speak for a few minutes on the amendment moved to clause 6 (a).

If my understanding is correct, I may, at this stage, make a few remarks that I was not allowed to make up to this point, in view of the fact that the Chair had not yet recognized me, although it recognized other hon. members twice. I do not know whether the Chair is as near-sighted as I am, but I might put my strong glasses at its disposal—

[English]

The Chairman: Order. It might be just as well for the hon. member to confine his remarks to clause 6 and the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, before making a few brief remarks concerning the amendment to clause 6, which deals with the interim salary, I just want to call attention to a statement made earlier by the member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), which the Chair allowed him to make, in which he criticized the very high salary of the president of the C.N.R., Mr. Donald Gordon. I wish to say that I support that statement. I would even go further and say that this particular gentleman should be dismissed from his post or else his term of office should not be renewed, as it was by the former government, since in their hearts the great majority of railway workers—

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order; are we now discussing clause 7 of the bill? I suggest that what the hon. member is saying has no relation to clause 7.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to answer the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), the Chairman has allowed me to comment on the amendment to clause 6. I have the permission of the Chair to do so.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. When the Chair asked whether the committee agreed to stand clause 6, the hon. member for Sherbrooke objected. The question now is on clause 6, and I would ask the hon. member for Sherbrooke to confine his remarks to that particular clause and the amendment thereto.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Previously, other members spoke about what the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) is dealing with, precisely as concerns clause 6. Since the matter was brought up on clause 6 by members from other parts of the house and the Chair allowed it, I do not see why the hon. member for Sherbrooke should be prevented from dealing with the very subjects which were allowed by the Chair on clause 6.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the hon. member for Sherbrooke wishes to speak only a couple of minutes on that point and I feel the debate would be shortened if he were allowed to do so. Thus, everybody would be treated the same way, since the topic was allowed previously.

Personally, I have no remarks to make on any clause of the bill, precisely to hasten its examination. I intend to speak on the second railway bill, and since I have refrained from saying anything on the one which will then be law, I trust I will be allowed to speak on the other less urgent legislation.

[English]

The Chairman: Order. The Chair has no intention of interfering with the right of the hon. member for Sherbrooke to speak, but the Chair does expect the hon. member for Sherbrooke, as I am sure he expects all other members of the committee, to confine his remarks to clause 6 which is now before the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I am pleased Mr. Chairman, to abide by your ruling.

The only unfortunate point that I want to raise—that ruling is valid and we must accept it—is that free scope was given in this house since the beginning of the sitting to other members who were able to deal with various matters not directly related to clause 6.

• (12:40 p.m.)

But, with respect to the amendment moved this morning, I want to make a few remarks; I want to express my sincere disappointment concerning the position and the procrastination of the present government which proceeds by trial and error and appears to this parliament and to the country as a weathercock, turning about and grinding according to the wind.

We met here for an emergency session, and Monday we were presented with a bill having three purposes, which I supported—we were asked on second reading to support it—and I did so with pleasure, in the public interest and especially because we understood that one of the three purposes was an interim salary increase which was merely a token gesture to create a climate, even though it behooves neither the government nor parliament to determine levels of wages between employers and employees in that conflict.

Last night the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), in his masterly speech which we applauded, pointed out that the clause concerning wages, which is amended today, was merely a moral guarantee, that there was in the bill the necessary mechanism and structure to enable that matter to be discussed during mediation and arbitration, if necessary, by qualified persons. He even said that a moral guarantee, and I was pleased to support him, was often stronger than legal provisions written in a piece of legislation. We applauded that statement by a minister of the crown who has responsibilities, who is not afraid to assume his responsibilities in this house.

Now, today, an amendment is introduced. Another change of mind. I wonder who prepares our country's legislation? Is it the government or outside people, not belonging to this parliament? Is that the course to follow?

We were asked to agree to second reading—which I did personally, in the interest of the country and when I noticed that there was in the legislation the necessary mechanism and structure enabling this very important matter to be discussed by qualified persons—but after we voted, after being in the boat, an amendment is introduced contradicting the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning the moral guarantee which was supposed to be felt, and which I had felt when reading the bill. Today, of course, we are presented with an amendment.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it does not rest upon the government to determine the wages of railway workers; it is a problem to be decided between the parties, the railway workers and the company, and if the problem is not settled by mediation, it will have to be by arbitration.

Parliament is substituting itself to the very parties, the structure and mechanism it created in its bill, to force consideration of standards by mediation or arbitration. That is not incumbent on us. Parliament must be called upon in that conflict after a decision has been made by mediation or arbitration. Then we are called upon as responsible legislators, in that conflict, to vote subsidies, but when standards and wage increases have been determined by other bodies and other persons.

Well, this morning I want to express my disillusion. I hope the government will not come up again, before we have completed consideration of the bill, with other amendments changing its whole aspect and policy statements on which we were asked to vote on second reading.

[English]

Mr. Fawcett: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak now on clause 6, but I should like to read an amendment to clause 7 at this time with your permission. I have copies of my amendment for distribution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman's position could be met providing it is understood that when clause 7 is called he can propose his amendment. If it is agreeable to the committee to stand clause 6, as seemed to be the general view a short time ago, to give the Minister of Labour an opportunity to obtain some legal and physical sustenance, I think we would make more progress. The house leader does not happen to be here at the moment, but he has authorized me to suggest we rise for half an hour and return at 1.20.

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is on the understanding that clause 6 stands.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to standing clause 6 and the amendment and moving on to clause 7?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Does the committee also agree to suspending the sitting from now until 1.20?

Some hon. Members: One thirty.

The Chairman: Is it agreeable that we suspend the sitting from now until 1.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 12.45 p.m. the sitting of the committee was suspended.

[Mr. Allard.]

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 1.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. When the committee rose it was understood that we would stand clause 6 and proceed with clause 7.

Mr. Fawcett: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated prior to the lunch recess, I have an amendment which I think would follow clause 6. It would be a new clause 7. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will read the amendment. I have for distribution a limited number of copies in French and English. My amendment is as follows:

That immediately following clause 6, there be inserted the following as clause 7, and the clauses 7 to 11 be re-numbered accordingly.

7. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, the terms and conditions of each collective agreement to which this act applies are amended forthwith by inserting therein the following clause:

"The employer shall not introduce or implement any technological innovation, development, or change which would materially and adversely affect the working conditions of his employees until after he has negotiated the matter with the bargaining agent of his employees, and that if no agreement is reached, the matter shall be referred to a conciliation board as provided by section 22 (2) of the act, and that if the employer introduces or implements the proposed changes without such negotiation and conciliation his employees shall have the right to strike immediately as if the collective agreement had expired and all other statutory requirements had been met."

I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the problem raised in the suggested new clause 7 has already been referred to in this debate. It was referred to by at least three of my colleagues, the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and other speakers. Does the hon. member for Nickel Belt wish to speak in support of his amendment?

Mr. Fawcett: I thought the Minister of Labour was going to make a statement concerning the intentions of the government with regard to the recommendations of the Freedman commission. I wanted to speak on the amendment but thought I should give the minister a chance to tell the committee whether the government has something in mind in connection with the Freedman commission recommendations. I will forgo what I have to say if the Minister of Labour wants to make some explanation.

Mr. Nicholson: At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to raise any technical objection whether we should have a substantive clause dealing with technological change. Under the circumstances I suggest that the hon. member now make his submissions in support of the amendment.

Mr. Fawcett: I thank the minister. I do not intend to take up too much of the time of the committee. This matter was the substance of my notice of motion on which I spoke at great length on March 30. At that time I explained fully the reason for my notice of motion. I believe a good many members in the house today were members of the house when the problem developed which resulted in the Freedman commission being established.

I do not think there would be much point in my making a lengthy speech on this subject but I should like to point out one thing, namely, that on the railroads there has perhaps been less said about the effect of technological change than in any other industry. This change has been going on for very many years and a great number of people have been displaced from their jobs. Only when the run through issue arose did this problem reach the headlines. But in the railroad industry the problem started many years ago, particularly in the locomotive shops when the railways commenced to use diesel power. In some cases locomotive jobs were done away with completely. Many of the employees found employment elsewhere, some had to take employment at a smaller salary, and there was no plan at all for taking care of the situation caused by these displacements.

The situation that arose with regard to firemen is another example of how technological change has affected the railroads. Last evening the hon. member for Timiskaming dealt very ably with the question of the increased productivity of train crews, which of course has resulted in fewer employees being required to handle the same tonnage of freight. This does not necessarily affect passenger trains because they are only a very small portion of the operations of a railway. Then we have had the innovation of centralized traffic control on Canadian National Railways. This is another example of technological change. Telegraph operators became redundant. While this change did not mean that fewer people would have jobs, and in fact I do not think the number of employees was reduced, it was a matter of a change being made without sufficient negotiation with the unions.

To give credit where credit is due, many telegraph operators were given the opportunity of training to become centralized traffic control maintainers and that sort of thing, but the change was made in a haphazard way. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this connection. I am not being too critical of the railways. Many telegraph operators thought it would be better if they left the railroad and got another job, which is exactly what many of them did. But the problems of run throughs caused the greatest furore. As a result the Freedman commission was set up but not before there was a wildcat strike on Canadian National Railways which tied up the trains from coast to coast.

I will reiterate very briefly what I said before. The wildcat strike took place only because run-throughs were being innovated without proper consultation with the unions. Management took the attitude that this was their right, that all they had to do was to tell the unions they were going to go ahead with it and there was nothing the unions could do about it. Management claimed they could put these runs into effect during the closed period of the contract and that they did not have to be negotiated.

The recommendations of the Freedman commission, so far as a good many railroad workers are concerned, are just as important as any other fringe benefits and even more so. I would go so far as to say they are equally important as a raise in pay to some classes of service. I do not think that the men, particulary those in the operating groups, will be satisfied after all that has been said in the house, particularly during this crucial period, about the need for something to be done in regard to the recommendations of the Freedman report. I do not thing they will be happy if some action is not taken on them. It is not going to be good enough to say that the government or a committee is looking into the matter and will bring forward recommendations.

This amendment is very clearcut. I do not think it contains anything which could be considered to be offensive in any way. It merely introduces a formula for handling matters such as run-throughs, and it does not tie the company down to such an extent as to prevent them from introducing some of these innovations. Mr. Justice Freedman presented an explanation in his very lengthy report of the manner in which it would be decided what were material changes in working conditions. If it is established what the material changes are and in what way they affect the employees and if the arbitrator decides that these changes should be negotiated, then my amendment would apply. I do not think there is any point in my going further into this matter. I will only say that I think it is very necessary that consideration be given to this amendment.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, when I had erroneously concluded that the hon. gentleman would make no further remarks after his introductory statement, I made some comments about technological change and said that it had been referred to by several speakers in this debate. I take the position now that technological change, to the extent that it relates to the railways and in particular to run-throughs, has been fully dealt with in the Freedman report. Technological change in the light of the recommendations contained in the Freedman report was dealt with in all the considerations of the conciliation boards. Reference is made to it in the reasons for judgment not only of more than one chairman but of other members of the board.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare in his remarks to the house on August 30, 1966, to be found on page 7855 of Hansard —both the former minister of labour and I the present minister have made statements to the same effect—commended Mr. Justice Freedman for his very worth-while study and for bringing to light the issues that were involved in the run-through inquiry. In his speech the minister said:

> Personally, Mr. Speaker, I have expressed fully my views on the Freedman report and the kind of guidepost it will establish in the field of industrial relations and labour relations in Canada. This problem cannot be ignored. It is a fact that there is concern among the workers that the institution of technological change during the life of a contract may have consequences in respect of their job security. They have urged that they have an opportunity to negotiate on these changes during the life of an agreement.
> Mr. Justice Freedman in his report made the proposal that the ideal solution of this problem is to permit the parties, the unions and the men, to work with proper procedures to cope with the problem. This is Mr. Justice Freedman's principal recommendation. He says that if this fails, legislation can be considered along the following lines: An arbitrator will be appointed to determine whether any change contemplated during the life of the agreement is a material change. Then if he concludes that it is not a material change, management is entitled to institute that change. If he concludes it is a material change, it is to be negotiated at that time or at the end of the agreement. That is Mr. Justice Freedman's proposal.

[Mr. Fawcett.]

> Hon. gentlemen will have read another report involved in this problem, namely the report of the conciliation board headed by Judge Little.

To which report I made reference earlier this afternoon. The minister continued:

> In my view there is an encouraging conclusion with respect to the Freedman report in that particular aspect of the conciliation board report, because there is a large degree of agreement between the union representative and the management representative on the way to cope with the Freedman-type issue. It has not been fully resolved but encouraging steps have been taken, and there is no doubt that further encouraging steps will be taken on a voluntary basis.

Further on some questions were put. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, for instance, asked the following question:

> Did the Little commission not recommend legislation in this matter?

Then there is a further discussion that does not deal with this particular point. I suggest that since Mr. Justice Munroe felt it was premature to deal with this matter, since Mr. Justice Cameron felt the same way, and because there were obviously difficulties in the minds of all three members of the Little commission regarding the best way of implementing legislation at this time based on the Freedman report, partly because of the effect it would have on other industries and employees who did not have an opportunity of making their views known to Mr. Justice Freedman, we must be careful.

It seems to me that since all the matters that were involved in these five disputes are going to be dealt with by the parties in further mediation and discussion, even though one conciliation board went farther than the other four. I can say quite frankly that one reason we provided in the draft bill for a mediator was, so that one of them, if necessary, might devote special attention to this particular problem between now and November 15. There is another equally compelling reason for this provision. If the parties cannot, in line with the hope expressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, resolve this problem, then automatically, under the language of this bill, it will be dealt with conclusively by the board of arbitration.

While I am in full sympathy with the necessity for dealing with matters of this nature, I remain of the opinion that when we are dealing with a bill providing for continued conciliation, mediation and, if necessary, arbitration, the problem should be left to be dealt with in that way rather than introducing affirmative legislation in the terms proposed by the hon. member. It is a fact that the amendment suggests the railways shall not do these things and then it goes even farther than the recommendations contained in the Freedman report. The amendment says that the employer shall not introduce or implement any technological innovation, development or change which materially or adversely affects the working conditions of the employees. This relates to shops, maintenance of way and other operations. It is far reaching.

In my opinion the proposed amendment to the bill introducing a new clause 7 is not in order. It is new, substantive law and is not a mere amendment to bring about a return to work of certain employees. It is much broader in scope. I have serious doubts about the legality of such an amendment. I say this with more confidence realizing that the matter will be inevitably dealt with when we come to subsequent clauses of the bill. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is not in order and that it goes beyond the scope of the draft bill which has been accepted in principle. Happily, however, the situation can be covered in the other way I have suggested. I believe that it can be covered in clauses 8 and 10 and I therefore rely more strongly on the point of order that this amendment has no legal standing.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, while the minister was on his feet he dealt for the most part with the substance of the amendment although he did conclude with a question as to its validity under our rules. Perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words on both aspects with which the minister dealt.

First, may I say it does seem clear that we all agree as to the significance and usefulness of the Freedman report. We all favour something being done about it. The only difference is that some of us would like something done right away and others wish to postpone it to another day. May I say to the Minister of Labour that when we were called here to deal with the railway dispute, surely if we were called upon to consider any of the matters that brought about the impasse we were called upon to deal with all of them. One of the matters in dispute between the companies and the employees is the question of technological change or automation or the desirability of implementing the terms of the Freedman report. I submit, both on the count of substance and the count of propriety, that this question is definitely before us as part of this legislation with which we are dealing.

May I emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that it really is not satisfactory for the minister to say that the question of the Freedman report is covered in the bill because the bill refers, for future negotiations, to a mediator or a board of arbitration, all of the matters in dispute. Merely to say that in those future negotiations or in the dealings by the board of arbitration all of the matters in dispute must be covered gives no direction as to what the outcome of these negotiations or considerations will be. The government, even in its first draft of this bill, did not leave the wage question that way. Even in the bill in its original form there was a provision for a floor in the statute, namely, 4 per cent and 4 per cent for 1966. This was guaranteed. The government has been persuaded to go further so far as the wage question is concerned and provide 4-4-4-6, for a total of 18 per cent over two years. The legislation we are passing, therefore, so far as wages are concerned does not just say that wages shall be one of the matters in dispute and are therefore covered by instructions that there be negotiation or arbitration. We have established a certain floor with respect to wages.

We contend, Mr. Chairman, that the matters covered by the Freedman report are just as much in dispute in this whole impasse as are wages and therefore these matters should be dealt with in the legislation in the same way as we have dealt with the question of wages. With respect to the question of wages we have put a floor in the legislation. We content that with respect to the question of technological change there should be a floor or a minimum requirement put into the legislation.

Let me go at this in another slightly different way. Let me say to the minister that it is quite possible under the bill as it now stands, supposing nothing results from the negotiations, for the board of arbitration to consider the question of automation and technological change but to recommend nothing. The board of arbitration would have fulfilled the terms of the law. We have a guarantee that the board of arbitration will do something about automation and technological change only if we put a requirement to that effect into the law itself.

May I say to the minister and to all the ministers, with great respect, that in connection with this matter we are right where we were with respect to the question of wages. I suggest that the 1950 precedent which my colleague the hon. member for York South cited earlier today applies again and applies with great force and emphasis.

Let me remind the minister and all the ministers in the cabinet that in 1950, on August 30, Mr. St. Laurent told me—I was questioning him on this point—that by its actions the then government had set a pattern and that the government believed that the arbitrator to be appointed under that year's back to work law would treat the hotel and water transport workers in the same way as the other railway workers were to be treated. Some members of the house accepted that. I was a bit of a sceptic and did not think that it would work. It turned out that Mr. Justice Kellock went by the law, not by what the prime minister had said on the floor of the house. So what parliament thought would be done—because it was parliament's motion—was not done because it was not provided for in the legislation.

I am not going to read again the quotations read this morning by my colleague the hon. member for York South, but I should like to remind the ministers, especially those who were here in 1950 or more particularly in 1951, of a very plaintive statement that Mr. St. Laurent was called upon to make on May 2, 1951, as recorded in Hansard at page 2616. This was on an occasion when I had moved an amendment to a motion to go into committee of ways and means which raised the whole question of the unfair treatment accorded to the hotel and water transport workers because they had not been protected in the legislation. There was a lengthy debate. The quotations from the debate of August 30, 1950, were repeated in that debate. Mr. St. Laurent spoke and toward the end of his speech he said:

> The matters remaining in dispute were left for the arbitrator.

Listen to this sentence:

> I may say I thought that, with our example before him, he might decide to treat them all on the same footing, but it was a matter that had to be determined by him. I believe it would be wrong for the government to ask parliament to vary the decision at which he arrived.

There, Mr. Chairman, was Mr. St. Laurent, eminent prime minister that he was, saying that because parliament had not written into the law what he thought would be the interpretation the arbitrator would accept there was nothing that we could then do about it.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we will find ourselves in the same position with respect to the whole question of automation and technological change if we do not put some clear direction into the statute. The only direction that is there now is that the parties when they negotiate must consider all of the matters in dispute, including automation. The only direction there now is that the board of arbitration, if one is set up, must consider among other things the question of automation. But that board of arbitration, having considered the matter, can make no recommendation whatever. Therefore a matter in dispute, one of the reasons that this parliament was called into session, will not have been resolved satisfactorily.

We are right back where we were, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the question of wages. Moral guarantees do not have the effect in this kind of situation that words in a statute have. Mr. St. Laurent learned that in 1950 and 1951. I would have hoped that this government would show that it had learned that lesson.

I say to the Minister of Labour that I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nickel Belt but I would be happy, as I am sure he would, to accept some other kind of wording. I would also be happy to have the wording put into some other clause, and the minister himself might come up with something more appropriate. I think it would be quite satisfactory if there were somewhere a direction to the board of arbitration to write into the collective agreements an implementation of the principles of the Freedman report in appropriate language.

In other words, we do not ask that the precise terms of the agreement be provided here, although my hon. friend has given guidelines which could be followed. But we do think it is not satisfactory just to say that the matters in dispute are referred to the arbitrator. This will not cover automation and technological change any more than the same wording covered the wage issue. I urge the minister to take this question very seriously. I think he will find that to some of the employees who are now out on strike this is a more serious issue than the issue of wages. The whole question of this bill being palatable at all does depend on some satisfactory dealing with this important phase of the matter.

Because the minister at the end of his remarks on the substance of this amendment raised a point of order—I do not know whether it was a tentative effort on his part or whether he meant it seriously—I would like to remind him that when we were on second reading and sought to move various amendments having to do with the Freedman report the Minister of National Health and Welfare argued that the place to do this was when we were in committee of the whole on the bill. This is something which we have been through hundreds of times in this house. When we are on second reading the government tells us to wait until we get into committee of the whole, and when we get into committee of the whole the government tells us no, this is not the place either.

I submit that the government and the Minister of Labour have been arguing that the phrase "all matters in dispute" in the legislation covers automation and technological change, so that this idea does not go beyond the scope of the bill. The whole purpose of the bill is to deal with the issues which brought on the strike. One of those issues was technological change. The minister admitted that time and time again by saying that this was one of the matters in dispute. Therefore, because it is part of what is before us I submit that it is within the four corners of this legislation and that it is definitely in order to move this amendment.

I repeat—and I know from conversation with my hon. friend for Nickel Belt that he does not object to my saying this—that the hon. member would be willing to have some alternative form of amendment. But it is certainly not satisfactory to ask the workers to go back to work without any guarantee that anything will be done about the question of automation and technological change other than those questions being discussed. Moral guarantees, a desire that it should happen —these things are not good enough, as Mr. St. Laurent learned in 1950 and 1951. We think that the importance of this matter requires that there be appropriate reference to it in the legislation itself.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Since the hon. member for Nickel Belt put forward his amendment the Chair has been considering its validity and unless there are other expressions of opinion to be put forward concerning the validity of this amendment the Chair is ready to give a ruling.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pennell: Just a brief comment, Mr. Chairman. I am dealing not with the merits of the principle being put forward by the hon. member but rather with the point of order. In my respecful submission, this amendment in the form it is now drafted purports to enlarge the scope of the bill. If allowed the amendment would in effect be setting aside the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It would permit a strike during the term of a collective bargaining agreement and on that very fundamental principle I respectfully submit that this would in effect, be an amendment to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act of this country. If we wish to do this it should be done as an amendment to the general law, not to this one bill.

Mr. Olson: I intend to speak only on the point of order. I will say a word or two later about whether or not we agree with the substance of the amendment should it come before the committee.

On the point of order I believe the reasons outlined by the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General in their submissions are not sufficient to justify the amendment being ruled out of order. Although the minister suggested it was out of order he did tell us that it might be dealt with in connection with clauses 8, 9 and 10. It seems to me that if it is wrong to introduce an amendment of this kind it cannot be argued that it may be dealt with in connection with clauses 8, 9 and 10.

Further, the preamble to the bill states among other things that the purpose and principle of this measure is to deal with the final settlement of terms and conditions of employment for the years 1966 and 1967. In the light of these words it seems to me we can introduce matters which deal with terms and conditions of employment, and job security certainly falls within this category.

While I do not agree with the wording of this amendment I believe we must certainly defend the right of the hon. member for Nickel Belt to introduce it and have it discussed. There can be no argument that a private member cannot move an amendment of this kind in connection with the bill before us on the ground that this is a money bill and so on. There is no superior competence in the hands of a minister. Any hon. member can move amendments of this kind.

There is, however, one difficulty which I see arising in connection with this amendment. The hon. member talks about the power of a conciliation board as set out in section 22(2) "of the act". But he does not say which act he has in mind. I think he means the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. However, the amendment does not say so. For this reason it is defective and the hon. member might wish to take it back and revise it accordingly.

It is possible too that the amendment might be out of order at this time because, while clause 7 is before us, the amendment does not deal with exactly the same subject matter within the strict rule on relevancy, and perhaps it should have been moved at some other time when we reach another clause in the bill. Nevertheless I believe the hon. member has the right to move an amendment on a subject matter of this kind at any point in the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: I never heard so much tergiversation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I offered my submission on the point of order when I was speaking on the substance of this proposal, but may I say in reply to the Solicitor General, who objects to this amendment on the ground that it seeks to amend what he calls the statute law of the country, that the whole bill varies the provisions of the statute law, particularly in reference to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Indeed, we do this all the time. Laws have an effect on each other, and merely to say that this amendment has an effect on some other statute does not make it out of order.

The hon. gentleman made one error in substance on this point when he said this amendment would apply to everything to which the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act applies. Not at all. It would apply the recommendations of the Freedman report only to the railway industry, as is made clear by the way in which this amendment is prepared and by the definitions in the statute.

In addition, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat has pointed out, if, as the minister says, it would be appropriate to move an amendment of this kind at some other place in the bill, then surely it would be appropriate to move it at any point so far as the rights of hon. members are concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I should reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this point of order. In the first place, no one on this side of the house said in my hearing that an amendment of this kind could be moved to any part of the bill. What was said was that the subject matter could be dealt with elsewhere. That is a very different thing.

My hon. friend the Solicitor General said that this amendment goes beyond the principle and scope of the bill as established by the vote on second reading. It certainly does, because the scope of the bill was the resumption of the operation of the railways and this amendment seeks to import into the collective agreement which the bill asks us to establish the right to strike during the course of that agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened patiently to the hon. member. Perhaps he will listen to me now and reply later if he wishes. Further, this amendment seeks to set aside—I do not say to amend—the ordinary law which applies to every other collective agreement under the I.R.D.I.A. It purports to dispense with the normal law and establish a special law.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Pickersgill: That might be all right, if it had been part of the principles and scope of the bill before second reading. In that case, of course, it would have been possible to do this. But this proposal seeks to alter the bill as established on second reading and in this respect I suggest it is beyond the scope of the legislation passed by the house, in consequence of which this committee does not have competence to change the rules which have been laid down. This is a fundamental rule applying to all committees and I rest my case on that.

Mr. Knowles: I apologize to the minister for having interrupted him. I was only about to ask him a question. Now he has sat down I will change it from a question to a statement. He said, without anything in his hand to help him make sure he was speaking correctly, that the purpose of this bill was to achieve a resumption of the operation of the railways. If he would pick up the bill and read the title on the front page he would find it says:

> An act to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

If he will read the preamble he will find that the purpose is set out again. Let me read the third paragraph of the preamble. It reads in part as follows:

• (2:20 p.m.)

—having regard to the interests of the railway companies and the employees, provision be made for terms and conditions of employment for the year 1966, for the resumption of the processes of negotiation and mediation and for the final settlement of terms and conditions of employment for the years 1966 and 1967.

When we get into the body of the bill we find references to disputes, and this has been quoted time and time again by the Minister of Labour. In other words, I rest my case on the very point that the minister makes, namely, that we have to be in committee of the whole within the scope of the bill that was given passage on second reading. But the minister put in only half of the scope, which is to get the railways running again. The other half is to settle the matters in dispute. The minister does not argue that disputes are not included. Therefore I submit the amendment meets the test that the Minister of Transport has raised, namely, that it is within the scope of the legislation agreed to on second reading.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may reply to that, since it has become a question, my reply is very simple. The purpose of the bill, as the hon. gentleman said, is to get the railways running again and settle the dispute. To seek to import into the bill a clause stating that once operations were resumed a further strike could be allowed to start a week later is totally contrary to the decision made. If we want to import that kind of principle into the general law of Canada with respect to collective agreements, that is another matter, but to make a special and different law for this one group of collective agreements would make it possible to have another national crisis, which would be a very odd way of carrying out the decision parliament has made on second reading. It is true that dispute is covered in the bill, but for us to seek to import this kind of clause into it seems to be not only beyond the scope of the bill but to be contrary to the purpose of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, what we in the opposition have been trying to do since Monday is to bring about a bill that will be effective, with justice and equity. I am trying to view this matter from the point of national interest and from a desire not to bring about legislation that will have dangers for the future inherent in it.

I have pressed the government to place provisions in this bill to implement the Freedman report. Within the last hour I have spoken to railway men, reasonable, responsible, rational men who want to do what is good for Canada. One of the things that they impressed on me is that it is going to be very difficult to secure adherence to the law unless something is done about the implementation of the Freedman report.

I am told the report is a best seller in the office of the Queen's Printer. It has become a standard work for employees and employers. Once more I advance this prayer for relief out of a desire to assure that whatever legislation is passed will not run the danger and possibility of not being followed.

I believe there should be a material amendment to cover the Freedman report or certain of its recommendations, but let us read this amendment and see what it means. Surely parliament is not going to pass an amendment to change the labour law of Canada to apply to one industry and to bring about the benevolent attitude that is inherent in this amendment. At the expense of taking up time I want to read the amendment which states:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, the terms and conditions of each collective agreement to which this act applies are amended forthwith by inserting therein the following clause:

"The employer shall not introduce or implement any technological innovation, development, or change which would materially and adversely affect the working conditions of his employees until after he has negotiated the matter with the bargaining agent of his employees, and that if no agreement is reached, the matter shall be referred to a conciliation board as provided by section 22(2) of the act—"

I am not arguing the merits at the moment, but up to that point if the amendment were accepted it would be along the line that I advocated this morning. It is the next portion that I do not think parliament can possibly accept.

I want to see fairness and equity to the men who work. I do not have to provide references about fairness and equity to the men of the railways because I acted for them on more than one occasion without fee. Indeed, I was called to the bar of the province of British Columbia to defend a railroad man without fee and had to pay admission to the bar of that province. On that occasion it cost me $1,500 to be called to the bar in order to take the case of a man who was unable to pay legal fees.

Mr. Herridge: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a comment? I want to congratulate him for undertaking legal work on behalf of union members for which he did not receive a fee.

In lighter vein I recall that when I arrived to be called to the bar there were judges and benchers present. The assistant clerk will also remember the occasion. It was the only occasion, in the four or five different times that I was admitted to the bar, that everybody was there. It was amazing. When they put on a lunch in my honour I began to realize it was one of the costliest lunches I ever participated in.

I acted for these men, not the unions but individuals, when there was a wrong—having that feeling toward men who work on the railways or elsewhere. I ask, does anyone seriously contend that this parliament should, having altered the provisions of this bill, proceed to legislate as follows:

• (2:30 p.m.)

—and that if the employer introduces or implements the proposed changes without such negotiation and conciliation his employees shall have the right to strike immediately—

Let us be reasonable. This looks like the effort of some hon. gentlemen who were a little slow on Monday and Tuesday to gain some of the lost ground today.

—as if the collective agreement had expired and all other statutory requirements had been met.

Feeling as I do and being desirous of seeing this bill, if it is passed by parliament, work, I believe that type of amendment is not going to do it. I will support the amendment up to and including the words "as provided by section 22(2) of the act", but the latter part of it I will not accept. It is asking parliament to take a course that is fraught with the most terrible consequences.

I find it difficult to understand that we in this parliament should be asked to support something that would completely jettison the whole law of labour relations in respect of one branch. If the hon. gentleman who proposed the amendment will delete the words following the word "act", although I have not had an opportunity of consultation with my colleagues I feel that it could be supported. Why were these latter words included? I do not know. But being desirous of securing an end of the strike—right from the beginning I have tried to do everything I can to get the government to act—the government has made changes, but slowly, following the strongest representations. To accept this amendment would be something that this House of Commons dare not do.

Having said that, again I come back to the question regarding the Freedman commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the Chair would rule now on whether or not the amendment is in order? Then we could get on with the other clause at which point the right hon. gentleman could state his position.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order which has been raised with regard to whether this amendment should be admitted, I should like to address myself briefly to the remarks of the Minister of Transport when he suggested that the purpose and principle of the bill were to get the railways running. He then pointed out that the acceptance of this amendment could at some later date, in fact, almost immediately, interfere with that purpose. I agree that there are some defects in the amendment and if it were proposed and put to the committee in its present form I would find myself unable to agree with it and therefore would vote against it. But, Mr. Chairman, that is no justification for attempting to invoke the rules of procedure in this house to prevent the member moving it.

Because of the argument advanced earlier by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the terms and conditions of the collective agreements are referred to in the title and the preamble, and have been part of the whole debate since this parliament reassembled, surely the job security aspect of the terms and conditions of employment cannot properly be said to be outside the ambit of this bill.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, would you now rule so that we can get on?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion which I think would save time. I have discussed this matter with my colleague the hon. member for Nickel Belt who moved the amendment which is before us. Having discussed it and having listened to the suggestions which have been made, we feel the matter might be dealt with equally well by moving an amendment to clause 10(1), when we reach that point, as follows:

(c) instructing the board to determine the appropriate form of an amendment to the agreements implementing the recommendations of the report of the Industrial Inquiry Commission on Canadian National Railways Run-Throughs, dated November 17, 1965.

We believe that would deal with the situation equally well. If the house is in agreement, my colleague the hon. member for Nickel Belt would be prepared to withdraw his amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand that the hon. member for Nickel Belt is prepared to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Fawcett: Yes, Mr. Chairman, on the condition that we will have the opportunity to bring forward something else.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Nickel Belt is withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. Fawcett: Yes.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister to explain if he will, because I simply do not understand it, the words in clause 7(2), "notwithstanding anything contained in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act or in the agreement". I should like to know what it is he is amending. While he is doing that, may I ask him also to look at subclause 1 of clause 7 which states "and ending on the day on which a new collective agreement entered into between the parties thereto in amendment or revision thereof comes into effect, or on December 31, 1967, whichever is the earlier." I know this ties two sections together but I do not know how else I can do it. Would the minister look at the final words of clause 8 which provide that in no event shall any such new collective agreement expire before December 31, 1967. Unless I am misreading it, and I well may be, or unless I am not understanding the clauses, it seems to me that on the surface there is a contradiction between clause 7(1) which says that the agreement can expire earlier than December 31, 1967, namely, on the day on which a new collective agreement comes into effect, and clause 8 which says it cannot expire before December 31, 1967.

I am rising to point out the difficulty I have had and to ask the minister to clear it up. The actual points in respect of clause 7(2) which I should like to raise with the minister concern the following words:

> The terms and conditions of a collective agreement to which this act applies, amended as provided by this act—

My opinion as a person who has read statutes is that I think what is meant by the words "amended as provided by this act" is that they refer not only to clause 6 but also to any amendments made by virtue of the machinery set up in clauses 8, 9 and 10. I should like to say to the minister, however, that there have been some people who have had concern that the words "amended as provided by this act" may be held to refer only to the amendments actually set out in this act, namely, in clause 6. I am not saying I agree with that interpretation. I am saying that the words as they now are interpreted by some people would be limited to clause 6. I would urge upon the minister that he consider making it simpler for those who perhaps are not ready to tie the whole group of sections together and add a few more words to clause 7(2) which will make that clear.

I am not drafting an amendment now and do not wish to move one, but this situation could be corrected by adding words to the effect that it would be amended as provided in clause 6 and in the light of the machinery provided in other sections. Those are not the words the minister would use, of course. This would make it clear that subclause 2 of clause 7 includes not only the provisions of clause 6 but also those which may subsequently be made as a result of mediation or arbitration, if the compulsory arbitration clause remains in the bill. Unless that is made clear there may be some difficulty about this and I think it would be worth while for the minister to give my suggestion some consideration.

Mr. Nicholson: Let me deal first with the point raised by the hon. member for York South in respect of subclause 1 of clause 7, which reads:

> Subject to this act, the term of each collective agreement to which this act applies is extended to include the period beginning January 1, 1966 and ending on the day on which a new collective agreement entered into between the parties thereto in amendment or revision thereof comes into effect, or on December 31, 1967, whichever is the earlier.

There may be a new collective agreement reached which might cover a period of three years. In fact, in discussions I have had with railway union leaders the possibility of three-year term contracts has been mentioned. What we are saying is that the collective agreements which are hereby revised will run until new collective agreements have been accepted or until December 31, 1967.

Mr. Lewis: Would it not be better to say "whichever is the later" rather than "whichever is the earlier"?

Mr. Nicholson: No, because this language makes it clear that the important date is the date on which a new agreement comes into effect rather than the date on which an agreement expires. If a new agreement is negotiated and accepted in November, for instance, then the extension is no longer necessary. An agreement could be entered into in November or December 1966, or January, 1967, but failing that the agreement will run at least, till the end of 1967. This has been carefully considered, and I happened to discuss this particular language with the law officers at noon today in respect of another matter.

The second point raised by the hon. member relates to paragraph 2 of clause 7 which reads in part:

The terms and conditions of a collective agreement to which this Act applies, amended as provided by this Act—

This act now provides for one amendment in respect of clause 6 and in addition for an amendment as a result of negotiations. It also provides for an amendment by arbitration. I think the language is clear, but I will be glad to consider improved language if my friend could suggest some improvement.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Railway companies and unions to negotiate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I indicated this morning that I intended to move an amendment which I think, if accepted, will go a long way toward bringing about a sense of unity in our country in regard to carrying out the law. I am not going to traverse the ground I have already covered.

I have been quite interested in discussions I have had with railroaders as to the changes they would like to have effected in order to remove certain inconveniences. If these objections are not met they will ultimately lead to a sense of resentment and frustration. Let me advance two examples, the first of which involves a very small matter. Many railroaders have expressed to me the desire to have the pay days changed from twice monthly to every other Thursday. Such a change would actually cost very little. The total cost, according to estimates I have received, would be approximately $40,000 to $50,000. I am also informed that the wives of these railroaders are in favour of this change. From the vertical manner in which the hon. member for Verdun has moved his head, and he has made a study of this situation, I can only conclude that he agrees that this is a small matter of some importance.

The other example I wish to present deals with the health and welfare plan in respect of which there is a general feeling today that if the railway companies were to absorb or pay the employees half it would be most acceptable. This would be a benefit to the employees and it would be non-taxable. Those are the kinds of things which, being now neglected, result in an accumulation of feelings that borders on resentment.

Everywhere I go railwaymen ask why the Freedman report has been left in cold storage. While it is true that it is being considered, that consideration has carried on for a long time. If we in this parliament were by statute, rather than by verbal declaration or vocal support, to add a clause which indicated that the Freedman report was going to receive not only consideration but action we would be going a long way toward assuring that the railway employees, when this bill passes parliament, will accept it and return to work.

I do not intend to press these things further, but hon. members know my feelings in this regard. I do suggest that unless we in parliament, with a deep sense of responsibility, provide something of a definite nature in respect of adopting the recommendations of the Freedman report, these men who are on strike will feel that we have deprived them of their right to collective bargaining by substituting compulsory arbitration. I ask the minister—I know he is very fair in the manner in which he endeavours to solve the problems that come under his jurisdiction—whether he will not recommend to the government the acceptance of an amendment along these lines:

• (2:50 p.m.)

That clause 8 be amended by substituting a comma for the period in line 11 and the following words be added:

"and that part of the collective bargaining to be undertaken will include provision for discussion and negotiation between the railways and the unions concerning the work changes, elimination of jobs, and general working conditions that may be affected by the introduction of technological and other changes."

That is not an arbitrary amendment; it is an amendment designed to bring about cooperation on the part of those concerned with the strike. I believe the cost of the strike is $15 million a day. When the men go back to work under law we want them to do so in the spirit that they have shown on so many occasions throughout the years.

This opinion is not based on personal observation. It is based on discussions I have had with responsible leaders of the labour movement and telephone conversations across this country in the last several days. I worked on this amendment during the night, trying to bring about something that, if the house will accept it, will mean that we can all be united, as I see it, in this house and parliament can speak with the authority of unity.

That is what we started to effect. We brought about changes. We had to fight for them, but having fought for them changes were made. I will make no further appeal during this debate. The minister must know the festering disquietude of the men on the railways because of the failure up to the present time to implement this report. If the workers across Canada know now that when operations have begun the discussions and negotiations that take place will cover this field, we will go a long, long way toward bringing about that mutual trust without which no law passed by parliament can ever be effective if it is one that is coercive, determinant and ends rights. On the one hand we have the national interest and on the other the rights of free men to have in their work those amenities that most of us have.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that while the Leader of the Official Opposition has done very well in posing the problems which have arisen in the railway industry as a result of rapid technological changes and the tremendous effect these have had on the lives of railway workers, this amendment really adds nothing at all to clause 8 because that clause already says:

> The railway companies and unions shall forthwith enter into negotiations with a view to the settlement of any matters presently in dispute—

The Leader of the Opposition suggests that we add as an amendment, "that part of the collective bargaining to be undertaken will include provision for discussion and negotiation." This amendment restates what clause 8 already says. In years gone by there has been plenty of discussion among the companies and the unions. The reason we have had these difficulties, the reason for the stoppage at Nakina and the stoppage of the whole railway system was that the railways and the unions concerned could not reach agreement. When they could not reach agreement, and when the railway companies insisted on exercising what they considered to be their right to manage the system and to make changes unilaterally, the men exercised what they considered to be their right to stop work, to withdraw from service. I remember that the former minister of transport, now the house leader, when he was warned by the former member for Port Arthur that there would be a stoppage, brushed aside that warning. The minister said he had been told by the president of Canadian National Railways that there were no problems. They were certain they could put through this change and the men would accept it. Then we were faced that week end with virtually a complete stoppage of the C.N.R. system.

The reason this matter has to be solved now, I am convinced, the reason it cannot be put off, the reason it cannot be left to later negotiation and we must include in the bill a clause to cover the situation, although probably not the amendment moved a little earlier by my colleague from Nickel Belt and not this amendment because I do not think it is acceptable, is that it is quite conceivable—I am not suggesting for a moment that I speak for the railway workers because they have not authorized me to do so and I am not their spokesman, but I know railway workers—in my opinion that the bill as now drafted, with the changes proposed to clause 6, will be acceptable to a large number of railway workers. I am thinking of the monetary proposals contained in the bill.

However, the operating employees, particularly the members of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, are insistent and determined that changes be made which will guarantee them the rights which Mr. Justice Freedman expressed so eloquently in his report. I am not going to read those sections of the report now, but essentially Mr. Justice Freedman said that the workers on the railways have a right not only to consultation but to negotiation about material changes which the company proposes to make in their working conditions.

For the information of the Minister of Transport who does not seem to have read the report, I point out that Mr. Justice Freedman said that this could be accomplished in a number of ways. He said that the proposals he made could be accomplished first of all through the process of collective bargaining, which the unions have attempted to obtain and which so far they have been completely unsuccessful in obtaining, or by amendment of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act or the Railway Act. For the information of the Minister of Transport, since Mr. Justice Freedman suggested that his proposal could be brought about by amending the Railway Act obviously he thought it quite conceivable and proper that if parliament so desired we could make these changes only for the workers covered by the Railway Act and not for all workers covered by federal jurisdiction. But, Mr. Chairman, we have not done that. I will not at this time berate the government for not bringing in these changes. They have not done so and as a result we have a strike.

One of the main issues which brought about this dispute, as mentioned by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is the determination of the railway workers, in particular the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, to have in their agreement or by legislation the right to negotiate, to bargain collectively, the right to say to the company: We do not accept that our members will be moved from Nakina to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg to Regina or Saskatoon next year unless it is done through consultation or through planning and with the approval of the workers concerned.

I think we need to change the provisions of this bill to include the basic principles which Mr. Justice Freedman enunciated. We need to do it now, Mr. Chairman, because I believe that unless we do so there is a distinct danger that the passage of this bill will not get the railways running in the very near future. However, I do not think that the amendment which the Leader of the Opposition has moved will meet the problem. It will certainly not meet the desires and the determination of the railway workers concerned. I would hope that at some point during our consideration of this bill the government will agree to a proposal made by any member of this house who has an acceptable proposal which would write into this bill a provision guaranteeing to the railway workers the basic principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Freedman, namely, the right of the railway workers to negotiate and to have their fair say about the changes in the working conditions under which they have to live.

Mr. Olson: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that so far as we are concerned we believe that the amendment proposed by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition asking for an addition to clause 8 is already contained in that clause. Nevertheless I think that if it would speed up the passage of the bill the government should very seriously consider accepting this amendment. As has been pointed out, clause 8 orders the railway companies and the unions to negotiate on all the matters presently in dispute between them. Surely the matter of job security as well as a number of other recommendations in Justice Freedman's report are among those matters presently in dispute between the unions and the railway companies. Therefore the adding of these additional words or even of an additional paragraph to clause 8 may be a little superfluous. However, it does not seem to me that it would do any harm or depreciate the value of clause 8 in so far as the workers are concerned.

Therefore, for the sake of passing this bill more rapidly and perhaps for the sake of spelling out the matter in more specific terms, even though they may be repetitious, so that the workers will understand that this is one of the things which the railways and the unions are being directed by parliament to negotiate, we would urge the government to accept this amendment.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious, I think, to those who have been following this debate in the house that there is much merit in the proposal advanced by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. In fact, it is directly in line with the remarks which have been made in this chamber by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and by myself. We are all agreed that the issue of technological change having taken on such importance and the Freedman report having been brought in over eight months ago, we now have an opportunity to move ahead in this field through the medium of additional constructive discussions under an intelligent mediator, and if the mediator's efforts do not bring about the results which we hope will be achieved the arbitrator will now be able to deal effectively with this proposal.

I must say that I do not see the necessity for this specific amendment in view of the assurance which I gave last night and repeated again this morning. The hon. member for Kamloops speaking on behalf of his party last night asked me to give a specific assurance that certain matters such as possible reductions in take-home pay as a result of a 40-hour week need not be spelled out in the bill if the minister gave certain assurances to the house. He said, on behalf of his party, that it would not be necessary to spell it out in detail so long as they received a positive undertaking from the minister that this would be done and that it would be final. If there is any doubt about it, I am quite prepared to give a formal undertaking in this house on behalf of the government that in the instructions that go to the mediator there will be a direction that when collective bargaining resumes under his leadership the same must include full discussion and negotiations between the railways and the union regarding work changes, elimination of jobs and general working conditions which may be affected by the introduction of technological and other changes. I give that undertaking now and, if the legislation is passed, I will implement it in writing to the mediator. Nobody need ever have any qualms on that score. It will be done and the government pledges itself to that course.

While I am in full accord with the expression of thought put forward by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and others, I think the legislation is sufficiently comprehensive to cover the matter in the light of our undertaking. I therefore do not see the necessity for the amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have done everything I can to get acceptance of the amendment by the government as part of the bill. The undertaking given by the minister is of course accepted by us at its true face value. I think, however, that to make the record complete we should have a standing vote on this question and in that way make our position clear. In his undertaking the minister has followed word by word the phraseology of the amendment which I moved. It is only because I want to underline the fact that in bringing this amendment before the house we have exhausted every recourse available that I am going to ask that the amendment in question be put.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived: Yeas, 63; nays, 79.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 8 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Appointment of mediator.

Mr. Brewin: I have an amendment to propose to this clause, Mr. Chairman. It is a very simple one and I offer it in the spirit of the suggestion made by the Prime Minister last night that if this legislation could be improved it should be improved. My amendment would simply substitute the word "October" for the word "November" in the clause. The clause now reads:

> The Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator or mediators (hereinafter referred to as the "mediator") who shall forthwith endeavour to mediate the matters in dispute between the railway companies and the unions and to bring about agreement between them and who shall report to the Minister of Labour, not later than November 15, 1966—

My amendment would substitute the words "October 15, 1966".

> —on the progress of the negotiations between the railway companies and the unions.

The purpose of my amendment is to deal with one of the very serious grievances felt by the members of the railway unions with respect to this legislation. They have considerable doubt in their minds, from experience, about the value of continued negotiations as provided for by clause 8 with which we have just dealt. I hope they are wrong. I have heard various members of the government express the view that they are wrong in assuming that because compulsory arbitration is proposed by clause 10 the process of mediation and negotiation contemplated in clauses 8 and 9 will not have effective results.

Let me put it both ways. Suppose the result is successful. Surely this parliament should impart a sense of urgency to the mediation proceedings. I do not believe we impart any sense of urgency if we suggest that mediation proceedings should continue until November 15, 1966 That would cover a total of roughly ten weeks. I am aware, as all hon. members are, that there are complex issues to be decided. If the mediation proposals are given that spirit of urgency which the situation demands, then there is every reasonable prospect that negotiations can be concluded within the six weeks period the amendment would propose.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, if this process of negotiation is to be long drawn out and unsuccessful, as some of the union members feel from past experience, then it is just another exacerbating delay in the final solution of this matter. One of the great difficulties with labour relations, as anyone experienced in them knows, is the long periods of delay before decisions are finally made. I think it was my leader who referred to the ritualistic dance. Ritualistic dances may be all very well and they may be necessary, but they get tiresome if they are drawn out month after month.

I suggest it would greatly add to the attractiveness of this bill—I do not say it is too attractive—in the minds of those who are on strike if we provided evidence in the bill of a sense of urgency which is not in the legislation at the moment. Someone may say there is a possibility that by October 15 these negotiations may have made admirable progress and yet be just short of a conclusive result at that date and that it would be a great mistake to dash suddenly into compulsory arbitration when real progress had been made. I agree, and I point out that that situation is adequately covered by subclause 2 which enables an extension of time if the mediator reports favourable progress. It may seem a small matter to substitute October for November, but I think it would be a symptom of the fact this house is ready to try to impart a sense of urgency to the negotiations. This is one of the grievances that has been in the minds of many workers. I know this from speaking to them. They feel this process has been delayed and delayed. Therefore I move:

That clause 9 of this bill be amended by substituting in the seventh line thereof for the word "November" the word "October".

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, speaking for this group may I say that we are not in support of the proposed amendment. We feel that now parliament has met reasonable time must be given. There is now a completely different set of circumstances confronting the people who are going to negotiate, and it is only fair to give them a little time to do their work and enable them to come up with something that they themselves have produced instead of having mandatory arbitration. Therefore we in this group are not prepared to support the amendment.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt about the urgency of this matter, but another very important principle is involved so far as the government is concerned and I am sure so far as the great majority of the members of this house are concerned.

All of us have said more than once, and said sincerely, that we believe in collective bargaining. During the past eight or nine days I have had the opportunity of meeting with the union leaders, sometimes for a few moments and on occasion for an hour or more in a session. I have some idea of the multitude and complexity of the issues which have to be dealt with. A study of the Freedman report is only one good example. If we are going to bring finality to this matter, the success of the mediation proceedings will depend to a large extent upon the man chosen as mediator.

I have given considerable thought to this question and I have discussed with my colleagues the person who I feel could do the best job. While I cannot appoint any such person until the proposed bill has become law, because of the urgency which exists we would be dilatory in our duty if we did not canvas the possibility of getting the man we consider most competent for this job before he became tied up with other commitments. We would want him to start as soon as possible and continue the efforts of negotiation and mediation.

The bill has been drawn with this in mind, and it is not necessary for the mediator or mediators to wait until November 15 before considering the matter. To one listening to the hon. member for Greenwood that might be the conclusion. The bill is deliberately drawn to make provision for this situation. What the clause says is:

The Minister of Labour shall appoint a mediator or mediators (hereinafter referred to as the "mediator") who shall forthwith endeavour to mediate the matters in dispute between the railway companies and the unions and to bring about agreement between them and who shall report to the Minister of Labour—

Then the bill does not say on November 15 but "not later than November 15". If the mediator reports that the negotiations are fruitless, then he does not have to wait until November 15; that would be absurd. We have in mind as the mediator a man who, if this bill is passed, will I am sure meet with—I cannot say unanimous acceptance—the overwhelming support of this committee. He is prepared to take on the job and he may well need, particularly in view of the technological aspects of this inquiry, until November 15. He is certainly likely to need a longer period than until October 15, and it is for that reason that we oppose this amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to suggest another reason that I think would make it inadvisable to put this kind of restricton upon the time. It is true that it could be extended by agreement, but I see no advantage in putting this restriction into the bill when there seems to be one obvious reason that the period should be until November 15.

That reason is that as soon as this measure has been accepted by the house, if it is, it is my intention, as has already been indicated by the first reading given to the bill, to introduce legislation which, notwithstanding the observations made earlier today by the hon. member for York South, the government believes will have the effect of giving the railways greater freedom to conduct their operations in a way which we hope, believe and expect will give them reason to feel, not right away of course but during the course of 1967, that they are in a better position to bargain successfully with their workers without imposing as a background another direct charge upon the taxpayers of Canada.

I do not dissent from the position expressed earlier today by the hon. member for York South that there are some kinds of transportation services that the railways are expected to provide. I am not seeking to debate the bill but, just as an illustration of the reasons for the desirability of this delay, in the bill we are asking parliament to authorize a proper costing of these services that are performed by the railways for national, public or social reasons.

The railways will know that they are going to be remunerated by the taxpayers for these services, and I think that this is a good and sound principle. It is not fair to put a charge on other shippers just because the railways are compelled by parliament to perform unremunerative services which are socially or economically desirable for the rest of the community. That was the principle which was enunciated. This means that the railways will know more certainly that they will be remunerated for these services and that the remuneration will be properly calculated. They will be able to count on that.

I think it is also most desirable that those services which could and should be remunerative and which are comptetitive should be run in a businesslike way instead of becoming a drain upon the taxpayers. But until the railways are in a position to conduct their business as other carriers are permitted to conduct theirs, they are not in an adequate position to bargain effectively.

I realize that this other measure is not going to get through the house between today and tomorrow. Indeed, it would be shocking if parliament were to adopt it within that short space of time. Nevertheless I hope that we will proceed with all due expedition and give the bill passage, possibly with some amendment, even though this will take some weeks. These things will be going forward at the same time as this period is running.

I feel that if the collective bargaining and mediation provided for in this bill are to have any kind of meaning, negotiations must go on beyond the reasonably anticipated period for the final passage of this legislation. The railway companies will then know what are the circumstances in which they are operating and will have some capacity to bargain effectively. For that reason I think it would be unwise, since in all human probability October 15 would be too close to that other date, for hon. members to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the Minister of Transport I am in a position to realize how proper the amendment is. As he went on to list all the difficulties it became obvious to me that if we must wait to assess all the benefits which will flow to the companies from the complicated legislation we are to deal with here, the mediation will be protracted long after October 15 or even November 15.

Had the minister been really logical he would have moved his own amendment asking for mediation to continue until December, January or even next March. The point I am making is simple. Direct negotiations, with a mediator, between the railway companies and the unions have failed for many years. They will fail this time, and after they have failed the issues must go to arbitration. It seems to us to make a great deal of sense that we should reach a settlement of the matters in dispute as quickly as possible. Instead of talking for two months before going to arbitration, the mediation period ought to be cut as short as possible in order to get on with arbitration. I shall not continue any longer because I think we should proceed with the legislation as quickly as possible.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 131.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Regulations.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, without agreeing to the desirability of having clause 10 at all I should like to move another amendment, and in doing so I invite the committee to return seriously and sympathetically to the question of the Freedman report recommendations.

It has been agreed on all sides that this matter can be discussed during the negotiations which will follow the passing of this bill and that they can be gone into if necessary by the board of arbitration. The Minister of Labour and some of his colleagues have given an assurance that this is what they want done. I am still conscious of what happened in 1950 when Mr. St. Laurent wanted something done which Mr. Justice Kellock felt the act did not give him authority to do. But we are agreed that one of the issues in dispute is the question of technological change and that it is one which can come under consideration.

We feel, and in this I think we are expressing a view held very strongly by the workers who are out on strike, that it is not good enough just to have the assurance that this matter will be discussed. There should be some assurance that action will be taken. The government has already accepted the proposition put forward both inside and outside the house that it was not good enough to leave the issue of wage rates for 1967 merely as something to be discussed. It was felt there should be some floor. We suggest it is similarly not good enough to leave this other issue, this burning issue, merely as one the discussion of which is guaranteed.

I remind the committee that this matter has been discussed at length for a long time. Judge Robinson, chairman of the conciliation board in 1962, urged that the problem be placed before parliament and dealt with by legislation. In 1962 the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and perhaps others, asked for an industrial inquiry commission to go into this issue. There was a wildcat strike on the C.N.R. in 1964. There was the Freedman report on November 17, 1965, the terms and recommendations of which have become almost a bible, referred to time and time again.

Then there is the report of Judge Little who headed one of the boards in the current dispute, a report in which legislation by parliament was recommended. How many times does this matter have to be discussed and put to arbitration before some action is taken? I say again that this is one of the most important issues involved. It is just as serious as the wage issue. Indeed, for many it is even more serious.

Whether we approve or not, parliament has grappled with the wage issue and I recognize that parliament must deal with this matter if it expects the men to go back to work. We urge the government to recognize that this other issue is just as serious and, to many of the employees, more serious. We have had discussion of this matter on other clauses. Discussion took place on the amendment which the hon. member for Nickel Belt put before the committee and later withdrew. It took place on the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. So it is not necessary to carry on at length.

• (3:40 p.m.)

But I dare to suggest that as a result of what has already been said we have come up with another amendment that meets some of the objections made and which I seriously ask the minister and the Prime Minister to consider. When I asked my hon. friend to withdraw his previous amendment I read the wording of another one which I had drafted. Since then I have tried to improve that draft and am prepared to move it as an amendment inserting a new subclause 1(c) in clause 10.

[Mr. Knowles.]

As clause 10 is constructed it sets out a provision for what the government may do after a mediator has reported. In other words, under clause 8 we accept the fact that in their negotiations the parties can discuss the Freedman report, and if they come up with an agreement that is fine and nothing more needs to be done. But the whole purport of clause 10 is to give the government power under regulation by order in council to take whatever steps may be necessary if satisfactory conclusions are not reached under clauses 8 and 9.

We suggest that if the point is reached where the mediator reports there is no agreement on the question of the Freedman recommendations, then the government should have the authority to instruct the board of arbitration to deal with that issue. At the point I have mentioned I believe the government should have power by order in council to put this matter in the hands of the board of arbitration with a guideline or minimum standard that must be met. Therefore to meet this condition and improve the bill in one of its main deficiencies I move:

That clause 10 be amended by inserting therein, immediately after subclause (b) of clause (1) thereof, the following new subclause (c):

"(c) instructing the board to determine and provide in an appropriate form, an amendment to the collective agreements to which this act applies implementing the recommendations of the report of the Industrial Inquiry Commission on Canadian National Railways Run-Throughs, dated November 17, 1965."

This amendment does not write in detail the terms of such an item for a collective agreement. It does not include anything which might offend the Leader of the Opposition, as did the previous one. It leaves it to the board of arbitration to draft the amendment to the collective agreements, but just as we have set a floor under wages, so it sets a minimum that must be met. That minimum would be an inclusion in the collective agreements of an appropriate form of the recommendations of the Freedman report.

I recognize the earnestness with which the Minister of Labour has dealt with the problem of automation and technological change. I recognize that he found it not very pleasant to oppose the amendment to clause 8 moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I feel he wants to deal with this matter, and just as the government has accepted the proposition of a floor with respect to wages I suggest it should accept the proposition that there be a minimum so far as automation and technological changes are concerned.

When the government agreed to the floor under wage rates in 1967 and to the 18 per cent total package it made its bill a little more palatable and acceptable to many of the workers, but there are many of them who also consider this a serious point and to whom the bill would be a lot more palatable if they knew that as the result of the negotiations and arbitration that may yet take place something will be done about this important question. I urge the minister to consider the amendment sympathetically.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the observations that I made earlier when commenting on the persuasive arguments advanced by the Leader of the Opposition, and in view of the firm assurance I gave hon. members that in the instructions to the mediator and, if necessary, the eventual instructions to the board of arbitration, we would direct specific and urgent attention to the technological change problem as dealt with in the Freedman report, I see no necessity for this amendment. The position is quite clear, and for that reason we oppose this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister heard both the hon. member for York South and me remind him of what happened in 1950. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport were here at that time and heard Prime Minister St. Laurent give the assurance that certain things would be done, but it turned out that Mr. Justice Kellock said he would have to be guided by the provisions of the statute. In those circumstances, what use is the assurance if it is not included in the statute?

Mr. Nicholson: Of course I listened to the hon. member for York South, but the circumstances in this case are entirely different. Mr. Justice Kellock was appointed an industrial commissioner under the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This bill, if passed, authorizes the Minister of Labour to appoint a mediator, and I have undertaken to give that mediator specific instructions.

Mr. Lewis: Apparently we have failed to make our point clear to the minister. Two things can be done. One is that the minister in his advice or instructions to the board of arbitrators may say, "You are hereby instructed to deal with this matter." I have no doubt in the world that the minister will do that. He has given an assurance that he intends to tell the board of arbitration to deal with the matter of the Freedman report, but I respectfully suggest to him that that means the board of arbitration would then be considering precisely the same things as Mr. Justice Freedman considered. I can again go over the ground in respect of the need for it and how to implement it.

On the other hand, there is another thing which can be done; that is, that the minister be given authority by this parliament to say to the board of arbitration, "You are not merely to deal with this matter, but you are to come up with certain actual clauses in the collective agreement implementing the recommendations of the Freedman report". The minister refuses to recognize the obvious and important distinctions between the two. His assurance—and I use the term with the reservation which I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does—so long as it is not in the bill, amounts to no more than an assurance that he will tell the board to deal with it. The board may decide to do nothing about it. There is nothing in the law which requires that it be done. If you want, as you do, to assuage the fears the workers have on this point and make clear that something definite will in fact be done, then this is the way to do it. If the minister can indicate that he has some other way of doing it, then I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be glad to withdraw this amendment and let the minister place an amendment before us.

I say to the minister as emphatically as I can that his assurance, sincerely given and accepted by this house, is not of the slightest value in this situation, because his assurance can go no further than ask for more discussion and more deliberation. What the workers, and particularly the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, require is an assurance in this act that the Freedman recommendation will be implemented in an appropriate form, decided upon either by the mediation board or, if mediation fails, by the board of arbitrators. That assurance can be there only if it is written into the bill.

I say to the government, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that this is just as important as the wages. A few moments ago I was called out of this chamber and informed, not by a member of the committee with which the minister met, but by a lawyer for the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, that he has been on the telephone with the union office and has been informed that this question of assurance in the bill that the Freedman report be implemented is of the utmost importance to his members who now are on strike.

There is no reason that this could not be done. How many more times must we investigate this problem. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated how many times this has been before tribunals. It was before a board in 1962, and then there was the wildcat strike in 1965. Mr. Justice Freedman made a thorough investigation and report. There was a committee of the house some years ago which came to the same conclusion. Surely we have had enough inquiries and investigations. I have not read a single criticism, even from business, of the particular recommendations Mr. Justice Freedman has made; perhaps there have been some, but I have not read them. Certainly most people have recognized that the Freedman recommendations are a great advance in management-labour relations.

I suggest we have had enough inquiry. The thing we should do in this bill is instruct the arbitrators to implement the Freedman report. There is a big difference between the assurance the minister has given and the purpose and purport of the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I should like to point out that the Freedman report, as is clear from the passage that I read from the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, does not come up with a definite formula. The commissioner says that the best way to solve this difficult problem is for the parties to get together and try to incorporate a formula in an agreement; and if that fails, then legislation may be necessary. We are going one step forward. This is the first serious negotiation in which the railways and their employees have been involved since the Freedman report was brought down, and we are saying in this legislation that if the parties cannot resolve it, it is an outstanding issue, then it will be arbitrated.

Judge Munroe, whose other recommendation we all accept, said that for him to recommend implementation by legislation at this time would be premature. He makes that clear.

Mr. Lewis: That is not what Mr. Justice Munroe said, Mr. Chairman. The minister interrupted me the other night and gave the impression that that was what he said. He does not say "implement by legislation". He said it was premature for him to accede.

Mr. Nicholson: That is what I said. Mr. Justice Munroe said that in the circumstances and pending completion of the study—the study being made by the Department of Labour—he thought it would be premature to accede at this time to the request of the union. As I said, we are providing here for a period of additional study and negotiation before final arbitration. In my humble opinion that is much more appropriate than the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He says:

> —the following new subclause (c):
> instructing the board to determine and provide, in an appropriate form, an amendment to the collective agrements to which this act applies implementing the recommendations—

And so on.

There was no clear recommendation in the Freedman report that if they could not agree there should be a change in the act. That is not what Mr. Justice Freedman said. This is a departure from the Freedman recommendation.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, we are not in a position to support this amendment. I should like to remind members of the committee that this amendment is committing the house to the recommendations of the Freedman report. This house has neither debated nor studied the recommendations in the Freedman report, and anyway as the minister said it is not intended as a final formula. It is not the purpose of the house to force upon any arbitration the over-all recommendations of that report. According to this amendment, parliament is being put in the position of an arbitrator, and this is not the business of the house at this time.

I find it difficult to understand the argument raised by the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre, because it seems to me they are asking us to impose upon the further negotiations which are to take place recommendations which I really do not believe they are convinced should be imposed or agreed upon at this time in this way. I believe it would be completely wrong to include this type of amendment in this legislation which we are considering now.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word in reply to the hon. member for Red Deer and the Minister of Labour at the same time. The hon. member for Red Deer says that this is imposing a condition in advance of negotiations. The Minister of Labour says that we are departing from Mr. Justice Freedman's recommendation which was to the effect that negotiations should be tried first and that only if negotiations failed should there be legislation.

• (4:00 p.m.)

May I say to both gentlemen that if they will look at this amendment in the context of the act they will see that it calls first of all for clauses 8 and 9 to become operative, and this is where provision is made for negotiation and mediation. It is only after failure to resolve this issue by negotiation or mediation under clauses 8 and 9 of the bill that clause 10, which, by the way, is a permissive clause, comes into play, whereupon the Minister of Labour may recommend to the governor in council that a regulation be passed giving this authority to a board of arbitration.

I submit that we are right in line with the proposals set out by Mr. Justice Freedman, namely that if there cannot be a successful conclusion to this issue by negotiation under clauses 8 and 9 then this parliament should say: We have had enough discussion about this issue and it is time for this to be implemented.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please rise. Those opposed to the amendment will please rise.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 125.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, this morning I gave an assurance to the committee that when we reached our consideration of clause 10 I would move an amendment. I do so now in the following terms:

Add subclause (3) to clause 10 in the following terms:

(3) Any board of arbitrators appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) shall not provide for a reduction in any wage rate or basic daily rate established by section 6.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Shall the amendment as moved by the hon. Minister of Labour carry?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I think we can accept the spirit and intent of this amendment, but perhaps the wording could be improved slightly. Will the minister consider including the words "award, decision or report" before "any board of arbitrators" so that the amendment would read in part:

(3) Any award, decision or report of any board of arbitrators appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) shall not provide for a reduction in any wage rate or basic daily rate established by section 6.

It seems to me that it is the award, decision or report coming from a board of arbitrators that might make a change.

Mr. Nicholson: Perhaps those words would clarify the wording of the clause because it is the award, decision or report which might provide for a reduction. We have no objection to such a constructive suggestion from the hon. member for Medicine Hat and we are prepared to accept it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Medicine Hat has made a useful suggestion to improve the language, but surely the word "report" is unnecessary. It is the award or decision that could result in a reduction.

Mr. Nicholson: That suggestion is also acceptable.

The Deputy Chairman: As I understand it the amendment as amended would then read as follows:

Add subclause (3) to clause 10 in the following terms:

(3) Any award or decision of any board of arbitrators appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) shall not provide for a reduction in any wage rate or basic daily rate established by section 6.

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 10 as amended carry?

I recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I believe you recognized me. Am I not right in that regard?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Brewin: I am only asking for a direction from the Chair. Someone informed me that the Chair had recognized me.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, obviously the spelling of Villeneuve is not the same as the spelling of Greenwood and it does not sound the same.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, clause 10 of Bill No. C-230 deals with compulsory arbitration and we can find in subclause (2) that:

(2) In the event that a board of arbitrators is appointed under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) and decides any matter not agreed upon between a railway company and a union at the time of its decision, the collective agreement to which this act applies between the railway company and the union shall be deemed to be amended by the incorporation therein of such decision—

That is where there is compulsory arbitration.

Yesterday, we had comments on, and opposition to, this compulsory arbitration, from certain leaders. For my part, I put the question to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) last night, as recorded in the right-hand column of page 7848 of the official report:

In the name of the freedom of the workingmen on the railways, or of any workingmen in Canada, the hon. member is strongly opposed to compulsory arbitration. Would he also be opposed, for the same reason, to the compulsory check-off which is entirely against freedom of any workingman who does not want to belong to any union in Canada?

The answer of the hon. member for York South, as recorded in the left-hand column of page 7849 was as follows:

In my own opinion it is not, and I therefore support deduction of union dues.

He did not say compulsory dues or deductions. I had put before him the question of compulsory deductions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, among the objections we receive, we could read a communication issued by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress in a press release dated August 30. He said:

The proposed legislation to end the Canadian railroad workers' strike is a coercive measure which is to the credit neither of the government that introduced it, nor, if it should be passed, of Canada. Its major objective is to coerce free men into working against their will—

Mr. Chairman, when I see such a statement by a labour leader with Mr. Jodoin's standing, I can but question the sincerity of such a man. When we refer to union check-off and compulsory dues and we object to them, Mr. Jodoin and other labour leaders claim foul play and cry democracy. It should be remembered that the Canadian railroad workers have stopped working quite legally, there is no question about that. But they are being placed in a position of having to choose between compulsion and refusal to submit to legislation they know is bad.

Mr. Chairman, in the case of the Canadian railroads, as the minister is aware, the unions, whichever they were, forced the government and the employers to deduct compulsory union dues to such a point that a railroad employee may not even keep his job if he fails to pay his union dues, if he fails to go to a certain bank when he gets his pay and his union dues are not paid up, he loses his job, not because he is fired by the company that hired him, but because the union boss decides that such a worker is no longer entitled to work, precisely because he has failed to pay his compulsory dues.

The worker is no longer entitled to work, precisely because he has failed to pay his compulsory dues to the union.

Mr. Chairman, it is time such hypocrisy is bared, that such notorious hypocrisy is revealed to Canadian workers who are being exploited by such people.

When we mention compulsory arbitration, the people of the New Democratic Party rise against the notion; it is a direct attack on union freedom; but when the unions force workers to join the union in order to be entitled to earn their daily bread, is that no longer dictatorship? Is this respect for personal freedom?

Mr. Chairman, I am also against compulsory arbitration; I am against compulsory union dues; I am against income tax deducted at the source from workers' pay cheques.

I want a worker who earns $100 to get $100; let him spend his earnings as he sees fit; let him pay his union dues himself; let him pay his income tax himself; let him pay himself for what he wants or what he expects from the economic or social life of his country. But when I see labour leaders writing to us —like this one from the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, London, Ontario, did on August 30, 1966. What does Mr. Gallagher, secretary of that organization have to say?

[English]

—that the leaders of the federal political parties in Canada be advised of our complete opposition to compulsory arbitration, or any legislation aimed at forcing us—

The unions.

—to accept anything less than a settlement of all our demands, on a basis acceptable to a majority of our members across Canada.

[Translation]

Union freedom is increased, I agree, but freedom of the individual is sabotaged at its base. This, Mr. Chairman, is to show that I would object to clause 10 if union leaders were ready to forget compulsory union deductions. I would object to that myself but if union leaders want compulsory measures in order to force people to work according to the dictates of certain union leaders, Mr. Chairman, then I will vote in favour of clause 10 which calls for, orders, and recommends compulsory arbitration.

When we see these compulsory measures right and left—I was reading a circular the other day put out in the province of Quebec by some of my old friends, staff members of the paper titled Vers Demain, which stated:

Why all these strikes? Actual reasons:

Give unions importance and power; put families out in the street; ruin landlords and businessmen; hinder police protection; create general dissatisfaction, forerunner of revolution; promote class struggles, in all spheres, including religion; stir up an atmosphere of confusion, favourable to revolutionary action; enable revolutionaries to carry out riot exercises; actually launch communist revolution; have the enemies of revolution thrown in prison, under the pretext of protecting the public.

This same Vers Demain paper stated last month:

We demand that the Quebec parliament take five necessary measure toward the recovery of public freedom and security:

1. Abolition of compulsory union contribution.

This is what unions are asking parliament or government to take out of its bill No. C-230, to delete "compulsory" from the bill.

2. Abolition of the right to strike in the public services.

When we had a strike in the hospitals of the province, Mr. Chairman, do you think what happened was something to be proud of, letting people out of hospitals because some union leaders in the province of Quebec had decided that hospitals must close down? Old people turned into the street because the union leaders had decided to get them out of the hospitals. And the public authorities tolerate such a situation resulting precisely from the compulsory which those people demand to help themselves and not to serve the Canadian people.

3. Picketing to be prohibited in all strikes.

4. Hospitals to be handed back to private institutions, religious or medical.

Mr. Chairman, those are recommendations which the newspaper Vers Demain made throughout the province and I endorse them. I do not endorse everything that the people of Vers Demain do, but when it makes sense, when they fight for the respect due to man, I do. To respect an odourless, colourless, tasteless organization does not appeal to me.

But the people who are part of the organization, for instance, the human being, the worker, the farmer, the settler, the white-collar worker, the physician, the professional man, anyone deserves respect and no one, no labour leader has the right to go against the freedom of the individual. No one has the right to prevent a Canadian from earning an honest and decent living.

Within the unions that right is not recognized. If one does not belong to the union, he does not have the right to work; on top of this, you have to pay a premium to belong to the union. This was the practice in Sudbury and in Rouyn-Noranda. In fact, when men were sent from Rouyn to Sault Ste. Marie, the union charged $50 to $100 to allow a worker into the union. It was compulsory, a condition which a man had to accept in order to be allowed to earn his living.

Mr. Chairman, as I indicated in my press release, the time has come to unmask some of the union leaders. This does not mean that we are against the unions. I say to the people and the workers: belong to the unions, but control them.

When I meet railwaymen in Rouyn-Noranda working for the C.N.R. or the Ontario Northland Railway, they tell me: since we made union contributions compulsory, we have had no service from our union leaders. When union contributions are no longer compulsory, the union leaders will have to take care of the workers and serve their best interests, instead of exploiting them and allowing the situation to reach the point where parliament must be recalled to draw up a bill in order to try and force people to accept working conditions, and force the employers to accept the unions' point of view, and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, when the Canadian economy is such that each individual can develop according to his aspirations, then we will hear no talk of compulsion, but of personal freedom, secure in the knowledge that Canada is able to take care of all its population.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the public and the house would understand if we were to take time out to reply to the diatribe of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) woven of half-truths, misinformation and a certain number of prejudices dating back to the previous century.

Let us say, Mr. Chairman, that I only wish to indicate that, at the first opportunity, I shall try to reply point by point to the statements made by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I could always follow the hon. minister to give him a few pointers on the proprieties toward Canadian workers.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the committee would like to get through with this matter as quickly as possible, but I have an amendment to make which I make seriously because I believe it will improve the legislation, make it more workable and acceptable; and I believe furthermore that it is in accordance with the principles accepted by all quarters of this house. The amendment that I propose, Mr. Chairman, adopts as a basis or floor for negotiation and arbitration provided for by these subclauses of clause 10 the recommendations made by the chairman of the board of conciliation in matters other than wage issues. As is probably known to all hon. members of this house, Mr. Justice Munroe and Mr. Justice Cameron included in their recommendations not only the wage provisions which we have fully discussed in this house but a number of what have been described as fringe benefits. These recommendations included such matters as improvement in annual vacations, insurance and unemployment benefits, bereavement leave, statutory holidays and other matters of this sort.

One of the reasons for which this bill, when it was originally introduced, ran into such a hostile reception from many people, including those in the railway unions and the people affected, was their belief that the effect of this bill was to take away even those favourable recommendations which had been approved by these conciliation boards. The reason for this hostility was not only the monetary issues which we have discussed and which may have been important, but also the feeling that these other matters which had been discussed at length and in a sense judicially determined as being appropriate were not once again to be made a subject of negotiation and taken away from them.

The argument has been made that these matters should be left to collective bargaining and arbitration. I agree with that, but if this matter goes to compulsory arbitration then I suggest that the very same principle applies here as has applied to what we have done with the wage issue. In the wage issue we have said that the basis, the floor or the foundation—I am using the words which have been used by ministers in this house—which the arbitration tribunal decided upon should not fall below the standard already judicially approved by the boards of conciliation.

The same thing was said in regard to wage proposals. We were told that we should leave the 1967 wages to conciliation, discussion, mediation and arbitration. This committee is well aware that in order to move toward making this bill acceptable we had to enunciate a principle, which was enunciated, that if we were truly to make the report to the board of conciliation a basis or foundation for any future settlement or for compulsory arbitration, a floor should at least be provided so that those benefits which were already recommended should not in effect be taken away.

It has been said in the house by the Prime Minister among others that parliament regrets having to intervene in matters of collective bargaining and labour relations, and that it should intervene as little as possible. This is true. However, if we have to intervene—and in this case we certainly must—then it would be folly, I suggest, not to intervene effectively on the basis of the principle that we must leave everything to conciliation and arbitration so as to secure the acquiescence if not the approval of those whose lives and working conditions are affected.

I am asking the Minister of Labour whether in this connection he subscribes to the argument that was so forcefully presented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

They said that the recommendations on future wages in the Munroe report, and I take it in the Cameron report, were, although not positively enacted, virtually certain to be acceptable or, to paraphrase the words of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, morally binding. For that reason they said that without explicit enactment in this legislation there was a basis, a foundation or a floor for future negotiation and arbitration. Does the minister also believe that on the other hand the railway companies will be free in the negotiation to refuse to include these recommendations, or that the arbitrator will be free to take away that which has already been recommended on the non-wage matters included in these reports?

I want to state with all the force I can that if the principle that we are adopting in this house is that we are intervening in this matter on the basis of the Munroe report and the conciliation board's report, and if we have found it necessary, as we have, to incorporate that report as a basic minimum below which negotiations will not go in respect of wages, precisely the same argument is applicable in respect of the so-called fringe benefits.

The word "fringe" somehow makes it sound as if these benefits were unimportant, but I assure you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of this committee that these arguments are not unimportant to those whose lives are directly affected. The acceptability of what parliament proposes to do here is affected by these matters. I want to know why we are asked to approve the proposition that the Munroe report shall set a floor in respect of wages, and not in regard to these other matters.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I therefore move, Mr. Chairman:

That clause 10 be amended by adding thereto paragraph 1(c) which will read as follows:

"Provided that if the decision referred to in paragraph 10(b)—

That is the decision of the board of arbitrators.

—is less favourable to the claims of the employees in respect of terms or conditions of employment than the recommendations made by chairmen of boards of conciliation in respect to collective agreements to which this act applies, then the said collective agreements shall be revised or amended so as to comply with the said recommendations.

This amendment is couched in legal language but the principle is simple. The principle is that if we are to have our legislation based upon the reports of the justices, who have been praised as experts in this field, if we are going to make them the basis of our legislation upon which we are asking men to go back to work without being able to exercise the normal right to strike, then we must incorporate not part but all of those recommendations.

This applies to the non-wage as well as the wage benefits. This amendment is consistent with what the Leader of the Opposition so forcefully put before us, and is consistent with what the ministers themselves have said is the basis of this matter. The acceptance of this proposal will give a guarantee to the employees concerned that they will not have to renegotiate the items already recommended in their favour by the boards of conciliation. I urge the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, in view of what was said last night when they asked for improvements or suggestions to make this bill more acceptable, to accept this amendment. I want to assure them and other members of this house that if this is accepted it will be another thing that will make it simpler and easier for those who are in leadership within the unions to be able to say that this parliament has been fair. It has changed its mind and improved the original legislation. It has made the full basis of the Munroe report the floor below which, at any future time, they can not be forced by any lengthy negotiation or any compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Nicholson: I think I should speak but will do so very briefly. When this suggestion was put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood this morning I assured him and the committee that I would give it further consideration. I have done so. At that time I indicated I did not believe it was necessary, any more than some of the other important matters that were referred to by the hon. member for Kamloops last evening, whose reasoning appealed to me. In view of that, I can only say that after careful consideration the amendment is not acceptable to the government.

Mr. Patterson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I should like to point out that we do not have a copy of the amendment.

Mr. Brewin: I handed out enough copies for everybody. I don't know why you did not get one.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) negatived: Yeas, 14; nays, 114.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 10 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, concerning the technical aspect of the board of three arbitrators, several members of the house mentioned, during the debates, that the labour legislation should be improved. I am of the opinion also that the procedures should be improved. The mechanism of conciliation, mediation and arbitration must be flexible and expeditious enough.

