Indeed this bill is entitled:

An act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

Therefore this means that the province or provinces have a duty or an obligation to have medical care plans of their own. And then the federal government, in the spirit of Bill No. C-227, will contribute towards the cost of insured services.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) should have introduced his bill this afternoon for an immediate increase in old age pension benefits in Canada. Inquiries coming from all parts of the country ask when the government intends to put its old age security program into practice, and we are unable to give them a definite date.

The minister was telling me this afternoon that it would be introduced during the present session. The present session will come to a close around Christmas time, until then our old age pensioners will still be getting only $75 a month. And the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) was telling us, the other day, that we were presently going through a very difficult period, an inflation era where the cost of living is continuously rising at an appreciable rate. But our pensioners must be content with a meagre $75 per month allowance, with which to face this increase.

It seems to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have shown objectivity, wisdom, and better understanding if he had asked us at the beginning of the present sitting to begin consideration of the bill to raise old age pensions to $105 a month. for those in need. But no; the minister tells us: we will study the bill entitled:

An act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

Mr. Speaker, I said it a little earlier; we still have two years before the coming into force of that scheme or that federal contribution to the provinces. In passing, allow me to say that the federal government will conribute to the costs incurred by the provinces to the extent that it has received from them money collected from taxes imposed on the working public, in short on the population of those provinces. It will contribute only after such taxation.

If through Bill No. C-227 we are to pay for a bureaucracy here in Ottawa, which will determine the amounts which the federal government will contribute to the cost of insured services provided by the provinces and if we have, on top of that, another provincial bureaucracy which sees or will see to the administration and application of a medicare insurance plan, then we will double the expenditures and the administration costs. In my opinion, that is what I find illogical. If the federal government must get those funds from the provinces' treasury to be able later, after having paid its bureaucracy, its administration, to give what is left to the provinces, it would be better if it withdrew completely from such schemes and left the provinces to administer themselves, which is what several provinces have asked in many cases.

Today, the Conservatives moved the following amendment:

This house, while of the opinion that provision should be made for medical services to be available to all Canadians at an adequate level on a prepaid basis, is nevertheless of the further opinion that no legislation for the provision of insured medical care services in Canada will be satisfactory unless it:

(a) secures co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada.

That is precisely what has not been settled at this time. Federal-provincial conferences are held, in Ottawa or elsewhere, and the provinces object to one scheme or another submitted by the federal government; they insist on their autonomy. The province of Alberta protested against the interference of the federal government in the field of medical insurance. British Columbia did the same thing. The province of Quebec also objects to the federal government interfering in the field of health.

Mr. Haidasz: Why?

Mr. Caouette: The province of Ontario—because we want precisely to preserve our freedoms and respect the autonomy of every province in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, before the federal government introduced its bill to help the provinces or suggest to them the establishment of a medicare plan, some provinces already had set up such plans within their respective boundaries.

As a matter of fact, in La Presse of January 22, 1965, the following item appeared:

Health insurance scheme in British Columbia.

The Social Credit government of British Columbia laid down yesterday the broad lines of a health insurance scheme for the benefit of low income groups which will be operated by private insurance companies.

This announcement constitutes the main feature of the speech from the throne read by the lieutenant governor, Mr. George Pearkes, at the opening of the 2nd session of the 27th legislature of that province.

Almost two years ago.

The plan entails an optional test of personal incomes. . .

An optional test, rather than a compulsory one, whereas the federal plan will be compulsory.

The plan implies an optional test of personal incomes and is meant to help those who are not entitled to social welfare but who, on account of their very low income are unable to pay the entire cost of medicare.

Naturally, the provincial leader of the New Democratic Party objected to that bill alleging that it was a surrender to the physicians and that the scheme could be a surrender to private insurance companies.

Mr. Speaker, has the N.D.P. in Saskatchewan made such a great success of its medicare scheme when physicians refused to co-operate with the government? Has the N.D.P. government not been compelled to respect the physician's freedom and to take into account the fact that a human being is more important than a governmental scheme, be it medical or otherwise? Has the government not been compelled to retreat and reconsider its legislation?

They did not have to, either in British Columbia or in Alberta. Why? Because they respect the freedom of the individual, the freedom of everyone, the freedom of the physician and patient, the freedom of the human person, and this is the cause to which Social Credit supporters across Canada are dedicated.

Mr. Speaker, nobody in Canada is more anxious that the members of the Ralliement Créditiste to see that every Canadian gets medical care when he needs it. It is unthinkable that in 1966, at this very moment, Mr. Speaker, every Canadian cannot enjoy the security of obtaining medical care when he is ill, in hospital, or in need of a doctor. It is unacceptable and inadmissible that this should exist in a wealthy country like Canada. Nobody denies the physical potentialities of Canada, but, on the other hand, everybody fears and dreads the financial potentialities, precisely because we are tackling things which should not be touched while financiers get away with exploiting Canada.

If, instead of telling us the medicare plan will be put into effect in 1968 only, the minister had said: We shall stop paying interests on the national debt in order to fight inflation. And the minister could have suggested that the provinces attend to the insurance plan and agreed to provide them with the amounts of money required to meet those expenses in their own territory; but not a plan with a yoke, one that degrades, that is a breach of individual freedom, that compels a patient to choose or take compulsorily the government's doctor, as will be the case and as is the case in certain socialist countries.

I can understand, Mr. Speaker, that medical care can be provided in socialist and communist countries, but not through doctors chosen by the individual, no, but chosen and paid by the government. That is what we will be coming to with legislation of this kind.

What have we, the Créditistes been asking for, ever since we have been in this house? Since 1962, we have been talking about a health dividend for each and every citizen of Canada; we are urging the government to guarantee payment of the annual premium of a group insurance policy for a married person and for a single dependent person having to earn a living.

Mr. Speaker, under a group insurance or health dividend program, such as the Créditistes suggest, the government gives a coupon to each family head in Canada. Once a year, the government gives a coupon to every single person in Canada. These coupons may be used only for the purchase of a group insurance policy covering hospitalization, medical care and all other medical services for all Canadian citizens.

A family head would go with his coupon to the insurance company of his choice, either Sun Life, Crown Life, Société des Artisans or Solidarité. All those companies sell group insurance. There is group insurance in private industry. In my own business, my employees, their wives and children are covered by group insurance. Now, the family head chooses his plan. If he chooses a more expensive plan than the one offered by the government, the family head covers the difference. The same thing applies in the case of a bachelor, but the family head, as well as the bachelor is still free to choose. One chooses the company offering the best group insurance plan. In the field of car dealers, at one time we choose an insurance company, and a rival company offered us a better plan. A third one came and offered an even better plan. We have always chosen the best plan, the one offering the best guarantees and advantages for the money.

Mr. Speaker, it would be the same at the national level. The head of the family would choose the right insurance company and group insurance plan for his wife and his children and himself. The whole family without exception would then have both medical and hospital insurance. At the same time, we could substitute for the present government hospitalization scheme a hospital insurance plan allowing the patient to make the decision, instead of the government deciding for the patient, as is often the case today, and telling him: This is the room you must take. Even the name of the patient is forgotten. He is given a number, patient No. 438, patient No. 32, patient No. 12, patient No. 8. The human person does not count any more, he is only a number which the government can transfer from place to place, from one hospital to another, in the province of Quebec as in other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the health dividend is a solution which would cost the government less than the present hospital insurance plan and the medical insurance programs advocated in Bill No. C-227.

Bill No. C-227 does not provide for the total payment of costs. Under this bill, the government will pay part of the costs of insured medical care services incurred by the provinces.

The province of Alberta tells the federal government: we do not need you, our plan is fine. The province of Quebec tells the federal government: do not meddle in our affairs, we are the ones who will deal with this.

And now the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) tells us: No, you do not want us to, but we will help you nevertheless. How? With taxes levied in the province of Quebec and in the other provinces. That is why the premier of Quebec shouted during the last provincial election campaign: give us back one hundred per cent of the personal income tax and one hundred per cent of the corporation income tax. Give us back the funds that you take from us and we will be able to manage.

In my opinion, Premier Johnson of the province of Quebec is justified in demanding one hundred per cent of the personal income tax. At this time, by introducing an act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services in the province of Quebec and in every other province the federal government admits that the premier of the province of Quebec is right.

Let us figure out how much the federal government will pay to the province of Quebec.

A tremendous amount of money will be needed for administration costs alone, and it will come out of income taxes collected in the province. Why not let the province use that money to implement its program and leave it up to the province to decide whether to have a socialistic program or one where people will be free. There is all the difference in the world between a plan imposed by a government and a plan selected by an individual. It is a different thing altogether. Our preference goes to the health-dividend medical plan as selected by the Canadian, the citizen, the human person, and not to a plan imposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, by the federal government or by the provincial government.

We want freedom of choice for everyone. There is none among us here, in parliament, who does not want to keep that freedom. And we, freedom-lovers, are going to pass a legislation which will place under a yoke, our fellow-citizens who are as intelligent as anyone among us, who also want to choose and have freedom of choice.

We will listen to all members who will speak on Bill No. C-227; but I want to say, before resuming my seat, that we of the Ralliement Créditiste will require a system of health dividend respecting the freedom of choice, in preference to a yoke-type medical assistance as called for by socialists and suggested now by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes have a solution, but the Liberals do not have one, nor the Conservatives, with their meaningless amendment over which we will not linger. We will continue to call for respect of the human person in Canada.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the bill which we now have before us, Bill C-227, brings to our attention a matter of great importance and one which has been under discussion on many platforms and in many forums across the country for a number of years. While very few if any would question the need for some definite plan under which the best medical care is made available to every person requiring it, there is a wide divergence of opinion concerning the best and most effective way to achieve that objective. I suppose in this regard most people would fall into one of two categories; first, those who support the idea of a government sponsored, government operated, compulsory health insurance program or, on the other hand, a voluntary plan with government assistance for those who cannot afford to provide health insurance for themselves.

The plan presented by the government, while recognizing the principle of provincial autonomy, as indicated on the front of the bill where it says it is an act "to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada towards the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medicare insurance plans," in actual fact dictates the type and the scope of the plan which is acceptable to meet the eligibility conditions.

We appreciate the fact, Mr. Speaker, that certain changes have been or will be made in the bill. As the minister indicated, there will be a measure of flexibility written into the bill, or recognized, but I believe that in spite of this the provinces still are coerced into compliance with requirements which, in their view, may be neither necessary nor desirable but which, unless accepted, would deprive them of assistance in financing their medical care insurance programs.

It is true that a province can refrain from participation in this particular program, but in so doing it still would contribute in the form of taxes to the implementation of the plan in other provinces in other parts of Canada. Therefore as I said, although there have been some rather fundamental changes promised in this legislation, these do not go far enough to remove some of the more obvious features which are obnoxious to various provincial governments and which I understand will not be accepted by them.

In looking at the measure before us, I think there are some commendable factors involved. First of all, there is recognition of the fact that health is not just a personal concern or a personal asset, but is a national concern and a national asset as well. There is no question but that illness is a personal loss; it brings hardship to the individual and to his family. It is however a national loss, in that that individual is not able to make the contribution in productive enterprise and in various social activities which go to make up our national life.

I think there is recognition as well of another principle; that is, that Canadian citizens should have within their reach, regardless of any financial considerations or obstacles, the very best in medical care which science has made possible. We stand amazed when we contemplate the advances which have taken place over the past few years in medical science as well as in other sciences. But what is the use of advances in medical science if people are not able to avail themselves of the benefits? Therefore I believe we must ensure that the children of our nation may have the health care necessary to the development of sound and strong bodies. We believe that families must not be fettered for their lifetime by medical bills which pile up and are beyond their ability to discharge. We believe the aged among us must not be deprived of those medical services required in their declining years. I say that regardless of the financial standard. I believe these services must be brought within their reach and must be made available to them whenever they are required.

I believe there is another principle involved here; that is, that society as a whole must assume collective responsibility to provide good medical services to those who, for a variety of reasons, are unable to provide it for themselves. In other words we recognize the fact that there always will be individuals in our society who, for various reasons, cannot be gainfully employed and are unable to earn sufficient money even to take care of the necessities of life, so far as food is concerned. Certainly when it comes down to the matter of medical attention they will never be able to meet the challenge or the need in this particular area of their lives. Therefore society collectively must recognize this fact and assume some responsibility therein.

Having said that I want to make it abundantly clear that we in the Social Credit party support the principle of a medical care plan. In stating that, however, I am not saying we are in support of or in agreement with every clause, line or word in the present bill. I believe it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said his party would support this measure on the understanding that they would be supporting it as it now is, and not as it may be amended. Of course when we vote on second reading we are voting for the principle of the bill which is, as I have pointed out, the authorization of the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by the provinces, pursuant to medical insurance plans. As I said, while supporting the principle we do not support unreservedly all the various clauses contained therein.

Let me place on record, if I may, part of a statement made by the leader of our party on July 12 in respect of this matter. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) stated at that time, as reported in Hansard at page 7563:

> Mr. Chairman, in commenting on this resolution, which is a preliminary to the medicare legislation that has been talked about by the government now for such a long period of time, I should like to say that we in the Social Credit party are in complete agreement with the proposition advanced by the minister that every Canadian citizen and every Canadian family, regardless of financial status or any other classification that might be applied, must have full access to the highest quality, comprehensive health care possible, according to physical or mental needs. This is a basic principle, and I think we, not only as members of this house but as members of society as a whole, must assure every Canadian citizen and every Canadian family that it will be achieved.

I believe that sets out very clearly the position of our group in respect of the principle of the measure before us tonight.

Let me also refer to a brief presented by the province of British Columbia to the plenary session of the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa on May 31, 1965. On page 4 there is a section dealing with comprehensive medical services, and it states in part:

> British Columbia endorses, without reservation, the introduction of comprehensive medical services for all Canadians as soon as possible and irrespective of ability to pay, provided that the government of Canada will share 50 per cent of the costs. The government of British Columbia stands ready to bear the other 50 per cent of the required public expenditure to ensure adequate health services to all provincial residents. British Columbia recommends that these financial sharing arrangements be accepted by the government of Canada for early implementation. Details of health services to be provided can then be promptly completed by the appropriate departments of our respective governments.

As I pointed out, we in the Social Credit party are in full support of the principle enunciated in Bill C-227. I indicated that while supporting the principle of the bill we are not suggesting we are in full support of every provision.

Four principles have been laid down by the government which provincial governments must meet in order to qualify under the provisions of this legislation. First, they must provide comprehensive medical coverage; second, it must be universal; third, it must be operated by a government agency, and fourth, it must be portable between provinces.

In dealing with these various qualifications laid down I think we must recognize that there are some changes which have been proposed or placed in the measure by the government. First, the plan must be operated by a government agency. It seems to me there has been some flexibility introduced in this particular provision, and even though it has not been accepted or approved by some individual members of the house, I believe it is a very wise provision or concession, in that it does not necessarily mean it must be operated by a government agency, but by one recognized and approved by a provincial administration.

As far as the test of comprehensiveness is concerned, I do not think it has been met because there are certain classes of medical services that are and will not be included. No provision is made for dental services or for services of chiropractors. As was pointed out today, the costs of an optometrist will not be covered by the provisions of this measure. I do not think therefore that we can say this is a comprehensive measure. Many medical or health requirements are not covered, and it would seem to me that if we are to enter into a plan such as this it must cover all those services required by the people of our country.

As far as the matter of universality is concerned, we do believe there has been a certain flexibility introduced in that for the first two years there must be coverage for 90 per cent of the insurable residents of a province, and thereafter 95 per cent. Perhaps there should be changes made in this regard lowering the desired coverage in the introductory period to perhaps 80 per cent or 85 per cent. If this were done I think it would encourage the provinces which already have health care services or medical plans to integrate their plans with the federal plan, and in other ways meet the qualifications laid down.

The feature of portability is desirable, and we are pleased to note that when a person moves from one province to another he will be covered by the insurance of the province from which he has moved until he qualifies for coverage in the province to which he has moved. There has been some criticism about the statement regarding this principle of flexibility as introduced in the measure. I believe flexibility is absolutely necessary to ensure provincial co-operation.

Perhaps there will have to be further changes made if the minister really intends to meet the insurance needs of provinces so that they will be encouraged to enter into this program. Flexibility is desirable as well to accommodate provincial plans already in operation. It has been pointed out, charged or alleged that the government has retreated. It is often said that retreats are necessary to win wars and perhaps that is the case here. The government may have to make further changes to meet the wishes of provincial administrations who, after all, have the major responsibility for providing health services to the people of their communities.

Hon. members who have spoken today have mentioned various features which are absolutely necessary if a health plan is to be successfully implemented. I am not going to enlarge on them or even enumerate them, but I think the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) covered them very thoroughly when he referred to the necessity for trained personnel, training facilities, hospital facilities and all the other things that are absolutely essential if a medical care plan is to be effectively administered and meet the needs of the people of our nation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that an intensive program is required to prepare for the effective implementation of the proposed medical care plan.

I understand that the principle of the bill is financial participation with the provinces in the provision of medical care insurance for all citizens of Canada. The measure now before us is considerably different from that which was first contemplated by the government. I believe that when we reach committee stage further changes will be suggested and I trust they will be accepted by the government.

I do not propose to say anything further at this time, Mr. Speaker, except to point out that we agree there are measures which are far more important at the moment than is the legislation we are now considering. The government has already indicated that this program will not become operative until July 1, 1968. What about the old age pension legislation that has been predicted? The government has already said that legislation will be introduced to assist in meeting the needs of the senior citizens of this country. Why, in the name of common sense, do they not bring that legislation in rather than this measure which will not become effective for another year and a half? I remember another occasion on which the government got its priorities all confused and mixed up, and as a result the activities of this house were hamstrung for weeks and weeks. It may be that the government hopes to gain some political advantage from bringing in this legislation at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, I don't think so!

Mr. Patterson: I doubt that it will have this effect. I suggest that countless citizens of Canada would have very much appreciated the government's saying: This legislation will not be implemented for another year and a half; therefore we will proceed with measures that are more urgent and place in a prior position legislation which is so important to the senior citizens of this country.

What about the unification program of the armed forces? This is something that will be implemented in the very near future. I am not arguing for or against unification of the armed forces at the moment, but I say that if this program is to be implemented this fall or early next year, and the medical care plan will not be implemented for a year after that, why give this measure priority over that with regard to the unification of the forces?

I believe the government has erred seriously in bringing this measure before the house and giving it prior position on the agenda when there are other measures that will have an immediate beneficial effect in our country, once they are dealt with. As I have said, we support the principle of the bill but trust its provisions will be changed when it reaches committee stage in the house.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to this debate will be brief. I had an opportunity to speak to the principle of medicare when the resolution was before the house some weeks ago. I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on having responded to the requests and submissions of the members of his party, supporters of the government, to introduce the feature of flexibility with respect to the implementation date of this measure. The minister referred to this flexibility today. There are members of this house who would be so intractable as to destroy the program because it was not identical with their particular idea of what it should be.

Mr. Orlikow: It is your idea.

Mr. Stanbury: There are others who might run away from this problem and destroy themselves. I should like to pay tribute to a minister who is strong enough and courageous enough to bring into this house a bill in which he believes and one which this country needs, even if it does not completely satisfy all of us in the house.

It is no secret to the house that many members of the Liberal party, supporters of the government, were disappointed at the necessity, as the government saw it, of postponing the implementation date for medicare, but I am grateful that the government has responded to the representations of its own members and has introduced the feature of flexibility which might permit this program to be implemented before July 1, 1968. This bill makes perfectly clear the commitment of the government and I hope that when it is passed, as I am sure it will be, it will make clear the commitment of the Canadian people to the goal of making health services equally accessible to all Canadians wherever they live, whatever their income or disability might be.

When the resolution was being discussed in the house I expressed some puzzlement at the position being taken by the official opposition.

I admitted to some uncertainty as to whether the principle of this bill was being supported or rejected by the official opposition. I received assurances at that time that the official opposition had had in its platform for some time a program of medicare, and wholeheartedly supported the principle of this bill.

When the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) began his remarks today I thought he was confirming that resolve on behalf of the official opposition, to see that medicare was introduced at the earliest possible moment. The hon. member began by asking, "Why not July 1, 1967?" Indeed, I might have asked the same question a few weeks ago. But he went on to tell us all the reasons why medicare could not be implemented in the foreseeable future in the view of the official opposition, and concluded by moving an amendment to the bill which even a novice parliamentarian like myself knows does not have any effect but to kill the bill. Is that the intention of the official opposition —to kill medicare?

Mr. Fulton: Yes—this bill which has been killed by the government already.

Mr. Stanbury: Apparently that is so.

Mr. Webb: It is to get it going.

Mr. Fulton: Why not bury it?

Mr. Stanbury: Now I come to the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Knowles: North Centre.

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I appreciate the credit he gave to me as one of the proponents of medicare. But I must say I was very disappointed at his remarks because it seemed to me that instead of directing his attention to the merits of this measure, he devoted most of his time to belabouring the minister and heaping ridicule, satire and cynicism on the head of the minister and the government.

Mr. Knowles: And scorn.

Mr. Stanbury: And scorn. He has developed great expertise in that during the many years in which he has been in the house. He thundered through without really directing his attention, except very briefly, to the merits of the bill. My impression is that his greatest disappointment was in the fact that this government would be the one to put on the statute books of Canada a medicare plan for all the people of Canada.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: When?

Mr. Stanbury: I suggest it will be a great deal sooner because this government is in office than it would have been otherwise.

One of the things that disappointed me in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was the threat, not just implicit but explicit, that the members of his party were prepared and in fact threatening to conduct a filibuster to the extent of their ability with 21 members in the house.

Mr. Orlikow: How will that affect us if we have to wait until 1968?

Mr. Stanbury: Members of the N.D.P. are never concerned—

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us about Peterborough.

Mr. Stanbury: —about taking the time of the house, or making interruptions; but apparently even in this case they feel it necessary to delay the passage of this bill as long as possible.

Mr. Orlikow: How will that hurt?

Mr. Stanbury: My hon. friend asks how it will hurt. He knows that this house is waiting to deal with all kinds of important legislation, and I am not putting this legislation behind any that is awaiting our attention. This house and this country are waiting to deal with legislation on guaranteed income for the aged, on immigration, on defence and other important matters with which I think most members of this house would like to get ahead—even members of the official opposition. In spite of this the N.D.P. has threatened us tonight that each one of their 21 members in this house will speak, and if past performance is any guide they will repeat each other 21 times, until this house has exhausted its patience with them and perhaps until the country has exhausted its patience with the N.D.P.

Mr. Orlikow: Check the Gallup poll and see with whom their patience is exhausted.

Mr. Stanbury: If every member of the N.D.P. were to speak in this debate I wonder whether the Gallup poll would be as encouraging to their party as they think it is tonight. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre accuses this party, of which I am a member, of being in the dead centre or, as he put it so colourfully, in the centre, dead. I suggest to the hon. member that some people refer to his party as being far left. May I point out to him that the attitude of the N.D.P. in this debate has indicated it feels indeed left: It is left out of the implementation of this legislation, and it seems to be suggesting that it will not be satisfied to have this government obtain any credit for something which has been undertaken against a great deal of opposition, and now apparently under the threat of a filibuster from the N.D.P.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stanbury: He used a most tortuous argument to show that the credit for this legislation which he says his party supports should not under any circumstances go to the government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a supporter of a government that has not just talked about this measure, as Liberal and other governments have done for many years, but a government which will now put it on the statute books of Canada.

It is a disappointment to me that we may not have this legislation implemented for another year, but I am glad that this government is committing itself now to making health services equally available to all Canadians. That is why I oppose the amendment, which is simply a means of killing this bill, and I ask hon. members including those across the floor who claim to support the principle of medicare to support this bill as the government will amend it during the committee stage.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Stanbury: I rather hesitate to accept a question from a person of such great wit and prominence, but I will try to answer it.

An hon. Member: Don't overestimate him.

Mr. Knowles: It is a simple question. Is the hon. member prepared to vote for the government bill in its present form, as we are?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to vote for the bill in its present form, if it is supported and proposed in that form by the government which I support.

I think that even the hon. member would prefer to have the government which I support than a government led by any other hon. member in this house.

Medicare

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) in his very able presentation to the house, outlined the almost unbelievable program of preparation which will be needed to enable medicare to operate in an effective way in the future. He also outlined the shocking lack of preparation which is being undertaken by this government to bring in a realistic program of medicare of which the Canadian people can be proud. I am convinced that the great majority of Canadians believe in the principle of medicare and are anxious to see a workable plan introduced in the very near future. I know that I most certainly am. However, it has become apparent that if a crash program for training additional doctors, dentists, nurses and technicians, whom we are going to need to enable the plan to work, is not undertaken in the near future, then the plan will be a bitter disappointment to the Canadian people, who have been led to believe that medicare will be of such great benefit to the general health of the people of this country.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) spoke in this house some weeks ago to explain why the medicare program was to be delayed in its inception for one year, he gave as his reason for the postponement that the measure would increase inflationary pressures which are so seriously affecting the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all know that these expenditures will not commence for another nine months. At that time such expenditures will be mostly a transfer from the private to the public sector. This country is engaged right now, not nine months from now, in a very important battle against the inflationary pressures which this government has allowed to grow during the past year or so. It is simply not in accordance with the facts to give as an excuse for the delay of this important medicare program, the fact that it will affect inflationary pressures today.

This medicare program is being delayed for two reasons, which have nothing to do with expenditures or inflation. The first of these reasons is that the provinces representing 85 per cent of the population of this country have refused to go along with the present plan. It is abundantly clear that no national plan could operate successfully if only 15 per cent of the people are included in it.

The second reason is that the Hall report had made it very clear that we in this country do not have nearly enough doctors, dentists, nurses and medical technicians to enable this plan to operate successfully. If a crash program is not started immediately to produce the additional personnel we are going to need, they are not going to be available for many years to come. So we see, Mr. Speaker, that the reasons for the postponement of this plan are not monetary, but political. This is a prime example I believe, of the political duplicity of the government in avoiding a solemn election pledge which it gave during the last election, namely, that when elected, it would immediately introduce a medicare program. It is obvious that the promise given during the election was not intended to be kept, and in my opinion that is political duplicity.

This government wants to avoid political humiliation by introducing a plan before the next election; a plan which has been rejected by the provinces in which 85 per cent of the people of this country live; a plan which will not have anything like the medical personnel which will be needed to enable it to operate successfully. This plan, like so many other legislative measures which have been presented to this house by the government, has been presented in haste, with a great lack of preparation and consultation with the provinces who, after all, are the ones who will have to make the plan operate successfully. It was presented at the last election simply to win votes, and without any thought of how it would work. The government now intends to try to keep the plan in cold storage for another two years. It has a very definite plan in mind. This plan is, as everybody well knows now, for the Liberal party to have a leadership contest a year from now. Following that leadership convention, they intend to call an election—

An hon. Member: Are you going to run, George?

Mr. Hees: —in the spring, I am a member of a party, Mr. Speaker, which is proud of its policies, not ashamed of them. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that plan is to call an election in the spring of 1968, before the date this government has said it intends to bring in this medicare plan. So, once again we are going to have medicare promised in yet another election, just as it has been during the past 47 years. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out that in every election since 1919 we have heard the same old promises, the same speeches, the same words, and seen the same duplicity from the same old gang. The same intentions to bring it in have been announced, and then it has been put aside, brought out and dusted off, to be presented at the next election. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is once again the plan of this government. I think this government is a government that finds it very difficult to stick to any plan it makes. The trumpets are blown and there is a call for a charge, then very soon afterwards you see the humiliating retreat after the errors and lax planning are pointed out by the opposition.

I think this time this government knows what it wants to do. It wants to introduce medicare once again, before it has the humiliation of putting it into operation and trying to make it work. The way things are going at the present time, it is obvious that unless very great changes are made, the majority of the people in this country are not going to be brought into the plan. This would make it impossible to operate. By July 1, 1968, there are not going to be nearly enough trained medical personnel available to make the plan operate successfully. I suggest to this government that they now go back to the drawing board and replace their plan with one that is operating successfully in this country, the plan introduced in the province of Ontario not long ago. This plan has in it one and three quarter million citizens of the province of Ontario. It is operating on a voluntary basis, and it has been found extremely satisfactory to the citizens of Ontario. I suggest to this government that they go back and redraft their plan on the basis of the successful plan which the province of Ontario has introduced.

I suggest if they do so that they would have a very good chance of having the majority of the provinces in this country go along with that plan, and make it not only a possiblity, but a reality. I believe the government should also start a crash program on a twelve months basis for training the great number of additional doctors, dentists, nurses and technicians which are going to be needed to make this plan operate successfully, and without which no plan can operate successfully. If they will do these two things, then I believe they can bring in a medicare plan which will be accepted by each of the provinces in this country, and which would be an operating success, instead of continuing to be, after 47 disgraceful years of duplicity and dangling in front of the electorate, something to win votes at election time. If they will do this, they can bring in something of which the people of this country can be proud, and in which we can all participate with great benefit to the health of the people of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, the medicare scheme announced by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) is in fact the crowning achievement of the social program which the Liberal party has been implementing over the years. And the present Minister of National Health and Welfare can take pride in having put into force the last of the measures planned in the past and in doing it too quickly according to several people. When we see our friends in the New Democratic Party indulging in sarcasm, it is probably because they were taken by surprise by the vigour with which the Minister of National Health and Welfare implemented that program and they were taken off guard to such an extent that today they can only find fault with the date on which the medicare scheme will come into force. Really it is a very minor complaint with regard to such an important measure.

In fact, that enables the opposition to create a diversion because as far as some opposition members are concerned, it was clear that the medicare scheme did not fit in at all in their program and that, on the contrary, if they had granted it, they would have done it only gradually to secure a few more votes in successive elections and to indulge in pure and simple electioneering. On the other hand, the Liberal party prefers to give the people a universal scheme by making it applicable in a year from now only, at the latest. It means that we are at odds now on a matter of timing. If the house supports the medicare scheme, are we really going to spend days on a matter of timing? If it were only a matter of ideology, if it were only a matter of saying that if the program is implemented on such a date for one group of people and much later for another, this debate would make sense. But when it is only a matter of timing, I think that we are dishonest in trying to drag on the debate only to indulge in electioneering.

For too long, as a young member, a backbencher, I have seen this house used as a forum of the lowest order in Canadian politics. That is unfortunate. And that the medicare scheme should be involved today is more unfortunate still.

We should show full cohesion in a field as vital as health. We should all agree on this legislation, as everything seems to indicate. If it only a matter of the date, let us not protract this debate, let us not try to show the Canadian people that we are in favour of this legislation, as an excuse, in fact, to fight it. One who wants to kill his dog says it has rabies.

Mr. Speaker, I also had a feeling of regret when the Minister of National Health and Welfare had to announce that the date for the coming into effect of the program would be postponed. But we must consider that this postponement may be for a few months only, since the legislation is very flexible on that point. Hence, if our friends of the opposition would rather take advantage of favourable economic circumstances which may occur before long to request medical care, we might all agree then, and very rapidly. But taking advantage of this legislation to continue this debate indefinitely is unfair, especially toward a minister who, until now, has fought unswervingly in the house to crown the social assistance system in Canada.

Therefore, as a back-bencher, I appeal to the opposition front-benchers in order that we may find ourselves in a more serene climate and that we may work toward the passage of legislation which would give rise to fruitful debates.

• (8:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), and I do this in all good conscience in spite of the remarks of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) who accused the opposition of trying to kill this bill. Actually, we are not trying to kill the concept of medical services in Canada, but we do feel that medicare as it is spelled out in the present bill is doomed to failure. Medicare in its present form is a dead duck.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that if a poll were taken across Canada there would be a resounding affirmation from the people that no person in this country should be denied the medical services which he requires, regardless of his or her ability to pay. Our social conscience demands that our affluent society provide medical and hospital services for all. I believe all members of this house will agree with this concept.

This present debate then is directed more to the how, the why and the when. I see that according to papers of recent date the government has been instructed by the Liberal national convention with respect to the starting date of the plan, so no more need be said about the question of when, except that this postponement gives to the minister a breathing spell in which to give some sober second thoughts to the question of how.

We are fortunate indeed, Mr. Speaker, in considering legislation of this kind, not to be the pioneers in the field of social medicare. We have the experience of several countries to examine and to consider before bringing down our legislation and, if we are as astute as we believe, should be able to avoid the pitfalls of other schemes. We can profit from their mistakes. We need not follow the same paths to discover for ourselves the mistakes which have already been made in other jurisdictions.

Would the minister reconsider the evidence which is piling up indicating dissatisfaction in Great Britain with the medicare scheme that has been in operation in that country for 20 years? There have been numerous reports of this dissatisfaction, and to illustrate let me quote but one that came to hand recently. I quote from Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly dated June 20, 1966. No doubt many hon. members have seen this article, which carries the headline "Cradle to Grave?". It appears that the British are turning away from socialized medicine. I quote:

> A company called Independent Medical Service Ltd. will seek to sell Britons for cash what they have been getting free from the welfare state for nearly two decades. Executives of Independent Medical Services recently told Barron's that public opinion surveys showed 30 per cent—40 per cent of Her Majesty's subjects are not satisfied with free cradle-to-grave state medicine. They would prefer to make private arrangements with a family doctor. The firm, for a moderate charge, will enable them to do just that.

The people of Britain are dissatisfied, and for very understandable reasons: The doctors are overworked. The national health doctor in Britain has 2,300 people on his list compared to a national average of 752 people in the United States. This creates difficulty when people want to see a doctor and often leads to hasty examinations. Many are dissatisfied because of the loss of the doctor-patient relationship. They are also dissatisfied because of the long waiting period for hospital beds. Only the most urgent cases can expect to receive prompt attention. As I say, the report indicates that about three quarters of a million people are waiting for hospital beds in the United Kingdom.

It is a well known fact that British doctors are dissatisfied with the impossible working conditions engendered by medicare, and this situation has caused a mass exodus of medical practitioners from the British Isles. This has resulted in a tremendous gain for Canada, but has resulted in a vacuum in the medical ranks of Britain.

To quote again from the same article in Barron's:

> From 1955 to 1962, an average of 400 British doctors emigrated each year; in 1964, no fewer than 1200 left the country for good, as against 1600 who graduated from British medical schools. Deploring this "substantial permanent loss" Lord Kindersley cited a survey of British doctors who had emigrated which showed: "Unwillingness to enter general practice, or to stay in general practice, as it exists under the National Health Service, was the most common complaint mentioned by those who responded . . . from Canada . . .

Finally allow me to quote from a brief presented to members of parliament entitled "Medicare in Canada: A National Danger" prepared by Dr. L. D. Wilcox, Clinical Associate Professor, Department of Medicine, University of Western Ontario Medical School, which reads as follows:

> Since the initiation of National Health Service in Great Britain in 1947 the government cost of medical care, paid from taxes, has increased by more than 500 per cent. At the same time British standards have notably deteriorated and Britain's medical care today is far inferior to that of the years prior to 1947. Medical research in Britain has also deteriorated and Britain's standing as a leader in medicine and surgery has fallen to a low and regrettable level.
> Britain at present is losing more than 10 per cent of its medical manpower per year to the United States, Canada and other countries . . . With the likelihood of medicare in Canada these doctors are now looking to the U.S. as they escape from the medicare program in Britain.

In looking at the British scene, we find that on re-examination, after medicare has been in effect for 20 years, the general public is dissatisfied with the operation of the scheme; medical doctors continue to emigrate at an alarming rate; the cost of the scheme has grown by a fantastic 500 per cent, with a deterioration in the calibre of service.