That is why, it has been noticed in clause 9 that the mediators will have to report to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) not later than November 15. But if it happens during this conflict, for example, that a board of three arbitrators must be formed by an order of the governor in council, I see nothing in the bill, in clause 10 especially, indicating a definite time limit within which the arbitrators must render their decision.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), that clause 10 be amended by adding the following subclause which will become the subclause (4).

(3) The said Board of three (3) arbitrators must submit a formula for settlement within three (3) months of its appointment.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that this board of arbitration will be bringing in its recommendations or award within a period of three months, but I believe that it would be a mistake to tie their hands to such a limited period. It might take three and a half months or four months. I hope it will be shorter than that, but this amendment is not acceptable because parliament might have to meet to extend time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Allard) negatived: Yeas, 2; nays, 111.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I will wait for some of the noise to simmer down. I have not as yet had anything to say at any stage of the discussion of this bill, even though I recognize that the bill and the situation which brought it in is one of the most serious and important questions with which this parliament has been called upon to deal for some time.

The particular clause, clause 10, with which the committee is dealing at the present time seemed well on its way to becoming one of the most amended clauses of any bill which we have had for some time, or certainly is a clause to which many amendments have been sought to be attached. However I want to assure the committee that it is not my intention to propose any further amendment to this clause. Indeed, if it were possible within the rules what I would be rising to do would be to move for its complete elimination from the bill. However I recognize that under the rules it would not be in order for me to do this, and when the appropriate time comes I shall have the opportunity of expressing my views upon it by the way that I will vote when the vote is called.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that this is the second time in a single session of a Canadian parliament that we are being asked to deal with a bill that contains within it a clause providing for compulsory arbitration on matters arising from a dispute between labour and management. I for one feel that if this is going to become a common occurrence in this chamber it is a subject matter that should give us cause for some serious thought before we repeat the performance for a second time in the same session.

In this connection I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that the bill we now have before us is numbered Bill No. C-230, and that it was only recently, as far back as Bill No. C-215, that we were dealing with the subject matter of compulsory arbitration, shortly before the house entered into a period of recess. I find that launching upon this course of action in the Canadian parliament is something which to me is most repugnant. In my view this parliament and its members should be devoting attention to devising ways and means of avoiding entering into a proposal such as that contained in this clause.

I have not had the long and detailed experience on railway matters of some of my colleagues in this party who have been participating in this debate, but I do feel that this particular clause in its implications goes far beyond this dispute. I feel that the members of the government who currently sit on the treasury benches, like those who have preceded them, when they were dealing with somewhat similar situations in the past, have not properly wrestled with the possible alternatives in presenting to parliament a particular course of action to bring this dispute to a conclusion.

Reference has already been made to the history of the major railway disputes in Canada, dating from 1950 to 1958 and 1960. I have to admit that I was not a member of this chamber prior to this occasion when parliament was wrestling with the question of bringing back into operation the national railway system. I had not arrived here in 1950, and as it happened I was temporarily absent in 1958 and 1960, the other previous occasions which have been mentioned in the debate.

However, I think that others who have preceded me in the discussion of this bill have made it abundantly clear that on each of those occasions parliament was asked to deal with a shotgun type of legislation to terminate a railway strike in this country. I well recall that when the Prime Minister opened the debate on this particular bill he waxed eloquent at considerable length upon his faith and belief in the principles of free collective bargaining; and in the next breath he said that he was going to bring the process of collective bargaining to an immediate termination, as far as it was possible for him to do so, in view of what I am sure he anticipated might be some resistance in this chamber.

I am not being particularly critical in any way of the present Prime Minister as contrasted with the position taken by his predecessors in that office who were faced with a parallel situation. What I am trying to say, Mr. Chairman, is that in view of this sequence of events in dealing with railway strikes, and in view of the fact that this has now reached the point that parliament has been asked to deal with disputes other than railway strikes, we should really begin to ask ourselves where we are going and what other alternative there is to this proposal that is now before us.

I would remind the Prime Minister and the committee that a bill is in the parliamentary hopper at the present time designed to give the public service the right of collective bargaining. This is a measure which I am prepared to support. On the other hand, I see very little value in our going through the motions of giving collective bargaining rights to people in the public service if we know in our hearts that immediately they begin to exercise those rights in the normal way we shall be asked by the government of the day to yank those rights away from them. It is most illogical and nonsensical.

I referred earlier to Bill No. C-215. As the Prime Minister knows, when this matter was before us the members of my party tried to bring forward an alternative method of dealing with that situation. We suggested that the operating companies should be placed under a public trusteeship if it was our intention to ask those particular employees to return to work. We felt this was a technique of placing the two parties to the dispute in a position of balance. On the one hand, we were saying to the men involved that they should relinquish their rights to withold their services. On the other hand, we were saying to the employers: As long as this dispute continues you will not have the right to operate this concern.

We proposed that there should be open-ended mediation, with a terminal date in the bill representing what we thought was a reasonable period of time to allow the two parties to arrive at a solution of their problems, bearing in mind public opinion in the country. This, we felt, was at least one alternative to the shotgun tactics which we are being asked to approve in this bill as we were asked earlier by the government to agree to in Bill No. C-215. I have heard the Minister of Labour as well as the Prime Minister talk about free collective bargaining and their desire to see it function. I must say that I was surprised, indeed I was hurt, by the hasty and somewhat angry rejection on the part of the government of the proposal we put forward in all sincerity and good faith in the hope that it might be helpful, indicating that if it were acceptable to the government a fair majority of members were prepared to deal with this matter in a way which did not require the forcing of a solution through compulsory arbitration.

However, that matter is not before the committee at this moment. I am not even certain that this would be the most appropriate way of approaching the problems raised by a national rail strike. Two major railway lines are involved, one publicly owned and the other privately owned. I freely admit that in my own view the whole situation would be a lot simpler if we had one integrated railway system and public ownership. However, we are dealing with the situation which now exists and it seems to me that another possible way in which this matter could be settled would be to remove clause 10 entirely from the bill and substitute some provision for what I would again call open-ended mediation and negotiation with a proviso that if the parties had not been able to resolve their disagreements by a certain date the question would be returned to parliament. In the light of the evidence adduced during the mediation proceedings and the positions taken by the parties, parliament could then make a further determination of the issue on the basis of the facts as then known, including the extent to which the parties had been prepared to bargain in good faith and so on.

This would appeal to me as being another possible alternative worthy of consideration in a situation such as that created by a national rail strike. There may be yet another alternative which would make this bill more acceptable to those of us who have at heart the right of citizens to engage in free collective bargaining but who are yet prepared to recognize that there are situations where in the national interest it is not possible to allow a particular group of workers to withdraw their services. Instead of including in the bill provision for compulsory arbitration with a binding determination to be made, there could be a clause containing some form of provision or suggestion, or indeed an order from this parliament, to the effect that the parties might find it a course of wisdom to agree between themselves on some form of arbitration on one or more of the issues to be received between them.

I realize I cannot move that this clause be abolished. An attempt has been made to amend it. I shall not attempt to amend it in the terms I have suggested. I recognize that the government has embarked on the course of action proposed in this bill. I recognize too that the situation which faces this country is a serious one and that some action by parliament is required without too much delay. Unless the governement is prepared to indicate of its own initiative that it is willing to give consideration to some alternative to the terms of clause 10, then all I can do is to say that when this question comes to a vote I intend to indicate my disagreement by voting in such a way as to indicate that I wish it was not there.

[Mr. Barnett.]

I said previously that I do not pretend to have all the answers to the question. Because of the increasingly complex society in which we are living, the plain fact that more and more groups or elements in the fabric of our society are deciding to withdraw their services means that the impact upon us is all the greater. I say that we in this parliament should come to grips with the problem and arrive at an answer consistent with the ocncept of free men being able to live in a free society.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief comments on compulsory arbitration. I am a member of a local of the International Association of Fire Fighters which has voluntarily given up the right to strike and acquiesced in compulsory arbitration. In their case this has worked well, but they are a different kettle of fish from railroaders.

One of the things I find most abhorrent about the speeches made by many hon. members on this bill is that they are completely closing their eyes to what they are saying and doing. We have seen the Prime Minister and others stand up and proclaim they are determined to maintain the rights of the railroaders, rights similar to those of other workers. From this I would assume that the railroaders have the right to withdraw their services, in other words, the right to strike. But though these hon. members say to the railroaders that they have the right to strike, at the same time they say to them that they do not have the right to stay on strike.

How ridiculous can we get? We say that we will maintain their right to strike but if the strike becomes effective and pressure is brought to bear we will take away that right. If we are going to take away that right, then what is the point of giving it to them in the first place? What kind of sham are we carrying on? If this is what the law of the land is going to be, then it is high time the railroaders realized it and found something else to take the place of these rights so freely given and so quickly taken away.

Clause 10 as amended agreed to: Yeas, 119; nays, 13.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, it will be recalled that clause 6 was stood this morning and was to be reconsidered after clause 10 had been dealt with.

On clause 6—Terms of collective agreements amended.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment to clause 6:

After the words "January 1, 1966" in line 29, delete the word "and", and after the words "July 1, 1966" in line 30 add:

", an additional 4 per cent effective January 1, 1967, and an additional 6 per cent effective July 1, 1967".

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 11—Tabling regulations in Commons.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations to make but I shall borrow no more than ten minutes of the committee's time to deal with clause 11 and an amendment which I propose to move that I believe will cope effectively with the root issue of the whole problem before us. During discussion of clause 10 we heard something about collective bargaining procedures and compulsory arbitration and my amendment will, in another sense, deal with these problems.

Without in any way detracting from the tremendously valuable service which collective bargaining has performed in the past and recognizing that it is desirable to continue to pursue it as far as possible, nonetheless I do not accept the proposition that this method is inviolable in any and all conditions. Our complex and fast-moving modern industrial society, composed of groups of people becoming more and more identifiable and interrelated, must have available some additional means, when necessary, of dealing with settlements in wage disputes.

For reasons which I shall give later I am convinced while we can give great priority to the continued use of collective bargaining procedures, yet there will be from time to time sets of circumstances which demand new and different approaches to be taken, either alone or in conjunction with the collective bargaining procedures. I think that has been pretty well recognized during the course of the debate.

Right now we are in a transitional phase. The process of collective bargaining has attained great aims for labour and has been a useful adjunct for society. If not replaced it must be used along with other methods, and the same is true of compulsory arbitration. We as a society have learned to accept, sometimes cheerfully but mostly grudgingly, a variety of compulsory powers. Look at the statute books and the ordinances we have in the federal and provincial governments.

On a co-operative basis, having the objective of securing the greatest good for the greatest number, we have reluctantly imposed upon ourselves a great many forms of compulsion, some of a negative kind and some which compel us to do certain things. There are many more we shall have to consider in the future, and so I must come to the proposition that the exigencies of our society may be such as to require people to accept imposed decisions. When it is clear and evident that the overriding requirement of society calls for it, this will have to be accepted by labour unions as well as by others. True enough, Mr. Chairman, a tremendously heavy burden falls on those who assert this proposition. It is a very heavy burden, and I suggest it is not a burden which can be discharged as the government is attempting to discharge it in this committee.

Having reached this conclusion, I must therefore say I have not opposed this bill because it does contain provisions for imposing decisions and for overriding the collective bargaining process, if this should become essential. But there is another reason. I am not going to take the time to deal with it in detail. However, there is a very interesting article by the famous historian Arthur Toynbee which appeared a short time ago and which sets forth that certain segments of society, particularly industry, capital, land owners and powerful labour unions, now have the power, the strength and the opportunity to assert such pressures that from time to time the share of the national wealth which they take is larger than that which on an equitable basis should be theirs in relation to those who have not this power to exert pressure.

There are millions of people in this country, pensioners, older people, salaried people, who are not organized, as well as small farmers who are dependent upon export markets, who have not the pressure, force or organization to exert any undue influence on their own behalf. Consequently the forces of particularly powerful groups in certain segments of society are able to pry out of the national wealth more than their fair share. I have no hesitation in saying this applies equally to certain segments of industry as it does to some labour unions.

Legislation Respecting Railway Matters

When the government accepts, as it must accept, its responsibility and in an extraordinary set of circumstances brings us here, as it has now, and asks parliament to pass legislation of this kind, leaving the final decision to third parties outside of parliament, I suggest with great deference it is not discharging its full duty. It is incumbent upon the government, and I suggest it probably is incumbent upon parliament, to see the matter through to its ultimate conclusion.

I suggest that the whole debate has indicated the correctness of what I say. Most of the speeches and many of the amendments have been directed toward placing within the four corners of this legislation various measures which hon. members honestly and legitimately feel should be part of the final agreement, the final arrangement under which, after the workers have gone back and the strike is over, a solution finally will be reached. I suggest, therefore, that clause 11 as it now stands falls short of a discharge on the part of the government of the responsibility which it should have.

In clause 11 the bill provides that a regulation appointing a board of arbitrators shall be laid before the House of Commons not later than five days after the day the regulation is made. It then is a subject for debate and the house, of course, has the privilege of setting it aside. This accepts in part my view. I suggest in the first instance that this process should be reversed. I suggest that the regulation should be laid before the house and not become law until accepted by the house. I suggest further that any decision of the board of arbitrators, when and if it is essential—I hope it may not be—should also be laid before the House of Commons and should not become effective until it is passed by the house.

My very strong submission, Mr. Chairman, is that the unique, extraordinary combination of facts and circumstances which has brought us here and has led to the introduction of this measure will continue until the final settlement is made and that this house, and particularly the government, must accept this responsibility and must ensure, for the protection in the first instance of the workers, that the final results which are achieved are fair, equitable and reasonable and, second, must ensure that the result which finally is reached by the arbitrators is one which in its relation to society as a whole is also a proper and fair one. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that had this course been followed last summer when we were dealing with the dockworkers' strike and the seaway strike we would not be where we are today and that there would have been achieved at that time a settlement consistent with equity and fairness to the strikers involved, to the employers involved and to the people of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Having said that, I therefore move that clause 11 be amended as follows:

1. By deleting all of the words after the word "effective" where it appears in line 22 and substituting therefor the following:

"when the regulation has been approved by the House of Commons".

2. By deleting the present subsection 2 and substituting in its place the following:

"Notwithstanding any provision of this act a decision of the board of arbitrators made under section 10 shall be laid before the House of Commons no later than five days after the day the regulation is made or, if the house is not then sitting, within the next five days thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting and the decision becomes effective when it has been approved by the House of Commons."

In conclusion I should like to say that I heard the exchange between the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam the other night. I agree that it is fantastic, it is preposterous for the government, the House of Commons or parliament to impose a negotiated settlement to take the place of conciliation boards or mediators under most situations. In an ordinary set of circumstances it would be quite improper for us even to consider it, but these are not ordinary circumstances.

Every speech which I heard indicated the views of members of this house who honestly and seriously are concerned. They had suggestions which they felt should be adopted and ultimately become part of the process of mediation, or ultimately part of arbitration, because these are extraordinay circumstances. I do not know to what extent my views may have approval but my views are strong. In moving my amendment I offer it genuinely in the sense in which I put it before the committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of our party I wish to say I fully appreciate the spirit in which the hon. member for Peace River has moved his amendment. I think if hon. members will look at it carefully they will find it as impossible to accept as I do. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni expressed the view that the compulsory arbitration part of the bill was objectionable and he stated views which I share. If there is going to be arbitration surely no useful purpose can be served by having the adjudication of an arbitrator readjudicated by parliament. That is the first serious objection I have in that regard. If a dispute goes to a board of arbitration the decision of that board should be final. No purpose can be served by bringing that adjudication back to this house for readjudication.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Second, I suggest there are elements of delay inherent in this bill which are undesirable and which make the whole process less workable than it would otherwise be.

I could find many more things which are objectionable but it seems to me, even though I fully appreciate the democratic objective of the hon. member for Peace River, that if we are going to have arbitration we should not extend the whole process by bringing the matter back to parliament for reconsideration, particularly after lengthy discussions would have taken place. Clause 10 sets out the powers and terms of reference for the arbitrators and surely that is enough without the whole matter being brought back to parliament. That would be unnecessary and illogical.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak again, but having heard the persuasive words of the hon. member for York South I should like to say only that I accept his arguments.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate and at this time I should like to make reference to the amendment now before us. It appears to me that we would be setting a very unfortunate precedent if in this instance we were to require that an award of an arbitration board should be returned to parliament for consideration. During the past months there has been a great deal of debate and discussion which has consumed a considerable amount of time. It seems to me that by accepting this amendment we would be adding another item of business to our already full agenda. Once an arbitration board has made an award I believe that award should be final. For this reason and the many other arguments presented against this amendment, I suggest that it should not be adopted.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Baldwin) negatived: Yeas, 38; nays, 99.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Schedules A, B and C agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On the preamble—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, when I proposed the amendment to clause 6, I drew the attention of the committee to the fact that it would be necessary to amend the preamble. I should now like to move that the preamble be amended in the following terms:

In lines 15 and 16 delete the words:

"terms and conditions of employment for the year 1966, for"

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment to the preamble as moved by the minister carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, if it meets with the approval of the house I suggest that we suspend the sitting until eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the desire of the house that we suspend the sitting until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on September 14, 1964 I rose in the last parliament on the resolution stage preceding a bill which might now be called, I suppose, the precursor of the bill on which I am now speaking. I persuaded the committee to say that the introduction of the bill was expedient, and that is really, sir, where the expediency ended. In order to get any further consideration of the bill in that session I had to persuade my not altogether unwilling colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), to strangle the child in the cradle and to send the remains to a parliamentary committee where it was dissected for several weeks by all sorts of interested parties.

I have done a little better this time, sir. I got this bill through the committee stage without making a speech, and if any member of the house feels he was deprived in any way because I was not able to do that, notwithstanding the layman's guide to the bill which was circulated the other day, I would commend to him—and it is not always that I look at my previous utterances with the same approval as I do this one—the speech I made on September 14, 1964, because I think that nearly every opinion I expressed in it is thoroughly justified.

There is only one about which I feel a little shamefaced. I said at the beginning that it has been suggested to me that I was introducing a revolutionary measure. Well, sir, that was certainly one revolution that failed, and after the experiences in this house this week, at this hour, at which it is hard even for an enthusiast like me not to regard this bill as rather an anticlimax, it is a little hard, in the shopworn state in which I find myself tonight, to feel much like a revolutionary.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Perhaps if we can achieve something between the speed of revolutions and the speed of glaciers we might hope to make some progress with this measure.

In retrospect I do not think it would have been possible in 1964, even if there had been parliamentary time and even if that bill had seemed to that parliament as important as I like to think it was, to have passed this bill through parliament even if we had had the necessary priorities. Moreover, I think it is a good thing it was not passed. I have read all the editorials that anybody has clipped for me in all the great metropolitan newspapers, and in some of the others, about how this terrible crisis came upon us because we in this parliament were collectively so negligent since 1961 that we have done nothing about this railway problem.

• (8:10 p.m.)

I have the impression that something the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said in connection with another measure might be appropriate. I am not going to quote him, because that would be against the rules, and I have forgotten his exact words, which is even more inhibiting. However, I believe I remember the sense very well, and it was this, that there were some things that could be done in a crisis that could not be done in ordinary times.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am being misquoted.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister, as usual is going to have to backtrack. The Prime Minister is not being misquoted, he is not being quoted at all. However, that is not his fault; it is just that I, like the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) earlier today, did not have Hansard handy, and I am relying on an equally imperfect recollection. The sense of what the Prime Minister said is good sense.

I like to think there is a sense of urgency about this legislation that has not existed at any time since the MacPherson report was received, and since there has been an opportunity, theoretically, for this parliament to deal with this problem. I had the inestimable advantage this morning, and it is an advantage that is rather spasmodic in the summertime, of the paper boy getting to my house. I had also the inestimable advantage of reading the editorial in the Globe and Mail. It is a wonderful thing for politicians that they have this public conscience every morning to remind them of their deficiencies. The editorial is entitled, "Can politics be kept out of transportation?"

Well, sir, there is only one place in Canada where anybody could be so far divorced from the realities of Canadian life that he could possibly write an editorial with that title, and that is in the city of Toronto, and perhaps even there only in the editorial offices of the Globe and Mail. Anybody who knows anything about the history of this country knows that there would have been no Canadian polity without transportation, and without a polity there would have been no politics. I said this once before in the house but I think it is worth repeating: Transportation has the capacity to arouse emotions and prejudices and to obscure the vision of most people even more completely than questions of race, religion or language.

It is right that it should be so. It is essential that it should be so, because without adequate transportation, there never would have been the kind of Canada we have; without the maintenance of effective transportation we never could have a united, efficient or agreeable country. I hope the day never comes when some editor in some ivory tower in Toronto is able to take politics out of transportation.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understand very well the politics of my hon. friend but I think he should do justice to that great city which I, as one member, represent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest to the house and to others like the hon. gentleman and myself, who have found it necessary for economic, social or other reasons to be transplanted from Winnipeg, that there are better places to go than Toronto.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. Knowles: May I raise a point of order? Is it not a well known rule of this house that no matter should be brought before parliament by the government unless there is cabinet solidarity? Should we not adjourn until there could be a cabinet meeting on this?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have said nothing up to now—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I gave the hon. gentleman the opening that he wanted—but I have said nothing up to now on which it would be possible to achieve solidarity in the cabinet or out of it. I am trying, sir, to illustrate something that I feel is really quite essential if we are to consider this bill in the proper spirit. I hope that politics can never be kept out of transportation in Canada, because if anyone takes the trouble to read this editorial—in view of the points of order that I have raised in recent days in the house, I would not dare read it myself—he will see that keeping politics out of transportation means, according to the writer, that some wise person in Toronto would tell the rest of Canada what was good for it instead of allowing the politicians representing every part of the country to work out in a free parliament a transportation policy that is related to the wishes and needs of the people. This is what I understand by politics in transportation and I make no apology for it. On the day we cease to have politics in transportation, we will cease to have a free country.

Having said that, sir, I have to admit for the benefit of my colleagues on my right the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), that there is a little germ of truth in what came out of Toronto this morning. There are two kinds of politics that we could have in transportation. One is the kind of politics which up to now I have been referring to; the kind of politics which means that in our collective wisdom, plus a certain amount of distributive foolishness, we do try in this house, despite partisan considerations, to get some kind of consensus of what will be suitable to bind this country together from Bonavista to Vancouver Island.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Grafftey: Would you mind singing it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would have to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) whether he knew the words to sing it. But I do not think my speech needs that kind of illustration.

There is another kind of politics which undoubtedly the editorial writer had in the back of his mind, and that is the kind of politics which, no matter which place we represent—even a place so self-sufficient as Toronto that it needs no transport—tempts all of us to see the selfish interests of individuals, groups or sometimes even of regions above the broader interests of the whole community.

That kind of partisanship and that kind of politics I quite agree we must try to keep out of our consideration of this measure if collectively we are to achieve something really useful for the country. I do hope that in the light of the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, while all of us will keep fully in mind the necessity for seeing that the point of view of every part of this country is adequately represented and fairly treated in a transportation policy, we will not push these regional and local interests to the point where it is difficult to reach a consensus of view that does meet the real national interest.

I know that there are in the house broadly two ideological views about transportation, and particularly about railways. Though this measure that I am introducing tonight is not by any means exclusively concerned with railways, it is mainly concerned with railways apart from the first part of the bill.

If I may once again allude to something which was said in an earlier debate today, I think by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), it was very clearly stated that there were those who felt that a public monopoly of the railways would be preferable, more efficient and would remove a lot of problems which exist because of the fact that we have two main railways, and a certain number of other local railways in the country at the present time.

That view is one which I think is quite tenable. There are a lot of arguments which could be made in its favour. But there are also a great many arguments on the other side. As I indicated two years ago—my views on this have not changed, and here there is cabinet solidarity because the views of the government have not changed—our view is that we do not think that on balance it would be an advantage at the present time to have only one railway in this country. We think that at the present time it is, on balance, better to make do with the basic situation which we have. We think that the rather limited amount of competition which exists at the present time—I would be the first to admit it is very limited, and I think too limited—between the railways themselves as well as between the railways and other forms of transportation serves the country better than would the other system.

However, Mr. Speaker, this is not the subject matter of the debate. Is is true that hon. members who wish to do so can assail this legislation and say that we should just scrap the whole system and have a different one. What we are seeking to do here—and perhaps this is why I was a little extravagant in the language I used two years ago when I said that what I proposed was revolutionary—is not to scrap the basic corporate structure of the railways, or of any other form of transport at the present time, but to create a framework within which they can operate in a way which, in our view, will not only better serve the public—which is the main consideration—but which will also better insure the Canadian treasury and the Canadian taxpayers against unnecessary and undue charges, and in some cases duplicated charges for duplicated services, which do nothing except add to the costs which all of us both as a community and as individuals have to bear.

I think it is important to remind hon. members, although they know it very well, that for nearly 80 years after confederation the railways were so much the most important mode of transportation in the country that they had in most areas a virtual monopoly in the carriage of goods, and pretty close to a monopoly in the carriage of people over any distance. That monopoly was mitigated in most areas of the country only by water transport, which of course is a much more ancient mode of transportation in Canada and was the original mode by which the country was opened up.

However, during this long period there existed the feeling which I think nearly always exists in any country where large and powerful bodies exercise an almost exclusive jurisdiction of any kind over things that enter into the lives and the livelihoods of nearly everybody, namely that this powerful force in the country had to be controlled by the public.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this measure of control was established by the Laurier government in 1903, when the Board of Railway Commissioners was first established. From 1903 up to the present day, though there have been occasional changes in the ground rules, fundamentally we have continued to take the view that public regulation of the actions and charges of the railways is essential in the public interest.

This monopoly was mitigated in some respects, as I say, where there were obvious alternative sources of transport, such as the lakes area. It was more and more mitigated as modern highways were developed. The railway strike of 1950 transferred a lot of goods to other forms of transportation, particularly road transportation; and gradually in many parts of the country, with the development of air traffic, in respect to many forms of commodity, and above all in the transport of human beings, that monopoly has been eroded and in large part has disappeared.

It is not often that I pay tribute to the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and I am sorry he is not here this evening, but he did one very good thing when he appointed the MacPherson commission. That commission made what I regard as a first rate report. It has stood up well, even after four or five years of exposure to the public gaze. It is true that circumstances have changed that some of these specific recommendations to deal with specific problems are no longer wholly appropriate, because some of the problems have changed their aspect. But the basic approach of the report was a new one. It was that there has been a development of alternative and competitive modes of transport in most parts of the country for most classes of travel, and that the kind of regulation of railway charges and practices by a regulatory body which may have been needed in the past was no longer essential for the protection of the public.

Habits die hard. It has been very hard to get through our heads the idea that this has become true, and if we do not make a real effort of imagination it will be hard to appreciate the fact that many regulations which in the past were necessary in the public interest have simply become shackles in the present.

This is one of the exercises we have to perform if we are to make any basic improvement in the situation of the Canadian railways, and in their capacity to serve the Canadian public without placing undue burdens on the treasury. It is also necessary to make sure that we do not burden the public with services which have ceased to be essential because other modes of transport have taken their place. I have said before in the house that in no country in the world with which effective comparisons can be made is there a greater cost imposed on the community per capita in respect of transport services than is the case in Canada. This is true in respect of any country about which I know anything. It may not be true of Russia, though I doubt whether the density of the population there in relation to its transport facilities is any less than it is in our own country.

To put it in another way, the cost of transport enters more largely into the cost of living and the cost of doing business of virtually every Canadian, on the average, than it does into the costs borne by citizens in any comparable country. It also happens that there is no other large country which depends to the extent this country does upon external income for the livelihood of its people. There is no country the per capita income of whose people is derived to such a large extent from outside the country as is the case in Canada.

In order to maintain this income it is essential that we should be competitive in the world we live in. Our transport services must be as efficient and as economical as possible. I cannot stress either of these things too much. After a great deal of deliberation and a great deal of discussion with people far more expert than I can ever hope to be, I came to the conclusion some six or eight months ago that in one respect we should make a more fundamental approach to this whole problem of national transportation than was envisaged two years ago when the bill was introduced at that time.

Because of my experience with other modes and forms of transport, for which I have a responsibility in so far as there is a public responsibility, I have reached the conclusion that one of the most important things of all is to have one unified organ of government divorced from any of these different modes of transport which would look at all of them, compare one with another and, when considering the regulation of one, would take account of what was happening in the other fields and determine whether we were getting the best value by spending public money on railways, for example, or whether it would be better to scrap a branch of a railway and concentrate on a highway or an air line.

We ought to be doing a lot more of this in Canada than we are today, if we are not to be burdened with expensive services which will not support themselves and for which the users cannot pay—services which therefore become an increasing burden on the treasury.

I do not think anything illustrates this more clearly than what has happened in the seven years since 1959. In those seven years, on three occasions, however this may have been disguised, the greater part of the increased wage bill of the Canadian railways has been passed on to the taxpayers of Canada—$20 million in 1959, $50 million in 1961 and another $30 million in 1966. So we are now paying out of the treasury $100 million a year. It seems to me, and it seems to some of my colleagues, that this process cannot go on without grave danger to the Canadian economy and to the well-being of all Canadians.

I think we are better able to appreciate this danger which has been brought home to us this week, so that we may be better able to overcome local prejudices and local tastes for the old and for the familiar, even when they have ceased to perform a function commensurate with its cost. Of course, it is easy for me to recommend that redundant services in Ontario or British Columbia, the prairies, Quebec or possibly, even the maritime provinces, should be curtailed.

An hon. Member: But what about Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, as the hon. member points out, when it comes to Newfoundland it becomes much harder. That is going to be the experience of every member of the house, except one or two of those really highly minded members—and I will not embarrass them by identifying them—who really can keep politics out of transportation. But, sir, if we are going to do a job in this bill, if we really are going to have a national transportation policy, if we really are going to deal with this critical problem—and heaven knows this week we have had it emphasized how critical it is—we have got to balance those local desires and feelings against the burden that is also put on everybody in those localities by the maintenance of what were services, but which are now in many cases either luxuries or burdens.

• (8:40 p.m.)

This is not going to be easy for any of us, and I do not fool myself. I have no illusions that it is going to be easy to get this bill through the house, although I have the impression that because we in the house were elected to represent all Canadians, as well as our own constituencies, and because we rub shoulders here in the house a good deal of the time, we do tend to have somewhat wider horizons than many of our fellow citizens who will be making representations about this legislation before it is passed.

We intend, or at least I am presuming, sir—I withdraw that—I hope, sir, the house will see fit to give this bill second reading and send it to the committee on transport and communications, and I hope that committee will see fit to hear the representations of every important interest in this country which wishes to make representations about this matter which is so vital to us all.

Now, sir, I could go on to give a description of the bill. I do not really think that there is much in a speech on second reading that I need to add to the description that I provided the other day. But I think if I just indicated the various parts of the bill, and said one or two words about certain aspects of each part of it that I think will be the highlights, it might help other hon. members in their consideration of the bill.

The first part of the bill is prefaced by a declaration of policy. I shall not read it because it is against the rules to read the details of a bill, but I do commend clause 1—

Mr. Cantelon: Would the minister be prepared to answer a question before he goes into his detailed statement?

Mr. Pickersgill: I really doubt if under our rules questions are allowed on second reading of a bill, but if at the end of what I have to say—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There is nothing in the rules to stop a question now if you will permit it.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, there is nothing; but the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon), who is one of the most courteous members of the house and who, I am sure, does not wish to interrupt my train of thought—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He would not be interrupting much.

Mr. Pickersgill:—which, I may say, is moving rather slowly anyway—

Mr. Cantelon: So long as I can ask the question later.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member would not wish to stop the train altogether, because it might not get started again. I know in the case of some hon. members they might like that, but I would really like to get to my destination, if Black Rod does not get here first.

I do commend to all hon. members clause 1, and the declaration of the principles contained in it, because the government has sought in this declaration to set out clearly and succinctly, and in hard language, the objectives we have in mind.

Having commended that part to hon. members I should now like to say a few words about the proposed Canadian Transport Commission which is dealt with in Part I of the bill.

I know there are some people in the house as well as some outside the house who fear that this—I forget who first coined the original phrase—could be a bureaucratic monster. I hope it will not. That certainly is not the intention. The intention is precisely the opposite. The intention and desire of the government is to amalgamate the three existing organisms and to provide certain other services in an effort, if I dare use the word and if it is not going to do my cause any harm, at integration.

I recognize at once that we have not reached the stage of common uniforms, and therefore it is provided in the bill that there will be a series of committees dealing with specific aspects of transportation and performing most of the functions now performed by the existing agencies. There will be other committees to perform functions in relation to interprovincial and international highway traffic at such time as the government may decide that in the public interest the present arrangements for dealing with them can no longer be continued.

There are some difficulties there, and I hasten to repeat what I said the other day that there is no present and immediate intention of taking on this task without full consultation with the provincial governments, and the fullest co-ordination. It is a very difficult field. It is quite unlike the railways because the highways are owned by the crown in the right of the provinces and the degree and nature of the jurisdiction and regulations that it is possible for parliament effectively to exercise—whatever the theoretical position may be—is very limited.

There is another field in which there may not be very much to do for some time, and that is in the transportation of solids by pipe line. This is something we know is coming and it did seem desirable, when we were attempting to foresee as much as we could the various modes of transportation, to do something so that we would have the machinery to deal with this problem when it does become of some importance.

It will also be competent for the commission to establish other committees, either on a permanent or ad hoc basis, to deal with particular problems. But I think the main reason why I came to the conclusion, and the main reason I was able to convince my colleagues that this was good to recommend to the house, was not that the regulatory functions would necessarily be better done by a body with separate committees, but that it was really filling a vacuum that badly needed to be filled, that it was just as important to have continuous research, investigation and study, and to have it done by competent people all the time, and not just spasmodically, as it was to have good regulations and able boards to administer those regulations.

When hon. members stop to think how vital transport is to the country and how large a part it plays in our whole economy, it is little short of disgraceful to realize that when a minister wishes to employ an expert in almost any field of transport he has to go outside the country either to the United States or to the United Kingdom. It is not because we do not have good Canadians with expertise, but it is because they all are employed with interests of one kind or another which in some respects are different from the public interest. This means that when you get these experts, if it takes them six months to do the job, they take four months educating themselves at the expense of the Canadian public, one month carrying on their investigation and another month writing their reports.

There is an awful lot to be said for applying that education continuously, and for educating Canadians. I do not mean that we are going to have a whole host of experts in the commission, but I do believe that if we keep this matter under continuous review we may in some of our universities—and I may say that some initiative seems to have been taken in this field in my own university in Manitoba—find that we will get some people in Canada who can be employed, and in respect of whom we will have the assurance that they are not in any way tied to any existing interests. Because they will be people who know the environment in which they live, they will not have to spend half of the time in which they are employed finding out what is the problem.

I believe that this plan will work. I do not say that it will end forever the neeed for any more royal commissions on transportation, but it will vastly reduce the need for them. Most of these studies will be done much more efficiently and much more quickly by people who are really familiar with the background of the matter which they are studying.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the studies be public?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would think that would depend very greatly upon the circumstances. At the present time, pursuant to the recommendations of the MacPherson report we are carrying out at their suggestion a comprehensive study of the facilities of the Department of Transport in the Atlantic provinces. This study is being done by the Economist Intelligence Unit of London England with some co-operation from the Acres firm in Niagara Falls. This is the kind of study which, if this commission was in existence, would have been undertaken by them. This does not mean that they would not do what royal commissions do; that is, farm out a lot of their work in the form of special studies. However, the people who daily are dealing with these problems would in most cases, I think, be able to do it much more efficiently and in a much shorter time.

There are other things; there are certain kinds of studies which the Minister of Transport or the government as a whole may wish to have done in order to be of assistance to them in making up their minds as to the kind of policies which are to be recommended. In cases of this nature I should think it would be very unwise to have these working studies made public, because if ministers are to be of any use and not just ciphers, they must be allowed to exercise their own judgment.

Apart altogether from any other aspects of the matter, if you have an expert study made and exercise your judgment upon it, and then the expert study is published, it puts both the minister and the expert in really quite an awkward position. I think it is quite contrary to our system of responsible government to do that. I know there are many distinguished authorities on transportation in Canada, like Mr. Douglas Fisher who was a former member of this house, who do not subscribe to this view and who think that everything should be done in the full glare of publicity. Maybe; it is a view. I think, however, that most people who have had experience in government, and not just experience in criticizing governments, would realize that this is not necessarily so. Well, it may have some advantages; and sometimes I think you need to shed a little light in some of these dark places, even in the Department of Transport. There are many occasions when you can have freedom of discussion, freedom to express opinions, and change opinions only if you do not have to expose your vanity.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton.]

In answer to the intervention of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) I should say that I think it would depend upon the nature of the studies and depend upon whether or not the government was seeking comment from the public and public understanding and whether or not the government was seeking to inform itself in order to exercise its functions in an adequate and effective manner. I sincerely believe and strongly hope that this function may be just as important and just as useful as the regulatory functions which also will be performed by the commission.

I do not think I should go on to say anything about the structure of the commission; it is in the bill and we will have plenty of time to examine it in great detail in the committee. Before I go on to the next part, in case I should be interrupted, perhaps I should say something which I had intended to say before I started discussing the bill; that is, the broad principles of this bill are endorsed by the government and are government policy, and on these policies we are staking our lives. The terms of this bill I think are certainly a lot better than in the bill of a few years ago and I think we owe a lot to the members of the previous parliament and to a lot of groups and persons who have made representations to the parliamentary committee and to the department.

I do not think the bill is perfect. As a matter of fact I found a typographical error only today. I do not think it is only typographical errors that will be found in it. I think it will be found in the committee that there are a lot of improvements which can be made in the detail, and I think it is just as well for me to enter this caveat now. I will not consider that I am retreating, even if the hon. member for Carleton is able to produce a better idea than I have, and I accept his rather than mine. I will simply consider I am wise enough to use his estimable brain. I may say that I only use the hon. gentleman as an example.

I do not think I need take very much time on part II of the bill. It makes provision for the jurisdiction over commodity pipe lines. Part III makes provision for the ultimate jurisdiction over extraprovincial motor vehicle transport.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister is placing the emphasis on the word "ultimate", is that right?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the emphasis is placed on the word "ultimate".

Part IV is a very exciting and important part of the bill which deals with bridges. This is really a buck-passing section because it transfers the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport or the Board of Transport Commissioners over to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Wait until George hears about that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps this will show that the present Minister of Transport is not an empire builder.

Part V of the bill is the part which deals with railways, and it is, of course, the most important part. If anything, it is even more important than the establishment of the Canadian Transport commission.

Part V of the bill carries out, but in a rather different way from what was envisaged in the previous bill, the principle enunciated by the MacPherson commission, namely that those services which parliament requires the railways to perform in the national or social interest, but which are not remunerative, should have their losses largely paid for out of treasury. In other words, we should not put the whole burden on the railways for keeping on these services. I refer to the uneconomic services, to use a loose term, which give the railways a reason for saying they are unable to pay adequate wages and so on. The treasury should bear the losses or a large part of them in respect of these services. There are various types of services of this kind.

In the previous bill there was a simple provision which provided that in respect of passenger services, they could be abandoned by the railways on proof of loss, whether the service was deemed to be socially essential or not. I do not think anyone would be surprised, after the experience we had earlier in the present session, that a minister even as intrepid as the present Minister of Transport, would hesitate to bring in legislation allowing a passenger service to be abandoned merely because it was losing money.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We could think of other adjectives.

Mr. Woolliams: I have used some of them already.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is recognized in this part is that in the case of passenger services, which can be shown to the satisfaction of the Board of Transport Commissioners to be losing money, and which are considered essential, 80 per cent of the loss should be borne by the treasury. The reason for establishing this figure at 80 per cent rather than at 100 per cent is the hope that there will be some incentive on the part of the railway companies to operate more efficiently on these lines and thereby reduce their portion of the burden.

The provisions for rationalization and the consequent abandonment of branch lines are basically similar to those contained in the previous bill. This legislation provides that if a line can be shown to be unprofitable, but the commission decides it is essential in the public interest, the total loss will be borne by the treasury.

In this legislation we are introducing a whole new concept and approach to the question of rationalization and abandonment of railway lines. I hope, at the committee stage, to be able to give hon. members an illustration of the way in which we intend to approach this matter under the new legislation. This whole concept is now in the course of preparation. It has been represented to the government by many interests on the prairies, and this applies exclusively to the grain growing areas where almost the entire problem exists, that instead of starting out by deciding which of these lines should be abandoned the government should prescribe the lines that will, regardless of circumstances, be kept in operation for a period of years. This will mean that everyone along those lines will know that there is no danger of any of these branch lines being done away with until a certain prescribed date. In this way investors, elevator companies and merchants of all kinds will know that these branch lines will continue for a certain period of time, and they will be able to plan their investments with a degree of certainty that has never been possible or envisaged in previous legislation.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may be allowed to ask the minister a question? Who will make the decision as to which lines will come within this prescribed period of time?

Mr. Pickersgill: The decision will be made by the governor in council.

Mr. Douglas: That decision will be made, of course, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, is that right?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. This whole process will be carried out only after intensive consultation and examination of the lines. That does not mean lines that are not guaranteed essential will necessarily be abandoned, but they will be the only ones that will be candidates for abandonment for a specified period of time. That period of time will be long enough to enable reasonable investments to be amortized.

We know that vast technological changes are taking place in the marketing of grain. Greater changes should be taking place than are taking place at the present time. One of the reasons these changes are not occurring as quickly as they should is that there is uncertainty as to which railway lines will survive. The provisions of this part should give not only a greater stability but also a greater incentive to improved handling facilities.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will frown when I say this. Although there may be poor years, it looks to me as though we can expect better crops and a higher plateau of production than most of us, like the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and I, who are getting a little long in the tooth, used to regard as normal. We have not got facilities in Canada to handle in an efficient manner the amount of grain that is and will be produced. These facilities have to be expanded and modernized. This is one of the most important tasks facing the Canadian people today. A tremendous amount of our income comes from our grain production and I suspect that we will obtain a great deal more from grain in the future than we have until very recent years.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would elaborate on this point while he is explaining the bill. Why has the minister decided that he and his department will make the determination about the lines that are sacrosanct and those which are to be submitted to the commission for determination? In view of the lack of research facilities, would this not seem to be the sort of role that the transport commission itself ought to pursue?

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member came into the chamber the minister said that he did not want his train of thought to be broken, and therefore we are refraining from asking questions until the minister has finished.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that in fairness to other hon. members I should reserve answering that question until the end of my remarks. If I forget to answer the question at that time, perhaps the hon. gentleman would remind me.

One of the most important things for us to do is to make the maximum use for the time being of the facilities which we have for carrying grain. This means that if lines on which there is very light traffic can quickly, without much incommoding of anyone, be abandoned, that much more equipment of the railways will be available to be used that much more efficiently, and therefore they will be able to carry that much more grain. I think it is just as important to carry grain economically, efficiently and expeditously as it is to grow it efficiently and economically, if we are to obtain the maximum return for it.

There is no doubt that because there has not been sufficient modernization the handling of grain is not as efficient as it could be and as it should be, if we are to obtain the maximum returns, as we must. The problem is urgent. While it would no doubt be very desirable, if it could be done, to wait two or three more years and have a lot more research done before a beginning is made in this process, it does seem to me that if a reasonable consensus is arrived at—and that is what it is hoped will be done—it will be better in the public interest to have it known that a basic structure is there for a sufficiently long time to come to enable a measure of stability and progress to be safely embarked upon. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this problem is very urgent and we have to get on with it, and fast.

With regard to the lines to be abandoned, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) had some discussion with me in the house two years ago on this subject. The criterion that was followed in the past was that the biggest losers were the ones that the railways most wanted to abandon. I suppose that will still be true. But the line that loses the most is not always the one with the lightest traffic. It sometimes is; it usually is; but that is not always the case, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle know. A great deal depends upon the terrain. In deciding as to whether the lines are economical to operate, the criterion with regard to abandonment will be that the necessary steps will be taken to see that the applications are made first for those lines which have the least density of traffic. The criterion that will be used will be as objective as possible in the light of information available to us.

Payments will be made from treasury, in respect of passenger traffic and branch lines which are not paying but which, in the public interest, it is decided to retain. However, Mr. Speaker, there is another very important area, one of the most important of all, especially in western Canada, and this concerns the rates in respect of export grain, usually known as the Crowsnest pass rates. The MacPherson commission found, with one commissioner dissenting, that these rates were not remunerative and recommended that a fixed amount, plus certain variable costs to be calculated, should be paid out of treasury in respect of this traffic.

There was a great deal of dissent in western Canada about this particular recommendation of the MacPherson commission. The government came to the conclusion that it would not be wise to put a figure in this bill, because any figure that was calculated in the earlier 1960's is obviously out of date, anyway. But since there was a good deal of dispute about whether there was a loss, there is provision in the bill that a costing study should be made over the next three years by the new commission. This will be a proper costing study. When that study has been made, the government can determine what, if any—and there are those who will say there should not be anything—payments should be made in respect of this traffic.

The more efficiently we handle the grain traffic, the less redundant services we have, the more likely these rates are to be really remunerative. Therefore every improvement that can be made in the next three years in the handling of grain will reduce the necessity for this kind of subsidy. We believe that in this way there will be a common interest for the farmers, the grain trade and the railways to work for efficiency. How is it possible for the railways to forgo a payment at the present time? I gave hon. members the figure a while ago of what is being paid to the railways in 1966.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the government wants to ruin the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not hear the hon. gentleman's verb.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): "Ruin"—do away with; abolish the Crowsnest pass rates. This is what the government is attempting to do, by not appointing an independent commission to study the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Crowsnest pass rates are going to be continued as long as the present Minister of Transport remains Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: As has been stated by the Prime Minister every time he has sought the support of the people of Canada, this is a basic policy of the Liberal party. It remains so, and we intend to continue it. Let there be no mistake whatever about that.

Mr. Woolliams: With the fatality of the present Liberal ministers, that is a pretty dangerous policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: The basic principle of this bill is that with regard to any services that parliament requires the railways to perform that are not remunerative, the treasury, the taxpayers of Canada, should contribute the greater part of the loss, and not other shippers in other parts of the country. This seems to me to be only fair, right and reasonable. But we take the view that we do not have enough knowledge at the present time to make an estimate of what, if any, loss there may be in respect of these grain rates; therefore there is no figure put in the bill. It is not necessary to put a figure in the bill because there is an entirely new device in the bill of a transitional character. The subsidies being paid at the present time in respect of wages, namely $100 million, are so huge that they could not possibly be taken away from the railways next year when this legislation comes into effect.

• (9:20 p.m.)

That would just be disastrous to the railways. However, what we propose to do is to reduce those subsidies by 12.5 per cent starting in 1968 thereby phasing them out over eight years. In the meantime, although the passenger subsidy and the subsidy in respect of branch lines will be calculated, the railways will not receive them in addition but they will be deducted from the transitional subsidy so that they will not get the same subsidies twice. At a given point, four, five or six years hence, the subsidies paid in respect of these particular services are likely to become as great as what is left of the transitional subsidies. The transitional grants will then disappear and the other subsidies take their place. In this way we will have plenty of time to do a proper costing. This will not be guesswork. In the meantime we will get rid of this huge, undifferentiated subsidy which is now being paid and which is a very unbusinesslike way, to put it mildly, of dealing with this problem.

In respect of rates other than the Crowsnest rates and the maritime freight rates, which of course will not be touched until the study is completed, and any new policy resulting from that study is evolved, apart from these rates and the Atlantic and eastern rates which are to be continued indefinitely, as well as the freight rate reduction in the Atlantic provinces which is to be continued for two more years, all other freight rates charged by the railways will fall into two classes. There will be those rates which are imposed upon captive shippers in cases where there are no alternative competitive ways of shipping goods. Those rates will be protected by a maximum rate and this will be the highest rate that the railway can charge. This does not mean that they will necessarily charge that rate, because most captive shippers today have agreed charges of one type or another. We have put two or three bills through this house in this session under which the railway branch lines have been based upon these agreed charges. However, every captive shipper will be protected by a maximum rate and the railway will not be able to charge a rate higher than that.

In the case of shippers who have an alternative mode of shipping which is genuinely competitive, the railways will be allowed to fix their charges, just as do other carriers such as trucks, ships or planes. In the main they will be able to compete for the traffic with other forms of transport. However, they will not be allowed to carry this competition to the point where the rates charged will become unremunerative. In other words, the railways will not be allowed to charge less than the cost of carrying the goods in order to put some competitor out of business. The rates they charge must be remunerative and the necessary provisions are contained in this bill to ascertain, in case of complaints, that they are. Those are the basic principles embodied in the railway section of the bill.

The other clauses are mostly of a tidying character and, as obviously the train is slowing down, I do not think I will impose upon the patience of the house by attempting to give any description of them this evening.

An hon. Member: Don't go on strike before you do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course the fact that a train stops when it arrives at its destination is not a strike.

Basically, the two important parts of this bill are the proposal to establish the Canadian Transport Commission, and the very comprehensive legislation with respect to railways. I do hope hon. members will feel that after a relatively brief general debate on second reading of this bill, the basic principles of which are similar to those of legislation prepared by the previous government, and similar to legislation introduced once before by this government and simply brought up to date to some degree, the general principles of this legislation will commend themselves to hon. members in all parts of the house and that, before very long we will be in a position to accept the bill, and to get on with the labourious task of going through this important legislation clause by clause in the transport committee.

I think, sir, that this is as much as I should inflict upon hon. members today.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is still in good humour and wishes to answer questions, I should like to ask him to explain the position of the freight rates on our coal shipments to Japan. I just received a telegram from the captive shippers from the Crowsnest pass. They are worried about this. I take it from what the minister has said that since the C.P.R. is hauling coal without competition from any other railroad and charging a rate of $5.30 per ton, this rate cannot be raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say, sir, that I think it is almost two weeks since I was last brought up to date on this matter. I understand the Attorney General of British Columbia had a meeting with the shippers and the representatives of the railway. A suggestion was put forward that there might be an alternative way of shipping this coal through the United States, which none of us would like to see happen. As far as I can judge, there is some very hard bargaining taking place between the coal companies and the C.P.R. at the present time. It is my hope that that bargaining will result in a solution of this problem.

Mr. Kindt: Does the minister mean that there will be a commuter train from the Crowsnest pass to Port Moody where the coal is shipped? This is what the operators are striving for.

Mr. Pickersgill: Actually, the negotiations that are going on are between what are usually called two private interests in this country. The government is not a party to those negotiations. Both parties have come and talked to me about this matter at various times. Every so often I ask them how the negotiations are getting along because I am very much interested in this matter primarily as a Canadian and also because I am Minister of Transport. Under the law as it stands at present neither the minister nor anyone else would have the power to set the kind of rate that the mines may feel they have to have in order to be satisfactory.

Mr. Kindt: I have one other question, Mr. Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, September 1, 1966

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, September 1, at 9.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Mr. Kindt: I have just one other question to ask the minister. The subvention on coal shipments to Japan is $2.73, and as the minister well knows the people in the Crowsnest pass area are dependant upon the shipment of coal to Japan. The minister is supporting those shipments. I wish to emphasize the fact that we do not want to see any increase in the present freight rate. If anything, we want to see a coal commuter train operated by the C.P.R. that will give us a rate of about $2.50 per ton. I hope the minister will work toward that end, as will the commission.

Mr. Olson: I should like to ask the minister if he would—

Mr. Cantelon: I rise on a question of personal privilege. When I asked the minister a question he said he would like to continue his address so that his train of thought would not be interrupted. I was courteous enough to agree and, at his request, wait until now to ask him a question. I have been interrupted once or twice now and I would not like to be interrupted again because I should like to ask this question now.

Mr. Olson: Out of courtesy to the hon. member I yield the floor to him.

Mr. Cantelon: The question I have to ask is probably the most important that could be asked of the minister, because it has to do with the matter of financing and, in particular, in the way in which this commission he is appointing to handle transportation is going to obtain information about railway operations. The minister says there will be expert help, he hopes, employed by the board. What I had in mind particularly was to ask him if there will be a firm of competent accountants engaged who will give their services to this board so that we may not have to depend entirely upon the figures the railways may supply. We should like to have impartial estimates for the use of the board and, I hope, for the use of the parliamentary committee on transport. This is my first question.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would be absolutely impossible for this proposed commission to do its work, I think, if it had to depend upon the accounting information provided by the railways, without any independent examination. Now, precisely how that would be done, whether it would be done by hiring outside experts or by engaging experts for the staff of the commission, it would be foolish of me to try to anticipate. I suspect both means would be used. I suspect they would have to have a considerable basic staff to do their costing. I would think that from time to time big problems would arise that were beyond the capacity of the staff the commission could economically afford to hire, and they would then retain outside consulting firms of accountants, or other firms who would be able to supplement their own staff. This is the way I envisage it; but of course the details are not prescribed in the bill.

Mr. Cantelon: I thank the minister for that answer. The second question I have is one that has to do with a comment he made during his address. I believe he said it was possible that roads might have to take the place of railways. He went on to say, and I think I am using his own words, that there would have to be the fullest possible co-ordination and co-operation with the provinces. I should like to know, is this just a nice way of getting around a problem or does he really mean that there will be concrete aid to the provinces to build these roads and maintain them where rail lines are abandoned, or where there are new roads to be constructed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would be competent to the commission, in certain circumstances where there would not be adequate alternate service to the railway, to assist in that way. This has happened once or twice already, and it is certainly not outside the scope of policy.

Mr. Olson: I have one short question. I want to ask the minister if he could provide the members of this house, and particularly the members of the transport committee, with some of the costs related to the carriage of a number of commodities for the so-called captive shippers so that we in this house, or other interested parties, could do some calculating on the basis of the formula that is in the bill, and thus reduce it to dollars and cents in so far as they might be concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will make every effort I can to get any such information. I think it would be helpful to me if any hon. member could give me some illustrations of captive shippers in which he was particularly interested. Then, we would have something concrete upon which to work. I am well aware of a good many of the cases.

I remind hon. members that most captive shippers, or a great number of them at any rate, are large corporations. They do not rely on the protection of any general maximum rate, but already have made specific bargains, what we call agreed charges, with the railway. Generally, those rates are more advantageous than any general protection likely would be.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): During the five minutes that remain to me, I think I should put forward a proposal—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I rise on a question of personal privilege? The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) indicated that he did not want to receive any questions, as he indicated to the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon), until after he finished his remarks. I have been on my feet attempting to ask a question on several occasions, and you could not help but see me. During the minister's remarks he discriminated against members of this party, but when a member of the N.D.P. got to his feet to put several questions the minister answered. I have one question I am going to get across to the minister tonight, and I wish he would give an anwer.

The minister referred to the fact that next year there would be a reduction in subsidies. Will he not assure me and assure the miners of Cape Breton that any reduction in subsidies will not in any way interfere with the coal subvention to the Nova Scotia coal industry?

Mr. Pickersgill: It could not have any conceivable connection.

Mr. Hamilton: At the end of my remarks I had intended to make a proposal which I thought would be helpful to the house in moving more swiftly to grapple with the major problems on second reading. We have eliminated the resolution stage which, under the old rule, used to give members a chance to ask questions and get some points cleared up. This particular bill has in it at least a score of major principles which I feel sure every member feels need clarification. The mere fact that when the minister spoke on second reading tonight many of us wanted to ask questions is indicative of the fact that we have to know a great deal more before we can vote on the principles of this bill at second reading.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The proposal I want to make, which apparently we will be able to consider overnight, follows other precedents in the house. I want to move at the end of my remarks, which I presume will be tomorrow morning, that the subject matter of Bill No. C-231 be referred to the standing committee on transportation, provided however that despite this motion the said bill shall remain on the order paper as an order for second reading without prejudice to the right to make or proceed with the motion for second reading.

What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, for the consideration of the party leaders or house leaders of the various parties is that before we can intelligently vote on the many principles which are inherent in this omnibus legislation we might be able to speed up things quite a bit if we were to move straight into committee stage, before continuing our full debate on the principle. I intend to make in the committee stage, if I am allowed, some proposals which I think can speed up the lengthy debate that I foresee on two sections of the bill. My proposals are five in number and are very simple, and I am sure that when they are heard will be recognized as a device to save a long, drawn out debate that we cannot otherwise avoid. I put this suggestion forward for the consideration of the house leaders and party leaders in the hope that this type of proposal, which is used mainly on private members motions and has only been used once on a government bill, will be considered in relation to this legislation.

In the few minutes that are left I want to make a remark or two about what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has said. He stated that the MacPherson report was a sound report, that it was a tremendous effort to get at the basic considerations of the fundamentals of the railway industry. I agree with that statement, but there is one thing wrong with it. That commission was set up in 1959 when, in the minds of most of the economists and business people of this country, the railways were looked upon as a declining and almost dying industry. However, since 1961 the revolution has occurred, and the revolution is that instead of 400 million bushels of grain moving in a crop year in western Canada we are now moving 800 million bushels.

The railways are a type of industry which is operated mostly on a fixed cost basis. If you increase the number of units moving in a fixed cost operation, you drastically reduce your costs. Today no one in his right mind would even suggest that there is any loss involved in the haulage of grain. There has never been any conclusive proof that there was ever any loss. Not even the railroaders would suggest, except in a clownish moment, that there was any loss on the haulage of grain.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely why the bill does not indicate any figure.

Mr. Hamilton: What I am trying to say is that this bill today, in 1966, is much better than the bill produced in 1964, but it is still hanging on to that old shibboleth that the industry is a dying industry which we must surround and protect.

I suggest that what we should do is to face the fact that not only is grain going to be a large item, but that by 1970 there will be more tons of potash hauled over the railways of western Canada to the west coast alone than there is wheat now sent to the west coast. We have 12 new pulp and paper mills to build on the prairies over the next decade which must transport their products west or south. We also need to transport zinc, sulphur, molybdenum and coal, the production of which is increasing at a fantastic pace. So that instead of thinking that our railways are dead and dying, a precept to which this bill still clings to a certain degree, we should abolish this type of thinking and begin to take advantage of the fact that we now have the green light.

Fortunately, we have in this bill one clause that gives me hope. I think that in committee we can take a look at the facts and figures, the maps and so on, and can remove the great fear which exists in western Canada and has existed since the royal commission report was brought down, namely that 15, 20 or 25 per cent of the people will have their railway lines abandoned. That fear should be removed immediately.

This should be done not on a five year or ten year basis. They should be told right now that every application has gone out of the window and that not one application presently before the board will be considered. Then when you have done that, all of us in committee can sit down with the board, and I believe that within a few days we should begin to show the people of the three prairie provinces that this great fear which has been hanging over them has gone, that all we are going to consider is a direction to the railways to operate their systems efficiently.

The system operating in the west can be operated so efficiently that there will be no need for any subsidies whatever. We will make so much money for the railways in western Canada that perhaps they will begin to pay wages to their employees which equal those paid in other industries. We hope that we will be able to show so much profit for the railways in western Canada that instead of increasing freight rates, they will have to be reduced.

That is the philosophy which I express in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize to all hon. members of the house for jumping right into the theme of my remarks without building up to them as I had intended. However, I do want to get this feeling of optimism rather than pessimism before the house.

On page after page of this bill are listed the gruesome details of the procedure for abandoning rail lines, how a poster must be put up at every station along the line warning the people that an application has been made to close it. Even though the board or the governor in council has decreed that a particular line shall not be abandoned for a certain time, the people are nevertheless served notice that it may be abandoned some day, perhaps five years from now, perhaps three years from now. It is like living on death row, with the certain knowledge that you are not going to be painlessly removed but are going to be strangled by a slow death.

This fear, as I say, has to be removed, and that is where parliament comes in. If we can go into committee and get a statement from the minister, then after we have explained what is in our minds I think that 90 per cent of this fear, which is held by the minister, will vanish.

I knew what the minister meant when he said that it is a question of balancing the local interest against the national interest. He also said that the old bill of 1964 was the precursor of this one. Let us leave off the "pre"; everybody curses that bill because they knew what it was. The first bill of 1964 was a farce, so far as rationalization was concerned, and it was a sell-out so far as costing was concerned. My hon. friend from Kindersley was right on the ball when he mentioned that in his question.

Tonight the minister said that he knew it would not be very easy to get this bill through the house, and he quietly appealed in a hopeless sort of way that we reduce the amount of fighting. I say that there is a positive way to get at this bill, and a positive way which will have the support of every westerner in this house.

We are the lifeblood of the railways. We are also the biggest source of revenue that the railways have. We will make even more money for the railways. All we ask in exchange is that we take this rationalization concept and put it into effect. Then not in 10, 15 or 20 years—because that is what it will take when we get through all these ramifications—but in one, two or three years and before 1970 we will be out of the subsidy business in western Canada and will have the peace of mind which we have not had for many a decade.

We know that there are one or two little joining up lines which have to be closed, and we do not oppose this; we welcome it. We know that we have tried for years to get the railway to abandon lines in certain places. Certain lines run parallel, and you can take out a fishing pole and touch them for mile after mile.

• (9:50 p.m.)

This is hard to understand. We have known ever since the Duff report of 1934 that this was a losing situation for both railways. We note that the concept of joint running routes has been accepted. I can recall one case in Saskatchewan where the C.N.R. hauled grain 100 miles north and 100 miles south so that they would not have to cross a C.P.R. bridge. That is how archaic the system is. The C.P.R. was established on a favourable commercial basis but the C.N.R. was a hodge-podge and we have been paying the shot ever since. Now is the time to straighten out this hodge-podge and, without interfering with the right of the railways to manage their own affairs, say to them: For God's sake run the railways efficiently. If they will not do it, I want to see in this bill the power to require them to do it.

Maybe this is the principle which the government has in mind. I do not know what to recommend to my party. Should we support these principles when I do not know where the power lies? I should like the chance to question the minister before I vote on this bill on second reading.

I am sure the minister will find me as helpful as I was in the past on those committees which he mentioned tonight. After bill C-120 had been introduced at the resolution stage, he spoke and I spoke. I said I would support the principles which I thought were contained in the bill. The former member for Port Arthur was not as gullible as I was. He was suspicious. But I believed the government would not neglect the opportunity to place these railways on a national basis.

I did not get hold of the bill until 11.30 at night and I had not got beyond page 6 of it before I was on the telephone to farmers in western Canada and to the premiers of the provinces—

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. member will not mind my interrupting him for a moment. The leader of the house is not here.

Notwithstanding that Black Rod may not be here before ten o'clock, I presume we would not want to do him the discourtesy of not waiting, and I wonder whether the house will agree that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle should continue speaking? If he becomes exhausted, then someone else should carry on until the knock comes at the door.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not mind confessing that I am saving the bulk of my remarks for tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Slow down the pace, then.

Mr. Hamilton: I was saying that at 11.30 I got the bill. I had not gone beyond page 6 before I realized I had been led into a booby trap. I had to telephone farm leaders in western Canada and the premiers of the prairie provinces to say that the agreement I had made with them as a minister, the agreement between the grain companies, the railways, the three premiers and the federal government had been shot out of the window by the new bill, and that any remarks I had made on the resolution stage, observations made in good faith, had also gone out of the window. Within a few hours the minister had been made aware of the objections of the western leaders and as a result the bill never saw the light of day.

Later on I made a suggestion to the minister which was somewhat similar to the one I have just made. We met privately in an informal group representing the five parties to talk things over. As the minister may recall, we brought in outsiders. Some of us put forward reasonable and constructive suggestions for improving Bill No. C-120. All this was two years ago. Since then many of us have worked in a constructive attempt to improve that bill and make the rationalization concept workable.

Now the minister has put forward another idea, that of placing the power with a super board. The real power lies with the governor in council. I do not think this is necessarily a bad principle, because if we have to rely on the tender mercies of the Board of Transport Commissioners, whose decisions in the past few years have become precedents which have the force of law, our chances of improvement are slim I say this because the board are now prisoners of what they have been doing for many years.

Surely it is not wrong at the start of a new day for either parliament or the governor in council to take some positive initiative and lay down at least the terms on which these boards must operate?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I made it clear that the government was proposing to go even further along the road which the hon. gentleman is discussing that he has envisaged, that is, that we intend to indicate perfectly clearly that the basic network should not be disturbed at all, whether those lines were paying or losing lines? It would only be the really marginal lines which would be candidates for abandonment. The basic framework would be fixed, and everyone would know it was going to remain. I think this is what the hon. gentleman wants. It is a positive instead of a negative approach—not an approach from the viewpoint of abandonment but one from the viewpoint of the assured retention of all the lines which are really essential.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Was the hon. gentleman interrupting for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I was asking a question.

Mr. Hamilton: Thank you for your protection, Mr. Speaker. I think you understand the difficulties under which I am working. I understand precisely why the minister has raised this question and it demonstrates, in my opinion, that the suggestion I have made is a sensible one. If we carry on here for the next two or three weeks on the basis of question and answer in the house we cannot hope to do our work effectively. I believe that if we could get together on these ideas it would be possible to remove many of the fears which are felt by representatives on this side of the house who come from farming areas. If these fears could be removed the minister might be amazed how forward looking we can be. If the minister would back this proposal and use his good offices with hon. members in all parts of the house, because there must be unanimous agreement, I think we would have a really good session because our ideas have advanced considerably during these past few years.

I wish to turn now, to another matter, one which is, I believe, the guts of the railway bill. This is where the big quarrel will take place. We shall fight on the question of maximum rate controls. Many ideas will be put forward as to how the passenger service should work in a country where the population density is hardly sufficient to maintain it at a profit. There will be ideas expressed on this and that. But there is one thing the minister should know. I believe he knows it already. Who is to decide on the formulae for costing? Throughout the bill it is stated that costing shall be as decided by the board. The minister has admitted that the board is not competent to deal with costing, and we all agree with that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to be unfair to people who are not represented here. I did not say the board was not competent. I said it did not have an adequate staff to enable it to do the job in the way we should like it to be done.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Hamilton: If the minister wishes to put it like that, I will accept it. I will add something else—that none of us in this house is competent, either. When the question of the Crowsnest pass rates came up there were protests from all western provinces. The C.P.R. hired one of the most able and competent cost accountant firms they could find in the United States, who had done cost accounting on railways, to look at the figures for 1958 for the carriage of grain in Canada. After several months work they came up with figures allocating certain costs, and said that on the carriage of grain in 1958 the C.P.R. had lost $17 million.

This caused an uproar from the three prairie provinces and they decided to spend good money on a similar study. They went out and hired an equally able, experienced cost accounting firm in the United States to examine exactly the same figures as the previous firm had done. This second firm allocated them slightly differently and said no, the C.P.R. did not lose money that year, but had made $2 million. What was the royal commission to do? It went out and got another firm of equally able, competent people to examine the figures and they said, "Neither is right; we think it is probably in between," and so they set the loss at $500,000. This is a humorous anecdote of what actually happened. The Board of Transport Commissioners are simply not in this costing league. This is not new. The gas industry has been operating in North America for 60 years and still no costing system has been decided upon.

When the experts cannot agree, then we in parliament have some part to play. We shall have to lay down the terms of reference between these experts and say that for the next two years or five years this shall be the costing system, and perhaps change it at the end of that period to a new system.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have gone beyond ten o'clock because I wanted to get something on the record tonight in answer to what the minister had said, first to make absolutely clear that I think we in this house should reject this pessimistic feeling about railroads.

Railways have been and will continue to be a very important part of our transportation system. Over and over again the railways have demonstrated that when you kick them high enough they can do fantastic things. This year, after we in the House of Commons finally blew our top, what the railways were able to do with the movement of grain was unbelievable. They actually brought in more motive power. They railroaded as never before. One of these days they are going to get so smart that they are going to build or buy a proper car for carrying grain which, instead of taking 20 minutes to load, can be loaded or unloaded in 12, 14 or 16 seconds. Then they will find their cost-profit relationship sweet.

Therefore I say that in this matter of looking at the railway bill we have to examine it minutely and realize we are setting the basic framework on which railways will operate, and which may guide the transportation industry of this country for a generation or two.

The question of the super board is one on which many of our members will want to ask the minister many questions. We want to know how it is going to relate the functions of a railway, in the traditional sense, to a railway looking on itself as an arm of the transportation industry. There is not a railway company in existence that should not be a full transportation company. If they can transport things by rail they should also be in the air business, the water business, the hovercraft business and the pipe line business, in fact in any other thing that transports goods, and that should be an integral part of their operations in order to achieve maximum efficiency.

Here in Canada where so many of our goods will be carried by pipe lines, the railways are naturals to go into the business of operating and building pipe lines, in some cases in competition with each other, and in other cases working jointly. This is one of the things we should see popping up in this bill.

But as I read the bill all the enthusiasm for what a railway company can become in Canada, with these great distances which are a great opportunity for them, dies as I look at the duties of this super board. What are their duties? They are to study this, study that, study this, and after a while study this. We need the statistics, yes; but surely parliament can give them some direction as to what we want them to do. There is another series of questions. If we take over the interprovincial trucking lines and the interprovincial buses and reach the point where the railways carry passengers on rail while the other carries passengers on rubber, and where the one carries freight on rail and the other carries freight on rubber, what is the relationship to the rate setting pattern? The railways are prohibited from setting a rate below compensatory levels. What is the situation in respect of the trucks. This is the sort of question to which the government will have to have answers. We have to have those answers before we know how to vote on the principles. So, I am going to move the adjournment of the house—

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope not. The house agreed to continue to sit until Black Rod arrived.

Mr. Hamilton: I think we can move the adjournment and wait for Black Rod, because I do not want to lose the opportunity to make the remarks I wish to make tomorrow.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C.R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (10:20 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General has been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to a certain bill:

An Act to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between Railway Companies and their employees.

At 10.23 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 2, 1966

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

MATTERS TO BE DISCUSSED AT FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the question asked yesterday by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition I promised I would make a statement on motions in respect of the forthcoming Commonwealth prime ministers' conference. The situation in Canada at the moment happily is such that I expect to be able to leave Ottawa tomorrow to attend the conference in London.

At that conference all but one of the members of the Commonwealth will be represented. There are now, I believe, 23 members of the Commonwealth. This shows how it has grown over recent years. The growth reflects the changed nature of the Commonwealth and indeed the changed nature of the world, because of these 23 members of the Commonwealth all but six are from Asia, Africa or the Caribbean area; all but Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Cyprus and Malta.

I believe there will be 12 or 13 prime ministers who will attend this conference, and in cases where prime ministers are unable to attend, as unfortunately is the case in respect of some members of the Commonwealth, those countries will be represented generally by their foreign or other ministers.

This will be the first meeting of the prime ministers at which a Commonwealth secretariat will be entirely in charge of the arrangements. The secretary general of the Commonwealth secretariat, a distinguished former official of the Department of External Affairs, will be the secretary general of the conference.

Undoubtedly there will be a wide range of subjects discussed. Over the years it has been the custom not to indicate in advance by means of an agenda what those subjects will be. This is a tradition which to me does not seem to have very much meaning in the present circumstances, but is one which always has been followed. So when there is a discussion of the Commonwealth meeting in advance it is customary to say: "the following subjects likely will be discussed although no agenda has been agreed upon."

I do not think I would be betraying any secret if I were to mention two or three of the things which undoubtedly will be considered.

• (11:10 a.m.)

The international picture generally is reviewed by the Commonwealth prime ministers, and on this occasion I am quite certain that the review will include consideration of the Viet Nam situation. It will be remembered that at the last meeting of the Commonwealth prime ministers in London over a year ago the prime ministers had a very active and, I think, valuable discussion about the Viet Nam situation, as a result of which a mission of four Commonwealth prime ministers was established and charged, if the parties to the conflict agreed, to do what they could to intervene in and mediate that situation.

It is perhaps not remembered as it should be that this mission—and three of the four members were heads of government from countries uncommitted in any way—was accepted for a visit by the governments of South Viet Nam and the United States, both of which were directly concerned, but that mission was completely rejected by the government of North Viet Nam, which made it quite clear it would not receive it in any way, shape or form. In any event, this situation will be considered again, I am sure.

There will also be a review of the disarmament position and I would expect, with particular reference to steps that have been or should be taken to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons. There will be very little at this conference in the way of economic and financial discussions; not that they are unimportant because, of course, they are, but it is extremely difficult to separate the problems in this field inside the Commonwealth association from those problems which are of world wide significance.

As I indicated the other day, there will be a meeting of the International Monetary Fund in September, at which time these matters will be discussed. Perhaps I should also have mentioned the other day that there will be a meeting of the Commonwealth ministers of finance in Montreal beginning September 21, at which time they will review the matters which will later come before the International Monetary Fund.

I am quite certain that the most important and the most difficult question to come before the Commonwealth prime ministers will be that of Rhodesia. It is because of that question I have said, and I do not think this is an exaggeration, that the future of the Commonwealth as a multiracial association—and that is the only basis on which it has a future—will be at stake at this meeting. In that sense the meeting will be crucial to the evolution or, indeed, the devolution of the Commonwealth of nations.

There are very deep differences of opinion in regard to the Rhodesian situation and what should be done to ensure that the illegal regime in authority there ceases to exercise that authority. These deep differences of opinion can and I think will be discussed in London in the traditional Commonwealth conference manner of complete frankness and understanding. I hope this discussion will result in some progress toward a solution to this very difficult question. We will certainly need at this conference all those qualities of frankness and freedom of discussion, and a feeling that there can be that kind of discussion conducted in mutual respect and without danger of violent misunderstanding.

So far as our own attitude is concerned, it would, of course, not be wise or prudent for me, before the conference, to indicate in detail what will be the policy of the Canadian delegation in respect of the detailed matters as they arise. It is certainly not wise to take firm and public positions on specific issues before a conference of this kind actually meets. Our basic policy in regard to Rhodesia has been made known. There have been discussions in the House of Commons, questions have been asked and answered from time to time, and there was a very good discussion of the matter before the committee on external affairs. Indeed, if it would help in any way I have no doubt that these discussions could all be put together and a memorandum or some kind of white paper issued with regard to them.

From the beginning this government, I think with the approval of all members of the house, has co-operated fully in regard to the imposition of sanctions against the illegal regime in Rhodesia. We have taken part in economic pressures which it was hoped would bring to an end the illegal régime in that country and restore constitutional government to Rhodesia, as a first step to eventual independence on the basis of majority rule, which is the only basis on which independence can be established and accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We have also co-operated as a government, I believe with the support of parliament, in carrying out resolutions of the United Nations security council and in carrying out the agreements of the prime ministers' conferences. We have not questioned, nor do we question now, the decision of the British government, which still has the ultimate constitutional responsibility for that country, not to use military or armed force against Rhodesia unless, as the Prime Minister of Great Britain said, such force was necessary to restore law and order. I have no doubt this matter will be re-examined at the forthcoming conference. We will certainly examine also the working of sanctions. For that purpose we will have a very detailed report from the sanctions committee which was set up after the conference of last January in Nigeria and is presided over by the Canadian high commissioner in London. We will be examining this report to see how and whether sanctions could be strengthened.

There is no doubt that the operation of sanctions as a method of bringing the regime to an end has been disappointing and that disappointment, I am sure, will be expressed in the reports we will receive. There is no doubt also that sanctions are having an effect on the economy of Rhodesia. In my own view there are still further steps that could be taken to strengthen economic pressures through sanctions. I have no doubt that proposals will be made to this end, and that one of these will be to refer the matter to the United Nations so that United Nations mandatory sanctions could be applied, either full or limited mandatory sanctions, under chapter 7 of the United Nations charter.

Under that chapter provision is made for the application of economic sanctions and military sanctions. I have always taken the stand, and I am sure hon. members agree with this, that imposing military sanctions under chapter 7 of the charter of the United Nations or under resolutions of the general assembly does not imply the use of force in the conventional sense. Nevertheless I am certain that before any use of force was contemplated under chapter 7 of the charter there would be a full examination of whether economic sanctions under the United Nations could be applied and made effective. All these matters will be discussed and I have no idea what the results of these discussions will be.

• (11:20 a.m.)

There is a very special problem with which we and other members of the Commonwealth are concerned, namely the relationship of Zambia in this situation. Zambia, which unfortunately will not be represented by its president, Kenneth Kaunda, who is one of the wise and moderating influences in African development and who will be represented by his foreign minister, is in the unenviable position of being as anxious as any country could be to see the illegal regime in Rhodesia brought to an end and replaced by one where the majority will prevail. However, at the same time Zambia is very dependent at the present time upon Rhodesia for its economic existence. If Zambia is to release itself from that dependence it is going to need economic and financial assistance from its friends in the Commonwealth and, I would hope, from outside the Commonwealth. For instance, it is an anomalous and ironic situation that one third of Rhodesian exports go to Zambia, yet Zambia is not in a position at the present time to cut off that one third which would inflict real economic damage on Rhodesia because it would destroy itself economically in the process.

This is the problem that has been actively considered in recent weeks, and proposals for assistance to Zambia by the United Kingdom and by other members of the Commonwealth including Canada will undoubtedly be considered at the conference.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot go into further details at the present time, but that is a summary of the situation which I think will confront us at the meeting which will open in London at the beginning of next week. I can only hope that out of this meeting will come some agreement which will help to solve the problems we will be facing, especially the problem of Rhodesia, the difficulty and complexity of which is greater than that which has faced, I think, any meeting of Commonwealth prime ministers.

On our ability to find some satisfactory solution to that problem, or some satisfactory progress to a solution, I think, might well depend the existence of the Commonwealth of Nations which we now know as a multiracial institution spanning the continents and including people of all races, of all colours and all creeds on the basis of complete equality.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the meetings of the prime ministers of the Commonwealth are of great importance for the Commonwealth and for the peace of the world. I am happy to hear the Prime Minister's reference to the multiracial nature of the Commonwealth as being of paramount significance.

I recall the criticism in 1960 and 1961 when I took the stand—the only white prime minister to do so—that without the principle that the Commonwealth must be colour blind it could not survive. I have not changed that view. What was heresy then is now accepted.

The fact that the Prime Minister will be able to attend the conference is naturally a matter of personal pleasure. I suggested that he should do so. I brought the matter before the house, because I think it is imperative that he be there.

A prime minister's conference without prime ministers is not effective, and one of my regrets, based on the information which appeared in the press, is that the prime minister of India will not be there nor will the president of Pakistan. These are the highest representatives of areas inhabited by approximately three quarters of the population of the Commonwealth. Therefore, authoritative representations by those countries will be lacking. No one except the leaders of countries can speak for them with the authority that is necessary.

With regard to the second portion of the Prime Minister's remarks dealing with the meeting itself, I am of the opinion—and there can be disagreement with this—that it is not necessary to have a prime ministers' conference at this time. Three of them will have been called in one year. The first was in January in Africa, the second for June, and another now.

As the Prime Minister stated, the problem of Rhodesia is the one above all others that will be receiving attention. Naturally there will be a review of the world situation. The question of disarmament will receive its regular and unfinalistic review. However, the major problem is Rhodesia.

We in this party have taken the stand that Rhodesia is a matter for the United Kingdom and the responsibility of the United Kingdom. The particular relationship of Rhodesia to the United Kingdom places that problem in that category. I am not saying what happens there does not have an effect elsewhere in the world on the relationship between the whites and the blacks. However, the problem of Rhodesia cannot be solved by the United Kingdom placing it before a prime ministers' conference. I was strongly criticized, as were the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) and Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), when we contended that the policy of sanctions would not work. It does not require a report by a committee of the Commonwealth nations for it to be known that sanctions have not worked. They have had their effect; they have interfered with various areas and sectors of the economy, but they just have not worked. Sanctions, on the basis of history, will not work.

Yet, one member of the government after the other, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), as far back as June last claimed they were working effectively. Well this is not the first time that predictions of that kind have not been borne out by events. It is generally admitted now that they have not worked. It is admitted by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, by Sir Edgar Whitehead in a recent article and by one of the great Commonwealth leaders Sir Roy Welensky. It is attested by the fact that the Smith regime is carrying on with no discernible discomfort and that Zambia will continue to be dependent on Rhodesia for oil. They have not worked. Naturally the British government wants a Commonwealth conference. This is the problem of the Wilson government, which said that it had the answers to this question. I want to emphasize that this is not our problem. Mr. Wilson said that his solution would work. Now apparently the responsibility is again to be dissembled among the Commonwealth nations. Three meetings in one year are at least one too many. It does not make for unity to meet together regularly and not have anything particularly in mind; and there is nothing in mind on this problem except, as the Prime Minister has said, that the matter might be brought before the United Nations, and I will refer to that in a moment.

The Prime Minister mentioned, and properly, the tremendous growth of the Commonwealth with, I think he said, 23 members now. What is going to happen there? I have expressed this fear before. Today the Prime Minister speaks almost lugubriously of the prospects for the Commonwealth. Months ago and prior to June my concern, as I expressed it, was that if a vote should take place at the prime ministers' conference, with the overwhelming number of the members of the Commonwealth of other than the white race, and that vote should be unacceptable to Canada, or Australia, or New Zealand, or the United Kingdom, then you have the beginning of the disintegration of the Commonwealth. That is why I fear for this meeting. It will either end with a communiqué which could have been written even before the conference began, which I am told sometimes occurs, or the conference could end in a cleavage and a division that would have irreparably detrimental results to the whole concept.

The Commonwealth is an amazing institution. It has no rules, no regulations, no agreement; no decisions are made, yet it has worked. I share the Prime Minister's fear that this meeting will bring about a situation that will lead to the most frightening results not in the years ahead but in the months ahead. It is because of this that I have so strongly pressed that the conference ought not to meet at this time. Time to cool has its benefits.

I know that in the last few days events have occurred that are bound to cause concern. It was only a few moments before I came into the house that I realized that this matter was going to be discussed; therefore I have before me only a few references. In the last few days Mr. Smith has acted in a way that would indicate that he is trying to meet in anticipation any action on the part of the prime ministers' conference. Up to the present Prime Minister Wilson has been talking about talks about talks. This pretty well ended in the last few days. The talks have halted, but to all intents and purposes they ended on August 25, when a bill was introduced in the Rhodesian parliament which was disastrous to the negotiations. This was a deliberate and contemptuous act designed to indicate in advance to the Commonwealth prime ministers' conference the contempt which Mr. Smith and those associated with him have for the Commonwealth.

What are the prime ministers going to do? Are they going to send the issue to the United Nations? In his statement yesterday U Thant indicated that the United Nations is in a serious position apparently unequalled in all the years of its existence. If the matter is placed before the United Nations, what will the United Nations do? What can they do? Are we going to have the United Nations determining the rights of individuals and the authority of a de facto government of a country which is not a member of that institution? The responsibility here rests firmly on the parliament of the United Kingdom. I repeat that Prime Minister Wilson said only a few months ago that he had the magic solution to this problem.

The Prime Minister now says, let me repeat, that the matter should be put before the United Nations. Well, as far back as January 11 or 12 of 1966 he stated that if it was not clear within a matter of weeks rather than months that existing sanctions were ending the rebellion, then further measures would have to be considered, including action in the United Nations under chapter 7. He referred to "a few weeks"; it is now months.

Chapter 7 implies military action in part. It is easy to talk of that. The Prime Minister brushed it aside, and I agree with his view. Canada should have no place whatever in any military actions that may be determined upon in this connection against a country within the Commonwealth; and no Canadian forces should be used, whether under the United Nations or otherwise, for that purpose.

We are in Cyprus as a self-appointed international policeman, at our own expense and we shall continue to pay. When I look at unification and integration and the mess they are in I can only conclude that we have come to a point in Canada where Canada's defence is to be forgotten, and in place of it involvement in international forces will be the rule. I am not going to deal with that now but I hope very shortly to do so. I can make some quotations from the texts of the minister of defence.

Having said that, I say to the Prime Minister that we can only hope this meeting will be productive of something positive regarding the Rhodesian problem. I do not know what it will be. The government has contended since last April that the sanctions were successful. Indeed, On April 20 last at page 4069 of Hansard I asked the question, and the answer was:

> —the embargo is being enforced; the embargo is successful.

All I have to say is that it does not turn out that way. We in Canada can support the need of sanctions to raise the standard of international conduct or action within the Commonwealth, with no fear of suffering in Canada; because we have no trade to speak of in that area. Will the United Kingdom be willing to agree to sanctions, harsh sanctions, against not only Rhodesia but other countries such as Portugal and South Africa? Because unless that is done the sanctions cannot work; and if it is done, and Britain accepts the views of the United Nations on these things and says "We have got to clamp down on this; the sanctions must be made to work," the British crown and trade will suffer seriously and the depreciation is bound to be great, so that any question of submitting these matters to the United Nations is not very hopeful.

Indeed, that has been tried. It was tried back in May. The African nations called for the use of force in Rhodesia, I think on May 23 last, and they came before the security council. Six of the council's 15 members voted for the resolution. Among the Commonwealth there were Nigeria and Uganda. But the United States, Britain, the Netherlands, France, China, Japan, the Argentine and Uruguay abstained, with New Zealand voting against, so there is little hope that action will be taken if this matter goes to the United Nations. It is easier to state the problem than to be able to come up with any solution.

What is happening in Africa is that there is a rush toward democratic institutions and freedom without the knowledge of the operating techniques of freedom. All those countries that have rushed in to attain freedom find themselves in a serious situation. When the Prime Minister was in Nigeria, at the conference in January, he was greeted by Sir Abubakar, one of the great democratic leaders in an emerging nation, a man for whom I developed tremendous respect. A few days later he was destroyed.

What is to be done? Is it possible that the government of Canada might consider sending representatives to Rhodesia, to meet there with the representatives of the Smith administration to try and bring about something? The British cannot do it; they have shown that. The other night on television a young man with the solution for all the problems of mankind stated that Canada enjoys a high prestige in Africa. I believe that. When we were in office we were able to provide assistance to those new countries which had broken away from France and become established because of our peculiar position here in Canada. We did that, and that has been continued under the present government.

We have a good and excellent standing among emerging nations. Would it not be a good idea if the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs were to go and try at first hand to do that which has not been achieved by the British government, which is naturally an interested party in any decisions taken, so through the medium of Canada there might be brought about some relationship which will ultimately lead to that which we all desire, namely peace with equity, and peace with the recognition that whatever the colour of a man's skin, men are equal and their rights must be respected.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the prime ministers' conference which is to begin early next week meets against a background which is gloomy and foreboding. One has only to read the letter which Secretary General U Thant wrote to the security council announcing that he will not be available for another term to realize just how serious the world situation is. I think every member of parliament ought to read that letter, to see in it the despair of a man who is probably more intimately associated with the forces at work in the world today than any other human being. He cites the lack of financial support for the United Nations. He cites the war in Viet Nam as an action which in his opinion, if not stopped, could ultimately lead to a major catastrophe.

Therefore it seems to me that the Commonwealth prime ministers are meeting at a most appropriate time. The right hon. Prime Minister said that two subjects would be discussed, one being the question of Viet Nam. I think it is a matter of regret that the Commonwealth prime ministers' delegation which endeavoured to meet with the various parties in the Viet Nam dispute was rejected by some of the disputants. This is a view which I expressed as forcefully as I could when our parliamentary delegation met Mr. Mikoyan, who at that time was President of the U.S.S.R. However, I hope the prime ministers' conference will not allow this rejection to dissuade them from whatever other action they can take.

One of the hopeful signs is that Canada and India, two of the members of the Commonwealth, are two of the members on the international control commission. If it is not possible to get the two co-chairmen of the Geneva accord powers to reconvene that conference, I think Canada and India might well discuss the possibility of themselves calling a conference and inviting all those who are affected, including the national liberation front in South Viet Nam.

It may be that Peking and Hanoi would refuse to attend, although I seriously doubt it. I doubt if they could stay away from a conference called by two members of the international control commission, two countries which have nothing to gain by prolonging the war in Viet Nam.

I hope the Prime Minister will use all the influence he can to persuade the Commonwealth Prime Ministers to speak out on the question of Viet Nam, and to urge the Commonwealth at least to endorse publicly the basic proposals put forth by U Thant, the secretary general of the United Nations, for a cessation of the bombing, for a conference of all groups including the national liberation front, for the eventual withdrawal of all foreign troops, and for the right of the people in Viet Nam to determine in free elections what form of government they wish to have.

The second question the Prime Minister said will be discussed is Rhodesia. I cannot agree with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that this conference should not be held at this time. I think it is imperative that the conference should be held at this time. It is true that constitutionally this problem is the responsibility of Great Britain, but if all the members of the Commonwealth, including Canada, do nothing; if there is no attempt to find a solution, what will inevitably happen is that members of the Commonwealth in Africa and even in Asia may one by one withdraw from the Commonwealth.

We can destroy the Commonwealth by inaction. We cannot do any harm by having the prime ministers meet. While it may be Great Britain's responsibility even the British government, or any other government, is surely not averse to getting the consensus of other nations which are equally concerned about preserving the Commonwealth as a force in the world. I think this is the time for the prime ministers of the Commonwealth to meet.

It is true that there is no easy solution, but it seems to me there are three courses of action open. The first is to do nothing and to allow matters to go on just as they are. Apparently the economic sanctions have not been completely effective, although undoubtedly they have had some effect. But if nothing is done there will undoubtedly be a withdrawal of some of the African Commonwealth countries from this association, and that could even be followed by the withdrawal of some of the Asiatic members from the Commonwealth.

If Mr. Ian Smith and his illegal régime carry out their threat of revising the constitution so that Mr. Smith can jail his opponents without trial, there could be bloodshed in Africa; there could be intervention by other African countries; there could be the beginning of a war between Africans and whites that would shake that whole unhappy continent. It seems to me that to take the policy of despair and say there is nothing we can do, and just let events take their course, is a complete abdication of statesmanship.

With respect to the other alternative that has been mentioned, of military sanctions against Rhodesia, apart from the moral consideration it is doubtful if Great Britain could assemble a military force and launch a military attack against a country as isolated as Rhodesia. There is another consideration apart from the military logistics. It is that a war between the forces of Great Britain or the Commonwealth and the illegal régime of Mr. Ian Smith might be an invitation to the 4 million blacks in that country to rise, and an invitation to other African countries to intervene.

It seems to me that the only solution which appears to be in sight at the moment, unless the prime ministers when they meet next week find some better proposal, is to submit this matter to the United Nations and ask the United Nations to impose mandatory economic sanctions. I recognize all that has been said about what this would entail. It may mean not only economic sanctions against Rhodesia but may mean economic sanctions against Portugal and South Africa. I recognize that Great Britain is very dependent at the present time upon its trade relations with South Africa, and that the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions by the United Nations under its charter would involve very considerable financial sacrifices for the United Kingdom.

But, Mr. Speaker, peace, like everything else, has a price. We have to decide whether we are prepared to pay the price to maintain a world in which the rule of law obtains. We must decide whether we are going to see a police state with a racist government continue a policy which could lead to a conflagration in Africa, or whether the United Nations will take whatever steps are necessary to guarantee the freedom of over 4 million Africans who at the present time are living under a totalitarian régime imposed upon them by less than a quarter of a million white supremacists.

I think Canada has to give its support to any such proposal if the Commonwealth is prepared to make an advance to the United Nations. It has been asked, "What can the United Nations do"? Well, Mr. Speaker, if we adopt a policy of despair that the United Nations can do nothing, and if this body, which was launched with such hope and optimism in 1945, is now so completely decrepit and useless that we cannot refer this matter to it, the future is filled with impending gloom.

• (12 noon)

I for one do not regret that Canada has contributed to the maintenance of peace in Gaza, Cyprus or anywhere else. Any small price Canada has paid out of its great affluence to maintain peace in any part of the world is a small price to pay. Peace is indivisible. Wherever there is war, dissention or racial discrimination in any part of the earth the peace of the world is in danger and the freedom of mankind is at stake. If Canada, by giving its support wherever such contribution is necessary financially, whatever sacrifices are involved, can contribute to the establishment of a genuine democratic government in Rhodesia with equality of treatment for all its citizens whether black or white, that, Mr. Speaker, will be a small price to pay for reaching such a satisfactory situation. I hope the Prime Minister will use his very considerable influence at this conference, in the absence of any other course of action which with his knowledge of the facts may seem preferable, to urge that the situation not be allowed to deteriorate further and, if Great Britain does not feel it can act on its own or if the Commonwealth does not feel it has any solution at hand, to urge that this matter be taken to the United Nations with a request that they deal with this troubled spot before it spreads throughout Africa and endangers the peace of the world.

The Prime Minister of Canada goes to this conference with very considerable prestige, prestige on his own account because of his long record in international affairs and his well-known interest in the cause of peace. He also goes with considerable prestige because Canada is a country which has the respect and I think the affection of many of the countries of Africa and Asia. We have stood with them on many occasions not only under the present Prime Minister but also under the former prime minister. We have stood with the African and Asian people in many of their disputes with the western powers. I think Canada is respected and will be listened to.

I believe our Prime Minister probably can wield more influence in discussions with the Commonwealth leaders of Africa and Asia than can any other white leader who will be present at this conference next week. Therefore I say to the Prime Minister that he goes to this conference, I am sure, with the best wishes of the Canadian people and carries on his shoulders our hopes and aspirations. It is our hope that he and his colleagues will be able to find some of the answers which will help promote and maintain peace in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) told us that 12 or 13 prime ministers of commonwealth nations would meet in London in a few days.

According to the Prime Minister, the international situation will be discussed during this conference. It is perfectly normal that prime ministers of commonwealth nations deal with the international situation and they will naturally discuss the American escalation in Viet Nam.

But I do not see how the commonwealth prime ministers could decide anything about Viet Nam. Since Canada is geographically located next to the most powerful country in the world, in the past the American government and the Canadian government have discussed the Viet Nam issue and will continue to do so in the future without seeking the advice of the other prime ministers of commonwealth nations because in some cases, Canada has to take positions that other commonwealth countries do not have or do not want to take. This is quite normal, precisely because of our geographical location and the close ties between the American and the Canadian people.

Another subject that will probably be brought up is that inflation which is presently causing great damage in Great Britain and in many other countries. But it seems that the most debated question will be that of Rhodesia. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister devoted two thirds of his statement to the Rhodesian problem. Before dealing with Rhodesia, the Prime Minister announced that the Ministers of Finance will meet on September 21 in Montreal to review our position with regard to the International Monetary Fund. I sincerely hope and suggest to the Prime Minister that he bring together the federal and provincial Ministers of Finance in order to review our monetary position right here without having to resort to the International Monetary Fund.

To revert to the question of Rhodesia, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said that Canada had to impose economic restrictions in the case of Rhodesia because the government there is illegal.

I am not questioning the fact that there is an illegal government in Rhodesia, but Rhodesia is not the only country with an illegal government. I suspect that in Russia, the government there is not quite legal. I do not think that in China, the government is quite legal either. In Cuba, the government is not quite legal. In other countries of the world there are governments that are not quite legal, but this does not prevent us from dealing with them, from making large deals with them.

Now, as for Rhodesia, we must be concerned directly in its situation, or rather in the position they are taking.

This should not be taken to mean that I approve what the present illegal government of Rhodesia is doing in that country, far from it, but I am in full agreement with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he says, for instance, that the problem of Rhodesia is no concern of Canada, it is the concern of Britain. This is true. This concerns the Wilson government, in Britain.

It does not concern us here. There have been skirmishes between Britain and Rhodesia, but that is no concern of ours. We have nothing to do with that and the Leader of the Opposition is right on that score. I understand the problem is most delicate and that every means are being sought to sanction and strangle Rhodesia and incite the people of Rhodesia to throw out a government which is considered illegal.

The people, men, women, and children suffer from these economic sanctions pressed upon them, because an illegal government is in power, like so many others all over the world.

Mr. Speaker, the problem is delicate and the right hon. Prime Minister informs us that Zambia is ready to co-operate with Canada and the other countries, but cannot afford to do so since it depends upon Rhodesia for two-thirds of its needs. It cannot do without Rhodesia. Canada could grant Zambia massive exports in order to substitute for Rhodesia.

Mr. Speaker, I do not feel these considerations contribute to the settlement of the Rhodesian question. Neither do I believe that Canada should be very much involved in the affair. I do not feel it should be. And for these reasons, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is right in saying that the Rhodesian question concerns the Wilson government in Great Britain. He is right.

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that there are other problems to be discussed among commonwealth country members, economic problems for instance, not economic sanctions or restrictions. If an appeal were made to logic and common sense, in Rhodesia and elsewhere, could we not reach an agreement?

I know how strongly the right hon. Prime Minister feels about world peace and good feelings throughout the world. I am aware of the fact that he was with the Department of External Affairs for many years and that he is thoroughly competent in this field. I know that the right hon. Prime Minister will enjoy, at this conference, great prestige, but is it not a fact that, on that occasion, Canada's influence, the Prime Minister's influence, is due to our being neighbours of the United States and that country is known as the most powerful in the world? That is reflected upon us Canadians, members of the government or of the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister enjoys this influence, to be sure, but let us use it to promote amity, cordiality, understanding, co-operation between nations. I am sure that the Prime Minister will measure up to expectations at this conference of prime ministers of Commonwealth countries, and my best wishes go with him. I am of the opinion that Canada stands to gain therefrom and I hope that the Prime Minister sees to it that the word "peace" is not merely an expression to be used right and left, without ever knowing where it should be applied. May it be used everywhere, in Rhodesia as elsewhere, and let there be an end to restrictions pressed upon people who probably deserve them no more than others who are at present not affected by them.

Let there be mutual understanding and cordiality, and above all let Canada make the most of its influence on Commonwealth countries as well as on the nations of the world.

• (12:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that with all of the concern and advice expressed to the right hon. Prime Minister he will not have very much difficulty at the conference of prime ministers next week. I suppose there may be some disagreement on the part of the prime ministers of Australia and New Zealand, so far as the advice given about Viet Nam by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) is concerned, in view of their stake in the southeast Asia situation. I can imagine as well that it will be difficult to get agreement among the leaders of the governments of the African Commonwealth countries.

It is with sorrow and a heavy heart that we look back at the last eight months and realize that a number of the men who would normally have been representatives of countries such as Nigeria are no longer alive as a result of two military coups that have taken place. Likewise there has been an upheaval in Ghana. The whole situation as to alignment or non-alignment with the great powers of the world is certainly not as fixed as it was a year ago.

I am sure the Prime Minister will be a little confused as a result of some of the remarks of the Leader of the Official Opposition who talked about three Commonwealth prime ministers' conferences held this year. If my memory serves me right, this is merely the second conference. The July conference that was to follow the January conference held in Lagos was postponed because of disagreement and lack of clarity so far as the problems in Rhodesia were concerned, so really this is the second conference of the Commonwealth prime ministers to be held this year rather than the third. Whether it is the third or second conference, Mr. Speaker, the grim realities of the world situation faced by the commonwealth prime ministers are something that do not give reason for very much cheer or optimism so far as the future of the world is concerned.

I only wish to say to the Prime Minister at this time that the most important thing in the Commonwealth and in the world is reasonable judgment and understanding by literate men of good will. There is no magic formula that will solve the problems of Rhodesia and Viet Nam. There is no easy way out of these problems. What we need in the world is balance, and that can only come from men of good judgment and understanding who fully appreciate the problems and what is at stake.

When we consider the situation in Africa and realize how interdependent these countries are so far as their economies are concerned, when we look at the history of the world during the last few years, and listen to the cries of uhuru and peace, when we consider the responsibilities of governments and administrations that must make decisions, it is easy to understand why this conference will not be an easy one. It will be difficult for the Prime Minister in his particular position as leader of a country which is respected, and for which there is great affection to give leadership during the deliberations that will take place and at the same time give consideration to every country's problems.

The fact that Zambia is as dependent as she is upon Rhodesia and Rhodesia upon Zambia and the fact that colour of skin and racial problems are not solved just by the declaration of high sounding principles point to the soberness and importance of this conference. These facts also point to the need for getting together and talking things over on a reasonable basis. If that requires another conference this year at which this kind of discussion can take place, then let us have another one, because as long as people are talking and trying to understand each other there is hope that some kind of satisfactory arrangement can be made.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, let me say in regard to the problems of Rhodesia that reason must be applied. The changing of so-called illegal governments by the normal process of democratic elections in countries such as Rhodesia is something that just cannot happen. There must be a period of time during which Rhodesia can be properly prepared for the processes of a true democracy, and this is something that will only result from the efforts of literate men and women who have some background in the administration of public affairs. If that can be done I am sure that Rhodesia as well as other African countries can live in harmony. In this way I am sure that some answer can be found to the problems which relate to black and white, underdeveloped, senior and junior Commonwealth countries and, indeed, perhaps even to the Viet Nam situation.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, personally and on behalf of our party I wish the Prime Minister and his staff well in the deliberations they face. I say again that we understand the importance of this meeting and the tremendous weight of the problems to be faced. We trust that, as has been characteristic of Commonwealth prime ministers and Commonwealth countries, men coming together to talk over their problems will be able to come to some reasonable solution and that step by step men and nations will be led forward in order that we may obtain the proper and full development of our resources both material and human.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR IN RAILWAY DISPUTE

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that, under the authority of section 9 of the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act, I, as Minister of Labour, have appointed Mr. Carl Goldenberg, Q.C., as the mediator to take charge of the mediation proceedings in the pending dispute between the rail unions and management.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Goldenberg has already started his work. He has copies of the five conciliation board reports and he is now studying them. He will be in Ottawa at the beginning of next week, after he has studied the reports, to discuss the matters on which I gave certain assurances yesterday and also to discuss whether at this stage associate mediators may or may not be necessary.

I think the people of Canada are very fortunate to have obtained the services of a man with Mr. Goldenberg's background and reputation in the field of conciliation and mediation in labour disputes. In the minds of labour and management he is one of our most highly respected mediators and conciliation board chairmen. I should like to express publicly the thanks, I am sure, of every member of this house to Mr. Goldenberg for taking on this very important task at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CONSIDERATION OF TRANSPORTATION BILL

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be permitted at this stage of the proceedings to say a word about the procedure that would be followed after the orders of the day, in response to the very constructive attitude taken last evening by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton). I should like to draw attention to the words he used:

> The proposal I want to make, which apparently we will be able to consider overnight, follows other precedents in the house. I want to move at the end of my remarks, which I presume will be tomorrow morning, that the subject matter of Bill No. C-231 be referred to the standing committee on transportation, provided however that despite this motion the said bill shall remain on the order paper as an order for second reading without prejudice to the right to make or proceed with the motion for second reading.
> What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, for the consideration of the party leaders or house leaders of the various parties is that before we can intelligently vote on the many principles which are inherent in this omnibus legislation we might be able to speed up things quite a bit if we were to move straight into committee stage, before continuing our full debate on the principle. I intend to make in the committee stage, if I am allowed, some proposals which I think can speed up the lengthy debate that I foresee on two sections of the bill.

I can assure the hon. gentleman and the house that the government agrees completely with the desire to proceed urgently with this measure, particularly because of the relationship it has to the negotiations to which the Minister of Labour has just referred. I am not able to accept the actual suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle because we have had one or two experiences of that kind of procedure. In the first place, it requires unanimous consent because it is quite contrary to our rules. In the second place, I am still scarred from an experience three years ago—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Scared.

Mr. Pickersgill: —when I agreed to do this in relation to another bill. I would point out that in this bill clause 1 is not the short title but is a substantive clause. It is a clause that contains the main principles on which the transportation policy is based. This would therefore enable a pretty ample debate after second reading and committee stage when we came back to committee of the whole. I believe that at the committee stage we could iron out many of the difficulties the hon. gentleman suggested and no one would be denied any opportunity for the fullest kind of debate on those issues upon which there was not already agreement.

The principle of the bill certainly does not involve the acceptance of any of the procedures, about which I can understand there are going to be some very sharp differences, and certainly I would never interpret a vote in favour of second reading of this bill as acceptance of all the procedures involved, because they could only be worked out in committee.

I was wondering, therefore, whether the hon. member's position would be met if we could proceed relatively urgently with the bill and have a relatively short debate and get second reading with the understanding that second reading was only approval of the two general principles, one that there should be a Canadian Transport Commission and, two, that there should be railway rationalization, if I may broadly put it that way. The other matters could be ironed out in committee. I have had a word or two with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you would permit him to make a reply now.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the proposal I made was based on the assumption that in this bill there are several principles which are very complicated and very frightening to us in the opposition. In making the proposal I thought we could obtain more clarification with regard to what the government intends to do, not just on the question of railway line abandonment but on the question of freight rates which has been a 30-year struggle in this country. It was on this question that I based my major concern to get some clarification from the government.

Since the government in its wisdom has decided not to accept the proposal, I would suggest that when the leaders of the parties have spoken today perhaps we could adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the house so that we could have two or three days to study the very complex bill that we have before us. I would hope, too, that the minister would use his time over the weekend to consider another proposal, namely, if we are to give effective opposition to this bill in a constructive way at the committee stage then, just as the minister admitted last night that the government has to go outside the country occasionally to obtain expert advice, I think the minister should consider giving all parties in opposition some sort of help and independent people we can draw upon to advise us on these very complicated matters. This proposal would involve the expenditure of money, which we in the opposition have no right to ask for, but if the minister would consider that as well as the other proposal I made I am sure it would be very helpful to us. I hope the minister will give my suggestions fair consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: If it is agreeable to other members of the house the government would be quite happy, after one representative of each party has spoken this afternoon, to adjourn the debate to our sitting on Tuesday to meet the suggestion of the hon. member. Since we do not sit until 2.30 on Tuesday afternoon, I would be glad to get certain of the officials together at a totally informal meeting where they could answer questions if any hon. members felt that answers to some factual questions would assist them in debating the measure more effectively and expeditiously. If this would be agreeable to the house I would ask our chief whip, after representatives of each of the parties have spoken today, to move the adjournment of the debate.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the matter is quite as simple as it was represented to be by the minister when he said that the acceptance of second reading would not mean approval of any principle other than, as he said, the appointment of a board and the rationalization of the problem that faces western Canada in particular. I think there is much more than that in this bill. He said that some haste was necessary because this bill was interlocked with the bill which the house passed yesterday. He will recall that one or both presidents of the railway companies—certainly the president of the C.P.R.—stated that this bill gives nothing to the railway companies that they do not possess already.

Mr. Pickersgill: For 1966.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Therefore this legislation will not meet the tremendous demands that will rest on the railway companies as a result of the legislation which parliament passed yesterday. As the minister knows, there are tremendous problems connected with this bill. He has given a great deal of study to it. Nobody knows better about that than a person with his responsibility.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

I understand his difficult problem but the fact has to be faced that in addition to the two points he mentioned there is an immeasurably greater problem which is that unless great changes are made in this legislation the granting of freedom to the railway companies to be virtually untrammelled in the fixation of the amount of freight rates will intensify the discrimination against the maritime provinces and western Canada and will bring about an accentuated distortion of the inequalities of today. I know that no one would suggest that such a matter can possibly be tossed aside by the acceptance of second reading, and I think the minister has come up with a very good suggestion. He accepted what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has said and after having heard the views of several parties he dealt with this matter at length and in a very capable way except when he discussed the Prime Minister's retractions or retreats. I could not quite understand why he brought that subject up last night. Aside from that he covered the situation in a way which I am sure all members of the house would agree was complete and thorough.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that after having heard the representatives of the various parties express their views on this matter the adjournment of the house until Tuesday will have a dual effect, one being that we would be able to study the matter and the other that those who wish to return home for the week end will be able to take Hansard with them and study it while away from Ottawa.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one related question? If we are making special arrangements regarding the number of speakers today, should we not hear from the minister and from the house leader what the government has in mind about the hours of sitting? For example, if we decide to take up something that will not require the full day, what will we be considering for the rest of the day? Maybe there is a necessity or desire for a cabinet meeting, in which case we might adjourn for the lunch hour.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in view of what has been said, and there have been some requests for this, I suggest that we rise at one o'clock for the regular lunch hour from 1 p.m. to 2.30 p.m., then resume the sitting and carry on until the debate is finished at which time we would follow the suggestion of the Minister of Transport and adjourn the house.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I just have one or two points to make. I also wish to receive the assurance of the minister on a point regarding the procedure he has outlined.

I want to say at the outset that with regard to our consideration of this bill I would have preferred the course outlined by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton). However, I am aware of the need for unanimous consent and of some other problems arising from the suggested motion which have been mentioned by the Minister of Transport.

One thing about which I am concerned is that the minister said the only principles we would be adopting would be whether or not there should be a transport commission and whether a railway rationalization procedure should be established. However, as has been pointed out there is a principle of equal and perhaps greater importance involved in this bill and that is the matter of rate-making. This principle appears throughout the bill. I ask the minister whether he could provide us with some costs to allow us to do some calculations regarding various commodities because the whole bill appears to support a cost-plus rate structure for all non-competitive traffic.

This principle permeates the entire bill. I therefore wish to ask for an assurance from the minister that we will not be prevented, either in the standing committee or when this bill returns to the house, from moving amendments which may turn out to be in violation of the principle that may have been adopted in these formulae. Even if we spend most of next week on it I am afraid members of this house simply cannot possibly understand what is meant by this new principle of rate-making unless some figures are supplied to us. If the Minister of Transport could give us an assurance that we will get some of these costs and also an assurance that he will accept reasonable amendments to what may be a new principle of rate-making even though we adopt the bill in principle on second reading, then we could agree to his suggestion.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am happy to give the assurance, sir, that within the ambit of the bill itself the government, as I thought I said last night and, if not, as I intended to say, does not feel that all wisdom is contained in the bill, and any amendments that seem likely to improve the procedure will certainly not meet with our objection on any technical grounds.

Mr. Olson: Will the minister give us his undertaking that we can get some of the costs on which the formula is based?

Mr. Pickersgill: That will certainly be one of the elements.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, this is improper.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed the house will suspend its sitting between 1 p.m. and 2.30 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF NATIONAL PARKS, ETC.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the house to make a motion pertaining to additional authority being given to the standing committee on northern affairs and national resources?

Mr. Knowles: What is it?

Mr. Churchill: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us hear what it is before we agree to it.

Mr. Laing: I am quite certain the house will find it agreeable. The motion is as follows:

That the standing committee on northern affairs and national resources, in addition to the powers granted to it on July 13, 1966 be empowered to obtain further information relating to matters and projects dealing with national parks and historic parks and sites;

That, for this purpose, the said committee be authorized to sit while the house is sitting or during adjournment of the house and to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the clerk of the said committee and the necessary supporting staff accompany the said committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent to this motion?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There is no consent to the motion.

Proposed Legislation

MANITOBA-SASKATCHEWAN BOUNDARY ACT

DECLARATION OF BOUNDARY LINE SURVEYED AND MARKED

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-45 (from the Senate), respecting the boundary between the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SASKATCHEWAN-NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BOUNDARY ACT

DECLARATION OF BOUNDARY LINE SURVEYED AND MARKED

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-46 (from the Senate), respecting the boundary between the province of Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MANITOBA-NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BOUNDARY ACT

DECLARATION OF BOUNDARY LINE SURVEYED AND MARKED

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-47 (from the Senate), respecting the boundary between the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA LAND SURVEYS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXAMINATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the first reading of Bill. No. S-48 (from the Senate), to amend the Canada Land Surveys Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEVEN TRUSCOTT—REQUEST FOR AID IN DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question which arises because of the continuing interest, as evidenced by correspondence received, in the Truscott case. When will this case come before the Supreme Court of Canada and, second, is provision to be made for Truscott to have available to him the evidence or at least the advice and counsel of an alienist or alienists at the expense of the people of Canada? I think it would be helpful and very beneficial if this could be provided.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter is now in the hands of the courts and I am sure no one knows better than the right hon. gentleman that it would be improper if there were any interference on the part of the Solicitor General at this stage. I am advised, and this is subject to confirmation but I believe it to be true, that counsel for Mr. Truscott has been in communication with the court on the matter, through motions, and they are working out a procedure to bring on the action at the appropriate moment before the Supreme Court of Canada.

The government has fulfilled its commitment to the house to arrange for the financial reimbursement of expenses incurred by counsel in the course of the defence. I believe the matter is well in hand. Mr. Truscott has eminent counsel representing him and it is my understanding subject to confirmation, as I say, that it is proceeding as agreed by counsel and the court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When is it expected to proceed?

Mr. Pennell: I understand it will be heard reasonably early in the new court term commencing this fall. This is a matter, of course, for the Supreme Court. Apart from that, I have nothing further to add except to say I am confident the matter will be dealt with in a manner in keeping with the spirit of justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there will be no misunderstanding, I was not suggesting any action before the Supreme Court. The matter is before the court. I was asking whether or not, as part of the financial responsibility of the department, provision is being made not only for the payment of counsel but also for necessary expenses for the provision of alienists and the like, if considered proper by counsel for the condemned man?

Mr. Pennell: I appreciate the right hon. gentleman's natural interest and concern in the matter. It is my understanding Mr. Truscott now has two counsel, senior and junior, assisting him. There was a meeting between officials of the Solicitor General's department, the Department of Justice and counsel to arrange the financial terms. I believe they are satisfactory to Mr. Truscott's counsel.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is his intention to table the Donald report on coal mining in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention to table this report. The government, however, has not yet completed its study. The report has been under study now for some time and when that study is complete the report will be tabled, probably accompanied by some statement from the government.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question? Is it the government's intention to pay the $25 million for the stabilization of the coal industry in Nova Scotia before tabling the report or is this to be left until after the report has been studied?

Mr. Sharp: This is not my particular responsibility, Mr. Speaker; it is the responsibility of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I should like to say in general that it is my understanding the government intends to fulfil its commitment.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys when some announcement will be made with respect to the $25 million for the stabilization of the coal industry in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the last part of the sentence uttered by the Minister of Finance was really an answer. This will be part of the policy which will be announced. I might add to what he said by giving the reason the report cannot be made public before about mid-September. The necessary number of copies are not yet available, and when they are available the report will be made public.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CREAM SUBSIDY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture concerning the payments made directly by cheque to farmers with regard to the new milk price support program.

Could the minister tell us why the cream shippers are paid only every three months, since, regardless of the nature of goods received, whether it be milk or cream, processing plants have to report within the same period of time?

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot indicate the period for which the cheques are issued. We have gone into this matter carefully and the data processing equipment and cheque issuing equipment just does not make this possible. We have tried every way to see to it that the cheque itself would indicate the period for which it was given, but we have found this is not possible. We are now investigating the possibility of at least issuing an annual statement to each farmer at the end of the year to indicate to him what period each cheque represented so that at least at the end of the year he would have some accounting of the cheques he had received.

With respect to the cream shippers being paid every three months, the difficulty is that up until this year cream shippers had never been registered with the stabilization board because they had received no direct payments from the government. Accordingly, it is taking some time to assemble the data from the various plants, and during this period the stabilization board feels it can only pay every three months. There is considerable difficulty in getting all the data from the various plants. I believe there are something like 265,000 farmers who are receiving payments. When the information is sufficiently complete and when our statistics are sufficiently complete, we hope that the three-month period for the payments to cream shippers will be improved upon and we will be able to pay more often than every three months.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ARDA PROJECTS IN KOOTENAY DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Forestry. I apologize for not giving him notice but the matter has just been brought to my attention. Are any surveys being undertaken by officials of the minister's department or the Department of Agriculture in the famous Kootenays with a view to the development of an ARDA program at the present time?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): This must be the Canada land inventory, Mr. Speaker.

CONSIDERATION OF PROBLEMS OF INCREASED PRODUCTION COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the government under study the special problems posed in regard to farm income levels resulting from increasing costs of production, and when is it expected that legislation will be available to meet these problems?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is an important question of far reaching policy which will be announced in due course.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT TO MEET REPORTED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Labour in his capacity of reporting to the house for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In view of the fact it was reported yesterday that a controller in the city of Toronto said that city is facing a housing shortage more serious than that of the second world war, I would ask the minister whether the government is currently seriously considering changes in housing policy?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the question of housing in Toronto and in other parts of Canada is under continuous study by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Ontario Housing Corporation and other interested bodies. If there is to be any change in government policy it will be announced in due course, but I might say that none is expected in the near future.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact it has been reported that housing starts are down 26 per cent from the comparable period last year, can we expect this announcement in the very near future?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I said that I did not expect to make any announcement in the near future in connection with this matter.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that wartime babies are now young married couples who are looking for homes, can the Canadian people not expect the announcement very soon?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The third question is argumentative.

POWER

LOCATION OF ATLANTIC TIDAL POWER PROGRAMMING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in connection with the recent announcement that the head office of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board will be located in Halifax. May I ask the minister whether consideration was given to any other location in another area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Many eloquent representations were received but the decision was taken to go to Halifax. It was taken on technical grounds. My department already has an establishment there; computer services are available and transportation is a little easier.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question. Would it not have been better to have a location such as Saint John, which is closer to the area and would be more interested in this development than Halifax?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that question too is argumentative.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REPORTED SELECTION OF YELLOWKNIFE AS CAPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the recent radio and newspaper reports that the Carrothers commission has recommended that Yellowknife be selected as the capital of the Northwest Territories, would the minister confirm or deny these reports? If they are true, is the minister now prepared to make known the other recommendations of the commission?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, Dean Carrothers presented me with a copy of the report the other day in addition to nine other copies. I and my department are in possession of all copies of the report. We have made no statement on the contents of the report, nor have I been asked to by anyone. It is not within my capacity to have any control over speculative stories, but this story is pure speculation.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of a question asked earlier by the hon. member for Northwest Territories.

I should like to ask the minister when he intends to bring an end to speculative reports about when the Carrothers report will be tabled in the house.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have told the house already it was my desire to table the report at once but that I was anxious also that I should be able to table the French version at the same time. We now are in the process of seeing whether or not we can obtain a condensed summary in French, in which case I think we will be presenting it to the house at an early date rather than wait for the full translation which may take six weeks.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the fact that the former premier of Quebec, Mr. Lesage, made a statement concerning the Labrador border and I quote from today's Le Devoir:

> Only one last solution remains, military occupation.

Is it the intention of the government to set up an inquiry into the matter of the Labrador border or to prepare a bill such as we find on the order paper today, to determine the Labrador border as to what part belongs to Newfoundland and what part belongs to Quebec?

[English]

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR HIGHER INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked the Minister of Finance whether or not the government was actively considering increasing the initial payment on wheat and he replied that it was. Inasmuch as the Canadian Wheat Board has just begun or is about to begin the authorization of initial payments on wheat that has been delivered in the new crop year, can the minister tell the house whether or not there will be a change before the payments are commenced so as to avoid having to make retroactive payments?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter, which as the hon. gentleman said I mentioned in the house the other day, is under study as a result of representations received from various parties. These representations are not all on the same side and I do not expect that there will be an early decision.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he any information to give to the house about the proposed increase in tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Not at the present time, sir.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN METHOD OF JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received from the Canadian Bar Association a report of the discussions and the resolutions passed at their recent convention concerning the appointment of judges and, if so, are they being studied by his department?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there has been no communication from the Canadian Bar Association, though I have been following their activities through newspaper reports. I can assure the hon. member that consideration will be given to this aspect of their deliberations.

FINANCE

VANCOUVER, B.C.—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the province of British Columbia applied for financial assistance in the construction of a highway to cross the national harbour in Vancouver?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Davis: A supplementary question. Can the same general principles which applied in the construction of the new bridge over the harbour at Saint John, New Brunswick, be applied in this case in Vancouver?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is out of order.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON BRIDGE APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received representations from the associated chambers of commerce of the lower mainland of British Columbia urging action on the proposed bridge approaches to the Vancouver international airport? If so, what action is he taking?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received many representations about this very important matter, and I am giving it the most urgent consideration I can.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

R.C.A.F.—MAINTENANCE OF AIRCRAFT USED TO TRANSPORT PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of National Defence an answer to the question I asked him the other day in regard to aircraft carrying military cadets to Vernon, B.C.?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question, no service aircraft has been identified as having been involved in any flight involving the transport of military cadets during which an emergency arose. My departmental officials advise me that the aircraft used to transport these cadets was operated by TransAir of Winnipeg under contract to the department. I presume that is the incident to which the hon. member was referring. TransAir has advised that the incident referred to is presumed to be that of a DC-6 on July 18, which 13 minutes after take-off from Winnipeg en route to Penhold returned to Winnipeg owing to excessive loss of oil in one engine.

In reply to the second part of the hon. member's question, there has been no evidence of deterioration in the quality of servicing and maintenance of aircraft in the R.C.A.F. On the contrary, a steady decrease has been noted during the past three years in the percentage of aircraft incidents attributed to errors on the part of maintenance personnel. I hope I said "decrease" the first time because that is what is in my script and that is what is in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys—

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have some questions to ask of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Lee, none of whom is present. I think we should wait until 2.30.

An hon. Member: They were here until one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I am in the hands of the house. If the house wishes to continue the question period at 2.30, that will be done. It being one o'clock—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, in view of the arrangements that were made about the debate, if it would not be possible to sit for a few minutes more to finish the question period?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want to ask some questions.

Mr. Barnett: I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but he is not here.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I had a question to ask before the hon. member and you had recognized me.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the order made earlier this day the sitting of this house is suspended until 2.30 this afternoon.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 1.05 p.m. the sitting of the house was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

POWER

QUEBEC—CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR STATION IN NICOLET COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys which will undoubtedly be of interest to the parliamentary correspondent of the newspaper Le Soleil.

Could the minister tell us if he has quite recently had talks with the premier of Quebec about the construction of a thermonuclear plant which is to be set up in Bécancour, in the riding of Nicolet, and can he tell the house if the project will be carried out in the near future?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, both governments have now formally agreed to that project and press releases to that effect are issued today in Ottawa and Quebec city.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Choquette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister tell the house if an agreement is expected between Quebec Hydro and the Atomic Energy of Canada and when it is to be signed?

Mr. Pepin: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that agreement will now be put on paper, but what mattered most was to get the two governments to agree.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that the by-election in the constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska and the announcement made today are purely coincidental, may I ask the minister when the decision was made to build this atomic energy plant in that constituency?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I think there were three phases or three steps, if you want to put it that way. The first one was in May, 1965, if my memory is good. At that date there was an agreement in principle between the then premier of the province of Quebec and the Minister of Industry who announced it in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that arrangement made?

Mr. Pepin: In May, 1965.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What year?

Mr. Pepin: 1965.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, and you waited until there was the coincidence of a by-election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Choquette: We don't need that; we are sure to win.

Mr. Winkler: You know better than that.

Mr. Pepin: Then, the second step, in May of this year agreement was reached on the location, and now the third step, this is a report on the agreement between the two governments. The fourth step will be an arrangement or agreement between Hydro-Quebec and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I would dare say that the Leader of the Opposition should not be giving a partisan meaning to my announcement of to-day, because I am quite sure that the new premier of the province of Quebec will not be looking at it in the same light.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the agreement was made in 1965 and the announcement is made now. That is its own answer. I would ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Pepin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking him for the answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pepin: I do not think the implication should be let go in that way. What was arrived at in May, 1965, was an agreement in principle—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh yes?

Mr. Pepin: —and it was understood from the beginning that this agreement in principle would be followed by the necessary research—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see.

Mr. Pepin: —in order to find out if new improvements could be made—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Political?

Mr. Pepin: —on techniques.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not really a question of privilege. It is a matter of debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to bring up anything that is controversial. I would ask the minister this: What is the present position with regard to the Brinco agreement, and if the Brinco agreement is not signed what arrangements are envisaged regarding the electricity that will be produced?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it is well known by constitutionalists—the right hon. gentleman knows this very well—that, notwithstanding the fact that the federal government has jurisdiction to intervene in matters of this kind, by convention the National Energy Board has never tried to intervene in matters of this kind between two provinces. This is the practice in the Canadian constitutional system. We have not been party to the negotiations and we are not at the moment party to the negotiations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So far as the National Energy Board is concerned did the government not reverse its decision the other day with regard to the shipment of gas by Trans-Canada?

Mr. Pepin: The decision to reverse the decision of the energy board was not based on constitutional matters.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosthern.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, a further question to the minister—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest that we go on to another question now. The hon. member for Rosthern.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: One last question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who has been very kind to me. I was going to add whose smile is almost as graceful as that of the Minister of Finance.

I would like to ask the minister if he can give assurance to the house that the agreement which is to come about between Quebec Hydro on one part and Atomic Energy of Canada on the other part with respect to the erection of thermonuclear plants is in any way related to the fate of the proposed steel complex for Bécancour?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, from the beginning, I believe these were two separate projects and they should not be confused.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF STANDARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to the Canada Assistance Plan and its application in the various provinces. Could the minister tell us whether he has had any complaints from the province of Saskatchewan with regard to the lowering of the standards of assistance under the new plan compared with what was said before the plan was passed?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not recall receiving any complaints and I do not think there is a basis for any complaint on the grounds suggested.

Mr. Nasserden: As a supplementary question, is it possible for a province to bring in regulations that would have the effect of making it more difficult for people to secure assistance than it was before the Canada Assistance Plan was passed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now asking for what is tantamount to a legal opinion, and I do not think the question is proper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SPENCE ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who appears to be Acting Prime Minister, in I hope a very temporary capacity. I should like to ask the minister when the report of Commissioner Spence will be tabled in the house. I understand that the report unofficially has been in the possession of the government for some time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the allegations of the hon. gentleman are untrue. The report has not been delivered to the government and therefore it would not be possible at this stage for the government to table it in the house.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not like to get involved in semantics, but when the minister says that the report has not been officially delivered to the government, would he tell us whether any copy has unofficially reached the hands of the government?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not believe any such thing has happened. Certainly nothing of that kind has happened to my knowledge.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Thursday, September 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, last night in my remarks on second reading of this bill, because of the possibility that we would be called to the other place I had time to make only one or two general observations in an effort to highlight what I think is the significance of the big change in the situation now from what it was at the time of the MacPherson report. Today I should like to develop my thoughts in a more sedate and orderly manner than was possible last night. In 1964 when the resolution in respect of Bill C-120 was on the order paper I had a discussion with various members of the government at which time it was intimated that the bill which was being introduced at that time was the bill of the previous government with some improvement. I spoke on behalf of the opposition and indicated general support of those principles. At that time I warned that when the bill was presented to us we would be very wary of it, but outside of that I think it can be said that generally I gave approval to the idea that now is the time to take a big new look at the whole question of railway legislation in this country.

In my speech on that occasion I outlined the history of railway development in Canada. I pointed out how in the course of time the application of flat freight rate increases across the country had affected the prairie areas and the maritimes. It was this unjust discrimination in rates that caused so much dissension in our country for so long, and as a government we were determined to halt it. We set up the royal commission on transportation in 1959. The fundamental job of this commission was to examine the whole railway structure in Canada in the light of the present development of our country in an effort to lay down ground rules so that the railways could operate efficiently in Canada and at the same time end this discrimination in respect of rates in various regions.

Those were the fundamental purposes of the royal commission on transportation headed eventually by Mr. MacPherson. In 1964 we were beginning to feel that the recommendations of the MacPherson report had to be modified because of the fact that they left up in the air any practical way of achieving the objectives of that report. In 1964 our attention was concentrated on the question of rationalization of railway management and operation primarily in the prairies where the greatest problems lay.

When the bill was produced in 1964 it was immediately very clear that the ideas we on this side of the house had were not being implemented. We had felt that if there was some way of getting the two major railways in western Canada to rationalize their efforts, then not only would there be more efficient railway transportation in the prairies but also the necessity of always claiming there were losses on the Crowsnest pass rates would end.

One of the greatest myths ever promulgated in this country is that the railway shippers in Canada are asked to subsidize the movement of western grain into world markets. This myth was finally destroyed last night when the minister accepted the proposition of no losses and said that is why they took the subsidies out of the bill. So at this moment I am speaking to those in central Canada who have lived comfortably all these years with the myth that they were subsidizing the movement of western grain into world markets. This has now been exposed as a myth. This is one of the points I wished to make.

In so far as the rationalization provisions of the 1964 bill are concerned, they failed because of a very simple fact. A rationalization board was set up and at the time the rationalization board was given no power to deal with anything. Therefore we had to point out that this was a complete farce from the point of view of trying to fool the people into believing that there was going to be a rational operation of our railways in western Canada.

Recommendations for the improvement of railway operations in western Canada have been made for over 30 years. Very few of these recommendations have been accepted. Many of us have come to the conclusion that until there is leadership provided by the government or parliament in directing the railways of this country, particularly in western Canada, to run on a rational basis they will not be run on that basis but will continue the inefficient practices that have been developed.

No one wants to go back and rehash the history of the railway companies in western Canada. Suffice it to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway, which first entered that area, over the years has developed what could be described as a reasonably efficient and integrated system. As a result of the enthusiasm on the part of the railway companies at the turn of the century and the ability of the prairie provinces to produce agricultural products they built railway lines all over the country. That is what precipitated the railway building spree. Lines moved in all directions. If one company built a line it was duplicated by another company, and we have had to pay for this situation for two generations.

This is the time to end this hodgepodge railway operation in western Canada. At this time when we are considering this legislation I am sure most of us agree that we desire forward progress and an end to this hodgepodge operation. The bill presented to the house in 1964 gave no power to the rationalization board to deal with this situation. Instead of rationalization all the board did was to turn over an application for abandonment to the Board of Transport Commissioners. Then traditionally, as always has been the case, the board accepted the railway figures.

Railway operational costing is so complicated that as yet there is no accurate system acceptable to experts. We had a bill before us in 1964 which turned over the whole question of whether a line would be abandoned, and whether the government or the taxpayers would pay a subsidy to keep the line in operation, to the board of transport commissioners. This was bad legislation because it only dealt with the question whether a line from point A to point B was paying or not paying and whether it should be abandoned or subsidized by the taxpayers. That did not provide an answer.

We intended that this rationalization board should have the power to look at each area of the prairie provinces where there was a duplication of railway services, railways running parallel for miles because they did not wish to use each other's lines, and decide whether there was an anomaly. We thought this board had the power to direct the railway companies to run these lines efficiently and within limits of ordinary common sense. We were convinced that once this took place there would be no railway line in western Canada that was not running at a profit.

In my speech in 1964 I made the proposal, even before I saw the bill, that we should divide western Canada into areas. The bill before us has accepted that principle. Since the bill of 1964 was presented our knowledge has increased and the principles envisaged at that time are no longer the right ones. The concept of the bill now before us incorporates a better idea so far as lines in western Canada are concerned.

We are now aware that most of the railway lines in western Canada are not only economical but produce a profit because of the tremendous increase in transported goods in the last two years. That does not necessarily mean that the railways are now making money. Let us not allow these anomalies to continue because of the operation of unnecessary lines. We could reduce costs even more than they have been reduced in recent years and effect greater profits.

Last night I said I hoped the railways would use the potential increase in profits to purchase new equipment and to make railway employees' wages equivalent to those being paid in similar types of industry. For generations we have asked railway employees in this country to refrain from seeking to have their wages grow in pace with the country's wealth and in pace with other sections of the economy. During the last few years we thought the railway industry was dying.

The third general suggestion I made last night was that we expect the railways to make this major change in thinking as a result of which not only will higher profits result but better wages, better equipment and lower freight rates. When the railways eventually adopt the concept of expansion it will follow in a rational way that rates can be reduced, resulting in more business.

Having reviewed railway history in a minor way let me now indicate that during past debates and discussions of this situation I have tried to be helpful. This is the time we should think in terms of action based on straight thinking. Let me put on record some ideas which I think will help this house to think along these lines.

Bill C-231 is a much improved bill compared with Bill C-120 presented to the house in 1964. The minister deserves congratulations because he has tried to understand this very complex situation and has put into this bill wording which indicates that new concepts are developing. This is indicated by the measure now before us.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must be honest and say I do not think it will help management, labour or shippers unless we propose ideas during this debate or at the committee stage which are practical and helpful. Before I attempt to do so let me remind the minister of what I said briefly last night. One or two principles embodied in this measure terrify me. The first relates to freight rates, and I will deal with that subject in greater detail in a moment or two.

A very real difference is developing in thinking regarding rationalization in order to remove the fear of western Canada about line abandonment. I am sure the minister knows the situation I have in mind. What are the new facts regarding this new concept? Railways are not declining as a mode of transport any longer. The change began in 1961. The one thing more than anything else which reversed that thought was the commencement of grain sales to China and other eastern European countries. Railways are no longer declining as an efficient method of transportation. It took some time after 1961 for us to realize that changes were taking place. Let me list some of the changes that have occurred.

I quoted these figures in a hurry last night and I should like to re-emphasize them. Using round figures, though I am sure the experts will not quarrel with them, as late as 1958 approximately 400 million bushels of grain were moved out of western positions. In the crop year just completed over 800 million bushels of grain were moved. The significance of these figures when applied to railway hauling can only be understood if one recognizes that the greatest part of the cost of running a railway is fixed. It does not make any difference whether no trains run or a great many trains run; there are certain fixed costs.

In my early days of studying railway economics we used to use the rough figure of 60 per cent or 70 per cent as representing the fixed costs of a railway operation. I have no recent figures but I hope to get them. If 70 per cent of the costs are fixed and you suddenly double the tonnage of goods being moved on the railway, the proportion of fixed costs drops away down and your profits rise tremendously. This can be demonstrated most dramatically in charts to show what happens to the cost per unit of freight hauled.

The movement of grain is in itself only a single fact in the new situation, but being such a large bulk product it is a very important part of our economy. Just a few years ago we in some parts of western Canada used to generate 20,000 or 25,000 bushels of grain per mile. Now in these same areas it is over 80,000 bushels per mile. A revolution has taken place in respect of this one item. Because of these facts we must make sure that in the parliament of our country we legislate on the basis of a growing, expanding industry and do not legislate to share the poverty of a dying industry.

The second point I want to make concerns the huge increase in goods that flow back from the central provinces into the prairies. This development has occurred in the last five or six years. We must recognize the tremendous number of dollars of new earning power that has poured into the prairies since 1961, first of all from the sale of the great quantities of unused and unsold grain and, second from the tremendous crops we grew in 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965 and, I trust, with God's help in this year 1966. These tremendous sales of grain and increased income have meant that a tremendous increase in purchasing power has poured into the central provinces and British Columbia. As a consequence our trains are carrying a tremendous back-haul of goods from the central areas of our country into the prairies. The importance of this situation is that when the railways are hauling goods both ways the amount of profit rises in a general ratio rather than in a direct line proportion. I wish I had the time and statistical staff to put before the house the extent to which this back-haul has grown in the last five years.

Third, Mr. Speaker, on the point that the railways are not a declining mode of transport I would refer also to potash, a new product. Potash is one of the three main fertilizers needed to keep our land productive in order to feed the people of the world. Potash is not needed for Canadian soils at the present time, at least, not in western Canada because our soils are too new and it will probably be a century before we have to use potash in order to restore the fertility of that land. But the great continents of the world, Asia, for example, where civilization has existed for 3,000, 4,000 or 5,000 years, need this product. The old continent of Africa needs it as do the newer areas of civilization in western Europe. South American and other areas with teeming millions are not as productive on the land as they should be and there is an increasing need for potash.

These vast areas of the world need the potash that is buried under the soil of the province of Saskatchewan and to some extent in Alberta and Manitoba. At the present time our production of potash is approximately 2 million tons a year but by 1970, with markets that are already known, the need for potash exports out of the west coast will be at least 4 million tons, and certainly between 1970 and 1975 the export of potash from the prairies to the west coast alone will have reached 7 million tons. This is on the basis of known markets, and the figures I have quoted do not include any figure for China where 700 million people now live. By 1980 the population of China will be 1 billion people. In the south of that country they grow three crops a year. One crop has to be wasted in growing grain fertilizer in the form of clover. In the north of that country they grow two crops a year, one of which is used for fertilizer. Chemical fertilizing alone will increase production in southern China by a third and in northern China by half. Here we have a market in addition to the markets I have already indicated. This will demonstrate to the house the tremendous movement of bulk products in Canada to our coasts.

I am sorry I do not have any estimates for the movement of this product to the south, the eastern markets and the markets of Europe and Africa. I am only positive of one thing, that they will be there, and I am sure that unless we learn new techniques in the next few years, for a good while at least these products will be carried by rail cars. I know of the work being done in connection with pipe lines. However, in potash alone the demand is tremendous. The only way I can explain this sensibly and make it understandable is by comparing it with a product we all know, namely, wheat. Those who have seen the hundreds of railway trains carrying our wheat to market will realize that an equal number of trains will be required to carry potash and they will have an idea of the expansion that will take place in western Canada in this connection.

I have dealt with potash, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to overlook the fact that products like sulphur, a by-product of our oil and gas wells, are now in great demand all over the world. I believe that just a year ago one million tons of sulphur went through the port of Vancouver. I would suggest that in this item alone there will be a tremendous tonnage in the future. We know that Japan wants our coal and that Japan and other nations want many of our mineral ores in concentrated form. We know there is a great demand in many parts of the world for our l.p.p. fuels, butane, propane, methane and so on. Although many of these fuels are carried in pipe lines, a great quantity is still carried by rail.

• (3:10 p.m.)

To give hon. members an illustration of the attitude on the part of railway management that we have to fight, I mention the Pine Point Railway. In 1958 the then prime minister of our country announced in Winnipeg a ten-point, over-all development program. One of these points concerned the building of a railroad to the south shore of Great Slave Lake. I well recall the laughs and mockery at that time. Some said it was a vision.

Let me relate to the house the significance of Pine Point not only to the development of new wealth in this country but to railway profits and operations. The Pine Point Railway runs for approximately 400 miles from Steen at the end of the Northern Alberta Railway.

The property at the end of the railway was owned at that time by a subsidiary of Cominco which is in turn a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Naturally we went to the railway and asked if they would not co-operate in building this 400 miles of line to Great Slave lake in order to haul the lead and zinc from the vast volume of reserves to help us develp not only a needed resource but also to establish an economic base and platform on which we could develop the whole Mackenzie river basin. The attitude of the Canadian Pacific Railway is well known. They refused to take part in the building of this railway. As a result the C.N.R. built the line on the guarantee of the federal government and rates were set to make the hauling of the ore from Pine Point compensatory. I believe the C.N.R. got the hauling rights for that ore down to Calgary and the C.P.R. takes it over the mountains to Kimberley and Trail.

The point I am making can best be described by giving some of the rough figures which have appeared in the press regarding the value of that mine in the first year. The mine started to operate when the railway was completed in the fall of 1964. The first full year of operations was 1965 and I think the capital cost was roughly $25 million. The profits in the first year of $22 million were sufficient to pay off most of the capital costs of the mine in that one year. The year 1966 is not over and if I read the press correctly profits on the Pine Point mine this year are running at approximately $36 million.

Here is my point, Mr. Speaker. This mine has risen in value because there was a sale for its products. Everyone was so involved with the glamour of rising stock prices that they forgot the tremendous importance to the railway economy of this movement of tonnage to the places I have named, which has made the whole fabric of railway transportation in western Canada that much stronger. It is quite clear that these mineral ores are not unimportant to the wealth of the country and to the wealth of our railways.

The second major fact I wish to emphasize is the need for more capital equipment on the railways. First of all we need more motive power to meet the expanding needs of the railways. Last year the C.P.R. leased some locomotives but now I think they should realize that what is required, with a rising demand for railway transport, is not a one-shot deal but that this demand will continue not only for transporting grain but many other commodities. We need this motive power to move a tremendous volume of goods faster and more efficiently.

We need to make use of modern technology, new grain cars and new ore cars. We still use cars with side loading for hauling grain. We started to use them in the last century and, by George, we are still using them. The building of artificial false doors, lining the cars with paper, loading the grain into the centre of the car and pushing it back require a tremendous amount of time. When the cars arrive at the terminal the same operations have to be repeated in reverse except for the fact that they have a few gadgets now to lift the grain car at each end.

I am simply suggesting that the modern type of grain car, which is open at the top, carries three times as much grain and can be dumped in a few seconds, as fast as the grain can pour out of the big opening, is one of the things that are necessary to decrease costs and increase the service to the shipper.

Another thing that we need is more new port facilities. This is in itself a whole new field. I have seen lakers on the Great Lakes carrying a million bushels of grain. They can now be unloaded in a matter of hours. Yet in some of our ports the operation takes four days. Shovels are still used to load or unload a million bushels of grain. I see in other places great boat-loading facilities and when I realize that we still continue to use the old techniques at our terminals I suggest, even though this is not dealt with in the bill, that what is needed among other things to make the railway system efficient is a complete revision of our port facilities. I suggest that this matter should be dealt with at an early opportunity.

To those of us who come from the prairies I say, without fear of contradiction, that we need a modernized country elevator system. We still use the same elevators that were used at the turn of the century. There is such a devotion to the old type of country elevator system in western Canada that it is hardly recognized that this method is costing the farmer 3 to 7 cents a bushel more than what he would be charged if we had a new system. This matter has a bearing on railway rationalization. Before you can ask the elevator companies to accelerate the building of a modern country elevator system you have to come up with a rational plan, not in 15 years but in the next year or so, whereby the companies can be told where these elevators can be built safely.

The third fact I want to put forward has to do with the question of rationalization which I have referred to once or twice before. I think I have made it clear that the government must lead and must act in this field. The bill says that the Commission may make recommendations to the railways. To me this is a waste of time. There is one section in the bill which can be utilized and which give the government power to clear up these points in a matter of two or three years. I say this power should be used.

Running rights are not new, and if I had to mention every single case in western Canada where foolishness in operation exists I would be here for many an hour speaking about it. Naturally one tends to pick the examples with which one is familiar, but when I think of some of the great areas of grain production in western Canada, the Goose Lake area, towns like Eatonia, Snipe Lake, Eston, Hughton, Forgan, Dinsmore and all the other grain towns through which a tremendous volume of grain passes, I do not need to be an expert in railway management to know that unnecessary cost is involved. The answer is so simple. For example, if we could get the C.N.R. to switch its trains to C.P.R. lines, go across the Outlook bridge and get back to the main line, that would be one case where a saving could be made. Rationalization was a new idea a few years ago but now it is a fact which we must accept. We can no longer let the railways dither and delay accepting efficient methods of operation. If we have to put up millions of dollars in subsidies for the railways we do not want to see these subsidies used for inefficient operations. This is the main point I am making. This is a new factor, and we must accept this principle of rationalization.

Another factor is productivity. I do not know how many Canadians know it but in the last few years some 12 million or 13 million acres of land in western Canada have had the bush cut off, the stumps pulled up and the land broken to produce more grain. These 12 million or 13 million acres account for more good farmland than Ontario uses. This is what these so-called broken down, small bush farmers in the west have done in the last few years. It is a revolution in itself. All the economists, all the experts have been telling these smaller farmers that they are finished. They have been saying that you have to have a great, big farm. The farmers say, we homesteaded this land or our fathers or grandfathers did and we are not going to give it up. They have cleared the bush, broken this land and now they are able to produce crops quite easily so that now we have a production of 700 million bushels plus.

The point I am trying to make is that many lines that are up for abandonment are in these areas which were not heavy grain producers a few years ago. What little grain they did produce was used to feed live-stock. Now they are areas with tremendous surpluses. A few years ago when I was the minister in charge of the Wheat Board I used to think a three or four bushel quota would clean up the grain in these areas with smaller farms. We know now that these are areas with heavy surpluses of grain. Larger quotas have cleared the grain off the big farms which were supposed to be efficient. However, the little fellow is now using machinery just as the big fellow does. He is using fertilizer and he has new land. In addition, he has an incentive to produce which he did not have five or six years ago because he knows he can sell his grain.

This means we have a new factor to consider. Many of these areas were not considered to be big revenue producers for the railway but they are now large grain producing areas. This is a new situation which I have put on the record in some detail. We have to face the fact that there is a new situation. I was hoping this bill would have indicated a realization of these new factors which are not particularly secret. They are well known. I hoped the bill would indicate a complete break with the philosophy of the past, namely, that the railways' share of the traffic was dropping from 60 per cent to 40 per cent and therefore we should ease their misery in their declining years. Instead we get a bill which, when we read the sections dealing with branch line abandonments, indicates the tortuous process we will have to go through in connection with the abandonment of lines.

If I may, I should like to take the liberty of quoting from the bill. The government is very kind to us. When lines are going to be abandoned posters are going to be put up all over the place.

Mr. Douglas: Death by inches.

Mr. Hamilton: It will be death by slow strangulation. I find one example on page 24 of the bill. It reads:

> The company shall post in each station of the branch line to be abandoned under this section and keep so posted for such period as may be prescribed by the commission a notice of any order or direction under subsection (4) or (5) made in respect of that line.

If you read the other sections, you will find they are going to give us five years of living on borrowed time. I have one other example which is found on page 32. Reading this section is like drum-fire on our sensitive nerve ends. It deals with costs and claims and reads in part as follows:

> (a) post notices at stations served by the passenger train service; and
> (b) publish notices in any paper or papers circulating in the area served by the passenger-train service.

We are going to be the best informed of any people in the world as we go to the hangman's noose. I could not help but tell the minister last night that in my opinion this bill is a pessimistic one. All I have to do to give myself nightmares is to take all the applications for railway line abandonment, take a coloured pencil and put a heavy line along those lines in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It is the most frightening map at which you can look, particularly when you estimate the number of people who are going to be affected.

Last night, therefore, I made an appeal to the minister to see to it that the situation is not hopeless. In view of the facts I have just given we should take away this fear of abandonment. We should end the long drawn out process outlined in this legislation for handling abandonments. In addition, we should increase the efficiency of railway operations so they can make more money and I hope they use some of it to pay their men additional wages and reduce freight rates.

In order to make this possible we need, in addition to what we have in the bill, more than an oral statement from the minister that his intentions are to go even farther. I should like to see a written statement from the government setting forth government policy. The branch line procedures outlined in this bill add to the fear under which we have lived for the last number of years. There are doubts about the government in western Canada. A definite and clear statement of this kind, which we knew could not be changed, would clear away one of the issues dividing us in this house. It would get these abandonments off our necks. We are going to have a big enough fight on railway freight rates without getting into a fight about railway line abandonments. I know the government has been working on this matter and I should like to get a statement of clarification so that we can vote on the other principles contained in this bill. I do not want to go into all the details but I think the minister can guess what they are.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rather easily.

Mr. Hamilton: The first thing we need is a declaration by the government that all applications for railway line abandonment in western Canada are going to be thrown out. The next thing would be to issue a list of lines on which the government would not accept applications for abandonment until 1975 or for about ten years. From the amount of use made of lines in western Canada not only for grain but for other bulk products I know the lines that will be on this first list. They will be the majority of the lines for which applications have been received for abandonment. I ask that those lines not only be taken off the list but be protected for ten years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the former minister like to ask me now?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hamilton: I have one more statement to make and then I will ask the question.

The third thing I want is an undertaking in this written statement that a plan of this kind will be undertaken in the form of a consensus arrangement in the sense that we will all know now the lines that will be considered for abandonment. Then members in this house will know how they are affected. If there is general agreement on this, then they can go forward. The ones on which there was going to be debate could go through the procedures outlined in the bill and we are prepared to accept those long procedures. Let us remove this fear of abandonment from the minds of so many thousands of our western people. My question to the minister is this. Will he consider giving an undertaking in writing to remove these applications entirely, to list the lines in relation to which no applications will be considered, and will he let us know which lines will be in doubt, so that we can begin to get down to making decisions?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is awfully good to let me intervene at this point to answer his question, and I appreciate it very much. I saw the presidents of the railways this morning, but for another reason. I took advantage of the meeting to ask them whether I might be permitted to say that on the very day on which this legislation passed they would withdraw all their existing applications for abandonment on the prairies, and that they would revise their applications in the light of the decisions made by parliament and put forward in the legislation, not as it stands at the moment necessarily but as it emerges from the committee and is passed by parliament. I was given the authority of the presidents of the railways to say that that would be done.

In other words, all those applications which are in suspension, none of which is being proceeded with, will be withdrawn on the day the legislation is completed. I think it is only fair that they should wait until then, because they would prejudice their own position if they acted and if we did not proceed with the legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would they be refiled the next day?

Mr. Pickersgill: They would only be filed on the basis of what parliament decided in the legislation which was passed.

To answer the hon. gentleman's second question, I thought I indicated in a general way last night—but I think I can be a little more specific in reply to his question—that I hope to get the approval of my colleagues to some of these things, though not perhaps before second reading because this week has not been an easy week to conduct deliberations with them. However, the government has already decided in principle that a network of railways in western Canada will be guaranteed as essential for a period of years.

Just as soon as it is possible for me to give the details I will give them to the house or to the committee and make them public. I will also give the date before which no applications under any procedures for abandonment will be considered on this essential network. As the hon. gentleman has said, I think that will accomplish the second purpose.

The inference to be drawn from this, of course, as all hon. members will realize, is that those lines which are not included in the guaranteed network will therefore be candidates for abandonment by whatever system parliament decides on. However, I think that that means that even a lot of those lines may not necessarily be abandoned. Some of them will not. However, they would not be guaranteed for the relatively long period suggested by the hon. member, or for some other similar period.

In respect to the new procedures for abandonment, I hope it will be agreed that the priority should be given to those lines that carry the least traffic, unless they are situated in an isolated area, are the only form of transport and are required there. But speaking generally, those lines carrying the least traffic will be the ones considered first.

I think that if these procedures are followed, then most of the fears that the hon. gentleman and I well know do exist in western Canada will be removed very quickly. I would be hopeful that something very like the consensus suggested by the hon. gentleman would be reached. I do not expect that we will get everybody to agree; we never can. But I think that we would make very rapid progress in this field; at least, that is my hope. I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman, as I say, who has given a great deal of study to this matter, as we all know, for giving me the opportunity to agree with him.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that the second point of the minister's statement is the key one. You have to give this guarantee in advance that for ten years, say, no more applications will be considered in respect to those lines.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton: If we are given that by the government, then I think we have achieved a great deal today.

I want to clear this matter away, because if we can handle this question in the way I think it is going to be handled, then we have all served our constituents well. However, there are still the major issues which I said were concerning us, and the issue which I touched on last night I have to deal with first. This is the question of costing.

Costing is the key to the second principle enunciated by the minister this morning. He mentioned that we should accept as a first principle that there should be a "superboard". He mentioned that he thought we should accept the principle that there should be subsidies paid for things done by the railways in the national interest which were non-compensatory as far as the railways were concerned. That is all very fine, but who decides what are the costs before we pay them? On this costing—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Hamilton: Well, will you make it brief.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. Does he not think that inevitably on the part of the government there will be a more direct and immediate interest in this matter than there has ever been in the past? Because these subsidies would have to be paid by the Minister of Finance out of the treasury, and obviously he is not going to accept anybody else's costing, except the costing of the government.

Mr. Hamilton: This is the very argument I wanted to make, but I would ask the minister to let me complete my remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize.

Mr. Hamilton: It is an imposition on me continually to have to bring my train of thought to bear on this. Costing is the key, for the simple reason that as far as we can find out there is no finally decided costing system on railroad accounting that we can allocate to each item; there is no precise percentage. We have been all through this many times before. I gave an example last night and I will give it again now.

When the railways put forward the proposition in 1959 that they were losing money on the Crowsnest rates, the prairie provinces asked for confirmation of this. The railway company hired a cost accounting firm of high reputation, they studied these figures, allocated costs to this item and to that item and said that the costs they had allocated to the Crowsnest rates, as compared with the revenue, showed a loss of $17 million on hauling western Canadian grain on Canadian Pacific lines.

This so disturbed the western prairie governments that they hired an equally competent firm, and this equally competent firm looked at the same figures, allocated amounts of money to different items in the way they thought it should be done, and showed that the C.P.R. had made a profit on hauling western grain that year. This meant that the commission was faced with two conflicting sets of figures prepared by experts, both reputable, so they hired a third firm. They looked at the figures, juggled them around, and thought that neither set was right but that probably the railways had broken even or, at the best, lost half a million.

My point is that we are going to be asked in this legislation to say that the terms of costing should be left to the Board of Transport Commissioners, or to the new body, the Canadian Transport Commission. On the past record of experience we have found over and over again that the Board of Transport Commissioners has had no choice but to accept the railway figures. The statement that the new board will set the costing does concern us. If the question of the Crowsnest rates were to be raised in this bill as it was in 1964, I was going to propose that parliament, not the cabinet or the new board, set the terms of reference for costing.

• (3:40 p.m.)

We, as laymen, do not know anything about the details of costing. When we get three firms looking at the same set of figures—three able firms I might say—and coming up with three separate answers, we had better make sure of the terms of costing used by the board when it examines these things. In my opinion we should have been prepared, in the example I gave, to have told the board that the costing for the next two years or five years should have been on the basis of the findings of the third firm, which was somewhere between the other two. In other words, parliament has the duty to protect the taxpayers of this country, and to do that parliament has to have more information, so that it can direct the limits or, if you like, say to the Canadian Transport Commission, something about the guide lines on costing. I used that example, although I know it is obsolete under this bill, because it is admitted that the Crowsnest pass rates make money for the railways and there is no need for the subsidy for that.

The same thing could apply when we come to look at passenger services. We will have to pay subsidies for passenger services which lose money, but which costing figures will we use? The minister says we will use the government's costing figures, but in the past, the government has gone to whom? It has gone, and it goes to the Board of Transport Commissioners. And what figures does the Board of Transport Commissioners use? It uses the railway's figures; so that you might as well not bother with that procedure. I am simply saying that we have a responsibility in this legislation to give some sort of directive to the transport commission which would indicate some guide lines for them to follow in deciding which costing procedure we will start with. We ought to be laying down the procedure, which they can change as they learn more from year to year. As the board gets more and more staff members, who are experts in this business, it will be able to compete with the railway economists and with the railway accountants. There may be better ideas from other quarters of the house, but I do think that on the question of costing and costing procedures the new board will have to be directed for a few years yet by parliament.

I want to add one more point to what I have said about costing. Two years ago I suggested that we should look at each of our areas in western Canada, by areas. Now I think we should make it clear in this legislation that we are going to look at the prairies as a unit, and that the railways will have to prove loss on the prairies rather than on individual lines from point A to B. All the way through this bill you see this business of costing your losses on the basis of having a starting place and a finishing place on a line. This is what sends us up the wall. At the very beginning of section 314, dealing with the matter of lines, it refers to—> —the costs incurred by the company in any financial year thereof in the operation of the line and in the movement of traffic originating or terminating on the line,

And it goes on to say:

> (ii) the revenues of the company for that year from the operation of the line and from the movement of traffic originating or terminating on the line;

This business of determining that the loss will be the loss from point A to point B means that the taxpayer is helpless, because we have no way of ascertaining for sure what the costs and revenues with respect to that line are, except by accepting the railway's figures. Therefore, to get away from this trap that is in the legislation, when considering these lines that are up for possible abandonment I think we should look at the whole thing on an area basis, and the area should be the whole region. It must be remembered that these lines that are above the marginal level in their generation of grain shipments add to the profit of other sections of the line. It is when we forget this, that we could fall into a trap, as legislators, if we accept this definition of costing in the bill. When we use figures with respect of point A and point B, what do we know? What are the real losses? We are in a complete trap and at the mercy of the railway accountant.

An hon. Member: That applies also to the costs of operating.

Mr. Hamilton: That is what I said. We can look at the revenue figures, but unless we have some way of costing, we are completely helpless. Therefore, adopting this principle in the bill of taking point A to point B, in my opinion at least, is bad. We cannot allow the taxpayers to be robbed, on a principle such as this. The only fair way to do it is to put the whole area together.

We will co-operate in getting rid of lines which are not necessary. Fortunately, there are not too many of these now. But when the matter is all rationalized, and operating, we will not give the railways a single cent until they do the things we want. In other words, there is no subsidy and no help until they rationalize their operations in all these areas, as the government directs them to. And if this rationalization procedure is not acceptable to the railways, there are no subsidies, period. That is the only language they will understand, and that is the only way to get these things done.

When I see a section such as the one I have referred to, I have to warn the house and I have to warn the country that we are turning ourselves—that is the taxpayers of this country—over to the hands of the railway accountant. This we cannot allow.

The next subject has to do with the super board. We have had three boards before, handling aeronautics, rail and water. Now we have a board that handles rail, air, water, motor transport—I suppose that includes buses as well as trucks—commodity pipe lines, and other things. Bridges do not come under the board, but are administered by the Department of Public Works. The theory is that by having one board, or with supervision at the top over the five sections of it, we will be able to co-ordinate things better. This theory sounds good, but all sorts of questions come into my mind.

In the past all these boards have tended to operate purely on precedent. The precedents of one board however, are isolated from the precedents of other boards. In the period in between, when there will be this adjustment to a super board, I presume the tendency will be for the board to accept the precedents from the original three boards. To my mind this might be a good opportunity to hear from various hon. members of this house as to how they feel, or as to how parliament feels about laying down some guide lines and some terms of reference, so that this super board will know what we feel about certain things.

Let us take an example. Over and over again in this bill is repeated the fact that every rail rate charged to the shipper shall be compensatory. The bill says that the railways cannot charge a rate which is less than the variable cost. This is an out-of-pocket affair. We will not let the railways charge less than it costs to transport certain goods. That sort of provision is primarily put in as a protection to truckers. But now that we are going to take over interprovincial trucking we will have to deal with the truckers to work out some of the arrangements for their freight rates. What is the attitude of the house about setting rates which are below trucking costs? What control can the board have over this when, at the present time, this is up to the provinces.

I think this is a question that should be looked into. If the interprovincial truckers come under federal legislation, and if we are going to turn over to this super board, the power of running this whole country, this is the time when parliament should lay down the terms, limits or directions for this board to adopt. I should put this in the form of a question, because quite frankly I have not come to any conclusion of what we can do on that score.

But I do say that if we are going to force the railways not to go below a certain price or charge, and if we are going to take over air transportation and trucks, we should be careful in co-ordinating tariff rates.

The next question, that of passenger services, is a subject on which many hon. members will have much to say, and many ideas to express. Under the proposals in this bill the railways are going to be allowed to abandon passenger services on the basis of cost, and if we as a parliament or government decide that they must continue passenger services for the national interest, then we are going to pay 80 per cent of the losses.

The first question I ask is, who is going to do the costing on that? But beyond that there is a bigger question. Today the C.N.R. railway management holds to the view that there is a future in passenger services in Canada, and is doing all it can to get passengers to ride the C.N.R. When passengers get on C.N.R. trains the management does everything it can through its staff to make travel as comfortable and friendly as possible. Here you have a railway management and staff all pulling together to get people to ride on their railway. But when you go from the C.N.R. to the C.P.R. it is just like going from a nice warm pleasant bath to a cold frigid shower, because apparently at the top level of the C.P.R. they have decided that they do not want passenger service, and by various means they have got this philosophy through to some members of their staff, with the result that the most frightful things happen to you on the C.P.R.

You can phone up for a reservation and they say, "Oh, we cannot get you a reservation for days, weeks or months." The first two or three times you get fooled by this, but then you walk down to the station, walk on to a train and take a chance that you can con the sleeping car conductor into getting you some accommodation. Then finally, when you get into the sleeping car you find it is half empty.

When you say to the conductor, "There is something funny going on; I have tried for days to get a reservation," he usually replies, "I don't know anything about that. All I know is, there's a lot of space here." On three occasions this last summer I was unable to get space on a C.P.R. train, but I took a chance, walked on, and every time I found any accommodation I wanted.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Would he be interested to know that a C.P.R. train left Toronto this morning without a single passenger on board?

Mr. Knowles: Now who is striking?

Mr. Hamilton: I think my point is well made. I believe it should be pointed out to the C.P.R. that if they want to abandon all their passenger services, we realize we cannot force a railway company to haul passengers. We cannot force them to be nice to their customers if they do not want customers, but we do have a right to say that we want running rights over the C.P.R. lines so that the C.N.R. can carry passengers and give somebody some service.

While speaking on this question of passenger service I must say that I have seen morale decline among C.P.R. employees. I have seen morale decline on the express services. I cannot understand, and neither can the railway workers understand what management is trying to do. Here is a railway company that over the years has served Canada tremendously.

Coming from a C.P.R. family myself I know of days when the C.P.R. was tough and hard, and the employees were proud, as railwaymen, to work for a tough and hard company. If a man made a mistake he got some black marks, some demerit marks; but the men did their best to get the odd merit mark. They were proud of a railway that was rated as a crackerjack railway. But now when you talk to railwaymen on the C.P.R. they do not know how to explain this new management attitude.