Should not these facts give us warning not to follow the same path? Over one half of the doctors now practising in Saskatchewan are non-Canadians. Will our young Canadian doctors continue to emigrate to the United States because of the threat of medicare?

I should like to refer to the hospital plan that we already have in effect. I am referring to the hospital insurance plan under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act which became effective on July 1, 1958. In the eight years past the government has contributed $2 billion to the provinces under the plan, which is an average yearly contribution of about $250 million.

Reducing these astronomical figures to understandable dimensions, the Minister of National Health and Welfare in a speech to the B.C. Hospitals Association convention on October 7, 1966, said:

> The per capita cost for the five year period from 1958 to 1963 rose nationally from $21.23 to $39.44 and it is now estimated at more than $50.00 per capita.

It does not follow that there has been a 100 per cent improvement in patient care between 1958 and 1963. The facts would appear to indicate that a service paid for by the government is more costly that when it is paid for by the individual.

Earlier on, I said that the minister should give sober second thoughts to some of the aspects of medicare. I used the word "sober" because it appears to me from the legislation that the minister is drunk with power. He has been adamant in introducing his own version of medicare. He has rejected all suggestions for improving the plan. He has selectively disregarded portions of the Hall Commission report. He has spurned the plight of the provinces as expressed by the premiers of the provinces. Bearing these facts in mind, I wish to say again that we are trying to save medicare, and not kill it.

Quoting from the pamphlet The Interpreter of August, 1966, I should like to express to the house the opinions of the various premiers with respect to Bill No. C-227:

> Alex Campbell, newly-elected Premier of Prince Edward Island, said his province cannot afford medicare unless it gets a better share of federal tax money. Nova Scotia's Premier, Robert Stanfield, said he has never been happy about the financial arrangements inherent in the federal medicare proposals—
> Speaking for the Quebec Government, Education Minister Jean-Jacques Bertrand stated that his province would not submit to a national medical care plan imposed by the federal government. He said grants to the provincial schemes should be unconditional. Premier E. C. Manning of Alberta described the federal proposal as burdensome, and reiterated his stand that Alberta is opposed to the compulsion implicit in the federal requirement for universal coverage . . . he favours a voluntary scheme that does not require the elimination of privately-operated health insurance plans.
> Manitoba's Premier, Duff Roblin, said the federal plan should be scrapped and a fresh start made. The compulsory part, . . . is not necessary—a voluntary plan would be better . . . Ontario's Premier John Robarts said he was dissatisfied with the manner in which Ottawa went about drawing up the legislation. He said there has been no opportunity for consultation, and demanded that there be a top-level federal-provincial conference on medicare.
> —The objections voiced by the Premiers, with one or two exceptions, appeared to reflect their dissatisfaction with the inflexibility of Ottawa's requirements for participation in the plan.

It is for these reasons that the minister ought to be aware that the present concept of medicare is dead, before it gets off the ground. The co-operation of the provinces is needed to make it successful.

The Calgary Herald, in an editorial of August 5, after the provincial premiers conference, had this to say, in a column headed "Federal Medicare":

> There are several important questions which will have to be answered at a future federal-provincial conference.
> Can the poorer provinces afford participation? What happens to the federal requirement of portability if some provinces reject the plan in the final analysis? Does Ottawa have the right to force a compulsory plan on the provinces?
> Ottawa's argument, of course, is that the provinces have a choice as to whether they wish to participate in medicare.
> But the question of choice becomes a very theoretical point when the provinces will have to contribute through taxes in any case whether or not they participate in the plan.
> Ottawa must reconsider its present position and be prepared to make reasonable concessions to provincial objections if there is to be any hope for a workable federal medicare scheme.

That is why I say to the minister that this concept of medicare is dead. If some of the suggestions which have been made are accepted, we may be able to make it survive.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the minister has selectively ignored portions of the Hall Commission report.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Here are some of the suggestions made in the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services:

> That in view of the shortage of qualified pharmacists in the Atlantic provinces there be established a school of pharmacy at Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland, at the same time as the medical school we have recommended and as a department thereof.
> That annual professional training grants of $2,000 each be made available to graduate pharmacists pursuing post-graduate studies in pharmacy. That financial assistance under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, and under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act be expanded immediately to support any qualified applicants enrolling in courses of training prescribed for those paramedical fields in which shortages exist. On the national level we foresee shortages particularly in the following occupations: medical record librarians, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, speech therapists and audiological therapists, and medical social workers.

I could continue to quote recommendations of the Hall Commission report. It appears that the government has taken one recommendation from that report and tried to put it into effect in isolation. I believe it was the intention of the Hall Commission that all these things should be brought into effect together so that when a medical service plan was brought into being the services and facilities required to make medicare capable of meeting the demands upon it would already be available.

One further point. I should like to quote extracts from a speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to the tax structure committee in Ottawa on September 14. This brings a whole new concept to our thinking in Canada in respect to cost sharing programs. I quote from page 7, paragraph 26 of the text.

We must recognize that the continuous and cumulative use of shared cost programs in fields of jurisdiction which are primarily provincial, would result in a greater and greater proportion of provincial budgets being devoted to programs whose costs are shared by the federal government, leading to a continuing influence on provincial decision-making. The result would be to reduce the fiscal responsibility of the provinces, and to hamper them in establishing their own priorities. We must recognize too that the provinces have more and more wanted to assume full responsibility for initiating and operating their own programs, and that their ability to do so has grown demonstrably since the war. This has been especially true of Quebec whose particular social and cultural goals have been a continuing and dominant influence on its approach to federal-provincial relations. A full recognition of these facts and these changes must surely lead to the conclusion that what was suitable a generation ago may no longer be suitable today.

The minister goes on to talk about the setting up of the act which provided for opting out by the provinces from certain federal legislation. He has this to say in paragraph 29:

We have decided to propose an important change in the federal government's approach to shared cost programs.

Then, as set out in paragraph 31—and this deals specifically with social measures—the hon. gentleman said:

It is our view that in respect to the three large and continuing programs which come under provincial jurisdiction, federal conditions should be withdrawn as soon as full provincial responsibility for them can be established. I refer to hospital insurance, The Canada Assistance Plan, and the continuing portion of national health grants. We are considering doing this in two stages.

First, the federal government would invite the provinces to take the first step toward greater fiscal independence and responsibility by accepting a new form of compensation in respect of these programs, effective January 1, 1967.

I quote now from paragraph 34 of the address:

This would be accomplished by escalating the adjustment payments, after a given date, on an objective basis unrelated to program costs. After this date the provinces' compensation in respect of these three programs would increase quite independently of—and almost certainly more rapidly than—program costs, on the formula we will propose. I am suggesting that this second step be taken on April 1, 1970.

At that time the federal government would eliminate the conditions the provinces are required to comply with under the shared-cost programs concerned.

Then, in paragraph 37, the hon. gentleman said:

One of the questions which will properly be asked about these proposed arrangements is what assurance there would be that the hospitalization and Canada assistance programs would be continued after 1970, and that the benefits would continue to be "portable" as between provinces, or that program standards would be maintained. Once major programs like these have been established, no government would discontinue them, because of the needs they fill and the public support they command.

It can be seen from this statement that it is the intention of the government to impose a plan such as the medicare plan on the provinces in such a way that the provinces cannot back out of it when the federal government decides that it no longer wants to be bothered with responsibility for management or for financing. If it is the ultimate goal of the government to turn projects of this type back to the provinces to administer, then I maintain the provinces should be taken into the confidence of the government when these programs are instituted.

It is evident from this statement by the Minister of Finance who, it must be admitted, has a strong voice in cabinet decision making, that it is the intention of the government to force the provinces into commitments with respect to a plan which most of them do not want. Then, when the provinces are stuck with the plan, the federal government intends to pull the rug from under them—to turn the responsibility for financing it over to them and offer a per capita grant unrelated to the service rendered. Why not make a per capita grant available now and allow each province to develop the medicare plan best suited to its needs?

In conclusion, let me say that I recognize the need for expanded medical services to all people, regardless of their financial status. We cannot offer expanded services unless we have a great many more trained medical doctors available, more trained paramedical personnel, more hospital beds. The government should have given priority to the supply of sufficient facilities and personnel before introducing this plan.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the minister can explain to us how he intends to ensure an adequate supply of these doctors before July 1, 1968. A federal-provincial conference on medicare should be convened immediately so that he can determine from the provinces the type of federal assistance which is needed and is acceptable for the discharge of a purely provincial responsibility—medical services.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should first like to comment on a statement made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) who claimed that the New Democratic Party was going to filibuster the bill and thereby hold it up. I think he will have to agree that no political party fought longer and harder for the inception of medicare than did the New Democratic Party. This has not been a fight; it has been a series of promises—47 years of promises which have resulted in a bill which, before it got to the floor of the House of Commons, has already been delayed. So the N.D.P. can hardly be accused of delaying a bill which the Liberals themselves are delaying.

Another matter on which I should like to comment is the old cliché, that there is insufficient personnel to handle medicare at the present time, used by the last two Conservative speakers, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Ballard). I am fed up with this old cliché. This only proves to me the need for medicare. It is an admission that there are people who are not being medically treated, but who should be, and that this failure is due to the fact that we have not had a medicare program to take care of these people, rather than the lack of medical people. This is dividing people into two categories, and results in a condition wherein treatment for illness is dependent upon the financial status of the patient.

I should also like to make one comment in respect of the statement made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). I do not agree with him when he suggests that integration is more important than medication.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not say that. I said that unification was something that was more urgent in that it was to come into effect in a very short time, whereas the government has stated that medicare would not take place for a year and a half.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): It is hoped that by debating this thing we might possibly get it into effect before 1968. I think it is still more important that we get medicare before us and in effect in this country before we get integration and unification of the armed forces. It is therefore with mixed emotions that I speak on this medicare bill. My emotions are mixed because I am glad to see it get to the floor of the house after these years of promises, but I am not happy to hear of its intended postponement which so far as I am concerned is an act of deceit perpetrated upon the Canadian people. It does show the influence the right wing element in the Liberal party has over the whole party, when this smaller group has had the power to sway the rest of the party. Since it has been promised on many occasions that this country would have medicare by July 1, 1967 most particularly within the cabinet of the Liberal party there must be some sort of small right wing element which has been able to deceive the Canadian people.

I have spoken many times on the different aspects of medicare. I have spoken in the House of Commons and elsewhere pointing out the need for medicare. But this is not what is at stake tonight; rather, it is the disappointing postponement of it with which we are confronted at the present time. I have deliberately planned a play-back of some voices—Liberal voices I might say—to emphasize what an impact this callous postponement of the medicare program must have had on millions of Canadians who, like myself, listened to these voices and dared to hope.

Medicare

I am going to start with this editorial from the Toronto Star of May 18, 1966, headlined "National medicare—proud Liberal achievement":

The Liberal government's conclusive commitment to introduce a national medicare program on July 1, 1967—whether all the provinces sign or not—redeems a pledge that has been gathering dust for the past 47 years.

With all the delays, frustrations, and obstruction the scheme has faced since it was first endorsed in principle by the Liberal party in 1919, Prime Minister Pearson can none the less take pride that it is a government under his leadership that will finally bring the program into being.

Well, hon. members, that commitment seems to have been more flexible—to use one of the Prime Minister's favourite words—than conclusive and is, I fear, slated to gather more layers of dust in its own hallowed spot on the shelf of Liberal party dreams. It may be that a Messiah other than the Prime Minister referred to will eventually redeem it.

Writing in the Ottawa Citizen on May 18 last under the headline "Medicare Start by July, 1967", Don MacGillivray said:

The big decision, expected to get wavering provinces on the medicare bandwagon by that date, was announced yesterday in the Commons by Health Minister Allan MacEachen.

Mr. MacEachen said the federal government will be ready to pay medicare contributions to any province with a plan in effect on the target date, even though not all provinces join.

We all know now, of course, that it was not the provinces who were wavering. A Canadian Press report in the Ottawa Journal of June 8 stated:

Health Minister MacEachen said Tuesday six provinces have given positive indications they intend to take up the federal offer to pay half the cost of medical care insurance starting July 1, 1967.

Not surprisingly, the four wealthiest provinces, Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia represent the negative side in this instance. On August 3, a Canadian Press report in the Ottawa Journal attributed to the Prime Minister the statement that he foresaw no changes in federal legislation as a result of criticism levelled by provincial premiers during that week. As late as Thursday, the first day of September, hon. members in the House of Commons were assured by the Prime Minister, replying to a question put by one of my colleagues, that medicare legislation did have priority for this session. And that, hon. members, is a factual record of the medicare promises made by the Liberal party during this last few months of the 47 years since the pledge was first introduced.

[Mr. Howe (Hamilton South).]

Surely, in a period of 47 years, there must have been some honest, sincere Liberals who really felt that the Canadian people needed this care. Surely, these have not all been election promises with no sincerity behind them. Has there not been, in all this time, one Liberal Prime Minister with the guts to face the private insurance companies, the medical profession and the corporate elite, and give to the people of Canada a social benefit that is truly needed.

Never before in history, perhaps, has a political party laboured so long to give birth to an important piece of legislation and still managed to avoid the final commitment. We are still dealing with empty promises, promises that were so beguilingly voiced in the last election campaign and, as I have just demonstrated, so faithfully repeated right up to the recent day of betrayal.

It has been suggested in some quarters that the Minister of Finance was forced into scuttling the program as a "dramatic" gesture in order to halt inflation and hold back pressures in other sectors of the economy. In other words, the medicare program which was designed primarily to assist those who lacked opportunities for first-rate medical care was to be laid as a propitiatory offering at the feet of Bay street financiers, insurance companies and, regrettably, too large a group of medical men whose great ethical tradition has been to some degree diminished by self-motivation. As recently as this afternoon I came across a page in the Monetary Times of October, 1966. I do not know who the author of this article is, but it is a Parliament Hill report by the Ottawa bureau entitled "Behind the Mockery". In part it states:

Most of the cost of medicare would be a simple transfer payment; money which Canadians now pay to private insurance schemes or directly to their doctors would be channelled instead through public agencies. The additional cost of medicare would be around $100 million at the most in the first year—a sum so small that it is well within the margin of error which finance ministers allow themselves in calculating their yearly revenues and expenditures.

Sharp decided to cut medicare from his 1967 program for public relations reasons. His economists are more concerned about what they call inflation psychosis than they are about inflation itself.

Reviews to date of this great dramatic production have not all been laudatory, however. Even in the Prime Minister's own party there are, I gather, some disappointed critics, albeit their criticism may be rather less strident following recent disciplinary tongue lashings.

It is difficult to understand the motivation behind this action. Did the Minister of Finance really fear inflationary pressure consequent upon the plan's initiation on July 1, 1967, one year in the future? I think not. He is well aware too, I think, that it was during a period of austerity in Britain in 1948 that a medicare plan was brought in by a Labour government.

Why was medicare chosen for the sacrifice? Why did not the minister think of plugging a few gaping holes in the income tax regulations, or looking into some of those peregrinations on official government business which have been multiplying both numerically and expensively in recent years? On the positive side he might have considered an excess profits tax at this time on inordinate profit-taking.

Whatever its motivation, this grand gesture by the Minister of Finance was a cynical and heartless one. It was also, I might add, perhaps to the minister's credit, singularly lacking in political astuteness. Inevitably this decision will boomerang on the government that so foolishly made it, because I am convinced the people are aware of the fundamental points at issue here and will refuse to be confounded by political twaddle. It is common knowledge that this period of further delay will give much in the way of aid and comfort to the enemies of the plan. They will have many months now in which to train their public relations batteries on the taxpayers—cajoling, frightening and persuading them with a barrage of equivocation, sophistry and evasion. Already the mails bear testimony to this.

There will be a rehash of the same old arguments against the plan. I shall deal with them one by one as they appear in a booklet entitled "National Medicare—Let's Look Before We Leap" authored by the premier of Alberta, one of the reluctant provinces. The Alberta government administers a scheme of subsidized prepaid medical insurance which, by the premier's own admission in the booklet referred to, covers little more than 80 per cent of Albertans. We are left to wonder what happens to the remaining 20 per cent who represent 47 per cent or nearly half of those eligible for a subsidized premium. It must be assumed that this half of the less affluent group are either unbelievably healthy or, unable to pay even a subsidized premium, are suffering for lack of an adequate and freely available medical care plan. Parenthetically I would suggest a comparison here with the figure of 99.87 per cent for medical care coverage in Saskatchewan.

Naturally Mr. Manning's primary concern in connection with the proposed national plan is not with money, funny or otherwise. He points sublimely to the right of each citizen to exercise freedom of choice in matters relating to his own and his family's welfare. For the premier's information, it has never been proposed that we institute a system of state medicine in this country. Under medicare there would be complete freedom of choice and the service would be based on self-governing professions and institutions. The patient would choose his own doctor just as the doctor would be free to accept or reject the patient, except of course in cases of emergency. The only people who would want to plead a case for freedom in connection with medicare are those reactionaries who fear that medicare is an extension of a right—and I emphasize, a right, not a privilege—to too many people too soon.

They choose to ignore the contemplation of freedom in its broader context of freedom "from", not just freedom "to". In this case it is freedom from sickness and ill health, not just the freedom to buy health as lavishly or whimsically as one's purse will allow. Health signifies the ultimate security for the individual and, as such, is a right not to be misconstrued as a privilege.

The second argument is: Are you as taxpayers in favour of governments spending your money to pay for medical services for those who can well afford to buy their own medical insurance? It is true that many people are covered by one form or another of group or private insurance. The premiums for this insurance are much more expensive than they would be under a government administered plan, but at least they are covered. However, according to the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services, over 7.5 million or 41 per cent of the population had no medical insurance whatsoever in 1961, and for some three million more coverage was considered totally inadequate. This is so after 35 years of endeavour on the part of voluntary plans as well as those of commercial insurance companies.

In considering the costs of the scheme we should always keep in mind that expenditures will simply be transferred from the private to the public sector of the economy. It has been estimated that the total extra cost to provide complete universal coverage would amount to a sum variously estimated between $60 million and $90 million. In a $55 billion economy this is not, by any stretch of the imagination, to be considered an intolerable strain. Most of this merely represents people who cannot afford medical care at present.