This is a problem that affects the efficiency of the company and we have a right to bring it to the attention of the C.P.R. If they want to get out of passenger services they should do it in an honourable and open way, and let arrangements be made for the other line to carry passengers over their rails. These are questions which other hon. members will raise in this debate.

Turning to the question of commodity pipe lines, to my knowledge Canada at the present time has not got a single commodity pipe line. Oil and gas are covered under the national energy legislation, but apparently the government proposes to bring this new type of operation under the transportation board. I think the logic is good.

When you look at the bill you see the government has included some sections of the National Energy Board Act, to protect Canadian ownership and management, and I suspect this is the only place in the bill where it is proposed to give power to the government to direct. It does not direct the railways, trucks and air lines, but people engaging in commodity pipe lines are going to be directed by the government. I think the reason the cabinet's courage got so high is that there is at present nobody to direct.

Are we just to set up a framework of technical regulations? What are the terms of reference under which we want this section of the board to operate? For example, how are charges going to be set on commodity pipe lines? Whether you like it or not, Mr. Speaker, a pipe line is a type of monopoly, and a type of monopoly must have some control over charges.

Are we going to use the principle laid down and accepted in the oil and gas industry, namely that the charge must be such that the maximum return on capital is 7½ per cent. Are we going to allow this 7½ per cent based on a rate base system, a combination of equity and bonding debentures? What are the terms? I ask, has not parliament the duty to see that something is done in this respect, that something is laid down much more clearly respecting the guiding of these commodity pipe lines for the protection of the public, and so that the companies can operate efficiently and rationally?

I said last night that as a person who is very friendly to the concept of railways I have long hoped for the day when railways would go into all types of transportation, such as air and water. Now pipe lines are going to become a bigger and bigger part of the transportation picture and the railways, in order to keep themselves fully competitive and integrated, should be one of the first types of companies to move into commodity pipe lines.

If more and more of the goods of the country are going to be hauled by pipe lines, then the railways should be planning now to set up pipe line companies either as subsidiaries or separate entities. Sometimes I think it would be best for the two companies to work together, although this creates a monopoly. If they do not get into this field, transportation revenues will pass away to competitors and once again the industry will go into a decline.

We have all heard about the studies presently being conducted into the movement of grain through a commodity pipe line. Other hon. members are more knowledgeable than I with respect to the technical terms, such as the slurry technique and the capsule technique, but certainly within the next decade grain, potash and wood chips, which were once heavy bulk products handled by railways, will be handled by pipe lines.

The contention that I am putting forward now is really none of my business. I cannot force the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. to go into the pipe line business, but I think we should let those companies know we in this house feel that they should be looking to this new form of transportation in order to keep themselves alive and competitive. I would even go so far as to suggest they should consider not only commodities carried by pipe line, within the definition of this bill, but also the question of oil, which we shall have to consider within the next few years.

There is another point in this bill about which I am very worried. In the old bill we had clauses on agreed charges; now they are out. This is another reason I was completely pessimistic as I read the bill. The agreed charge section is out. What is the agreed charge section? This is a section which allows the railways, when building a market, to charge a rate which is not compensatory, because they know that at the end of three, four, five or six years the market will develop to such a point that they will be in the black. You cannot develop a country, particularly in the mining and wooded areas, unless in the first stage there is a loss period.

The railways now are forbidden to open up a new area like this, if this section is out. I may be wrong, but as I read this section it seems to me it has disappeared. I can refer to it at page 49. I see the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) shakes his head. It says:

> The heading preceding section 349 and section 349 of the said Act are repealed.

The note says:

> This section permits the board to authorize special rates for specific shipments between points not being competitive points, to develop trade or to create business, or for the advantage of the public interest, if not otherwise contrary to the act.

As the clause says, it is going to be repealed; and as the explanation of the clause stands, I can only take it that the section is out. The agreed rate system can be helpful; only if it is hurting anybody else in opening up an area is it not helpful. We know that the minimum rates are compensatory; it is repeated again and again in the act. It is for the protection of the trucking industry. The maximum rate control provisions in this bill are the same as they were in 1964. The clauses in respect of the captive shipper are lengthy. Many people think they are adequate, but frankly I know that some will debate the details of the captive shipment principles. I will leave that to the experts.

What I should like to wind up with, and express in the strongest terms, is that under this bill I do not see an end to the discrimination in rates. In looking at page 51 of the bill under the part headed "traffic, tolls and tariffs", I find that it reads as follows:

> 381. (1) All tolls shall be just and reasonable, and shall always, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions with respect to all traffic of the same description carried over the same route, be charged equally to all persons at the same rate.

That sounds wonderful, but there is one thing left out. What about region to region? This is where I need the help of persons who are extremely qualified in interpreting this. To me this reads that, in respect of an article going over the same route, any person buying a similar article in the same area gets the same rate. Suppose I live in Saskatchewan, that this rate applies only from Toronto to Sudbury and I want to get the same type of goods from Winnipeg to Saskatchewan. All the people in that area get the same deal under this section, but it may be anything at all compared to the rate from Toronto to Sudbury or vice-versa. The way this is written I do not see anything but regional discrimination again.

What has been the policy all down through the years? This is what the fight has been about. As the railways needed more money, from the thirties on, they applied freight rate increases all across the board—10 per cent, 12 per cent, 17 per cent. They obtained authority from the Board of Transport Commissioners to apply this all across Canada, but they never applied it all across the country. They applied it only in the areas where there is no competition. In the main, these areas were the maritimes and the prairies. The same discrimination applied in areas of northern Ontario and northern Quebec, but the only thing different about the northern areas of Quebec and Ontario in relation to the maritimes and the prairies is that no one in these areas has fought for these people; that is the reason they never heard much about it. This discrimination, however, has been consistent. Every time the railways wanted more money, up went the rates. Naturally we look for a clear explanation. Goods of the same sort carried the same distance should be shipped for the same price whether in Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Ontario or British Columbia. That should be the principle; we have fought so hard to get this principle accepted.

I am only a layman and others may have an interpretation which will clear this up, but unless I am misreading the bill, this principle is not contained in it. I have to tell the minister that in spite of his remarks this morning I cannot vote for the second reading of this bill until this point is cleared up. This is the reason that yesterday I made the appeal that we do not have this debate on second reading. I do not want to stop the good sections of this bill because of the things with which I do not agree; but this is all fundamental to our economic well-being. I do not wish to turn over to the railways the right to say that one area will develop and another will stagnate. Being extreme in my views, it seems that a railway could decide to ship goods from Winnipeg to Brandon at such and such a rate, and at a different rate from Winnipeg to Kenora. One town would have high rates and all the people in that area would have high rates, while all the people in the other area would have low rates. I have spoken to a good many people who feel as I do, and this is the interpretation they put on it. This is the reason I have no choice but to fight as hard as I can and as long as I can. This is a battle we have had for 30 years and it must be cleared up in a manner satisfactory to all.

I appeal to all parties in this house, not only on the opposite side, to realize that this is the key, the real issue. We can resolve the question of railway line abandonments in western Canada. But the point on which the country is dependent is that there will be equality in carrying a certain amount of goods a certain distance and that the rate should be the same in any part of the country. That is the main contention that I put forward. I am not going to deal with the matter of the maritime freight rates or the grain rates; they are protected for two or three years.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; indefinitely.

Mr. Hamilton: For at least two or three years I will not deal with the Crowsnest pass rates, because I think it is clear that that is out of the way for at least three years. The question of labour we debated at length during our study of the previous bill. I am certain it will come up in respect of this bill, because there was a section there which was not too good. But at least it was there, and now it is out. I thought they were going to put in the labour section, but we hear rumours it will be in another bill. We do not know yet. These things I will let go for the moment, because I think they will be covered adequately by others. I just mention this, because we will have an opportunity to express our views later.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I have been on my feet for a little over an hour, but I do not apologize to the house. As I said last night I feel we are now considering, a bill which is related to the lifeblood of this country—the railway system. The railway system has built Canada, and has held Canada together. In view of the growth of other modes of transportation in the last few decades, and the tremendous growth of the country itself, coupled with the impending growth in industry in the next few years our philosophy should be that our railways are going to be expanded and become the key part of transportation.

The railway should extend into all forms of transportation. We as legislators must try to provide principles which will guide this transportation system for generations to come in order to make sure they have the opportunity of expanding. No matter how we twist or turn, transportation of some sort must be controlled in the public interest, because this is a quasi monopoly. The public must be protected. I have indicated the areas in which we must protect the public and the areas in which we can co-operate to help this expansion. I have indicated the areas of this bill with which I disagree. I hope as we proceed we will develop within a few months a bill of which we can be proud in years to come.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, without exercising my right to speak. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle referred to me when he was talking about agreed charges which are covered in section 16 of the Transport Act. This section has not been affected at all, consequently clause 61 of the new bill does not relate to agreed charges. I wanted to make that point clear at this stage.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this parliament at this session, because it has overriding implications regarding the Canadian economy, and its growth and development. The house agreed to waive the resolution stage of the debate and consequently there are a great many details with which we are not familiar. We did not have the opportunity of questioning the minister to obtain clarification of a great many points. As a result I have some trepidation about entering the debate. There are quite a few points in this bill about which I am not at all clear. Since that fact did not deter the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) from taking part I see no reason why I should allow my modesty to keep me seated. I am just pulling the minister's leg of course, because the minister is very well informed about this subject and displayed that fact by his excellent speech last night, without a single note. He was operating under a terrific handicap, expecting momentarily that the house would be summoned to the other place. He reminded me a bit of Wellington who, during the battle of Waterloo, is supposed to have taken out his watch and said: "Blucher or night". The minister seemed to have made his speech with the thought: Usher of the Black Rod, or adjournment.

The Minister of Transport made a very informative and witty speech, but I thought he would likely get into trouble as the result of his statement that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), as usual, was going to have to backtrack. There is an old saying that many a true word is spoken in jest, but let me remind the minister that this kind of witticism from a minister might get him summoned to the other place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the hon. member is not imputing motives in making that observation?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member regards that as a fate worse than death.

Mr. Douglas: I also thought the minister's remarks about newspaper editorial writers in the city of Toronto had a somewhat bitter note.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Douglas: The minister took very strong exception to an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail under the heading "Can Politics be Kept out of Transportation". I think the minister was a bit hard on that Toronto newspaper editorial writer. This probably resulted from a guilty conscience because of the extent to which politics has entered the administration of transportation in this country.

The minister made a very informative speech with respect to the machinery and techniques which will be set up under this legislation. I was disappointed that I did not have the feeling that the minister was outlining a national transportation policy with which this house could be fully seized. I felt that the minister was unfortunately vague on the matter of policy. He began by saying that one could not take politics out of transportation. I should like to quote what he said as reported at page 7989 of Hansard:

> I hope the day never comes when some editor in some ivory tower in Toronto is able to take politics out of transportation.

In one respect I believe there has been too much politics in transportation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman is not attempting to misrepresent what I said. I said exactly what he is now saying. There are two kinds of politics. One is the kind that all of us who have any self-respect in this house are proud to practice, while the other is the kind which editorial writers seem to have on the brain and which I would describe as a dubious kind of conduct which is not confined by any means to politics.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: I was about to say that part of the sorry mess transportation is in at this time has been in large part due to the shenanigans that have gone on among railway promoters and politicians. In that regard, as I shall show later on in my remarks, I think the sooner we get politics out of transportation the better it will be for Canada. When the minister says that we must have politics in transportation I take it he means we cannot have transportation in this country without government control and direction. I am completely in agreement with that suggestion. One cannot operate a transportation system in the same way as one operates a soap factory or an automobile assembly line. A transportation system cannot be operated merely on a profit and loss statement. A transportation system, particularly in Canada, has certain very definite functions to perform. As the minister said last night, transportation has been the life line of Canada. Here we are, 20 million people spread across the American border stretching for some 4,000 miles, with a depth varying from 200 to 300 miles in the settled parts of our population. We have a straggling, sparsely settled population that must be linked by adequate transportation services. From the time Canada was born transportation has been the main consideration of the governments that brought Canada into existence and have conducted its affairs in all the years from then until now.

There are few countries in the world that are so dependent upon transportation. We are dependent upon transportation because such a large part of our produce has to find its way into world markets. There are few countries in the world where the people spend such a high proportion of their per capita income on the transportation of goods and people. Consequently for nearly 100 years transportation has been a matter of national policy and could not be conducted in the way one would conduct an ordinary business of manufacturing or mining.

One of the principles that has had to be followed is that a transportation system must get our primary goods, as well as our manufactured goods, to world markets at competitive prices. This is why we have had such things as the Crowsnest pass agreement, to allow the farmers of the prairies to get their grain into world markets. This is why we have had various subsidies to enable Canadian manufacturers and primary producers of minerals, pulp and timber to get their goods into world markets.

In addition to that, national policy has dictated that Canada had to develop its great industrial potential in central Canada. This is a fact that is sometims forgotten. We often meet people who tell us how much assistance has been given to the people of the maritimes and the people on the praries in the way of various subventions, subsidies or fixed shipping rates. But it is equally true that part of our national policy has been directed toward bringing raw materials to the great industrial complex of central Canada as cheaply as possible, and to bring fuel to central Canada. That is why we have had subventions on coal from the maritimes into central Canada. It has not been merely to enable the maritimes to sell coal but to given central Canada cheap fuel. That is why we have given assistance in putting gas pipe lines through to central Canada. That is why we have special rates on shipping feed grain from western to central Canada, to enable the farmers of central Canada to fatten their cattle for market.

I am not complaining about it, but I am simply pointing out that part of the national policy for decades has not only been to allow primary producers to get their products into world markets at competitive prices but also to help central Canada by giving them raw materials, feed grain and fuel at the lowest possible cost. The result of this, of course, has been to produce a freight rate structure that is a veritable nightmare. I had the privilege on two or three occasions of appearing, along with the late Hon. Angus Macdonald, the former premier of Nova Scotia, and the late Hon. J. L. Ralston, before the federal cabinet to appeal freight rate decisions of the Board of Transport Commissioners.

I think anyone who has tried to study the freight rate structure will agree that the longer you study it, the less you know about it. The freight rate structure is like the peace of the Lord; it passeth all understanding. But the fact is, of course, that we have learned to live with it. I think it can be improved. I think the discriminatory features need to be removed. I believe we should look very carefully at this bill which, while it may take some of the anomalies out of the freight rate structure, introduces an entirely new principle which could be dangerous in the extreme; because as I see this legislation it is designed to let competition solve our major problems in transportation. It is designed on the thesis that the competitive forces of the alternative modes of transportation will be effective in preventing exploitation of the shipper, and any abuse on the part of those who are in the transportation business. This was stated very clearly by the minister last night at page 7991 of Hansard when he said, referring to the MacPherson report:

> But the basic approach of the report was a new one. It was that there has been a development of alternative and competitive modes of transport in most parts of the country for most classes of travel, and that the kind of regulation of railway charges and practices by a regulatory body which may have been needed in the past was no longer essential for the protection of the public.

Mr. Speaker, that is a very debatable contention. I am afraid that in making that statement the minister let his free enterprise bias influence his judgment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair to me. That was my interpretation of what was said by the MacPherson commission, as he pointed out at the beginning of his statement.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, and I am assuming, of course, that the minister agreed with the position of the MacPherson commission and that this legislation is introduced to implement the recommendattions of that commission. All I am saying to the minister is that the thesis that there are now sufficient alternate modes of transportation to provide enough competition that the public will be protected, without the kind of restrictions which have existed in the past, is extremely debatable.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would mind if I stated it the way I should like to state it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am simply objecting and saying that I am being misrepresented by the hon. gentleman, and I know he does not want to do that.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the minister's jumping up and down, but he has a very bad habit of doing this. Our speeches are punctuated with his jumping up and down. I asked the minister a question last night and he said he did not want his train of thought interrupted. I kept looking for the train. I thought there was a strike on because the rails seemed to be comparatively bare. The minister did not want to be interrupted, and I do not want to be interrupted. Neither do I want to misrepresent the minister. Let me read the next paragraph:

Habits die hard. It has been very hard to get through our heads the idea that this has become true, and if we do not make a real effort of imagination it will be hard to appreciate the fact that many regulations which in the past were necessary in the public interest have simply become shackles in the present.

Surely that is clear. The minister has a perfect right to his opinion. I am not saying he has not; I am simply saying that the minister's thesis and the thesis which came out of the MacPherson report recommendations is that we now have sufficient alternate modes of transportation to give enough competition in this country to safeguard the public interest, without many of the restraints and restrictions which have existed hitherto. I say this is a debatable contention. I became doubly suspicious of it when I saw that the moment the MacPherson report was issued and the moment the government indicated this type of legislation, not only in this bill but in Bill C-120, which the minister introduced on September 14, 1964, it was hailed with glee by the presidents of both the big railways. When they begin to rub their hands in glee I always think that anyone who is concerned about the public interest and about safeguarding the pockets of the shippers of this country had better take a second look at the proposition which they are lauding to the skies.

I ask the house to look for just a moment at this thesis.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to seem to be popping up and down, and I apologize to the hon. gentleman, but if he is going to make a reply to my thesis I wonder if he would mind my putting in the part he left out of it. I said half a dozen times since this subject has come up that there are areas where there is a monopoly, and wherever there is a monopoly regulation is needed just as much as it was ever needed. However, there are other areas, and they are expanding, where there is effective and economical competition. It is in these areas that many of the regulations that were needed in the days of monopoly appear to me no longer to be needed now. If it is stated that way, I will be very happy to have it debated.

Mr. Douglas: I have no objection at all. As a matter of fact I was going to deal with these very points and will do so if the minister would just possess his soul in patience.

I want to ask in the first place: Where will this genuine competition exist? What are the alternative modes of transportation that will provide the competition so as to keep rates at a reasonable level? The argument is immediately put forth that the trucking industry will provide this kind of competition in some parts of Canada. And yet the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that both the large railways in Canada have been acquiring large trucking operations, that they are already operating interprovincial trucking firms in this country, and that many of the trucking companies in Canada are just waiting to get a lucrative offer from either of the railroads. As the railways move into the trucking business—and I do not blame them for doing so; they would be very foolish to stay with only one form of transportation—which they have done and will do in increasing measure, where will the competition be then? Will the shipper have the choice between shipping by the railways or shipping by trucks owned by the railways, or maybe eventually by pipe line owned by the railways? We will be leaning on a broken reed if we depend on competition to keep transportation rates at a price that is fair and reasonable to the shippers who want to get their goods to market at competitive prices.

Second, what about the areas where there are no alternative forms of transportation? The areas in the maritimes, in northern Quebec, northern Ontario and on the prairies will not have alternate modes, and large parts of these regions cannot have a trucking service that is independent from the railroad. These regions will not have the kind of competition which would keep rates at a reasonable figure. What alternative will the shipper on the prairies have, one who wants to ship livestock over long distances, or the potash and the mining companies? What about the lumber companies and the pulp and paper companies of northern Ontario and Quebec?

The maritimes will have some protection for two years, but they too have always faced this serious situation, which we also have in western Canada, that whenever the railway companies have been given permission to raise the rates it has been the Atlantic provinces and western Canada which have borne the brunt of those rate increases. I cannot see anything in this bill that will give any guarantee of protection to the shippers of these areas.

If the government is going to take the wraps off the railroads, it will be able to get more money, which it claims it needs. I have very strong fears that the areas from which they are going to get that extra money are western Canada, northern Ontario and Quebec, and probably later on the maritime provinces.

In the television address which the Prime Minister delivered over the national hook-up on August 23 of this year he said this to the Canadian people:

> Necessary increases in wages of the railway workers since 1960 have on three separate occasions, been met by government subsidies to the railways. Such subsidies are now costing the taxpayers of Canada $100 million a year. The government cannot continue to provide subsidies to pay railway workers without imposing higher taxes. This we are not prepared to ask parliament to do.
> We do, however, intend to ask parliament immediately to pass transportation legislation based broadly on recommendations of the royal commission on transportation. This legislation will give the railways greater freedom to adjust their charges to meet competition and increase their earnings. Therefore, it should enable the railways themselves to bear the burden of a legitimate increase in wages.

This legislation, as hon. members know, called for the steady reduction of that $100 million annual subsidy over a period of eight years.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Where will the railways get this extra money to reimburse them for the loss of a $100 million subsidy and to enable them to pay increased wages? We may speculate on whether or not it is fair to have a subsidy which is paid for by all the people of Canada or else say to the railways: You can get this money instead out of levying higher freight rates on those areas of Canada where the competition places you in a position of monopoly.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I greatly fear that the removal of restraints and restrictions on railways with reference to freight rates will mean that certain regions of Canada, those I have already named, are going to pay the shot and that some of the burden which heretofore had been borne by all the people of Canada is going to fall upon those areas of Canada which can least afford to carry this burden. Certainly the maritime provinces cannot afford to carry it. They will have a couple of years of grace, but we do not know what will happen after that. Certainly the northern part of Ontario and Quebec cannot carry it. Already the prairie provinces are paying freight rates that are much higher than those paid in other parts of Canada, and they should not be called upon to carry this extra burden. If there had to be extra money for the railways, surely that is a matter of national policy. The funds to provide that extra revenue ought to be provided equitably by all parts of Canada and not the parts of Canada that at the present time are less prosperous and have less industrial development than other parts of this country.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe that free enterprise and the competitive system of transportation can give Canada an adequate transportation policy at a price we can afford. There may be countries where they can afford to have all sorts of free enterprise and competition; different forms of transportation and different companies competing with each other, duplicating services. However, in a country of 20 million people where, as I said before, we are more dependent than probably any country in the world on getting our goods to market over long distances at competitive prices, where we spend more per capita on transportation than probably any other country in the world, I do not think we can afford the luxury of having a free enterprise, competitive transportation policy.

As a matter of fact, it is this free enterprise competition which has produced much of the mess in which we are now. The minister earlier talked about politics in transportation. He and I both agree that the government has to be concerned about transportation, and that politics, in one sense of the word, ought not to be in transportation. Undoubtedly, it has been from the beginning. Politics in transportation has bedevilled the history of this country.

There was the Canadian Pacific Railway which the government, and a group of railway promoters, started in order to link Canada together with bands of steel. We had the Canadian Pacific scandal which defeated the first Prime Minister of Canada. We have had grants and subsidies in one form or another to keep this company going. When it made money out of its transportation system, it put that into other ventures. Whenever the Canadian Pacific Railway was in trouble with its transportation system it came to the government and said: We cannot afford to carry on unless you give us subsidies and subventions and various other forms of assistance—always keeping behind their back of course the money which they had made out of the land grants, and the operating profits from their other enterprises. Then, we had the period of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Clifford Sifton which was also bedevilled with railway promoters. There was Mackenzie and Mann and other railway promoters, providing duplicate services until most of them went broke. The Canadian people were then loaded with a second transcontinental system, and loaded with debt out of all proportion to the assets which they acquired. We have been suffering from that ever since.

Then came trucking, air services, water services and now pipe lines. Pipe lines are going to be a very important part of transportation in the future, let us make no mistake about that. The transportation of solids by pipe line is now well advanced in the United States. Experiments are being conducted now in Canada for transporting potash by pipe line. In the United States they are transporting coal and iron ore in pellet form by pipe line. Experiments are being conducted even in the transportation of packaged goods by pipe line. All of these various forms of transportation have been growing up, but they have been growing up like Topsy. They have been competing, duplicating and providing a degree of waste, high cost and inefficiency which has reflected itself in the very high payments which the Canadian people have had to pay to ship goods from one part of Canada to the other, or into the markets of the world.

One example of this duplication of service was seen only a few years ago when a special bill was introduced into the house to build a Canadian Pacific line to Esterhazy in Saskatchewan for the potash mine. The Canadian National Railways already were in there. At the same time the Canadian Pacific Railway was appealing to the Board of Transport Commissioners for permission to abandon other lines in Saskatchewan and yet they wanted to build a line to Esterhazy where there were adequate facilities already to ship the potash. It is this type of duplication, this wastefulness, this lack of co-ordination and integration which has caused so many headaches for successive governments with respect to transportation in this country.

I believe that what we need, Mr. Speaker, is more government control and direction not less, in the field of transportation. My quarrel with this legislation is that the Canadian transportation commission which is proposed has two functions, regulatory and research, and with that I have no quarrel. However, this is not enough. It is purely a negative approach. This commission will have the power to prevent the railway pulling up lines; it will have the power to restrict the railway when some captive shipper can prove the railway is taking advantage of him. The commission will have the power to make recommendations to the railways that certain steps should be taken in order to effect savings and provide more efficient service at lower cost. However, they have no authority to enforce decisions. They have no power to bring about integration, so far as I am able to discover through reading this bill. I think what we need is a Canadian transportation authority with some power to do the things which need to be done.

One of the reasons we get off on the wrong foot in Canada in the transportation field is that we have always thought of modes of transportation rather than of transportation itself. We have thought in terms of a railroad, we have thought in terms of a ship, we have thought in terms of a truck, we have thought in terms of an aeroplane, when with our limited resources and our sparsely settled population we should have been thinking in terms of transportation, which means the task of getting people and goods from point A to point B, and the best way to get them from the one point to the other. We should have thought of integrating all forms of transportation so that one form of transportation would complement the other rather than duplicating it.

Every hon. member who has travelled across Canada knows that railway lines sometimes run close enough together that one could throw a baseball from one set of lines to the other. There is endless duplication. I can take members to places where two sets of transcontinental lines and the trans-Canada highway all run within sight of each other, and all are used as a means of hauling similar goods. There has been no co-ordination and no integration because we have thought in terms of separate modes of transportation rather than in terms of a single transportation system that would move goods and people from one point to another.

What I should like to see in this legislation is not just a commission set up, but a Canadian transportation authority clothed with the power to begin to integrate and to co-ordinate all forms of national transportation in Canada, so that we will be able to eliminate the wastefulness, duplication and overlapping which we cannot afford in a country like Canada, if we are to convey our goods to world markets at competitive prices without having to subsidize their carriage out of the public treasury.

I think this probably means that such a transportation authority would have to begin with the integration of the two railway systems. Instead of having some of the ridiculous anomalies which were pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), and which I need not repeat, such as going 100 miles north and then 100 miles south again rather than switching on to the other company's line, examples such as this which can be duplicated at various points across Canada should be eliminated. It does not make sense not to have these railway systems integrated, certainly as far as passenger traffic and freight are concerned.

I think that the day will undoubtedly come when these two railways will have to be integrated as part of a government transportation system. By that time the railways themselves will probably be operating a good part of the interprovincial trucking system.

I think that a national transportation authority will have to move into the field of pipe lines for moving solids. Because if it does not, and if the public transportation system is to operate railroads and allow some free enterprise promoters to operate pipe lines, we will be back to the old situation of the government owning the most costly form of transportation and allowing private enterprise to make a lot of money out of other forms of transportation.

I am not hopeful that the government is going to be sufficiently farsighted that it is going to move as fast as I would like it to move. I want to tell the government that if it does not do this the day is coming when some government and some parliament will, in the not too distant future, be compelled by the pressure of economic events to take all of our national transportation systems and weld them into a single public utility. I think that is inevitable, and it would be far better if this were done right away.

One good thing about the minister's bill is this—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Churchill: Carry on.

Mr. Douglas: I was interrupted a few times, Mr. Speaker, but if I may have a few minutes more I can finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: One good thing about the minister's bill is that it does propose to set up this Canadian Transport Commission which, while it has no power, has some regulatory authority and will do considerable research into the various forms of transportation. It is a first faltering step, and it will at least provide the framework within which this government or some other government, if it has the courage, will be able to build a genuine national transportation authority and eventually to establish national transportation as a public utility.

Therefore, I hope that this first faltering step which the government is taking will be followed up very quickly. I am convinced that this government or the government that succeeds it will find that in a few years this transport commission, because of its lack of power and authority, will not be able to solve the problem. If the house does not at this time give that commission some power and put some teeth into the bill, then some subsequent parliament will be compelled to do so, after we have lost valuable years and very large sums of money.

In his speech on September 14, 1964, the minister said that this legislation was revolutionary. Well, we have heard of the quiet revolution, and we now have what I would call the timid revolution. It is a very tepid revolution. It is a move in the right direction and will bring the various forms of transportation at least under regulation. It is a start. But I hope that before the committee to which this bill is being referred reports back, it will give very serious consideration to putting some real muscle into this act so that the Canadian Transport Commission will become an authority, not merely a regulatory body.

I would urge the committee of the house to which this bill will be referred to think of transportation for Canada in terms of the last quarter of the twentieth century and the first quarter of the twenty-first century, rather than in terms of the nineteenth century. If transportation was vital to the economic life of Canada 100 years ago when the fathers of confederation began to dream of binding Canada from sea to sea with a ribbon of steel, how much more vital is it today in a world that is shrinking so rapidly, a world where it is absolutely essential to move goods cheaply and quickly if we are to retain our place as one of the great trading nations of the world.

The minister is right when he says that transportation is Canada's life line. If that transportation system is not efficient, if it does not provide service as cheaply as possible, if it does not free itself from wasteful duplication, then this country will suffer the economic consequences of our neglect and of our lack of vision.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that when this legislation goes to the committee of the house it will get a full and complete revision, not in the light of past experience alone, but in the light of the great changes which face Canada in the future.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, when the Minister of Transport was introducing this bill into the house, he made some point about politics in transportation. I think he went on to define the different meanings in the word "politics".

First, I should say that I appreciate the interpretation or connotation that the Minister of Transport put on the word "politics", and with the connotation that he used with respect to politics in transportation I agree. In spite of all attempts by editorial writers, and so on, across the country during the past two or three years in particular to degrade politics and politicians generally, we still must recognize that it is the politicians, particularly in this house, who stand between the government and the governed. That essentially is a noble function. It is also true that those politicians who have been maligned and degraded stand between the monopolistic interests in the country and the people of the country. Here again they perform a noble purpose. This purpose I think is being served reasonably well by politicians.

The Minister of Transport also commended to the members of this house the first clause of the bill defining a national transportation policy, and asked us to read it. I have read it. While it is very short, certainly no one can disagree with the objectives outlined in that brief statement.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, we go on to read the rest of the bill, and we find outlined in the balance of the bill the ways and means of achieving the objectives that have been outlined in the statement of policy. I do not think the Minister of Transport would be critical if I suggested that there could be wide disagreement on the ways and means of giving effect to these objectives, so far as the other clauses are concerned.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, as I look over the bill, those remarks might apply so far as the new transport commission is concerned. I agree with some of the other statements which have been made, that it is a step in the right direction. Although I will not cite cases today, the very fact of air routes and railway lines having been referred to different boards has had the end result of denying certain communities in Canada adequate transportation from either the one form of transport or the other. I hope that there will be an improvement in co-ordination so far as the public interest is concerned, when the new transport commission is set up, and I hope that the board will consider all modes of transport, so far as the over-all requirements of each community are concerned.

We have to examine in great detail the powers and duties of this new transport commission. As I look over some clauses of the bill I find that there are differences between powers that appear to be assigned to this commission and the powers that the existing Board of Transport Commissioners has had in the past. I am not going into detail, but I should like to quote one example. We have had what might be termed a long standing traditional right that any shipper could go before the Board of Transport Commissioners and plead discrimination—discrimination in his own individual case, so far as rates are concerned, and as those rates applied to his own personal or corporate business. That provision was contained in section 317, I believe, of the old Railway Act. The provisions appearing in the new bill, defining the powers and duties of the new Canadian Transport Commission, are such that an individual shipper will have to prove, before his case can be valid, that the discriminatory rates he is charged, if you want to call them that, affect the public interest. I hope this will not be the case, because, surely, some small corporation or individual should not have to go before the transport commission and prove that the public interest is being damaged because of a rate being charged to him. Yet that is what the new act seems to provide.

The long standing tradition to which I have referred is something that shippers have valued and used for many, many years; namely the privilege of being able to go before the Board of Transport Commissioners and prove that there was discrimination against them in relation to other shippers of a similar kind, with the result that a railway company could be ordered to change its rates and remove the discrimination. That sort of thing appears to have gone, as I read this bill.

Talking in the same vein, in the bill before us there is no definition of the words "public interest". During the course of his political career I know the minister has probably used the words "public interest" thousands of times. I have used them, and I expect every hon. member of the house has used them. But what do they mean, so far as railway rates are concerned? They are not defined in the bill. Do they mean that an individual shipper who ships, say, for 500 miles or for smaller distances from his point of origin must prove that something affecting him has to do with the public interest, affecting the people from Bonavista to Vancouver Island? That is an unreasonable condition. The reason I raise the point now is that we are discussing the principle of a new railway act. That long standing tradition that a shipper might apply to the board, pleading discrimination so far as rates are concerned, has not been incorporated in this bill. I hope the minister will correct this deficiency, and perhaps something can be done by way of suggestion or amendment in committee which the minister will be prepared to accept.

[Mr. Olson.]

I am not going to speak more about the transport commission, except to say I think there is some value in co-ordinating supervision over all the modes of transportation that come under federal jurisdiction, so that there will not be a withdrawal of vital services by one mode, and then by another, leaving communities without adequate service by any mode.

The bill also makes provision to deal with commodity pipe lines. As the minister said, this is something we shall probably have to be concerned with in the future. It is not a major problem at the moment. It is not even a major factor in our economic structure at the moment, but it is probably good to consider it and have something in the statute so that we may have a starting point when problems arise.

Another part of the bill deals with motor transport. It constitutes a very timid move, and this is probably good because for the most part the provincial governments are responsible for motor transport. After all, provincial governments have built most, in fact almost all of the highways, and therefore moving into this field timidly and gently is probably a good thing.

Another provision allows for transfer of responsibility for bridges from the Board of Transport Commissioners to the Department of Public Works. I do not think it is of any particular concern which department handles them, so long as it looks after the public interest.

So far as railway rationalization is concerned, I was pleased to hear the Minister of Transport say that at the outset they are going to establish a minimum grid system of railways in the prairies. The provincial government of Alberta, which has the same political affiliation as my party in the house, has been asking for this for a long time. At this point I do not know whether the grid system to be established will be completely satisfactory to everyone involved. As the minister said, most likely it will not, but at least a start will be made on it.

Before dealing with the rate making provisions, which are probably the most important part of the bill, I wish to deal with the principle which claims that the transport commission ought to have greater power to direct and control all modes of transport, so that over-all transport policy is directed by the commission.

In my opinion it is a fallacy to argue that an appointed board, no matter how competent the appointees may be, is in a better position to direct all transportation policy for Canada than a number of individual groups and companies who are trying to move goods, people and commodities in Canada at the lowest possible cost, in order to do well by their companies. I do not buy the argument that it is better for an over-all authority to give directives and have complete control. Experience has shown that this has not proven to be the case in other areas. Of course, because of the nature of our geography, there are cases of monopolies, and in that instance there is justification for some government control.

The possibility, indeed the probability of change in rate making envisaged by the bill is the most important feature of it. At the outset in discussing this particular subject I want to say that all this talk about freedom to make rates, to lift ceilings, and to give the railroads freedom to make the kind of money that they need to operate and pay wages to their employees, and so on, is a farce. I say that, because on less than 5 per cent of the total commodities and goods now being shipped is the ceiling rate charged.

The railways have argued that until the government frees them from freight controls, permitting them to operate competitively, their hands are tied. Only this summer in the prairie provinces there has been a general increase of 3 per cent on most goods rates, and they are still not up to the ceiling. Therefore I think we should dispel the fallacy that the railways hands are tied.

The other night the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway said on television that this bill does not give the railways anything that they did not have before, so far as money and earnings are concerned. I have to agree that it does not, except that there are certain provisions in the bill to allow the rate ceiling to be lifted. Even now the railways have plenty of room to raise rates to the ceiling. It is not a valid argument that parliament has held down and controlled rates up until now. But where the railways have no competition, no effective competition, in some cases their rates are already raised to the permissible ceiling. However, I think it can also be shown that where they are charging the maximum they are also getting the costs, plus—and in some cases unreasonable rates over costs. This is one of the things about which we are very concerned.

I would ask the minister to get for us from the railways some of their costs of moving commodities, so that we can calculate what the rates would be if, under certain clauses of this bill, the costs plus formula is going to be used. I have reason to believe that it will be somewhat difficult to get this information from the railway companies, but it is absolutely essential that we get it in order that we can make our own calculations.

It would be absolutely hopeless to try to understand the principle of this rate making formula unless we have the basis from which it is going to start. So far we do not have it. I would hope the minister would stand up in the house, stiffen his back, throw out his chest and say: We will get those costs. He should not say: We will try to get those costs, but rather that he is going to get them, so that we can do our own calculations.

I should like to know, for example, how much it would cost to ship a 30,000 or 100,000 pound carload of fertilizer from Medicine Hat to Vancouver and from Calgary to Winnipeg. I should like to know how much it would cost to move a 70,000 or 100,000 car of potash from a certain point to Vancouver and how much it would cost to move a 100,000 pound or 70,000 pound car of steel to Edmonton. I should like to know how much it would cost to move steel, fertilizer, sulphur, or farm machinery and so on, 500 miles. We need to know these things.

The other night when I asked this question, because I made the mistake of trying to relate it to a captive shipper the minister asked me what I called a captive shipper. A captive shipper is defined in the act, of course, in words to the effect that it is where there is no alternative, effective and competitive service. With regard to farm machinery, for example, I suppose it is possible for motor transport to move a piece of farm machinery from Hamilton to Calgary. Does that remove it from coming under the definition of "captive shipper", because it is physically possible in some cases to ship in this manner

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. The definition I do not think says "physically possible or theoretically possible", does it?

Mr. Olson: No; it does not say "physically or theoretically possible"; it says "alternative, effective and competitive."

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Olson: We have been faced with the argument that while there is an alternative mode, perhaps it is only carrying 5 per cent. That is very practical proof that there is 90 or 95 per cent being carried by rail, despite the fact that it is possible, and so on, for it to be delivered. I still think that falls almost in the category of a captive shipment; yet it might be a little difficult to prove by the wording that is there.

In any event what I am asking is that we get the costs in respect of certain commodities, because at the present time we do not know these costs. When you look at the formula which was advanced in the old bill, although this formula has been changed a little in the new bill, I think you will find that it is essentially the same. For the purposes of this bill it is the Canadian Pacific Railway with which we are concerned in the matter of costs, because this is the standard which is going to be used, and it will apply to the other railway companies. They are not going to use the costs of the Canadian National Railways.

In the bill it states that the cost used will be cost plus on the basis of the C.P.R. costs. At the present time these are not made available. Therefore, we find we have to use some of the costs which are published in the United States. The Interstate Commerce Commission publishes these costs in respect of some commodities. In the bill the basis which is spelled out is that which is related to a 30,000 pound car, and then you establish a cost plus from that basis. Yet, we know very well that some of these same things move in 120,000 and 140,000 pound cars and that the railways, under this bill, could charge as much as 800 per cent over cost. We know that the average size of car which is being used is not a 30,000 pound car. It seems to me it is ridiculous to base it on a completely unrealistic size of load. If the cost plus is 150 per cent and you base it on a 30,000 pound car, you get the cost of moving a 30,000 pound car, but if you move four times that much weight in a car with a similar additional cost, then you get these enormous increases in cost.

Mr. Speaker, we again urge that the Minister of Transport and the government reconsider this basis for calculating the costs, because it seems to me the most realistic thing to do would be to base it on the actual cost in categories of perhaps from 30,000 pounds to 40,000, and another above 50,000 pounds, and then another above 80,000 pounds and so on, rather than base it on the cost of moving a 30,000 pound car.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at the moment our hands are tied. We hope we can obtain this information in committee. We do not yet have the information we need in order to do the necessary calculations so that we can find out what this will amount to when it is reduced to dollars and cents. There are other differences in rates which are completely incomprehensible and which do not seem to be provided in the bill. Why, for example, does it cost more to ship from Vancouver to Toronto than it does to ship from Toronto to Vancouver when moving exactly the same thing the same distance and in the same car. We do not understand why there is not a provision that once a rate is established for a certain commodity and a certain route it would apply both ways.

The bill does not seem to make provision for correcting these things. I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are some improvements in our whole national transportation policy as a result of this bill. We hope the bill can get to the standing committee on transport and communications as soon as possible, because I think there would be some futility in having a protracted debate in the House of Commons until the minister and his officials are prepared to give us additional information, so that we know what all these words mean. We wish to know in dollars and cents what some of these things will amount to when the calculations are made.

So, Mr. Speaker, I will close now in the hope that this bill will go to the committee. However, before I conclude I should like to suggest to the minister, and to the house particularly, because I know the minister does not have full control of this matter, that while we have perhaps a little more urgent responsibility and a little more pressure upon us, because of things that happened this week and last week, to get a new railway act, that we do not try to rush it through the committee. We would hope that it would get the attention and study which it deserves.

I think it is fair to suggest that it is necessary for all interested parties to have at least a three week period to consider this bill and present a report. It is a long and complex subject. Hon. members should have an opportunity to study it and then collect their thoughts. I know there will be a great deal of pressure to get the committee started. I hope the pressure will not be such that we cannot give this bill the consideration it deserves.

In closing let me make one other point, and I may say that I hesitate to refer to this at this time. I am haunted by a suspicion that this dispute between the railway companies and the railway unions was partly prompted—and that is perhaps a harsh word—by the railway companies in order to put pressure on parliament to pass this bill. During the eight months prior to December, 1965, and even before that, until the strike took place there was really no serious attempt made by the railway companies to negotiate with the unions. The companies made no reasonable offer at all, nor was any indication of any offer made public.

I do not like this kind of pressure put on members of parliament as a result of power politics, if that is what happened, to force us into passing rapidly this new railway act. As I said, I have been haunted by the suspicion that that is what happened, because during the past few months there have been indications that a strike was imminent. Everyone apparently knew that a strike would take place; yet during that time the railway companies claimed their hands were tied until the government passed legislation necessary to allow them to increase revenues in order to meet the union demands. The companies complained about competition and the inability to compete, using this as a reason for not being able to meet demands for higher wages. If competition has prevented them from making bigger profits in order to pay higher wages, that is one thing; but the companies should not blame the government or parliament for not moving to free them from an unfair position.

I do not intend to say anything more at the moment. I am sure we will have a very useful and constructive discussion at committee meetings. We in this party have a number of suggestions to make and I hope the minister will accept them as constructive suggestions which may improve the ways and means of giving effect to a good national transportation policy, which we agree must be established at this time.

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville): I move that the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): It has been moved that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my parliamentary secretary may be given leave to explain an arrangement that has been made for officials to meet on Tuesday before the opening of the house in order to answer any questions about this bill which hon. members may wish to pose.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, arrangements have been made for a briefing session, referred to by the minister, on Bill No. C-231, to be held in the Senate railway committee room, 356-S on Tuesday, September 6 at 12.30 p.m. Sandwiches and coffee will be served, but I do not wish hon. members to consider that to be an inducement to attend. A memo will be sent out to all hon. members to this effect.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.39 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 6, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NATURAL GAS

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING PIPE LINE THROUGH U.S.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Prime Minister promised to table the press release dealing with the rejection by the government of a pipe line project submitted by the Trans-Canada Pipelines Limited. I am now tabling two copies in French and in English.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the minister is attempting to table this document on motions. Does the minister have leave to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling the document to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF UNIFICATION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister consider putting a motion on the order paper to reassemble the defence committee of this house with instructions to examine the state of affairs within the national defence department, and with permission to call witnesses including various senior officers who are bringing public attention to the fact that the minister's program of unification will be damaging to Canada's defence forces? I refer particularly to the public interest shown by Generals Simonds and Vokes and Admirals Brock and Landymore, is well as others who are finding fault with this program. I think the public interest requires that something be done in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please pose his question.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister take that action?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it would be desirable or in the public interest to do that at the present time. If hon. gentlemen will re-read the evidence given to the committee earlier this session I am sure they will come to the conclusion that the program is moving ahead very well, that it is accomplishing the goals that have been set out, and that it is really worthy of the support of members on all sides of the house.

It is very gratifying now to see a greater interest being taken in these matters than was the case at the time the committee met earlier this year. So it is my hope that when the legislation is presented to amend the National Defence Act, which I hope will be soon during the course of the current session, and is referred to the committee, there will be real public interest in the discussion that takes place at that time and a searching examination of all the various points of view.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Defence to do here in the House of Commons that which he has not yet done, namely, state what he means by unification of the forces. It was not disclosed in the report of the committee.

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Hellyer: I will be pleased to give my hon. friend definitions of each step at the time the legislation is being considered.

Mr. Churchill: I want you to give it now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And unification has been proceeding all this time without legislation.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him whether the statement attributed to General Allard, calling upon the people of Canada to support integration, was made with his knowledge and consent.

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not see the speech before it was made, but I have complete confidence in the chief of defence staff and I am sure that whatever he said would be in order.

Mr. Brewin: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there some different rule, then, in regard to the chief of staff than applied to Admiral Landymore, who was condemned by the minister for making a speech on this subject while he was still a serving officer?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The chief of defence staff decides who under his control may make public statements in respect of defence matters.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Does the minister say that he approves of the views expressed by General Allard regarding unification and that such expression of views is in keeping with the rule which the minister himself dealt with some months ago, namely that serving officers should not be giving opinions on controversial matters? Has that been changed, too? Has Mr. Lee given his approval to change?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I resent the implication by my right hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: —and I think it is quite uncalled for from a parliamentarian of his standing. The chief of defence staff made a speech on his own responsibility, and he has the prerogative under the standing orders to do that.

An hon. Member: Oh, no, he hasn't.

Mr. Hellyer: I have complete confidence in him and in his staff, and I resent any reflection cast upon the chief of defence staff by my right hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Smoke screens like that do not help the minister.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this. Is it proper for any chief of defence staff or any other high ranking officer to express in public opinions on subjects that are controversial, that the minister has not brought before parliament, and with which parliament has had no opportunity of dealing?

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot think of anyone better qualified to speak on this subject than the chief of defence staff.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

[Later:]

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to return to the Minister of National Defence and ask the minister if he feels he is justified in proceeding with his program without having legislation before the house.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, any of the actions that have been taken so far and all the actions contemplated in the immediate future are authorized by the National Defence Act as passed by parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at all.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister would advise the house whether it is true that all he needs by way of legislation to bring about total integration of our armed forces is an amendment to the act changing the name?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is not in order.

Mr. Forrestall: I am wondering what the law is.

Mr. Speaker: This is exactly why the hon. member cannot ask the question. He cannot ask what the law is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, the source of all dependable information on occasion. Did the Acting Prime Minister receive a telegram from the tri-service identities organization requesting that parliament not recess without an opportunity being provided for full deliberation and consideration of the defence situation, and that before any definitive legislation is introduced for further reorganization a full and searching inquiry should be undertaken? Was such a telegram received? Will th Acting Prime Minister give an assurance to the house that before we leave now, not months hence but before this present portion of the session ends, this house will have an opportunity of dealing with the haphazard and excessive actions of the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition knows very well that he cannot qualify his question in the way he has done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I withdraw the qualifications, Mr. Speaker. I ask, will the Acting Prime Minister give such an assurance, that we may know in the next few days just where Canadian defence is going, and that parliament will have an opportunity to give this matter consideration?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I I have received a telegram from Mr. Hilborn. I propose to reply by telling Mr. Hilborn that the Minister of National Defence will be introducing legislation at this session to amend the National Defence Act and that this legislation will be referred to the committee on defence, where a full and searching examination can take place. In giving that reply I hope I have not destroyed the reputation for dependability which my right hon. friend was kind enough to attribute to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can only say to the hon. gentleman that he has not added to that reputation. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, before we adjourn following discussion of the subject of inflation, this house is going to have the opportunity of dealing with this matter so the Canadian people can find out what is the situation and ascertain the true facts in connection therewith.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think my reply was as comprehensive as it could be at this moment. We will have to see what progress is made. When the legislation is introduced the Minister of National Defence does intend to see that the legislation is referred to committee, and it is clear that he is very anxious to have the most searching examination made of a policy which I think increasingly seems to commend itself to many people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he going to amend another brief?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence which is supplementary to an earlier question. Did I understand him correctly when he seemed to imply that evidence was given before the defence committee which would lead the committee to suggest that unification of the armed forces might be beneficial? I specifically say "unification"; I am not referring now to integration.

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker. Although there may have been suggestions to that effect, I think what was shown to the satisfaction of most members of the committee was that the integration process has proceeded satisfactorily, that it is a good program, and that it is in fact a good foundation upon which to build a unified defence force for Canada.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I disagree with the conclusion of the minister that unification—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to ask his question.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I will proceed now with my supplementary question and ask the minister if he could tell the house what General Allard meant when he said, "We realize what people are saying. We will go through with the program. It will make all Canadians proud of the Canadian forces." Is this meant to imply that Canadians have not been proud of the forces in the past?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not proper. I do not think it is proper to ask what was meant by another's speech, or in a speech made outside this house by another person.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order. May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that on August 30 I asked the Minister of National Defence who was responsible and in charge in his department. He replied, and I quote from page 7797 of Hansard:

> I have to accept the responsibility for all the actions that were taken.

His chief of staff is now speaking on his behalf as a propaganda agent for unification, and the minister should take the responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order. I have to so rule. I do not think the minister should reply to the question, because what the hon. member for Queens asked was what did it mean when this person made such and such a statement. Certainly that is not a proper question.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege; I cannot allow my hon. and gallant friend to make a statement like that, reflecting, as it does on a gallant and dedicated officer of the Canadian armed forces in a way that I feel is quite uncalled for. I hope the hon. member will withdraw his statement.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister very much for talking about gallant officers. I know the service of General Allard, and I hope he knows mine. But if the minister is going to be responsible for things that take place in his department he must be responsible for statements made by the chief of staff, and his point of privilege is not well taken.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest there is no question of privilege, just as there was no point of order.

[Later:]

Mr. Forrestall: One further question to the Minister of National Defence. I would ask him whether during his forthcoming trip to the maritime command area, particularly to Halifax, Greenwood, Summerside and other points directly concerned, he intends to make opportunities available to all the men to express frankly their views on unification.

Mr. Hellyer: Plans are being made which will permit a very large cross-section of the men and officers of all ranks to express their views freely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister spoke of plans. Will he tell us what those plans are which will secure the opinions of the men and women serving in the ranks?

Mr. Hellyer: The plan which the hon. gentleman was just talking about was for me to go and talk to them, and that is what I intend to do in two or three weeks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister now say that his august presence among members of the armed forces will take the place of information of a dependable character?

Mr. Hellyer: On the contrary. It will be that.

LABOUR RELATIONS

KINGSTON, ONT.—CROSSING OF PICKET LINES BY ARMED FORCES MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I sent notice this morning. In view of the urgency of the situation and the importance of maintaining good public relations between the armed services and civilians, will the minister ask the commander at training command at Westwin, Manitoba, to use all legitimate influence to stop NCO's at Kingston moonlighting by driving cabs through the legal picket lines of some 800 employees at Millhaven Fibres in the Kingston area?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I should like to take that question as notice, and hope to be able to give an answer tomorrow.

REPORTED CONTINUATION OF PICKETING AT RAILWAY YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport. In view of the goings-on that were manifested yesterday in some of the railway yards across the country by railroad workers, are any measures being taken to protect those who want to go back to work against those who are still doing some picketing at the main gates of different terminals? Are any security measures being taken to protect these workers?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the return to work has been proceeding at a very satisfactory pace. There has practically been a return to normalcy, which I am sure is a fact that will be received with great gratification by the house generally.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister especially about the situation that exists in respect of those who have taken spare time jobs and are not in a rush to go back to work. Will any legal measures be taken against those still picketing and causing a little bit of difficulty for the good natured or good hearted ones going back to work?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend recognizes that parliament has taken a decision. I hope he would agree that the reply I have already made is the kind of reply that is more conducive to a satisfactory disposition of this matter than anything that might be regarded as provocative.

WATER RESOURCES

UNITED STATES CONFERENCE ON WATER FOR PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wish to direct my question to the minister of national resources. In the light of the fixing of May 23 as the date for the opening of the international conference on water for peace at Washington, is the minister now prepared to formulate and state the Canadian government's position on water policy; and in particular will he say that the government will not enter into a discussion of sharing water on a continental basis at least until the national policy has been stated, debated and settled?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for not responding immediately to the hon. member's question, but I am not used yet to being addressed as the minister of national resources. My title has not been changed officially and I am still referred to as the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

I will answer the hon. member's question by saying that we have been informed that the United States government plans to issue invitations to all governments with which it maintains diplomatic relations and to international organizations concerned with water questions. The government, however, has not as yet had the time and opportunity to explore fully the implications of this important initiative on the part of the United States. Considerable concern is felt, however, that such a conference, if it is to succeed, should engage the efforts of other countries not only in its execution but also in its planning. Indeed, the period of time envisaged by the United States for this important preparatory work is not very long if the conference is to be held in May of 1967.

The Canadian government will of course give careful and sympathetic consideration to the United States invitation when it is received. However, the invitation not having been received as yet it would not be proper for me to comment further on the announcement.

In answer to the second part of the hon. member's question let me say we are doing everything possible to develop a Canadian water policy. In Winnipeg recently my hon. friend and I had a very interesting public discussion on that subject. The press was pleased to report that we were very much in agreement on this matter.

Mr. Fulton: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like the minister to make a statement now clarifying the government's position so as to give him a basis upon which to make a stand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's second question is argumentative. I suggest to him that his request to the minister should be made on motions if it is to be considered by the minister.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was really asking whether the minister will answer the second part of my question, namely, will the government make it clear that it will not enter into a discussion on the sharing of waters on a continental basis until a national policy has been stated, debated and settled?

Mr. Pepin: That is the general position I took in Winnipeg, at which time the hon. member seemed to agree with it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure this house in a few brief words that the government of Canada will not undermine the desire of the Canadian people to protect their water resources?

Mr. Pepin: Quite right.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a further supplementary question. In view of President Johnson's recent statement that war or pure water appeared to be the world's choice, does the government consider this philosophy of water or war has any application to Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe this is a question that can be asked at this time.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PROPOSED VISIT TO CANADA BY THE QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. In view of the apparent announcement from London that the Queen has accepted an invitation to be present in Canada during the centennial celebrations next year, I wonder if the minister has any statement for the House of Commons on this very important matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I think it will perhaps be later in the week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he is in a position now to advise the house what day this week he expects to introduce the debate on the economic situation existing in the country today.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that this is the next order of business before the house. The sooner the house disposes of the transportation bill, the sooner I will be able to do that. I think it is the right order of business.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—REPLIES FROM PREMIER RESPECTING FEDERAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister.

Would the minister tell the house if the federal government has heard from the premier of Quebec about the federal legislation on various constitutional matters, in reply to letters from the Prime Minister?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether or not we did get replies. I will inquire and I might be able to give an answer tomorrow or Thursday.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION RESPECTING SAFETY FEATURES ON AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the senseless and record slaughter on our highways this last Labour day week end, and in view of the fact that President Johnson has put or is about to put his signature of approval on a highway and automobile safety bill recently passed through the congress of the United States, I would now ask the Minister of Industry whether the government is considering similar federal legislation in Canada to provide for the protection of the Canadian people?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, it is recognized that the United States has passed a bill in relation to safety features on motor cars. I am glad to say that it appears, partly indeed as a consequence of the automotive agreement with the United States, that those features on cars for sale in the United States will also be available on cars for sale in Canada.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question which might be considered complementary. Once the government has brought in this legislation to provide for safer cars in Canada, will the minister also bring in a bill to provide for safer drivers in the country?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that legislation respecting driving habits is a provincial, not a federal, responsibility.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I know that; it is the individual's responsibility, too.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): I have a question for the Minister of Industry supplementary to the one asked earlier by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. The minister indicated that the safety features which are to become compulsory in the United States will be available in Canada. Does this mean they are to be standard equipment on all Canadian cars, or will the consumer be required to pay extra for these particular devices which are to be available in the United States?

Mr. Drury: I merely said that the safety items which will be available on cars manufactured in the United States will also be available on Canadian manufactured cars.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question. I do not mean this to be argumentative in any way, but in so far as the United States legislation affects both imported and second hand cars does the minister not feel that specific Canadian legislation in the automobile safety field is now required?

Mr. Drury: In relation to second hand cars, the hon. member is now suggesting, if I understood his question correctly, that a government program for the modification of existing cars be instituted. I do not think he really intends to suggest this. As to imported cars, I would point out that the vast bulk of the cars entering Canada enter from the United States.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR EARLIER APPLICATION OF FIXED VALUE FOR DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I apologize for not giving him notice, but it might be some antidote for him to know that his activities to date have received very favourable comment in the agricultural press of British Columbia.

Now for my question. In view of the fact that I am informed that potato growers in British Columbia suffered some loss because of the failure of the government to apply the fixed value for duty earlier on certain products, would the minister inform the house if it is possible for officials of his department to keep a record of and close watch on the maturity of crops in the United States and in Canada, so this duty can be applied when required, to protect Canadian producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a question to be asked at this time. The hon. member is making a suggestion for the consideration of the minister, which I assume will be taken into account.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS RESPECTING DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the critical economic situation of the dairy farmers, especially in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, can the minister tell the house if he has as yet had an opportunity either to meet or to set a date for a conference with the ministers of agriculture of these two provinces in regard to this most complex and important matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I agree that the problems of the dairy farmers, as well as those of other farmers in the country, should be subject to continuing review, and that we need to have continuing policies to improve their lot. Our present policy, which has raised the price of manufacturing milk from a national average of $2.76, which it was when we came to office, to $4 is a responsible step in this direction. To try to make it work more effectively I have arranged a meeting open to farm organizations, with the provincial ministers for this coming Friday.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO BOARD HEARINGS ON REGIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house whether, notwithstanding the fact that we have major transportation legislation before us at the moment, it is still the intention of the government to proceed with hearings on regional air policy in western Canada? Could the minister further inform the house when those hearings will take place?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not quite sure of the precise dates on which the hearings with respect to the application of TransAir to be relieved of the requirement to fly certain lines in the prairies are to be held. I think it is in October some time, but I shall inquire and inform the hon. gentleman as soon as possible. There is no question but that these hearings should be held, and they will be held.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it that the date has not been decided upon?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it probably has been, but I do not carry it in my head.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, of which I have not given him notice. On July 8 the minister announced that a white paper on immigration, proposing changes in the regulations, would soon be tabled or be made available. Could he now say how soon that will be?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think, Mr. Speaker, that I mentioned the white paper would be tabled in the very first days of the resumed session in October. That could mean the first, or second, or fifth or sixth day. I do not know the exact date, but I can assure the hon. member that it will be tabled soon because it is almost ready.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING CANADIAN OFFICES IN FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), but he has just left the house. I will therefore direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Martin).

Last night, on the television program "Aujourd'hui", the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out the differences between our immigration offices in England and in France, saying that our organization is perfect in England, while it is not in France.

Is the government taking steps in order that our immigration offices in France—there are three at the present time—may be improved and others may be established to interest French people in emigrating to Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I beg your pardon; I thought that question was directed to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, but I think the answer is in the affirmative.

[English]

UNITED NATIONS

REPORTED INTENTION OF SECRETARY GENERAL TO RELINQUISH OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having in mind today's reports from the United Nations that U Thant is being urged to reconsider his decision and to stand again for the position of secretary general, can the minister say what is Canada's position in regard to this move?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition intimated that he was going to ask a question along this line. I might say in reply that Canada has stated, as I mentioned last week, that it would wish to see the secretary general continue in that post. We have reaffirmed this desire since I replied to the question of the hon. member for Red Deer a few days ago.

The security council was to meet this week for the purpose of considering this matter. Wisely, I think, it has decided not to meet. I sincerely hope it will be possible for the secretary general to accept the strong urgings of so many nations in the world that he continue in this important assignment.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will say immediately that we wholeheartedly concur in the stand the minister has taken in this connection. Is it a fact that all the members of the United Nations are of the opinion that U Thant, because of the superlative capacity for leadership he has shown as secretary general, should continue; and that opinion having been conveyed to him, has he given any indication that he might reconsider his stand and accept an appointment, if not for the five year term for a two year term, in the interests not only of himself but of the world, for the preservation of peace?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know of no nation that is opposed to U Thant continuing in office. He has not, however, given any indication as to whether he would accept a draft. Proposals have been made that he should be offered a five year term, a three year term and a two year term. There has been no decision taken on that question by the members of the United Nations nor, as I say, was there any indication by U Thant of an intention to reconsider his decision, as he said last week that he was not going to be a candidate.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED DISSATISFACTION RESPECTING RECLASSIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the widespread dissatisfaction among members of the civil service because of the circumstance under which some have been advised of reclassification and have received adjustment cheques, while others working in the same offices have heard nothing? What is being done to rectify this situation?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. I have looked into the matter he has raised. We at once referred it to the Civil Service Commission, which advised me that it did not know of any such situation as the hon. member refers to, since each department is sending out certificates on its own. It may be that there is a shortage in some departments. The Civil Service Commission has advised me that it will look into the matter and report back, and I will advise my hon. friend immediately.

Mr. Chatterton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister mean to say that the Civil Service Commission is not aware of the fact that this situation was caused by a shortage of the conversion certificates, form 245?

Miss LaMarsh: That is correct. This is so because each department is handling the certificates itself.

WATER RESOURCES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS FROM ADDITIONAL STORAGE ON KOOTENAY LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I should like to take this opportunity to answer a question directed to me the other day by the hon. member for Kootenay West having to do with the application by Cominco Limited to store an additional two feet of water in Kootenay lake under certain conditions set out in the order of agreement.

In answer to this question I would say that the governments of Canada, United States and British Columbia, subject to appropriate conditions, have registered no objection to the approval of the application. The question of upstream and downstream benefits was discussed during the hearings. Prior to the hearings, as the hon. gentleman knows, this was the subject of an intensive study by the government. In stating the conclusions reached as a result of this study, the representative of Canada said at the hearings that it was fully recognized that the granting of the Cominco application would produce substantial benefits both to Canada and United States on a basis which would do full justice to the interests of the two countries.

The government of Canada placed great weight on the fact that the period involved was only one year, and that renewal for any additional period would require an entirely new application to be made.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I thank the minister for his answer. Should there be a renewal of this application, would the government of Canada then consider insisting on receiving downstream benefits?

NATURAL GAS

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF PIPE LINE DECISION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My question will be addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the cabinet be reconsidering its decision of a few days ago not to allow Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to move western gas into eastern Canada to assure its markets there? Will the hon. gentlemen be reconsidering this stand?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): The decision of the government has been announced.

Mr. Hamilton: I am afraid the Acting Prime Minister does not understand my question. I realize the government's decision has been announced. I am asking whether it is the plan of the government to reconsider its refusal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think so.

Mr. Starr: Why not backtrack on that, too, and keep up the record?

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question to direct either to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the Minister of Fisheries, preferably to the one who can give me the most illuminating answer. I should like to know when we can expect to see established the base lines from which to measure our 12 mile fishing zones.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I can assure the hon. member that my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been very active in getting the ground ready for early action to be taken in this regard.

Mr. Barnett: How much longer will we have to wait? May I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether this is the same sort of action we have experienced over the past two years?

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Friday, September 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. C-231, do define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with some hesitation because of my limited knowledge of the complex field of railway rates and transportation policy generally.

Bill No. C-231 was presented to the house by the minister last Thursday in the course of a very light and witty speech, a speech which caused me and, I believe, many members of this house concern because we had agreed to forgo the resolution stage of the bill in order to co-operate with the government in bringing the legislation forward. Clause 1 sets out the transportation policy and the remaining clauses, which are many in number, attempt to spell out how the government intends to enunciate and carry out that policy. In some respects the bill takes the wraps off the railroads and allows them to charge whatever is feasible, whatever is economically sound or, in some cases, whatever they can get away with.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Over a number of years we have had various transportation boards. This bill sets up one huge 17-man board encompassing all others. This immediately causes me some concern because how can 17 men reach a decision any quicker than the five members of the present Board of Transport Commissioners?

In considering a transportation policy for Canada we must do so with caution because today Canada is at the crossroads in many aspects. In recent years we have seen many policies which have done good but which have divided Canada. In looking back over the transportation history of this country we must realize that it was our transportation and railroad policies which brought Canada together in the very beginning. Those policies must remain sound and must remain fair and just to all parts of Canada or they will have a diversifying effect. You, Mr. Speaker, as well as other members of the house, know that there are too many diversifying elements in Canada today. As members of this house we must ensure that this bill will do nothing to diversify Canada further but will aid in uniting the country as the railway transportation policy did in the very beginning of Canada's history.

[Mr. Barnett.]

In first looking at the bill it seems to me that it is a monstrosity. I see nothing good in it for my part of Canada. This may alarm some members. This bill has been talked about a great deal as being a vast improvement over Bill C-120 which was brought before this house in 1964. How is it an improvement. The Minister of Transport says he would like to see this bill proceeded with with all haste so that the railways might be able to compensate themselves for the minimum wage increase which this house has just assured to the workers. This again causes me some concern because I immediately ask myself, where and how do the railways hope to compensate themselves for this wage increase?

Last week we were told that the wage increase would mean something like $7 million or $8 million for every 1 per cent of increase. We know now what this will mean. With a minimum wage increase of 18 per cent the railways will have to obtain approximately $144 million to $150 million in increased revenue. Where is this going to come from? We are told that the bill will give the railroads the privilege to collect this increased amount of money, and we are told we must proceed with the bill with all haste so that the railways can then start collecting. I think that we as members of parliament owe it to the people we represent to take a very close look at the bill.

First, what does it do? It sets up a 17-man board which, to say the least, will be unwieldly at times. Then it goes on to state what the board will be engaged in. It will be engaged in inquiries; in fact, there will be a continuous inquiry into the whole transportation policy. As the minister said in his opening remarks, the inquiry need not be made public but may be kept confidential. This is stated in the explanatory note on page 26 of the bill. So we have a board to be composed of 17 men which will inquire into all aspects of transportation in Canada and will make rulings as a result of such inquiry. In the past we have had adjustments in the transportation policy which have been arrived at as a result of independent inquiries at which the public could appear. Here we have a transportation board which may in the future carry on inquiries which will be confidential, the results of which may not be made public and which may in some cases be carried out by the very people who perhaps will be trying to substantiate results they have already arrived at. This gives me some concern.

It is not necessary that the inquiries of the board which is involved here be made public, nor is it necessary that the recommendations as a result of such inquiries be made public. Certainly I can see that the recommendations resulting from an inquiry will be made public whenever the Governor in Council agrees to carry out those recommendations, but if the Governor in Council should disagree with them I can readily see that those recommendations would not be made public. The bill states that they need not be made public.

In looking at other clauses in the bill we see that various shippers may appear before the board but then the right of appeal is right back to the same board. I see it is suggested that if the chairman is involved in the initial ruling the vice chairman shall preside over the appeal. This is a situation which does not appeal to me as a shipper who might be appearing before the board in argument.

Let us take a look at how the railways will obtain the $150 million increase in revenue which we are told this bill is going to give them the right to collect. First of all we are told that the railroads have not been able to meet their costs because rates have been frozen. We have been told that all freight rates have been frozen since 1959. Actually, only all class rates and non-competitive rates have been frozen since 1959. The railroads have been able to increase their agreed charges and their competitive rates. No ruling by this House of Commons has changed this.

What do these rates account for? What percentage of railroad revenue has been derived from the various rates? Class rates account for 4.7 per cent of their revenue. These figures are taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics way-bill analysis for 1964. Non-competitive rates accounted for 29.6 per cent of railway revenue. Therefore while rates were frozen on something like 33 or 34 per cent of railway revenue this bill will take the off wraps in a sense and allow the railways to increase them. In other words, it might well be said that the railways are going to increase these two classes of rates by such an amount that they will be able to collect the additional $144 million to $150 million.

For those who are concerned, I might also add that the statutory rates, which are the Crowsnest pass' rates, account for 13 per cent of railway revenue, competitive rates account for 27.3 per cent and agreed charge rates account for 25.2 per cent. Mind you, there has been no freeze on competitive and agreed charge rates. They have agreed to increase these and have increased them right along. Therefore, according to the 1964 way-bill analysis the railways have increased something like 52 per cent of their revenue in any case.

The other night the minister assured me that as long as he was Minister of Transport and as long as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was Prime Minister of this country the statutory grain rates, the Crowsnest pass rates, will not be increased and will remain the same.

Let me return to my original analysis of this situation. The increased revenue which the railways must have and which hopefully will result from the passage of this bill will be derived from the movement of goods under the class and non-competitive rates. These account for 33 per cent of their present revenue. Now we come to the crux of the problem.

Where are most commodities shipped under class and non-competitive rates? I want every member of this house to take note of this situation, particularly those members from western Canada and the maritimes because those are the areas from which this increased revenue will be derived. What did Canada's transportation policy mean to the unification of Canada? The transportation policy was the Magna Carta of the west and a basic reason for confederation in the maritimes. This policy had a great deal to do with the uniting of Canada. What does this present bill do? It puts aside those historic facts and, to use a common expression, throws the maritimes and the western part of Canada to the wolves. It does not continue to help unite Canada but rather divides Canada in no uncertain terms. It will have the same effect in some parts of northern Quebec and Ontario.

Let us consider the evidence given before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in 1964 and 1965 in order to find out the extent of the movement of goods under class and non-competitive rates in various parts of Canada. The table I refer to is printed in a report of the committee for March of 1965 and is dated 1963. It was the most recent table available at that time.

Referring to page 968 of that report we find that goods from western Canada to the maritimes which moved under class and non-competitive rates accounted for 60.7 per cent of freight between those areas. Sixty per cent of the movement of goods from western Canada to the maritimes was moved under class and non-competitive rates. This table indicates that 70 per cent of all goods moved from the maritime region to western Canada was moved under class and non-competitive rates. That figure appears at page 973 of this report.

Of all goods moved from western Canada to eastern Canada nearly 50 per cent, actually 44.4 per cent, was moved under class and non-competitive rates. Nearly half of all freight movement from western Canada to eastern Canada moved under these rates. These rates apply to all goods except grain, for example, and the wraps are to be removed to allow the railway companies to increase their revenue by x millions of dollars.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I do not wish to lose my train of thought.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope to get the hon. gentleman's train back on the rails by asking this question. The hon. gentleman suggested that the wraps were to be removed from non-competitive and class rates. Does he not realize that the non-competitive rates are to remain under control and, if I understand what he means by "wraps", these rates are to be kept under wrap and will continue to be under control?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will deal with that point in a minute or two. It is interesting to note the minister's thinking in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked a question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will deal with that question before I complete my remarks. If I do not perhaps the minister will ask the question again.

Let us consider the movement of goods from the eastern region to western Canada. This table in the same report indicates that 40 per cent of all goods from eastern Canada to western Canada, including the farm machinery we buy and the automobiles purchased by every Tom, Dick and Harry in western Canada, is shipped under class and non-competitive rates. There is a heavy movement of freight from western Canada to the maritimes and the rest of Canada under non-competitive and class rates.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Let us consider the movement of freight within the maritime provinces. This same report at page 971 indicates that 55.8 per cent of the movement of all freight within the maritime provinces moved under class and non-competitive rates. That should be of particular interest to the members from the maritimes. The minimum increase in revenue of $150 million will result from the movement of freight now being moved under those rates.

Let us consider the movement of freight in the western region, in which area I have always felt there was a good network of highways. Of all freight movement in western Canada, excluding grain 22 per cent comes under class or non-competitive rates. In western Canada 39 per cent of all freight is moved under the statutory Crowsnest rate and agreed charges rates. Competitive rates apply to 38.4 per cent of all freight movement. The rates in respect of 22 per cent of all freight will be allowed to increase, those in respect of 39 per cent of all movement will remain frozen and the 38.4 per cent of freight movement under the competitive rates will remain relatively the same.

Let us deal with the non-competitive aspect mentioned by the minister when he said that non-competitive rates would remain the same.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said they would remain under control.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am glad the minister has corrected me. Let us see under what control these rates will remain. Non-competitive rates will apply to shippers or areas designated as captive shippers or areas. What formula will be used and where will captive areas and shippers be found? I suggest they will be found in the prairies and the maritimes, and the formula that will be used is related to 150 per cent of variable costs. What is the situation regarding areas where competition is keen? This bill states, as was stated in the previous bill, that these rates must be compensatory in relation to variable costs only. In other words, the non-competitive rate will be 50 per cent higher than the competitive rate. We in the west and the people in the maritimes—I was going to suggest the minister also but he is very rarely in the maritimes—will have to pay 50 per cent higher freight rates than people in other areas of Canada.

At page 37 this bill sets out that in not later than three years the commission shall make a study of the Crowsnest pass rates. What will the commission attempt to determine and why is the government suggesting that a study should be made? Surely the answer to that question is that the government hopes a deficiency area can be found in order that the railways can be compensated for their losses and thereby gain increased revenue.

I look at this particular clause of the bill and consider how it will affect me or any other member of the house in running an industry when we realize that within the next three years the government is going to have the commission make a study of that industry and ascertain how large a subsidy, if any, is to be paid after the three-year period has expired. I know what I would do. I would try to minimize my efficiency in the next three years. I would try to paint a picture of dire need of a subsidy as huge as I could logically expect to be paid. This clause is suggesting to the railways that they should be inefficient for the next three years and they will be compensated forever from that time onward.

This clause should be taken out of the bill completely. It is not necessary that it be there. If the government wants to have the commission to be set up make such a study, it can have it do so, but this is what I should like to know from the minister. Does the government feel that the Crowsnest pass rates, with the volume of grain that is being moved today, was moved last year and will be moved next year and in the future, are causing the railways to lose money? If this is what the government feels, let it say so. If it believes that railways will be losing money in the next three years, then it does not have too much confidence in the world wheat situation. I should like an answer to this question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asked me a question. Would he permit me to answer it right away?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: My answer is that Mr. MacPherson and his commission agreed with the railways that they were losing money on these rates. After full examination we are not convinced of that claim. That is why we took out of the old bill the fixed amount that was to have been paid in respect of these losses and put in instead a provision that there should be an investigation to see whether there were any losses. We decided not to assume, as was assumed in the bill drawn up by the hon. gentleman's friends, which we inherited, and in the bill we introduced—I am not blaming the hon. gentleman's friends because they followed the commission and so did we—that there was a loss. We have now decided not to make any such assumption and to have an independent inquiry to see what the truth is. That is the difference.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Once again the minister is getting a little ahead of me. I was going to deal later with this particular aspect of the report of the MacPherson commission, but I will deal with it right now. Before doing so I want to conclude my remarks with regard to the study of the crowsnest pass rates. I believe this clause is not necessary unless the government feels that today the Crowsnest pass rates are losing money or that within three years they will be losing money and will not provide a proper return for the railways. We must remember that the MacPherson commission report was based upon export shipments of 1958. This is one of the difficulties into which governments get from time to time. They set up commissions to study various questions but before they get around to acting on their reports they are out of date. This is true particularly of the report of the MacPherson commission with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates. I believe that in 1958 an independent study arrived at a figure of a loss of $2 million under the Crowsnest pass rates. This figure was arrived at in connection with moving something like 316 million bushels of wheat for export and a total volume of wheat, including that moved within Canada, of some 450 million bushels.

What did the railways move last year and what do they propose to move this year? The figure is well up in the region of 700 million bushels or 800 million bushels and may be 900 million bushels including coarse grain within Canada. We have nearly two and a half times the volume moved in 1958. How is this volume being moved? It is being moved on the same trackage and in some cases on less trackage. The railways are moving it with modernized equipment and greatly speeded up handling facilities in some cases, although in others there is still a dire need of improved handling facilities.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the MacPherson commission report is outdated with respect to the Crowsnest pass rates and the movement of grain, particularly in light of the increased modernization of handling facilities today. In fact, transportation and railway movement have undergone such a change since 1958 that we find optimism in the transportation industry rather than the pessimism that existed in that year because of the desire for wholesale rail abandonment. Today there is not the same desire. Many of those railway lines are paying and in fact I am sure the minister will agree that perhaps only a quarter of the proposed line abandonments are really necessary today in light of the movement of grain and other commodities. This only points up the changed outlook in today's railway movement and in transportation policy generally. We have the movement of potash, we have grain volume tripled, we have every commodity one could mention moving by rail and other transportation facilities in increased tonnages in comparison with the 1958 figures.

I am not going to deal with all the aspects of this bill. The whole rationalization question could be dealt with. The whole passenger question should be dealt with and perhaps will be before the passage of the bill. In summarizing what I have tried to put before the house, Mr. Speaker, I would say this. We are told by the government and the minister that the passage of this bill is important and he urges us to pass it quickly so the railways may begin increasing their revenues to offset the minimum increase in labour costs which they will have to face. I ask hon. members before they vote in favour of the bill to consider who is going to pay for it. Eighty per cent of the increased revenue will come from western Canada and the maritimes from freight movement either to or from or within those areas.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him one more question? He has asserted about four times now that extra revenue is going to come from the maritimes. Would he explain how this is going to be done, when all the maritimes' rates are specifically frozen in this bill?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Perhaps a maritimes member will deal with this matter at greater length than I, but as I read the bill the maritimes rates are frozen for two years. What happens after that?

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Read the bill.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The minister says "read the bill". I think I have read it backwards and forwards. Perhaps my interest mainly lies in the increased cost to western Canada. I do not deny this. However, I am fully convinced, and I would like to convince more hon. members, that this bill takes the wraps off the railroads by allowing them to increase class and non-competitive rates. This puts the burden mainly on those regions which were brought into consideration by a transportation policy involving subsidies. It is those areas which will be thrown to the wolves so far as increased rates are concerned. They will be paying the increased revenues to the railways when they use this legislation for this purpose.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-231 now under study indicates that the government is preparing to define a general transportation policy for Canada. This new piece of legislation will be known as the National Transport Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we consider the principles of the bill, we realize that its primary purposes are the abandonment of uneconomic railway lines; the abolition of subsidies to railway companies and the removal of the ceiling on freight rates so as to enable the railway companies to increase their rates in order to meet higher current expenditures.

As a matter of fact, Bill No. C-230 passed last week authorized additional expenditures of $170 million by 1967 and of $148 million every subsequent year. This means that in 1968, 1969 and in the ensuing years, the national railway companies will have to anticipate additional expenditures amounting to about $148 million per year.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this bill, as others which we have passed in other areas, will eventually bring about an increase in the cost of living. Eliminating subsidies to the railways and giving them power to increase their freight rates will clearly bring about an increase in freight rates of 10, 15 or even 20 per cent. The companies will not be paying such amounts. The consumers will. We will be paying more for our food, clothes, rents, lumber, materials, etc. In other words, everything will go up. Prices will increase again at a time when we are considering how to fight inflation pressures in Canada.

When the government gave subsidies to the Canadian National, we felt this was nonsensical, because private enterprise such as the trucking industry, for instance, was being taxed in order to subsidize a competitor called the Canadian National. It was complete nonsense to tax private enterprise to maintain a state enterprise; it is neither honest, equitable, or decent toward the trucking industry.

By eliminating subsidies, we are reverting to competition which, to my mind, is more equitable. This will force the railroads as I said to increase their freight rates. The result will be an increase of the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, it is not by legislation of this nature that we are going to change the economic situation in Canada. We will be going full speed toward inflation if we pass bills of this nature. We legalize inflation by applying such legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing for a long time here, in this chamber, all that legislation of the government seeking to give inflation a permanent hold. When we, Social Crediters, we, of the Ralliement créditiste, ask for increased income for labour, for the Canadian population as a whole, surely it is not through increased freight rates, nor through salary increases, which will have a direct impact on prices. Proof is that we are told that the 18 per cent to be granted to railway workers between now and next year will cost $160 million. The answer does not lie in the 18 per cent or 25 per cent increase, because this goes directly into product prices.

There is another way, which we suggest: It is not for the government to determine rates, no, but it is the government's responsibility to show at all times Canadian consumer requirements with regard to buying power for the purchase of products manufactured and existing in Canada. Legislation should be passed which is aimed at balancing the economic system, and not at further unbalance. We do not want an inflationary law.

When we suggest that the government should use the Bank of Canada to balance the Canadian financial system, this is completely different from what we see in Bill No. C-231, which authorizes a price increase while we propose to use new Bank of Canada credits, which do not figure in prices and which are distributed to each and every Canadian citizen. This means an increase in the income of Canadians enabling them to buy commodities made by Canadians. Seeing that prices are not affected by this additional income, it is therefore clearly anti-inflationary and "anti-deflationary" also. There would never be any danger either of deflation, where people would lack purchasing power to buy the production, or of inflation, i.e. a situation where people would have a purchasing power greater than the country's production.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the government and all the ministers are aware that our national production this year will reach some $55 billion. On the other hand, Canada's total national revenue will barely reach $42 billion.

How can $55 billion worth of national production be bought up by $42 billion? That is the actual problem; it is too often forgotten, and the government and its economists and advisers are not interested therein. Their main concern is to take away some of the purchasing power from those who do not have too much and give some to those who have even less; this is supposed to balance the economy.

The personal revenue of each individual is not a solution. It is not the Canadian millionaires who prevent the less well-to-do from making a living but the economic system. The millionaire does not eat his millions, he eats food for nourishment, wears clothes, and seldom puts on two suits at once; he wears one at a time.

The rich man also is not the one who prevents the poor man from making a living; it is the financial system which prevents each and every one from sharing in the wealth produced by the natural resources and industry in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, a bill is never introduced to balance purchasing power and national production in Canada. The bills that are introduced settle nothing, or will only help to increase the cost of living, so that the less wealthy will continue to suffer. We have seen this in the passing of Bill No. C-230 which complements or lays the foundation for Bill No. C-231. We do not give an 18 per cent salary raise because of the skill of the worker but because the cost of living has increased. The cost of living has gone up for the railway employee earning $2 an hour as well as for the employee earning $4 an hour. But the 18 per cent pay increase will give to the latter 72c over the next twelve months but only 36c to the former. So, once again, there is a difference, that is double between the salaries of the high and the low wage-earners. Again, the one getting the higher salary will be getting the larger share.

Therefore, a bill is being passed for the benefit of the high wage-earner. But, is the pound of butter not selling at the same price for the person earning $2 an hour as for the person earning $4? If the pay increase had been set at a fixed sum for everybody across Canada, it would not have doubled the salaries, for the difference in salary between those earning $2 or $1.50 or $1.25 an hour and those earning $4.25 or $3.75 would have remained the same. Employees would have continued to be paid according to their responsibilities. But this pay increase will not be the same for all the citizens, for all the railway employees, and this applies in any field; for instance, in the mining industry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that this Bill No. C-231 will cause the cost of living across Canada to rise.

Some members have mentioned uneconomic lines, railway lines which the government will be abandoning soon because they are not bringing in good returns.

• (4:00 p.m.)

In this case, the service question is involved, the requirements of railroad service or services in certain areas of Canada. There are in the eastern region, in Quebec, in Ontario some unprofitable railway lines; there are some out west, among the farmers of northern Saskatchewan, for instance; there are some in Manitoba. All are nevertheless necessary to serve a part of the population. At such times the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and the government consider the question of dollars and cents. To maintain a line in operation no account is taken of the service rendered to the farmer who must ship his grain, nor of the services that must be given to the passengers who may not be in sufficient numbers to make a line profitable. But there again the dollars and cents factor is being considered instead of the social angle, the sheer service angle. A service for the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the government should be rather concerned with the possibility of passing proper legislation which will ensure service and make financially possible what is physically feasible.

We have been saying it over and over again for a long time. I know that deep inside most members understand the logic of this solution. But we are afraid, we fear to air it, we are afraid to deal with the financial question. Everybody is being attacked; that is alright. Bills to lessen human beings, to reduce individual initiative, to reduce private enterprise, that is alright. But any legislation to bring finance face to face with the facts, to place finance at the service of such initiatives, those are things the government has no right to discuss. We speak of inflation, yes, but we blame it all on the worker, the manufacturer, the small businessman who has a hard time making ends meet under the present system. They are said to be the cause of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, did you hear the hon. Minister of Finance, or the hon. Minister of Transport, or the government, speak of the interest we pay solely on the Canadian national debt? Is this not a cause of inflation? And no one dares speak about it. Nobody mentions the fact, for instance, that a Canadian purchasing a small home, under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, over a period of 25, 30 and even 35 years, will have paid the price of three homes, once his house is paid for, but received only one—at the end of 25 years, 30 years, he will have paid for three homes and, at that time, his home will no longer be of any value. That is inflation. And Bill No. C-231 is a step in that direction, just as all governmental organizations are.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house, but I point out to you and to the hon. Minister of Transport the importance and the urgency of having a clean financial policy for Canada, taking into account realities, not obscure things. Let us be realistic and introduce legislation rendering financially possible that which is physically desirable and feasible.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we would have much less of those disastrous strikes in Canada and we would see a political, economic and social revival that would ensure to workers, farmers and everybody, economic security in individual freedom. That is what the Créditistes want for Canadians and that is what the Créditistes are asking for and demanding of the present government of Canada.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few general observations on this bill at this time. We are told that the bill aims to promote the development of a transportation policy for Canada. In that connection I should like to quote briefly from the explanatory note accompanying the bill. It reads in part as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to define a national transportation policy, to spell out the objectives of that policy and provide the necessary statutory provisions for the achievement of these objectives.

After reading the explanatory note we can look forward with great hope to the accomplishments that will be attained as a result of the passage of this legislation. I am quite sure we all realize that the major work in connection with this bill will be done during the study undertaken by the committee appointed to deal with the legislation, when an opportunity will be afforded to hear representations from various groups in this country.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we are wondering whether the new transportation commission proposal in this bill will be a repetition of 1938. In that connection I want to quote from today's Globe and Mail what I think is a very appropriate article. It is by Robert Rice Globe and Mail reporter, and reads as follows:

> • (4:10 p.m.)
> Will the new transport board be a repeat of 1938? "It shall be the duty of the board to perform the functions vested in the board . . . with the object of co-ordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers engaged in transport by railways, ships and aircraft . . . "
> —A clause in the 1938 act of parliament establishing the Board of Transport Commissioners to replace the Board of Railway Commissioners. "It is the duty of the commission to perform the functions vested in the commission . . . with the object of co-ordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers engaged in transport by railways, water, aircraft, extra-provincial motor vehicle transport and commodity pipe lines . . ."
> —A clause in the 1966 bill to establish the Canadian Transport Commission to replace the Board of Transport Commissioners, the Air Transport Board and the Canadian Maritime Commission.
> It almost seems as if history is repeating itself.
> Twenty eight years ago, Parliament gave the job of co-ordinating rail, ship and air transport to the Board of Transport Commissioners.
> Six years later, in 1944, it spun off aircraft control and turned it over to the newly formed Air Transport Board. Three years after that, it set up the Canadian Maritime Commission to keep an eye on shipping operations.
> And now, in 1966, it is being asked to start all over again and bring the three separate agencies together under one roof, with the added responsibility for inteprovincial trucking and commodity pipe lines.
> Will this new move fare better than the ill-fated effort of 1938?
> The answer rests with Parliament as it plunges into the intricacies of the government bill to create the Canadian Transport Commission and reform the railways.
> But assuming Parliament approves the bill largely in its present shape, the real answer will lie in the hands of the 17 members of the new commission.
> It will be up to it to achieve the co-ordination and harmony that two royal commissions, almost everyone in the transportation industry, and the present Liberal government feel are essential if Canada is to achieve an efficient, low-cost system of moving goods and people.

I think that is an historically correct assessment of the situation and of the responsibilities that will rest on the 17 commissioners who will be appointed under this legislation.

This subject has been of great concern to the Canadian people over a long period of years. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that when I was elected vice president of the British Columbia Liberal Association the Liberal party at a convention adopted two resolutions which were of particular interest to me at that time. One was to provide for the nationalization of the banks in Canada, a resolution which was adopted at that convention by a majority vote. The second resolution was to provide for a rational transportation policy for Canada.

I must say in fairness that in both these instances the late Senator McGeer was a moving spirit, and I am sure that many of us remember his fight to obtain equitable freight rates for all regions in Canada. However, this revolutionary spirit in the Liberal party soon fizzled out and nothing was done about these two very important resolutions. Consequently, some time later I resigned from the acting presidency of the B.C. Liberal Association and joined the C.C.F. party. That was part of my progressive evolution, Mr. Speaker, if I may put it that way, in political affairs.

Then in 1931 we had the Duff commission which dealt with transportation problems. Then we had the Turgeon royal commission on transportation, which was appointed in 1948 and reported on January 9, 1951. Later we had the MacPherson royal commission, appointed in 1959, and its report lay on the minister's desk for years before any action was taken.

From the formation of the C.C.F. party, and since it has become known as the New Democratic Party, it has recognized the need for a national transportaion policy. I have heard this problem discussed at our national and provincial conventions over a long period of years. Very serious consideration was given to the matter by persons with some knowledge of economics, some knowledge of accounting and some knowledge of the requirements of the consumers whom the railways are supposed to serve.

To indicate that the government may be paying lip-service to one of our long-standing policies in the introduction of this bill, I will place on the record the program which was adopted by this party many years ago so that we will know where we stand in this respect. This is in brief the program for which we have stood for a long time. I have been a member of this house for 21 years and have heard this program placed before the house on numerous occasions when this party has urged upon the government the need for a national transportation policy. This is our program:

> Transportation is the most important public utility in Canada. In our country of vast distances and widely separated communities, economic and efficient transportation for the bulky primary products of the land, mine and forests is also a factor in linking our various economic regions into one great nation. Narrow profit considerations and lack of a comprehensive transportation policy have helped to produce a complicated and inequitable freight rate structure that has created bitter dissensions between different parts of the country.
> An over-all transportation policy based on broad considerations of national interest would integrate, as far as possible, rail, road, water and air services, establish non-discriminatory freight rate scales as a part of the whole transportation plan.
> The C.C.F. will also provide federal financial aid to the provinces for highways of national and international importance, including a trans-Canada highway system.

I cite that because here is an indication that in the introduction of this bill the government is at least paying lipservice to the policies which we have advocated throughout the years.

In my opinion the government has missed two outstanding opportunities for the development of a national transportation policy in this country. First, they missed an opportunity at the conclusion of the second world war, when the experience gained in the winning of the war and in the administration of the industries of this country could have been easily used to promote a national transportation policy. I think that the second occasion when the government lost the opportunity was at the time of the building of the trans-Canada pipe line, a time when the government actually provided loans for the building of this very profitable enterprise. I think, Mr. Speaker, that on those two occasions the government would have been well advised to advance the policy they are now advancing in this legislation.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the minister on his introduction of the bill, in which he obviously demonstrated that he had a wide knowledge of the subject and of the need for a national transportation policy. He spoke for almost two hours without a note and I though he made an excellent speech. As I say, I listened to it with great interest. I think we can say that the minister knows very well all of the aspects of the problem, but we will have to see what happens in the future to ascertain how his knowledge has been applied with respect to this legislation. When listening to the minister's remarks I could not help but think that here we have a minister who rises so quickly to a point of order in the house but takes so many years to rise to recognize the need for a national transportation policy in Canada.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I also listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) who indicated a wide knowledge of his subject. I thought he made a most interesting contribution to this debate. It was obvious as one listened to him that he was able to speak from a wide experience so far as western farmers and western conditions are concerned.

The leader of the New Democratic Party, a former premier of Saskatchewan, spoke with full knowledge of the question and of the attitude of western people to the abandonment of lines, passenger services in some instances, and the effect of freight rates on producers. I think it is quite safe to say that no member of this house can speak with greater understanding of this problem, and of the effect it will have on the lives of the producers and people generally in Canada, than the leader of this group. I remember quite well that he was one of the pioneers in our movement who first saw the need for a national transportation policy and urged that need at our national and provincial conventions. It is not a question of getting up here, supporting the legislation that has been brought in, saying amen, and so on. I mention these things to indicate that our movement and our leader in this house were pioneers in promoting the need for a national transportation policy and building up support in the country for that policy.

I thought the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) made a very interesting contribution. He delivered one of those very earthy speeches of his which are always closely related to the soil and the needs of those who cultivate the land, and he demonstrated that he understood the attitude of western producers and their determination to make certain that we have a transportation policy that is fair to all sections of the country.

While the debate on second reading of the bill has been interesting and informative to many of us—this is a very complicated question and I do not underestimate the difficulties at all; we realize that this is a very intricate, complicated and complex problem—I think we all realize that the real work in connection with this bill rests upon the shoulders of the committee to which the bill will be sent. The committee has a heavy task in this connection. It will have to hear representations. I urge that the committee take plenty of time to deal with this legislation and to get the opinions of those who are concerned.

In connection with the bill I want to make a few suggestions. We attended a very interesting briefing just before we came here. Questions were answered by the minister, the Minister without Portfolio, or by the deparmental officials who were present, and we were very glad to have the opportunity of hearing the answers. I was a bit concerned about the replies given to some questions, especially those having to do with rationalization. I am just wondering what will become of the railways as a result of what is known as rationalization. I wonder whether rationalization will mean that the Canadian Pacific Railway will continue to operate the Kettle Valley railroad at a considerable profit and yet refuse to grant a daily passenger service, because passenger service alone, it is considered, must make a profit. I hope rationalization will not mean that, and I trust it will not mean the abandonment of certain lines where the freight rates are bringing a nice profit to the company and where a passenger service is required but can only be operated at a loss.

That sort of thing will have to be found out when the committee meets. The committee will have to find out what various terms in the bill mean. I am hopeful that when the bill has been dealt with by the committee and returned to the house the recommendations of the committee will be such that I shall enjoy the opportunity to ride on the first passenger train to run again on the Kettle Valley railway.

Mr. Gundlock: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I see I have the support of my hon. friend from Lethbridge who is also interested in this question.

I emphasize again that one of the most profitable areas in the operations of the Canadian Pacific should not be denied passenger service simply because passenger service by itself operates at a small loss. I am looking forward to some support in this connection when the time comes to raise these matters before the committee. I am quite sure I can tell the minister that he has not heard the last of this question because our forces are being mobilized at this time in British Columbia.

May I make a few suggestions? I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that there should be further research into the requirements for freight and passenger service across Canada. When I talk of research I mean independent research. I am not talking about research carried on by the company itself but about independent research so that the facts may become known to the committee and to the public.

I suggest in that connection that we should have independent economists, independent accountants, independent engineers and all those other persons who are capable of undertaking this type of research. I am very hesitant about accepting the costs of operation placed by economists of the Canadian Pacific Railway before various organizations which have made protests about reduction or abandonment of various services. I think there must be further careful research into costs of operation and the costs of maintaining these services. The debate in this house has indicated the need.

A cost accountant can produce various results depending on how his task is undertaken and for whom. In this connection I want to quote briefly from the Financial Post of August 27 to indicate that this is a difficult question.

> MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. changed certain accounting methods which had the effect of increasing 1965 net profit by $3 million.
> In addition to these examples, some other factors may raise or lower reported earnings. The way a company reports reserves in its annual accounts may affect return on equity. Contingency reserves are frequently shown as a liability apart from shareholders' equity.
> Analysts often include contingency reserves in shareholders' equity when calculating ratios—whether or not the company does so.

It goes on to indicate that company accounting may be carried on in various forms to produce the result required on occasions.

I am very much of the opinion that the C.P.R., when it has been presenting its case to local authorities and groups, has been utilizing the accounting which places the company's position in the best aspect possible for the company's argument. I therefore suggest it is most important that the costs of maintaining these services be determined by independent economists, accountants and such other persons who have the necessary knowledge of railroad operations, air line operations, or sea transportation. I think that is necessary and I believe it is only fair to the Canadian people.

If this bill is finally to meet the needs of the Canadian people when it is returned to the house, the people must participate. We must seek the co-operation of all the Canadian people if this legislation is to be effective. The people must participate by making representations to the commiittee through the various organizations in Canada that represent them at this time. That is why I suggest the committee has a heavy and long task ahead of it.

Without doubt, if this bill is to be effective we must have the co-operation of provincial and municipal governments on the basis of an understanding of the problem and the legislation. Various trade unions, employees of the transportation companies, farmers, industrialists and consumers as well as many other groups will wish to advance their views before the committee. I maintain, however, that this cannot be done effectively unless the various organizations representing the public are informed of the nature of the problem. This is not easy. There will have to be serious study of the situation by those who represent these groups in our society.

I suggest, therefore, that all organizations wishing to make representations before the committee should be provided with, (1), a copy of the bill, (2), copies of the issues of Hansard covering the present debate, because I think the reading of Hansard would be of value to those who wish to make representations before the committee and, (3), copies of all other statistical information likely to assist them in arriving at a clear knowledge of the facts related to the development of a national transportation policy in Canada. It is only fair that those who intend to make representations, especially on behalf of organizations which are not directly in touch with this subject from day to day, should have such information.

[Mr Herridge.]

I should like to hear from the ministers on this point, believing as I do that if our democratic society is to function productively there needs to be a great deal of participation by the people themselves and their organizations so that the measures passed by this house are the result of a process which can actually be called co-operative democracy. I am keen on this idea because I realize more and more how easily government can draw apart from the people and fail to understand the needs or the motives of the people. On many occasions I have urged the government in power to ensure the participation of the people directly concerned with legislation which comes before us.

I say with confidence that the success of this measure is likely to depend entirely on the degree of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and upon the co-operation and participation of all those groups in our society who are concerned with the development of a national transportation policy.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the bill before us is lacking in concept. I do not wish to say this in an unduly critical way but, like so many members on this side of the house, I feel the measure should have been referred to a committee at an earlier stage than is now proposed. In these circumstances we have no alternative but to vote against the bill as it now stands on second reading.

I have said that the approach taken to the subject has been incorrect. I take this position because I find that the issue is based in a large degree on past experience, and when I say "past" I mean the comparatively recent past, even four or five years ago. In this connection I shall refer later to speeches which I have made in this house as late as the present year, 1966.

I am surprised that the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in particular have not given the whole subject of this legislation much greater consideration because in my view a great deal more consideration is required. During the present debate a number of speakers have pointed out how rapidly the situation is changing. The concept of railroading is changing almost from day to day, particularly in the area of freight rates. As an example of changing patterns I merely draw attention to the fact that the movement of wheat has practically doubled in the past four or five years from 400 million to 800 million bushels. This in itself, it seems to me, is reason enough why all those concerned should be allowed to present their views on the subject to a committee of parliament before this bill progresses further.

In this context I have in mind particularly the representatives of the labour organizations, those who represent the provinces and the municipalities, and those corporations from one end of this country to the other which are directly affected by transport legislation. Let us not forget that this bill does not merely affect certain parts of the nation. It affects western Canada, northwestern Ontario, northern Quebec, the whole country, in fact, with the exception of a relatively small area which may be indicated by drawing a line from Montreal to Windsor. I believe that an opportunity should be given to all concerned, right down to individuals, to express their views to a committee before the bill progresses to a point at which there is no recourse. We have accepted this principle in the case of other bills.

I appeal to the minister to consider seriously whether the course I have suggested cannot be taken. As I say, I do not wish to appear unduly critical. We who sit on this side of the house do not like to be criticizing continually without offering constructive alternatives. I say that the alternative is to send this measure to the committee first, not at some later stage, so that the house in reaching its conclusions may take into consideration the opinions of the people I mentioned earlier.

I enjoyed the reference by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) to the Kettle Valley because it is very close to my own constituency. We hear a great deal about the Crowsnest pass rates. For us, of course, the Crowsnest is part of the Kettle Valley line running from Lethbridge to Nelson and through the Kettle Valley to the coast.

I have suggested that this bill is preoccupied with the conditions of the past. In my opinion it should be based on the present and it should also look forward for a few years at least. It is most disappointing. I would point out again, as I did in a speech I made in this house on February 9, that when farmers move wheat, vegetables or other crops out of their areas they spend the money they receive on other goods produced, more often than not, in Canada.

I might refer specifically to the time nearly 25 years ago when I had a heating unit put in my farmhouse in Alberta. It was ordered from Montreal, and I think I can recall the actual address. I believe it was 242 Jarvis Street. I was reminded of this the other day when an hon. member of this house crossed the floor complaining in a sense about something like this. I thought that the rest of us showed much better sense many years ago than he was showing. As a matter of fact, this was at a time when he was a very young man. I am proud of that fact and I simply present it to emphasize part of my argument.

Whenever we make a profit in western Canada the money immediately becomes available to the rest of Canada. We are proud of that. This is part of our argument; this is the reason we so often have seemed to demand a certain service. I pointed out too in the same speech that the railway service is the worst we have had in history. Many excuses were offered and there were even investigations instigated. On February 7, as a matter of fact, the Board of Transport Commissioners authorized a probe into customer service. The emphasis of the inquiry was on a move the C.P.R. had made to improve customer service in respect of box cars.

At that time I tried to point out that the service had not been improved. A probe was instigated and apparently it showed that this was not the case. On Tuesday March 1, I pointed out the same thing again. There was nothing much done about it. The minister who speaks for the Canadian Wheat Board had some statistics which showed that the quotas were higher than actually was the case. These were given to him no doubt by the railroad or by the Wheat Board, but they were not correct. A day later I again pointed out what these charges meant and what the lack of service meant. I hope the minister will consider this matter because in legislation such as this we are looking forward. If we are not looking forward more than we were four or five or 30 or 40 years ago, if we are not looking forward having in mind the facts of today, then in my opinion we are not looking forward far enough.

This may sound a little like a chronology, but on March 4 I received a letter from a prominent man in the farm union who had gone to Vancouver in an effort to see what was the matter out there. He looked into the whole problem. As we pointed out at that time, it was not wholly the fault of the railways, but we are reminded of all these things when we are faced with a bill like this.

I am reminded also of passenger service, and if time permits I should like to go into that a little as well. On March 17 the statement was made that it seemed that the C.P.R. was not concerned about our area. It seemed that there were empty box cars going by local points to Calgary and Medicine Hat when the elevator companies had local orders for delivery to Calgary and Medicine Hat mills. I think these things should be brought to the attention of the committee and through the committee to the house.

I should like to go back to March 7 and a headline which reads, "Wheat Moves At Record Clip". This was a release by the C.P.R., as a matter of fact, which appeared in the Lethbridge Herald of March 7. This sounded good to me. As a matter of fact I even went to the telephone and called some people at home. It said, "the wheat growers are happy now." The answer was, "what are you talking about". I looked at the headline again. I began to look into it a little deeper. I looked at the profits of the C.P.R. and began to think that "clip" meant something other than speed. When you clip horses and cows for hair and sheep for wool and you come out with a record yield on clip, you have a record take. When I looked at the take of the C.P.R. generally and particularly in our area I rather enjoyed reading this headline, "Wheat Moves At Record Clip".

I do not make any claim to understand this bill as much as I should but, generally speaking, if the bill goes through with these increases I believe that the people in my area and those of northern Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes will take a very dim view of the people who represent them in this house. I think they would take a very dim view if we stood up, said our piece and then let the bill pass without opposition before we are assured there is full realization on the part of the minister and the government that railway shipping in particular is different from what it was four or five years ago and certainly much different from what it was 30 or 40 years ago.

I pointed out before the situation in respect of wheat. Hon. members have heard this before but I want to emphasize it. There are also the potash shipments, and in farming areas an increase in the volume of shipments has been brought about by mechanization and automation on the farm the application of new farming methods such as the utilization of fertilizer and things like that. As a prime example I might mention my own farm which I have farmed for 30 years. In my area we have had a most abundant crop. I have seen many good crops. This harvest we have had a particularly good yield. It was 30 bushels more than anything I could possibly imagine as a result of my own experience. The high yield was prevalent throughout the area and related not only to grain but small crops such as peas, beans, corn, cucumbers and many others. This not only will apply to agricultural products in the west but to the production of primary products—iron ore, pulp, etc.—in the eastern areas mentioned before, Quebec and northern Ontario, as well as the hard goods manufactured and shipped from the industrial area.

There has been a tremendous increase in production throughout the country which has given a boost to the Canadian economy. When a government considers a major revision such as the one embodied in the bill now before us, one which will probably be with us for 50 or 60 years, it should keep all the factors I have mentioned in mind. The Canadian public is aware of this increase in our productivity as are the railway companies who are taking advantage of it. One need only consider the railway companies' returns, the increase in the value of their stock and their increased dividends.

Why have the minister and the government not considered fully all the factors involved? Why has this bill not been drafted in a way that would indicate that due consideration has been given to its intent? Surely it is reasonable to ask that we be given an opportunity to hear from witnesses who have something to say about transportation in Canada before this house deals with a measure of this magnitude. I realize that not every member is interested in this type of thing, and that is only human nature. Some of us are interested in the operations of railways, some of us are interested in the price of bread, butter, eggs and fish, while others are interested in the Canadian economy generally. I urge the minister and the members of this house to consider this bill in the proper light. I appreciate the time I have been allowed to speak in this house and I hope the minister will consider some of the matters I have raised.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to make a few comments on Bill No. C-231 which is intituled:

An Act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

By this bill the federal government seeks to set up a Canadian transport commission and to provide for all modes of transport which come under federal jurisdiction such as railways, trucks engaged in extra-provincial activities, aircraft, coastal and inland vessels and pipe-lines.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a terrific expansion of transportation in the past ten years or so. As far as shipping is concerned, the St. Lawrence seaway has enabled Canada to make great progress in the fields of transport and trade by waterways.

Air transport has been characterized by the same dynamism in the last six years since another carrier, Canadian Pacific Airlines, is now in operation besides Air Canada. Other routes have been inaugurated which make Canada justly proud of the air services it provides for its citizens and foreigners.

In addition, over the past ten years there has been obvious and noticeable progress in transportation, especially in motor vehicle transport. That advance, that progress is due to the Trans-Canada highway which now links Canada from coast-to-coast and which allows for the efficient and speedy transport of passengers and freight by road.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Ten years ago highway transportation between or within the provinces was faced with many problems.

Finally, we note that during that decade, the railways, which were up against a keener competition from increased water air and highway transportation, have nevertheless continued to develop thanks to the many subsidies granted by the federal government, and the yearly subsidies they have received, especially since 1960. This brief review shows that water, air and highway transportation have made inroads upon the monopoly of transport held almost exclusively by the Canadian railways a dozen years ago.

Of course, this bill is very important and it was actually time it was introduced in this house, since a royal commission had made very worthwhile recommendations and suggestions many years ago. I am speaking of the MacPherson commission.

Of course, some reforms are called for and co-ordination and standardization regulations should be encouraged with regard to those four means of transportation, not to mention the field of pipeline transportation.

But, Mr. Speaker, if some reforms and standardization are advisable, this does not mean that everything must be changed overnight and that the useful contribution to the country of certain means of transportation, such as trucking, should not be retained. In all fairness to thousands of Canadians and several areas of the country, the characteristics of some areas must also be taken into account. The assistance which must be continued must promote the economic development of those particular areas. When I speak of areas, I think above all of the western provinces and the maritimes. We must continue to give assistance, not token assistance, or on a ridiculously low scale, but substantial assistance, because if we consider here in parliament an economically strong Canada, on the road to progress, not only as a whole, but in all its important parts—and the ten provinces are important economically—the federal government cannot afford, whatever the legislation, to pass drastic and expeditious measures which would put some areas of Canada at a disadvantage.

And when I hear the fears expressed by hon. members from the maritimes and western Canada, I congratulate them for taking a stand and warning the government, and the officials who will see to the administration of the new transport board of Canada, against proceeding too quickly in the administrative field with regard to unification and co-ordination. We will have to try to avoid serious discrimination, so that Canadians from coast to coast will not see in the field of transportation discrimination from one area to another or from one transportation system to another but will feel that throughout the country, whether they live in the west, in central Canada, in the maritimes or elsewhere, the laws of the central government do not discriminate against any Canadian because he lives in one province rather than in another.

Some recommendations of the MacPherson commission apply to uneconomic railway lines. For instance, in the notes which have been sent to us by the officials of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), it is indicated that the commission recommends that the railways should not be asked to subsidize their uneconomic services through their economic ones, that the freight services should not subsidize the passenger services. The commission also mentions that the railways must, in the public interest, operate uneconomic services; that is when the commission recommends that the costs be borne by the public treasury. Also, with regard to transportation by rail, the MacPherson commission mentions the Crowsnest pass rates and the rates applicable to export grain. It is understood that those rates must be maintained and that the losses suffered by the railways, if any, must equally be borne by the public treasury.

In the recommendations of the said commission, mention is made of special assistance to the Atlantic provinces, of the principle of special assistance to the Atlantic provinces which should be maintained and of a special study to be made so as to determine whether the principle could not be more efficiently implemented by other means.

Evidently, such Canadian transport commission must meet all the complex problems of Canada and that is why at this stage, I do not intend to say any more on the various viewpoints we could bring up on this bill. We know the legislation will be referred to a parliamentary committee; we trust, Mr. Speaker, that interested individuals will be called before the committee and that it will even be authorized to travel so as to observe the material, economic and equitable conditions of various methods of transportation in the various areas of the country.

To-day, I should like to state two points of view lingering in my mind with some concern. Involved is highway transport which the national commission would take over. My second remark, which I shall revert to in closing, bears on the future attitude of the railways toward highway transport.

Will the railways, like the C.N.R. for instance, be in a position to continue to intervene, by all kinds of direct and indirect means, with highway transport and compete with it in an underhanded way, particularly in relation to trucking?

When speaking of transport, Mr. Speaker, we refer, evidently, from the constitutional standpoint, to the British North America Act, especially to subsection 10 section 92 which stipulates the constitutional authority in the field of transport. Obviously, section 92 does not give in detail the modern means of transport because in 1867, there was no trucking, no automobile transport, and the various aspects of transport could not be mentioned. That subsection 10 of section 92 reads as follows:

Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are of the following Classes:

Evidently, section 92, subsection 10, gives exclusive authority on local works and undertakings other than those mentioned in (a), (b), (c).

This means that (a), (b) and (c) come under federal authority. Those exceptions in subsection 10 of section 92 are indicated as follows:

Lines of Steam and other Ships, Railways, Canals, Telegraphs, and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province.

Consequently, when the federal government and the minister introduce a piece of legislation, concerning, for instance, interprovincial, international or extra-provincial highway transport, the minister is in a very good constitutional position, since according to the letter and the spirit of the constitution, authority is conferred on the central government in the field of interprovincial transport. This was confirmed by the Privy Council in London in a decision rendered on February 22, 1954, in the Winner case.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to read the main paragraphs of that Privy Council's decision which enable us to reconsider together the position and the constitutional decisions rendered in the field of interprovincial transport.

[English]

The power of a province to control its own roads does not entitle it to interfere with connecting undertakings that fall within section 92(10)(a) of the British North America Act or impair Dominion jurisdiction in relation thereto. Legislation of a province which denies the use of provincial roads to such an undertaking or sterilizes the undertaking itself is an interference with exclusive Dominion authority. Whatever provisions or regulations a province may prescribe with regard to its roads, it must not prevent or restrict interprovincial traffic. It may, of course, prescribe traffic regulations but its legislation must be confined to such matters.

• (5:10 p.m.)

It is not desirable nor is it possible to define precisely the limits within which use of provincial highways may be regulated. Nor need the court be concerned with the question whether a province was entitled to plough up its roads and so make interprovincial connections impossible. So isolationist a policy was unthinkable. The roads existed here and in fact formed a connection with other provinces and with another country. It is immaterial that the Dominion has not legislated in relation to a connecting undertaking. A province is precluded in any event from interfering with it.

Provincial legislation is ultra vires where it prohibits the operator of a particular connecting undertaking, namely an international and interprovincial bus line, from using provincial highways except as a means of passage from another country to another province, as where it purports to prohibit it from bringing passengers into the province or carrying passengers outside the province or between points within the province. Such legislation cannot be justified as traffic regulation.

Where an undertaking is in pith and substance interprovincial, and in its operations embraces, in the same way, both interprovincial and intraprovincial journeys, it is wrong to say that its intraprovincial operations are incidental and hence subject to provincial control. If the undertaking is in fact one and indivisible, then merely because it might have been operated differently by limiting its activities to activities within or without the province, does not make it any less an interconnecting undertaking. Hence, its intraprovincial operations cannot be severed for the purpose of committing them to provincial legislative jurisdiction.

Of course, a carrier who is substantially an internal carrier cannot put himself outside of provincial jurisdiction by starting his activities a few miles over the border. Such a subterfuge will not avail.

Quaere, whether the operator of the connecting bus line in this case could initiate a purely provincial bus service even though it was under the aegis of and managed by his present organization!

[Translation]

Those are very important and relevant provisions which, in my humble opinion, should be put on record for further reference during this debate or even during the discussions to be held or the studies to be made by the parliamentary committee.

As I was saying earlier, under the constitution, the minister and the federal government are empowered to act with regard to interprovincial, extra-provincial or international transport.

But it has happened, and this fact should be taken into account here in Ottawa, that for almost a century all legislation and even regulations in the field of interprovincial transport have been left to the provinces.

Indeed, the legislation recognizing this practice is included in the federal statutes themselves. With regard to these precedents, I should particularly like to point out to this house the federal legislation concerning extra-provincial transportation by motor vehicle, which is included in the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 59. This legislation was passed on June 26, 1954, therefore following the judgment given in February 1954 in a case heard by the Privy Council which recognized the constitutional authority of the central government. Here, however, in practice the central government of Canada referred the problem of interprovincial transport to the provinces, probably because transportation of that sort was not very important ten years ago on account of the lack of organization in the interprovincial system and because the Trans-Canada highway had not yet been built.

Now, this has always been done and is still being done, and that federal act of June 26, 1954, admitted it in its terms and provisions.

I want to remind the house in particular of subsection 2 of section 3:

The provincial transport board in each province can, at its discretion, deliver to a person a licence to operate an extra-provincial enterprise by entering the province or passing through it under the same conditions and in the same way as if the extra-provincial enterprise operated there was a local enterprise.

And also in section 4 of that same bill:

4. When, in a province, the tariffs and rates to be set by a local carrier for local transport are determined or regulated by the provincial transport board, the tariffs and rates to be set by a federal carrier for extra-provincial transport in that province can, at the discretion of the provincial transport board, be determined and regulated by the provincial transport board in the same way and under the same conditions as if extra-provincial transport in that province were local transport.

Therefore, the texts of that act clearly show that the federal government has until today delegated to the province the power to legislate and regulate in the field of trucking.

And now, in the present bill setting up that federal transport commission, the federal government wants to recover its authority on interprovincial trucking and its administration as well.

The Department of Transport created in 1964, when considering that matter, a group of officials to study trucking in particular. It would seem that the federal government decided also to intervene in the field of trucking for three main reasons. Since 1954, interprovincial trucking has greatly increased thanks to the construction of the Trans-Canada highway, so that it has become truly competitive with regard to the railways. Trucking is becoming some kind of economic and commercial giant in the field of interprovincial transport, and there is no doubt it can harm the railways which are facing some difficulties. The railways and interprovincial trucking come into conflict quite often with regard to the delivery of permits and the initiative which should or should not be left to the railways to add to their services a trucking service to round out their obligations. In fact, it seems that the railways must use trailers or trucking systems to compete with the private trucking industry.

The Department of Transport also seems to think that it is a good thing to have the trucking industry and the other means of transport come under the same commission, because the MacPherson commission, which studied all those complicated problems, recommended it and, in the areas where competition between the various systems of transportation is particularly keen, it would be better that only one act, one set of rules apply to all transportation systems in Canada.

Finally, according to this study committee and certain declarations which were made previously by the hon. Minister of Transport, and the hon. Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner), who is with the Department of Transport, it appears that this would enable the central government to fulfil its obligations, as he says, to control economic development in Canada from sea to sea.

If the federal government is considering taking over highway transport, I believe this would be doing a certain injustice particularly toward the Canadian Trucking Association and the private truckers, and also toward the Quebec Trucking Association, Incorporated. Because, in hard times, say for the past ten years, while they extended further within the provinces, from one province to the other. Does the member for Levis (Mr. Guay) have some comments to make from his seat?

Mr. Guay: Indeed, his speech is so instructive at present. We shall see later.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Allard: Of course, the hon. member for Levis gives the impression in this house of coming here more often than not just to wear out the seat of his pants. It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that in this house, while we are seriously debating so important a piece of legislation, presented by the hon. minister, there should be members, that I shall call parasites who, instead of listening in silence in the house—and if someone has a speech or comment to make, we will be happy to listen to him—

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member resume consideration of the legislation presently before the house?

Mr. Guay: He has nothing to say on this bill.

Mr. Allard: I accept your invitation with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, but I would also appreciate it very much if you pointed out to the member who keeps interrupting at untimely moments, the standing orders of the house according to which he must remain silent and let speak those who are seriously interested in legislation here in Ottawa.

Perhaps we may have the pleasure of hearing his comments, after my speech. We do not very often have the chance, in the house, to hear the hon. member for Levis seriously discuss important Quebec or Canadian issues.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Guay: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Contrary to the impression that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) is giving, namely that I very seldom make a speech in the house, I am taking part in the debates of the house as actively as himself, and when I have a speech to make I will try to make it intelligently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that, in the house, there are members wasting their time—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allard: —and who are applauded by their colleagues for such nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member could now forget the intervention just made by certain members and revert to the more serious business of the bill before the house.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I accept both your ruling and your invitation and I will go on with my remarks, while I wait for any light coming from the hon. member for Lévis.

By placing interprovincial trucking under its own jurisdiction, the federal government is obviously hurting directly the interprovincial trucking industry. As a matter of fact, representatives of this industry, that is the Canadian Trucking Association and the Quebec Trucking Association, have already made representations to the government and to the minister in this regard.

Now, over those ten years, while highways within the province as well as the Trans-Canada highway were being constructed, carriers and road transport companies across the country have developed a trucking industry which is strongly competing with other means of transportation. They have shown a lot of aggressiveness and co-ordination in their efforts, in their activities, and have helped the country and the province of Quebec considerably, as far as the Quebec Trucking Association is concerned.

To-day, of course, those associations fear that by placing the road transport industry under the sole jurisdiction of the federal government the national transportation commission will be used as a means to permit the railways to carry on a competition which is becoming very difficult to meet. While the truckers and those involved in those companies succeed in spite of many difficulties in operating at a profit, they have to withstand the competition of the C.N. which operates with a deficit, of course, and which must deal with unprofitable services and with some branch lines, a situation which will apparently be corrected under the present legislation.

I should like to call the minister's attention to a paragraph of the Canadian Trucking Association brief on this subject. On page 3 of the brief presented, in January 1966, we read the following:

In the field of transportation, unrestricted competition will only bring back monopoly conditions. This should not blind us to the danger of excessive regulations or poor regulations. The standard is simply this: Are the regulations contributing to maintain transport services and continued competition?

At the present time, jurisdiction over trucking operations is split between the federal and provincial governments. Under current federal legislation, extra-provincial regulation policies are implemented by provincial boards completely without any co-ordination or even uniformity whatever between them.

Very little satisfaction is obtained from such a system by extra-provincial trucking contractors.

The present system under which extra-provincial truck transport is ruled by a certain number of individual regulatory boards, each operating under a different code and under provincial regulations is utterly impractical. The fact that they achieve a certain degree of effectiveness is a tribute to the common sense and intelligence of the members of the provincial boards. But to be practical—

And the brief continues with this conclusion:

What we need is uniform and co-ordinated regulations.

An hon. Member: Be practical. Read further on.

Mr. Allard: Do you want me to read seven or eight paragraphs more and waste the time of the house?

An hon. Member: It would not be any more boring.

Mr. Allard:

But any realist person here knows that it is possible to establish a set of rules to be more or less strictly applied. The essential point is to know whether the contradictions inherent in the system are likely to produce unfavourable results in the long run. To what extent may we rely on the individual capacity of provincial boards to overcome the fundamental weaknesses of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act? The very fact that the present system was set up to operate up to some degree since 1954 is all to the credit of our provincial regulating boards. After all, with regard to extra-provincial transport, they were instructed by parliament to regulate on extra-provincial trucking in the same way—and these are the exact words: "in the same way as for local trucking." Ten conflicting extra-provincial control systems have thus been set up. What we need are standard and co-ordinated regulations administered by the provincial boards, but under a new federal legislation.

The Canadian trucking industry feels it is possible, by taking regional problems into account, while preserving the role of provincial boards. But considering the national role of extra-provincial trucking companies, we also believe that when provincial boards are jointly interested in extra-provincial regulations, the federal legislation should group them together as a single board.

It should be pointed out that in its recommendation, the Canadian Trucking Association Inc. suggests standard and co-ordinated regulations administered by the provincial boards rather than by a single Canadian Transport Commission.

That is the whole difference, and that is the reason why, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the hon. minister to this point of view of the Canadian Truckers Association. On page 1 of the memorandum which was distributed to hon. members of this house, by the hon. Minister of Transport, on the introduction of Bill No. C-231 we find the following:

Provision is also made for federal licensing and economic regulation of extra-provincial commodity pipelines and extra-provincial motor vehicle transport.

Licensing and economic supervision of these activities will be carried out by the new Commission as they may become necessary in the public interest.

The provisions with regard to these two modes of transportation will not come into force automatically, but will be proclaimed only when it is necessary to apply them and after consultation with the provincial authorities in the case of interprovincial highway traffic.

The greatest care is taken to avoid any interference with the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures respecting operations wholly within the boundaries of the several provinces.

These statements, which are clear enough, complete the text of Bill No. C-231 on the matter. However, as the trucking associations seem to suggest, the system could very well work if this licensing and this economic regulation were to operate according to the spirit embodied in this bill, but precedents were created that have become so powerful in this particular segment of interprovincial highway traffic that the administrative aspect or the constitutional aspect of this legislation is now being considered, and this sudden change is liable, according to the associations concerned, to create displeasure or frictions, even as regards the provincial governments. How will the provincial governments react to this recovery, by the federal government, of some authority in the field of interprovincial highway traffic?

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question? I wonder whether he noticed that in the observations I made the other evening I said that while we were asking parliament in this bill, if the bill passes, to give the Canadian Transport Commission the authority to exercise jurisdiction over extraprovincial road traffic there was no intention of embarking upon this field immediately or quickly or without the fullest and most complete consultation with the provinces.

I think the hon. gentleman said "subitement", suggesting that we were suddenly going to do something. There is no intention of doing anything suddenly or without full consultation with the provinces, because I do not believe it would be possible to make the bill effective unless we were to do so. I should like the hon. gentleman to know that I agree with what he says on that point.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I wish to thank the minister for his explanation and for the assurance that the federal government does not intend to do that immediately, and that when it is done, there will be consultations with the provinces.

Well, I am now asking you this question: why have not the provinces been consulted before drafting of this bill, and before it was introduced in the house? There are not—

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps on that point the hon. gentleman, who has been very courteous, would allow me to make another intervention to say that the Prime Minister, some time before this bill was introduced, wrote to the premiers of all provinces acquainting them with what we were proposing to do, asking for their views, seeking to arrange for consultations and assuring them that we had no intention of upsetting any existing arrangements in any sudden or precipitate manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: This type of consultation is very commendable, and I hope it will be maintained in every area. What we would like to know, when the minister rises, is whether any provinces, when answering, have protested in any way or expressed some concern? I would be particularly interested to know if the government of the province of Quebec has, when answering, merely acquiesced wholeheartedly to the establishment of a Canadian transport commission which would include interprovincial road transport, and to the fact that the commission would make rules and regulations and also grant licences?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member for Sherbrooke that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make on this bill. In the period of time I shall be speaking I do not intend to go into all of the minute details because I hope and take it that when the time comes the bill will go to the committee. I will be sitting as a member on that committee and this will give me and other members a full opportunity to study this quite weighty bill, a most important one for all of Canada.

First of all I want to refer to Part I of the bill. In this regard I noted the remarks of the minister in the house on the matter of a national transport board. The last report of the Maritime Transportation Commission, volume 6, No. 4, referred to two speeches, one made by the minister on April 27 of this year in which he flew a few kites, and one by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner), who I believe was speaking in Montreal.

The Minister without Portfolio stated that the new board would be in a better position to perform the administrative functions which parliament may authorize in regard to licensing, tariffs and economic regulation of transportation. I do not intend to go into what the minister said, but the bill certainly bears quite a resemblance to what he stated at that time, at least so far as some of its phrasing is concerned.

In speaking in the house the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) put forward the possibility that a national transport board would perhaps coin for itself the appellation of "bureaucratic monster". I do not know about that but I believe that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), who has just spoken, referred to the Canadian Trucking Association who view it as a "bureaucratic colossus". I do not know whether that is the case, but in the minister's speech which opened debate on this bill he suggested that this was certainly not the intention of the legislation.

Some doubts are cast in this regard by the Maritime Transportation Commission and perhaps I might put them on the record at this time.

The idea of the establishment of a national transportation body is not new. The commission points out that the MacPherson royal commission in its 1961 report recommended the creation of a non-regulatory national transportation advisory council, a purely advisory council, not a regulatory one.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In the words of the MacPherson Royal Commission the council would be freed of regulatory responsibility, would be able to judge and assess the impact and effect of the decisions of all transport regulatory agencies and would be empowered to confer and consult with all interested parties and all levels of government. This advisory council would then recommend broad policies through the Minister of Transport.

I have already referred to the view of the truckers' association. The Maritime Transportation Commission says that obviously there is a need for some co-ordination in transportation policy in Canada and quotes the MacPherson commission report as follows:

> —there exists nowhere below the cabinet level in Canada any organization or advisory body sufficiently broadly based to undertake the task of continually developing goals for national transportation policy or a broad outline of measures to achieve them.

I hope the Minister of Transport was correct in what he said regarding this board. The Maritime Transportation Commission went on to say:

> Such a non-regulatory advisory council as recommended by the royal commission would in this commission's view meet an existing need and should perform a valuable service. The replacing of the existing regulatory boards by a super regulatory board, on the other hand, would appear to achieve nothing useful.

We shall have to wait and see, Mr. Speaker, whether this statement is correct. I hope this board will not be another bureaucratic colossus, as it has been referred to. I thought I ought to put that on the record. We hope that this board will not be another bureaucratic body. We hope that the minister's contention is correct and that what he has stated will be carried out.

Second, I wish to deal with another matter arising from the minister's remarks and which is contained in the bill. I refer to the Maritime Freight Rates Act. In the few minutes I have at my disposal perhaps I might refer to that act. As hon. members probably know, the act was passed in 1927 and provides a 20 per cent subsidy on all rail movements within the maritime region, which extends as far west as Levis and Diamond in the province of Quebec. Also, the original 20 per cent subsidy has been increased to 30 per cent on rail traffic—it does not apply to import traffic—moving from the maritime region to other parts of Canada on the portion of the rail rate earned east of Levis and Diamond. The act was passed in 1927 as a result of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims and was intended to restore in a broad measure maritime rail rates to the position they held in relation to other Canadian rail rates prior to 1912. This was to continue into perpetuity.

What has happened is that this has not taken place. With the advent of competition by trucks, with the increase in rail rates and with trucking competition in other parts of Canada, the effect has been to distort the position in the maritimes. This has meant that the Maritime Freight Rates Act in its present form has been unable to maintain the relationship between Atlantic province rates and rates outside the region. This has taken place despite the fact that there has been an increase in subsidy under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

The present legislation calls for a two-year freeze on maritime freight rates under the act. The only difficulty in my mind stems from reading subsection 2 of new section 335 which provides:

> Subsection (1) shall be in force during the two years after the coming into force of subsection (1) and expires at the end of that period.

The only question in my mind is what happens after that two-year period? What happens after the study is completed? I wonder whether the government, after receiving the independent report by the Acres Company and another company which will take two years to prepare, will be able to give any guarantees? Is there any guarantee in this present bill, which says that parliament can then look at this matter, or will it mean that after the report is brought in the government of the day can then bring forward a policy which will be discriminatory and detrimental to the Atlantic provinces regardless of the Maritime Freight Rates Act? That bothers me.

After this bill is studied, brought back to the house and then becomes law, will it mean that the government of the day can go ahead and do that when the two years have expired? The bill does not say anything about the study. We know why the two-year freeze has been put on. Can the government then go ahead and decide to make all rates, including those in the maritime Atlantic provinces, compensatory? I suggest there should be some guarantee in the legislation that this will not be the case and that all interested parties, including members of parliament, will have an opportunity of being heard on the subject, perhaps by the matter being referred back to parliament, before any regulations or orders are put forward.

The matter was dealt with briefly in a recent editorial in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of August 31 which had this to say:

> A national transport regulatory agency can be a good thing—if it doesn't set up a stifling red-tape bureaucracy.

The editorial then refers to the Maritime Freight Rates Act and then continues:

> In the simplest terms, the Maritime Freight Rates Act was intended to let this region's manufacturers compete at less transportation disadvantage in the Quebec and Ontario markets. It never produced the expected benefits entirely, and in recent years across-the-board freight rate increases have watered down its effect even further; nor has this area benefited from the intense rail-highway competition that has kept hauling costs down in more industrialized areas.

It then says:

> But the new bill at least sets out to maintain such M.F.R.A. benefits as exist and a two-year freeze on maximum freight rates in the Atlantic region is apparently designed to postpone final decision until the current regional transportation study . . . is completed.

It goes on to say:

> A national transportation policy based solely on "compensatory" freight rates (i.e., keeping only profitable lines operating) could do immense harm to the maritimes. So far, Ottawa seems to be keeping this in mind. It will be up to the Atlantic provinces to be sure their interests are protected as parliament legislates in this crucial field.

I would hope that, as has been stated in oher legislation, more than a moral guarantee will be given to the Atlantic provinces. We would like something in writing, in black and white, rather than an oral agreement because, as suggested by an hon. member from Toronto, who quoted the late Silby Barrett, "an oral agreement is not worth the paper it is written on." There should be a change in the bill. I hope the Minister of Transport will consider this.

May I suggest with regard to this legislation that, even after the present study is made of the transport problems of the Atlantic provinces, a question similar to that which I asked one of the officials in committee, with respect to the Maritime Transportation Commission be kept in mind. At that time Bill C-120 was before us and I asked the official of the M.T.C. if he would like to view it, and at the same time to understand just what had occurred in the country, before making his final submission so far as the Atlantic provinces were concerned.

I think this bill, or whatever is finally brought forward, should be the subject of a full study by those who come from Atlantic provinces so that they may be able to find out how their region is affected before any final legislation is enacted for our area. I heard the minister say that all interested parties will have an opportunity to express their views. I take it this will include the Maritime Transportation Commission and other organizations of that nature. As I say, I hope to have the opportunity to sit on the committee and go further into a matter which is so vital to our area, since transportation, Mr. Speaker, is the lifeline of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, if the leader of the house or his representative do not wish to suggest a supper break I will carry on. I am afraid this is what I shall have to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems there are a number of hon. members who wish to speak and I think we should make use of the time allotted under the rules and go right ahead.

Mr. Winkler: But I thought the original idea came from the Minister of Transport himself. Was there not some sort of agreement? I have no objection.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Transport would benefit by having no dinner.

Mr. Winkler: So would the Conservative whip. But what about other people?

Mr. Prittie: I am unlike the Minister of Transport in that connection. Often, Mr. Speaker, I hear it said that politics should be kept out of our discussions of transportation problems. There was, I believe, a suggestion to this effect in the Globe and Mail, from which newspaper the minister quoted in his speech. This, it seems to me, is a totally unrealistic approach, an approach based on a lack of understanding of the processes we use in this country and in this house.

I was interested in one sentence in that particular Globe editorial which posed the following question:

> —or every time an unprofitable line is to be abandoned or an unreasonably low freight rate is to be raised, will the politicians leap to defend the local or group interest, forgetting the national interest?

I think the answer to that question is, yes. This is not to say there are not many subjects with which members of the House of Commons can deal in national terms, not merely in local terms. But it seems to me that the railways and freight rates are not among those subjects.

I suggest also that if members of parliament, particularly opposition members, did not express critical views of interest to their constituents they would be condemned by those same sources for merely acquiescing in everything the government tried to suggest. Incidentally, it seems to me that the railway bill with which we dealt last week was greatly improved as a result of the activities of opposition members.

The minister told us that Bill No. C-120, dealing with the same subject, was introduced in 1964 but did not pass. In the event, he told us, this was probably a good thing.

We have heard a good deal in Canada in recent years about minority government, whether it is good or bad, and I suppose one's views on this depend upon where one sits. If in 1964 the government of the day had possessed a majority, that bill would undoubtedly have gone through the house and become law. Yet the minister has admitted today that it was a poor bill in many respects and tells us we have a better bill before us today.

Many organizations in Canada made representations before the railway committee at that time, and the objects of some of their submissions have been incorporated in the present bill. It seems to me this ought to become a regular process, that the reputation of a government should not be at stake when a bill is first presented and that a certain amount of time should elapse in the course of which those of the public who are interested could express their views. When this had been done parliament could get down to the real work of legislation.

Compared with the bill presented in 1964 the measure now before us is greatly changed. The preamble begins with the words:

> It is hereby declared that an economic and efficient transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to the economic well-being and growth of Canada;—

It then goes on to suggest means by which this objective can best be achieved.

It seems to me that a coherent national transportation policy could be more easily attained if both our major railway lines were under a single ownership and authority. We are dealing in fantasy if we imagine we can have a coherent and sensible transportation policy in Canada while a major link in the system is not subject to direct government authority. I am referring, of course, to the Canadian Pacific Railway. No doubt it is possible to make public policy felt, and have it implemented by indirect means. Nevertheless, this could be done more directly and more efficiently if ownership were vested in the people.

In this connection I am not speaking of the railways alone. I would remind the house that the two big railway companies in this country control in turn a great many trucking lines. I do not know what percentage of the interprovincial trucking business is controlled by the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. but it amounts to a large share. These two companies control telecommunications, water transport and air transport.

Thus, if we are to have a coherent transportation policy responsible to public opinion as reflected in this house, one necessary step, it would seem to me, would be to place both these large companies under public ownership.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does he think it would be desirable to have the trucking lines also owned by the government?

Mr. Prittie: Certainly not all the trucking lines. But I believe that if the government owned the two bigger systems together with the truckling lines which are now subsidiary to those systems it would exercise effective control over all major aspects of interprovincial transport.

The minister himself said this was a tenable point of view but that the cabinet had rejected it. It would have been helpful if when dealing with a subject as important as this one—and the present bill is supposed to deal with our transportation future for many years to come—the hon. gentleman had given some reasons for the government's rejection of the case for placing the Canadian Pacific under public ownership.

This issue will have to be faced one day, and I hope that later the minister will have something to say about the question. At any rate there is a growing demand in the country for action such as I have proposed. I recall that when the representatives of the National Farmers Union were before the railway committee two years ago they made such a demand. The National Farmers Union, I understand, has a reputation of being the more radical of the two major agricultural groups of the country and perhaps its views in suggesting something of that sort would not carry the same weight as the views of some other organizations. But I notice that in its submission to the government this year the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made the same point.

I should like to quote from page 18 of the presentation to the Prime Minister of Canada and members of the cabinet by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on February 22, 1966, under the heading "Transportation Policy":

> It is the view of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that the nationalization of the rail enterprises of Canadian Pacific Railways would make possible a single integrated system of rail service that could most rationally, and with the public interest always paramount, serve the people of Canada. It recommends therefore that the C.P.R. rail services in fact be nationalized.

[Mr. Prittie.]

This point had been made earlier by the National Farmers Union. The same point was made by a number of members of this house last spring when the question of the cancellation of the Dominion passenger service was under consideration and when there was some unhappiness in respect of the speed at which the railways were carrying grain to coastal ports. At that time I heard, from unexpected quarters, members suggest it was time the second railway company in this country was under government control. Again the government has said it has not changed its view. I think many Canadians would like to know what are the reasons for that refusal.

There is another point which I think members of the committee on transport and communications would like to ask a great many questions about. Where are the railways to get all the extra revenue as a result of this bill? When the emergency legislation was before us we were told that if this bill were passed the railways would not have to come to parliament to get the money to pay the extra wages which they may be compelled to pay their employees either by parliament or as a result of negotiation. I think the members of the committee should do a great deal of questioning on this point so that we will know where the extra revenue will come from. We know that the rates for the Atlantic provinces are not to change for the next few years, so there will be no extra revenue there. The Crowsnest pass rates are to remain for the next few years, so there will be no extra revenue there.

It has been suggested that the railways can save a certain amount of money by rail line abandonment. I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) the other night and I listened to the answers which the minister gave him during his speech on the question of rail line abandonment or rationalization.

From the minister's statement at page 8034 of Hansard it seems that when we finish with the bill there will be very few rail line abandonments because the government is going to give an undertaking that large areas will be left alone. As a result of what the minister said I cannot see that there will be very many abandonments and therefore there will not be very much saving in that direction. Presumably extra revenue for the railways will come from those areas where there is competition in the transportation business and where the truck lines exist between major cities in areas such as southern Ontario, the St. Lawrence valley and certain parts of the west. But according to the theory we hear the competition between the various modes of transportation, rail lines and trucking lines, should keep the rates down, so I do not see where the extra revenue will come in there.

I expect that in Canada in the future as in the past there will be a large amount of money coming from the public treasury to subsidize railway transportation. I do not think the Canadian people are shocked by this. It is something we always have had to do and likely will have to do in the future. I am not a member of the committee on transport and communications, but I suggest to the members of the committee that staff people should try to give them some rather concrete figures about where the extra revenue is to come from, if the various sectors I have just mentioned are to be excluded.

I am interested in the question of interprovincial trucking. The explanatory note on the page opposite page 14 of the bill reads:

> Extra-provincial motor vehicle transport is, at the present time, regulated by the transport board of each province under the authority of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act. If it becomes desirable, in terms of the objectives of the national transportation policy, to regulate extra-provincial transport at the federal level, the new transport commission would be the regulatory authority. The necessary regulatory powers would be provided by this Part.

However, the minister has said that this will be done only if it is considered necessary. This is another question I have in mind. The Canadian Transport Commission will continue to set the rates for the railway lines in certain areas but they will not set them for the trucking lines. It seems to me less than sensible that if people are going to be engaged in the same sort of business in the same area the same board should not regulate the rates.

On the question of competition within a province let us take, for example, the line running from Windsor to, say, Kingston or Belleville which is all within a province but quite a good distance. You have the transport board of the province of Ontario setting trucking rates there and for the railway lines you have rates set by the Board of Transport Commissioners at the present time. If, because this is an area where competition exists, the railways are to be freed from having their rates fixed by the new transportation commission, what happens concerning trucking within that province? Will the Ontario Transport Board not regulate the rates for the truckers? Will they then be left to compete with the railways or will the transport board in Ontario set the rates for both the truckers and the railways in that sort of sector which is completely within a province?

Again, this is another question which comes to mind. A very good point in the bill, of course, which has been mentioned by other speakers, is the fact that a research agency will be established which will carry on continuous studies on the question of the economics of transportation in Canada. I hope the government will pay sufficiently well to get good people for this and then pay sufficient salaries to keep them. My fear is that we may get some people who will begin to understand the transportation economics of this country and will then be hired away perhaps by the C.P.R. or some other company in the transportation field. This certainly is a most important field. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle made reference to that the other night.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of bill in respect of which I would rather not be called upon to vote on second reading. It is so complex and deals with so many subjects that it is difficult to comprehend them at one time. It seems to me it would have been more useful had we done what I believe happened in 1964 when the subject matter of the bill was referred to the committee and when, after views had been heard from various organizations and questions had been answered by experts, the matter then came back to the house. I think in this way members would be in a much better position to evaluate the legislation we have here, because it is so important and so very complex.

I should like to conclude with a reference to one other subject which I have mentioned from time to time. At earlier times I have suggested we should have a minister of civil aviation in this country. I suppose that idea does not stand up any more because we are to have this over-all transportation commission which is to regulate air as well as rail, water and road traffic. I have always felt, however, that the Department of Transport is such a large department with so many responsibilities that, as in the case of the Department of National Defence, there should be more than one minister. I know that at the present time on a temporary basis the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) is assisting the minister, but in view of the importance of the transportation life of Canada it seems to me the government should consider bringing in other legislation the next time the cabinet is reshuffled to provide for an associate minister of transport to share the duties in this very important field.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie), particularly those about politics in transportation and government. The minister mentioned this subject originally and I think it is fair to discuss it now. I see nothing wrong with politics in transportation or politics in this house if you consider politics, as it is properly defined, to be the science of government. I believe that what the hon. member and the editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail had in mind is that this government, with tremendous enthusiasm and zeal and great attention to detail, has in its inimitable way taken the science out of government.

Be that as it may, I feel, as does the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that we must be very cautious at this stage of this bill because of its great detail. I commend the government for reaching out toward a new concept which has been spoken of by royal commissions for many years, particularly because of the new and sensational innovations which are contemplated.

At this point I find it difficult to vote in favour of this measure on second reading and I must express my opinions at this time as being without prejudice. We must observe what develops as a result of committee hearings and we must be entitled to see what impact this policy may have in dollars and cents on various industries and various regions of the country before coming to any conclusion whether or not it will help to make a greater and better country.

I am sure we are going to receive a very considerable amount of expert evidence during our committee hearings. We will be able to ask factual questions and get factual answers. That is the forum where this should take place. If as a result the government's contentions are in fact borne out I can say without equivocation that I am prepared to forsake without prejudice my position and give support to the bill.

In any event I do have some reservations at this time and I think this is the proper opportunity to ventilate them. In that way I think I should remark upon the statement made by the minister during the course of the speech by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) and later on during the speech of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) as to the government's willingness to take a position of flexibility regarding this bill and to accept certain changes which the opposition may recommend. I realize that the government's experience in respect of collective bargaining durig the last two or three months has not been happy, but I do hope it will adopt a collective bargaining attitude toward the opposition rather than use compulsory arbitration.

I wish to direct the major portion of my few remarks toward the subject of a super body or commission and its composition. At this time I am not prepared to take the firm position that the composition of the commission, being 17 members, is objectionable, but I do see some ground upon which one can argue that its forms and procedures are objectionable. I will reserve my judgment in this regard. We must wait until it has been in operation for some period of time before we know whether or not it can work efficiently.

At this time there are some aspects of this subject to which I think I can take exception. I am wondering whether it is proper to give appellate jurisdiction to the board, which is contrary to the present act. During the course of our very interesting discussion this morning, and I am happy the government made available some of its knowledgeable senior civil servants, there was a comment made to the effect that because of the variety of viewpoints which would be represented on the commission there would be a cross-fertilization of ideas. There was also mention made of research facilities and functions.

I fear that this research aspect of the commission will in the end result in such an impregnation of the entire commission, if I may carry on the analogy of cross-fertilization, that the ideas which will flow from it in the form of orders and recommendations to the government, ultimately to be reflected in legislative measures, will all be cut out of the same cloth and that there will not be within the four corners of the commission that variation of opinions or that new and completely distinct approach which any appellate division must have if it is going to carry out its functions successfully. In other words, not only the formal but informal discussions which will take place from time to time among the 17 members, having in mind the studies on which they will base their actions and orders, will be affected by this research aspect of the commission. There will not be, under those circumstances, that independent, free and objective attitude taken by some members toward decisions made by others. I hope I am wrong but I must say, having in mind my professional experience as a result of applications in courts and in argument presented to the Board of Transport Commissioners, that this appears at first blush to be a reasonable objection.

Let me follow up the question of the research aspect of the commission. I am wondering whether or not, as a result of the views regarding the entire ambit of transportation which will flow from this research unit, the government—I use that word with a small "g"—will become so imbued with them that any subsequent legislative proposals will not be likely to be changed or varied. If that happened the task of those who think they have a ligitimate objection to certain proposals would become very difficult indeed.

The minister has said there is a limited number of people in this country with the varied knowledge and background essential to be of assistance to the government of Canada. I think some consideration should be given to the establishment of a national transportation research institute, partly financed by federal and provincial governments, which would make its massive information and its opinions available to all people and governments. This would not prevent the national transportation commission or the government from having access to its own expertise. I think this suggestion has been discussed from time to time during the course of studies by royal commissions. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I thought it was original, but when one reads back one finds there is nothing original in this house or in politics. However, I suggest that the government give this matter consideration.

The second point that worries me at this time is that Bill No. C-231 incorporate certain provisions of the Railway Act of Canada. For example, the Board of Transport Commissioners has for a number of years taken the position that it is inhibited in its jurisdiction. It has taken a very narrow view of its powers because of what it feels are the statutory provisions under which it was created and operates. I shall not deal with all of them, but I have here the report of the Turgeon Royal Commission made some time ago. In the general review at page 23 of the report Mr. Justice Turgeon deals with the decision of the board in connection with an application for a 30 per cent freight rate increase. He says:

> In the first decision of the board filed in the 30 per cent application on March 30th, 1948, the position of the board with respect to its jurisdiction and powers to reduce rates to assist industry or to equalize,—

I think these are very important words:

> —through the prescription of reduced rates, production costs, geographical location, or climatic conditions, was dealt with at considerablel ength. The following extracts from its decision indicate clearly the opinion of the board as to its own powers and as to the discretion left to the railways concerning these matters.

Running very briefly through some of them, they are:

> "In other words, while members of the board may and do, as Canadians, sympathize with policies of economic development which may through increasing diversity lead to greater economic solidarity, it is not their general opinions but the powers conferred on them by the Railway Act which determine what they can do. Very wide powers, it is true, are given under the Railway Act; but the Railway Act is not to be construed as if it were a blank cheque to be filled in as members of the board see fit. It is not the board's function, as delegated by parliament, to make rates to develop business, but to deal with the reasonableness of rates either on complaint or of its own motion."

The board said also:

> "Railways are not required by law, and cannot in justice be required, to equalize natural disadvantages such as location, cost of production and the like."

The board said it did not have the power to compel them. And so on, Mr. Speaker. The first two pages of Mr. Justice Turgeon's report are simply littered with comments of this kind. My view is that the national transport commission, inheriting under the provisions of this bill the powers, jurisdiction and ability to make decisions on the principle of stare decisis, will be bound in this regard and will very probably take as narrow and as limited a view as the Board of Transport Commissioners. I think that somewhere in the bill there might be placed a section directing the commission to have regard to many of those factors to which the Board of Transport Commissioners said it was unable to give effect. I notice that the bill says in clause 1:

> It is hereby declared that an economic and efficient transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to the economic well-being and growth of Canada—

If that could be interpreted as meaning that the economic well-being and growth of Canada are based upon the economic well-being and growth of all regions of Canada, and that the commission is compelled to look at that aspect of it in its decision, I would be content. But I fear that, faced with the previous decisions of the Board of Transport Commissioners and based on a normal interpretation of this particular clause, the commission will not have this authority. Equally, the proposed new section 317, which is to replace the section dealing with the settling of rates and the right of any person to appeal, says, as will be found at page 33, clause 44 of the bill:

> Any person, if he has reason to believe that any act or omission of one or more railway companies, or that the result of the making of rates pursuant to this act after the commencement thereof, may prejudicially affect the public interest in respect of tolls or conditions of carriage of traffic, may apply to the commission for leave to appeal the act, omission or result and the commission—

I do not think this very important section will cover the situation to which we might well come, and it has been referred to by other hon. members, namely, that the legitimate regional desires and requirements of various parts of Canada must be an aspect of any national transportation policy which is required to be put into effect.

Using those two phrases which I have quoted from the bill as being indicative of the probable result, I doubt that the commission proposed to be set up under the present bill will be able to go much farther than the Board of Transport Commissioners. It is true that the same rights of appeal are carried over into this bill, namely, the right of appeal from the commission as a whole to the Supreme Court and in certain instances the right of appeal to the cabinet, but when it comes to the question of regional development and policy we have the situation which the previous government took into consideration when it acted as it did with regard to the freeze on rates, and so on.

There is another question which I raised earlier. I refer to the very, very few cases where appeals have been made to the cabinet, to the governor in council, under the pertinent section of the Railway Act and have reached the point of being heard and disposed of. This indicates that the procedure is not too satisfactory and all too often what happens is that when appeals reach the cabinet, in due course the cabinet acts not on the appeal but some legislation is brought down or a royal commission is appointed and the matter reaches an unsatisfactory conclusion in that way. If we are to have this concept of a new board and are to give it adequate authority, it should be given some additional authority to deal with certain questions of fairness and equity affecting regions in connection with equalization and regional discrimination which the former Board of Transport Commissioners was unable to deal with.

I should like to deal very briefly with several of the general positions which appear to be taken in the bill. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) dealt with the question of the Crowsnest pass rates. It is true that under clause 50 and by new sections 328 and 329 of the Railway Act the bill does propose that an inquiry be instituted and that during the course of the inquiry there should be a freeze on the existing statutory Crowsnest pass rates. Basically this is the position. But I am a little alarmed at the wording of proposed new section 329, first, because the period of three years is not definitely fixed. What the act will say, if it is passed in its present form, is "not later than three years after the commission shall inquire," and so on.

This could mean anything. It could mean that the commission could wait until the very last day of the third year to start its inquiry and conclude it at some period in the future. It could mean that the commission could start its inquiry the day after this bill becomes law and complete it within six months.

I do not think, or at least I hope, that the last of those two contingencies will be a fact. However, what does concern me is part of proposed new clause 329 which states that when the commission has established its inquiry, gathered all its evidence and reported to the government, then, in the words of the clause:

> —the governor in council shall take such action as he deems necessary or desirable on the basis of that report to provide assistance to such railway companies.

I am not prepared to accept that in its present form. Having in mind the contention which has been held for so many years and the fact of which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) spoke regarding the great variation between the original figures produced by the railway companies before the MacPherson commission, the figures produced by the western provinces and finally the figures which were obtained by the royal commission from its own statistical studies—these were the people who obtained the very best expert assistance—it is to be noted that there is a very considerable difference between the figures I mentioned and the final figures.

Surely under those conditions—I am trying to approach this on a national basis—it would be very difficult to ask the western members and the people of western Canada to accept the fact that the government may act solely on the figures which the commission obtained and which are subsequently furnished to the government. My view is that when this matter is being considered, as probably has already been done by the government, thought should be given to replacing this phrase by the simple alternative sentence: "The governor in council shall refer the matter to parliament".

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is the phrase he has suggested not implicit? The governor in council cannot appropriate moneys. Therefore it seems to me that all the governor in council can do in these circumstances is to suggest an appropriation in the estimates to give the railways this relief. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this was intended by the draftsmen, and if there is any doubt about its meaning this is something we would certainly want to resolve in committee. I want to make it very clear, if the hon. gentleman will be good enough to permit me to do it, that there is no thought whatever that this would empower the governor in council to recommend any change in the Crowsnest rates. All it would do would be to authorize the governor in council to recommend to parliament that some financial relief be granted to the railways if that seemed desirable to the governor in council after receiving the report.

In the case of the branch lines that are retained and of the passenger services, we have made it mandatory that the railways should be compensated for any losses, in one case for the full amount and in the other case for 80 per cent. All that is said here is that the governor in council may consider what should be done and that parliament might then be asked to take action. If the language is not sufficient to make that clear I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will entertain any reasonable amendment to make doubly sure that no other meaning will be read into that clause.

Mr. Baldwin: I thank the minister for his explanation. I think it probably makes this clause a little more palatable. However, I must say that the words contained in the phrase, "and the governor in council shall take such action as he deems necessary or desirable on the basis of that report to provide assistance," lead to more than one interpretation.

I was glad to hear the minister say that only parliament can take action in this matter. Of course I have seen attempts at doing otherwise made in the past. However, I think the usual legislative approach might be better than appropriating moneys in the estimates which are of course debatable. Each estimate constitutes a parliamentary resolution. It must be studied, debated and passed by this house and by the Senate before it is enacted into law. However, in some cases difficulties arise. I hate to make accusations against this government but sometimes a large number of supplementary estimates are brought before the house in the dying days of the session. I think this is a fault common to most governments under our democratic system. The possibility arises that toward the end of a session the government may bring down estimates which include an item for $15 million or $20 million expressed in the form of a subsidy to the railways to compensate for the losses they are alleged to have sustained in hauling the grain of the western farmers under so-called statutory rates. I do not think that would be the right way to do it. I think the minister has indicated that he will consider this matter further and I believe it is very important that he should do so.

Then there is the question of a maximum rate control. Obviously this is one of the very detailed and complex aspects of the legislation. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle and other hon. members have referred to the question of costing. This is a tremendously important part of the issue and goes right to the heart of the problem. It was the subject of a great deal of discussion before the MacPherson royal commission and I am sure the officials in the minister's department have considered this matter and made their calculations. I will only say at this time that I am very doubtful whether the formula as it is expressed in the proposed new section 334 of the Railway Act will meet with my approval but it is possible that the minister and his officials may be able to satisfy my requirements. The onus will be on them to do so.

Finally I wish to speak on the question of the motor vehicle undertakings. I am concerned about the initial assumption that certain tolls may be fixed by the government. Of course the minister indicated at one time, and we heard the view expressed this morning, that there are conditions precedent to this coming about. The question of jurisdiction is not one which should be discussed in detail at the present time but it is certainly a very important factor. As I pointed out this morning, it is stated in clause 35 (c):

> —the commission may make regulations (c) respecting the safety, protection, comfort and convenience of the persons availing themselves of the services of a motor vehicle undertaking;

During the question period today I pointed out that the difficulties in implementing this right are very great indeed. It is the provinces which are responsible for the construction of highways. They lay down the rules and regulations respecting the equipment of vehicles. They lay down the restrictions under which licences are granted to operators and they lay down certain regulations with regard to insurance.

It seems to me, at first glance, that this subclause could be struck out as being entirely unconstitutional. There is no doubt that this a matter on which there will be constant negotiations because if there is to be a national transportation policy it must be based upon the ability of the government in conjunction with the provincial governments to lay down and establish tolls which are in fact a part of the whole competitive structure. Without that ability it is very likely that the announced purposes of this legislation will be nullified. I am not suggesting that this new approach should not be undertaken but that there are grave weaknesses which will have to be explained satisfactorily in committee and later on in this house before it can be accepted.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question? Probably, Mr. Speaker, if you were asked to rule on it you would rule it out of order because it is a hypothetical question. I do so only because the hon. gentleman is a very distinguished lawyer and I do not get the chance too often to ask lawyers for free advice.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

My question is this. With respect to the particular section 35 (c) to which the hon. member referred, would it not be true to say that since the vehicle would be on a provincial road the regulations regarding safety, etc., made by the provincial legislature would have to be complied with but that it might be possible for parliament to insist upon additional precautions that were not in conflict with the basic laws in cases of vehicles that cross provincial lines?

I think that is all the draftsman had in mind. In no way would it be possible for us to say that a vehicle could go on provincial roads when the provincial laws said that it could not do so. However, we might insist that if the vehicle was going to cross from one province to another even more stringent regulations might apply. I would just put that to the hon. member.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, as a result of such an appealing request by the minister I will break one of the first laws of our profession and give him free advice. After all, as I am speaking in the House of Commons this cannot be used against me at any subsequent professional trial.

This is somewhat like the situation which prevails in many provinces where there is conflict between municipal ordinances and provincial regulations. Some municipal ordinances are held to be valid so long as they do not conflict with the provincial law. As a matter of fact, I would hope that this might serve as a means whereby a more uniform approach can be taken over the whole country. If that can be done, then more power to the government, the minister and his officials. Whether or not the provinces are in that type of receptive mood now is another point, but a more rational and uniform approach to this whole question is certainly one which is worth working for.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I take this general position. I hope that the minister and the house will understand that I do not say what I have said from any personal, regional or even constituency viewpoint. I think that the strength of this country must be maintained by paying attention to all parts of it. I hope that we in this country are now passing through the concluding stages of the argument whether or not there shall be two nations or two states in Canada. I hope this argument is reaching its conclusion. But for many years another argument has been raging as to whether or not there are also two parts of Canada, one the developed part and one the other part which needs developing but which because of fiscal policy, transportation policies and other policies is not managing to achieve that measure of development, socially, economically and politically, that it should.

It do not think that you can have a strong country unless you have normal and proper growth in all regions. I think that our real problems of transportation will not disappear until this becomes the case, until you find secondary and tertiary industry coming into western Canada, coming into northern Ontario, coming into Quebec and coming into the Atlantic provinces. When this happens, then and only then will many of the problems which the government is trying to solve in this legislation really disappear. Any legislation which does not achieve or work to that desirable result is not good legislation.

We have heard a lot of talk about masters. I think that there was in one of the provinces at one time a "maître chez-nous". I believe it was Abraham Lincoln who said: "As I would not be a slave, so would I not be a master". I think it is in that way and with that attitude only that the government and this parliament can make a national approach which will result in the development of all parts of the country in a normal manner. I think that anything short of that is insufficient.

• (6:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to express all my admiration for the logical and the sound manner in which the previous speaker discussed the problems facing parliament. And it is an example that we, newcomers, will try to follow because he would naturally be inclined, and quite justifiably, to sharply criticize the government; but instead, as a serious-minded and very objective lawyer, he puts forward constructive arguments and, as an independent, I am glad to congratulate him personally. I must add that I am learning a great deal by listening to his contributions in this house.

Mr. Speaker, the bill under study is entitled:

> An Act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

I shall not make a complete review of the bill, first because it has already been done by more experienced colleagues and also, because I am one of those who find pieces of legislation totally tasteless and confusing and who sometimes wonder whether the drafters take pleasure in making them so, in order precisely that the laymen will not be tempted to scrutinize them too closely and to leave it to the lawyers to fiddle with them.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, pieces of legislation are so questionable. As a matter of fact, I must have listened to 10, 12 or 15 learned lawyers here who expressed different opinions in many cases, and I know that these learned lawyers and all their colleagues, in the coming centuries, will keep on arguing on the meaning of such and such a word or insist that part of a sentence means just the opposite of what laymen think.

Therefore, I shall not venture that far. I shall only make a few general remarks reflecting the opinion of what I consider as a layman who sees those pieces of legislation take form, who sometimes wonders with some concern whether the statutes he can hardly understand and which are so insipid actually promote the commonwealth, the common good of the people who are perhaps not as well protected.

I shall first remind the government that I voted for the bill introduced in this house to end the strike. I even urged my colleagues to do likewise without delay, because of the emergency that I found disastrous for the country's economy and which resulted every day in an increasing number of lay-offs throughout the country. We therefore voted for the bill, but I did so on one condition which I shall now state. I believed in the government's undertaking to take the required measures in order to settle the problems of railway workers and also to prevent the recurrence of such crises. I remember that on that occasion, we were told the bill would precisely remove, directly or in directly, a great number of the causes for disagreement and misunderstanding which give rise to strikes as unfortunate as the one experienced recently. I reminded the government that we fully expect that all these things will be done. I am speaking in a constructive, rather than a destructive way.

In my area, Mr. Speaker, in the constituency of Trois-Rivières and in the whole area of Trois-Rivières which is called the heart of Quebec, the railway workers returned to work on the very night the legislation was passed. The appeal I made over the radio not only in my constituency but in the whole area, asking the railway workers to set an example of observance of the law, was answered. They went to work within a few hours, the very night the legislation was sanctioned. I will not say that like many others throughout the country who were convinced that the legislation did not settle the whole problem, they returned to work with joy in their hearts. They returned to work precisely to show to the entire country that they were law-abiding citizens; they also returned to work because they believed in the government's undertaking which I, as an independant member, brought to them, telling them that I had reason to believe that the government would fulfil their undertaking. But now, these undertakings will have to be met, otherwise, some pleople will be most unhappy and they might have unfortunate reactions on occasion.

So, Mr. Speaker, even if I cannot find it in the first reading, after thorough scrutiny, I trust that, in the spirit of the legislation and in all provisions, means will be taken to ensure that this legislation will not protect solely the companies, but that it will also protect the workers. But before I get to the gist of my remarks, I should like to comment on some statements made in the house.

For instance, I have heard the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) tell us that the net result of this legislation will be to increase the risk of inflation. I beg to differ. I am not quite sure of that. On the contrary, I believe that this legislation will be most helpful if it is to eliminate duplication of services, for instance, and eliminate useless and costly lines, in short if this legislation should encourage the railways to rationalize their operations, to adopt more modern and efficient methods to prevent operation at a reduced capacity when full capacity is needed, as was mentioned by an hon. member this afternoon. Indeed, all of us have occasionally made reservations and been told that no space was available, but on getting aboard the train we found that the reserved seats were only half full.