We are asked to consider the point that medicare will produce excessive demands for services. It is probably true that there will be a backlog of cases coming forward in the early months of the plan's inauguration, and somehow they will have to be looked after on a priority basis. This priority establishment is properly the responsibility of the doctors themselves. They must see that patients are treated according to their needs and not according to their pocketbooks. For too long, perhaps, the well-to-do hypochondriac has monopolized medical attention.

I am, of course, very much in agreement with Mr. Manning when he urges the government to spend more on research. It is only when he makes point number four, expressing his fear that expenditures for long-range research will be subjugated to the political expediency of further expanding the immediate services which count most with the electorate, that I take emphatic exception.

It is true we are behind other nations in research. When Mr. Manning says we should be spending at least $100 million a year in this field I am delighted with the breadth of his vision. We would be satisfied with much less than that, because at present our expenditure of moneys provided by this government amount to 90 cents per capita as compared to $6.50 per capita in the United States. This causes a brain drain from Canada to the United States where there is money for research allowing projects to be carried to a conclusion.

I heard on the radio this morning that a doctor in Chicago by the name of Huggins was awarded the Nobel prize for medicine as a result of research done at the University of Chicago. This man is a Canadian-born and Canadian-educated scientist. He was awarded a medal for work done in the United States, and I suppose he went there to carry out this work because we do not supply sufficient money in this country for research.

Mr. Manning is no doubt as disappointed as I am with the proposed cut in the rate of increase for the next fiscal year. This is no way to ensure the vastly improved climate for research which is absolutely necessary if we are to staff expanding medical schools across the country. Only when we are able to attract competent teacher-scientists to staff these schools will we be assured of an adequate supply of new doctors.

Let me refer to a local matter. In the city of Hamilton McMaster University is starting a medical college which, it is hoped, will be in operation in 1969 with new modern facilities, and it has the money to build these facilities. There are pre-medical students now taking their Bachelor of Science degree at this university. The university has some very progressive ideas with regard to graduating students. With the reduction in the supply of research funds available there is some doubt whether this university will be staffed adequately to teach medical students who would otherwise have sufficient facilities to graduate under an entirely new scheme—which I will not go into—on a speeded-up basis, which has been highly recommended. This scheme cuts down on the length of time taken for graduation. As a matter of fact, this university is cutting down the graduation period from four years to three years by reducing the summer holidays to two weeks rather than the usual four or five months.

Top-flight teachers of this type will never be induced either to come to this country or to stay here until an improved research atmosphere is established on an assured basis. In other words, Mr. Speaker, research people want to be assured that funds will be available with which to carry on the programs they start, rather than starting a program and being frustrated by the fact that there are insufficient funds to complete the work they started. Here again the threatened cut in the rate of increase will amount to a picayune sum in the context of the entire economy. It will be hard to justify it as a counter-inflationary measure. Equally hard to defend is Mr. Manning's contention that money spent on medicare will of necessity have to come from research expenditures. Research is a vital part of the medicare program, adding modestly to its cost to enrich its quality.

Many of the points I have dealt with in defending medicare were very succinctly expressed by Dr. Samuel Wolfe, medical director of the Saskatoon Community Health Services Medical Clinic, in his address delivered at the Chateau Laurier last November before the working conference dealing with the implications of a health charter for Canadians. I should like to read this very appropriate excerpt from that address:

> There has been a lot of nonsense spoken in recent years about government sponsored medical care plans, and their supposed evils. I have had the good fortune to serve for close to four years as a commissioner of the Saskatchewan medical care plan, and while I do not pretend to speak for the Commission, I feel free to say that we have exploded a lot of myths. First, the myth of administrative cost when a plan is run by government. The fact is that the cost of operating the Saskatchewan plan has been about 6 per cent. The Hall Commission showed that the private insurers of Canada used 28 per cent of every dollar for purposes other than paying benefits. Second, Saskatchewan's plan provides broader coverage than any other plan in Canada, and for example, includes psychiatric care by private physicians, and preventive check-ups. Third, Saskatchewan's plan pays doctors' bills faster than any other plan in Canada. Fourth, the costs of Saskatchewan's plan have risen more slowly than the costs of private plans over the past three years. Fifth, demands for service have risen only modestly, and evidence suggests that increased services may be due more to doctors' decisions than to patients' demands. Finally, the pet myth that free selection of doctor by patient and patient by doctor would be interfered with, has been exploded.
> The Saskatchewan experience to date proves that medical care, as one component of social security, can be entrusted to a government agency, with loss of neither individual nor professional independence. Freedom is widened, not narrowed, when the man who earns $40,000 a year pays more for public medical care insurance than does the man who earns $4,000 a year.

I should like to speak very briefly about what I consider to be some of the shortcomings of this bill as it is introduced. There are many other practitioners of medicine, aside from medical doctors, who are involved in the care of people who are ill. These include—I am touching on only a few—psychologists, chiropractors, optometrists, dentists and many other paramedical groups.

Psychologists serve an extremely useful purpose in the treatment of a large percentage of both children and adults who could otherwise be very demanding on the overworked medical profession. Realizing that many medical illnesses are of a psychological nature, psychologists are not only treatment specialists but serve to relieve the already overburdened profession which has many other phases of medicine to deal with. These practitioners of course require consideration in the bill before the house at the present time.

Then, too, many people are treated by chiropractors, who have also been significantly omitted from Bill No. C-227. Another group of the so-called drugless practitioners, who are highly recognized in our medical society, are optometrists. The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) has mentioned optometrists but I am going to mention them again. The omission of optometric care is a drastic one not only for the care of people's eyesight but again because of a release of the burden on the already overworked ophthalmologists. Almost 6 million Canadians need visual care that cannot conceivably be handled by other than 1,500 optometrists in Canada, and certainly cannot be treated by the only 300 ophthalmologists. It is therefore my strong recommendation that the definition of medical practitioner be changed to include the optometrists of Canada. It goes without saying that there is an extreme need for dental care, which should be included in this bill on a basis equal to that of medical care.

If Liberal amendments go through, medicare will be postponed at least until 1968; and how do we know it will suit them any more in 1968 than they now think it will in 1967, when it is now 1966? I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator of October 11. The editorial is entitled, "Medical Inevitability" and reads in part:

> —Canada's ruling party was telling itself that it was all right to breach the promise made during the election only 11 months ago because circumstances had changed, but that it can promise that circumstances will not change during the next 12 months.

The editorial goes on to say:

> The cabinet has thus made itself accountable to the collective minor officialdom of the Liberal party instead of remaining primarily accountable to the people of Canada.

If the amendment the Conservative party has moved were to pass—and I am sure it will not—this would not only get rid of the plan for a year and a half in order that we may think it over, but I am afraid it would get rid of the plan forever. I do not think that even the Tory party can stop this progress that other people in our country are trying to make. It looks as though neither of these parties is willing to face private insurance companies and give the Canadian people any real social progress.

Medicare

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, the present bill, namely Bill No. C-227, invites us to improve health conditions and assist the sick. Those two reasons are worthy of praise, all the more so when we know that disease constitutes, for both Canada and Canadians, a loss of time and money.

In 1963, sickness caused a loss of 100 million man-days, that is more than $1,600 million, or 3.8 per cent of the G.N.P. In comparison with this, industrial strikes do not represent even 1 per cent of the losses caused by sickness.

The provisions of Bill No. C-227 show us how the central government intends to contribute to a provincial medicare plan, that is by paying 50 per cent of the cost if a province satisfies the four following conditions: first, the program must be administered by the state or a non-profit organization; second, it must be universal in character, that is it must apply to at least 90 per cent of the population; third, it must be transferable, and fourth, it must cover all medical expenses.

I am examining these various conditions, Mr. Speaker, and I shall have occasion to come back to them at the end of my speech. But I wonder if these four conditions in themselves justify an intervention by the central government in the field of medicare. I personally feel that the provinces, separately or together, could easily have drawn them up and agreed thereto, especially now that the Canadian provinces meet annually, at a provincial Prime Ministers conference, and in view of the fact that interprovincial co-ordination and co-operation are gaining favour across the country.

It seems as though the central government were good-humouredly playing at Santa Claus several months ahead of time, offering the provinces money and setting conditions as if the provinces were children, backward little girls unable to organize their wardrobe themselves. This, Mr. Speaker, is the continuation of the unrestrained centralization practised by the present government in all fields and, it seems, despite the very eloquent statements made last night, according to press reports, during a celebration closing the conference of the Canadian Liberal party, when that party said: as long as we do not amend the Canadian constitution, we must respect it. This statement made the headlines of several newspapers.

[Mr. Howe (Hamilton South).]

There was also the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who as it were added, in a sort of speech which he alone can make, in speaking of the Liberal party and of the Liberal government in power: We do not intend to nor must we encroach upon or destroy the powers and the jurisdiction allocated to the provinces under the constitution. A wonderful statement, Mr. Speaker, which was made quite recently, as a matter of fact only last night. There you have the theory, there you have the statement, but today you have a concrete example of this systematic inconsistency because a motion was made for second reading of a bill which goes against the spirit and the letter of the Canadian constitution which allocates to the provinces, solely and exclusively, the fields of insurance and hygiene.

This is why, in this house, since January 18 last, we had the feeling of plunging further into a constitutional chaos in which this government places us continuously. This government refuses to set up a parliamentary committee to review our Canadian constitution. It denies the hon. members of the house and the law-makers of this parliament the right to amend this old text dating back to 1867 in order, it seems, to adapt it—may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I do not think that the hon. member may call it ten o'clock immediately. However, this is not why I intervene. I simply want to remind him that at the present time we are discussing a bill which deals with establishing medical care in Canada and it seems to me that his speech at the present time is not closely related to the principle of the bill which we are considering at this time. The hon. member may still be making his preliminary remarks and, if such is the case, I invite him to come as soon as possible to the substance of his speech.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, when I close my remarks, this evening or tomorrow, you will find that this is the basis of my argument which is fully related to the substance of this bill and to the debate on medicare.

I simply wanted to point out in the premise—I will come back to that at the end of my remarks—that this legislation is another centralizing, anticonstitutional measure, and those are areas and conditions which should be established by the provinces and not be imposed on them, as if they were only wards of the central government.

If we consider the provisions of the legislation—and several members raised the matter tonight—various questions may be raised to which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has not yet replied. We hope that when he makes a statement, he will dispel our anxieties on various matters, as he himself and his government have decided to go ahead in the field of medical care.

Do we have enought doctors? Do we have, in Canada, the necessary medical schools? Do we have enough hospitals, laboratories and staff to overcome the effects which such a legislation would create in the field of health and in the country?

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to whoever is acting house leader tonight in regard to the business of the house tomorrow. May I offer the suggestion that in order to have a quiet day in the house maybe we should take up a non-controversial subject such as the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Knowles: That is a spurious suggestion.

Mr. Hellyer: Splendid.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my instruction from the house leader is to indicate the continuation tomorrow of the present subject matter, and if we finish that to continue with Item No. 48, house in committee of the whole on Bill C-218, to be followed by the second reading of Bill C-220, respecting the Immigration Appeal Board.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

OLD AGE SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, October 5, as recorded in Hansard at page 8348, I put to the Prime Minister a question that was supplementary to one that had been asked by another member, in which I used these words:

> In view of the concern being expressed in the country, may I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration is being given to providing for an old age pension increase without imposing any test or limitation?

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should wait until the resolution is introduced; his understandable curiosity will be satisfied at that time.

My reply was:

> I think I shall have to satisfy my curiosity at ten o'clock.

I have had to wait not only from the afternoon until evening but some eight days to get my question before the house during one of these late shows. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, several other members have asked questions about the proposal to supplement the old age pension by $30 a month. Questions have been asked as to the effective date and various other details. Every time these questions have been asked the reply has been that members should wait until the legislation comes before us when the details will be disclosed. Well, the main outline of the government's proposal was given to us by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on July 14 of this year. I suggest, therefore, that it is a bit of a cat-and-mouse game to suggest that we wait for the details if those details are simply going to be along the lines announced on July 14.

What we are asking for, and the government knows it, is a reconsideration of some of the fundamental points in the program announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My question to the Prime Minister was one of those questions. Is consideration being given to providing for this increase without imposing any test or limitation? I hope the minister tonight will not give us one of his usual speeches about the number of times the Liberals have increased the old age pension, and all that kind of thing. I hope he will address himself to the question, and I make it as simple and as direct as I can. Do I hear the hon. member for Parkdale making a reference to 1919?

Mr. Douglas: His conscience is bothering him.

Mr. Haidasz: I was not here in 1919.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that if the hon. member's conscience is bothering him he might see a psychiatrist, if he can get one under medicare.

I ask the minister the direct question: Is the government reconsidering the matter of the test that the minister announced on July 14? As I tried to say to him on that day, and as I have said on different occasions since, it will be another major mistake of the Liberal party if it, in effect, goes back to the means test. We have had a debate today on what I think is a major mistake of the Liberal party in effect, bring back the means test, this will suffer seriously because of this. I say that if it is going to provide pension increases which, in effect, bring back the means test, this will be a mistake for the Liberal party and it will be a mistake for Canada. I can tell him that, just as certainly as it is after ten o'clock tonight, the next few election campaigns will be conducted around an effort to get rid of that means test.

Now, there is no point in the minister telling us that what he proposed is not a means test. There is no point in trying to give it some other name. The means test was not the official name of the test that applied under the old age pensions act from 1927 to 1952. It was in effect a kind of income test, at a very low level. "Means test" was the popular phrase which was applied to an arrangement under which people did not get the pension if they had certain other income.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if that kind of test is put on the $30 that it is proposed to add to the $75, we are going back to the means test of unhappy memory which at long last we got rid of starting in 1952. I suggest that it would be a political and social mistake, and that it would be quite unjustifiable to go back to it.

Our people need this increase in their pension; no one will deny that. We can afford it, and no one can deny that: The money is there in the old age security fund. But our old people also have the right to their dignity and self-respect and they will not have this if we impose a means test on a portion of their pension.

I am glad to know that we will get a pension increase during this session. It was good to get that clear statement from the minister this week. I plead with him not to spoil that increase by the indignity of a means test, and I plead with him to say to us tonight that the government is prepared to reconsider this aspect of the proposed pension increase. Let us have an increase across the board for all our senior citizens.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I want to assure him that it is not the intention of the government to reconsider this particular decision. Because we are commencing in Canada in its application to recipients of old age security a new concept—the concept of a guaranteed annual income. This is the most modern concept in social welfare thinking and economics, and we think that we ought to move ahead and abandon some of the older concepts which, though good in their day, may not be as applicable now as they were formerly.

I appeal to the member for Winnipeg North Centre to watch the danger of slipping into Tory thinking. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre believes that everything that was decided on 30 years ago or 20 years ago must be valid and applicable in 1965, 1966 or 1967.

Mr. Knowles: It was the Liberals who instituted the means test, not the Tories.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not accept this view. I think we have to change and move ahead. We have a new, modern concept of a guaranteed annual income. We will be the only country in the world that I know of which is making a start in the application of this concept, and we are applying this concept to the recipients of old age security. The hon. member is setting up a straw man. He says it is a means test.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: It is not a means test. It was never proposed as a means test. I hope that when the plan is fully unfolded we will be able to convince the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are applying an income test, something which was strongly supported by his deputy leader who advocated in the house not long ago the desirability of having an income test approach to these matters. I am glad his deputy leader is moving ahead and I hope that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will catch up with him before we get into the house on this bill.

Mr. Knowles: It is still a means test, and the minister knows it.

Mr. Dinsdale: An exercise in semantics.

AGRICULTURE—MILK—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN SUBSIDY TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I raised the question of the manufacturing milk subsidy, along with the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on September 9. I regret very much that the minister is not in his place tonight, and I say that with every deference to the parliamentary secretary who has to take the minister's place.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I am raising this question because on reading the minister's statement I could not see anywhere in it that the minister was satisfied that the producers of manufacturing milk were in fact to receive $4 per hundredweight for their product. This is a serious matter, because we know how the minister has played with this situation since the last election campaign. It was he who made the promise that producers of this product, in essence, would receive $4 per hundredweight for their milk.

We know that this has not happened. All of us, including the parliamentary secretary, well know what the differential was and why it existed. We, too, had a policy to offer to the producers of this product. The point is that the minister and the government did not fulfil the promise that was made to these producers. The minister and the government know this full well. It was not until pressure was applied by farm organizations, particularly in the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec—where a somewhat similar situation arose, with a small exception—that the matter was brought forward.

I am rising because the minister would not give me the information I requested and, of course, because Mr. Speaker on that day would not permit the minister to answer, saying that this was a more appropriate time. I have the minister's statement here. In no way, and nowhere in his statement does he assure the producers that they will receive this much money. In fact, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the ministers of agriculture in the provincial governments of Quebec and Ontario coming to the assistance of the federal Minister of Agriculture at this particular time in question, the producers still would not be receiving that which was promised in his last election campaign. Such a thing is regrettable, but it shows one of the ways in which this government has been acting. Someone always has to bail it out from problems it has got itself into.

The Windsor Star, which is a paper not noted for its support of the Conservative party, gives full credit to the provincial ministers concerned for what has happened with respect to these producers.

I said at an earlier date that I believe that constitutionally the responsibility for the payment of this subsidy is that of the federal government and I cited my authority. The minister questioned what I said at that time. However, an article in the newspaper I have mentioned points out that quite likely the minister has now realized that the constitutional authority for the payment of this subsidy lies with the federal government. That newspaper article also states that probably the producers will receive more than the minimum undertaking; and if that happens, the credit should go to the two provincial ministers, not to the federal government.