There is on that point an obvious lack of organization indicating that, within the railways, at least as far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned, methods which I would call mediaeval are still in use. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am under the impression that the Canadian National was more quickly modernized, that morale and service seemed better than on the Canadian Pacific. Nevertheless, there are still in operation methods which I call medieval and I wonder whether the railways are not maintaining them because they are aware that when faced with huge deficits, they can turn to the government which will then fill the gap. So then, the hon. member for Villeneuve should give the matter some thought because if such modernization is resorted to, there are grounds for hope that the railways will become profitable.

He was right when he said that it was not quite logical to give an increase of 18 per cent across the board, as our friends say, because on the whole, those who are getting smaller wages will benefit less that those who are more highly paid, while the cost of living is the same for all.

I was also struck, Mr. Speaker, by the remarks of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who, convinced as he is of the importance of his bill, said as reported on page 7994 of Hansard: "We are ready to stake our lives on that". That is not a verbatim quotation, but that is what he meant. Presumably, he will not have to do it, but I hope the Minister of Transport and all those who share with him the responsibility for the development of this legislation will nevertheless take into account all the comments made here and those that will be made at the committee on transport and communications and bring in some amendments which are obviously required.

An hon. member of the opposition also said that he noticed that morale was down among C.P.R. employees. He was perfectly right, and I do not see many members of this house who did not have an opportunity of seeing that for themselves during their frequent trips on trains.

One wonders whether the C.P.R. is not neglecting its passenger service simply to have the government allow them to get rid of that white elephant, now that they have taken off everything profitable in the concessions made to them by the country. Anyhow, I will return to this point a little later on.

The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) gave us the history of the railways to remind us that they had received extraordinary and fantastic advantages from the Canadian people and he concluded by saying that the railway companies did not have today the logical reaction they should have by giving back to the people, at least to a certain extent, what the people gave them.

It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I will make some constructive criticism.

I hope that the Transport Commission will have teeth; teeth which will have enough bite to compel those in the railway companies to fill certain gaps, to remedy certain deplorable deficiencies. Once again, I do not wish to present a complete picture of the situation; I will rather proceed by means of illustrations.

Mr. Speaker, despite everything that can be said about the financial plight of the railways, I cannot see why most railway stations in Canada should look shabby and the surroundings neglected beyond belief; the responsible people seem to forget that this is the place which visitors from foreign countries, tourists, for instance, might regard as the face of Canada. Buildings are left in a dilapidated condition with inconceivable thoughtlessness. Some will say that this is because of adverse conditions but it is too important to show a proper face to our visitors to leave things as they are. I am thinking of Expo 1967 which will bring thousands of visitors. Those who travel by train or by car, and who approach railway stations, will find that one station out of five only is in good condition; it is reasonably modern, and painted, and does not look like a hovel or an abandoned house. This fact should be pointed out to those who have the responsibility in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, it is also my opinion that the passenger services are awfully neglected. This has been mentioned many times; I repeat it, because this service is a must; the commission should be specifically instructed to see to it that railways cease to neglect the travelling public, either by abolishing branch lines, which seem to be necessary because of a lack of passengers, or by a lack of deference towards passengers, or in discouraging people to take the train, so as to get rid of them.

It should be determined, Mr. Speaker, whether it is good, logical and morally right for the railways to have obtained their early concessions from Canada including land and natural resources and all sorts of things, in other words millions of dollars in grants and subsidies coming from the taxpayers and then, having invested in different companies all the proceeds from their concessions, isolate passenger service only and say: This is unreasonable; what is economic about our badly-financed organizations?

That is incredible, Mr. Speaker. They did not make those distinctions when they asked the Canadian people to grant them all those concessions; they were ready to provide all sorts of services for Canadians and they did provide them then. Now, however, if other services are more paying than passenger service, part of this profit should be used to continue giving the Canadian people, who paid for it, the services to which they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, the men, the employees, the railwaymen are also complaining about all sorts of things, particularly that they are not always treated in a humane way. I am not one of those who like to play the demagogue. On the contrary, I am of those who on occasion remind the workers that they not only have rights in society, but duties as well. We did it yesterday, on Labour Day; our workers hear that; they listen attentively and take it into account.

• (7:00 p.m.)

But someone must remind those people of their grievances once in a while. For example, train conductors tell me that they were away from home for two or three days and that they went to eat a good steak at noon—one knows how much a good steak costs; at least $2.75, $3, $3.50; in some areas of the country, where it is less expensive; in certain places, the best steak costs $4.50 and I suppose they are just as entitled to it as we are. And yet their expense account is cut down to $1.25 to $1.50 under false pretexts.

How can the morale of those workers be good, when they see the railway company make savings on the cost of their steak at noon, instead of making more effective ones? Their morale certainly cannot be good.

Mr. Speaker, I have personally seen, for example, in Montreal and also in Toronto, under certain circumstances, railway employees who work outside their home towns and who can only visit their families on Saturdays and Sundays, forced to wait sometimes half a day because they cannot travel aboard any train; they can only ride on certain trains. They have to wait at the station, after having been away from their families for a week and they cannot take the train which would bring them back home as soon as possible. As a result, they hardly spend a day with their families, their wives and children.

How do you expect the morale of these people to be high?

Mr. Speaker, I have visited personally in the Ottawa area, railwaymen who work on railway construction and have to stay away from home for whole weeks on end. I went to see the cars in which they live and I may state that conditions regarding sanitation and cleanliness are repulsive. Such conditions are inadmissible in this era. For instance, to quote only one example, it seems to me that blankets should be washed more often than once every five or six months. To me that would appear to be elementary. The same applies to the sanitation. It would appear that it has not yet been understood that we no longer live in the era that we, older people, have known—where some of those sanitary services were lacking, where there was, especially for those coming from the country, only a pump and, sometimes, only a well in the yard to supply us with water, and where, for lack of other sanitary services, we sometimes had to take a walk to the back yard. Well, conditions are no longer like that; such a situation is not admissible in 1966, especially if one wishes to say that all possible measures are being taken to keep the railwaymen's morale high. Therefore, those people have complaints.

Next, there is the question of forthcoming automation; evidently, that is even more important but I shall not venture into it. However, I would ask hon. members to understand the anguish of those people who have spent 10, 15 or 20 years with the railways and who believe that by reason of automation, they will perhaps be dismissed, their training making them ill-prepared to secure employment elsewhere. They expect that the government, through its Canadian transport commission, or perhaps through the agency of the Department of Manpower, that is to be established, will guarantee to them a sort of rehabilitation, in short, a change of job inside the company if, eventually, automation should mean the loss of their livelihood.

Mr. Speaker, we must keep in mind, while we are revising the Railway Act—because not only the interest of the companies is to be considered, once again—that there is not only the financial interest to be considered, but that we must take into account the human aspect. We must not forget that.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I will make a more personal comment. I know that some members of this house will find that we are discussing this at right and wrong moments, and I know that it will probably hurt certain members of this house. However, I wish to remind them that we have no intention of engaging in destructive criticism. If they feel hurt by my remarks, they should keep in mind that we were hurt for a long time when we were, shall I say, victims of certain omissions, certain errors. I am telling this to the hon. minister, knowing his good disposition, expecting that he will want to take measures so that errors will not be committed as they were before.

On page 3 of the bill, Clause 6, it is stated that a board of 17 members will be created. I ask myself immediately: will there be a reasonable number of competent persons among the 17 members, be they from the province of Quebec or elsewhere? Will there be any? I have been assured that there would be, Mr. Speaker, on another occasion when we were dealing with the National Arts Centre. I was told: there is no need for those things to be written in black and white in the act, because we mean well and this will be done.

I believe that this is generally the case. I feel parliament has dealt with the French Canadian element in Canada with probably more fairness than most of the previous parliaments. I am ready to state this in all frankness, but I must also say say that there are still a few things which worry me. I remember, in particular, when the corporation was created for the administration of the Ottawa station, I saw five English names and not one French name. I told myself: is it possible that there could not be a French Canadian in the 10 provinces who would possess the necessary qualifications to be a member of this corporation? And you will understand why this worries me.

I repeat this for the fourth or fifth time, and do not interpret my speech as being in any way separatist; I am one of those who wish to make a serious attempt at federalism and I am ready to make the necessary sacrifices; but I am telling those who do not believe we have a generation of young French Canadians who are angry, because they examine the history of confederation over the past century and they are not satisfied with the treatment they have received, and they are the first instigators of separatism, since they do not act with due fairness toward those people.

I will make another remark, Mr. Speaker, and, this time with probably more equanimity. I was shocked to see on page 39, section 329 of this bill, something that reads thus:

(1) In this section—

—the definition of eastern ports—

(a) "Eastern port" means any of the ports of Halifax, Saint John, West Saint John and Montreal and any of the ports on the St. Lawrence River to the east of Montreal;

I do not see the name of the harbour of Trois-Rivières. It is classified among any of the ports. Mr. Speaker, the port of Trois-Rivières is proportionately the most paying of all Canadian harbours for the National Harbours Board. It could have the honour of having its name in the bill. I take it for granted that the minister will not refuse me that pleasure.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise another point. I would like to suggest to the hon. minister to invite representatives from the Canadian Federation of Mayors when this bill is discussed in committee. They have constructive remarks to make concerning the taxes the railway companies have to pay. And this point I make to you in the most constructive manner—I know since I was for several years on the executive of the Canadian federation of mayors. Mayors of Canadian communities where huge railway installations are located are dissatisfied with the treatment of the municipalities on the question of taxes.

It is not my intention to elaborate on this, but I suggest that they be called before the committee to make known their grievances. This is simply a constructive suggestion.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, I conclude with two remarks. There was reference a while ago to disputes which might arise between provinces. To my mind a desirable formula for the establishment of this transport commission, would have been for the federal government to invite each provincial transport commission to send a delegate to that federal commission. This would have been a way to show implicitly, even in a field of federal jurisdiction, that there is a desire for co-operation between the central government and the provinces.

And in conclusion I shall say this to the house. Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling that the requirements, the problems and the sacrifices of the trucking industry in Canada are not being fully taken into account. If it is true that the railroads have exerted a decisive influence on the economic development of this country, it is also true that the trucking industry with its own money, and against all comers has achieved something impressive, notwithstanding that it has to compete with the railways which are subsidized in the way we all know.

I think the trucking industry should enjoy special consideration; I would even go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that, in my opinion, the railroads should not be allowed to compete with the trucking industry with the taxpayers' money.

I believe the Canadian trucking industry is capable of absorbing what the railways cannot carry. The trucking industry did it up to now with their own money, with their own means. What they have done should be recognized or at least government grants should not be used to create competition.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in conclusion that if, by setting up this transport commission, certain railway companies persist in wanting to make a profit on economic lines while refusing to spend some of it on uneconomic lines and to give the Canadian public the service to which it is entitled, well, I for one suggest then that we had better think about nationalization. I do not favour nationalization as a general rule. But in the case of such an important service, I think we should perhaps go ahead with it. But nationalization should not then be confined to means of transportation but also to all concessions made to the C.P.R. to everything the C.P.R. has invested in other companies which are extremely well off today; all that was given to those transport companies should be returned to the Canadian public for the benefit of the Canadian public.

This being said, Mr. Speaker, I nevertheless commend the government for the timeliness of this bill. It is timely and I know people have been clamouring for it for a long time. I also suggest—and I know the government has sense enough to do it—that some of the recommendations which will be forthcoming should be taken into account, that certain people, certain representatives, should be invited to appear before the transport committee and their recommendations heeded. May I mention in this respect the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and the representatives of the Canadian trucking industry and, of course, labour representatives who expect the government to finally settle the problem which it has started to settle by introducing the bill we passed the other day.

• (7:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I join with a number of speakers who have preceded me in extending to the minister my personal compliments on having given birth to this long-awaited baby—although it is not exactly a baby; it is probably one of the most far-reaching pieces of legislation ever to have come before this house.

I am a young man, but for the last ten or 15 years I have followed the progress of parliament and of the various governments of Canada in their pursuit of a national transportation policy which would embrace all forms of transportation and the general field of communications. What we have before us now for approval in principle is indeed the basis of worth-while legislation. I could go on to praise many aspects of it, but I am afraid that like most members of the house I have not yet had the opportunity to avail myself of expert opinion as to the effect it is likely to have on certain traditional positions.

As junior member for the constituency of Halifax it might be redundant for me to place on record the full extent of the effect this legislation in its present form is likely to have on the port of Halifax. It is difficult to describe in a few words the importance of transportation to the port, to the local economy and indeed to the entire province of Nova Scotia. Its role is a dominant one. Around our port and the movement of goods through the port, around our military and naval establishments centre all the hopes we have in Halifax, and that general area, for an advance at a pace "commensurate with the rest of Canada", to use a phrase from the bill itself. In this light it is obviously of importance that the consequences of this bill should be understood clearly and that at least one or two assurances should be forthcoming.

The provisions of this measure will affect, among others, longshoremen, customs and immigration staff, railway employees, freight workers and maintenance men together with a vast range of associated interests. It is probably true to say that from 25,000 to 30,000 people derive a livelihood from an occupation directly related to transportation.

In terms of tonnage, the general cargo volume has been running somewhere around 1,250,000 tons in the last year or two. Perhaps I should include the value to Halifax of bulk cargo shipments which have a direct dollar value to the port and to the local economy of at least $18 million each year—not an insubstantial sum by any means, and this estimate is probably a conservative one.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

During the past two or three years we have seen a levelling off of the second major factor in our economy—the income deriving from the military role of the area. For many years there was a continuing increase in the effect of the military dollar upon our economy. This is declining every day. Indeed it is almost gone. But these are two factors which are directly associated with rail transportation, and because of our isolated position they must receive first and primary consideration in my mind as a representative of Halifax.

As I understand the bill before us, which we are being asked to approve in principle, no assurance is given beyond the stated two-year period, notwithstanding the valuable work now being carried out by the special Atlantic provinces study group, and the recommendations it may make to the government at some time in the future. There is nothing in the bill as far as I can see which would protect the traditional position of the maritimes, and if the Minister of Transport thinks otherwise perhaps he would be good enough to say so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. member was good enough to invite me to intervene perhaps he would allow me to draw his attention to the fact that the rates set under the Maritime Freight Rates Act are not altered in any way. The new protection which was introduced only in the last couple of years in connection with Atlantic and Eastern Grain rates is contained in this legislation, and no rates in the region can be changed at all for two years, and then only those which were frozen a very few years ago under the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

Mr. Forrestall: I thank the minister for that reply but I am still not certain that what he has said is the assurance we are looking for. The minister knows as well as I do that our competitive position under the existing Maritime Freight Rates Act puts us into a very broad category and places us at a disadvantage of some 30 per cent compared with other areas. This has been the subject of many letters to the minister; he is familiar with it and I do not think I need elaborate. It will be difficult for me and for most maritime members to give the bill support in principle. It is not good enough for the minister to give assurances. It must be in the act.

An hon. Member: Put it in the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Put what in the act?

Mr. Forrestall: An assurance as to what is to happen at the end of the two-year period. I will not go into it further at this time. I think the minister well knows what I am talking about.

• (7:20 p.m.)

The hon. gentleman is aware of the tremendous difficulty attaching to the shipment of goods from the maritimes to the western regions and from the western regions to the maritimes, as well as to the north. There is the problem of captive shippers. Quite frankly in respect of a captive shipper I think all shippers would be much better off if it were their decision to choose whether or not they were to be captive. It should be their choice and not that of the commission. In spite of the fact that the bill includes a broader definition of what a captive shipper is, it would seem to me on the surface that it would be much simpler and much more feasible if indeed the shipper himself, after recourse under this act, was able to elect whether or not he will be a captive shipper and come under the provisions and clauses in the act.

Just to refresh the minister's mind in respect of captive shippers, going back to 1963, shipments moving from the maritimes to western regions under class rates and non-competitive commodity rates in 1963 accounted for 70.7 per cent of all movements. Back in 1949 this figure was 76.3 per cent. It has come down only 6 per cent in the 17 intervening years since 1949. Again, within the maritime region, as pointed out earlier by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner), under these two particular classifications, first the class rates and second, the non-competitive commodity rates, the total amount of movement by any standard in 1963 at least was 55.8 per cent. In 1949 it was 89.6 per cent.

I suggest these figures are significant, Mr. Speaker, because they do point out the tremendous number of people in the maritimes who fall into this broad category of captive shipper. It is at this point that I am sorry the minister has left the house. He knew what I was talking about and perhaps that is why he left. It is because of the large classification of people and the fact that it is so substantially large as compared to captive shippers in the central region, and because of the impact that any change in the freight rate is going to have on this large body that I must reiterate the necessity of incorporating in the act in terms which are clearly spelled out and which leave no doubt in the mind, just what is going to happen in respect of the two year period of freeze on the present structure.

The study being done by the Atlantic provinces transportation group is not due before the government until January 1 of next year. Because of its complexity I am a little sceptical about whether or not they will have a final recommendation for the government by that time. Indeed, a more likely date would be late spring or early summer. Because of this, because of the lapse of time which will take place between now and the time this information is available to us, plus the fact that we now have the government asking for approval in principle of this new bill, and because of this lack of time which is going to lead to further uncertainty and doubts, I suggest that unless something is done at this stage in the passage of this legislation the effect of this bill will be of deterioration and of disadvantage. Further, it will throw obstacles in the way of all economic communities with regard to planning of projects and of production capacities. They will not know where they stand. No businessman is going to enter into expansion ventures of any magnitude when there is doubt and perhaps more than doubt as to the position of the railways.

Perhaps the government does not know what it is going to do. Surely that is not so. Surely we can get some assurances built into this bill, some assurance that will let people plan and which will let them program a project or a proposition on a sound economic basis. It is not enough at today's pace to look two years into the future. Industry needs much more time, much better information and much more solid information upon which to base its projected economic expansion and planning.

Another point I should like to mention is the maximum rate control. It is important to know the definition of a captive shipper, but what is more important is the manner in which the maximum rate is to be calculated. It has been said before, and I will repeat it, that until such time as the actual basis upon which cost is founded becomes a matter of public knowledge, public understanding and public awareness, there will always be misgivings and doubts. An immediate example of this is to be seen in that fact that for years and years people in the maritimes have been wanting to know, for example, between Toronto and which city, Saint John or Halifax, the compensatory rates have been based. If they were based upon the port of Saint John, then the subsidies must have been quite expensive to move goods to the port of Halifax. If, on the other hand, the rates were based on the port of Halifax, then the railways must have made themselves a small fortune on the movement of goods to the port of Saint John.

This is not a factor but rather a symptom in respect of the cause of the concern and unrest in the minds of the shippers. I have always been dissatisfied with our position under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Indeed it has deteriorated; it is not the best in the world. As a matter of fact it is one of the worst, but what is worse would be to let this legislation in its present form go through. As I have suggested it will throw out planning; it will lead to further erosion in the port of Halifax and indeed in Saint John and all the other areas east of the river ports.

We have heard a great deal lately about what has been done regarding the so-called lag in the development of the economy of the Atlantic provinces in contrast with the rest of the country. The present consensus would appear to indicate that while our primary industries will become more efficient and productive they will not employ a greater number of people, and that consequently our greatest hope for employing and retaining the substantial majority of people growing up, being educated and establishing businesses in the Atlantic region today lies in those means which will lead to a satisfactory atmosphere of expansion and development of secondary manufacturing industry.

The cost of transportation to and from central Canada is the principal reason secondary manufacturing industry in the Atlantic region has not developed at the same rate as elsewhere. So long as this country and its trade tariff policies remain constituted as they are—and I doubt if there is anybody who could seriously argue with this—the cost of transportation will persist as a major economic problem to Halifax and the Atlantic region. Indeed, I suppose this could be said to be the major problem in the port of Halifax.

When navigation on the St. Lawrence, the St. Lawrence seaway and over other transportation developments which have taken place in other regions of the country, hold no threat whatsoever to our export-import traffic, and if the principle of port parity can again be effectively incorporated in railway freight rates over land haul from eastern ports to central Canada, there will be an improvement.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act, as the minister knows, has no application to this type of traffic. We are freezing the Maritime Freight Rates Act, but we are not doing anything about this traffic. Indeed, it might be useful if the minister found an occasion to define clearly what are year-round ports, and if he were to bring back the principle of parity, declaring the port of Montreal and ports on the lower river, and coast to be equal. I am sure at that time the minister will find many friends in the Atlantic provinces, myself numbered among them.

The MacPherson royal commission called the Atlantic region an area of significant monopoly, and I have presented figures from the transport committee hearings of last year to substantiate that suggestion. One of the results has been a greater implementation here in the Atlantic region than in other parts of Canada of the several horizontal freight rate increases authorized during the 13 years immediately following the last war. One must consider that transportation has been and probably will be for many years much more intensively competitive in other parts of Canada.

It is difficult to believe that this development did not in some way have an adverse affect on the objectives of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. No government study so far appears to have considered this factor. It has been entirely overlooked. It is also difficult to believe that the objectives of the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the national policy it purports to implement do not require some revision, having regard to all that has taken place since they were originally conceived in 1947. No government study appears to have been made in this field.

It is true that extensive studies were made by the maritime transport commission prior to presentations being submitted to the MacPherson royal commission; but apart from the amendment to the Maritime Freight Rates Act in 1957 there appears to be little or no evidence that this excellent work received any attention at all, let alone the attention it merited.

Without reviewing it too extensively, the national policy for the Atlantic region, as formally enunciated in 1927, was based primarily on the Duncan royal commission on maritime claims. The result of that was the passage of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, an act which sought to give statutory form and authority to certain of the conditions which, either implied or expressed, were nevertheless part of the agreement under which the maritimes joined with other British colonies to form Canada.

I am sure all hon. members have heard the words of Georges Etienne Cartier, and they are as worthy of repetition today as they will be in a thousand years. He said, and I read from a quotation to be found at page 956 of the committee reports for 1964-65:

> It is as evident as the sun shines at noon that when the Intercolonial Railway is built—and it must necessarily be built if that confederation takes place —the consequence will be that between Halifax and Liverpool there will be steamers almost daily leaving and arriving at the former—in fact it will be a ferry between Halifax and Liverpool.

He was referring to Liverpool, England, not Liverpool, Nova Scotia. You might well ask me the point of this quotation. It is simply this: When serious matters concerning shippers in the Atlantic provinces have been raised and when studies have been made of these problems by independent groups, particularly the maritime transport commission, and it appears that no attention has been given to them, the words of Cartier not only become less and less true, they become nonsensical.

What Cartier was saying in principle was true 102 years, less six days ago, and it will be true a thousand years from now unless the government does something meaningful to bring the standards in the Atlantic area into parity with the rest of Canada. I could go on and outline a particular case for the port of Halifax and the people of the Atlantic region, but I think my point has now been made. The government must give some consideration to the position of the shippers and industries of the Atlantic provinces. Hopefully it will bring forth an amendment which will give assurance in respect of our requirements, if business there is to prosper during the next few years. This would remove the threat which now exists because of a lack of knowledge as to what will happen at the end of this freeze period.

I am compelled to say that as the situation now exists, notwithstanding the stated assurances of the minister and the hope of assurances and recommendations that will come from a special transportation study, the minister must act to put these assurances in the form of an amendment to the existing legislation, before I can approve of this bill in principle.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Before the time at my disposal runs out, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments in regard to an area that has not been dealt with in any detail. Again I am sorry the minister is not here, because he could probably set my fears at rest. My remarks deal with the incorporation under this broad bill of the Air Transport Board, and the Aeronautics Act under which in part the Air Transport Board operates. The bill deals very briefly with what is going to be done in connection with the Air Transport Board. It deals with what will happen to the chairman of the board and the commissioners. It deals with the employees of the board, and so on, but it does not tell us anything at all about the act. In an earlier part of the bill it is suggested that the regulatory powers provided under the existing statute will simply be transferred. I am not sure what this means. I am not sure what will happen between the word and the actual fact. What is to be transferred? Will there be an opportunity to review the existing regulatory powers under the Aeronautics Act?

For example, Mr. Speaker, will this bill provide an opportunity for members of the aviation industry in Canada to step in forcefully and hopefully, at the invitation of the minister, to express their views on general aviation matters? Will an opportunity be given for them to assist the minister in the formation of policy in this connection? Indeed, does the minister envisage any change in the present act or regulations? When are we to get a general aviation policy? When are we to get a regional aviation policy? Are we to draw any inference from the general theme of compensatory principles? Are we to draw the inference from the bill before us that passengers on air lines will travel on a basis compensatory to the carriers?

In this connection, what is to happen with regard to building up air freight lines? In recent years steps have been taken in this area not only in Canada but througout the world, and it has been seen that companies with faith in the growth and future of the country may in these circumstances experience some lean years. None of these matters are dealt with in this bill. We are left in vague, gray shadows in this regard. We are urged: Do not worry about it; everything will be all right. Members of the general aviation industry in Canada have not yet spoken out too loudly in this regard but I am certain that during the next 12 months—and I am sure it will not take that long to pass this mammoth piece of legislation before us, after a thorough discussion of its priciples—they will come forward with many questions of the minister. He could deal with these questions now, and set the minds of these people at ease, during our discussion of this bill.

Then, Mr. Speaker, what is the position with regard to appeal provisions in the bill? Under the existing regulatory powers appeals are held and dealt with in the final analysis in the minister's office. Surely nobody in the general aviation industry in Canada wants to appeal a matter to the minister's office and obtain a ruling under the act. However, the present act says that they must. In regard to every other form of transportation there is the right of appeal to a technical or legal board, but that does not apply here because the appeal is to the minister's office. Appeals taken in connection with other forms of transportation are not heard by the minister, and I hope these people are discouraged from running to his office every time they have a problem.

I ask the minister why this situation could not be changed and why something could not be spelled out in the bill to deal with these matters. The question of appeals alone has been the subject of many, many representations over a period of years. One of the major reasons for the hue and cry in the last ten years has been the lack of a definite regional and national air lines policy in Canada. Now that we have a transportation bill dealing in a broad way with these problems, why is this policy not laid down? Why must we wait until some vague, indefinite and unmentioned point in the future? Certainly this policy has to be changed. The present minister, and ministers before him, have assured this house on a regular basis, in response to questions from the floor and in reply to correspondence and inquiries from the industry generally, that we will get into this whole field of regional air policy soon. We have been told that we must devise a policy in this area. But now we have the bill before us and it contains nothing dealing with this subject.

Then there is the question of main line domestic policies. Are they to remain the same? Will the same bodies bargain for us in connection with international air line routes? Will they bargain for us for extended freight routes? When will we get around to dealing with the question of the Aeronautics Act, which is left hanging and vague in this bill? The only persons protected are the members of the present board, and there does not seem to be any concern for other matters in this connection. Clause 82 of the bill says:

> Upon the coming into force of Part I, a person who, immediately before the coming into force of that Part, was a member of the Air Transport Board becomes a member of the Canadian Transport Commission with like effect as though he had been appointed thereto under Part I on the day that he was last appointed to the Air Transport Board.

The same position will obtain with regard to the employees of the board. As I have said, the status of the chairman of the Air Transport Board is dealt with, and rightly so. But nothing else is spelled out; there is no indication of what will happen in other directions. Indeed there does not seem to be any great concern in this regard. In the field of private aviation there are many, many vital questions. Many of these questions deal with the utilization of privately owned aircraft, privately owned and operated airfields, the use of aircraft both private and commercial and the use of military airfields for commercial purposes. These are all matters under the purview of the Air Transport Board and the air services branch of the Department of Transport. They are important matters and many thousands of Canadians are vitally concerned with them; yet the minister has done nothing to explain to this important sector of our national economy, what it is intended to do, when it will be done or whether anything at all will change under this new bill.

One of the direct results of a lack of general aviation policy in Canada, particularly a regional air transportation policy, has been the extreme difficulty on the part of regional air carriers to provide an effective and economical service in the areas they attempt to serve. Again, here, the lack of further direction only tends to restrict them. It is difficult to plan unless you know under what authority and under what rules and regulations you are going to operate in the next few months or years. Without this knowledge this section of our economy remains at a disadvantage. Mind you, it has been at a disadvantage for a long time, but these regional air carriers are pretty stout fellows who will probably button their lips for another few months. However, sooner or later they will rise and demand that the minister explain to them what their future will be.

• (7:50 p.m.)

This legislation has been promised to them for years. Now we have it and there is nothing in it. There can only be dismay, discouragement, bewilderment and wonderment over what the government is attempting to do. This is a broad and sweeping bill which deals mainly with railways. But railways are not the only communication media in Canada; these thoughts are very real in the minds of the regional air carriers, and they will bring those thoughts forward forcibly.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion again may I urge the minister to give assurances and to spell out in clearly defined terms that the maritime shippers and the maritime industry will not suffer and will not be put at a disadvantage once this bill becomes law, and at the conclusion of the two-year freeze period.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, one has only to peruse Bill C-231 in order to arrive at the conclusion that a great many more questions arise from it than there are answers contained in it. It has been indicated in the debate today by a number of hon. members who have studied the bill and endeavoured to inform themselves to the best of their ability that they are left with a very significant question in their mind regarding their approach to this bill on second reading. It would be much simpler if the government were to refer the bill for study in the standing committee and allowed the experts in these various fields to appear before the committee, to enunciate their criticisms and express their views on how this bill can be improved,—if indeed it can be improved; some may believe it is perfect as it is. This would place members of this house in a better position to arrive at an informed conclusion on the bill. If the government forces hon. members to arrive at a definite conclusion without proper evidence being made available to them, it will place them in a difficult position.

I hope the government will not endeavour to get this bill through second reading before the standing committee has had time to consider the broad general philosophy behind it. If we are to leave shortly for the remainder of the recess with a clear understanding of what will happen in regard to a national transportation policy, then we should first send this bill to a committee for thorough consideration. I do not think that even if we spent the whole of this week debating this bill in its present form we would find ourselves in a position to make an educated estimation of its value. I hope the government will consider sending the bill to the standing committee before it obtains second reading.

I would now like to turn to some of the general questions which have arisen in my mind as a result of studying this legislation to the best of my ability in the short period of time available to me. First of all, transportation has always been of main concern in this country because our economy has evolved our trade patterns from east to west rather than from north to south. We in the maritimes or the Atlantic area are well aware of the complexities that will face us when this legislation is adopted.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act has dealt with the inequities in transportation which have developed between the maritimes and the central part of our nation. This act has been used to develop the philosophy of east-west transportation and to try to equalize transportation charges which must be borne by the people no matter where they live. The government is fully aware of the fears of the people of the maritime provinces regarding freight rates. I need only quote portions of an editorial which appeared in the Moncton Daily Times and which reads as follows:

> The new legislation enunciates manifold changes, among these some of marked significance in what has heretofore been long observed transportation rules and regulations governing not only the railways but steamship and other shipping operations, and the air lines. The three federal regulatory bodies which have jurisdiction over the respective phases of the nation's transport—Board of Transport Commissioners, Canadian Maritime Commission, and Air Transport Board—are planned for consolidation into a single agency to be known as the Canadian Transport Commission. This body will have seventeen members.
> Inasmuch as it is proposed to afford the railways greater measures of freedom from the presently governing rules and regulations, the Atlantic provinces in particular have especial interest in that important aspect of freight rate making. One of the proposed freedoms is that the railways will have more power in adjusting their freight charges to make these, where considered necessary, more compensatory.
> In the consideration of this new legislation and in that part of it relating to the terms of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, the members of parliament from the Atlantic provinces must hold the government not only to preserving the rights given this seaboard region by the Maritime Freight Rates Act but to providing guarantees that there shall be no further erosions of such rights through blanket or any other type of increases in the freight tolls.

• (8:00 p.m.)

In the light of the sacrifices which the martime provinces have made toward maintaining the Canadian confederation in other ways, neither the government nor parliament should lose sight of such facts.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) indicated a short while ago that we have a guarantee in the legislation that there will be absolutely no alteration in our rates for the next two years. For this, we are very thankful. I am sure that the fact the minister comes from the Atlantic area had a good deal to do with the recognition that fears must be allayed in the Atlantic provinces that the rights we have now will not be eroded in any way. I say to you, sir, there is another aspect which I should like to have the minister consider. It is the fact that if the government believes the Maritime Freight Rates Act is a fair act, a realistic act, in the development of a national transportation policy, should there not be the same consideration given to the Atlantic provinces in relation to other forms of transportation? I mention especially air transport and pipe lines which, for the first time, will be coming under the national act, as well as road transportation which we might as well admit has been a provincial responsibility up to the moment.

I believe that if the philosophy behind the Maritime Freight Rates Act is accepted by the government, then the government should indicate in this legislation, which to the best of my knowledge it has not done, that similar consideration will be available to the Atlantic provinces in these other fields, that similar recognition will be coming forward to the Atlantic provinces in connection with other forms of transportation. One result of such consideration may be that we would be able to progress at a much faster rate than is in evidence at the present time. Since I have been in this house, it has been obvious that transportation problems are at the core of many of our economic problems. It is in this field that we spend most of our time in our debates in this chamber.

I should like to mention only two or three examples. In Nova Scotia there is a good deal of discussion concerning the establishment of a second ferry between that province and the New England states. There is money being expended at the moment on the building of a causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to form a more satisfactory link and to make the products of Prince Edward Island more accessible to the remainder of Canada. In New Brunswick, as well as in Nova Scotia, there is a good deal of discussion about the building of a road through the state of Maine, so that we would have greater access to the markets of central Canada, or Ontario and Quebec, if you would rather have the area described that way, since people in those parts of Canada do not appear to like being told they are from central Canada.

Our problems are basic, and harken back to the problems of transportation, the getting of our goods to markets at the cheapest possible rate. We have a new conception determined by the MacPherson royal commission, and put into legislation on two occasions by this government. The legislation is so complicated that it takes more than a week for a layman to understand it. The government however is asking us to give approval to the principle of this legislation before we really have a good understanding of what the legislation will do for us or to us. It is the latter part that we in the maritimes fear more than anything else. I mentioned earlier the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the assurance was given by the minister that nothing would be done for a period of two years. This is very specifically set out in the legislation. However, we have no assurance about what is going to happen after the two-year period. In the maritime provinces, we feel a little leery about leaving it up to this 17-man board to make the decision on their own after this two-year period.

I would think a satisfactory alternative would be to have the recommendations made when that study is completed brought back to parliament so that parliament may be able to make the decision about what should happen at the conclusion of those two years. I think we in the maritimes would be much happier if we thought, before any final decision was going to be made at the conclusion of the two years, that parliament would have an opportunity to hear from the members representing that area.

I refer to another section of the bill which will be of real concern unless some assurances are given by the government. I refer to what will be section 329A of the act and which deals with eastern rates as they are defined here for eastern ports. Since 1960 there has been a freeze on these rates. They are, and have been, of assistance in maintaining business at our eastern ports. We want something in the way of an assurance from the minister about what kind of decision is going to be rendered in the future on these eastern rates. We want an assurance that our ports are going to be maintained at the highest possible level.

One who comes from the maritimes does not have to live in either Saint John, New Brunswick or Halifax, Nova Scotia to appreciate that the level of prosperity in those two areas has a good deal to do with the level of prosperity in the whole of the maritimes. Naturally, therefore, we are anxious to know more about what will be done with those eastern rates in the future. There are so many complexities in this bill, so many things to which we do not have the answer and may not for some time to come, that I do not really believe it is fair to ask a member to vote now. I think the bill should go to the standing committee, where it would receive scrutiny which would be of benefit both to it and to a national transportation policy. Members would then be in the position of making an educated assessment of the bill and would be able to make a determination as to whether or not it should receive their support.

By asking members to vote now I think the government is placing them in the position of being able to vote only one way, and that is against the bill. I say that because it is much safer to vote against something with regard to which you do not possess all the answers. One should be in the position of making a sensible and realistic assessment, one which would be of benefit to the nation as a whole. I do not think that any member of this house is anxious to vote against any legislation. We are here to endeavour to produce the very best legislation which can be made available to the nation. We are not "agin" anything. We are for reform, for the kind of reform that is going to be of benefit to our nation in its development. But at this stage it is hardly responsible procedure to ask members to indicate their views about a piece of legislation as complicated as Bill No. C-231.

Let us take a look at the history behind this bill so as to realize how complex it is; that is, if we are to judge from the length of time which the government had the MacPherson royal commission report before it before bringing in this legislation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, had this bill been before parliament prior to last week this nation might very well not have been faced with a rail strike. The government and the minister considered the policy such a complicated and difficult one that they not only presented one bill which was then withdrawn, but have allowed this bill to come before the house only at a time of national crisis. I am not at all sure when the house would have got the bill had it not been for the rail strike. It may very well be that the minister would have brought it in this fall anyway; this is what he indicated; but the minister having found it possible to prepare the bill and bring it before us while a rail crisis was in progress, I cannot for the life of me see why he could not have brought it in before the recess. Had he done so it might very well have resulted in a negotiated settlement between the railways and the employees, and thus averted the damage that has been done to the economy by the strike that ensued.

I hope that the minister, who comes from the Atlantic area, or I should say, to be more specific, who represents a constituency in the Atlantic area, will give consideration to developing the same kind of philosophy as that embodied in the Maritime Freight Rates Act in regard to the various other forms of transportation that are becoming so important to the economy of the Atlantic area. There is today a tremendous development in the handling of freight by the air carriers. Here again we are in the position of having almost a monopoly situation, certainly with respect to transporting our goods from any part of the Atlantic provinces to any other part of Canada outside the province of Quebec. Surely if the government believes in the philosophy behind the Maritime Freight Rates Act it should be doing something to see that our advantages are equalized in the carriage of air freight just as much as in the carriage of rail freight.

While as yet we do not have the great benefit of pipe lines, I am sure that these will come. There again the same type of philosophy as embodied in the Maritime Freight Rates Act should be extended to the operation of pipe lines. So far as truck transportation is concerned, it is our only alternative today. Since the bill is to regulate this form of transportation in the future, surely this legislation should once again give us the same kind of protection and provide the same kind of philosophy for highway transportation as it recognizes for rail transportation.

I hope that the result of this legislation will be of real benefit to the Atlantic provinces. I hope it will spur our development and that we will progress at a faster rate than that evidenced at the present time. But I think it is too early to predict what this legislation will do. I do not think we have available to us the kind of educated opinion that we need in order to arrive at a sane and sensible conclusion. Therefore, I would ask the minister to give consideration to withholding second reading at the present time and to allowing the committee immediately to go to work on this legislation, so that members are able to make an assessment which is in keeping with the gravity of the legislation when it does finally come before the house for second reading.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, the news of the introduction of this transportation bill in the House of Commons was viewed with a great deal of real exhilaration on the part of the citizens of Ontario, especially those of southwestern Ontario. They felt that at last there was at least a chance and an opportunity to remove some of the restrictions and regulations in the government's transportation policy which have seriously curtailed and throttled the industrial expansion of that particular area.

For years industry, chambers of commerce, agricultural leaders and citizens of the area had petitioned, pleaded with and had interviews with the various governments concerned, but all in vain. Now, at last, with the entire proposition brought forward before parliament for consideration it was felt that an opportunity would prevail for views to be expressed on this most important legislation. There is one sad aspect to this, however. There was a growing feeling on all sides, that from the manner in which the railway strike was being handled by the present government a crisis was being deliberately fermented that might bring forth a climate which would be opportune for the passing of such legislation with strong public support.

On listening to the presentation by the Minister of Transport, and the various speakers who have taken part in the debate of this, the second reading, the magnitude and complexity of the bill is very, very evident. Those who are directly affected have found much to be concerned about, both in the clauses that pertain to their particular industries, and to the very principles that were either just mentioned in passing, or not dealt with at all.

Surely the people in Ontario have a great deal to be concerned about. Those in the area

I have the honour to represent, who are engaged in industry, are very much concerned to know what is meant by this equalization of freight rates; to know what is meant by a national policy. The farmers in my particular area want to know whether this will have any effect on the subsidies paid on freight with respect to western grains. How will they fare under a new bill?

The truckers too, are very much concerned. Will the action taken by this government in this transport legislation have the effect of removing the contentious subsidies the truckers have opposed for years? Will this enable them to compete on a more equitable basis? Will this provide the climate for competition and expansion they have sought for so long? Will this indeed be a national policy that will work toward the interests of all?

I was very much impressed when I heard the various participants in this debate talk of a national policy. Some expressed concern that this policy might break down into regional areas. Various members spoke of a particular problem that is of direct concern from a regional point of view.

Here in Ontario, and in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, how can we be expected to take any other course of action than we have, when we hear the suggestion that freight rates presently in operation, that is to say, government regulations in effect in the maritimes, will be untouched, that government regulations of direct concern to western grain producers will be untouched; that regulations concerning the Crowsnest pass will remain untouched?

When we hear this sort of thing being elaborated, when we hear the minister and various members of the government alluding to this bill as one which will enable the railways to be placed in a competitive position, one that will once and for all enable the railways to charge rates that will place them on an economic footing, why should those of us in Ontario and Quebec not become concerned?

We want to know where the money is to come from. We heard that the government at the present time is paying $100 million in subsidies. We heard that the increase in pay to the railway workers conceivably could add up to $30 million. We understand from the railway representations that the railways need more money in order to operate in the black. We are getting an uneasy feeling, Mr. Speaker, in Ontario, and I am sure in Quebec also, that if there is to be little change in the maritime freight rates, if there is to be little change in the rates for the western provinces, any increase the railways may be allowed could conceivably come from Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. If this is so, Mr. Speaker, certainly it will add a tremendous burden to every segment of industry in those areas I have mentioned. We begin to wonder if this money will come from us. Where is the money to come from? Where are we to get the needed additional revenue?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. Danforth: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very interested to know whether, in expressing these fears, the hon. gentleman was speaking for his party?

Mr. Danforth: I think the minister knows, from long experience, that each member of the Conservative party is well able to speak for himself. I am speaking on behalf of the people I represent, who belong to an area, I think, that the minister has completely forgotten about. May I elaborate on that particular area, to give the house an idea of what I am talking about? We have been discriminated against. Certainly the Minister of Transport must know this. That is so partly because we are in the very centre of Canada, and partly because we are in that projection of Canada that juts down into the United States. As a matter of fact we are almost on the same parallel as New York city.

Because of this, the freight rates that we have to contend with are somewhat different from those prevailing in other parts of Canada. The area I refer to is comprised of five counties. In those counties, the value of agricultural and manufactured goods annually shipped is in excess of $1,250 million. The materials purchased in the area and shipped in represent a value of approximately $900 million. The annual payroll now exceeds $300 million. The number of employees is in excess of 80,000. This is the area that I assure the minister I am very much concerned about.

Why am I concerned, Mr. Speaker? What are some of the inequalities I speak of? Because of our geographic situation we are subject to two different types of freight rates. Anything we ship to the east is on the pound per mile shipping basis. May I give an example of what this means? When we ship 100 pounds of freight first class, let us say from Windsor to Halifax, the rate is around $4.15. The rate from Montreal to Halifax—Montreal is approximately 600 miles closer to the port of destination than Windsor—is approximately $2.59 less. We appreciate why this should be so. It is because Montreal, as I say, is 600 miles closer to the coast.

One would think that in shipping to the west we would have the advantage; but when shipping westward we are included in a zone which stipulates that goods shipped from Windsor to Winnipeg shall be subject to a rate of $5.89 per 100 pounds, though from Montreal, which is 600 miles farther east, we find that the rate is exactly the same. Why would industry be encouraged to establish itself in southwestern Ontario when by moving to Montreal it could get half the rate when shipping to the east and the same rate when shipping to the west? This is one of the inequalities of which I spoke.

Again we find ourselves handicapped when it comes to farm products, because of the policy laid down by the government. In our area there has been a tremendous expansion in the production of feed grain. Here, too, we are encountering a penalty. We find that when shipping to the maritimes we are penalized to the extent of almost $20 a ton compared with shipments from western Canada, and we see no reason why this should be so. When shipping to our traditional markets in the east we do not see why we should not be accorded a rate at least comparable to that given to the west.

These are some of the thoughts which occur to most people in southwestern Ontario. They know this is bound to be a complicated bill establishing a national policy. But they are uneasy. They feel that once more they will be asked to carry more than their fair share of the burdens of the transportation system.

Like many members who have spoken before me I had been hoping that the government would refer this bill immediately to the standing committee on transport. There is no question that such complicated legislation needs the best expert advice from whatever source. I had hoped the government would avail itself of the invitation to set up the committee immediately. I am asking the government now to entertain submissions which may be brought before such a body. Various segments of industry, including heavy industry, manufacturing, agriculture and trucking, not to mention the chambers of commerce and municipalities in the area which I represent, will wish to have the opportunity of placing their views before such a committee.

They would like to explain why the treatment to which they have been subject in the field of transportation has worked such undue hardship. These are the people who are likely to be asked, when there is any increase in the rates, to bear the economic burden and certainly they have a right to place before the committee any aspect of their understanding of the effect of this measure.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask another question? Is the hon. gentleman not aware that it is the intention to give all interested parties the fullest opportunity to be heard before the committee when the bill is sent there?

Mr. Danforth: I wish to thank the minister for that statement, and I am certain he is sincere when he gives me that assurance. However, I cannot help remembering other occasions when delegations found the greatest difficulty in making their wishes known before committees set up by this government.

In the light of that assurance from the minister I will certainly convey to interested parties in my own area the understanding that an opportunity will be afforded them to make presentations before the standing committee, and I am sure they will avail themselves of this opportunity.

As I have said, this is complicated legislation, legislation which must deal with the needs of the nation as a whole. It is to be hoped that, when the bill finally passes, the citizens of Ontario and Quebec will be satisfied that they are not bearing more than their fair share of the cost of the development of a policy which will place Canadian transportation on an economic basis of operation.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): I should like to say a few words to the house, more particularly perhaps to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) who is basking at the feet of the old master. I said that slowly, Mr. Speaker, so that I would not fall into the trap into which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) fell the other day by saying the wrong word. Perhaps before leaving the Minister without Portfolio, who is learning his lesson in excellent fashion for the warfare he faces in the days ahead with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), I should ask whether the Minister of Transport is also giving singing lessons.

When I first read the bill which is now before the house I was pleased with the provision dealing with the Maritime Freight Rates Act and term 32 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. Since then I have had some second thoughts because, really, we are dealing with two main transportation problems, not with one, and I would much prefer to have seen the whole national transportation policy spelled out, including those provisions dealing with Atlantic Canada rather than wait until some future time for special provisions dealing with Atlantic Canada to be written in.

This is the reason for my concern. As I say, there are two problems. There is the matter of effective and efficient transportation as related to manufacturing in Canada. Then there is the question of transportation as it affects our exports and imports.

In the second field, as a representative of Halifax I am bound to be concerned about the competitive position of my own area as compared with the competitive position of other areas, and I think the present bill may be defective in this regard inasmuch as it fails to come to grips with some of the problems of real concern to the area I represent.

There are certain developments in the field of winter works, for example on the St. Lawrence river, with which this bill cannot deal and yet which are vital in consideration of a national transportation policy. These developments are with us now. These specifically are the decisions of two conferences, the Canada-United Kingdom freight conference and the United Kingdom-Canada freight conference. They sound like tweedledum and tweedledee, but they are perhaps two sides of the same coin which are pressing for all-out winter navigation on the St. Lawrence river. Unless some measure is brought in to check this, the ports of Halifax and Saint John will be a matter of serious economic consequence to the Atlantic area. By the time these transportation studies are brought in the damage may become permanent. So, while I welcome the thought of the minister turning toward a national transportation policy—and I think he will recall that

I made that point, although it was rather an unpopular one, to many of my constituents during the emergency debate on the St. Lawrence seaway tolls—the national policy is not complete, because the Atlantic aspects of it are left out in the cold. I should like to express my doubts to the Minister of Transport and the Minister without Portfolio to the government, to the house and to the country as a whole.

I wish to deal briefly with one point and then get to the meat of my remarks. The port of Halifax commission has suggested to the minister I am sure over and over again that the only formula which can solve the problem I have just mentioned is to equalize the cost to the shipper of transportation between all Atlantic ports and the St. Lawrence ports. To carry out these purposes, I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition made a very sensible observation some weeks ago when he suggested that a high speed railway line be built diagonally across the province of New Brunswick. This should improve things for the ports of Halifax, Saint John and other maritime centres, as well as Newfoundland, and feed products into central Canada by a shortened and faster route.

The second problem has to do with the manufacturing business in Canada itself. Here I am going to present the results of two very thoughtful studies carried out by Professor Roy E. George of Dalhousie University, a man with experience as an area manager in the British coal Industry before coming to this country. He was a professor at St. Mary's University in Halifax before going to Dalhousie University. Professor George also has been commissioned to do special studies on Atlantic problems for various bodies. His points are germane to the problems of transportation.

Professor George's first study concerned the elements of costing of firms if they established in Atlantic Canada as opposed to firms established in central Canada. His findings have equal relevance, I suggest, to the prairie provinces because he was equating operations in central Canada against those on the periphery of the country. Instead of tackling this in a very theoretical way, Professor George tackled it in this manner. He found there were 27 firms which had manufacturing plants both in Nova Scotia and either Ontario or Quebec. This was in the year 1962. He wrote a series of communications to these firms to find out whether or not they would be interested in taking part in his study. Eighteen of those firms, or exactly two-thirds, replied that they were interested. So he proceeded, either by questionnaire or by seeing their executives directly, to ask questions so as to compare the various elements of costing.

I might say for the benefit of the minister that if he is not familiar with this study—and if he is not I will be pleased to provide it for him or any official in his department—that there were a number of factors involved such as labour, productivity, cost of the material, and other items; but for the purpose of this debate I shall confine myself to the study which relates to transportation. Of the 18 firms which co-operated in the study the breakdown is as follows: In the food group, two; in the metal group, five; in the chemical group, six; and in the miscellaneous group, five, making a total of 18. The value of their output per annum was as follows: In the food group, $1,500,000; in the metal group, $5,900,000; in the chemical group, $72,200,000; in the miscellaneous, $8,400,000 or a total of $88 million.

Of the various questions Professor George asked, one asked for the cost of materials to Nova Scotia factories as percentages of cost of similar materials in Ontario or Quebec. I repeat that here his figures were obtained from companies which had factories in Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec. The cost of materials to the food group was 105 per cent, to the metal group 104 per cent, to the chemical group 104 per cent and to the miscellaneous group 100 per cent. In respect of all firms the average cost of material to Nova Scotia factories as compared to factories in central Canada amounted to 102 per cent. You will notice, of course, the disparity.

Then he asked for the transportation cost in supplying all existing markets entirely from Nova Scotia, expressed as a percentage of the cost of supplying entirely from Ontario or Quebec. Perhaps the minister could cease his conversation long enough to listen to these, Mr. Speaker. These are the transportation costs involved in supplying all existing markets from Nova Scotia, expressed as a percentage of the cost involved in supplying entirely from Ontario or Quebec. In the food group it was 125 per cent, in the metal group 160 per cent, in the chemical group 141 per cent, and in the miscellaneous group 103 per cent or, for all firms, an average of 125 per cent.

Professor George makes this observation:

Taking all the firms together, had all existing markets been supplied from Nova Scotia, transportation costs would have been about 25 per cent higher than if those same markets had been supplied from Ontario or Quebec.

As transportation costs in the typical Nova Scotia plant made up 3 per cent of all its costs this increase would have inflated costs by about three quarters of one per cent.

• (8:50 p.m.)

These findings in themselves perhaps do not indicate that transportation is an alarming factor so far as dollars and cents are concerned, though the figures would be startling when one considers percentages upwards of 125 per cent.

In a second study by Professor George, carried out a few years ago, entitled "An inquiry into why the Atlantic provinces so often lose out to Quebec and Ontario in the battle for new industry", he made a sampling of 349 firms which had set up manufacturing plants in either Quebec or Ontario between 1959 and 1962. Perhaps I should say parenthetically that about 60 per cent of new manufacturing plants continue to be established in the industrial areas of the two central provinces.

Professor George found in his study that of the 349 firms, 279, or 79 per cent, had considered one province only, and that happened to be the province in which the new plants were actually established. He found that 56 firms or 15 per cent had considered both Quebec and Ontario but no other province; that 16 firms or about 5 per cent of the total had considered provinces other than Quebec and Ontario, nine of which considered western provinces and seven of which considered Atlantic provinces.

The professor looked for the reasons these firms ignored the possibility of establishing in provinces other than in central Canada and most of the firms supplied these reasons. The first factor against locating outside the central Canadian region was the cost of transporting the finished product to the customer, or as the professor puts it:

The cost of bringing in materials and transporting the finished products to their markets figured very prominently. This seems to be the main competitive disadvantage of the outlying areas and the one which governments which seek to influence the location of industry have to overcome.

Part of the reason relates to a psychological factor because people look at transportation in a very general way without delving into the situation to discover the disadvantages which one would not encounter when locating a factory in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, the prairie provinces and British Columbia as opposed to central Canada. Nevertheless, the transportation factor has a leaverage effect and, small as it may be, influences the decisions of executives in the location of new factories.

Let me point out again that these studies on transportation, helpful as they are and necessary as they may be, do not take into account a large part of the transportation problem which is so vital to Atlantic Canada. To have an effective national transportation policy, Atlantic Canada and its needs must be considered as soon as possible. Following the period of freeze we may find that some of our problems are solved, but that other problems have grown and become almost insurmountable.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I cannot help but recall the smile on the face of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) when he rose in this house with an assumed spirit of meekness to introduce this measure, in the hope that it would receive co-operation from all sides. Many years ago we on this side recognized the need for a national transportation policy in this country.

The minister referred to the fact that members in all parts of the house were responsible for the failure of this government to do anything about this matter during the last three years. I recall vividly the statements made by the minister in the house and across the country because in the course of a few months we had not acted on the initial MacPherson commission report. In contrast to those statements the minister paid tribute to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, as prime minister, set up the MacPherson commission to study railway problems. Surely that is in contradiction to the many views expressed by those members when on this side of the house in criticism of the establishment of commissions set up to ascertain certain facts regarding problems facing this nation.

It is gratifying to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) in the house during the course of this discussion, because nothing is more important to those engaged in agriculture than transportation costs. Certain provisions of this bill will affect the costs of producing many things in Canada, but to a greater extent will affect the cost of agricultural production. This is more important because the increased costs faced by the agricultural industry as a result of certain provisions in this bill cannot be passed on to someone else.

Transportation needs in this country have changed during the last several years, since the MacPherson commission was set up and since it presented its report, and this is particularly true of western Canada. Many of the rail lines which were designated by the companies as nominees for abandonment have proven to be worth while, and I am sure that the railway companies would hesitate at this time to proceed with these abandonment plans.

The great change that has taken place is only the forerunner of the change which will take place in the next few years. That is particularly true of the province of Saskatchewan, where there have been new developments in the production of minerals of one kind and another.

We cannot help but view this legislation not only with an eye on the effect it will have on our industry today but on the effect it might have on the industry we hope to have tomorrow. The title of the bill is, "An act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada", and no one will quarrel with that, "to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof"—this will depend upon the amendments that are brought forward—"and to enact other consequential provisions." Knowing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), whose "other consequential provisions" are what bother me, because if they are not spelled out so that it is very clear for everyone to see, we in western Canada and on the prairies cannot help viewing with some concern a measure as vague as this.

The bill contains a clause referring to the Crowsnest pass rates and the minister has given us the assurance that these rates will be protected for western Canada. As I read the new sections 328 and 329, whether the minister really means what he said in this regard is a debatable question. I cannot help but remind him, as I suppose he has been reminded before in this debate and on other occasions also, that the Crowsnest pass rates are looked upon in western Canada as part of the Magna Carta of confederation, and we do not want to see written into any statute of this parliament legislation that will place these rates in a position where they can be eroded two, three, five or ten years from now when someone may come along and say that the basis of the rates has been changed and such-and-such action will be taken. I know there are those in the maritimes who look upon the Maritime Freight Rates Act in much the same way.

Looking at this bill and the explanations the minister has offered in regard to it, I should like to make the following comments. The minister referred to the subsidies which the royal commission recommended. They are three in number. I need not rehash them for the benefit of members of the house. The explanation goes on in this way:

> The present bill takes into account many representations received in regard to these matters. In place of the three special subsidy funds, it provides for a transitional subsidy to the railways which will start at approximately the present level of railway subsidy payments, namely, $110 million per year; and commencing in 1968 will decline at the rate of 12½ per cent of the present subsidy each year.

It does not say when this decline is going to end.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a simple matter of short division, Mr. Speaker. It is eight years.

Mr. Nasserden: That is what worries us in western Canada and the prairies at the present time, because this freedom the minister seems so anxious to give to the railways can mean only one thing in dollars and cents for us, and that is increased costs for those of us in the part of the country which is so dependant upon agriculture for a livelihood. We are what I would call a captive industry because we have to speculate on a government in power at the present time that does not seem to do anything about the prices farmers receive for their products, at a time when farm costs are rising as they have never risen before.

This is a government that promised the farmers of western Canada that they would do something about the price of grain, not only wheat but other grains; yet on every occasion when the opportunity to do something in this regard has presented itself, they have failed utterly to do anything. We have seen the minister and some of his colleagues laugh this off as an election promise. This is one of the reasons we would like to see written into this legislation assurances that will be more than the fact that in eight years time the costs that go into producing the products of the farms in western Canada will have been increased by more than $110 million a year. This of course applies right across Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent the situation. I did explain in my speech that a considerable part of these subsidies would in four or five years time be replaced by the specific subsidy in relation to branch lines that were retained and by another subsidy in relation to any passenger services that were retained. So that all subsidies are not going to disappear under this legislation. But we do think that the subsidization of railway wages is itself a very inflationary measure that adds to the costs of farmers and everybody else, and it is a tendency that ought not to be encouraged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: I see that the minister obtained some applause from that side of the house for his intervention. The only difference is that a subsidy is shared all across the nation when the charge is written into the law. That is why we are concerned about this legislation, because in the past we have seen the centralization of industry in certain areas of Canada at the expense of other areas. We saw this particularly in the years prior to 1956.

We in western Canada, and I believe this applies also to those in the maritimes, believe we are also part of this nation. We want to be able to build industrial plants in our areas as well, and we want to build those plants not only because of the wealth they will bring to our own areas but because they will help to sustain a population that will enable us to cut the cost of services to the people we have in the less populated areas of the country as compared with the more heavily populated areas along the St. Lawrence river basin.

In his summary, on page 4 the minister also referred to the so-called bridge subsidy across northwestern Ontario of $7 million a year. He said this would take place over a three-year period. I will leave that matter for other hon. members to deal with. I was very interested in one statement the minister made in introducing this bill. I found his speech most interesting. I say that for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) who is smiling. As reported at page 7988 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I have the impression that something the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said in connection with another measure might be appropriate. I am not going to quote him, because that would be against the rules, and I have forgotten his exact words, which is even more inhibiting. However, I believe I remember the sense very well, and it was this, that there were some things that could be done in a crisis that could not be done in ordinary times.

We also saw those headlines in the newspapers prior to the strike, and one cannot help wondering whether this government wanted the strike in order to bring in railroad legislation that was unpalatable to many people in this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. gentleman on reflection will wish to withdraw that kind of imputation against any member of this house. I am sure he does not think that anyone in this house wanted to face the calamity of a railway strike in this country if there was any possible way of avoiding it.

Mr. Nasserden: I might agree that no one would like to face that calamity, but one cannot help drawing the conclusion from what we have heard and seen from this government that they viewed with a sense lacking alarm the possibilities that might accrue from such an eventuality, provided they could get it over with in a certain length of time. I think that is a poor recommendation for a piece of legislation as important as this particular measure now before us.

The minister has been asked whether he would consider allowing this bill to be sent to a committee before receiving second reading. I do not know whether or not he has changed his mind in that regard. He shakes his head that he has not. I believe there is a very good reason for sending this legislation to a committee before giving it second reading because I am of the opinion that substantial changes might be proposed after the committee has had an opportunity to study it. After all, and in the minister's own words, this is perhaps the most important measure ever to have come before parliament. The minister will not suggest that it is not important.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the most important measure ever to have come before parliament. I am much more modest than that.

Mr. Nasserden: This is a modesty that frightens hon. members on this side of the house. We know the minister attaches a great deal of importance to this bill. I believe that to begin with he called this measure a revolutionary one. That was a year or two ago, at a stage when it was just hatching. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation ever to have come before this parliament, in view of its economic consequences in every part of this nation. This measure will affect people in every part of Canada and it will change the complexion of many of our communities.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation also deals with pipe lines. Recently we have witnessed the spectacle of the Energy Board approving the setting up of a pipe line which has been vetoed by the government. Many people in this country think that this decision will cost the consumers of gas in Ontario and Quebec several extra cents per cubic foot. This is one case which leads us to think that when this bill is sent to a committee which has been given the chance to hear representations and to consider them in the light of today's conditions, recommendations may be made amending certain clauses.

I should like to say a few words regarding rail rationalization. I know that there might be one or two railway lines which are uneconomic and can be abandoned. I believe that this has already been done by some of the railways as a result of the unkempt conditions of parts of the tracks. I know of one or two rail lines that were designated for removal in the area I represent, and yet I feel that these lines have been essential for the delivery of grain over the past few years.

This matter raises another question, and that is the effect which the removal or abandonment of lines will have on individual producers in the prairies. The Crowsnest pass rates are supposed to be the Magna Carta of confederation. The first settlers in those areas endeavoured to make Canada the grain bin of the empire, on the understanding that the Crowsnest pass rates would prevail. Now we are facing the prospect of the government, or a commission, taking that right away from them. I wonder whether there is some provision in this bill which would recompense these people for the losses they must bear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member, for my information. Is he seeking, by the statement he just made, to imply that under this legislation the Crowsnest pass rates will be changed in any way? The fact is they are not altered in any way under this legislation, and this government has no intention whatsoever of doing so or of supporting any alteration of them in any way whatever.

Mr. Nasserden: Well, Mr. Speaker, I accept the minister's assurance, but the fact remains that regardless of whether the Crowsnest pass rates are altered or not, when a rail line is abandoned the farmer has to haul his grain perhaps 40 miles instead of 7 or 8, as a result of which his costs are raised, because of an action taken by the government of Canada. There is no question about it. The minister laughs. This proves that the minister never in his life hauled a bushel of grain.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hauled grain before the hon. gentleman was born.

Mr. Nasserden: I would hope there was some progress in every generation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not have a truck to do it with either; we had horses.

Mr. Nasserden: I was wondering whether it might not have been in the days of the oxen.

I do not wish to take up any more time of the house. But I do bring to the attention of the minister the fact that people in the farming communities of western Canada are not happy with the prospect of having to haul grain 40 miles instead of 7 or 8 miles.

The minister mentioned that improved roads might take the place of rails. I hope this meant that the federal government or the proposed transport commission will be prepared to enter into agreements with the provinces in those areas where lines are abandoned to provide for the construction of better highways, which would take the heavier load which will be placed on them owing to the abandonment and dislocation of certain railway lines. I want to assure the minister that western Canada is not as unreasonable as some newspapers have indicated in the last few days. We know the budget of the railways has to be considered; but nowhere in this bill is it stated how the railways are to find the money to pay the increased costs.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman seems to agree with the president of the C.P.R.

Mr. Nasserden: This might be the first time. After having seen the transformation which took place following the discussions between the great champion of the farmers of western Canada, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), and the president or maybe the vice president of the C.P.R., I am glad to announce to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have not had any interviews with the president of the C.P.R. and I will avoid having one with him.

I was about to conclude when the minister's intervention distracted my attention. I spoke of our hope that the federal government or the proposed transport commission will provide some assistance in the construction of highways in areas where railway lines are to be abandoned. This would only be fair, in view of the importance which the people in western Canada place on Crowsnest pass rates. I therefore hope the minister will allow this bill to be studied in committee before second reading. I am sure that there may be some amendments. The minister admitted that there has been some haste with regard to the preparation of the bill, and it seems that would be the proper course to follow.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): I shall not speak too long on this particular bill, Mr. Speaker, but there are some things which I have been hearing in the west which I should like to place before the minister. I just came from there, landing here tonight about 7.15. I feel I should put these matters on the record, and I am glad of this opportunity to do so.

First of all, I should like to refer to branch line abandonment. Some time ago I attended a meeting at Glenwoodville, southwest of Macleod. The hall was filled. The meeting was concerned with the abandonment of the line from Glenwoodville to Cardston. The people were worried or the hall would not have been filled. They were worried about what a railroad bill might do to them. I see the minister is laughing, but I shall take him to task before I am through if he does not take that laugh off his face. This is no time to be laughing. This is a serious matter and it is dead serious.

The people at that meeting were greatly exercised about what would happen to their line from Glenwoodville to Cardston. The agent for the Canadian Pacific in Lethbridge let word slip that this line was one slated for abandonment. This was the reason for holding the meeting. Even the Hutterites in that area, people who seldom attend meetings, were out in force. The meeting organized an association to present their case at the proper time. I suggested this course to them and told them they should get their brief prepared. I am sorry the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) has left the chamber because he has done many cost studies. I wonder if the Minister of Transport ever made a cost study? I wonder if he ever had to work on a study and set the capitalization for a corporation? I wonder if he would know how to do it, if he were charged with the responsibility of this commission that is being set up?

In other words, this legislation is expecting the commission to do costing work which they are not able to do. I doubt if there is anyone in this room who can do a capital study or a proper costing study for a railroad. I have made many costing studies for railways and other companies. I do not hesitate for one minute to say that, whatever costing studies are made by the officials of the Canadian Pacific, they will not be acceptable to those upon whom the decision about abandonments is to be placed. Upon whom are you going to depend? You may call it rationalization, but before you can rationalize you have to have some figures. What rate of interest are you going to charge in your costing study? Are you going to charge 1 per cent, 5 per cent, 2 per cent or 6 per cent? I will tell you this much, you can make any branch line in this country appear to lose money by charging 6 per cent or 7 per cent interest. This commission has got to decide the interest rate to be charged in a costing study. Is the minister prepared to stand behind some fictitious interest rate that may be pulled off the shelf, and applied, to show whether a branch line needs a subsidy or whether the rails should be pulled up and the line abandoned? Legislation predicated upon that type of approach will never satisfy the people of Canada because it just cannot be done.

All you have to do to satisfy yourself about that is to talk to the Board of Transport Commissioners. I had many opportunities of talking to them when we were dealing with the disruption of passenger service between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge and between Lethbridge and Calgary. The Canadian Pacific ran a little car up and down that line, you know. They said they were losing money. We challenged the figures presented by the railway company. We asked them to let us in on how they made their computations, what their interest rates were and what capitalization they took into consideration. Did they take into consideration also all of the subsidiaries that had been set up by Canadian Pacific? Had they drawn off all the money and put it into other things? Were the income and capitalization of these subsidiaries taken into consideration in calculating the capital structure or computing the interest rate? No, not on your life.

The lawyers appearing before the MacPherson commission for the Canadian Pacific argued that the hauling of grain or the hauling of any particular commodity should rest upon its own feet. It should not be considered a part of that great transportation system. They wanted to calculate the interest rate and capitalization of the particular equipment the Canadian Pacific used in transporting that grain or that particular commodity. Now, those are the fallacies basic in this legislation, and the minister should know these things if he knows anything about costing.

I will tell the minister what is going to happen. The commission will get a great many figures which neither they nor anybody else will understand and, in the end, they will have to guess. This is what will happen in connection with the abandonment of lines. They will not fool anybody. This legislation is going to force the commission to do just that. I say that it is bad legislation when you place any honest, government workers in a position of trying to bring together these figures. They can prove what they have done in the way of costing, and you can see it all. Somebody else can make the same calculations but the answers will be vastly different. In all probability, with different costing the railway might pay. It depends on what their pre-conceived notion is.

I have done costing studies on the cost-benefit ratios connected with flood control on some of the big projects across the line. Congress used these studies to decide whether or not the projects would be undertaken. The cost-benefit ratio means a consideration of the costs that go into the project as related to the benefits that would come out of it. I have done lots of these studies and I can say to the Minister of Transport that you can make these studies biased in any way you want.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that what the hon. gentleman did?

Mr. Kindt: Never mind what the hon. gentleman did. I followed the basic pattern. I will tell you this, that when they were finished I do not care what member of parliament or what congressman looked at them, he could not understand them. I am honest about that. It is too complicated for the minister to understand or he would not laugh. It is too complicated for the average citizen to understand. Unless you are a trained accountant, unless you are schooled in costing, you would not be able to get the basis of the criticism of the figures which the commission would put forward. The minister can say that these are the best we can possibly get and that we will base our decisions upon them; but those who are familiar with the situation know full well that the results which have been produced are not worth the paper they are written on.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I say this, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness. There is a place for cost accounting. Let it not be said that I am throwing cold water on cost accountants. But the cost accounting required for the railroads is very elaborate; and even though you do the best you can it will satisfy no one—unless, perhaps, the minister.

This particular legislation permits greater freedom to the railroads to set rates, a matter which is worrying the people of western Canada. I have just come from there, and those who have not been harvesting and have been reading the newspapers realize the problem. They see that something is hidden behind the smile of the Minister of Transport. He can shake his head in denial, but we have seen that head shake before and are not fooled.

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, this legislation will permit the railroads to set rates in competitive areas. In this regard the wording of the bill is vague. I was not satisfied by the answer given me by the minister the other night on the question of coal shipments. No competition exists in rates between the Crownest pass and Port Moody. The C.P.R. charges $5.30 a ton to transport coal from the Crowsnest pass to Port Moody, from where it goes to Japan. That, incidentally, was a recommendation of mine which was followed by the government and put into effect. Initially it cost $4.50 a ton subvention to send coal to Japan. Since then, because of a change in the value of the dollar the subsidy is down to $2.73. The coal miners and operators in the Crowsnest pass want that subsidy removed, whenever economically possible. If it were removed they could step up production of coal from 800,000 tons to a couple of million tons and export it to Japan; and the Japanese would buy it.

When these coal shipments to Japan were negotiated and a subvention placed on the shipments, our original thought was that perhaps after one year, two years or even five or six years the C.P.R. would run a commuter train from the Crownest pass to Port Moody, in a similar fashion to the commuter trains in the United States, and lower their rates to almost half the present rate of $5.30 a ton. So the thought originally was that this enterprise would be able to stand on its own feet.

The proposition then was that the C.P.R. would cut $1 or perhaps $1.50 off the rate. The loading service at Port Moody would cost a little less, the shippers of the coal to Japan, whether in Japanese bottoms or somebody else's, would reduce their rates slightly; and perhaps the Japanese would pay a little more for the coal, in which event the shipments of coal to Japan, which keep hundreds of people in the Crowsnest pass employed, would be able to move forward without any government subsidy. This is what the miners and operators want, but they are now being held back owing to the failure of the C.P.R. to consider putting on a commuter train. They load a car of coal at Coleman which will then sit on a side line, to be hooked on to a train of mixed freight, at some indefinite time later, and pulled to Port Moody.

A boat at Port Moody may be waiting to load coal, but the coal shippers are required to pay a demurrage charge for the delay, which runs to about $2,000 a day. These are matters the operators are up against in shipping coal to Japan, and that is why they are asking the C.P.R.,—which above all should be willing to consider running a commuter train to reduce costs—to take some action. Instead of hooking coal shipments on to a general freight train, which takes a long time to reach the coast, they could run a commuter train which would transport this coal in a matter of one day from the Crownest pass to Port Moody, where it would be unloaded and the commuter train would then return. This would cut costs. But you cannot calculate the cost of coal shipments to Port Moody the way things are now.

Last year these rates went up 15 cents a ton. The C.P.R. solemnly promised when these coal shipments were commenced that when their volume increased—and as I say, they are now runnnig at about 800,000 tons —they would cut the rates. After all, this is good business for the C.P.R. and you would expect them to lower the rates. Instead of that they were raised 15 cents per ton. What are they going to do from now on? This is no laughing matter, Mr. Speaker. The people in the west are worried, as should be the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) and the Minister of Transport. These people are asking questions about this matter; they want to know what is going to happen, because they have commitments.

If the railroads are freed from all government regulations and supervison they are in the position of making or breaking the people in the Crowsnest pass overnight. They are in the position of making ghost towns out of the whole area. This the C.P.R. can do by raising their freight rates. Therefore you can understand why these people are worried. I was in the area last week and talked to them about this matter, and both the miners and the operators are exercised about it.

Likewise, if the freight rates on farm machinery, foodstuffs and thousands of miscellaneous items like cars, and so on, are increased, then how on earth are the farmers of western Canada to meet the cost-price squeeze? For example, no farmer is in the position of being able to say that the price of his grain will go up 18 per cent, 10 per cent, 5 per cent or 4 per cent.

I am sure the Minister of Transport knows of the reasons why this should be so. The reason is simply this. In our economy farmers, as a group, are in the most perfect competition. They are the most perfectly competitive producers in the world. One farmer does not know that he is producing against another farmer, and that the sum total of the production has anything to do with prices. In other words, the farmers are in such perfect competition with one another that they are not conscious of the fact that they are competing with one another. This is vastly different from the Gary dinners of the United States steel corporations when they get together and talk about prices. Nothing is published about that, but there is discussion.

We have in our economy, therefore, on the one hand the steel industry which gets together with its Gary dinners, to talk, and on the other hand, perfect competition. A man such as a farmer, who cannot say what the price of his product will be, is the man who is in perfect competition. He has nothing to say about the price of his product, and the only protection he has is from government regulations and from parliament. I am speaking of the Canadian farmers.

If you are going to remove every bit of regulation from the railways, in order to allow them to put the costs of production up for the farmer, where will that lead to? You will have trouble, just as surely as the Minister of Transport sits there. You will have people coming here, and I suggest that the minister will not be Minister of Transport for very long. Unless this problem is met he will not be Minister of Transport. You can see it coming over the horizon.

An hon. Member: Through the fog.

Mr. Kindt: As I mentioned before, you must have competition, and there is not sufficient competition to force the railroads to set proper rates.

Some time ago I made some studies for the establishment of a big steel corporation which would involve $100 million. I thought that the plant should be located in a certain place, and I discussed this with my principals. I went to New York, and there I completed my studies concerned with financing. I do not mind telling the minister that the reason, in the end why we could not recommend that the plant be located in a certain spot was that the people in New York would not finance the plant. They would not finance one where there was not a competitive railroad line.

You run into the situation all over western Canada of not having competing lines. Is this government going to allow railroads to raise rates indiscriminately?

Mr. Pickersgill: We are not.

Mr. Kindt: Are you going to allow them to raise rates at all? The minister could not say that last week when I asked him about coal shipments. He said that the matter would be studied in committee, and he kept repeating that it would go to the committee, and how gracious and farsighted this committee is going to be.

That is not satisfactory to the people in the west who are thinking this thing through, and who have to live with it. They want to develop their country. They do not want to put their earnings out on transportation charges.

I do not intend to talk for much longer. Already I have talked far longer than I had intended, and I would not have done so were it not for the fact that this is one of the most far-reaching pieces of legislation ever to be placed before this parliament, so far as western Canada is concerned. I know that this legislation has affected the east, as well as other places. But we in the west will be very, very careful of what goes into the legislation, and how it will be carried out.

My colleague has already talked about the Crownsnest pass agreement, and the minister has given the assurance, and it is worth repeating, that those rates with respect to grain are not to be disturbed. Now the minister says—and this is provided for in the legislation—that studies will be made by the commission to see how much money is being lost on grain.

Mr. Pickersgill: If any.

Mr. Kindt: Well, the commission is going to cost study this matter. Whose figures will it take? I am talking about costing. Whose figures are to be taken? You see, the government is going about it the wrong way. The figures you will get on costing, and then take money out of the public treasury to support, are not those which should be used in arriving at what should be paid under any Crowsnest pass agreement—because that agreement is supposed to remain the way it stands. We have talked about that for years.

The people settled in western Canada along the railroad lines because they had transportation, and because they were encouraged to do so by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the government. If you are going to increase the rates for those people who have spent their lives there building up the area, forcing them to pay additional rates—

Mr. Pickersgill: We are not.

Mr. Kindt: They will have to pay additional rates on many thimgs, which will enter into their cost of production. The rates are to be left to competition between the trucking lines, and the railroads.

Mr. Pickersgill: And air.

Mr. Kindt: There is competition from trucking, of course, but that may not provide the answer in maintaining and keeping the good will with respect to the bargain made with the farmers, when they went into the west and homesteaded that country. They are there, and they have done a good job, but they will not sit idly by and let some minister of transport permit the railways to pull up the tracks, or to set rates that will increase the cost of production which, in turn, will raise the costs to all the people of the west. If the railways do that, those people will be down here, talking to the minister.

As for the air lines, I must say that they would improve with competition. I am a great believer in competition. If even the Minister of Transport were to compete with someone, he would smarten up.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kindt: Let me talk about air lines and competition, and in particular about Air Canada, with no competition. During the strike, when Canadian Pacific Airlines was stopping at Calgary, you could board Air Canada at Calgary and go to Winnipeg, and to Toronto, at almost any time. Air Canada was putting extra flights on at Calgary. They were special flights. I came down today on a special flight. I actually came down from Calgary to Toronto. But when it came to getting from Toronto to Ottawa, I had to stand in line. Seventeen others could not get on the aircraft, because there were no seats. There was no competition from Canadian Pacific Airlines, or from any other line, on the run from Toronto to Ottawa. Where Air Canada does not have competition, it could well do with some.

• (9:50 p.m.)

We should take a hard look at this competitive aspect. I have always been a supporter of Air Canada and I still am, but the time is coming when we shall have to consider introducing a little competition. I think competition is the lifeblood of industry and I hope the Minister of Industry will agree with me. I am sure he will. Unless there is competition, no company will put its best foot forward. If there is, they will look at the pattern for which they are trying to provide a service and place their facilities at the points where they must meet competiton and where it is evident that competition is a factor. I do not know how long we can continue without admitting the necessity for competition if we are to maintain freedom of enterprise.

I had hoped the minister would permit this bill to go to committee even before second reading, so that representatives of agriculture and industry from all over Canada could make recommendations and suggestions. Once this bill has been given second reading, how many changes will the minister be willing to make? I am sure he will find all the arguments under the sun for not changing it. He will bring these people to Ottawa from western Canada, and then he will say to them: Yes, you have a good idea, but the bill has been given second reading by parliament and we cannot change it now.

Legislation of this kind will not go down at all. I hope when the bill does go to committee, people from all parts of Canada who are affected by it will be in a position to make suggestions for changes and that those suggestions, if they are good ones, will be incorporated in the legislation when it is finally passed.

It may be that the whole process should be started again, from the beginning. The minister has had certain ideas about railroad abandonment, and so on, which are expressed in this bill. I am not too sure he is on the right track. We will have to consider that aspect. I feel strongly that the arrangements proposed are not likely to be in the public interest or, indeed, in the interest of anybody. They will satisfy no one. I feel, therefore, we are bound to take a hard look at it before this legislation is enacted into law.

Mr. Pickersgill: It appears there are a number of other hon. members who wish to speak. I wonder, therefore, if I might make the usual motion in order to give hon. members additional time in which to express their views on this bill.

Mr. Churchill: You would not give a supper adjournment hour so do not try to squeeze us now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I could, of course make the usual motion and let ten hon. members stand up, but I do not wish to embarrass hon. members opposite.

Mr. Grafftey: We do not embarrass easily.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) in the most co-operative way suggested we should get over this general debate and let the measure go before a committee, where all these questions could be answered. I hope this is still the spirit of the party opposite and that nothing has happened to change it.

Mr. Churchill: Instant legislation.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I have a few brief remarks I should like to make on the second reading of this bill. They have to do with the terms upon which railways are abandoned, what should happen to the right-of-way, and how these abandonments ought to be dealt with when they take place.

I had a bill on the order paper in 1962, and again in 1963, dealing with this subject. I hope that now, when the Railway Act is to be overhauled, the government will see fit to incorporate in its legislation a provision to cover the problem to which I intend to refer. The idea is to provide the Board of Transport Commissioners with both the authority and the responsibility to specify the conditions upon which any railway line may be abandoned, and my remarks spring from an experience in my own constituency as well as from experiences of this kind in several adjoining constituencies in recent years.

The MacPherson commission has forecast the abandonment of 8,000 miles of uneconomic railway branch lines in Canada. Lack of patronage indicates that these lines are no longer required. These branch lines served a pressing need in the days of horse-drawn vehicles 50 years ago, but they cannot possibly compete with the modern motor transport for either short haul passenger service or freight service. On the grounds of economy they should be abandoned, but the government through the Board of Transport Commissioners should accept responsibility for the manner in which abandonment takes place.

Many interests are involved. There is displacement of labour; new jobs must be found; business is disrupted; rail-tied investments are sometimes jeopardized; agricultural delivery points are eliminated, and there are problems connected with the rehabilitation of the abandoned right of way.

It is this aspect of the problem which concerns me this evening. Abandonment can be carried out as an orderly transition if it is done in an orderly manner. If left unplanned and uncontrolled, however, it can become a very disagreeable experience for many of the people involved.

As a good instance of unplanned and uncontrolled abandonment, I would draw attention to the developments following the abandonment, in 1960, of the Courtright branch of the New York Central railway, which extends from St. Thomas westwards through the counties of Lambton, Middlesex and Elgin. Train service had almost disappeared from the line. Business disruption was slight, but the abandonment of the right of way created serious and very irritating problems. The rails and ties and any useful culverts remaining were torn out, leaving an unsightly mess. The fences, which had been neglected for some years pending abandonment, were left in deplorable condition. I suppose one cannot blame a railway company for not keeping up a line which it intends to abandon.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman seems to have a very short speech and I wonder whether we should not try to get it all in one issue of Hansard?

Mr. Thomas: If there were unanimous consent I would be prepared to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is consent on this side of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Mr. Churchill: Ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: Not so.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 7, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REMOVAL OF MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

On the order: Government notice of motion:

That a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament be appointed to inquire into and report on the expediency of presenting an address to His Excellency praying for the removal of Mr. Justice Leo Landreville from the Supreme Court of Ontario, in view of the facts, considerations and conclusions contained in the report of the Honourable Ivan C. Rand concerning the said Mr. Justice Leo Landreville, dated the 11th day of August, 1966 and tabled in the House of Commons on the 29th day of August, 1966;

That 12 members of the House of Commons, to be designated later, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records and to engage counsel; to sit while the house is sitting and to report from time to time;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for its use and for the use of parliament; and that standing order 66 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. Cardin: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 21(2), this notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day or at the next sitting of the house.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

N.C.C. ACTIVITIES IN GATINEAU CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,335—Mr. Isabelle:

1. Since 1956, was any money spent by the Federal District Commission and the National Capital Commission in the constituency of Gatineau (a) for the expropriation of lands and buildings (b) for projects on these lands, such as buildings, roads, parks or lakes and, if so, how much?

2. Since 1946, has any land been expropriated and have any houses under construction been demolished by the National Capital Commission in the constituency of Gatineau and, if so, how many pieces of land and how many houses remain unused?

3. Does the National Capital Commission employ any persons in the constituency of Gatineau and, if so (a) how many (b) how many live in the constituency?

4. Does the National Capital Commission have any immediate projects planned in the constituency of Gatineau with regard to roads, parks, lakes, or buildings and, if so (a) what are these plans (b) where will these projects be carried out?

Answer: 1. Since 1956, money was spent by the Federal District Commission and the National Capital Commission in the constituency of Gatineau (a) for the expropriation of lands and buildings, yes. (b) for projects on these lands such as buildings, roads, parks, or lakes, yes, $6,102,776.

2. Yes. Since 1946 the National Capital Commission has expropriated lands in the constituency of Gatineau. Two houses, considered to be under construction, have been demolished. Approximately 100 parcels of land are vacant, pending its planned use and five houses considered suitable for rental purposes are available on a lease basis.

3. Yes. (a) The commission has 21 full time employees and 58 seasonal employees working in the constituency of Gatineau. In addition, approximately 10 employees may work occasionally in the constituency of Gatineau. (b) 20 full time employees live in the constituency; approximately 50 seasonal employees live in the constituency. The 10 occasional employees live outside the constituency.

4. Yes. (a) (i) The National Capital Commission and the government of the province of Quebec are negotiating an exchange of lands within the boundaries of Gatineau park in order to provide land needed for the construction of a student city and route No. 11. (ii) The commission will construct a structure to carry the Philemon Wright parkway over new route No. 11. (iii) Improvements are planned in Gatineau park to extend picnic and camping facilities. This will include the construction of a new service building with change rooms, toilets and a first aid room; the resurfacing and enlarging of parking areas; the clearing and marking of Gatineau park boundaries; and the construction of an addition to the maintenance building.

(b) (i) Land for student city is located partly in the municipality of Lucerne and partly in the municipality of Hull West. Route No. 11 will use land located in the city of Hull. (ii) The Philemon Wright overpass will be located in the municipality of Hull West. (iii) The addition to the maintenance building will be erected at Old Chelsea in the municipality of Hull West. The construction of the picnic, camping and parking areas and the service building will take place at Lac Philippe in the municipalities of Masham and Eardley. Clearing and marking of Gatineau park boundaries will take place in the municipality of Masham.

AGRICULTURAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF N.C.C.

Question No. 1,401—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the national capital commission established an agricultural advisory committee?

2. If so (a) when (b) what are its terms of reference (c) who are its members and what is the occupation or ordinary position of each (d) how many meetings has the committee held?

Answer: 1. Yes.

2. (a) A decision to form the committee was taken on the 25th February 1966, and the first meeting was held on the 30th March 1966, and reconvened on the 1st April 1966. (b) The terms of reference of the agricultural advisory committee are as follows: Committee formation: The committee shall be called the agricultural advisory committee to the property division of the National Capital Commission. Basis: The committee is formed as set out in a letter to Mr. S.C. Barry, deputy minister of agriculture, from Lt. Gen. S.F. Clark, chairman of the National Capital Commission, dated 25 February 1966. Purpose: The purpose of the committee is to afford the property division of the National Capital Commission professional and technical aid and advice with respect to matters of terms of development of the agricultural and forestry portions of the lands owned by the commission. Meetings: Meetings shall be at the call of the chairman of the committee, depending on the references which are made to him by the property division requesting advice on management and development of agricultural and forestry lands. Secretary: A secretary shall be provided by the property division of the commission. Scope: The agricultural advisory committee shall consider, investigate and report on matters relating to the use and development of land for agricultural and forestry purposes in which the commission may be interested, as requested by the property division. Such matters will include: (i) The rental, maintenance and rehabilitation of agricultural properties of the commission. (ii) Use of agricultural lands with specific reference to land capabilities and classification. (iii) The maintenance of lands, fences, buildings and drains. (iv) Matters of good farming practices, leasing methods and terms. (v) Economic feasibility of agricultural projects and practices.

The agricultural advisory committee shall not consider or investigate any matter contemplated by paragraphs (a) to (e) of part I of subsection 5 of By-law No. III (4) respecting the land committee of the National Capital Commission.

(c) The members and their occupation are as follows: Doctor Grant Carman, Director of Information, Information Division, Canada Department of Agriculture, Confederation Building. Doctor Peter C. Stobbe, Director of Soil Research Institute of Canada, Department of Agriculture, Central Experimental Farm. Mr. R.C. Hodges, Regional Director Ontario, Agricultural Rehabilitation & Development Section, Canada Department of Forestry.

(d) Three meetings have been held to date.

SALES TAX ON RETREAD TIRES

Question No. 1,786—Mr. Scott (Victoria (Ont.)):

Will the government consider removing the 11 per cent federal sales tax from (a) tread rubber used in retreading tires, or (b) the retail sale of retread tires?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): (a) Upon enactment of amendments to the Excise Tax Act recently passed by the House of Commons all retreaders of tires will be licensed as manufacturers and will be allowed to purchase materials, such as tread rubber, to be incorporated into retreaded tires free of the 11 per cent sales tax. (b) This is a matter of government policy. If any amendments are to be proposed to the Excise Tax Act concerning sales tax on retreaded tires they will be announced at the appropriate time.

ALEX PRATT—EMPLOYMENT BY C.B.C.

Question No. 1,792—Mr. Ormiston:

Has Mr. Alex Pratt ever been employed by the C.B.C. and if so (a) in what capacity was he employed (b) what was the period of his employment (c) what were the terms of his contract(s) (d) for what reason was his contract terminated (e) was a C.B.C. administrator responsible for the decision not to renew his contract and, if so, what is this person's name?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. that Mr. Alex Pratt was employed by the corporation. (a) and (b) Co-ordinating producer from May 13, 1957 to May 31, 1959; production assistant from June 1, 1959 to November 30, 1960; t.v. producer from December 1, 1960 to November 6, 1964. (c) The terms were those of the standard C.B.C. contract for t.v. producers. (d) and (e) It has not been customary to require crown corporations to disclose information of this kind and the C.B.C. believes that deviation from this policy could only prove detrimental to the corporation and its employees.

NCO'S AND ENLISTED MEN IN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,802—Mr. Enns:

1. How many NCO's and enlisted men are there in each of the three armed services?

2. How many of these are engineers possessing university degrees?

3. How many NCO's and enlisted men in each of the three armed services have (a) applied for release since February 1, 1966 (b) have been retired, having reached the compulsory retirement age (c) have been recruited since February 1, 1966?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. 30 June 1966

LENGTH OF SERVICE OF RETIRED OFFICERS

Question No. 1,817—Mr. Lambert:

1. What is the total length of service in Canada's armed forces respectively of the following officers whose retirement is announced as effective July 16, 1966; Vice Admiral K. L. Dyer; Lt. General R. W. Moncel; Lt. General F. J. Fleury?

2. When was each (a) promoted to his present rank (b) appointed to his present position?

3 Were such retirements effective on reaching normal retirement age, or on voluntary request or for any other reason?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. and 2. Vice Admiral Dyer has had continuous service with the Royal Canadian Navy from September 1, 1933, totalling 32 years and 317 days. He was promoted to his present rank on August 1, 1964, and was appointed chief of personnel the same date.

Lt. Gen. Moncel has had service in the Canadian army (active) and Canadian army (regular) totalling 25 years and 278 days, together with service in the Canadian army (reserves) totalling 3 years and 344 days. He was promoted to his present rank on August 1, 1964, and was appointed vice chief of the defence staff on September 2, 1965.

Lt. Gen. Fleury has had service in the Canadian army (active) and Canadian army (regular) totalling 25 years and 328 days, together with service in the Canadian army (reserves) totalling 8 years and 347 days. He was promoted to his present rank on September 2, 1965, and was appointed comptroller general the same date.

3. As stated in the House of Commons on 7 July, 1966, these retirements were by mutual understanding.

From 560.0 feet north of North Sydney town line to Purves street—grading and structure.

ROUNDEL INSIGNIA, R.C.A.F.

Question No. 1,833—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What roundel insignia was used to designate aircraft of R.C.A.F. squadrons during World War II?

2. Has a decision been reached to change this roundel insignia and, if so (a) by whom was it made (b) for what reason has it been decided to depart from this tradition identified with the heroic efforts of Canadian flyers during two world wars?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. In 1924 when the R.C.A.F. was formed the standard red, white and blue roundel insignia of the R.A.F. was used on R.C.A.F. aircraft and continued to be used until world war II.

2. During world war II the R.C.A.F. had various versions of the roundel painted on its aircraft. From 1940 to 1942 the design was revised by the addition of a yellow ring around the red ring to make the roundel more readily visible against the camouflage paint of fighter aircraft. On bomber aircraft, such as the Lancasters and Halifaxes, the customary white circle was deleted because it was easily seen in the glare of enemy searchlights and the roundel was only a red circle surrounded by a blue ring. Later in the Far East and in the Aleutians the roundel on R.C.A.F. aircraft consisted of a blue circle surrounded by a white ring.

(a) In 1946 the air council, presided over by the Minister of National Defence for Air, approved that the red circle in the roundel insignia be replaced by a red maple leaf and this was effected later that year. By virtue of the Aeronautics Act, the Minister of National Defence, subject to the governor general in council, is authorized to make provision for the proper identification of military aircraft. Within these terms of reference it became policy for the maple leaf in the roundel insignia to be identical in pattern to the maple leaf in the armorial bearings of Canada depicted on the Canadian flag which also is displayed on R.C.A.F. aircraft. Following the adoption of the new Canadian flag the design of the maple leaf in the roundel markings was altered to conform to that in the flag.

(b) Recently air transport command, with the approval of the chief of defence staff, has been experimenting with a roundel consisting of a red ring around a red maple leaf on a white field and a few aircraft carry this marking. No decision, however, has been reached with respect to a change in the official roundel insignia.

RETIREMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS

Question No. 1,836—Mr. Fulton:

1. What were the ranks of the officers who respectively occupied the positions of vice chief of the defence staff, chief of personnel, and comptroller general on June 1, 1966?

2. Have these officers retired from the Canadian armed forces since that time?

3. What were their respective ages at the date of retirement?

4. What is the retirement age specified for officers of these respective ranks?

5. To what annual pension will these officers be entitled respectively following their retirement?

6. With reference to the statement by the Minister of National Defence (Hansard, page 7306) that there was "mutual understanding" with respect to these retirements, did the discussions preceding these "mutual understandings" include reference to the part these officers were expected to play in their respective positions or other positions they might occupy in the forces with relation to the program of integration and with respect to their relationship to the minister, and were these roles or those alternative positions and those relationships acceptable to the officers in question?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) Lieutenant general, (b) Vice admiral, (c) Lieutenant general.

2. Yes.

3. (a) 49 years, (b) 51 years, (c) 52 years.

4. 55 years.

5. Approximately (a) $11,680 (b) $15,496 (c) $11,699.

6. It is not departmental policy to make public discussions held by the minister with members of the Canadian armed forces.

DIRECT BANANA SHIPMENTS FROM CARIBBEAN

Question No. 1,842—Mr. McCleave:

1. Are any restrictions, governmental or otherwise, imposed upon the direct shipment by sea to Canada of Caribbean-produced bananas from any source, which have been the subject of complaint by any department?

2. If so, what has been the nature of the complaint, to whom was such directed, and with what result?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture, External Affairs, Finance, National Revenue and Trade and Commerce as follows:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

*FLOUR EXPORTS TO RUSSIA, CHINA, CUBA

Question No. 1,852—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Has flour been exported from Canada to (a) Russia (b) China (c) Cuba, since the first day of January, 1966, by (i) The Quaker Oats Company (ii) Robin Hood Flour Mills (iii) Pillsbury Flour Mills?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Both the minister and his parliamentary secretary being absent on official duty I was asked to answer this question in their place.

In reply to the right hon. member's question concerning flour exported from Canada to Russia, China and Cuba since January 1, 1966, by The Quaker Oats Company, Robin Hood Flour Mills and Pillsbury Flour Mills, I am advised by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that information about individual companies cannot be released in view of the secrecy provisions of the Statistics Act.

However, I can inform the right hon. member that in the six month period January 1 to June 30, 1966, exports of flour to Russia amounted to 234,583 hundredweight (value $1,052,000) and to Cuba 2,756,312 hundredweight (value $14,676,000). No flour was exported to China during this period.

*PENSIONS OF RETIRED ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 1863—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has any action been taken by the government to promulgate regulations as authorized by the Statute Law (Superannuation) Amendment Act 1966, relating to the pensions of retired armed forces personnel subsequently employed in the public service?

2. If not, when is it anticipated such action will be taken?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is yes, the regulations to which the hon. member refers were made by order in council P.C. 1966-1586 dated August 24, 1966 and were effective the 1st day of September, 1966. The regulations will be published in part II of the Canada Gazette, on September 14, 1966.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 1,879—Mr. Coates:

1. Has the government secured a site for the new federal building at Amherst, Nova Scotia?

2. Has an architect been appointed to produce the plans and, if so, on what date?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes.

2. An architect was appointed on December 13, 1965 to produce the plans.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BUTTER IMPORTS

Question No. 1,660—Mr. Laprise:

1. Has Canada imported any butter since 1960 and, if so (a) how many pounds each year (b) what quantity from each country each year (c) what was the average price each year (d) was any of this butter intended for domestic consumption and, if so, how much each year?

2. If any of this butter was intended for processing for re-export (a) how much each year (b) what factories processed it (c) how much did each factory process each year (d) how much did this processing cost the government each year (e) in what form, to what countries and at what price was this butter sold each year?

3. In 1966 and subsequent years, does the government intend to import butter and, if so, how does the government intend to dispose of it?

Return tabled.

EMPLOYEES IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 1,750—Mr. Irvine:

What was the total number of employees in each department and/or agency, as listed in schedules A, B, C and D of the Financial Administration Act R.S.C. 1952 chapter 116 as amended, on March 31 of each of the years 1950 to 1966, inclusive?

Return tabled.

DAMAGE CLAIMS, TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, N.B.

Question No. 1,800—Mr. Flemming:

1 Regarding the answer to question No. 1649, have any claims been presented which contained expenses of moving buildings in the area mentioned in the question named above, which called for 90 per cent contribution by the federal government?

2. If so, have they been paid either in full or partially?

3. What are the names of the parties on whose behalf claims were made and the amounts claimed for each of them?

4. Have any claims for moving buildings been disallowed or are any presently unpaid?

5. If so, what are the names of the parties on whose behalf claims have been made?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

UNIFICATION OF ARMED FORCES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house in accordance with standing order No. 26 in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, that the Minister of National Defence is pursuing an improper course without statutory or parliamentary authority in dictatorially proceeding with and, as he himself stated, in accelerating the unification of the armed forces despite strong objections; that there is grave danger that his illegal actions will be irrevocably completed before parliament under its ordinary rules has the opportunity to debate the matter and before fulfillment of the minister's assurances that ample opportunity would be afforded service personnel to air their objections; that he interfered with the deliberations of the defence committee by tampering with the evidence which Admiral Landymore intended to present to the committee, thus being in contempt of parliament; and that by all these actions he has created a further serious decline in service morale and a state of widespread concern about Canada's ability to maintain an effective defence force.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member for Halifax address the Chair on the question of urgency of debate?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, to bring the matter before the house properly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), that the house now stand adjourned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Forrestall: I suggest to the Minister of Transport this is not very funny. I am trying to do something properly and I do not want to be shot down improperly.

The urgency of this matter, Mr. Speaker, may be summed up briefly in this way.

Unless the minister or the house refers to the defence committee at this time the question of unification as set forth in the motion, total unification of our Canadian forces will be irrevocable before the members of the house will have had an opportunity to discuss or review the matter in any way, or to record their views. Yesterday in response to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre the minister stated, as recorded in Hansard at page 8053:

> No, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it would be desirable or in the public interest to do that at the present time.

The minister was talking about referring this matter to the defence committee. By this action and by that statement he had denied the members of this house an opportunity to place on record their pertinent and useful views. It has been clearly stated that the minister is not prepared now, and will not be until some vague time in the future, to let this matter go before the defence committee, thus depriving members of the house an opportunity to discuss the matter.

All the main requirements under rule 26 concerning the urgency of debate have been met. The importance of the matter is demonstrated also in the public concern that has been voiced not only by members of parliament but by thousands and thousands of Canadian servicemen as well as by senior, high ranking military officers who have found it necessary to make public statements. They are concerned about our ability to mobilize in the event of a national emergency. I suggest this is an important matter.

I should like to mention one further point, Mr. Speaker. The Department of National Defence accounts for nearly one quarter of our total annual budget. If this policy were forced through without full knowledge of all the facts it would be a disservice to this house. I suggest that on these grounds there is urgency of debate at this time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I should like to speak to the question of urgency of debate, Mr. Speaker. Before doing so, however, I should like to suggest to the hon. member that if he is serious in his suggestion that I have acted illegally he should have the courage of his convictions and lay a charge—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Hellyer: —rather than slip a phrase into a motion of this kind and attempt to take advantage of whatever publicity may accrue to him by casting reflections upon me in a way which is not in accordance with the facts, and which I defy him to substantiate. He is a very junior member of this house, and for that one must make some allowances.

Mr. Starr: Talk about arrogance.

Mr. Hellyer: At the same time there are certain rules that apply to all hon. members—

Mr. Grafftey: And he wants to be Prime Minister some day.

Mr. Hellyer: —and I would suggest that he learn to abide by those rules.

With regard to the question of urgency of debate, Mr. Speaker, the subject referred to here is no more urgent today than it was yesterday or a week ago or a month ago. As a matter of fact the urgency of debate on this subject arose in 1964 when the white paper on defence was presented to the house and to the Canadian people. It was stated quite clearly in the white paper on defence what was the policy of the government—

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: It was not stated clearly.

Mr. Hellyer: —that it was to integrate the armed forces of Canada as a first step toward a single unified armed force.

This question was considered at length at the time by the special committee on defence. That committee reported to the House of Commons. Its report was adopted by the House of Commons, and this became the policy of the government and the policy of the land. So far as integration is concerned, it has proceeded through its various stages from that time to this and it is now virtually complete; it is a fait accompli.

So far as urgency is concerned, there is nothing urgent about considering at this time the integration of the armed forces. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the opportunity was made available to discuss this matter earlier in this session before the committee on defence. Witnesses were available from the various commands to give evidence with respect to the integration process and how effective were the commands; and full opportunity was given to members of parliament to raise questions and to learn about this policy.

So far as unification is concerned, if this is the object of the debate, it is not the custom in this house to refer matters to a committee before the legislation in respect thereto is introduced. The government stated in the Speech from the Throne its intention to introduce amendments to the National Defence Act. My hon. friend did not at that time take the opportunity afforded by that debate to state his views with respect to this very important matter, when a number of days were available for discussion on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Again when the budget was under consideration full opportunity was afforded all members of parliament in a general debate of that nature to state their views with respect to this matter if they wished to do so.

Mr. Churchill: That is not right; it is a restricted debate.

Mr. Hellyer: Other ample opportunity has been given from time to time to express viewpoints with respect to the policy which is laid down in the white paper. So far as integration is concerned, it is well advanced. So far as unification is concerned, it cannot be accomplished until there is a further amendment to the National Defence Act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is not what you said before.

Mr. Hellyer: That has been forecast and will be introduced in parliament later this session in the normal manner. It will be debated at that time, and full opportunity will be provided members on all sides of the house to stand up and state their views, and then to stand up and be counted with respect to the proposals which will be laid before the house. This legislation will afford full opportunity, first of all for general debate and then for specific consideration of all of the various aspects in the standing committee once the legislation has been referred to that committee for consideration.

Mr. Churchill: When will that be; December?

Mr. Hellyer: In view of that fact, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest to Your Honour that there is no urgency whatever with respect to having a general debate at the present time on this subject, but that the proper time will be when the legislation is presented to the house when it can be given full and adequate consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I address myself to the question of urgency, but in doing so I cannot deny myself the luxury of referring to that cynical attitude displayed by the minister toward the hon. member who moved a perfectly responsible motion for adjournment. He referred somewhat sarcastically to the youth and inexperience of the hon. member. I would refer the minister, when he speaks of self advertisement, to that article which appeared in the rotogravure section of the Toronto Globe and Mail, which set out in detail this new defence policy. It referred to the hon. gentleman and Mr. Lee as "those clean cut kids".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is urgency—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is sheer envy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken can speak with authority on that subject. He is soon to be elevated to another place where age does not count.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is also envy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I refer to the question of urgency. The hon. gentleman spoke of the opportunities that were available. There was a white paper in 1964. I defy the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member to show in that white paper any anticipation of the kind of dabbling policy that has become so apparent during the past few weeks.

Sir, yesterday we endeavoured to get some information from the hon. gentleman with respect to national defence. At page 8053 of Hansard he showed his attitude:

I do not think it would be desirable or in the public interest to do that at the present time.

Why? Simply because ever since the adjournment the minister has been going faster and faster along the road of unification, without regard to parliamentary legislative authority. The minister says it is not urgent. Yesterday the minister refused parliament an opportunity to look into this matter.

I say, sir, in sections 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the National Defence Act there is no authority whatsoever for the kind of conduct that has continued with accelerated force since the house adjourned early in July. What will the position be if we do not act now, if we wait until the minister completes his unification program? How can it be unscrambled? He has proceeded with this matter in a way that is a denial of parliamentary rights. Undertakings were given that changes made would not be of any serious nature. Indeed, when Admiral O'Brien took over on July 20, in a press conference he said:

I did not accept this appointment lightly. Before I did so I met for a considerable time with the minister, chief of defence staff, and defence staff. As a result I have been assured that there is no intention of making changes in the identity of the forces—

That is one of the points raised:

—the uniform or the conditions of service before legislation governing the unification has been passed by parliament.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Continuing:

Furthermore, each one in the forces will be advised well in advance of the implementation of such legislation and how it will affect him.

Then he says:

He will be afforded—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to intervene without cause at this time, but I should like to remind the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and hon. members that the question before the house now is the urgency of debate, not the subject matter raised in the motion by the hon. member for Halifax. It seems to me it would be difficult to distinguish between the speech the right hon. member is making and the speech he might make if the motion were allowed.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I assure you, sir, that if there is debate on the subject and I have an opportunity to express myself regarding this contemptuous action on the part of the government, the house will find no difficulty in making a distinction.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Yesterday we were told that the minister intends, regardless of parliament and regardless of undertakings which have been given in the past, to proceed with this policy. He intends to do this irrespective of the attitude of parliament. Indeed on July 24, in the course of a national television program with Mr. Lynch, he stated his intention to accelerate the unification program, as well as his belief that further enabling legislation was necessary only in respect to a change of name for the armed forces. In other words he said on July 24 that he intended to accelerate the unification program, for which he has no authority and for which parliament has given him no authority.

This is why, when questions were asked yesterday, we found ourselves met by an attitude of mind which disregards every principle of parliamentary control. He intends to go ahead. In effect he told Charles Lynch in "The Nation's Business" on July 24 that there was no one to stop him. Well, we heard that some years ago from another minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: You made it up in both cases.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman was a colleague of his and they both went down to defeat when the first opportunity given to the Canadian people made it possible. That is an attitude which I thought was cured in 1956 and 1957. Yet the minister says, now, "I do not care about parliament; I intend to go ahead".

Mr. Pickersgill: The exact opposite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is this noise which comes from the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order. That is the noise. My point of order is the same as the one I made the other day. There is a rule in this house which applies to all hon. members and even to the arrogant and insufferable Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Standing order 26 provides that one may argue the question of urgency of debate of a topic, but one must not smuggle into that argument a debate on the topic itself. Most hon. members respect that rule, but I have not heard the right hon. gentleman respect it yet and I think the time has come to enforce the rule.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman intends to take over your place, Mr. Speaker. He must recently have been in communication with a former prime minister extramurally, because those words are practically what Mr. King said on one occasion regarding another leader of the opposition, which indicates that the hon. gentleman has not learned anything with the years.

Mr. Pickersgill: That gentleman was humble compared with the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It indicates that the hon. gentleman does not regard parliament as being of any importance, and I had always thought he did.

Parliament has had no say on this issue. Parliament will have its say only after the minister of defence has done all his work. He admitted on July 24 that he intended to go ahead with the unification policy because he had the authority to do so; all that required legislative enactment was the change of name. Yesterday, he gave his answer. That answer was, "I will act as I please."

Mr. Pickersgill: He said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: His answer was "I, along with Mr. Lee, the two clean-cut kids, will determine Canada's policy on defence; after we have done it and made it impossible for any legislation to remedy what we have done, then we shall give parliament a chance."

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On the question of urgency, I would simply say that since we have now had the speeches we might as well have the debate too.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to address a few words to Your Honour on the question of the urgency of debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chatterton: In exactly the same manner as the Leader of the Opposition has done.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Chatterton: I too wish to demonstrate the urgency of debate on this important subject of unification. The Minister of National Defence very cleverly tries to confuse integration with unification. The fact is that there was no exodus of our most valuable people from the armed forces until he began this process of unification. I have first hand information that all the senior staff tried to help him with his policy of integration. It was when he started implementing unification that the trouble began.

I maintain that the minister has laid all the groundwork for effective unification without approval or consent from parliament and without making any statement in parliament in explanation of his policy. I maintain he should have taken no action with regard to unification before a bill had been approved by parliament giving him the necessary authority. The minister is now carrying on a process of education among the junior ranks of the armed forces for the promotion of unification.

An hon. Member: Brainwashing.

Mr. Chatterton: I heard someone say "brainwashing". Perhaps that is a better word. I contend that before the hon. gentleman does greater harm to the armed forces of Canada than he has already done with his unification policy, it is essential, as a matter of urgency, that parliament should have the opportunity to discuss this subject today. We intend to get a clear statement from the minister as to precisely what he proposes when he speaks of unification.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, just a few words to point out to the house that when we were called last week it was to examine Bills Nos. C-230 and C-231.

At that time there was no question of unification of the three services and neither was it understood that we would examine this matter of unification of the armed forces of Canada. Normally, we should have come back here for the session on October 5 only.

The Conservatives would have had no opportunity to introduce their motion of urgency at this time, if we had only convened on October 5.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances we should limit ourselves to the discussion of the bills for which we were called in emergency session. And, if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his colleagues hold the matter of the unification of the armed forces so much at heart, they will be free to discuss it after October 5, and this will not impede the operations of our three services, and will not remove any soldier from our Canadian forces at the present time.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe the urgency the Conservatives wish to bring forward at present simply amounts to a political football so as to play partisan politics in parliament.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the statements made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, who fails to recognize that the Minister of Finance has indicated he wants to talk about something else besides railways sometimes later this week or next week—he has not indicated when—I would like to draw Your Honour's attention to some of the factors I think you will be considering as to whether there is or has been an opportunity to discuss the matters raised by this particular motion.

First of all, there are no items on the order paper concerning unification. There are no committee reports for consideration. There has not been a committee report for consideration. There are no estimates to be called. There are none of these things. There is no supply motion. There is no general debate, and the general debate referred to by the minister is almost a laughable reference, a mere scribble in the Speech from the Throne saying that there will be amendments to the National Defence Act. I think the minister is trying to strain credibility when he wants us to believe that this would point directly to unification.

But the point is that since the last meetings of the defence committee on June 23 and June 29, when a no comment report was tabled in the house, there have been very important events. As a matter of fact the minister has changed his mind, because he assured the committee that no decision had yet been taken on unification. However, now we know for a fact that he did tell senior officers that certain steps were going to be taken.

Why were so many senior officers forced to resign? Were they all wrong and the minister the only one who was right? These are things the house has a right to know; because it is also a fact that many times the minister has indicated that by October 1 he intends to implement possibly a change in pay rates, a common rank structure, a concentrated trade classification structure; and if this is done the house will be presented with a fait accompli when we meet on October 5.

I contend, as is suggested in the motion, that under the provisions of the National Defence Act the minister does not have the power to do these things. In fact he is forbidden to do them. This is what the house wants to know.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we have dealt with the major emergency of last week. We are now considering a long term bill and, because we do not know when the house will adjourn again, I suggest this matter must be discussed now. Respectfully I suggest to Your Honour that you accept the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if hon. members feel there is any case to be made in favour of pursuing the argument at this time. If there is I shall hear other hon. members who may have arguments to contribute in addition to those that have already been submitted for consideration by the Chair.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have such an argument. Admiral Landymore was dismissed by the minister after giving evidence before a parliamentary committee. I think that is a gross abuse of the privileges of the house, and I think that is a very impelling reason for debate on the whole matter at this stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I grant the hon. member who moved that motion that this is an important matter. But as the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) pointed out so well earlier, it is not urgent in view of the circumstances under which we have been meeting for a week. What is important for the Canadian people, and the railway workers in particular, is that the government agreed to submit two bills last week and we are now at the stage preceding second reading of the second bill. That is what matters and that is why we were called back. There has been for a few days a lot of talk about a new recess this week to allow us to go back to our respective ridings where our constituents are waiting for us to deal with problems as important and even urgent. If I may be allowed a suggestion, it would be a good thing if the house adjourned on Friday and came back on October 5.

But coming back to that highly important matter, and even if General Allard bears a very dynamic and sympathetic name, I would like it if, when orders of the day are called, the minister would indicate clearly if an army man at the head of our forces has the right here to make political statements. It seems that those who bear the name of Allard often speak too long and to often.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, a while ago, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) said that this house has already had the opportunity of discussing the subject mentioned in the motion made by the Conservative party. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that since we have had the opportunity to discuss the unification of the armed forces there have been new developments, new facts which not only add a significant factor to the situation in the present circumstances, but also an element of urgency.

Among those facts there are the statement of the admiral, the statement of the minister and especially another fact directly related to unification, that is the notice posted at the base in Bagotville to the effect that French Canadian service men should speak English when on duty.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is one of the effects of unification, I think it is important and even urgent to discuss that matter today.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I believe this whole matter of urgency revolves around the statement which the minister made on national television to Mr. Charles Lynch, and if he meant what he said then it is a matter of urgency. He said at that time that unification was to be accelerated, and that the only matter for which he needed the consent of the house was the change of name. If that is the case, if that is what he meant—and I take it he meant just that—then obviously this is a matter of great urgency to be debated at this moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. members who took part in the discussion on the motion made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). I want to assure them that I took into due consideration the arguments they submitted to enlighten me before making such a difficult decision.

[English]

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) has asked leave to move the adjournment of the house in accordance with standing order 26 in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. We have had argument as to whether there is sufficient urgency of debate at this time to adjourn the ordinary business of the house. As hon. members know, the day to day order of business in the house is the responsibility of the government, and it is only when the conditions prescribed by the rules and the practice of the house are strictly met that we can adjourn this business and go on with the consideration of unannounced business.

Hon. members know as well as I do what are the relevant citations. They have been quoted on a number of occasions in the past. There is citation 100 in Beauchesne's fourth edition which prescribes:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

It is not easy to decide whether, in relating a particular item which is on the order paper to another item proposed by an individual member of the house, which one should be given precedence and whether there is such urgency to debate the new subject matter that the ordinary affairs of the house should be set aside. On balance I would doubt that the matter raised by the hon. member does meet the requirements of the citations and the precedents of the house.

I would also refer hon. members to citation 100(8) in Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads in part:

> "I do not think that, under the standing order of 1882—

—which is a similar standing order to the one we are considering now—

> —a motion on a subject of this kind, having such a very wide scope, was ever contemplated. What I think was contemplated was an occurrence of some sudden emergency—"

This is the second requirement. It should be a matter of sudden emergency, something completely new.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I realize that the subject matter of the motion is extremely important, and that has been recognized by the minister and other hon. members who have made comments for the guidance of the Chair. There is no question whatsoever that it is an urgent matter in itself, but the question I have to decide now relates to the urgency of debate, and whether it relates to such a sudden occurrence that the adjournment of the house should be allowed.

If I may judge on the basis of questions that have been asked from time to time in the house, editorial comments and news reports, of which I assume the Chair is allowed to take judicial notice, this is a matter of long standing, not a sudden occurrence. It is therefor my duty at this time to reject the motion of the hon. member for Halifax.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions Nos. 157 and 158 are acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 161? I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING ARDA REGIONAL OFFICES

Motion No. 157—Mr. Coates:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the press release issued by the Minister of Forestry in January, 1966, in which the four areas selected as regional offices for ARDA operations across Canada were named.

Motion agreed to.

MOVE OF ATLANTIC REGION ARDA OFFICE

Motion No. 158—Mr. Coates:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of any communications exchanged between the government of Canada and individuals, corporations or commissions, dealing with the proposed move of the regional headquarters of ARDA for the Atlantic provinces from Amherst, Nova Scotia, to Moncton, New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to.

VIEWS OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL RESPECTING UNIFICATION

Motion No. 161—Mr. Forrestall:

That an order of the house do issue for copies of all communications between the Minister of National Defence and serving members of the armed forces with respect to their personal views on unification of the three services.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): In respect of this motion, Mr. Speaker, there are no formal documents, and any communications that might exist would be privileged. I therefore have to decline the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion dropped?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Churchill: You can't just decline it.

Mr. Forrestall: I must beg your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, as I am not sure what I am required to do at this time, but I am not prepared to drop the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will be transferred for debate pursuant to standing order 47.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, am I not right in understanding that before this motion can be transferred the minister must so move? I did not understand the minister to move that it be transferred for debate. I understood the minister to say merely that he declined to accept it, and it is my understanding that in such case the matter must be decided immediately by a vote.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would be right if a motion had been made, but no motion was made. The minister made a statement before a motion was made and it has been the practice, at least in the last few months, that at the request of the government or the minister such a motion before the house is transferred for debate pursuant to standing order 47.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the motion being put if that is the wish of my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: Just to keep the record straight, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that the hon. member for Halifax is at a rather oblique angle to you. I assure you that he did rise to move his motion when it was called. It was in response to that indication that the minister said he was unable to accept it.

Mr. Speaker: It is obviously contrary to the practice which has been followed for the Chair to put a motion which is not before the house. Although the hon. member sits very far to my left he is very much in my vision; perhaps the Chair has Vista-vision. In any event I did see the hon. member, but I do not think this point of order can be accepted.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. The heading in the order paper above these notices of motions reads "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers". Surely we are dealing with motions in this instance.

It has been my experience here that when an hon. member indicates his assent it means he wants the motion put. If the minister accepts the motion then we do not have a vote, or it can be transferred for debate. However, if there is a refusal by a minister to do anything about the motion, then it is up to the member to call for a vote if he so desires.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the desire of hon. members I shall put the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish me to put the motion in a formal way?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Forrestall) which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—WITHDRAWAL OF FRENCH CONTRIBUTION TO MILITARY EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister advise the house what, in his opinion and that of the government, will be the effect of France notifying NATO that after January 1, 1967 that country will make no further contributions to the military expenditures of NATO? To what extent will the failure of France to make that contribution add to the amount that may have to be paid by Canada and other nations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): The information that I have, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what has been given publicly, is not clear as to whether this decision of France refers only to obligations that she might have with regard to the infrastructure program of NATO. Until I know the precise answer to that I do not believe I would want to answer the question at this time. There has been no final decision, of course, with regard to the disposition of French forces in Germany, nor has there been any decision with regard to overflights. I think I should like to take my hon. friend's question as notice and, if there is more information tomorrow, perhaps give a precise answer.

NATO—MOVE OF CANADIAN AND U.S. AIR BASES FROM FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he explain the report that as a result of the policy of General de Gaulle which requires that the United States and Canadian air forces must leave France the Canadian air force is moving to Germany and the United States air force to the United Kingdom? Can he explain why there is this peculiar arrangement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, last March the government of France announced that it was not going to continue in the integrated force structure of NATO or in the integrated command structure. To that end it served notice on the United States and Canada to vacate the air bases within France that these countries had, in the case of Canada two and in the case of the United States five. The decision to be made by the government of the United States as to relocation is, of course, a matter for the government of the United States. Canada has made its decision with regard to relocation in Germany.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he can explain to the House of Commons why it is that the Canadian air force is being transferred to Germany but the United States air force is going to Great Britain?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that the United States is not transferring all of the bases that it had in France to the United Kingdom, only a portion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF MEDICARE AND OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It is supplementary to questions I put to the Prime Minister on Monday and Thursday of last week. I asked whether we would proceed during this portion of the session with action on old age pensions and medicare. The Prime Minister said there would be a statement in a few days as to what we would do. What day may we expect that statement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take a look at what the Prime Minister said and perhaps be in a position to answer this question tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether it was agreed that the old age pension and social security questions would be revised as the session would resume on the normal date set for that, next October 5?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member.

That is the question which was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and which I had promised to consider in the light of the reply given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) a few days ago.

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF INFLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to establish a committee or commission to study the cause and effect of the present inflationary situation in the hope of finding a solution?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): The government takes a very serious view of this problem, Mr. Speaker, and when the Minister of Finance is given an opportunity, immediately after the disposition of the transportation bill, the government's views on that and other questions will be made known.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

It has to do with the railway strike. Is the minister aware that the senior officials of the railroads got a 5 per cent salary increase retroactive to January pending final readjustment? Does he feel that that is normal?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is inadmissible in its present form.

[English]

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

INQUIRY AS TO REGIONAL CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Labour advise the house if the International Labour Organization conference is to be held on Monday and if members of this house will be able to sit in on this conference?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): The short answer, Mr. Speaker, is yes. All hon. members who are interested will be welcome. The session will open in the Commons chamber on Monday morning but where it will continue after that time, whether here or in room 200, will depend on the decision or action of the house later this week. I certainly hope that interested members will take advantage of this opportunity. This is the first time a regional conference of the Inter-American members of the ILO has been held in Canada. I hope all interested members will take advantage of the opportunity to attend as many sessions as possible. It is to begin on Monday morning, and I might say it will be opened by the Acting Prime Minister.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN BOUNDARIES OF DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, since he has had to decline an invitation to attend a meeting of the Georgian Bay Development Association. Does the minister intend to make any changes in the near future in the boundaries of the designated areas?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, a statement will be made to the association meeting in that connection.

REPORTED GRANT TO SUBSIDIARY OF CANADIAN JAVELIN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Industry whether it is a fact that the government of Canada has granted $5 million to one of the Doyle companies, Melville Chemical and Cellulose, a subsidiary of Canadian Javelin?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the terms in which the question is phrased make it somewhat difficult to answer. If the enterprise to which the hon. gentleman refers is a manufacturing or processing enterprise intended to be located in a designated area it will qualify like any other manufacturing or processing enterprise located in a designated area for the incentives approved by parliament under the area incentive program.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VISIT BY MINISTER TO MARITIME COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence regarding his proposed visit to maritime command when he intends to meet a very large cross-section of men and officers of all ranks who will express their views freely. Will the minister now give an assurance that the proposed meeting will be held openly and in the presence of the press?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I would think not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question. I would ask the minister whether it would not be possible for him to revise that decision in view of the fact that security matters are unlikely to be discussed. The matters to be discussed will concern only the minister's proposed plan of unification, will they not?

Mr. Hellyer: It would be possible, but I would expect that that kind of encounter would not produce the full and frank exchange of opinions which I would desire.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Behind closed doors.

Mr. Churchill: If the minister would allow debate here he would have a full and frank exchange of opinion. May I ask him a supplementary question. Will this very large cross-section of men and officers which the minister mentioned be very carefully selected in advance? Will they be screened?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that the hon. member will agree that that question is not acceptable.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Since he is going to appear in Halifax to allow a cross-section of service personnel to express their views freely, am I to understand that the rules and regulations will be changed to allow this to take place or has the minister taken upon himself the responsibility of permitting free expression of opinion, which is against the written rule?

Mr. Hellyer: I will take full responsibility for what occurs, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The rules notwithstanding.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN CLOSING OF OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Could the minister tell the house and the Canadian people in general whether the government intends to implement the arbitrary and unrealistic policy advocated by U.I.C. officials with a view to closing most unemployment insurance offices in Canada?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I think I said on an earlier occasion, it is not a case of the government acting arbitrarily or otherwise. Certain responsibilities have been delegated by parliament to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I have the assurance of the commission that they will receive and consider representations even though their preliminary thinking and plans may involve the closing of offices. But I wish to reiterate that the responsibility rests with the commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether, before those unemployment insurance offices are closed, the matter will be brought before parliament so as to give us the opportunity to discuss it in this house?

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: I would think not, Mr. Speaker. Parliament has already delegated this responsibility to the Unemployment Insurance Commission and a number of offices have been closed by them. I might say that this is not surprising since for many years the work of the National Employment Service was conducted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Since the functions of the National Employment Service have been transferred to another branch of government there does not remain anything like the same volume of work for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

In the interest of good administration the commission is making these decisions, but they are not making them arbitrarily. They are listening and will listen to the representations which are made from time to time by members of this house and others interested.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of Labour use his good offices to see that the office in Saint-Hyacinthe is retained, because it is one of the oldest?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope we will not engage in a discussion about individual offices. Perhaps even the Chair might have something to say about this.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): A supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. Have the provincial departments of labour been consulted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission before these offices have been closed?

Mr. Nicholson: I would have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I know that discussions have taken place with some of the provincial governments, but I cannot say whether the question has been discussed with all of them. I will take the question as notice and answer it as soon as possible.

WATER RESOURCES

UNITED STATES CONFERENCE ON WATER FOR PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has the government yet received a formal invitation to the water conference called by President Johnson for next May?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I have not personally, Mr. Speaker. It may be that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has, but I have not personally received one.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question. In accordance with the preliminary advice that the minister has received, will his department be able to make full and complete submissions within the time indicated in the original notice?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave yesterday is still valid today. The fears I expressed are also valid.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR HIGHER INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Finance, as the minister responsible for matters having to do with the wheat board, whether any favourable consideration has been given by the wheat board to increasing the amount of the initial payment for wheat delivered this year in view of rising costs and so on, to which the minister will no doubt allude when he speaks on the subject of inflation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a question was asked several days ago by the hon. member for Medicine Hat on exactly the same subject. I said at that time that we had received representations on both sides of this question, some in favour of increasing the initial price and some not in favour. I said that the matter was before me since, as the right hon. gentleman knows, this is a matter for the governor in council rather than for the wheat board. The wheat board itself has also been considering the matter at my request.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the matter is now before the governor in council to determine whether or not there shall be an increase. Can it be expected that the government will act with celerity in this regard?

Mr. Sharp: I gave a very candid reply to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I said that I did not expect there would be an early decision.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): A supplementary question. Will the Minister of Finance take into consideration the recommendations which he might receive from the Minister of Agriculture in this regard?

Mr. Sharp: I always pay the greatest possible attention to the views of the Minister of Agriculture.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

HULL, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO LAND ACQUISITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works?

In March 1966, the minister received several delegations from the city of Hull requesting that the federal government grant to the city of Hull some water lots located on the Hull side of the Ottawa River. Has the minister or his department reached a decision concerning those lots which the city of Hull would like to obtain from the department?

[English]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am not clear as to which parcel of land the hon. member has referred. Several parcels of land have been discussed with various authorities in Hull at one time or another.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This seems to be the type of question which should be placed on the order paper, for it pertains to particulars which the hon. member could obtain much more easily if his question were put in writing.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DISCLOSURE OF REASONS FOR COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the growing public anxiety, fear and concern, both in North America and Europe, over the recent rise in multiple murders of both ordinary citizens and policemen, will the government not consider the appeal made yesterday by the Canadian Association of Police Chiefs for the cabinet to make known to the public the reason why on each occasion the death sentence is passed that sentence is or is not being commuted?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there are some related questions on the order paper from the hon. member for York-Humber. In view of this, perhaps I might take the hon. member's question as notice so that I might deal with the questions of both hon. members at the same time.

EXAMINATION OF MATERIAL SEIZED FROM SEAFARERS UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, at the request of some good Canadian trade unionists I wish to ask the Solicitor General a question. Has he anything further to report with respect to developments in the examination of letters, documents and other material seized by the R.C.M.P. from various locals of the seafarers international union?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the members of the R.C.M.P. have completed their investigations and a report of their findings has been forwarded to the Department of Justice. I understand that the Minister of Justice and his officials have been in touch with the appropriate provincial authorities and that the report is under study.

SPENCE ROYAL COMMISSION— INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Spence report has been received by the Privy Council office and whether a copy of that report has been sent by air to the Prime Minister in England?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the report in question has been received by anyone in the government. I am not aware that it has been received by the Privy Council office but I shall make inquiries at once.

An hon. Member: Don't they keep you informed of anything?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ST. CATHARINES—REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT McKINNON INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister, with other members of the government, received representations with regard to substantial lay-offs at McKinnon Industries in St. Catharines and with respect to the applicability of the transitional assistance benefit plan which was announced by the former minister of labour last year?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in late August employees of McKinnon Industries of St. Catharines, along with employees of General Motors and other affiliated companies, met here in Ottawa with the Minister of Industry, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and myself. We had a very useful discussion. Representations of the nature referred to by the hon. member were made.

After the meeting my colleagues and I discussed the matter. I might say that the representations impressed me—at least, some of them did. They were rather persuasive. I hope they had the same effect on my colleagues.

We have asked for a special study and report which I think should come before the cabinet within the next week or so.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did this delegation ask that in addition to the supplementary unemployment benefits, TAB benefits be paid also? What was the reaction of the government to that request?

Mr. Nicholson: That was one of the suggestions put forward, and it is being carefully studied along with other suggestions and submissions made by the delegation.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—EARLY HANDLING OF U.S. GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General.

Will the Minister of Finance tell us if next spring the Montreal harbour will be able to handle American grain before the harbours at Fort William and Port Arthur are open?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question is a little premature and could easily be put on the order paper.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, last April the minister had talks with the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Montreal harbour board and was to report to us, but we never heard anything more. That is why I am asking this question today.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to disavow responsibility, but this matter really concerns my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, who is responsible for the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I then direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe we intend to hold a meeting with the Montreal port authority soon.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUPPORT OF UNIFICATION PROGRAM A PROMOTION FACTOR?

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has information been relayed from the minister's office or from the department to any officers or men in the services to the effect that enthusiastic support for the minister's program of unification will be a factor in considering matters of promotion?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Certainly not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

KINGSTON, ONT.—CROSSING OF PICKET LINES BY ARMED FORCES MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I should like to answer the question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver East who asked a question with respect to allegations that non-commissioned officers have been driving taxicabs in their off duty hours through the picket lines at Millhaven Fibres Limited near Kingston.

In general terms, it has been departmental policy not to interfere with servicemen engaged in part time employment outside the armed forces except in cases where their duties in the armed forces are affected.

According to our information no suggestion has been made that the servicemen off duty and in civilian clothes have acted illegally. Therefore we can only presume that it would be a matter for the individual taxi drivers to decide according to the dictates of their conscience. In this case it would appear that servicemen are subject to the same laws as ordinary citizens.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given a few moments ago by the Minister of National Defence and in light of the interest which I know he takes in the existence of good public relations between members of the armed services and the civilian population, may I ask whether it is not possible in some way, as a matter of urgency, to stop members of the armed forces from moonlighting, scabbing and going through local picket lines? The minister is interested in good public relations and so am I. Cannot something be done in this direction?

Mr. Hellyer: I will be pleased to take note of this suggestion and perhaps pass it along to the individuals involved.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence which may be related to moonlighting by members of the armed forces. Can the minister say approximately when an announcement of a general pay revision for the armed forces will be made?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, subject to the kind and courteous co-operation of the Minister of Finance and my other colleagues, I still hope it will be October 1.

Mr. McCleave: And will it be 14 per cent?

Mr. Hellyer: It would not be proper for me to give any indication of what my colleagues might approve until the announcement is ready to be made.

GRAIN

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—INCREASE IN ELEVATOR CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my favourite question to my favourite minister and ask the Minister of Agriculture whether over the summer recess he has come to a favourable decision about the grain elevator in Prince Rupert?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answering my favourite New Democratic Party member, after the hon. member for Kootenay West, I might say that the decision with respect to Prince Rupert is under review at the present time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF CONSTITUENCY RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State or the minister responsible for the appointment of returning officers in the various electoral ridings in Canada.

Could the minister tell the house if the new returning officers have already been appointed and, if so, if it would be possible to get the names of those 265 returning officers?

[Mr. Winch.]

[English]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Some have been, Mr. Speaker, but I could not possibly remember any of the names. I think there has been no change—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe this question is not so urgent that it could not be placed on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

ARDA—MOVE OF MARITIME REGIONAL OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry. Is the minister in a position to indicate when he might meet with a delegation from the town of Amherst over the intended move of the regional ARDA office from Amherst to Moncton?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question of course is of importance to the hon. member, and perhaps to other hon. members, but it is not, I think, of the type that should be asked at this time. It is local in character and I suggest to the hon. member that it should be placed on the order paper. Perhaps he might get in touch with the minister directly.

Mr. Coates: I have placed the question on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, but I anticipate that the answer is going to be available before the question on the order paper can be answered.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RETURN FROM U.S. OF ESCAPED PRISONERS FROM CANADIAN PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to the arrest and current detention in the United States of four escapees from a Canadian penitentiary.

Is the minister aware that a statement has been made by the United States Attorney General's department to the effect that two of these four escapees, being of Indian origin, are not to be returned to Canada and, indeed, that they may not be extraditable to Canada? If the minister is aware of this, can he say whether any action is contemplated with a view to challenging this statement and the position taken?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and deal with it tomorrow.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INVESTIGATION INTO GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General, to whom I extend my congratulations for a brilliant tour of the lower St. Lawrence.

I should like to ask the minister if the report of Mr. Justice Montpetit on the working conditions of the postal workers has been turned over to him and when it will be made public?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, it has not yet been referred to me, but I expect to receive it before the end of the month.

Mr. Choquette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the postal workers have indicated through the press their intention to go on strike, have representations been made to the minister by representatives of the said postal workers?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I was seeking to make the point that while our railway legislation is before us for consideration particular attention should be paid to providing by statute for the disposition and rehabilitation of railway rights of way after abandonment has taken place.

I pointed out that I had private bills on this subject in 1962 and 1963 on which there was debate. However, no action was taken. There is another bill on the order paper in my name this year dealing further with the matter.

Now that the general revision of railway legislation is being considered I feel this is a most appropriate time at which to deal with the problem presented by abandoned rights of way. I cited our experience in Middlesex West when the Courtright branch of the New York Central Railway was abandoned in 1960 as an example of what is likely to happen. Business disruption was slight because there had been virtually no business over this line for years, but the abandoned right of way created serious and very irritating problems. The rails and ties and any remaining useful culverts were torn out, leaving an unsightly mess. The fences, which had been neglected for some years pending abandonment, were left in deplorable condition and resulted in a livestock nuisance. The right of way subsequently was covered with a growth of brush, burdocks, thistles and an inglorious assortment of all noxious weeds known to the district.

Railways are always a nuisance in farm areas because almost invariably they divide farm losts into awkward parts. They create a crossing problem and they create a problem of cultivating odd-shaped fields.

While the railway continues to operate, this inconvenience is ameliorated by properly maintained fences, gates and grade crossings. When abandonment takes place the crossings are torn out, the drains blocked, the gates and fences are left in useless shape and the right of way becomes an unrestricted multiplying ground for noxious weed seeds. The New York Central right of way has now been sold en bloc to private speculators who have proved very difficult to contact. The county weed inspector has been unable to get action on the weeds. This right of way has become an eyesore, a nuisance and a menace to the community.

For further details of the tribulations and frustrations encountered by the people along this abandoned railway line, I refer hon. members to the debate of February 9, 1962. These difficulties are continuing. No one seems to know or care about cleaning up this mess. Surely the members of this house do not wish this most unsatisfactory experience to be repeated in other parts of the country. Although the difficulties in this New York Central case were not connected with railtied investments, grain storage, or alternate transport facilities to the same extent as they might be in other cases of abandonment, these problems of field separation, fencing, drainage and weed control are both irritating and unnecessary.

This parliament has set up a number of planning boards to help avoid confusion and mistakes in our future development. Surely we are justified in giving the most careful consideration to some form of planning and regulation which might help to smooth out the process of railway abandonment.

The Railway Act occupies 203 pages of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. It was passed in its original form when railway construction began and was intended to protect the interests of all concerned, both under conditions of construction and of operation. It has been amended from time to time to meet changing requirements. Railway abandonment now makes further amendment a prime necessity.

The Railway Act provides for a Board of Transport Commissioners to administer the act. This transport board has authority over all aspects of railway construction and operation. It can grant permission for a company to abandon a railway line but holds itself bound by a judgment in the case of Cairns Bros., written by Chief Commissioner Guthrie, November 17, 1936, which rules that the board has no jurisdiction over abandoned rights of way.

Once the rail lines are torn out, the board's jurisdiction ends. The board has no right to enforce conditions for abandonment. I am urging this parliament to provide the Board of Transport Commissioners, or the new authority, with both the authority and the responsibility for setting forth the conditions under which any railway abandonment may take place.

I suggest that one of the conditions for abandonment should be the appointment of an abandonment planning board for each line abandoned. This board should be representative of the various interests which will be affected. Such a board should have on it representatives of the railway company, of labour unions, of agriculture and of the municiplities concerned. The board should have the responsibility of recommending to the transport board the conditions under which abandonment could be permitted. Their recommendations should concern the best disposition of the right of way in the public interest, the disposition of the workers involved, consideration of compensation for rail-tied investment, and any other matters of vital public concern.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Where the right of way separates farm lands the right of way should be restored wherever practicable to the farm lot from which the land was originally taken. This would do away with crossing problems and the nuisance of working odd-shaped areas of land and cultivating odd-shaped fields. It would permit the farmer in each case to re-incorporate the right of way to the best possible advantage on his farm, and to control drainage and weed menace. Larger areas of property such as those in town sites should be disposed of in the best public interest after consultation with the municipalities concerned.

It is proposed that whenever an application for abandonment is granted by the transport board a waiting period should be allowed during which such a representative abandonment planning board as suggested could prepare a plan for abandonment. Provision could be made for settlement of disputes by arbitration. The services of municipal and provincial planning boards might be used where available.

I think this is most important. Boards have been set up under our conservation legislation for the purpose of planning in rural areas, and their services might be used to advantage in conjunction with the abandonment planning board I have suggested. Conservation authorities at various levels of government should be consulted.

These unnecessary railway lines have served their day and generation well. There is no sound reason why we should now abandon them in such a way as to leave ghost towns, broken fortunes and unsightly scars across the face of our country. I hope the government will recommend such action as is necessary to take care of this situation.

In the debate in 1963 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) had something to say in regard to this proposal, and I quote from his opening remarks on that occasion as recorded at page 4038 of Hansard for October 25, 1963:

> Mr. Speaker, may I, first of all, commend the sponsor of the bill before us. I think this measure is certainly a step in the right direction.

Those are very kind words from the minister. Later he went on to say:

> The railways will make no attempt, as businesses in competitive spheres must do, to make these lines pay and to make them effective and efficient. If they decide the line does not make money easily their attitude is: "Let us get rid of it; let us fold it; never mind the effects on the localities and on the people." I suggest that any corporation that has had a monopoly from the people of Canada and has milked it for all it was worth when the cream was good has no right to abandon a line to the detriment of the people in the locality, without making very adequate compensation to the people there for the abandonment of the line.

The hon. member who proposed the bill has taken a step in this direction and, as I said earlier, I think he is to be complimented and highly commended for this step.

Again very kind words.

I wonder whether he has gone far enough. In hearing his well presented and documented speech—

Again very complimentary.

—I wondered whether it would not be advantageous to the people in these areas and more proper, in view of the fact that the railways have used these lines which were very largely granted from the public domain, if the railway when it wished to abandon a line would have to return the right of way to the public domain. I wonder how many applications for railway line abandonment we would have if the railways were told: "That is fine; you can abandon the line if it is in the public interest of the locality, but if you do so any land—"

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) also took part in that debate in 1963. He raised an objection to the bill under discussion at that time on the grounds that it was ultra vires the parliament of Canada, that property rights properly come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and if the parliament of Canada undertook to dispose or direct the disposal of property owned by a corporation such as a railway company, after the line was torn up and the service discontinued, this would be wrong because the property reverts to the original owner and is held as any ordinary property is held. In other words, for the federal government to direct the disposition of such land would be beyond its powers.

This matter was not decided at that time. The point of law still remains unsettled. Arguments were presented in favour of and in opposition to it, but I would like to put on the record again some of the comments of the hon. member for Rosedale, as recorded at page 4042 of Hansard for October 25, 1963. Aside from the position of the federal government in the matter he said:

I do not disagree at all with the concern expressed by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) with regard to the fact that a piece of industrial wasteland may have been created, nor do I disagree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) that the particular railway should not be able, without any financial cost, merely to abandon the line and let it lie. But the point I was making is that this should be governed by the local planning authority. The jurisdiction over this should be exercised by local people who make plans for the use of real property within a particular community.

That fits in with the suggestion I have made that for each abandoned line there should be an abandonment planning committee established to plan for the conditions under which abandonment might take place.

What I am saying in connection with land which is purely the land of a particular locality, is that the locality should decide. The people should not have to come to Ottawa. They should not be forced to the expense of coming to the Board of Transport Commissioners to say how the land is going to be used.

• (4:40 p.m.)

From a legal standpoint this question is amply clear for the reasons I have cited. We have already got pronouncements of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council with respect to jurisdiction over land declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. We have the clear statement of the Board of Transport Commissioners, a statement of law on which appeal was available, but upon which no appeal has been taken, that in fact the land has ceased to be part of the railway operation.

He goes on later to say on the same page:

It is not so much a question of whether something should be done about this problem created for a community, when industrial wasteland exists after railroad tracks are torn up. I agree it is not that question, but the question is by whom should it be done?

Now that we are considering amendments to the Railway Act in general, I submit that this is a good time to make provisions in the legislation to take care of these abandoned rights of way and those other things which have to be taken into account when a branch line is abandoned.

We have acclaimed the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act which aims at the creation of economic farm units as a good conservation plan. We should apply some of these principles of conservation planning to the rehabilitation of farm lands which are affected by abandoned railway lines. Provision should be made through the Board of Transport Commissioners for suitable disposition of abandoned railway property to prevent its becoming a nuisance, a source of damage or a menace in the communities where abandonment takes place.

Mr. Justice Rand, at page 290 of the reports of the Supreme Court of Canada for 1958, in discussing property rights under the Railway Act describes section 198 of this act as:

An extraordinary power created by parliament which, being its creator, could modify it to whatever extent or in whatever manner may be considered advisable.

It is submitted that parliament, having created the Railway Act to govern the operation of railways, should also have the power to provide for the conditions under which they should be abandoned. That is what I am proposing.

The proposed amendments to the Railway Act as contained in this bill are of paramount importance to this country. This bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation this parliament will have to consider and we must approach it with great caution. There are overriding differences of opinion about the changes which should be made in our railway legislation because these changes affect different regions of the country.

The prairie provinces—the great grain growing areas and the so-called bread basket of Canada—require certain concessions under our railway legislation. They have always had certain special rights under this legislation, one of which is the Crowsnest pass agreement. The Atlantic provinces are in the same position. Special privileges and rights have been given them under our railway legislation. We should avoid any hurried amendment to this legislation. We must take our time and give careful consideration to every step in this process. For that reason I wish to move an amendment.

My amendment seeks further investigation by the standing committee on railways before the house proceeds further with this legislation. I think it would be of great advantage to the members of this house to have before them a report of a committee which had heard representations by interested parties in Canada, including provincial governments, wheat pools, railway companies, shippers, consumers and others who will be affected, before second reading is given to this bill.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

This house, while prepared to support the principle of a national transportation policy, is of the opinion that, owing to its complexity, the subject matter of this bill be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications for consideration and report, without prejudice to the further proceeding with the said bill later this session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion perhaps I could ask Your Honour to consider at this time or subsequently whether or not a motion of this sort is in order at this stage of our proceedings.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I make any comment on whether or not the amendment is acceptable, perhaps hon. members would like to express their opinions.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that this is a proper amendment because it does not say whether the house should or should not proceed with second reading of the bill. It makes the suggestion that something entirely different should be done without prejudice to the order paper. I do not see how an amendment can be moved that does not prejudice the order paper and still be a proper amendment, if the word "prejudice" means anything at all. Moreover, it seems to me that this amendment, or purported amendment, deals with the subject in another way entirely, though the subject is perhaps the same as the subject matter of the bill. What the amendment proposes is something that is so essentially different that it would appear to me that if this kind of motion was in order at all it would require to be treated as a substantive motion requiring notice. I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that unless the amendment proposes to do something substantially different from the second reading of the bill it is not at this stage in order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it may be that the form in which this amendment has been moved varies somewhat from second reading amendments that have been allowed in the past.

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly does.

Mr. Knowles: But it does seem to me that Your Honour should take a good look at the amendment in the light of citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I know it is very easy for the government to rise every time there is an amendment on second reading, every time there is a request for the subject matter of a bill to be considered before second reading is voted on, simply to say that it cannot be done.

I suppose it is foreign to procedure as we practice it in the House of Commons to suggest that we should follow common sense, but it seems to me that there is common sense in the suggestion that as complex a bill as this might be looked at by a committee, with that committee reporting back to the house before the house decides on the principle on second reading.

I suppose I have quoted citation 382 in this house scores of times, but having read it again just now it seems to me there is a phrase in it which does provide a basis for the validity of this amendment. May I read citation 382 in its entirety and then draw to Your Honour's attention one particular part of it. I might point out that the citations previous to 382 refer to the second reading stage of debate. Then citation 382 says:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question—

That is what the hon. member to my right has done. He has moved an amendment to the question for second reading.

—a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

The part of that citation to which I think Your Honour will have to give a great deal of weight is the phrase "or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees." Could you ask for a more apt description of the amendment which the hon. member for Middlesex West has moved? He says in his amendment that this is a complex bill, that we should not be asked at this point to make a decision on it, that in some way it should remain before the house with regard to what our decision on second reading is to be but that before making that decision we have the right to seek further information in relation to the bill through a committee.

I know how long is the list of amendments to the second reading of bills which have been ruled out of order. I know the citations and the precedents that have been quoted. But surely this is an unusual situation in that we have before us a bill with so many principles in it that one cannot talk about the principle of the bill, a bill that amends several acts, a bill that, as the Minister of Transport himself says, affects our life and concerns us almost more than language and religion. Surely it is the part of common sense to have such a bill discussed and examined by a committee before we are called upon to make a decision on second reading.

I am speaking to the point of order raised by the Minister of Transport, but I cannot help but say that I like what this amendment asks for. The amendment seeks to avoid saying no to the bill at this point. It asks the House of Commons to take the common-sense approach of letting a committee of this house study it carefully and report back to us, whereupon we might continue with the debate on second reading and reach a decision on principle.

I am fully aware of the fact that what I am arguing for is a departure from what has so often been the practice. I realize that it may seem to come right up against the whole theory of responsible government namely, that the government brings in its bills and we have to take them or leave them as they are. But times are changing; there are revolutions, quiet and otherwise, around the place, and it seems to me that if what we are asking for has common sense on its side it ought to be considered by this House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to add very much to the comprehensive argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the point of order, but I should like to refer Your Honour to some precedents whereby parliament, the parliament of Westminster at any rate, has allowed the second reading of a bill to be deferred and the bill to be referred to a committee for consideration and report, exactly as has been suggested here.

May I first of all remind Your Honour that the authority for this proposition is found in the citation of Beauchesne that has been referred to, and it is quoted there as a precedent applicable to proceedings in the Canadian House of Commons. Beauchesne rests his authority on May, and the relevant citation is to be found in May's 17th edition at page 527, subparagraph (3).

• (5:00 p.m.)

It—

That is the house.

—may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees.

This is a citation with respect to the English parliament which is carried forward on the authority of Beauchesne as applicable to the Canadian parliament. The citation then gives some examples of cases where it has been done in the English House of Commons. I admit freely that the citations refer to instances some scores of years ago but, Mr. Speaker, the point is that they are there as citations and authorities still binding and applicable in the English House of Commons.

Notwithstanding their age, what is good for Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 17th edition, is good enough authority for me.

I now want to refer to one typical example which took place in 1875. A bill entitled The Bankers Act Amendment Bill was under consideration and a motion for second reading had been moved. An amendment was proposed that the words after the word "that" be left out, as is the English form or amendment, in order—I am now eliding the actual form of the amendment but not its substantive parts—that the following words be substituted therefor:

A select committee be appointed to consider and report upon the restrictions imposed and privileges conferred by law on bankers authorized to make and issue notes in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively.

In other words, the amendment asked that instead of giving the bill second reading the subject be referred to a select committee in order that they might consider the whole scope of the matter which was proposed to be covered in the bill, the second reading of which had been moved. That amendment was allowed to stand, was subsequently voted upon and was carried. An order of the house then issued that a select committee be appointed, etc.

I have chosen that particular example because this was a case not just of a simple reference to a committee without any qualification but a reference to a committee in order that it might consider the whole ambit of the subject matter of the bill. This is exactly what is sought to be done in the amendment now before the house. Therefore, in addition to the argument put forth by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the argument of common sense, and the application of the citation in Beauchesne, I submit this precedent—and others referred to in May—as having been actually accepted and in accordance with our parliamentary practice.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to reply on the point of order to the argument just adduced by the hon. member for Kamloops. He referred to May's 17th edition, page 527, the third subparagraph. That section of May deals with what has been termed a "reasoned amendment". It reads:

It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment." This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words;—

A reasoned amendment according to May may be one of several categories. There are three categories and the hon. member for Kamloops referred to the third one. The first is that such an amendment may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principle, policy or provisions of the bill. The amendment before you does not do so because it says:

This house, while prepared to support the principle of a national transportation policy—

In other words, it does not contain a principle adverse to the bill. The second category in May's opinion reads as follows:

It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

That, with respect, this amendment does not do. It is obvious therefore that the hon. member for Kamloops had to rely on the subsection which reads:

It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

What he did not do, and I am sure he did not do this deliberately but in order to save the time of the house, was to continue reading the citation. It continues:

Such amendments have tended in modern times to become rather stereotyped and are confined generally to the first two categories.

In other words, the citation from May suggests that the third category recited by the hon. member for Kamloops has become rather stereotyped and has been abandoned. It then goes on to say:

An amendment, urging the setting up of a select committee to consider the subject matter of a bill, might be moved and carried, if the house were averse to giving the bill itself a second reading and so conceding its principle.

This amendment concedes the principle of the bill. If I may refer Your Honour to its terms, it reads:

This house, while prepared to support the principle of a national transportation policy, is of the opinion that—

I want to refer you to page 528 of May, which follows the citation brought to Your Honour's attention by the hon. member for Kamloops. It is said there that the effect of carrying a reasoned amendment is to delay and impede the progress of the bill. It then reads as follows:

It must be borne in mind, however, that the amendment, if agreed to, does not necessarily arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion. The technical effect of such an amendment is to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time.

That being so I would suggest, as the Minister of Transport has already submitted, that this is a substantive and superseding motion and therefore would require notice.

I now wish to refer to the citation brought to Your Honour's attention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He referred to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 382, which is to be found at page 277 of that reference. It reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

It then refers to the citation in May recited to you by the hon. member for Kamloops. However, I suggest to Your Honour that the governing words are:

> —a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

Here again this amendment states in broad terms that this house is prepared to support the principle of a national transportation policy.

Mr. Fulton: That is only one of the principles.

Mr. Turner: If I may in turn refer to another citation, citation 202 (15), found at page 170 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, I would point out that Beauchesne is referring here to amendments on second reading. The citation reads:

> An amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order . . . An amendment was moved that the house welcomed certain terms of the agreement and condemned several features of it. The speaker ruled it out because (a) the portion of the amendment which approved the agreement was useless as it suggested no change in the main motion, and also, (b), an amendment to disapprove what the main motion approves is nothing but an expanded negative.

In other words, this amendment is in the form of a disguised negative. It purports to support the principle of the bill but would have the effect of killing it because it would indefinitely postpone second reading.

The hon. member who introduced the amendment said, and the amendment itself says, that the matter is so complex it ought to be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications for consideration and report. The rules of this house provide, and the minister has given an undertaking as well, that this will happen after second reading is accorded to the bill. There will be, therefore, the same opportunity for witnesses to be heard and for the bill to be examined clause by clause. The advantage of that procedure is that the bill will be moving forward in accordance with the usual procedure of this house. If the subject matter only were to be referred to the committee rather than the text of the bill, witnesses would be heard but there would be no direct reference to the clauses which comprise the intended statute. I suggest to Your Honour that the amendment would have the effect of placing the committee in limbo without anything specific before it except the vagueness of the words "subject matter".

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre admitted that if the course outlined in the amendment were followed it would be a departure from the standard practice of the house. If the ordinary procedure were followed we would move this bill forward with no prejudice to the rights of this house, to the rights of the committee or to the rights of the people of this country to be heard. We should proceed with second reading of the bill and in the ordinary course the bill will arrive before the same committee with the same personnel as the hon. member seeks to have consider the bill by way of this circuitous amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps Your Honour would permit me to draw attention to the nearest parallel case which I have been able to find. It is not exactly parallel because, in this particular case when the farm machinery bill was before the last parliament on September 28, 1964, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. A subamendment was attempted to be moved by the hon. member for Peace River. I admit that to that limited extent that is a difference. The subamendment was ruled out of order by the present Speaker, who was then Deputy Speaker, on the ground that the subamendment proposed at one and the same time to take the question out of the house and keep it here. The subamendment contained the exact words that are in this amendment, "without prejudice to the right to proceed with the motion for second reading." As I say, the present Speaker, when Deputy Speaker, ruled the subamendment out of order. In those days we could appeal the Speaker's ruling, which I am glad we cannot do now. An appeal was taken and the house sustained that ruling. I suggest this precedent is more relevant than precedents in the British parliament in the eighties of the last century.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): If I may say a word on the point of order, I should like to stress the view that was expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This appeals to him as a sensible amendment. It does not seek to stall the bill or destroy it. All that is sought here is further information. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this house will be in a better position to vote on second reading, which is a very important stage in our procedure. If we vote for second reading we accept the bill in principle. I understand that it then goes to a committee for consideration, but when we accept this bill on second reading we have committed ourselves irrevocably to the processing of the bill.

It is true that we can vote against it on third reading, but we are going rather far in giving it second reading. There are serious questions in the minds of many members concerning some features of the bill. Generally speaking, we are in favour of a national transportation policy. However, I know that some members have grave doubts about the advisability of certain features of this bill. If the bill were sent to a committee before second reading I am sure that the information that would be brought forth would be of great value to every member of this house in reaching a conclusion on second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair is in a position now to render a ruling on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Middlesex West. I should like to thank the hon. members who have given me advice and referred me to certain citations. I recognize, of course, the difficulty that faces us when we read Standing Order 77 which says that no bill can be committed without being read a second time. I recognize the difficulty in discerning the difference between the bill itself and the subject matter of the bill. Whatever personal views I may have about how a difficult bill of this nature should be handled by this house, the Chair is faced with the problem of deciding whether or not the amendment is in order in accordance with our rules and our precedents.

May I first of all refer the house to that section of the amendment which reads:

> —without prejudice to further proceeding to the said bill later this session—

I am not sure what this means. If it means that the bill is to remain on the order paper for second reading and at the same time the subject matter is to be referred to a committee, then we arrive at the position where we are trying to have it both ways. We arrive at a position similar to the one upon which Mr. Deputy Speaker Lamoureux ruled on September 28, 1964.

May I refer hon. members to citation 386 on page 278 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads:

> On the second reading of a bill, the house may decide to refer the subject matter thereof to a commission although the bill could not be referred to a committee of the house before its second reading. (The subject matter of the bill and the bill itself are two different things).

Also from the same page I read the following:

> This amendment was as much a declaration of policy as if it stated that the question of adjusting the railway rates on grain should be investigated by the Railway Board.

I would take it from this citation that referring the subject matter of this bill to a committee is a declaration of policy. Having said that, may I refer members to citation 393 which reads as follows:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading.

It is for this reason that I declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if at this stage of the proceedings, in order to give a reasonable amount of notice to hon. members, I might move, pursuant to standing order 6(2), that the house continue to sit after six o'clock.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure just what is going to occur and I was waiting to see. I want to enter the debate on second reading. If you are going to do anything with respect to the proposal put forward by the Minister of Transport, I wonder whether that should be done first or just what is the procedure with respect to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has been moved by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), seconded by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner), that pursuant to standing order 6(2) the house continue to sit after six p.m.

Mr. Starr: Is any time for adjournment specified in the motion? Normally when a motion of this nature is put the time of adjournment beyond the hour the house normally rises for adjournment is stated. Would the mover of the motion stipulate the time of adjournment after six o'clock which he proposes?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it would be reasonable to suggest sitting beyond ten o'clock.

Mr. Starr: Could that be included in the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: It could be understood.

Mr. Starr: I think it better to stipulate it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be quite happy to have it made an order. It is a moral guarantee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must point out to the house that this is not a debatable motion. Standing Order 6 (2), which I will read to the house, states:

A motion that the house continue to sit after the hour specified in section (1) may be made at any time without notice. If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places—

Mr. Howard: I am not objecting, Mr. Speaker; I just want to speak on second reading.

Mr. Southam: Put the motion. There is no objection.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I also want to address myself to the motion for second reading.

I do not want to object, but I do want to speak on the motion.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister of Transport wish to change the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I am putting the motion and I am agreeing at the same time that it should be understood that there is an order of the house that we will not sit beyond ten o'clock.

Mr. Starr: I think it is understood that the minister has said it will be understood that the house will not sit beyond ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will read again standing order 6(2).

A motion that the house continue to sit after the hour specified in section (1) may be made at any time without notice. If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places and if ten or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion. If no member objects or if fewer than ten members rise in their places, the motion shall be deemed to be carried.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are members of the house objecting to this motion?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, now that the motion has been carried may I ask the minister whether he feels the need for a meal this evening? Could we not take one hour off for that purpose?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Less than ten members having risen in objection to this motion, the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: I was not objecting to the motion Mr. Speaker; I was asking the Minister of Transport a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to reflect on the question for a while.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there are times when I have a certain amount of compassion for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) but as he is not really interested in listening to me I will not bother expressing my views in that regard at the moment.

There are certain aspects of the bill which are appealing. One is that it seeks to consolidate into one agency the regulatory functions relating to a variety of modes of transportation. Another is that there is an enunciation of national policy with respect to transportation itself. There are, however, other facets of the bill which are not appealing and which tend on balance against a favourable disposition being made of it. One of these is the fear of the establishment of a bureaucratic monstrosity, as the Minister of Transport expressed it. At the time he said that, he said that he hoped it would not become such, that it really was not the intention of the government that it would become such.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully say to the hon. member that I do not think that was the minister's expression. He said that some other people may have called it that.

Mr. Howard: I will accept that correction, Mr. Speaker. Some people may have called it a bureaucratic monstrosity, but without referring to the minister's exact words I think he said that he hoped it would not be and that it was not the intention of the government that it should be. However, regardless of whether the minister felt that it might or might not be, nowhere in the legislation is there any guarantee that it will not be. Nowhere is there any check or balance against its being a bureaucratic monstrosity.

We now know that certain boards and commissions established under the aegis of federal law are in fact bureaucratic monstrosities. They do exist at the moment, so much so that some of them are in effect able to thumb their collective noses at what parliament may desire and go along in their own merry way regardless of the desires and opinions of the Canadian public. That is the fact in certain areas.

As there is no guarantee, check or balance in the legislation against this commission becoming a bureaucratic monstrosity, I doubt that we should give the final stamp of approval to something of this nature. That is one of the facets of this legislation which is not appealing to me.

Another facet is that there is an open-ended and unenunciated quality in the matter of freight rates. If there are adjustments upwards in freight rates we all know that the freezes and guarantees established at the moment, and which apparently are to be perpetuated, will be paid for in large measure by those of us who live in the western extremity of the nation. For instance, the north line of Canadian National Railways has perhaps as high a freight rate structure attached to the commodities carried along it as any other area in Canada, and those of us who live in that part of the country certainly do not feel the frozen rates structure that exists in other that we should have to subsidize even further parts of the nation. This is another facet of the bill which does not appeal to me.

Perhaps the most important reason why the bill does not have the appeal it should rests in the very history of the Liberal party. I am making special reference here to the history of the Liberal party with regard to the one form of transportation to which the minister studiously avoided referring—shipping. He made a couple of passing references to water transport but he did so in the historical sense that this was the way Canada had developed and so on, and that there was a competitive feature about water transportation on the lakes. Beyond that there was not a single mention of the very important question of shipping and of the manner in which it affects the people of this nation, particularly those who live in the coastal extremities.

The needs of both the east and west coast have not been given, in my hearing at any rate, any examination in this house. Certainly, as I said, the minister avoided reference to this subject. Representing a constituency on the Atlantic coast, as he does, the Minister of Transport above all others should automatically have thought in terms of the effect that shipping would have on the communities on the Atlantic coast and he should have outlined the intention of the legislation with respect to shipping as a means of transport. The British Columbia coast undoubtedly has such needs.