What I want to learn this evening from the parliamentary secretary is whether he has the authority to make a statement assuring the producers of manufacturing milk in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec that they will in fact receive a minimum of $4 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish I felt constrained to thank the hon. member for Grey-Bruce for his question which, to me, is slightly irresponsible. The question asked of the minister was whether he would assure the house that the milk producers in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec will, as the result of his announcement, be assured of $4 per hundredweight of manufactured milk.

I wish to draw attention to the words "be assured". The word "assure" means "guarantee". I did not—

Mr. Winkler: That is what he did during the election campaign.

Mr. Beer: It is my submission that to use the word "assure" would be absolutely irresponsible, and the minister, I know, would not make a statement of that kind. I should like to give two or three reasons to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce why it would be altogether irresponsible to guarantee to farmers a price of $4 per hundredweight. If we were to guarantee $4 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk it could only be done by entering into an offer-to-purchase program. This would remove from the milk manufacturing and processing business all initiative for the marketing of the product through distributors. Such action would be quite irresponsible.

Again, the marketing of milk does not come under federal jurisdiction; it comes under provincial jurisdiction. Milk is produced in Ontario or Quebec according to standards established by the departments of health in those provinces. In the second place, it is hauled by motor vehicles licensed by the provinces in which they operate. These are at least two reasons, in addition to what I have already said which make it clear that it would be irresponsible for a federal minister of agriculture to guarantee $4 per hundredweight to producers at the farms.

Mr. Winkler: He made the promise and it is a simple matter to implement it.

Mr. Beer: One should review the program which has been in effect. This creates a climate which will enable farmers to get $4 per hundredweight. The federal support program as established on April 1, 1966, was designed to provide an average price to producers at the factory of $3.25. If we add to this the 75 cents federal subsidy, we arrive at a figure of $4. Then on September 9 the stabilization board raised its butter selling price by two cents a pound which is equivalent to eight cents per hundredweight of milk. The total comes to $4.08. On October 1, 1966, the government of Ontario introduced a producer subsidy of 25 cents, bringing the total to $4.33.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to table today a white paper on Canadian immigration policy. It is bilingual and probably multicultural. In doing so I would like to express my sincere appreciation to those who have worked on the preparation of this document; some have done so not only this year but also during 1965 under two of my predecessors.

No one who understands the immigration problem will be surprised that this white paper could not be produced quickly and easily. Immigration policy depends on a complex interrelationship of economic, social, humanitarian, legal and international considerations. There are few issues, indeed, that bring into play so comprehensively all the delicate balances and tensions of our Canadian society.

Our problem is to avoid the ill consequences of these inevitable complexities. Immigration policy and procedures have to adjust to changing circumstances. The natural tendency, when the issues are so difficult, is to make the adjustment by small, partial, ad hoc modifications. And as these accumulate, immigration procedures tend to become complicated, confused, uncertain, even contradictory.

I hope we can all recognize this problem without partisanship. The difficulties I am talking about have been at work under all governments, irrespective of party label.

We will cure them only if we are prepared from time to time to take stock, to reassess our policy and sort out our procedures, to develop a new synthesis as the basis for an immigration policy suited to contemporary needs.

The white paper is an attempt to do that. I do not expect it to be accepted without criticism. Immigration touches too many emotional issues to be clarified without dispute. I believe, nevertheless, that most people will find that the synthesis we have developed in this white paper meets the main needs of Canada today while taking reasonable account of all legitimate special interests.

I would like at this stage merely to draw attention to three main features of the policy I propose. First, it is expansionist. It seeks to establish the basis for a steadily active immigration policy adapted to our manpower needs, a policy that will assist Canada's growth by bringing here every year a good number of people able to adapt to our society and qualified to contribute to our economy.

Second, it is non-discriminatory. It establishes principles and procedures that can and will operate entirely without regard to race, colour or creed. I do not mean that it is in our power to ensure that geography will make no difference at all to people's chances of coming to Canada. We have to take account of the differing attitudes to emigration among other governments and peoples. There are practical limitations on our side. We cannot afford to establish the same facilities to assist immigrants in countries where the facilities will be little used as we have in countries where they are in heavy demand.

These, however, are practical problems, to be treated as such, to be overcome as much as possible. There will be no discrimination by principle and no practical differences that are within my department's power to remove.

Third, the white paper policy establishes, for the future, a new balance between the claims of family relationship and the economic interest of Canadians as a whole, which is that immigrants should generally be the well qualified people for whom employment opportunities are increasing.

[Translation]

Where there are at present some anomalies in the range of relatives who may be sponsored, these will be corrected by broadening the range. Canadian citizens, and other people who are already here as landed immigrants, will be able to sponsor everyone they now can, and a few additional classes of relatives, with the one reservation that those who are going to be entering the labour force must have either some needed skill or the equivalent of an elementary school education.

The effect of this limitation will not be to reduce the number of sponsored immigrants entering Canada. Its purpose is only to remove from the sponsorship system its present potential for explosive growth. If that were not done, we would face the danger of admitting to Canada an ever-increasing number of people for whom our economy will offer not more but fewer employment opportunities.

The sponsorship rights of Canadian citizens will for the first time have full legal recognition, with an appeal board that can over-rule the Minister's decisions. And, of course, the new immigrant will be able to bring to Canada, without waiting for his citizenship, the members of his immediate family who are or become dependent on him.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the house will wish to explore these proposals with care and consideration. I would therefore say that I intend to propose that the white paper be referred for study to a special joint parliamentary committee which would be able to examine the issues in the depth that their importance requires.

[English]

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this white paper has had a very difficult and very tardy birth. Conceived by the Prime Minister as long ago as December, 1964, and promised before the next following session of parliament, it has taken 21 months and three ministerial midwives to bring it to delivery today. Can hon. members detect anything in the minister's statement so novel or startling, any such great policy innovation, as would have required this inordinate delay? I have difficulty in believing from his statement that the white paper lives up to all the trumpeting advance notices which there have been.

[Mr. Marchand.]

Indeed, as I listened to him what I feared was that what the minister gave in the white paper with one hand he took away with the other. I want to put it straight to the minister, Mr. Speaker, that Canada needs a dynamic, positive immigration policy. A passive immigration policy is self defeating; and pious expressions, window dressing or lip service will not serve the national interest. This country must recognize the economic and social advantages, both immediate and long range, of a sustained high level immigration inflow. I am personally an unrepentant expansionist. The minister today tells us that this policy is expansionist, but then he enunciates what I suggest is a policy which will not bring any additional immigrants to this country.

Obviously a white paper of this size and this basic significance will require detailed study before comprehensive and perceptive comment may properly be made upon it. But the real test, I want to say, will come when the government introduces, as I hope it will do at the earliest possible date, a complete revision of the Immigration Act. Then we will see if actions equal professions. We on this side are anxious that immigration be sustained at a relatively high level, a uniform level, and become a permanent instrument of national economic policy designed to give stimulus to all facets of the economy. We seek to end the feast and famine, tap on tap off, approach which has been a curse in the past.

The minister has said a great deal about this policy being non-discriminatory. I am sure his objectives in that respect will receive the hearty endorsation of all members of the house, though I am compelled to say that the way this country renounces discrimination reminds me of Mark Twain swearing off smoking. He said that it was easy; he had done it scores of times. In my view the greatest milestone of real advance in non-discrimination was the new regulations which were introduced four and a half years ago by Hon. Ellen Fairclough, one of the great ministers of citizenship and immigration.

I agree with the minister that in this age there can be no tolerance of any discrimination on racial, religious, colour or national grounds. But it is not enough to end it in theory; it must be ended in practice. I point that it is not just a matter of admission. The real essence of non-discrimination is to make every immigrant feel that he can become a full and equal Canadian; that there are no master races in Canada. The full potential of this nation will be built upon the strength of immigrant peoples; and for all of them, from whatever shore they come, there must be full and absolute equality as Canadian citizens, not some secondary status which is subordinate to people of other origins.

What the minister has said about sponsored immigration causes me very considerable concern. The minister stated that he was making some basic changes, but what he said sounded to me excessively restrictive. It is clear that he has introduced into sponsored immigration the whole question of skills.

In order to get sponsorship on a balanced basis from all continents, what he has done is to take away from some. He said he has made no change. In fact, Mr. Speaker, when you examine his statement carefully it becomes quite clear that he has severely restricted sponsored immigration from certain of the countries where it is now at a very high level. If I understand the minister aright, and I think I do, there will be many heartbreaks and much anxiety and unrest over this new policy.

The minister during the last week publicly made some very inconsistent statements about skilled and unskilled immigration. Our immigration cannot be restricted solely to skilled persons. I wonder how many ancestors of the members of this house would ever have entered Canada if admission had then been restricted to skilled persons. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we must be realistic about this question of skills and sponsorship. There is a role for persons without special skills, and we must not by selective standards or restrictions on sponsorship discriminate in fact against admissions from many countries in the world.

I hope that in the committee there will be an exhaustive study and a vigorous discussion of the white paper. I also hope there will be vigorous discussion of this white paper by informed persons in all parts of Canada. But I suggest to the government that they should now introduce the bill to revise the Immigration Act so we would have it before us in the committee as well as the white paper. This would enable knowledgeable persons to be heard as witnesses and all would be given a chance to make a contribution, not only to the development of this policy but to its implementation, in a fully revised immigration act.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we in this party welcome this white paper. If I may adopt the metaphor used by the hon. member for Carleton because of the very long period of gestation we would have been inclined to welcome it even if we had thought it was an ill favoured document. However, I must say that it is a white paper which should not be so described. I cannot help recalling that the various Conservative midwives failed to produce any white paper at all.

We promise and urge the most intensive scrutiny of this at the earliest possible time in the appropriate committee of the house, for the earliest possible embodiment of some of the proposals in the white paper in legislative form. We say this because we believe this bill may foretell a very serious and important improvement in immigration procedures in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we welcome, first of all, the fact that this white paper is expansionist in outlook. This is as it should be. This country in the future, as in the past, must depend for its growth and prosperity on the welcome and intelligent expansionist policy in Canada to those whom we can attract to this country.

Second, we welcome that part of the bill which is non-discriminatory. This is very important to the good name of Canada, and this is something we have not achieved in the past. It is very important that we not only change the regulations in regard to sponsorship which the white paper suggests, but we should go further and change those provisions in the act which lend themselves to continued discrimination. Also, while mentioning this subject of sponsorship, there are some matters here that we want to look into very carefully.

I also notice in one part of the paper relating to this matter that it is suggested that non-citizens who are permanent residents will have the same sponsorship privileges for the next six years, but thereafter non-citizens may sponsor only dependent relatives. This seems an odd compromise. If it is a good policy it should not be for six years but should stay indefinitely. If it is bad policy it should not be in for six years. This is a compromise. We want to look into the sponsorship provision very carefully, because it is important to get skilled people here, and skilled people will not come to Canada unless they are given reasonable opportunity to sponsor their relatives into this country. We want to make sure we are not being discriminatory in that way.

One last point I want to make is that unless effective changes are made in procedure, the whole thing may be illusory or delusory. Today we have quite a fair immigration act and quite good regulations. The minister and the machinery exist. But if by a simple fiat people can be and are excluded, the administrative machinery can defeat the best intentions. We propose during the scrutiny of these matters to make sure that the procedures coincide with the basic principles of elementary justice, which has not been the case in the past. We invite the co-operation of all members of the house. This part is not too clear, but we want to make sure that it becomes clear.

Finally we welcome the fact that the white paper proposes a change which we feel is essential; that is that the minister's discretion, which cannot but be exercised from time to time on political grounds, is now to be handed over to a judicial tribunal. There is a necessity for discretion, and no amount of rules can get over the human complexities of the problem, no matter how well worked out those rules may be. But the right of exercising discretion should be in some entity other than the political authority. Many of the scandals and difficulties of the past have arisen because of our failure to regard this rule.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, we welcome this white paper, and we offer the full co-operation of the members of this party, some of whom have had experience in this matter over the years. We do this in the hope that this white paper is not a stillborn child. We hope it will grow into an effective change of policy.

• (11:30 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, our group wishes to congratulate the minister for speeding up as much as possible the tabling of that white paper.

Of course, like any other citizen, the minister must base such policies on human principles. I note that the minister stated, not only in the highlights of his plans about immigration but also in his remarks a little earlier, that the Canadian policy on immigration did not discriminate with regard to colour, race and religious beliefs.

The minister could just as easily have said that, from a humanitarian point of view, there are no frontiers, all people are equal.

[Mr. Brewin.]

However, Mr. Speaker, any organized society is governed by regulations, and frontiers may be said to represent the scars of living history, both present and past. In a society of this type there must be regulations.

And I see that government policy tends to bring down as many barriers as possible to do a service not only to the Canadian people but also to citizens from beyond our frontiers.

However, Mr. Speaker, we should not act hypocritically when I hear the minister talk about allowing a greater number of skilled immigrants. Nor should we apply any discrimination. And here perhaps I see a problem. The Department of Immigration and the government in power at any given time will be faced with a problem dealing with underdeveloped countries and it will be impossible for us to invoke hypocritically the following saying or principle: Let us serve ourselves by helping others, or by serving others. What I mean by this is that there are underdeveloped countries with which we exchange students in order to give them at least skilled labour, and very often we find that those people return to their countries and immediately apply for residence in Canada as Canadian citizens. Therefore, in the long run we are not helping those underdeveloped countries.

In our immigration policy, we must also consider the humanitarian angle. If we help them today, let us make sure that we will never lose sight of the reason why we did it. The minister will admit that, under the circumstances, a problem might arise. Of course, in such a bill it is one out of thousands which will come up. On the other hand, I am happy that, with his new immigration policy, the minister seems to realize that the people are a country's true wealth and that he will try more and more to bring human capital to Canada, which will truly develop our nation from all points of view and I hope that, in due course, he will try to keep foreign capital away, because the true wealth of a country is its human capital and its productive value. Such a policy does not mean, for instance, that we will open the door to everyone. Let us welcome suitable people and try to keep out the undesirables.

And, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insist on the fact—I do not see it in the white paper and, of course, I have not had time to study it thoroughly, but that will come when the bill is introduced in the house—that as much as possible the provinces should have a say in the matter, the federal parliament should not behave as lord and master but ask the advice of the provinces, and find out what their needs are. If they have no need for it, let us not overlook the governments dependent on this one; I mean the provincial and municipal governments, the school boards or any organization which might be interested in immigration, either directly or indirectly. I think that the minister did not mention, at least not explicitly, his intentions on that score. However, I know the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and I am convinced beforehand that he has already thought about that problem. It would prevent a lot of discussion on the matter, which is so complex, if we sought more and more the advice of the provinces where those immigrants would live.

I see that the minister has given himself a trial period of six years. Anything can be expected. In the meantime we must keep our eyes open, make the necessary changes and come up in the end with an immigration policy which will benefit our country and all mankind.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): We in this party congratulate the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on having brought in this white paper. I think we all realize it has been a long time coming, but it certainly fills a vacuum which has been developing over the years in this field.

I am particularly pleased with the last paragraph of the minister's statement in which he says it will be necessary to explore these proposals with care and consideration, and that to assist in doing so a special joint committee will be set up to study the white paper before any legislation is drafted. I think this is a wise move, and I hope the minister will see that this committee is set up as soon as possible so there may be additional opportunity for a thorough study before legislation to change the present immigration laws is brought in. There is a great deal of urgency in this regard.

Without going into the details of these recommendations, I would say that the program is expansive in its concept and deals with very important aspects of immigration. History shows that our greatest periods of prosperity as a nation have been those periods when there have been great numbers of immigrants. Certainly we cannot but give our full support to the non-discriminatory aspects of the proposals.

As far as sponsorship is concerned, I think there needs to be further discussion of this topic. Whether it is going too far to allow non-citizens, for a period of six years, to sponsor immigrants other than direct dependants, might be questioned. However, as I say this is part of a problem which should be discussed further in the special joint committee.

Therefore, without going into detail, but emphasizing once more our satisfaction that this white paper is before us, we urge the minister to have this special committee begin its work as early as possible, and to bring in legislation as soon as that committee has completed a reasonable amount of study.

WATER RESOURCES

UNITED STATES CONFERENCE ON WATER FOR PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister received notice of any revision in the timetable of the world conference on water called by President Johnson for next May?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First I want to say that we have not yet received a formal invitation to the conference. As the hon. member read in the press, congress has refused to vote certain funds for the organization of the conference. However, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has written to Washington expressing our desire to co-operate, as well as our concern about the timing and procedure of the conference.

Mr. Aiken: As a supplementary question, aside from the letter which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has written, has there been any other protest or objection filed concerning the pressures placed upon Canada by the time of calling, and by the President's accompanying remarks?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, in the letter which the Secretary of State for External Affairs wrote he offered a few suggestions as to the timing and the procedure to be followed.

THE MINISTRY

CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTIONS PASSED AT POLITICAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his statement that the bilingual proposal was simply a resolution passed at a political conference, may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether this applies equally to the other resolutions passed at the recent Liberal convention, and particularly does it apply to the resolution expressing the hope that medicare might be introduced prior to July 1, 1968?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend will know from his long experience with conventions of his own party that resolutions serve as a guide, and we on this side take them very seriously as a guide to policy. But resolutions themselves do not establish policy, and in respect of the resolution on bilingualism, which we undoubtedly will consider, I would like to point out that the policy of the government on that matter was laid down in the house on April 6.

That policy provided for bilingualism in the civil service being achieved under conditions which would be fair to all concerned and not prejudice the position of those who do not have the good fortune to be bilingual. We treat that resolution seriously. We treat all resolutions seriously because they are guides to policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Then as a supplementary question may I ask the Prime Minister whether the resolution suggesting that medicare would be introduced prior to July 1, 1968 represents government policy.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As soon as we are fortunate enough to reach the committee stage of the medicare bill my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for the bill, will be making proposals which I am sure will satisfy the hon. member in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) a supplementary question to that put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) on bilingualism.

Could he tell us when the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism will submit its report and whether he has heard anything about that?

[Mr. Douglas.]