With regard to the history of the Liberal party one cannot help remembering that it was in office at a time when our merchant shipping fleet was almost wiped out of existence, at a time when that fleet was transferred to other nations, and at a time when we could have established and maintained a merchant shipping fleet in this nation. It was a Liberal government that refused to take cognizance of the necessity for a country such as Canada to maintain a shipping fleet to carry commodities in domestic trade as well as commodities in import and export trade.

We cannot help but recollect that it was a Liberal government that permitted the subsidy provisions for shipbuilding, instituted by Mr. Balcer, I believe, when he was minister of transport in the Conservative government, to lapse. The shipbuilding subsidy had had an effect on the activity in the shipyards of this nation. When it came time for the shipbuilding subsidy to be reinstituted it was reinstituted in such a way and at such a level that it favoured only a few of the larger shipyards in Canada and did nothing really worth while to promote a healthy shipbuilding industry and consequently a healthy shipping industry.

It is a Liberal government that has so far steadfastly refused in respect of shipping to deal with such matters as manning scales, and safety measures with regard to sailors and ships sailing in our waters. That matter is still up in the air. Admittedly it is not within the scope of the bill, but it is a subject with which the government should be concerned. Those are just a few examples of the attitude that the Liberal party has historically had to shipping, an attitude that makes the whole bill less appealing to me than it otherwise might have been.

May I speak about the coast of British Columbia. I do so because I am familiar with it, and I leave the analogies with respect to the east coast to hon. members who are more familiar with that area than I am. I have discussed extensively over a long period of time with my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), what I am about to raise. The communities on the coast of British Columbia are at the mercy of the shipping interests and suffer from the whims of the shipping interests and shipping companies. I should like to quote a case in point.

We have in the north coastal area, within my constituency, the Queen Charlotte Islands which are separated from the mainland by a body of water varying in width from 40 to 50 miles at one point to somewhat greater distances toward the southern tip of the islands. Shipping is the only way in which heavy materials and commodities can be transported to the Queen Charlotte Islands. The only other mode of transportation is by Canadian Pacific Airlines which carries only passengers and relatively light freight and express items.

Northland Navigation, a shipping company, at one time serviced the Queen Charlotte Islands. The company received, as does the present company, a subvention from the Canadian Maritime Commission of $3,000 to $4,000 a year. Northland Navigation Company, regardless of the fact that it was receiving from the public treasury a subsidy to provide passenger service to certain communities, admittedly not only the Queen Charlotte Islands, decided that it was no longer worth while or no longer of interest to it to service the Queen Charlotte Islands on the direct run from Prince Rupert. It discontinued the service and left the people living on the northern part of the islands, who relied to a great extent upon Northland's schedule to travel between Prince Rupert and the Queen Charlotte Islands, completely up in the air with no shipping transportation. This condition prevailed for some period of time until the former owners of Northland sold their interest to somebody else.

That example is one of a number of similar ones on the west coast which show that communities have had their interests completely disregarded because of the whims of shipping companies. Even in the midst of the Christmas season, when people expect Christmas gifts to be transported, when people expect to use the shipping on the coast to go home or to visit friends or relatives in other parts of the province, communities have found that the shipping company involved has suddenly decided it was not in its interest to make a particular run at Christmas time. The result has been that hundreds of people have been left stranded, unable to go where they wanted, and Christmas parcels have been left on the dockside or in the warehouse simply because the shipping company felt it was not in its interest to make a trip at that particular time. As we see it, the only way in which there can be any sort of reasonable or rationalized, if that is the word, transportation system on the coast of British Columbia is if there is an integrated structure involving aircraft, ships, highway transport and the three railroad facilities.

I have taken up this matter on a number of occasions with both the Conservative government and Liberal governments but to no avail. It appears that regardless of how knowledgeable the Minister of Transport and his officials may be about the needs of the people living along the coast of British Columbia, those needs have been completely pushed to one side in the preparation of this bill. Certainly they were completely forgotten in the introductory remarks of the minister.

It is interesting to compare our treatment of Canadian shipping with the way in which United States shipping is treated by the authorities of that country. I understand that in the United States there is a law which provides that commodities cannot be transported from one port to another in the United States except by United States ships. There was an incident at Prince Rupert when a transport truck carrying cement, I believe, from somewhere in the United States boarded the Queen of Prince Rupert and left that vessel at Prince Rupert with the intention of proceeding to some part of Alaska by way of the Alaska state ferry system. The truck was detained or confiscated. In any event something happened to it because United States officials said the law had been contravened in that part of the trip had been made in other than a United States ship.

However, when Canadian goods are being shipped we take a much more lenient point of view and permit without question the shipping of goods from one port in Canada to another port in Canada by way of United States vessels, for example, from Prince Rupert by the Alaska ferry system up to the Skeena River. A portion of these goods could be transported by us but this is not being done. If we had a government which took the least interest in the development of northern British Columbia and had continued assistance to that province under the roads to resources program we might not have to tolerate a situation where our goods are shipped in vessels owned by the United States. We might by now have seen the Stewart-Cassiar road in such a condition that the transfer of heavy materials by truck into the areas being developed north of Stewart and Prince Rupert would be possible.

This is an example of the history of blindness on the part of the present government concerning the need for the development of transportaton on the coast of British Columbia and in the northern areas, and nowhere in this bill do I see even an inkling of an understanding of these problems. If the Canadian National Railways had any hope of promoting northern development, either that company or the government would have at least undertaken some time ago a survey looking toward the extension of the line northward through Hazelton to the Yukon panhandle and the Cassiar district so that the transport of goods and materials to this rapidly developing area just north of where I live might be possible.

It is incongruous that in his presentation of this bill the Minister of Transport should be making a great play about the necessity for expediting grain shipments while his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is saying on the other hand that we do not need additional facilities at the grain elevator in Prince Rupert. The Minister of Transport talked about the great need for shipping large volumes of grain faster and more economically. I am certainly not unfavourably disposed toward more efficient grain handling or heavier grain shipments to other parts of the world, because this is a vital part of our economy and is no doubt of great value to the grain farmers on the prairies. But I am disturbed when I find one minister talking about the necessity for increasing grain shipments while another minister in the same government refuses to build the necessary extensions to a publicly owned terminal elevator in the city of Prince Rupert at the C.N.R. terminal point on its northern line.

There are two other aspects of this subject which I should like to mention before I finish. They are matters with which I believe the bill should have been concerned and which make me feel I cannot support the measure in its present form. They are the two vitally important questions with which this house and the whole nation were concerned only a few days ago.

I refer to the position in which railway workers find themselves not only with regard to their wages, hours and working conditions but as individuals faced with automation or technological change and the desire of the railway companies to run trains greater distances with the same crews. We appointed a royal commission to look into this question in great detail. Recently we have also seen more than 100,000 rail workers out on strike, not so much because they were concerned about their wages, though this was an important factor, but because they were concerned about the steadily declining opportunities for continuing work within the railway system. The men are concerned about the future of their jobs and the effect of automation and technological change upon their employment. They have lived in this atmosphere for the past 15 or 20 years since the advent of the diesel engine replacing steam. They have seen the decline of the old roundhouse, the laying off of certain classes of employees, including men with 15 to 20 years of service. They have seen terminal points closed because facilities were no longer needed. They see no end to the process.

We spent nearly the whole of last week dealing with one aspect of conditions on the railroads of this nation. Railway workers and others have been concerned for years about automation and the potential working life of a railroader. This is a question whose answer melts into vagueness when one considers the possible effects of automation. But the bill before us is silent on these matters. It is as though the government wished to ignore completely the real cause of the difficulties and deal only with the superficial aspects. For these reasons I cannot bring myself to support the bill in its present form regardless of how appealing some parts of it may be.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee on transport and communications and as a representative from western Canada, a large proportion of whose population would be directly affected by the passage of the legislation incorporated in Bill No. C-231, I feel impelled to take part in this debate.

I agree with many hon. members who have spoken that the objective of this bill is good. We in Canada have been carrying on a patchwork system of transportation for the last 60 years. We have taken old acts and amended them on a piecemeal basis. We have now reached the conclusion that a completely new concept of transportation in Canada is long overdue. Under the leadership of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert this party appointed the MacPherson royal commission in 1959 to look into the subject of transport and make recommendations.

It has been agreed by the minister and by other hon. members that the recommendations made seven or eight years ago were exceptionally good, but in the intervening years conditions have greatly changed to such an extent that I feel the whole concept of Bill C-231 is wrong. It denotes more or less a spirit of pessimism rather than of optimism. This point was well demonstrated in the speech of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) in reply to the minister's comments when introducing the bill.

When the MacPherson royal commission report was received we in the west had gone through some economic setbacks because of crop failures with the result that railway revenues had gone down. But since then, as emphasized by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, grain production in western Canada has almost doubled with the result that railway revenues, even though the companies are using about the same amount of rolling stock and the same number of miles of line, have doubled in the transportation of grain.

In addition, a great new development has taken place in the mineral industry of Saskatchewan to the extent that within the next five or six years railway revenue derived from the transportation of potash will equal and possibly exceed the total amount realized through grain handling. The population of the west has also increased. Other industries are also developing. So it stands to reason that the railroads should have greater revenue.

Instead of an attitude of pessimism with respect to the economics of railroading I believe we should take a serious look at the principle of this bill covering subsidies and giving privileges to the railroads to increase their revenue by raising freight rates. This is a matter which was ably dealt with by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) in his speech yesterday when he referred to the various levels of rates, particularly non-competitive rates and class rates. It is a matter of deep concern to people who have studied the bill.

Cost accounting techniques are another subject of grave concern. It is something which many witnesses discussed before the standing committee on transportation both in relation to Bill C-120, which we dealt with at great length in 1964, and in relation to the work of that committee this spring when its members took a trip west to study the problem incurred by the discontinuance of the C.P.R. Dominion passenger train. On each occasion witnesses indicated their concern about the figures we were going to consider when we would finally get around to dealing with the bill now under discussion.

The very title of this bill, "An act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions," is so wide in its scope that people are worried about it. Most Canadians realize that there is a necessity for new transportation legislation. I know the members of this party are in agreement with the principle that we should have new legislation, and the sooner the better, but because it is of such grave importance this legislation must be given the greatest study under the most ideal conditions and with the assistance of the best advice we can get from Canadian experts and possibly experts from outside the country.

As is clear from the evidence given to the MacPherson royal commission there is a great difference of opinion on the matter of cost accounting. We had to go outside Canada to get independent cost accounting experts to assist us in arriving at what we thought was a reasonable figure in the allocation of costs. On the basis of the present bill many people across Canada have already expressed concern due to the fact that in 1964 this same government, in its wisdom, introduced Bill No. C-120, and it is now history that that legislation fell flat on its face. To illustrate that I quote a headline from the Western Producer of October 1, 1964 which read, "Legislation On Branch Line Abandonment Totally Inadequate, Says Pool President." Criticism is again being directed against us on this very matter and it behooves all members of the house, whether in opposition or supporting the government, to work toward a final solution to the best of our ability and enact legislation that will meet the needs of present-day Canada.

I myself have been greatly and directly interested in the problem of rail line abandonment. I do not pretend to be an expert on cost accounting. I think we should leave that angle for the experts to discuss when we deal with it in committee, but I do have quite a lot of experience with rail line abandonment because it so happens that in my own riding, one of the longest branch lines in western Canada was abandoned in 1961 after lengthy consideration by the Board of Transport Commissioners. As the member for the area strong representations were made to me regarding the abandonment of that line.

At the time I felt action should have been delayed until the MacPherson royal commission had completed its report, at which time we could have considered the abandonment of the Wolseley branch line in the light of that report rather than in the context of piecemeal abandonment. In view of that experience I have become alarmed about abandonments and am naturally sympathetic to the concern of so many people in western Canada about the future prospects of abandonment because the railroads directly affect their lives and aspirations and particularly the well-being of those people whose economy is tied in with the agricultural industry and who depend on the railroads to move their grain to market without undue cost.

Because of my concern about this matter, in 1963 I introduced Bill No. C-70, in 1965 Bill No. C-20, and this year Bill No. C-86, which is presently on the order paper, dealing with the principle of a moratorium on rail line abandonment. There is a vagueness in the government's bill with regard to this principle. It is understood that the MacPherson royal commission report with respect to railway line abandonment will be acceptable in some areas, but when abandonment is recommended I believe a definite moratorium should be provided before actual abandonment takes place. In the bill I have on the order paper I have suggested a five year period.

I am very disappointed that the government has not seen fit to be more specific in its bill. Here again there is a certain vagueness. The reason it should be more specific is the importance of this matter to people who are affected by rail line abandonment. It is hard to give a definite figure of how many people will be directly affected by rail line abandonment in Saskatchewan but if further abandonment takes place many thousands of farmers will be affected. It is estimated that in western Canada something like 4,000 miles of railway line could be abandoned. I do not think all this mileage will be abandoned because, as I suggested earlier, the economic picture has changed so much within the last six or seven years that we can prove western rail lines are not so uneconomic as they once appeared to be.

Nevertheless it is understood that there will be some line abandonments. The farmers living along these lines have for many years depended upon them for the marketing of their grain. Elevator companies have built elevators along these lines, some of which are in a very good state of repair and some of which are relatively new. In the case of abandonments the farmers will have to travel greater distances to deliver their grain and the elevator companies will have to dismantle their elevators. New techniques have been found whereby the elevator companies can move an elevator lock, stock and barrel to a new site. In some cases they may have to and will repair these elevators because they feel they can be used for several years after the railway line abandonment.

Many small family enterprises are adjacent to these lines in western Canada. We do not have large cities on the prairies and our communities are serviced by small self-contained villages and towns of perhaps 300 to 500 in population, some even smaller. Often there are two or three elevators in these villages, a family store, a service station and a hardware store. Often one will find also an independent garageman or, as was the case in days gone by, a blacksmith shop. These are small self-contained units, and many of the residents are now wondering whether there will be a definite time limit set with regard to the proposed abandonments. Surely they should have the opportunity of disposing of their businesses and re-establishing themselves in other areas.

In areas where lines are abandoned the farmers will have to haul their grain greater distances by truck which means that the municipalities will have to budget in order to provide a better road system or, as we refer to them in Saskatchewan, grid systems. In Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan there are programs under which the provincial governments contribute to municipalities for the purpose of building market roads or grid roads. There is definitely a need for a time limit in this regard to give municipalities an opportunity to budget for the extra expense because they cannot assess their taxpayers in one year to cover the total cost involved. In this regard I think there should be a five year limit to allow these municipalities to provide for the additional roads which will be required.

I believe my remarks have covered some of the basic arguments in favour of a moratorium principle. I hope the government sees fit to bring in an amendment to provide for such a principle. I am sure we will have a full discussion on this subject during our committee meetings. If such a principle is incorporated in the bill a great deal of worry will be removed from the minds of those who are going to be directly affected by this new legislation.

It is interesting to consider the economics attached to increased grain handling. I have had an opportunity to consult with a number of elevator companies' agents along some of these lines in my area, and I am thinking particularly of the Kipling-Maryfield area where over the last few years, as a result of improved agricultural techniques and the provision by mother nature of adequate moisture, there have been wonderful increases in production. I have figures in this regard which indicate that in many cases grain delivered per mile has almost doubled, in some cases from 40,000 to 80,000 bushels per mile. This has taken place over the past seven or eight years and indicates that we should take a very optimistic view about grain handling by the railways in western Canada. We should not talk about subsidies on the basis of the railway companies' figures which show that they are continually losing money in the grain handling operation.

In this regard I was very interested to read an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of April, 1964, at the time when Bill C-120 was before us. The heading of the editorial is "Odd Increase", and I think it would be of value to place at least a portion of this editorial on the record. It states:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway seems to have had a pretty good year in 1963 judging from the annual report made public this week. Railway revenues—that is the part of C.P.R. income coming directly from railway operations—amounted to more than $477 million, an increase of more than $24 million over 1962.
> Freight revenue accounted for $419 million of the total take. This represented an increase of $25.3 million over the preceding year or 7 per cent. Freight traffic volume increased by 12 per cent and, according to the report, grain shipments resulting from the Chinese, Russian and other wheat sales contributed heavily to the increase. But it was not only revenues that increased, profits increased as well. The net earnings actually rose by more than $6.2 million over 1962.

The editorial then goes on to state, and this is a very salient argument:

> It's rather odd that C.P.R. freight profits increased at a time when grain shipments increased. The railways have long and vigorously contended that they were losing money on the Crowsnest Pass rates charged for hauling grain. If this contention is valid, the railways should have shown a marked decline in revenues when they hauled record shipments of grain to seaboard.
> Maybe the railway accountants should take another look. Or better still, maybe some outside accountants should sharpen their pencils in a definitive examination of the Crowsnest rates.

I think that is a very valid comment which applies even more so today than it did at that time, particularly in view of the evidence we heard before the committee and in light of what was pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in his speech the other evening. In view of the fact that gross tonnage volumes have increased by leaps and bounds in western Canada and the prospect that this will continue, perhaps we should be concerned about throwing this whole thing open and allowing the railways to increase their freight rates in order to recoup what they feel they may lose as a result of the Crowsnest pass rates.

There has been a good deal of reference to the Crowsnest pass rates and I do not intend to deal with this subject at any length. It is paramount to the success or failure of western Canada agriculture that we have equitable and fair freight rates. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) last night in his eloquent address referred to this provision of the bill and pointed out that there was a certain vagueness in respect of this matter. This vagueness is a matter of great concern to the people of western Canada and should be a matter of great concern to the people of eastern Canada as well. This should be a matter of grave concern to all members of the house whether on the government or opposition side.

Before concluding my remarks I should like to deal with a matter specific to my riding because I have had some experience in this regard. I refer again to railway line abandonments in the Moose Mountain area and specifically to the Blewett-Luxton branch. On this line there are three elevators at three different points with a total capacity of 77,000 bushels. These figures are about two years old but are indicative of the situation in the rural area with which I am familiar. In the areas around these three points and three elevators there are 76 farm families who will be directly affected by any rail abandonment that may take place.

Along the Corning-Peebles-Hansworth branch line there are three points, seven elevators and 279 farm families who will be affected by the proposed abandonment. The volume of grain handled up to the end of 1963 averaged 289,000 bushels at these points. In the Goodwater-Radville area in the south-west corner of the riding of Moose Mountain there are two points and five elevators. In this area 164 farm families will be affected. The average volume of grain in the area was 289,200 bushels. In the Kisby-Weyburn-Stoughton area, there are four points which would be affected. This area has seven elevators, 198 farm families and a volume of approximately 214,000 bushels of grain.

At the 12 points I have mentioned in this relatively small area of western Canada there were, at the time these figures were compiled, 22 elevators and approximately 750 farm families producing an average of one million bushels of grain per year. These figures point up the number of people who would be affected by the proposed rail line abandonments. They also illustrate how seriously these abandonments are viewed in my part of the country.

This brings me back to one of the reasons I felt compelled to speak, namely, that before this bill is pushed through the House of Commons a long and fair study should be given it in the committee, I was disappointed that the amendment of the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) was not accepted by the minister. It was put forward in a spirit of co-operation following what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned the other evening, namely, that we should in a spirit of co-operation in the house consider this legislation in all its aspects, that we should consider it very fairly and not do anything to hinder its passage but at the same time make sure that when we do pass it we will have something that will be adequate to meet the needs of this great country of ours over the next 25 or 30 years.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Transport has had time to reflect on the question I asked him some time ago. I would suggest that for the sake of the staff and all the rest of us we might take one hour off at this point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have been reflecting on the question and I think that since the house did not have a great deal of notice of the desire to sit this evening it would not be unreasonable to take some time off for dinner. But in order to give the maximum number of speakers a chance to speak I wonder whether we could not agree to reassemble at seven o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Chiseler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the house rise until seven o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 6.16 p.m. the sitting of the house was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity as member for the riding of London to say a few words on what I consider to be a very complex bill. Whether or not I may be below the average level of understanding I am not sure, but at the same time I am aware that this feeling is prevalent among many hon. members in this house. I have spoken to some of my friends on the other side of the house and to many of my friends on this side and I have asked them whether they had a thorough and profound understanding of this bill. The answers I have received are: "I don't know anything about it" or "I don't understand it" and even in some cases, "I haven't even read it". Perhaps this has been so because it is a massive piece of legislation, and it is very difficult for the average person to study adequately the entire contents of the bill as quickly and profoundly as it should be studied. I am sure there are many people here in the house, including myself, who recognize the fact that a bill is necessary and who would like to vote for it, but before voting on it we should like to have a better understanding of it.

I think that perhaps when this piece of legislation was put together three or four persons could have sat down and condensed it into capsule form, containing maybe 20 chapters. I find on reading the bill that some of its clauses are quite contradictory.

For example in the explanatory notes which appear on the unnumbered second page of the bill it said:

> Part I of this bill deals with the proposed Canadian Transport Commission which would replace the present Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, the Air Transport Board and the Canadian Maritime Commission. Parts II and III would make provision for two other modes of transport, namely commodity pipe lines and extraprovincial motor vehicle transport.

This is quite clear to most of us. However, if we refer to page 6 of the bill we will find an outline of the personnel of this board, which is to consist of 17 members. I believe that previously these three bodies were manned by 13 people. I will not attempt to suggest that this is another effort at empire building because I do not think it is intentionally so. I do not want to be particularly argumentative in this matter, because I think we should approach the bill, not in a partisan manner but as fellow Canadians with a common interest.

I would also like to congratulate the minister on his description of the bill. Perhaps it would have been better to have heard not quite as lengthy a description from several hon. members on both sides of this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what an opposition is for.

Mr. Irvine: Now, Mr. Speaker, I have some questions to ask of the minister which I hope he will answer at the end of this debate. I would like to know how many states of the United States are served by the C.N.R. branch or subsidiary lines. I am referring in particular to the Grand Trunk line which runs through to Chicago and serves intermediate points. It is my understanding that 13 states are served by this line but I would like to have this corroborated by the minister. I would also like to know whether that portion of the railway system is subsidized by our government and if so to what extent. Can the minister also inform us whether the intent of this bill is to bring an end to transport subsidies? Nowhere in the bill is this actually spelled out in black and white.

As everyone knows, we have recently been hit by a severe rail strike. Having carried a union card myself some years ago I am well aware of the trials and tribulations of the railway workers. I am of the opinion that as a result of Bill C-230 we will find ourselves saddled with an expenditure of an extra $100 million. I would like to know where this money will come from. Will it come from increased freight rates? It is my understanding that the rates in the west are somewhat higher than they are in this part of the country. I understand further that in some instances, the rates in the east are higher than in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Ontario and Quebec comprise what we might call the economic breadbasket, or at least the industrial breadbasket, of Canada. I am afraid these areas are going to have to carry the brunt of the increases. The people of Quebec and Ontario should be apprised of this situation in advance. This is going to be a tough blow to us industrially. It could also be a tough blow to us in trying to capture and keep some of those foreign markets, which are so important to our balance of payments picture.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal said in this bill with regard to rationalization. What about rationalization? In the riding I have the pleasure to represent, the city of London, we have a service that runs from London to Windsor, a distance of about 120 miles. We have one Canadian National and one Canadian Pacific line paralleling each other. So far as passenger trains are concerned, the schedules are almost identical. What a waste of money this is. These are double-tracked lines and there is no reason in the world why an arrangement could not be made whereby one line would be used. I feel that the direction for this course should come from us. There are many savings which could be effected. For instance, what about the grade separation program, toward which I believe we pay 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the cost? I know of two or three grade separations that are under study at the moment in the city of London. I do not know about Chatham or Windsor, but I am sure the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Danforth) would have some information about that.

What about the savings that would be effected in the upkeep of tracks and in the upkeep of roadbeds? What about the savings that would be effected by the use of one station at each place, instead of two stations? Then, of course, there are the other buildings that are appended to such an operation. One more very important factor to consider, Mr. Speaker, is land use. Here we have two rights of way running through some of the greatest agricultural areas in Canada. Economists well believe that before too many years, if not now, there will not be enough land available in the world to feed all the people in the world. Therefore we must conserve these areas particularly. I am sure there must be many other areas in a similar position throughout this country of ours. I say that there are many facets of this subject of rationalization to consider. There are many things we should be considering, some of which we have not considered.

This problem we are having in connection with transportation is not something new; it goes back many years. I am going to quote some of the thoughts of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on this subject back in 1932 or 1933, and for this purpose I shall read from the third volume of a book written by Roger Graham. There is one chapter here about which we should think for just a moment. This is written about a man who was a champion of private enterprise, and of giving all kinds of people an opportunity in this competitive country of ours. I quote:

> The question of how to deal with the railway problem, which had been before the country for so long, was one of the few important subjects on which Meighen ever changed his mind. Up to the 1930's no one had resisted more adamantly or outspokenly than he the notion, consistently advanced by C.P.R. officials and always finding some political support, that the two great railway systems should in some way be merged. By the time the Duff Commission reported, however,—

I think that was 1934.

> —he had become convinced that unification of some sort was the most hopeful way out. "Confidentially," he wrote to a member of the commission, "I may tell you that I have been for two years firmly of opinion that the interests of the whole nation would be best served by a placing of the one road under the other for co-operation, and a distribution of the earnings among the securities of both in an equitable manner . . . The public interests will be looked after by the railway commission supplemented by additional powers from parliament, if desired." What had brought him to a conclusion he had so often rejected in the past? For one thing, what seemed to him the carnival of extravagance which marked Thornton's presidency of the C.N.R. has disillusioned him somewhat with public ownership of railways in practice. The trouble lay not in the experiment of public ownership having been tried in the first place, as Beatty was contending in a series of public speeches, but in the way the experiment had been conducted after 1922 when Thornton had succeeded D. B. Hanna.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when we should give very serious thought to a scientific and economic study of transportation, a study in depth taking into consideration air, rail, shipping, pipe lines, etc. I mean a study in depth and not just one of those superficial things. For instance, after the second world war the then Liberal administration—I am going to throw them a bouquet because I think it is due them—set aside $50 million a year for the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. This was a good thing. As a result of this move Canada today is recognized as one of the leading nations of the world in the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. This was a far sighted program. What about the future now? Are we far sighted?

When the last spike was driven in the trans-Canada railway, we sat back with a feeling that we had it made. Things have changed. We are in a new era. We have to look for new means of transportation. Perhaps some of these things may seem to be away out in left field. Our big problem today is simply this, that we have to move goods and people and move them quickly and economically. In so far as bulk products are concerned, for instance, we may consider the pipe line. The movement of oil and gas by pipe line has been a great boon to this country. One cannot imagine moving such a great volume of oil or gas by any other medium at the present time.

• (7:20 p.m.)

Let us consider this in terms of other bulk items, because there may be ways more economical than those now used. The University of Alberta at the present time is studying new techniques—techniques which would amaze you—for the movement of bulk products by pipe line, such things as coal and sulphur. And why not?

I recently read an article—which I did try to find, but failed, because I thought it particularly interesting—which reported that a group of economists in the United States had stated that in ten years sulphur would become one of the most valuable items in our way of life. Put packages wrapped in neoprene, or whatever they wish to use, into a pipe line, and it takes very little effort to move them great distances.

These ideas may be somewhat far out, but we have to look ahead to new ideas and techniques. For example, has it ever been considered that instead of using railway lines it might be cheaper to ship our wheat year round from the lakehead? Of course, this would entail the use of icebreakers and nuclear reactors, but how much would this cost us? Has a study ever been made to determine its feasibility? It might be more expedient to do this, in view of the volume of bulk products which can be carried in ships.

Has any thought been given to the movement of wheat through a pipe line from, say, the prairies to Halifax, or from the prairies to Vancouver, or from the prairies to Churchill? There are of course complexities and difficulties here. These are some of the things we should be thinking about.

According to the information I have, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology is doing preliminary research at the present time into the high speed movement of commuters and commuter traffic through pneumatic tubes at speeds of up to 350 miles per hour. What have we done to study such a possibility? Would it not be wonderful for the members who live in Toronto, if they could hop into a capsule and arrive in Ottawa 45 minutes later. Or, for example, the members who live in Montreal could commute back and forth each day in 20 minutes Think of the advantages of this system when a vote was called, and we would not have to ring the bells for any longer than an hour and a half before every member was here. These are matters we should be looking into.

This proposal is nothing new. Let me take members back to the old-fashioned store we used to visit 35 years ago. Perhaps some of those present did not do so, but I did because I am in that age bracket. We remember the tubes which used to hang above the counters. Your money was put in a little capsule, shoved into this tube, and whoooosh!—away it went to the office, and then came back with your change. This new idea is exactly the same system, only on a much larger plane. We must project our thinking into the future and consider these new technologies and what we can do with them.

What will be the modern way 10 or 20 years from now of transporting something or somebody from Edmonton to Montreal? Will it be by pipe line, will it be by hovercraft, will it be by rocket, or will it be by pneumatic tube? People may laugh at this, but they laughed at the Wright brothers who 65 to 70 years ago said that they were going to fly in an aeroplane. Since that time aviation has done pretty well; but at that the time they were ridiculed. People thought they were a bunch of kooks. This is a time for reflection and thought, a time to use imagination, foresight and initiative in planning tomorrow's transportation. I would suggest that such a study is a very important consideration at this particular time.

I was much in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) but which was not allowed by your deputy, Mr. Speaker. It was an unfortunate thing because I feel that it would be only fair and sensible to refer this bill to the committee on transport and communications, where it could be further studied. An opportunity would be given to hear witnesses in order that many members, myself included, could go into the complexities of the bill, ask questions and receive responsible answers.

The action we take today may be binding upon us for many years to come, so let us not be in a hurry. I do not think there is any point in our trying to hurry this legislation. We have given up the major part of what was to have been a summer recess. I do not think that anyone feels sorry for himself for that. Most hon. members feel that their responsibility is to this country of ours, and if we are needed here we should be here. I would suggest that we sit right on, take our time and make sure of this legislation before we complete second reading.

It would not be fair to mention names, but people on both sides of the house have confided to me that they do not know what this bill is all about. I suggest they should have knowledge of this legislation before deciding to stand up and be counted—instead of being counted on something about which at the present time some of them may have no knowledge. Let us review the matter in committee and get the answers we want to our questions.

I think many people want to vote for a transportation bill, and I am one of them. I should like to vote for this transportation bill if it were amended in certain respects, and if we were given the opportunity to discuss it in committee so that we might have a more complete and profound understanding of it. If that were done, Mr. Speaker, would it not be nice to pass this bill unanimously in the house? I submit that this would be very, very refreshing.

• (7:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I shall not delay the study of this bill too long. I should like very much to share the enthusiasm shown by the minister, but like the previous speaker, I have some doubts about the bill now before us.

If I decided to say a few words, it is because I feel I owe it to my constituents to express their views about a piece of legislation as important as the one under consideration. Some will say perhaps that I am practising obstruction. I could not care less, and if I want to speak this evening, it is because I feel justice should be done to certain parts of the country. If we do not express our views, the minister will be unable to make the necessary amendments and corrections so as to make the bill really beneficial to the Canadian people.

There are too many things we know nothing about in this piece of legislation of national significance for us to give the minister a free hand. In the past, we, from Quebec, have not been too interested in railway rates, since the province of Quebec and especially, the province of Ontario, are served by a water and highway transportation system at relatively low rates.

When the minister says this measure will increase competition, it is only logical to infer that certain rates, in the fields of railway, highway or water transportation, will go up. Who will then pay for such an increase? It will surely be the people of Quebec and Ontario, since this bill assures us that the rates now in force in western Canada and in the Maritimes will remain at the same level for at least two years.

On the other hand, no mention is made of freight rates with regard to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. This means that sooner or later, if it becomes necessary to obtain additional revenue, it will be sought in Quebec and in Ontario. For that reason, I am asking the minister to reconsider the bill and to give Quebec and Ontario industrialists and farmers the same guarantees he has given to those in other provinces. Mr. Speaker, we are not envious of the treatment given our sister provinces but as representatives of constituencies in the central provinces we have a duty to make sure that the interests of our electors are treated equitably.

There is nothing in clause 68 of Bill No. C-231 to guarantee that the tolls will be just and reasonable for the areas mentioned. No mention is made of the areas. It is stated, for instance, that tolls must be just and reasonable. We all agree on that point. In fact, no one would tax one group more than another. And it is added that they shall always be charged equally to all persons. There is no mention of the areas at all, but some areas could be hurt because in none of them can the situation within a province be compared to the situation of another group of persons in a sister province, or even within the same province if it should happen that regions are not respected.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the weaknesses that should be brought to the attention of the minister for correction. If such legislation is hurriedly passed, what will the repercussions be on the small industry in our province as well as in Ontario, where small industry is the very framework of economic life?

The passing of a bill detrimental to the industrialists of our provinces would place them in an unfavourable position to compete with foreign manufacturers. Our fellow Canadians would bear the brunt of this and would suffer the consequences. The Canadians would also have to pay the piper and provide the additional amounts required for the operation of railroads.

The bill also provides that the federal government will intrude in a provincial field, that of truck transportation. I know that up to now trucking companies have been provincially licensed. I suggest that the provinces will surely object to this intrusion. Is it the intention to foster misunderstanding or to legislate in order to create good will?

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it would be advisable and logical to first refer this legislation, before second reading, to the committee specially charged with consideration of this matter. The bill, as someone said, and there is nothing wrong for me to repeat it, is highly complicated and requires a comprehensive and full examination.

Should we refer without delay that bill to a committee especially created to study it, we would give the municipalities, the provinces, the trucking firms and the experts in that field the opportunity to express their views;

I feel that we would get something out of it as well as all the people of Canada.

Too often in the last few years half-baked and poorly drafted bills have been submitted to us, and each time the government had to retreat, there was a weakening of its authority.

That is why I think that the minister should heed the advice given him not only by the members of this side of the house but also on the government side, because I am convinced that he was given the same advice in caucus by his fellow-members. He would be well advised to listen to those who sit here and improve as much as possible the legislation submitted and see to it that when these matters have been thoroughly studied, we pass quickly a measure which will give satisfaction to the Canadian people.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the remarks which I wanted to make on that matter.

[English]

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) simply cannot win. On the one hand he has been exhorted, in the past, to bring in a new, revised national transportation policy, and when he does so he runs into the opposition of hon. members opposite. Perhaps it is because the transportation policy incorporated in the bill now before us contains so many different facets of principles that hon. members may find themselves able to support many of those principles while being unable to support others.

• (7:40 p.m.)

After listening to the debate of the past few days it seems to me almost all hon. members agree that the intent of the bill as far as it relates to the desire to rationalize transportation in this country and bring about the integration or co-ordination of the various kinds of transportation services, is a good one. As to the expressed intention to bring the administration and regulation of transport under one so-called super board; it is difficult to be impressed by the proposals for administrative reorganization. It could be argued that the nation's transportation would be better co-ordinated if the various commissions now in existence were brought under one over-all commission. On the other hand, it could be argued that there is a point at which an administration body becomes too large and cumbersome, and at which it becomes desirable to reorganize it into subdivisions.

I do not attempt to say I have sufficient technical competence to pass judgment on this matter. But I do wish to say that the minister has caused a great deal of uneasiness and uncertainty in the minds of many of those who sit in this chamber, particularly those who come from regions in the country which are on the geographical periphery. The minister may not have meant it, but he gave the impression a few days ago that the effect of this bill would be to allow the railways to charge rates which were fully compensatory, the intention being ultimately to free rates from restriction and return to an ever greater degree of competition within our transportation system. I know that since this first impression was given the minister has taken the time to elaborate on some of these points and clarify certain areas of misinterpretation.

We understand, now, that certain classes of commodities will retain the benefit of freight subsidies from the national treasury for a number of years. There are some profound questions to be raised when discussing a national transportation policy and perhaps the first of these is whether a national transportation policy should be determined almost exclusively as a result of economic analysis and cost studies, or whether it should be determined after an analysis of the social factors involved in any change which might be made.

I have no doubt it could be shown that by allowing the railways freedom to set freight rates, abandon branch lines and so on, we would enable them to increase their revenues and, in consequence, reduce the need for subsidies. This would mean ignoring or forgetting the social consequences in certain regions and localiites.

It seems to me we should not seriously be talking about basic changes in transportation policy without having regard also to tariff policy. I believe it is generally accepted as a proposition that tariff policies benefit the central part of the nation somewhat to the detriment of outlying regions. If it is part of national policy to maintain tariffs and other restrictions on imports, it follows that there should be acceptance of the need and of the justification for the continuance of transportation subsidies to the benefit of regions which are placed at a disadvantage because of those tariff policies. I have little doubt that this is the position taken by all members in this chamber who represent areas removed from the centre.

When we speak of the national interest in connection with transportation policy we should first be clear as to what is meant by the national interest. It may well be that when added up in terms of dollars and cents a change of transportation policy would show a net gain. But this gain may be experienced almost entirely in the central region of our country, and may be most detrimental to the economies at the geographic extremities. I do not believe this kind of reckoning is a true indication of what is in the national interest.

I support completely the proposition put forward yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) when he said that what is in the national interest is a policy which benefits all the regions of a country, or a policy which does not discriminate against the balanced development of the several regions which make up a nation.

I am sure that by now the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is becoming impatient of members as they rise to take part in this debate, because most of the substantial points with regard to this bill have been made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt him for a moment? I am far from impatient. I have been listening with the greatest interest to what he has to say. Perhaps he would allow me to ask him a simple question. He seems to find an antithesis between economic cost analysis and policies prescribed by parliament which would contribute to balanced growth in the country. The question I am putting to him is, does he not think that if policies of that kind are to be intelligently devised it is desirable to use the best modern techniques to find out what the facts are, instead of guessing at them as earlier generations had to do because they did not have those techniques?

• (7:50 p.m.)

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). I did not mean to suggest that he was showing impatience right at the present time. I was merely saying that I would not be surprised if he were becoming impatient, for the simple reason that already there has been considerable discussion.

What I was trying to establish in the past few minutes is my contention that many hon. members, and many people in different regions of this country are getting the impression that this new transportation policy will do no particular good for the economies of their regions.

Obviously the more time that can be spent on fruitful analysis and discussion of the various terms of this bill, the more information we will have and the better kind of policy we will be able to arrive at when a report is made to the house by the committee. It is not that I am faulting the minister for bringing in the legislation. I am merely trying to say that there is cause for uneasiness, because when a statement is reported in the press to the effect that the policy is intended to allow for the freeing of rates, then it takes a few days, perhaps even a few weeks subsequently to clarify that statement and to give the minister and others time to elaborate as to just how it is intended to protect the economies of the various regions from too sudden and harsh a change or disruption.

It is my contention that the two most difficult parts of this bill are those having to do with freight rates and with branch line abandonment. In the past few years there has been a pretty strong indication that almost every community in western Canada has shown a marked antagonism towards the idea that because of cost factors, and the like, railway branch lines may have to be removed. There is the problem of cost analysis; but we must take several other factors into consideration, and it may well be that with the passage of time people in some of these communities in western Canada will be less reluctant to accepting the idea that certain branch lines will have to be abandoned. They may do so because of a continuing trend among people to identify rather more with their regions and regional economies rather than with their own immediate local areas. But if you expect these people to accept the idea of branch line abandonment it must first be demonstrated to them that their regions and regional economies will not be disadvantageously affected by changes in transportation policy.

In other words, it will have to be demonstrated that all other means of railway rationalization and cost accounting have been investigated and attempted before the railways are given permission to abandon lines servicing some of these communities. That, of course, raises a very moot point, one which the minister touched upon in his introductory remarks, namely that when we speak of railway rationalization, cost accounting, and adopting more efficient techniques, surely we must consider the proposition that the possibility of public ownership of all railway lines in this country should be very much a part of a study of railway rationalization.

If we are really serious when we talk about railway rationalization we must be willing to say that we will investigate to the fullest extent possible, by acquiring the fullest data possible, the feasibility and desirability of actually bringing both major railway lines under single management. Otherwise how can we ask people to accept certain changes for the sake of rationalization, for the sake of efficiency and cost accounting, unless we are able to say to them that all—simply all—alternatives were looked into when parliament and parliamentary committees were considering ways and means of rationalizing rail transportation in Canada?

I do not think anyone here can get up and say, with any amount of concrete data at his disposal, that it would be better or worse to have railway transportation in this country under single management. Of course I know it is a matter of ideological dispute, with some people contending that it would be better because duplication would be avoided and the costs of duplication thus eliminated. On the other hand, others will argue that competition as between two railway systems provides for greater efficiency. Therefore I would hope that the proposition of bringing railway transportation under single management would be carefully considered and analysed in depth before we go about the country advocating or insisting upon branch line abandonment.

Some hon. members who have participated in this debate have dealt at considerable length with the effect that some of the proposed changes in the bill would have on western agriculture. I have some fairly strong views on that point but if I were to voice them now I would merely be repeating much of what has already been said.

However, I do want to make this point which I do not believe has been touched upon, namely, that it would strike me as very strange for us to remove certain kinds of subsidy on rail freight, since this is one means of giving an advantage to some of our export commodities in world markets. Of course direct subsidization as such is not permitted under the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, but indirect assistance, such as is provided by freight subsidies, has been regarded in past years as permissible under GATT.

We would be foolish to adopt the general proposition that it would be desirable to free freight rates and allow the railways to charge ever increasing rates, even though this would be directly disadvantageous to many of the industries which are producing commodities going directly into the export trade. I do not believe that the mood of the Canadian people today is such that they would oppose the passage of legislation which would modernize transportation in this country and bring it under more efficient and effective regulation. It is my belief that such legislation would be accepted by the vast majority who think about our problems and discover that it is desirable to have legislation providing for a co-ordinated administrative body charged with the responsibility of regulating freight and passenger transportation rates, and the conducting of research and investigation into factors entering into transportation problems. Surely the mood of the people is such that they will accept that concept readily and with great approbation.

Those of us who represent regions in this country considerably removed from industrial centres would be derelict in our duty if we did not take pains to point out to the government and the responsible ministers why we cannot accept this bill in its present form. There are too many unanswered questions and too many principles involved. A vote on second reading is really meaningless. By voting in favour of the bill an hon. member would simply be indicating approval of some of the principles. At the same time that hon. member may have grave reservations and, in fact, outright opposition to other principles. Yet that hon. member cannot be sure of the advantages or disadvantages of this bill because we do not have the technical competence here in parliament which would allow us to ask specific questions. Perhaps this difficulty does not relate only to the competence of members, but to the fact that this forum does not lend itself to this kind of search for information.

The only part of this proposed legislation about which I have an emotional reaction is that part which impinges upon the economies of various regions in this country. Government action has a very direct effect upon the growth and development of regional economies, and the government has a responsibility to intercede or intervene in economics generally in an attempt to help these regions grow, in so far as that is possible.

There is no need to apologize for accepting the principle of freight subsidies as we have known them in the past. They have been necessary to compensate for the results of tariff policies of this country for the past century. It is in the national interest that various regions develop to the maximum. Let me refer to a specific case.

It was not in the national interest to allow the relocation of the overhaul base from Winnipeg to Montreal, simply because it was demonstrated on a cost basis alone that it would be cheaper to conduct that operation in Montreal as opposed to Winnipeg. In addition to a cost factor, one must also consider desirability. Surely it is desirable to have more than one jet overhaul service base in Canada; yet by simply looking at the cost factor it was decided that this skilled jet overhaul service should be consolidated in one area in this country.

One of the last things we would want to see happen in this country is a development whereby the economy and the population became increasingly centralized, to the point that some regions stagnate while one or two metropolitan areas in the country grow at a rapid rate. Such a development would create complex cities to the point where the phenomenon of megalopoly sets in. I do not think it is desirable to have one, two or three centres in the country growing at such a rate that problems in terms of urban life and living develop while at the same time other areas are relatively stagnant. We are all aware of the phenomenon that has occurred in Latin and central America, and some of the so-called banana republics, where the whole economic strength is concentrated in an area restricted to one city. This is an extreme illustration but I fear if we bring in transportation changes and policies based almost entirely on the concept of competition and private enterprise we will move somewhat in the same direction.

It must be a deliberate policy of the government to embrace transportation policy which will have the effect of giving various regional economies in this country sufficient assistance, by subsidies and in other ways, to allow them to enjoy a rate of growth comparable to other regions. This will in turn add to the strength of the whole nation.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention tonight to go into detail on the bill now before us, but I should like to make some general observations in respect of its general purpose. We should have a national transportation policy enunciated and implemented in Canada. I do not intend to go into detail, as I have said, because my colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), dealt at some length with the major parts of this bill which are causing concern.

I am sure that his concern and our concern has been shared and is being shared by a great many members or this house because of the far reaching effects that these proposed changes may have on our whole economy.

Over the years there has been an increasing cry for a national transportation policy. I believe this has been occasioned by changing conditions in our country, by the development of forms of transportation other than the one mainly under consideration at the present time—that is, rail transportation—and also by the failure of our transportation systems to meet the challenge of the present day. I am thinking especially of the movement of grain throughout the past months. We all remember that on a great many occasions those from the prairie provinces have constantly brought to the attention of the government the failure of our transportation systems to meet the need, so far as the transportation of grain products is concerned.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when we consider the clamour that has been evident in days gone by it is rather difficult to reconcile the attitude taken, now that the government has enunciated a transportation policy. It may not be all that we desire, and certainly it is not. We all recognize that there are inadequacies in the measure now before us. I am sure that we all acknowledge the fact that further study will bring to light additional weaknesses that must be corrected if this policy and plan are to meet the need of Canada in this day and age. Therefore I believe that as we look at the bill before us we must look at it not as a finished product, not as something that is all cut and dried—I would not like to think of it as such—but as something like a working paper, if I may put it that way, that can be gone over, forming a basis for consideration, study and analysis; and then I trust the government will be prepared to accept recommendations, suggestions and amendments that this house believes will be necessary in order to make it an effective piece of legislation.

We have before us, of course, a bill that outlines the government's thinking with respect to a national transportation policy and the means of achieving that objective. A number of methods have been used to try to explain the contents of the bill and the effect it will have upon the transportation systems in Canada. We had the statement of the minister when introducing this measure. It was a rather complete statement and outlined the role transportation has played in the development of our nation, and the need for a realistic transportation policy to enable Canada to develop, prosper and progress as it ought. In addition to the minister's statement we have had presented to us what I suppose we might call the layman's guide that was drawn up by the minister in an endeavour to put into understandable language for those of us who are laymen in the field the meanings, purposes and objectives of the bill, and the way it will work out in reaching the objectives enunciated.

Then just yesterday noon we had a briefing session at which the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) and some of the officials of the department made themselves available for questioning and explanations in connection with this measure. In addition we have listened now to a considerable number of participants as they have made their contribution to this debate. I for one have endeavoured to listen to all of them, and think I have succeeded to a large degree in an attempt to understand more fully just what is comprehended in this particular measure. I say, Mr. Speaker, and I think others share the same view, that in spite of all these things there are many questions that remain unanswered; there are many fears that are still not allayed; there are many clauses which are so controversial that it will take a considerable amount of discussion, debate and analysis before we can really understand their full implication.

Mention has been made of the branch line abandonment suggestions. I believe that my colleague the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) brought out a very important point when he stated that care must be taken to ensure that in a case where a line is to be abandoned other forms of transportation are available so that those areas will not be left out in the cold. Another aspect of the bill that is causing grave doubt is that having to do with the rates structure and the suggestion that this will enable the railways to recoup their losses, as it were, or increase their revenue in order to take up the slack and meet the other provisions of the bill.

Many have expressed grave concern about the effect of the application of the provisions of this bill upon the various regions of Canada. I know we all like to think in terms of a national policy, and we must do so. We like to think of Canada as a great and growing nation, and so we are. But in spite of that fact I think we must be forced, and we will be forced, to realize that although we are one nation there are several distinct geographical areas, and the effect of the implementation of any measure must be considered in the light of its effect upon our regions.

Therefore I think the members from the maritimes have a right to express grave concern about the possible effects of this bill in relation to the maritimes area. Those from the prairie provinces have expressed their doubts and fears. Those from the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec are fearful lest they will be called upon to bear the major share of the increased cost that may be involved through the implementation of this measure.

We in British Columbia also fear that this measure will have a detrimental effect upon our province. The question has been raised and the fear expressed that British Columbia may find its adverse position aggravated still further if this bill becomes law and its provisions implemented. It is always a cause of concern that the freight rates are higher when shipping east from Vancouver than the rates to ship toward Vancouver. I think this is a discriminatory position that must be rectified in the very near future. British Columbia is developing rapidly as an industrial part of Canada, and therefore I believe the people of British Columbia should have the right and the facilities for access to the markets of Canada to the same degree as those in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Therefore I believe that the fears which have been expressed with respect to the various aspects of this bill are well founded.

Many references have been made to the complexity of Bill No. C-231. I for one share that particular view, namely, that it is practically impossible for one who is not accustomed to dealing with these particular matters to understand just what is involved and what the over-all effect will be of the application of such a measure. Clarifications, explanations and additional information must be secured, and I believe that the best place to secure this is in a committee. Therefore, if we face the fact that this measure, if passed, will go to the committee on transport and communications, we will be prepared to seek out the information we desire, look for the clarifications that are necessary and get those explanations which it is very probable we will be able to secure at that particular stage of the bill. When this measure is before the committee all those who are interested will be able to make their representations. It will be possible to call expert witnesses and to question them on the effects of the application of such a bill. Provincial governments will be able to make their representations, as well as farm organizations and other interested parties.

• (8:20 p.m)

I therefore believe that this bill will form the basis of a very interesting and constructive analysis and study, once this measure reaches the committee on transport and communications. And so, Mr. Speaker, while indicating our intention at the present time to further analyse the bill and to suggest amendments to its various clauses, we will support the principle of the bill, which we understand is to define and implement the national transportation policy of Canada.

As I have said, we reserve the right to offer suggestions, recommendations and amendments, but at the same time we believe that the time has come for the enunciation and implementation of a national transportation policy which will be more up to date and will meet more realistically the challenges that we face at the present time. It is therefore our intention to support the second reading of this bill while reserving our right to participate actively in the further stages of the bill and to contribute to the improvement of the measure now before us.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in my view this bill represents an attempt to bring our transportation policy up to date. I hope that our future policy contained in this bill will take advantage of what we have learned in the past. We hear much about regionalism, and the impression might be gained that the big crop which is being reaped in western Canada today will solve all other problems in that part of the country. However I would suggest that if western Canada did not harvest a large crop from year to year this country might still remain a somewhat backward colony.

It was the opening up of the west which gave Canada the great impetus. It was the building of the railway that made us a nation. I hope that in implementing this new transportation policy we will avoid some of the mistakes of the past and go forward in the building of a bigger and better country. I suggest that one of the mistakes we made in the past was in seeking to bind our country in perpetuity or, to put it another way, to let ourselves be bound by the hands of the dead. I hope that our new policy will be a dynamic one, one that is attuned to varying circumstances.

I believe that we should establish a knowledgeable transport board to handle Canada's tremendous problems in this field and I support wholeheartedly the setting up of such a body. At the same time we must make sure that this group does not become a little empire unto itself and does not forget the important reason for which it is established. I am therefore opposed to the creation of a sort of super crown corporation. I would like to see it become an advisory board not only to the Minister of Transport but to parliament as a whole. It is my hope that the parliamentary committee on transportation will work hard and become more knowledgeable, and that, together with this new super board of transport commissioners, it will work for the betterment of transportation in Canada. I am convinced that this can be achieved.

It might sound like sheer heresy for a western Canadian to say that we should perhaps take a second look at the Crowsnest pass rates to see whether or not there is a better and more equitable way of sharing the cost of transportation across our nation. Perhaps preferred rates might not be necessary if we found some way of stabilizing the price of agricultural products at a level at which we could pay competitive freight rates. I would like to think that when this commission is set up it will have a bold vision of our future. It is possible that if we calculated our present gross national product and divided it by 20 million we might find that we cannot support a railway; but if we approach this problem with the vision which we had when we built the Great Slave railway we will be encouraged to build new railways into the hinterland and into undiscovered areas where Canada's great wealth lies, and where perhaps still greater wealth will be discovered. I therefore hope that when this commission is set up it will not be restrictive but will act with vision and enterprise, that it will plan for a bigger and better Canada, not only able to support itself but able to come to the aid of the less privileged countries of this world.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the western farmer produces more wealth per hour of labour than any other worker in the world and it is therefore not surprising that he demands a fairly decent standard of living in return for this work. After all, a bushel of wheat can be made into so many loaves of bread. The western farmer is entitled to a raised standard of living in return for the tremendous efficiency with which he performs his tasks. To those people who look at him with envy I will say: Come on out and help us reap this harvest. We are short of thousands of labourers and we cannot get them because other industries in Canada are draining our labour force. We are reaping great wealth from our crops. One of the reasons I hope the Crowsnest freight rates will be continued in the future is that these people are entitled to a fair return for their labours, which are bringing to Canada sufficient wealth to make a substantial change in our balance of payments.

• (8:30 p.m.)

When we consider this transportation policy, I want the board which is going to be set up with regard to freight rates and railroads to consider seriously the effect on the trucking industry. I suggest that from time to time the railroads have not performed the services they might have performed, so we have developed a tremendous trucking industry in this country. I do not believe the people who have put their life's work and their life's savings into this business should be brushed aside. When we think about the rationalization of the railways, let us think also about the rationalization of the highways. Let us tie in the whole of our national highways program with this transportation program. I do not suggest however that we should put all the highways in Canada under this board. I am a little bit alarmed about the power the board could gather unto itself, unless parliament watches very carefully and puts in some safeguards to see that they do not become an all-absorbing empire. After all, an empire may not have the vision which I hope this board will have, and we might hold up the development of Canada in this last half of the twentieth century which rightly belongs to her.

I should like to make sure that when the railroads come forward with their figures parliament will take a good look at those figures, to ascertain whether or not the excuses the railroads give for not making money are real. In the past there has been a tremendous amount of waste, and not due to branch lines. If you look at a map of Canada today you will see the way these railroads radiate out from the main business centres, instead of being linked up properly across the country. Then you can understand why it is difficult for the railroads to haul any tonnage between the major centres without waste. As an example, we may take the city of Edmonton. The railway lines branch out of Edmonton like the fingers on your hand. In at least two places in Saskatchewan near the Alberta boundary the railway links are not closed. In one case there is a gap of almost 40 miles and in another case there is a gap of 125 miles. If you want to ship something from one point to another, although the two points may be only 40 miles apart your goods have to travel over 600 miles because of this gap in the railway lines.

I personally took up this matter with officials of the Canadian National and they told me that this was one method they used in trying to balance their books, that is charging freight rates over 600 miles. They did not think it was economic to close the 40 mile gap. These are things which I believe tend to put our railway system 50 years out of date.

I believe that this rail system of ours quite rightly should be tied in with a proper air policy. The air system in Canada today is far from adequate. Again, I should like to refer to the north. If you were talking about building an airport in a place like Fort Chipewyan, the air line officials would tell you that there are so few planes going into Fort Chipewyan there is no justification for building an airstrip. This is true because airplanes cannot land there. I do not know how in the world one can just sharpen a pencil, divide by 20 and say whether or not an airstrip should be built in a territory which so far has never been adequately covered. After many years Fort Chipewyan has an airstrip, but there are many places in the north country where airstrips are needed for development. We cannot take a cost figure or a per-ton mileage figure and say it is economic to build a railroad at some place, unless we guess. Unless we plan for the future, I think big mistakes will be made.

I hope this commission will look into the question of what they call pioneer rates. It is possible today for the railroads in northern Alberta to charge those pioneer rates. They can charge double or treble the ordinary freight rate because some lines have not been completed. This situation is supported by the statutes of Canada. Thank goodness we are going to scrap these statutes. However when we scrap these old, worn out statutes, let us put in statutes which are going to develop Canada in the most equitable manner. Let us stop the situation which finds the trappers in northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, the pioneers of mining and the prospectors, being charged treble and quadruple the ordinary freight rates, merely because the railroads have a monopoly.

I hear a great deal about the trouble in which the railroads find themselves. I am sorry, but I cannot weep for the railroads. We own the Canadian National and are responsible for the policies of that company. I will not worry about them. The great Canadian Pacific railroad, which at one time helped to link Canada into a great nation, has been delinquent in recent years. Part of their contract was to provide transportation. So far as passengers are concerned, we knew they would not make money by taking settlers out to the west to develop the land. However this company was willing to accept the hundreds of thousands of acres of land, including oil rights, in return for this gamble. Their gamble has paid off, and it has paid off again and again. Now they own great steamship lines and great air lines, but they want to get out of the transportation business because it is on the red side of the ledger. If we add up all the money this company made out of its contracts with the Canadian people, I do not think they have lost the amount of money they say they have in running the Canadian or the Dominion across Canada.

We do not want to rake over old ground. However, we do want to make sure that this great railroad company does not get out from under. If they are no longer going to keep their side of the contract by supplying passenger service across Canada in return for the enormous profits which they have put into other endeavours, such as oil leases and mining, then I say we should make it abundantly clear that if they want us to take over that form of transportation we are going to be hard bargainers. Parliament, one hundred years from the time the company was set up, can draft a bill to make sure we take over on the basis of a fair contract. I do not suggest a lawsuit, but this new statute should make certain that, when we make a contract with them in which they are given tremendous rights in our country, they are obliged to pay their share. I do not believe the Canadian people can be accused of being niggardly during the depression years. We dug down deep into the pockets of the taxpayers and saved the Canadian Pacific from bankruptcy. Now that the company is flush, I would appeal to them to pay their share in building up this integrated transportation system which Canada needs so badly.

[Mr. Bigg.]

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak about a western problem, namely the abandonment of railway lines. There is a great deal of logic in this move to abandon some of our railway lines. It is obvious they are uneconomical and not doing the country any good. Perhaps there is a little bit of pride because a railway runs through your town, whether it runs through every day, or every ten days or every five weeks.

I am going to suggest that the commission consider one or two points in connection with these abandonments. I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) when he states that this should be an area study, and not just a blanket study. If we have the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific running almost side by side, let us decide which of the two shall be discontinued. The commission should look at the effect of sharing branch lines. In other words, where lines complement each other it is cheaper for the Canadian National to go over a Canadian Pacific branch line to their main line. It would be cheaper for the C.P.R. to send their trains out over the C.N.R. branch line to their main line. So it would save everyone money.

Secondly, I want to consider what happens when a branch line is abandoned. Is the steel just left there, are the ties just left there and is the right of way just left there to rot, with weeds growing around it? I think that if the commission were given the facts they would suggest that the steel be taken out, that the ties and roadbed be taken up, and that the mineral rights and right of way should revert either to the province or to the municipality concerned. That is just a suggestion I would make. Because if abandoned lines are just left there, the land is wasted.

All I suggest to the commission is that they take these few points into consideration when giving permission to abandon, say, 20 miles of line.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been encouraged to speak tonight because of the extension of hours. I judge that that is what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) wanted. He wanted to hear from more people with regard to this bill of his in which he takes considerable pride, so—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would have asked to have the hours extended until midnight had I suspected that that would bring the hon. gentleman out.

Mr. Churchill: If the minister interrupts me as he has interrupted almost every speaker up to this point, then what I have to say will be extended. But I like to accommodate the minister. I do not rise to praise him, sir, as many members who spoke earlier in the debate have. I have known him longer than some of the members in this house and I realize that he does better without too much praise. Consequently I will not praise him for his efforts; in fact, during the course of my remarks I will point out some of his deficiencies.

Somewhat left-handedly though I think I should say of our hon. member, who may be transported to another place, that I will miss him if and when that happens.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let's go together.

Mr. Churchill: Just think of the loss to the House of Commons. Nevertheless it is a thought that I will turn over, and perhaps I will consult him about that. I will miss him in the House of Commons because he is a stimulating influence and keeps people, whether they be on the government side or on the opposition side, on their toes, to make sure he is not carrying out some action which deserves a second look. That is rather euphemistically phrased, I think, but I believe the minister will get my idea. I always examine every proposition that the minister makes to the house, every bill that he presents and every question that he brings forward to see where the hidden meaning is. I suggest, sir, that this is the type of activity that keeps people in the House of Commons alert, and for this I pay my compliment to the Minister of Transport.

Now and again he does something I like very much. When he was speaking the other day he commented upon the question of keeping politics out of transportation. He had apparently seen some article in the paper that was critical of this, though I did not see the article myself. The minister gave a defence of politics and said there are two kinds. If I may quote him, he said that there is the one where the house attempts to get some kind of consensus about what will be suitable to bind this country together. The second type of politics was—if I may quote him again—the kind that tempts all of us to see the selfish interests of individuals, groups, or sometimes even of regions above the broader interests of the whole community. I think it is useful for people to understand what is meant by the term "politics", and in this house his first definition would mostly apply.

There is, of course, nothing new about this. The minister is as interested in history as I am and he will not mind if I direct his attention to the situation in the House of Commons on April 11, 1919. At that time the house was discussing transportation and considering a resolution to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company. During the course of the debate on the resolution the leader of the opposition at that time, Daniel D. McKenzie, member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, used these words, to be found at page 1397 of Hansard:

> Politics is the science of government. When people say: "We must take this matter out of politics," they mean that it shall be taken away from patronage, graft, or mismanagement. I am willing that works of this kind shall be taken out of politics in that sense, but I do not agree that the people who own and operate enterprises shall have nothing to say about their management. Politics must exist in public ownership in so far as that involves the fullest possible control by the people.

I draw that to the minister's attention simply to show that he is following in the footsteps of parliamentarians of the past who had a similar idea with regard to the meaning of politics, and the fact that you cannot divorce politics from a consideration of matters of public concern.

When we were summoned to the house some time ago the impression was given both to us and to the public that we had two important and urgent pieces of legislation to put through because a railway strike was going on in the country. Quite obviously the bill to terminate the railway strike which we dealt with last week was of very great urgency, and you can imagine my surprise when during the course of one of those debating days four members of the Liberal party filibustered their own bill. It should have been passed very quickly.

However, it was also indicated that the second bill, this one dealing with transportation, was of great urgency and should be passed with great speed, and I think this was a little misleading. I was not the least bit surprised when I read in some column in one of the papers that the Minister of Transport had dreamed up an idea.

He considered that this would be a great opportunity, with the house meeting under urgent conditions, to compel or urge the House of Commons to pass in double quick time his pet bill—this one on transportation—and linking it up with the railway strike to give the idea across the country that the two bills went together, and that one could not pass without the other. Then the House of Commons, seized of this urgency, would immediately pass those bills, and the minister would be very happy.

We discovered after we assembled here, began to discuss the railway strike bill, and had a look at the present Bill No. C-231 dealing with transportation problems, that although initially it might pass before the House of Commons very, very quickly, nevertheless it would require weeks, if not months, of intensive study by way of committee before it would come back to the house for final approval. So the urgency of the second bill was not anything like as great as pointed out to us, or as we were given to believe before parliament assembled.

Relating that fact to my earlier remarks about the stimulating influence of the Minister of Transport on the House of Commons, one can understand why I examined very carefully the situation that confronted us. I think the article in one of the newspapers was fairly accurate when it said that this situation gave the minister an opportunity to get rapid consideration of a bill under what was almost a pretence that it was essential to do so at this time, because of the railway strike legislation.

We now know that even if this bill were passed very quickly at this stage, and considered by committee very quickly, it would not alter the financial position of the railways for the year 1966. We know from our experience here that the bill will not pass through all the stages very quickly, and it would be very unwise if it did, because ever so many organizations, in addition to the provincial governments, will wish to make representations.

[Mr. Churchill.]

During the course of his speech the other day the Minister of Transport told us this:

I like to think there is a sense of urgency about this legislation that has not existed at any time since the MacPherson report was received.

I consider that this is a spurious sense of urgency. The urgency has been present with the minister and his colleagues for over three years. Why the minister failed to act after he withdrew his railway legislation in 1964, until September of this year, escapes me. What was he doing for over two years with his transportation legislation? Quite a bit of the early work had been done by his predecessor, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), who was then minister of transport. Yet, well over two years elapsed before the minister was seized with a sense of urgency which happened to coincide with a railway strike and with a special session of parliament. This is the stimulating influence that this minister has on the House of Commons, and this is how he leads some people down the garden path.

Then, not content with that, when he was entertaining the House of Commons the other evening while speaking, he said something about hoping that there would be—and these are his words——a relatively brief general debate on second reading.

Earlier we had conceded a point for the minister, and had passed the resolution stage without debate. Not content with that he wanted a brief discussion on second reading.

We have reached the stage of what I now call instant legislation. Everything has to be done the day before yesterday, and I rise in protest against this attitude of mind which wants everything done before you have even time to consider it. If there is one bill which should not be classed as instant legislation, it is the bill presently before us. It has taken the government years to prepare it. It has taken the present minister over two years to get it ready. Its ramifications, as pointed out by many speakers, are profound and will affect our country for many years to come. This is not a bill which should be subjected to this new fangled idea of instant legislation.

Mr. Winkler: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) this evening on the national broadcasting network blamed the opposition for pushing everything through the house too hastily.

Mr. Churchill: I find myself co-operating now with the Minister of Finance. I am glad that he does not agree with the Minister of Transport. The Minister of Finance wants this bill to be considered very carefully. I suggest to my colleagues that they should take note of that fact and make preparations to speak tomorrow on this bill, in order to accommodate both ministers.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the hon. gentleman a question? He was flattering enough to quote my reference to a relatively brief general debate on second reading, perhaps unwisely observing things in retrospect. Would he be kind enough to quote the last part of that same paragraph on page 7998 of Hansard?

Mr. Churchill: I have never found that putting the minister's words in speeches of mine does any good at all, and I do not know why I should give him additional publicity by repeating some of his badly phrased sentences. I think I will just leave it there, for everybody to read. He has drawn attention to the fact that he made that remark on September 1, 1966, at page 7998. I record that in Hansard for the edification of the next generation of parliamentarians.

I want to comment on some other matters that the minister mentioned, before dealing with certain general aspects of the bill. As I say, I realize the damage I am doing to my speech by quoting the minister's words, but I want to be fair to him. At page 7991 of Hansard, in the second column, when he is dealing with the very large board that he is setting up, he uses these words:

> I have reached the conclusion that one of the most important things of all is to have one unified organ of government divorced from any of these different modes of transport which would look at all of them, compare one with another and, when considering the regulation of one, would take account of what was happening in the other fields.

And so on.

Now the minister has been affected by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) and he wants to put everything together. I am surprised he did not use the word "integration". He has got the word "unified" in, anyway. He wants to unify, and so he set up a board. He has integrated three boards. He has put them together and added four members, one of whom will be the head. He is appointing a czar, and he is going to have an organization similar to that of the Minister of National Defence, with a chief of staff under the minister.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I am sorry he has been infected by this desire to unify everything. The Minister of Transport did not tell us, though he is much more frank about these matters than is the Minister of National Defence why the system now proposed will be better than the present arrangement. There may be some value attached to integrating various boards. The strange thing I noticed when I looked over the bill was this, that having integrated the boards, the hon. gentleman then separated them again. They are to carry on their present functions and, from time to time—it is not very clear as to when this will happen—they are to assemble together and compare notes. So we will have a body of experts on maritime affairs, and a body of experts on railway freight rates, and a body of experts on air transport trying to have a meeting of minds. I do not think this is likely to work at all. I believe we are better off under the present arrangement whereby these specialists advise the minister. He can call them together and say: Gentlemen, our national policy is such and such; in your particular field you do not meet requirements of these other boards and I wish to reach a consensus here and arrive at a modification of policy.

This, I would think, is the function of a Minister of Transport. It is for this that the minister exists. But the hon. gentleman has delegated that authority to a very large board and put a man at the head of it who will have tremendous powers. That is his excursion into unification.

I wish to comment now, on something else which I think should be corrected in the minister's thinking and in subsequent speeches he makes. The following appears on page 7991 of Hansard. I will quote most of the paragraph—this will really please the hon. gentleman:

> I do not think anything illustrates this more clearly than what has happened in the seven years since 1959. In those seven years, on three occasions, however this may have been disguised, the greater part of the increased wage bill of the Canadian railways has been passed on to the taxpayers of Canada—$20 million in 1959, $50 million in 1961 and another $20 million in 1966.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a misprint. I thank the hon. gentleman for drawing attention to it. It should be $30 million. He will find that it does not add up properly and I would not like it to be thought that I cannot add.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You know, sir, that escaped me. That was not what I had in mind. But I am glad to help the minister correct Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have already done that.

Mr. Churchill: I continue to quote:

> So we are now paying out of the treasury $100 million a year.

What I think is wrong—and I appeal to the better nature of the Minister of Transport which, from time to time, I recognize—is this: I think it is wrong to suggest that the greater part of the increased wage bill of the Canadian railways has been passed on directly to the taxpayers. The suggestion here is that a subsidy of $100 million a year is solely related to wages from 1959 to 1966.

Mr. Pickersgill: So it was.

Mr. Churchill: Why is it not related to other operating costs? Surely in that period from 1959 to 1966 the men working for our railways were entitled to increases in their wages, just as many others in Canada have received increases in their wages. Why do we say this is paying the wage bill? Are we sure it is not paying the cost of extra locomotives or freight cars, or the repair of trackage or something like that? I do not think it is fair to the men who operate our railways to saddle them with the statement that this amount of money paid out of the treasury over the period of seven years has all gone towards their wage increases.

Mr. Pickersgill: It just happens to be a historical fact. The first $20 million was paid as a result of the wage increase of 1959. The second payment in 1961, was disguised by the hon. gentleman's friends who said they were awaiting the MacPherson report and that they would pay the extra wage bill in the meantime. In the case of the 1964 increase we did not disguise it. That is a historical fact, whether it is fair or unfair. All I am saying is that we really must try to enable railways to earn enough to pay their men so that we do not have to saddle the taxpayers with these costs.

Mr. Churchill: The minister is now smuggling words into my speech which I did not put there. My point is this: The minister could rightly draw attention to the fact that in 1959, 1961 and 1966 additional moneys were paid the railways in order that they might remain in operation. But it is not necessary to say that these additional moneys are directly attributable to increased wages. That is my point.

Of course, it was in that area that there was trouble, and when the issue finally came before the government it centred on a wage dispute. So it is natural to say: Oh, well, this money is for wages. I have sympathy with management but I also have some understanding of those who operate the railways. Why are not wages regarded as an initial charge on revenue, and why cannot any deficit incurred be attributed to something else? Cannot the C.N.R. come here and say—as they do, from time to time: Our operating costs are so much, and they include everything, wages as well; we cannot maintain our trackage, and we need additional funds. That is all I am saying. I do not think we should continue to suggest that the sums of money which have gone to the railways from the treasury over this long period should be linked solely with wages.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He was a responsible minister when $70 million of that $100 million was paid to the railways. About 40 per cent of it was paid to the C.P.R. This is now a matter of history and I do not think the hon. gentleman would be breaking any cabinet confidences. Would he tell us why the government of which he was a member gave this huge handout to the C.P.R.? Would it be to buy locomotives?

Mr. Churchill: We have come back to the minister's definition of politics. He is indulging in a type of politics which he defined in the second part of his phraseology. He says partisanship. I was rising above that. I hope, on the minister's transmission to the other place, that he will rise above this petty partisanship he is talking about.

• (9:10 p.m.)

I fully realize what happened in those years when we were in government, and the troubles over railway matters. I was mixed up in them to a very considerable extent. I took a great interest in the problems of railways and the problems of freight rates.

I do not know whether I should quote any more of the minister's speech, although I think it pleases him. He went on to deal with rates and the abandonment of lines and things of that nature, but I shall spare the house any more of his words.

I should like to direct the attention of the house to something else along general lines. The minister has made a great deal out of the fact that he is now declaring a national transportation policy. One would have thought there had not been such a policy in the past, but of course there has always been a transportation policy for Canada, and it has to be modified from time to time.

In 1919 when they were incorporating the Canadian National Railways the gentlemen who then occupied this chamber discussed matters of policy. They said what they were then doing was bringing in a policy of public ownership, taking over privately owned railway lines, incorporating them into the Canadian National Railways, assuming the financial obligations, and naming a board of directors to run the Canadian National Railways as a crown corporation. They said that the policy then being adopted was one of public ownership. Therefore if the minister is going to give us a definition of national policy he should include historically some of the things that happened in the past.

What was the transportation policy in the years when the C.P.R. was being established? What was the transportation policy when the various privately owned lines were assembled together to make the C.N.R.? That policy holds to this day, but the minister has not incorporated that in his statement. But with a bit of fanfare he gives us a national transportation policy, and in it he treats us to the platitude that an economic and efficient transportation system, making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest cost, is essential to the well-being and growth of Canada. There is nothing new about that. I do not think the minister dreamt that up himself.

Then he suggests, in his declaration of national policy, three matters that should be considered. He mentions regulation with due regard to the national interest, each mode of transportation bearing a fair proportion of the real costs of resources and facilities provided at public expense, and compensation for each mode of transportation for facilities and services that it is required to provide as an imposed public duty. This, he says, constitutes Canada's national transportation policy; but I do not think it is comprehensive enough.

Several hon. members have dealt with the interpretation of the words "national interest." It would be rather difficult to define the national interest. It appears differently to different people and to different areas of the country. I am speaking tonight as a representative of the province of Manitoba, and what is good for Manitoba is good for Canada. That is the national interest because we are a wealth producing province and if we are strong and wealthy all Canada benefits. I suppose every province in Canada could say the same thing, but when a minister considers that as breaking new ground in announcing a national transportation policy he should enlarge it and make it complete and comprehensive. I think he should have added that no area of Canada should bear a disproportionate share of freight rates.

This is what has concerned people in western Canada for many years. This was my concern in 1958 and 1959 when we were faced with another horizontal increase after I don't know how many had been imposed since the end of the war. As a representative from western Canada and the province of Manitoba I was naturally disturbed that this would happen. As a result of the situation at that time grants were made, always with the hope that they would be temporary. But they never are, and subsequently the MacPherson commission was appointed to make a full investigation and to give us the facts.

On the question of national transportation policy I think that the minister has not done justice to the ability which resides in him and to the advice he might be able to receive from his competent officials. How people are going to interpret national interest when they are dealing with the regulation of modes of transport will be an interesting controversy to observe. A 17-man transport board is going to determine some of these matters in relation to the national interest, and the national interest may differ depending on individuals and where people live.

When he was urging us to have a short debate and pass second reading, the minister suggested that there were two principles in the bill, and if we voted for it on second reading all we would be approving was that there should be a Canadian Transport Commission and that there should be railway rationalization. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) immediately pointed out that there was a third matter, the matter of rate making.

When we come to the point of deciding whether or not to vote for this bill on second reading, which is approval in principle of the bill, are we just to accept the bland assurance of the minister that we have only those two things to decide and that our votes are just with regard to those two matters? I say we have to include the one stressed by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would not agree that the question of appropriate freight rates is obviously an aspect of rationalization?

Mr. Churchill: Of course, and I hope we get appropriate freight rates; but I think this is the major concern. When you are asking people who have felt the pressure of freight rates over the years to vote in favour of this bill on second reading, you are asking a great deal if they have not yet received all the information that should be made available to them.

• (9:20 p.m.)

That is why we on this side of the house have repeatedly requested that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the committee before we are asked to vote on second reading. One can become trapped as a result of a vote on second reading.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman another question? He has been very courteous about answering my queries. In 1964 I yielded to exactly the same request and sent the subject matter of a bill, which had provisions very similar to these with regard to freight rates, to a committee. There was an exhaustive examination made by that parliamentary committee, which heard representatives from all over the country, as a result of which certain modifications were made as represented in the present bill. May I ask the hon. gentleman how many times this same process has to be carried out before we can get on with the job that the hon. member's leader promised to do, when he was in power within six months of the time the 1960 bill to keep the railwaymen at work was passed?

Mr. Churchill: There is no question about the fact that the government of which I was a member made improvements to the legislation, because the minister constantly refers to them. The minister can certainly look to our term in office as an example for his government to follow.

I recall that the subject matter of the 1964 bill was referred to the committee for study; but what is wrong with that? If that was done in 1964 and it proved to be helpful, as the minister has said it was, why should we not follow that practice again? The minister has now enlarged the bill, provided for another board and declared a national transportation policy. Conditions have altered materially in the past two years. I suggest that these conditions should be re-examined and that the subject matter of this bill should be sent to a committee. Perhaps once again improvements will be suggested. The minister admits that improvements were made as a result of the committee examination in 1964. That was a good procedure to follow then and I suggest it should be repeated now.

I object to the sense of urgency the minister has imported into this discussion by his suggestion that we should get on with this business now. I am opposed to this kind of instant legislation. When we do things rapidly in this house we are doing things in a hurried and stupid manner.

Mr. Pickersgill: Six years have passed since your leader promised legislation of this kind.

Mr. Churchill: We received the reports of the MacPherson commission in the summer of 1962 and we produced a bill and put it on the order paper. I well remember the session of 1962-63 when we were not able to persuade the opposition to be anything like as co-operative as the present opposition is. This opposition has been sustaining this government for over three years. Were it not for the efforts of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his supporters the present government would find itself in worse trouble than it has been in during the past three years. Who was it that saved the situation last week but the Leader of the Opposition, with the support of his colleagues and the members of the New Democratic Party? Canada's greatest blunderers are sitting over on that side of the house.

All the information attendant upon the preparation of the MacPherson report and the bill which followed has been available to the present, unfortunately incompetent government which Canada selected in 1963. Three and a half years have elapsed between the time of the election of this government and the presentation of the bill now before us. The minister now says: Let us get on with this bill, which should have been dealt with yesterday. I say there is no need for haste and that if we move too quickly we may make mistakes. We have found out from bitter experience that mistakes can be made when parliament moves too hurriedly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: I thought you would take pity on me, Mr. Speaker, in view of the many interruptions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the hon. gentleman that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Churchill: I am sure that I could conclude my remarks by nine thirty, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give its unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman should have another round.

Mr. Churchill: Let me conclude my remarks then with this sentence. I hope that those who follow me will ask the Minister of Transport to indicate the hidden features of this bill. Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) will come into the house and advise us about the hidden features of this bill. What must we take on trust, and what is being concealed from us? What do we not understand about this bill that is clear to everyone else? Perhaps my colleagues will pursue that line of thought.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman seriously expect anyone to tell him what he does not understand?

Mr. Churchill: There is so very little I do not understand it would be a waste of your time to point it out.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that most of the members of this house wanted to take part in the debate last week in respect of the emergency legislation dealing with the railway strike. We refrained from doing so because of our desire to expedite matters pertaining to the critical situation which faced Canada. Like my colleague, that hon. member from the keystone province of Manitoba, I am grateful to the minister for making it possible to extend our normal hours of sitting tonight so that as many members as possible can speak. I think it is particularly important for members from the province of Manitoba to speak on this bill, because that province, more than any other, is very deeply concerned with and involved in national transportation problems.

As I understand the situation the government has linked this bill with the one highlighted by the discussion last week, in an attempt to provide a complete approach to the problem of rail transportation. It has been suggested that the legislation now before us has been designed to rationalize not only rail transportation policy, but transportation policy generally in this country, in an attempt to avoid the periodic crises which have rocked the nation and this house. Perhaps these crises have occurred in part as a result of the failure of parliament to deal adequately with the revolutionary changes which have taken place in the Canadian economy over the past few decades.

It is unfortunate that we must debate this matter in an atmosphere of crisis. I shall not be discouraged in any way during my participation in this debate tonight by the government's attempt to carry over the atmosphere of crisis that existed last week. Having endeavoured to interpret this bill, having attended the special seminar that was set up to enlighten members of the house, and having listened to the comments of those individuals who are most knowledgeable about railway matters in this country, it is my opinion that this bill in no way resolves the problem that precipitated the crisis which necessitated the recalling of parliament for this special emergency session.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The authority, of course, for that statement, as has been quoted several times during the debate, is the president of the C.P.R., Mr. Sinclair, who made the statement that the legislation contemplated makes no advances and gives the railways nothing that does not already exist in the present legislation under which railways operate in this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: So far as 1966 is concerned.

Mr. Dinsdale: As far as 1966 is concerned—and I think we are dealing with the year 1966. If it does not meet the problem in 1966, with the rapid processes of social and economic change in the country I would conclude it would be even more out of touch with reality in the ensuing years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member does recognize that the increase in wages for 1966