[English]

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report. I have tried to keep in touch with the commission from time to time, expressing the hope that they will be able to make a report without undue delay.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS FOR CROP MOVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance who answers in the house for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the very large crop, the harvesting of which has just been completed in western Canada, and in view of what appear to be very favourable marketing conditions for this crop, have there been any meetings between the minister and the wheat board and the railways to establish targets for the amount of grain to be shipped during this crop year, as was done last year? If so, what targets or goals have the railways accepted for this shipping period?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of Transport and I have been very much concerned to see that the wheat board moves as much grain as possible. The railways are co-operating to an unprecedented degree. Indeed, it is now quite clear, as a result of their gearing up for these large movements, that the possibilities for crop movement are very much greater than anyone had ever thought.

Mr. Olson: As a supplementary question I would like to ask the minister whether the railways have given any commitment as to the amount of grain they would be prepared to move between now and July 31 next, such as they gave the year previously?

Mr. Sharp: We have not discussed specific targets, Mr. Speaker. We are quite satisfied that the amount of wheat or grain they will move will be far larger than ever before, and we do not want to limit them by putting a target on the total.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in the minister's discussions with the railways was he able to find out whether there will be more box cars available this year than last year, and whether the railways have succeeded in reducing the number of Canadian box cars which are located in the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall take notice of that question.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Has he initiated any talks with the elevator and terminal companies with a view to improving their facilities for handling additional quantities of grain over what they have been able to handle in the past?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the wheat board is engaged in this endeavour every working day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF ACQUISITION OF F-5 PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. As a result of the United States defence department deciding not to buy the F-5 is any reconsideration being given by Canadian defence authorities with respect to the acquisition of similar aircraft for Canadian forces, either in the present quantities suggested or in reduced quantities?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. We were quite aware of the feelings of various people in the department of defence in Washington at the time our decision was made. Our decision was based on the needs of the Canadian armed forces and not on the needs of the United States air force.

Mr. Lambert: Then in what way does the minister justify his original statement that his decision was based on the decision taken by the United States forces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That supplementary question is argumentative.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

SUGGESTED DISBANDING OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the projected costs of the bilingual and bicultural commission, which I understand were recently calculated by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), as possibly totalling as much as $7 million, and in view of the minister's desire to cut down expenditures, would he disband that commission now and save the taxpayers an additional $3 million?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—SALES TAX IN EFFECT WHEN TREATY SIGNED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which intrigues a good number of us. Can the minister inform the house whether the 11 per cent federal sales tax on machinery was in effect when the Columbia river agreement between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia was signed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This intriguing question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should answer a question asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Kootenay West and addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The answer is yes.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN OTTAWA-TORONTO SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if he would use his good offices to expand and increase the services of Air Canada between Ottawa and Toronto.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of his intention to raise this matter, which I believe is of concern to many hon. members who, I am told, are having considerable difficulty getting to Toronto on Fridays.

Mr. Churchill: And other days as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall bring these representations to the attention of Air Canada in the hope that something can be done to improve the situation. Of course the hon. gentleman knows I do not direct Air Canada; I merely report for it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

DORION, QUE.—INVESTIGATION INTO LEVEL CROSSING ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I wish to answer two questions which were asked me yesterday. One was by the hon. member for Lotbinière, who asked about the matter of a public inquiry and the way in which it would be set up, into the regrettable accident at Dorion. Until the preliminary investigations are completed and the inquest has been held it would not be proper to set any date for the inquiry, but as soon as it is proper public notice will be given, and every person who has written to the board will be advised by letter.

I might also say in reply to a related question asked by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that I am told there have been some discussions between the Board of Transport Commissioners and the municipality about an overpass or underpass, but according to my information, up to the present time there has been no formal application.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DESIGNATION OF CAPITAL OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the recommendation of the Carrothers commission on the Northwest Territories that the capital be designated by the government, when might we expect some decision on this matter of importance to the people of the Northwest Territories?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to discuss the matter with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is out of town today, and perhaps he could reply to the question next week.

GLEICHEN, ALTA.—REQUEST FOR HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious hospital situation at Gleichen, Alberta, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the Alberta provincial government has approached the federal government for the usual federal grant of $2,000 per bed to help build a hospital there.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to intervene at this point because I realize this matter is of great interest to the hon. member, but it seems to me the type of information he is seeking could be obtained in some way other than by asking a question at this time.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED INTENTION TO REMOVE ROYAL COAT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is he in a position to confirm or deny reports that the royal coat of arms which appears on all mail trucks, bags and other things used to move Her Majesty's mail is to be removed and replaced by another symbol?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are going to adopt an emblem which will represent a truly Canadian post office and which will give a real interpretation to the Post Office Act.

Mr. Hales: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Postmaster General not feel that a matter of such importance, involving a symbol of such long standing tradition, should have been discussed in committee or by this house?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The suggestion made by the hon. member is argumentative.

Mr. Churchill: We would like an answer.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to infer from the minister's decision just announced that in the view of the government the mail is no longer to be Her Majesty's mail?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): The mail has never been Her Majesty's mail, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question to direct to the Postmaster General. In view of his statement that the mail has never been Her Majesty's mail, will he explain the significance of the use of the initials "O.H.M.S." and indicate what his department intends to do about the use of these initials?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF APPEAL PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Now that the white paper has been produced is the minister prepared to bring forward a new immigration act? Let me give him an example of what I wish to bring to his attention. When an inquiry takes place to determine the right of a foreigner to remain in Canada, if he is arrested and bail is refused by an inquiry officer the minister's department now takes the position in no uncertain terms that the individual has no right to appeal to a high court. The result is that in some cases men and women from other lands remain in jail for as long as 80 days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I could not determine whether the hon. member was making a statement or asking a question. If he is asking a question perhaps he will indicate what it is, and indicate its urgency.

Mr. Woolliams: The urgency of this matter relates to the fact that there are a number of men and women from other lands in jails in Canada under the provisions of the Immigration Act. My question was very simple. Is the minister prepared now to bring in a new immigration act which will rectify the situation to which I have referred? I should like to hear from the minister in this regard.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is now a bill before this house relating to the board of appeal. I believe that when this bill is adopted by the house these new immigrants will have the right to appeal and decisions will be made much sooner than they are made now.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question. This bill will be discussed at a later date, but I should like to ask the minister to consider this situation because there are men and women incarcerated in jails in Canada without any right to bail, while awaiting long inquiries to be made by his department.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will look into the situation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MALTON, ONT.—LAY-OFFS AT DOUGLAS AIRCRAFT PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question posed yesterday by the hon. member for York South concerning a situation at the Douglas Aircraft plant at Malton.

The company says that it is a coincidence that a shortage of parts has necessitated the lay-off of assembly workers under training just prior to the arrival, on October 25, of a group of skilled immigrants recruited by the company in Britain. If that is so the coincidence is certainly unfortunate. Officials of my department are keeping in close touch with the situation and with the Ontario government, which supports the on the job training program at the plant. I will inform the hon. member what action, if any, is called for as soon as I have the full information needed to make such a determination.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR PRIOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF UNIFICATION AND INTEGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is designed to be cooperative and constructive, and I should like to address it to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to a very serious matter. In view of the criticism, confusion and turmoil relative to the policy of integration and unification of the armed forces, will he now reconsider his decision not to have the defence committee meet until government policy in respect of the proposed legislation has in principle become a fait accompli?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have been giving this matter a great deal of consideration, and one of the points that arose in my mind was the responsibility that this house has for taking decisions on principle. I also considered the fact that the government in presenting legislation is accepting a responsibility for the principle that it espouses.

In view of those circumstances I feel it would be an abdication of the responsibility of government and of this house not to deal with the matter in principle. For that reason I believe we should follow the normal course. I can assure my hon. friend that I will be prepared to produce the information and evidence required to satisfy the majority of the members of this house that the policy is indeed good and progressive, and will meet the needs of the military forces of this country in the future. In so far as any details are concerned, they will be made available by the military staffs at the time the bill is being considered by the standing committee on national defence.

Mr. Winch: I have a supplementary question. In view of the emphatic and point blank answer given by the minister I should now like to ask him what I believe is a logical question. Does he take the position that the defence committee of this House of Commons is merely a rubber stamp in respect of government policy and legislation?

Mr. Hellyer: Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. My belief is quite to the contrary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the supplementary question asked by the hon. member is argumentative.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I listened to the minister's answer with great interest. Can he explain why the government is going the other way around in respect of its procedure on the white paper immigration policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hellyer: To my knowledge that is not the case, Mr. Speaker, but I will refer that question to my colleague who is responsible for these matters.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question I intended to direct to the Secretary of State, but in her absence perhaps I should direct it to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. When does the government intend to introduce the promised legislation on broadcasting?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the white paper has to be considered by the standing committee first. I do not believe this legislation will be brought forward for some time, for the additional reason we have quite a bit of legislation on the order paper which we have been trying to deal with first. We lost a couple of days last week. We hope to move ahead with the broadcasting legislation as soon as the committee has dealt with the white paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister indicate whether it is intended to bring this legislation forward at the present session of parliament?

Mr. McIlraith: It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State answered this question yesterday. I will look up that answer and repeat it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a related question I should like to direct to the minister who acts on behalf of the Secretary of State in her absence. I was wondering whether the minister would convey to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the suggestion that the program "Preview Commentary" might be more properly entitled "Liberal Commentary".

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED GRANT TO SAFETY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that death on the highways is considered to be Canada's No. 1 health problem, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell the house to what extent the grant to the Canada Highway Safety Council will be increased?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the most recent grant made by the department to the council was greater than the previous grant. We have the representations of the council under consideration and if there is any further change in the extent of the grant, it will be announced in the house.

INDUSTRY

INFORMATION ON OPERATIONS OF FOREIGN COMPANIES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the widespread interest in the information being collected by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics about the operation of foreign corporations in Canada, can the minister say if this work is now completed and whether it is his intention to make this information available to the house?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of valuable information is being obtained. We are now learning more about the operations of subsidiary companies in Canada than we ever knew before. Much of the information is being submitted on the understanding that it will be kept private, in that it has a bearing upon the competitive position of the companies. The information is now being assembled, and to the extent that I can do so I will be glad to make it available to hon. members of the house when my estimates are under consideration.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great interest and the need of people carrying out studies of this kind in Canada, will this information be collected in a form that will be available to the economists who are working in this field?

Mr. Winters: To the greatest extent possible, consistent with the secrecy aspects of some of the information.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ROLE OF CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I see has left the house. I gave him notice of the question. I should now like to address it to the Prime Minister. In the light of the reported discussion between the President of the United States and the Chancellor of West Germany relating to a searching reappraisal of the threat to Atlantic security and the existence of a three nation—that is, American, German and British—study of changed force levels in NATO, does the Canadian government contemplate taking any steps to notify the representatives of these three governments of a desire to alter the future role of Canadian forces in NATO?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty far reaching question. I know this matter is under discussion not only by the three members concerned but by the NATO council. Before I say anything more than that I think I had better discuss the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I believe was prepared to answer the question but was called out of the house.

OLD AGE SECURITY

CONTINUATION OF PAYMENTS TO DEPENDANTS OF DECEASED PENSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he say what consideration is being given to the request of the pensioners and senior citizens federation of Canada that the old age pension of a deceased pensioner be continued for six months in order that the surviving spouse be enabled to meet debts incurred by terminal illness?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am just wondering whether this is not the type of question that should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Mather: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INITIAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister reporting for the Canadian Wheat Board. I would ask the minister if he is now in a position to say whether any decision has been taken relative to the proposal that the initial payments on western wheat, oats and barley be increased.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance following the question asked by the hon. member for Springfield regarding the initial prices of wheat, oats and barley. Does the Minister of Finance, like the Prime Minister, take seriously the resolutions that were passed at the recent Liberal convention? I believe there was one involving this particular matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating a question that was asked earlier today.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

REPORT OF INQUIRY INTO FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister received the report of the McIvor commission and, if so, when will it be made public?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the report has been received by the Prime Minister. The translation is expected to be completed today or Monday, and it will be tabled early next week.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT ELECTIONS BE NOT HELD ON SUNDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister assure the house that in any legislation arising out of the report of the committee on election expenses no consideration will be given by the government to holding federal elections on a Sunday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should be asked to give an assurance of that kind, though personally I would not hesitate to do so. The report of the committee will be submitted to a committee of this house. I think it is a parliamentary matter even though it is also a governmental matter, and before the committee has had a chance to examine it I should not like to say anything more.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Should a democratically elected Quebec government proclaim the independence of Quebec, would the federal government use the army to prevent the province's independence, as stated by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard)?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is highly hypothetical.

Mr. Grégoire: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. As he will recall, two or three times in the earlier part of this session he indicated that he was personally agreeable to the idea of enlarging the terms of reference of the joint committee on the public service so that it might consider the question of the pensions of retired civil servants. Can the minister say whether the necessary motion to enlarge the terms of reference accordingly has yet been drafted?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been discussed further with my colleagues than was mentioned in the house. I expressed a personal opinion at that time. However, I should like to say that we are most anxious to have this committee complete the work it has before it at the moment in order to get the collective bargaining legislation before the house as soon as possible.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not recall that the request was that this matter be dealt with after the collective bargaining legislation had been concluded? Would he therefore keep the matter in mind?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question is argumentative; the hon. member is asking whether the minister recalls or does not recall something which he may or may not have said before. That is not a proper question.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure he does recall it.

TRADE

GATT—SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN NEGOTIATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce the urgency of which I think is apparent from the limited time left for the negotiations under the Kennedy round on tariffs. In view of the resolution passed recently in this city, will the minister instruct the negotiating team to take a more liberal policy with regard to the negotiations in Geneva, or is this just another resolution?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think all hon. members know that Canada is in the forefront of those nations seeking a liberalization of trade, and we will continue to be so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INVESTIGATION INTO GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the continuing unrest among postal employees about the conditions under which they work, when can we expect the tabling of the Montpetit report?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet received the Montpetit report. We were expecting it on the 13th of this month, but my most recent inquiries reveal that it will be received definitely by the 18th. So it will be Monday or Tuesday at the latest.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FAMILY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Considering that the government is trying its utmost to bring the income of elderly citizens in line with the cost of living by guaranteeing a minimum of $105 a month instead of $75, could the minister tell us whether or not he intends to increase, in the same proportion and for the same reason, the family allowances of $6 and $8 a month paid to Canadian children under 16 years of age?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF NON-DISCRIMINATION POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a riding with the heaviest ethnic grouping west of Toronto, I claim your indulgence to allow me to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the principle in the immigration policy which he announced verbally and in the white paper of non-discrimination on the basis of race and colour, I would like to ask him whether this will be the policy followed by his department prior to the introduction of the new legislation.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, right now there are differences between the sponsorship rights of Europeans and those of Asians. This is in our law and of course it cannot be changed before the law itself is changed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASES FOR CLERICAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he would undertake to look into the long delay in the salary increases announced under class B, which includes the secretarial staff of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Without accepting the preamble to the question, I will be glad to look into the matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night, I was dealing with the excessive cost of such a medicare plan. It is expected that in 1971, it would cost $4,481 million, of which 85 per cent would be paid by the various governments. It must be emphasized that governments would then have to seek additional revenue without, for all that, crushing the taxpayers, who are already overburdened with all kinds of taxes and contributions.

Countries where such programs were established without preparation or adequate planning were faced with financial problems bordering on disaster. In England, the national health service was supposed to cost $390 million per year. After one year, however, its cost exceeded $1 billion. In 1960, it had reached almost $2 billion.

In Sweden, the initial cost of compulsory insurance, forecast 14 years ago, went up by 500 per cent. In France, the social security deficit reaches the fantastic figure of 1 billion N.F. The plan for the modernization and increase of hospitals and research laboratories in France is 30 years late, due to a lack of funds. Out of 150,000 hospital beds, 140,000 were provided before 1940. At the Lariboisière hospital in Paris, there are only 13 showers—one for 71 beds—150 basins, 56 water closets—one for 17 beds.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are a few considerations which indicate the complexity of a medicare scheme and the minister or the government should prove that governments are now in a position, considering present and future economic and financial conditions, to meet such obligations. But no explanation has yet been given in that connection. Indeed, that is why provincial governments have been protesting so strongly and so bitterly in the last several months. As a matter of fact, eight provinces have demanded a revision of Bill C-227, not only as far as the principle is concerned but also the provisions, the priorities and the phases to establish.

Ontario and Alberta have objected to the criteria, to the four conditions required by Ottawa. Manitoba has also made reservations. The three maritime provinces which took part in the meeting asked for improvements to this legislation, Bill No. C-227.

Even Mr. Ross Thatcher premier of Saskatchewan, a province already enjoying a provincial plan, has asked for a review of the bill before us because important things were left out for instance, the administrative costs. The province of Ontario has requested a revision of Bill C-227 for several reasons which are reflected in the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative party. And the province of Quebec, through the hon. Jean-Jacques Bertrand, said that it would never accept the condition imposed by Ottawa.

Such is the situation. That is the spirit in which we consider this bill which is refused or criticized by eight important provinces in our country. But in spite of those protests, those warnings, those anxieties, the government is going ahead. It continues to increase the pressure, the confusion and the disagreement between the central administration and the provinces.

Ottawa must be strong, and have a strong government which must crush all the provincial governments, without any regard for their aspirations, their administrative wisdom, their social and economic environment, the characteristics of the people living in those provinces whereas in 1867, the Canadian constitution entrusted all those regional and local matters, including health, to the provinces. This is the course followed by the present government.

I appreciate that this is not the first time I raise the question, somewhat like St. John the Baptist who was preaching in the wilderness. I will not stop as long as the people of the riding of Sherbrooke will send me as their representative in this house, to defend the rights of the provinces and of Canadian citizens, and to warn the federal government, which is Liberal at the present time, to stop it omnipotence, to stop poking its nose into fields of all kinds, especially in fields where it has no business.

The present government advocates a very vicious principle. Let them remember a statement by a great Liberal of the past, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said that it was absolutely wrong and unacceptable that this Canadian government, in a well-conceived federalism, should levy taxes which through distribution to other governments, would be spent by them.

Fundamentally this is extremely vicious. And this statement, this idea of federalism originated in the mind of a great Liberal of days gone by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The present Liberal government is devoid of consideration, of tactfulness, in short its members have no idea of true federalism. We are in a constitutional chaos, Mr. Speaker, a chaos which must be denounced because it goes against the aspirations and the wishes of the provincial governments.

What will be the outcome if the present federal government continues to push its way around in all fields? We will have a unitarian system of government, because the provinces will withdraw. Is this what the present government wants? No, but it refuses to meet with the provinces again in order to reach an agreement concerning the different standards.

Mr. Speaker, some provinces have made a list of priorities. For some, health is the most important consideration, for others it is education or sectors of the economy. But the present federal government disregards all this. It wants to pass legislation on a national scale with regard to the economy and in all other fields, which is contrary and destructive to the principle of federalism and which emphasizes disunion and pressures in the country. The government is responsible for this. It does this with a sort of unconcern which is entirely reprehensible.

I say it is an extension of co-operative federalism, of centralization. It is another example of the famous co-operative federalism some members of the government talk about in various parts of the country.

Mr. Speaker, in 1919 Ottawa first passed an act to help fight venereal diseases and create a public health department. Then, in 1944, the federal government established the Department of National Health and Welfare. Followed in 1948 a national hygiene and health program providing 13 subsidies. Later, in 1957, it passed the act on hospital insurance. Those are all matters belonging to the field of health and social welfare which, according to the spirit of the constitution, were to fall exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

And this is extended further today; naturally, the tentacles reach further. Now we have medicare. Co-operative federalism has become, facts prove it, coercive federalism. Four conditions are laid down, then the provinces are told: accept that, launch your own medicare program, and we will pay so much provided you meet our four requirements. Well, that is not co-operation; it is trespassing, coercion.

Moreover, it is not true that the federal government can spend as it sees fit. It must have sufficient revenues to provide for its responsibilities and jurisdiction as outlined, amongst others, in section 91 of the constitution. But it is erroneous and malevolent to maintain that the government in Ottawa can levy most of the taxes in Canada, spend the money according to its own wishes and invade provincial fields of administration. The interest the federal government may have in a problem does not allow it to legislate on such matters as are the express responsibility of another government.

The present federal government is concerned about health and sickness problems in Canada. But other governments have dealt with those problems before, namely in Saskatchewan and Ontario. Just because the federal government decides one fine day to do something about it, because its coffers are full while those of provincial governments are almost empty, does not give it the right to meddle with problems which fall within provincial jurisdiction and responsibility. Interest in the matter does not create a right.

[English]

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question of the hon. member? Does he think the provinces to which he has referred would object because the federal government, as a result of its interest in health, through ancillary legislation paid half the cost of maintaining the good health of their citizens, as I understand this bill seeks to do?

Mr. Allard: Would the hon. member repeat his question? I had a bad translation here.

Mr. Winch: In view of the hon. member's remarks relating to the lack of authority of the federal government in this field, and in view of the national interest in health, does the hon. member feel the provinces he mentioned would object to the federal government paying half the cost of maintaining the health of the citizens of those provinces? Would you object, or do you think the provinces would object?

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand very well what the hon. member wants to say by relying on the interpretation. It might be better for me to listen first to what he has to say in his mother tongue, if he is kind enough to repeat his question in English.

[English]

Mr. Winch: In view of what the hon. member said before I took it that he was objecting to the federal interest in the health of the people because that comes within provincial jurisdiction. Does the hon. member consider that there should be objection by the provinces when the federal authority, in an ancillary manner, is prepared to pay half the cost of the medical requirements of the citizens of a province? Does he object, as well as expressing the view that perhaps the provinces would object to this financial assistance?

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Allard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I explained a while ago that I object to this measure simply because the federal government does not give back to the provinces an adequate share of the amounts collected in these taxation fields.

The government keeps in its coffers the revenues collected in these taxation fields to deal with all kinds of things, namely medicare. I think, however—and I am not alone in thinking that way—that the provinces can very well look after this matter. Besides, some provinces have already started to do it successfully.

Another point, which explains my objection to this bill, is that a province which will not participate in the medicare program, according to the provisions of Bill No. C-227, will not receive fiscal adjustments before 1972. This is a serious discrimination, because we know that the province of Quebec will opt out of the national medicare program and that until 1972, it cannot receive, as in other fields, any fiscal adjustments. This is discriminatory because the taxes paid by the Quebec citizens to the central government, will help provide funds for a national medicare program, but these same Quebec citizens will also, through a portion of taxes they pay to the Quebec government, pay for a provincial medicare program. This is unjust and discriminatory; it is a serious matter which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and this government should have agreed to negotiate and discuss with the Quebec government. He knew very well, as he knows now, that the Quebec government with its self-governing policy and its special hospital and health condition, would not be interested in participating in a national medicare program.

In clause 8 namely, the minister should have provided for fiscal adjustments for this first term until 1972, expecially to exclude such discrimination and injustice to Quebec citizens.

[English]

Mr. Winch: Why the interest then?

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: We, the Quebec people, (I wonder whether the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), can understand that it is not because of a lack of interest in Canada) want to mind our own business and administer the areas under our jurisdiction. We do not want our own responsibilities to be taken over by another government, it is as simple as that.

And this is why when we agreed to a political system in 1867, we quoted, as we often do, the provisions of that 1867 constitution which put into the hands of the provinces, in section 92 and others, in view of its structure and its wording, all the social, civil, local and regional matters and professional problems. This is why, when we speak here we take our stand on the constitution, and I do not think that we are foreigners in this country, but we want to look after our own business. This does not mean that we have a grudge against the other citizens of our country; on the contrary, we like them, we appreciate them, we like to meet them, to visit them, and we consider ourselves Canadian as much as anyone else in this country. We want to administer the fields coming under our jurisdiction, but we would be loath, however, to give anybody the impression that we want to be difficult and that we do not consider ourselves as 100 per cent Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, it is on these particular grounds that I object to this bill and that I shall vote against it. If all other hon. members vote in favour of this bill, there will at least by my own objection, since I do not favour the bill, mainly for the reasons I have indicated.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the debate thus far has brought forth suggestions from several hon. members who have participated to the effect that unfortunately the implementation of this important legislation has been surrounded by an atmosphere of electioneering. I think the hon. member for Dollard raised this point.

At the outset I should like to indicate, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a new phenomenon. This has been the atmosphere that has prevailed, as our friends in the New Democratic Party keep insisting, since the subject was first raised back in 1919.

The first statesmanlike approach to the problem of the urgent necessity of providing Canada with an adequate health care program was the appointment of the Hall royal commission in 1960. This enabled the subject to be raised from the level of electioneering and political cut and thrust and to have an objective and comprehensive look taken at the whole situation.

Hon. members on all sides of the house have agreed that the report of the Hall royal commission more than justified its appointment. It has laid down a health charter which, if implemented, will provide Canada and Canadians with the best possible health care program. When I say a health care program I do not limit it to the medicare scheme presented to us in this Bill No. C-227. I think one of the basic criticisms that can be made against the bill is that it moves only to deal with a small segment of the whole problem of health care in the modern state.

It is not necessary for me to review the basic recommendations of the Hall commission report. I think it is obvious to all—and this view has already been expressed during the debate on second reading—that the present bill falls far short of implementing many of the objectives of the Hall commission report.

This has resulted from the government's failure to carry out adequate consultation with the governments most concerned, namely the provincial governments. When the legislation was first mooted the former minister of national health and welfare who is now Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) indicated to the provincial governments that there would be, as had been recommended by the Hall commission report, a federal-provincial health conference which would make it possible for the governments most concerned to bring their representations, which were based on the report, to the attention of the federal authority.

As I recall it, Mr. Speaker, one of the meetings held along these lines was attended by the former minister, and the next meeting was attended by the new minister, who presented to the provincial health ministers a fait accompli. He laid down a rather rigid set of criteria comprising four points that are well known to the members of this house, and created a sense of frustration in governments at the provincial level which has resulted in the present difficulties which confront us in considering this legislation.

There was a great desire on the part of the government to get the legislation before the house. It came up first of all last July when we were anticipating a summer recess, and an attempt was made to complete second reading at that stage. I was bold enough at that time, Mr. Speaker, to prophesy that the target date that was laid down by the minister, of July 1, 1967 for implementation of medicare, would not be met. I know it is not perhaps quite the thing to quote your own speeches, but as reported at page 7589 of Hansard for July 12 I was bold enough to say:

> I scarcely believe, however, that on the basis of past performance, at least during the 15 years I have been in this house, we are going to have a comprehensive and absolutely complete program in operation as early as the beginning of our 100th birthday.

In other words, on the basis of the past performance of the government we could have anticipated that the target date put forward by the minister was not a realistic one in many respects and would inevitably have to be altered. And this has been the case; there has been a postponement.

I do not think it is adequate, Mr. Speaker, for a government charged with the responsibility of implementing a health charter of the quality of the Hall commission report to operate on the basis of electioneering propaganda. The hon. member for Dollard indicated that the opposition groups were operating on this basis. I think it has become crystal clear in recent months that this piece of legislation, along with other basic matters in Canada, has become part of a game of oneupmanship which is being used by responsible ministers to establish their claim to succession in a perpetual and perennial Liberal leadership race. The headlines in the daily press talk about the contest of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) v. the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). At one time the Minister of Finance is in the lead; at another time the member for Davenport is in the lead. At other times it is a contest of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) v. the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer).

I had the impression, when the minister endeavoured to rush this legislation through last July, that it was his contribution to the game of oneupmanship. Then if the program does not proceed according to the schedule recommended by the minister there is the constant threat of resignation. That is a confusing and awkward way to run a country, I suggest.

Providing a comprehensive health insurance program for Canada is not an item in the leadership race. This is an opportunity to provide adequate health care, as set out for us in the Hall commission report which, I reiterate, goes much further than the concept of medicare as laid out in Bill No. C-227.

It is for this reason that the members of the official opposition have seized the opportunity, made possible by the government's delay in implementing the legislation, to bring the health care program more closely into line with the recommendations of the Hall commission. After all, it was the Conservative government which set up this royal commission in an attempt to get the subject out of the realm of politics and perpetual electioneering. That is why I am happy to be the seconder of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard).

In the field of health care medicare is not a new concept. In fact it goes back to the last century, to Chancellor Bismarck of Germany. It is very interesting to hear the various parties in this house competing with one another for the distinction of being the fathers of medicare. Most countries other than Canada and the United States of America, as North American countries, already have programs in operation.

I do not think it is a fact unknown to most members in the house that these programs have developed serious problems. The United Kingdom program, for example, has headed inevitably into the difficulties of bed shortages and personnel shortages which threaten to become chronic. Sweden, which has often been pointed to as the paragon of the socialist paradise, particularly by members of the New Democratic party, has run into even greater difficulties in the operation of its scheme. There is such a shortage of personnel that they have to close down many of their hospitals during the summer. The latest figures, as I understand, indicate that some 4,000 Swedish citizens are on the waiting list for operations. The problem is not only financial, Mr. Speaker. It also involves, as has been amply demonstrated by experiences in other countries careful planning and co-ordination.

It is not good enough for hon. members in this house to say that they accept a bill—any bill—that purports to deal with this urgent problem. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that his group would vote for any bill which gets Canada started in the direction of medicare. I think that is hardly a responsible position. If there were great urgency, or if the scheme were to be implemented within the few months as originally indicated, namely by next July, perhaps there would be justification for that position. But here we have almost a two year interval, and we are debating the issue now. We are rushing into it as part of a game of oneupmanship. I suggest that the delay initiated by the government itself makes it possible for hon. members of this house to deal adequately, thoroughly and responsibly with the bill so the obvious gaps I shall point out in a moment can be dealt with.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), intervening in the debate yesterday, suggested that in putting forward amendments members of the Conservative party are against the bill, and that they are endeavouring to kill the bill. It has virtually been killed by the government's delay. I repeat what I said at the resolution stage, that rather than being against the bill it ought to be remembered that the present action was initiated by the former Conservative government, when it appointed the royal commission to deal comprehensively with this matter.

In the remaining time at my disposal I wish to deal with three major areas of deficiency. First of all, the bill does not avoid the obvious pitfalls of similar schemes in the United Kingdom and Europe. Second, it does not meet the requirements of the Hall commission report for a comprehensive health care program, as opposed to a medicare program. Third, the bill has already run into very serious criticisms from most of the provinces. This means that we are running into a major difficulty right at the outset.

That is so because under our constitution it will be the responsibility of the provincial governments actually to implement the legislation. The provinces have been placed in a federal strait-jacket by the fait accompli criteria which has been laid down by the federal government. Though it is said that there is flexibility with respect to time no flexibility has been allowed with respect to these criteria. They still exist and provide for physicians' services only. This will have a serious disrupting influence on programs already operated by provincial governments, particularly with respect to groups such as optometrists which, as I read the legislation, are excluded from the provisions of the bill. The 90 per cent participation requirement at the outset of the scheme means the interpretation of the word "Universal", in the bill is compulsory.

Everyone agrees, of course, that benefits should be portable; and as for the final criterion "operated by government or an agency of government", I do not think anybody has too much quarrel with that. Our amendment deals with the basic question of provincial co-operation, and it also attempts to deal with the Hall commission recommendation that there should be a comprehensive health care program as distinct from a restricted medical care program.

First, as to provincial co-operation, I will refer to the province of Manitoba because that province has made special recommendations in this respect. When the bill was first before the house the government of Manitoba suggested that the requirement for participation at the initial stage be relaxed to 80 per cent rather than the 90 per cent level. This was a reasonable request, and it would seem to fall within the principle of universality endorsed by the Hall commission. Telegrams were exchanged and the federal government insisted that the original 90 per cent participation figure should remain.

This makes it impossible for a province such as Manitoba to institute the program, which was already in effect as a voluntary scheme, in the form of legislation. The word "universality" is being interpreted by the federal government as meaning "compulsory". It is the provinces which must impose this compulsory feature. While Ottawa takes any political kudos which may result from the implementation of this scheme, it is the provinces which will have to bear the political difficulty of imposing a compulsory scheme in many areas of Canada where there is considerable resistance to this feature. Manitoba is not alone in this regard; the province of Alberta is even more forthright in its protestations.

I suggest to the minister that in the interval between the passing of this legislation and its implementation some two years hence it would take none of the lustre from his leadership campaign if he were to reconvene the federal-provincial conference on health care so these difficulties could be discussed with the provincial ministers and the launching of the scheme assured by the reconciliation of the policies of the two levels of government.

Another matter is coming to the fore. Again I cite the case of the government of Manitoba, which has always insisted on a system of priorities both in the general legislative field and in the field of social welfare. A number of hon. members have suggested that, to judge from their mail, people are not so much concerned with this medicare bill as they are with the situation in which old age pensioners find themselves. I can testify that my own experience is the same. I have not had a single letter concerning medicare and the need for rushing this legislation through at the present time. My correspondence on the subject of social welfare priorities all centres upon the necessity for dealing as a matter of urgency with the situation of our senior citizens.

There are several governments, including the government of Manitoba, which are ready to come forward now, not in July, 1967 or in July, 1968, to deal with one of the areas of greatest need, the provision of adequate health and medical care for our senior citizens, provided they can get the agreement of the federal government to make this possible.

Only yesterday the government of Manitoba issued a statement urging Ottawa to move forward immediately to make it possible for those who really need medical help because of restricted income—and this concerns old age pensioners in particular to obtain the necessary assistance. The statement calls upon the federal government to proceed immediately to implement such an aid program as is suggested in our amendment. Here is a real priority; here is a real need, and I am sure it is one which will receive the backing of all hon. members in this chamber.

The second point of concern in our amendment has to do with medical education and the provision of the necessary services. My hon. friend from Simcoe East dealt with this subject quite adequately in his presentation. I shall merely refer to it in passing, and perhaps make a few additional points. The medicare program proposed in this bill will precipitate a crisis in the field of medical services. The experience of the United Kingdom and the experience of Sweden will be mild by comparison.

This crisis will not be met by the health resources fund which this House of Commons has already approved. Here is one of the greatest weaknesses of this legislation; it deals with one small area only, medical care and physicians' services. It ignores the paramedical services and all the ancillary services which go to make up an adequate health care program as set out in the recommendations of the Hall commission.

In addition it will disrupt the worthwhile experiment which is just beginning in the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario. I refer to programs of home care designed to relieve the growing pressure on hospital bed accommodation across the country. These deal with one of the most pressing aspects of any health care program. The hospital insurance program and many others of a voluntary nature already in existence are dealing satisfactorily with the basic needs of in-patient accommodation. Most of the medical needs of patients can be met under such schemes. The real cost arises after the patient has been discharged, particularly where his case is a chronic one and has to be taken care of in a home situation. There is absolutely no provision in this bill to meet this difficulty. Indeed, its restrictive terms will seriously interfere with the home care program experiment already under way in several provinces.

There is another matter to which I would like to refer before concluding my remarks, and that is the failure of the bill to follow the recommendations of the Hall Commission with respect to mental health. The commission was quite specific in this regard and pointed out that the treatment of mental illness in Canada has not moved much beyond the ghetto approach that has existed since the nineteenth century. The present program is one that segregates the mentally ill from society and aggravates the problem by such a ghetto approach.

Medical science has made remarkable progress in psychosomatics, the approach of treating the whole patient, yet very few of the psychiatric insights provided by the social scientists have been implemented in overt policy. The cost per day per bed of a mentally ill patient is around $5 or $6, which indicates that the total treatment services available must be strictly limited. In contrast the cost for the physically ill is somewhere about $30.

Mr. Justice Hall was quite specific in the recommendation made, and the first page of the summary which was provided in connection with the publication of volume I quotes from the report in these terms:

> The commission recommends a complete reorganization and reorientation of mental health services.

Recommendation No. 29 reads:

> That henceforth all discrimination in the distinction between physical and mental illness, in the organization and provision of services for their treatment, and the attitudes upon which these discriminations are based, be disavowed for all time as unworthy and unscientific.

The summary adds that this:

> —may be said to keynote the commission's views in the field of mental health.

A deficiency of this kind more than necessitates the careful reconsideration and review that has been recommended in the amendments put foward by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). This also applies to the field of public health services which have not been taken into consideration under the bill, and which are basic if we are going to have an adequate health care program for Canadians.

I have already mentioned that the bill ignores the services of such groups as optometrists. They are going to be completely excluded. This is something which deserves consideration by the government, and by all hon. members if they are given an opportunity to hear further representations.

On the question of a voluntary program and freedom of choice, again the Hall Commission report was quite specific. I do not think I need to underline that point any further, but I think I should refer to a speech made by Mr. Justice Hall which was published in the September-October issue of the Canadian Tax Journal. In his speech he made this point:

> This measure of governmental participation in the financing of health services is not socialism. We are convinced that Canadians are opposed to the concept of state medicine. We have urged Canada not to become involved in a battle of semantics. In recommending the program we have proposed, we have steered clear of the views of those on the extreme right or extreme left. We are opposed to state medicine, a system in which all providers of health services are functionaries under the control of the state. We recommend a course of action based upon social principles and the co-operation and participation of society as a whole in order to achieve the best possible health care for all Canadians, an aim that Canadians by their individul efforts cannot attain.
> Such action, we insist, is based upon freedom of choice on the part of the citizen, and on services provided by free and self-governing professions. By safeguarding these elements, so vital to a free society, we believe we have avoided the difficulties inherent in a program which attempts to nationalise the services which one group provides for others.

I believe that this fundamental principle has been violated by the legislation before us and by the restrictive four points that have been put forward by the government

Let me conclude by saying that those of us on this side of the house are concerned, in approaching a matter as important and as serious as adequate health care for Canadians, that it be taken out of the realm of electioneering, of leadership, oneupmanship, and that as responsible members of the House of Commons we regard this as an opportunity to implement the best possible health care program.

From the medical standpoint Canada today leads the world in the quality of its medical care. We can only continue to do so under a program that will not disrupt the facilities that have already been established, because we have already moved a long step forward to resolve many of the difficulties. Provincial governments have been active in the field, and if we are going to continue in a positive direction, now that the federal government at last is intervening in this field, let it be in the spirit of co-operation rather than in the spirit of controversy which has been the response from most of our provincial governments in reference to the bill before us.

The government has decided, for reasons known only to itself and obviously as a result of internal politicking within the cabinet, that the original target date will be postponed one year. We are discussing this legislaton early in the resumed session. It has been placed before us ahead of many more urgent matters that will be implemented long before 1968. Let the government use the time that has been afforded by the delay to have this matter referred to the federal-provincial conference on health care, and to have it referred to our house committee so that we can begin the program in a spirit of harmony and co-operation rather than in the spirit of controversy which at present prevails across the country.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of speaking in support of the motion introducing the second reading of Bill C-227 which will provide federal financial contributions toward the cost of insured medicare services of provincial health insurance plans. I am sure most of us in the house were eager and happy to approve the resolution several weeks ago and to give first reading to this medicare bill last July 12.

However, after hearing the speeches during this debate, and especially those of the Conservative spokesmen, I must say that this is a puzzling experience. After hearing the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) I do not understand the position taken by the official opposition. It is regrettable that the amendment now before us was not withdrawn, and for this reason I must deplore the fact that we have to continue to deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard).

This amendment will serve only to delay indefinitely a comprehensive and universal health insurance plan for the people of Canada. The amendment is puzzling and even self-defeating because the sub-parts are in conflict with the preamble. However, more disturbing was the deplorable statement made yesterday by that leading Conservative spokesman, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I should like to refer to page 8634 of Hansard where he is reported to have said that this medicare bill should be killed and buried. This attitude is disappointing, I am sure, to all of us and will be disturbing to the people of Canada when they learn about it.

The first part of the amendment asks the federal government to obtain the co-operation of the provincial governments. In this era of rapid progress and increasing demand for social justice, no provincial government would want to deny to its citizens a basic human need in the form of readily available adequate health care. In spite of the reported reluctance of some provincial spokesmen to subscribe to the basic conditions of the federal medicare scheme, I am confident that at this time of federal-provincial co-operation this reluctance will fade away and with good will the difficulties will be be met and solved satisfactorily.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Haidasz: I will answer the hon. member's question after I have completed my speech.

Mr. Aiken: How many provincial governments have brought in medicare plans—

Mr. Haidasz: I should like to finish my speech, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. The hon. member for Parkdale has requested that questions be deferred until after he has concluded his speech.

Mr. Haidasz: The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), announcing the Liberal medicare policy in Toronto last year, said:

> We cannot impose policies and programs on provinces in respect of matters within their jurisdiction. And we will have to be increasingly careful in participating in joint federal-provincial programs in which all provinces do not participate. On the other hand, we will not forgo our right to make grants to provinces to help them in programs such as medicare which are provincially administered; and our right to relate such grants to the acceptance of certain principles which, in our view, justify the expenditure of federal funds for provincially administered schemes. It is then for the provinces to decide whether they wish to co-operate on this basis.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a most reasonable and fair approach. It ensures federal initiative and invites provincial co-operation to fill a need of the Canadian people.

This federal program with its universality feature will also bring social justice to all Canadians. It is welcomed by our citizens and by welfare organizations, and praised in editorials across the country. Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, chairman of the royal commission on health services, has refuted the arguments made by some provincial authorities and some critics in this house who want to postpone indefinitely a national medical insurance plan in favour of education by declaring in Ottawa last November:

> There cannot and must not be any question of conflict or of priority between the needs of better education and good health.

Furthermore, not only social justice but also economic progress could be served by the early implementation of a national health insurance scheme. It is estimated that in 1965 illness caused a loss to our economy of approximately $630 million. I am certain that much of this loss might well have been prevented if adequate health services had been available. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to deny or postpone indefinitely in Canada an adequate medical insurance plan.

The other parts of the objectionable Conservative amendment can also be shown to be without a sound foundation. The present federal scheme does recognize the principle of free choice in the doctor-patient relationship. The scare of state medicine of socialist countries cannot be justly applied to the federal scheme we are debating.

The third part of the amendment crying for adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research and training of medical and paramedical personnel appears to forget the steady progress in this field since the introduction by a Liberal government in 1948 of the national health grants which poured out millions of dollars for public health facilities, professional training, research and hospital construction. This was continued during the administration of the right hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). This part of the amendment also overlooks the further increase in health facilities and personnel provided by Bill C-199, the health resources fund, which will provide $500 million over the next 15 years. I cannot understand the forgetfulness of the opposition with regard to such a recent act passed by this house on June 27 of this year.

The last part of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, is also untenable. Our provinces have for many years financed the cost of medical services for persons on public assistance and those in need. The outpatient departments of our hospitals and the public ward beds are filled with patients who receive adequate medical care free of charge or at a very minimal fee. Furthermore, this type of need is now being provided in greater measure by the Canada Assistance Plan also introduced by this government and enacted by this parliament last July.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act in 1956-57 and 1958 objections similar to those we hear now from opponents to medicare were heard. But parliament, in its wisdom, passed that bill providing universal hospital insurance. True, there were differences, difficulties, objections and problems but parliament did not wait for perfect circumstances to institute the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. It was passed in 1957 and since that time we have learned many lessons, gained much experience and satisfaction.

The goal of an effective hospital insurance program was achieved by the co-operation of the governments, hospital trustees, doctors and the public. With diligence, dignity and understanding on the part of all parties concerned, a universal hospital insurance plan initiated by the federal government became a success. I believe that no Canadian today would wish to be without our hospital plan. I also truly believe that the majority of Canadians do not want to be without a national health insurance plan.

• (1:20 p.m.)

Many remarks have been made by hon. members since the commencement of this debate. Most of them were very favourable and included interesting suggestions and constructive criticism. After all, in our parliamentary system it is customary and useful to test in the crucible of debate whether good legislation can be improved. The majority of Canadians, approximately 12 million, are fortunate in having some form of prepaid or government subsidized medical plan. However, today approximately 7.5 million Canadians have no medical insurance except for the medical diagnostic services provided by the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act which was introduced in 1957.

But every day now in Canada more and more Canadians have access to health insurance because of the introduction of provincial medicare plans which are now available in Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland. It is of interest to note that the earliest health services plan was Newfoundland's cottage hospital medical plan, which dates from 1934. The Saskatchewan medical care insurance plan began in 1962, the Alberta medical plan in 1963 with extensions in 1966, the British Columbia medical plan in 1965 and, of course, in my province the Ontario medical services insurance plan began in 1966. The Saskatchewan and Newfoundland plans are universal in coverage; enrolment in the other plans is on a voluntary basis. Together, these five provincial health insurance plans cover about 4 million Canadians. In particular, approximately 1,700,000 people are enrolled in the Ontario medical services insurance plan, or 25 per cent of the population of Ontario.

From the British North America Act, Supreme Court decisions, declarations of royal commissions and federal-provincial arrangements and negotiations, we regard health matters today as mostly a provincial responsibility. But since it has been customarily the primary objective of the federal government in the health field to assist with the development of vital and essential services on a nation-wide basis, this government's action in offering financial contributions to provincial health insurance plans is most welcome. This federal initiative will also meet, I am sure, the need to develop comparable standards of health services across this vast country.

May I reiterate, Mr. Speaker, the accepted principle that adequate standards across the country should always be maintained as much as possible. Not all the medical plans now operating provincially provide the same benefits. The British Columbia plan, I learn, provides such additional services as physiotherapy, special duty nursing, chiropractic and naturopathy services without additional charge. May I add that I have received many communications from my constituents that there is a great need also for insured ambulance services. But above all, the great discrepancy in premiums is a serious complaint that is often heard from our constituents.

In Saskatchewan, a province less affluent than Ontario, the premium, which covers about 25 per cent of total costs, is only $24 for a family. In the affluent provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario the family premiums are in the order of $150 per year. I again ask the question: If the federal government is going to pay half the cost of provincial health insurance plans, why could not the provinces reduce the annual premiums of their plans?

Mr. Speaker, I know it is very difficult to satisfy everybody and that no plan is absolutely perfect, but in trying to produce a health insurance plan for Canadians we should strive to come up with the best possible plan. Therefore I appeal to all members to support this bill. We should all be proud to be part of this federal parliament which has been given the privileged opportunity to make available for Canadians a national comprehensive health insurance plan.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, the address of the parliamentary secretary to which we have just listened was obviously made to support the government's position because of the embarrassment which they feel, and what he said is in no way realistic so far as the Canadian people are concerned. The hon. member mentioned at length the plans that exist in the provinces. He even referred to how they were instituted. I remind him immediately that there are now four plans in operation and not one was instituted by a Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that not one was instituted by a Liberal government, and I dare the hon. member to deny that statement. What is more, a fifth plan will be in effect soon and it will be instituted by a Conservative government. I believe that such nonsense as was delivered by the hon. member demands an apology even to us on the opposition side of the house. When I think of the things from which the Canadian people have benefited in the course of this year, 1966, because of the action of the opposition, I sometimes wonder what this government is doing.

I believe that some of the ministers of the government are afraid to come into the house. Last night I tried to get the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) into the house in order to learn his position with regard to milk subsidies. He would not come and sent his parliamentary secretary. I think of the position in which he has put himself with the farmers of this country and I have come to the conclusion that the government will find itself in exactly the same position with regard to medicare.

The previous speaker said he cannot understand the position of the opposition because of some of the arguments we have put forward. I tell him right here and now that so far as the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is concerned, I am not too far away from his thinking. I can morally vote against the bill as it stands, if the government does not accept our amendment, and can certainly make my position clear so far as my constituents and the people generally are concerned.

Can we not have universality without compulsion? Certainly we can. Can we have a comprehensive plan without compulsion? Certainly we can, and hon. members opposite know it. I give the minister credit here because I believe he is changing his views slightly in this regard. I do not say that in a deprecating way but, if he will allow me to do so, in a flattering way.

I do not know why so much concern was expressed by the previous speaker, in view of the fact that we will have to wait such a long time before the plan is instituted. Hon. members opposite will be lucky if every province does not have such a plan by that time. I know there are a few provinces which are not in a fortunate enough position economically to institute such a plan.

Mr. Haidasz: What is the target date of your plan?

Mr. Winkler: If the hon. member had listened to us he would know that for 30 per cent of the people who need it would be January 1, 1967. Let there be no mistake about that.

• (1:30 p.m.)

Subparagraph (d) of the amendment reads:

(d) immediately provides for those persons who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services for themselves.

We mean that. As a matter of fact, the hon. member may well justify his position as a doctor by supporting this amendment, and I think he knows it. When the hon. member tells me that he hears a lot of complaints from his constituents about the diversification of the various plans now in effect, the inequality of coverage, the difference in premiums and so on, let me tell him one thing. I come from a rural constituency which also has a reasonable amount of manufacturing industry. I have worked in that industry and I have been a member of their union. These men are telling me: "15 years ago our pay cheques used to have a little stub at the end showing deductions. Now our pay cheques have still another deduction. Tell the government to keep our pay cheques and tell us how much we can spend." That is the state to which you have brought these people. These people have bargained for some of the medical protection they now have. I am not so sure they want the plan that is now being offered.

I also find there is a great deal of reason behind the thinking in the province of Ontario because I do not believe anyone in the house will deny the fact that the taxpayers of the provinces of Ontario carry a substantial burden in this country. I have said this before and I say it again with pride. They are prepared to say: "All right, put your plan into effect. Give the provinces the rights that are constitutionally theirs, but for heaven's sake do not make us pay for something we do not want." I think the hon. member subscribes to that very statement, unless I am wrong, but of course all members on that side of the house will stand up and vote for the bill whether it is right or wrong.

I believe that the principle of freedom of choice in the plan is an extremely important one, and I say that with all deference to the people in the profession as well as to those who will be covered by the terms of this bill.

Furthermore, I hope I do not have to remind any member of the house of the effort and time spent in trying to bring the government and the minister to the realization that the necessity for increasing old age security pensions at this time is equally important. It may be even more so when we realize we have to wait for two years for this piece of legislation to become effective at a time when the people who need additional money because of inflationary trends—I do not have to remind you who is responsible for them—require this money for the basic necessities of life. I believe that my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), will join me in our combined fight for increases in old age security payments. I do not think he has changed his view and I certainly have not changed mine.

Mr. Haidasz: Your filibuster is only prolonging the delay.

Mr. Winkler: I remind the hon. member that it will be pretty difficult for us to talk for two years. You do not have to worry about that. If the hon. member is referring to increased old age security payments, then let his party postpone this bill and we will give them our approval in a hurry. I can assure him of the support of our caucus for that piece of legislation.

I have in my hands an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated October 12 and outlining in detail the editor's point of view in regard to medicare. I will read for the record the last paragraph of that editorial because it is very relevant. It reads as follows:

> This is what can happen when a timetable is given priority over circumstances and judgment. It is not the best way to ensure that Canadians get the best medicare available.

With that I agree. However, this is prefaced by the errors which the government made in instituting the Canada Pension Plan. I am not very proud of standing here this afternoon and saying that I voted for the Canada Pension Plan, and if I had to do it again I would vote against it, proving the truth of the article.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I was somewhat dismayed to read the article in the Globe and Mail this morning headed, "Medicare Bill Runs Into Tory Roadblock". If our position in regard to medicare is a roadblock, then I think the author of this article had better read Hansard and take a look at our amendment which is a constructive one.

Mr. Orlikow: It is a killing one.

Mr. Winkler: It is not a killing one. As I stated before, if you want to bring medicare in immediately we will support the date of January 1, 1967. I have the support of every member of the Conservative party on that.

Mr. Knowles: The government postponed it for two years but you are postponing it forever.

Mr. Winkler: Of course that is totally wrong. The hon. member just has to look all across the country wherever medical plans are in operation, and I think my hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Winkler: I am always delighted to have the Minister of Transport ask me a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether this is his bid for leadership?

Mr. Haidasz: Fulton killed his last night.

Mr. Winkler: My aspirations in political life are to serve Canada and all its people.

Mr. Pickersgill: That sounds like a leader.

Mr. Winkler: I will put it this way, Mr. Speaker. If the Minister of Transport feels that the need for a leader in his party is that great, I will certainly cross the floor.

Mr. Knowles: Don't you think they have enough Tories over there already?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I believe that initially the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) brought in this plan at the time he felt most appropriate to get the support of most of the provinces. Today we know that most of the premiers do not particularly favour the plan which the minister has presented. I am not saying this in a political vein; I am being practical about it. Then we had the innovation whereby the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) delayed the plan until mid-1968. If it has been delayed for economic reasons, and it may well have been so, then I think the government should re-examine its position in regard to other projects which have been mentioned by the government such as the scholarship plan which was also withdrawn.

• (1:40 p.m.)

I do not see how the withdrawal of the scholarship plan would affect this particular piece of legislation now that it is delayed until 1968. Indeed, the Liberal government is considering many other expenditures which might well be deferred, and although the minister made a remark on the position taken by Mr. Hall I still think that the money allocated to education and to the implementation of this legislation should have priority. This has not been done and therefore we can only conclude that the Minister of Finance made his decision very hastily and probably without the agreement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not think that it was for personal reasons, although I must admit that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is beginning to look a little better every day as the weak ones fall by the way. He is coming forward in great style. I do not believe that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) was serious when he made those remarks a few moments ago. I think that the Minister of Finance is proceeding well in the right direction.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Winkler: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is he suggesting he would like to have the Minister of Finance as leader of the Conservative party?

Mr. Winkler: You can make your own suggestions and I will make mine.

Mr. Knowles: That is where he belongs.

Mr. Winkler: I return to the medicare proposal before us. I agree with those who have referred to the important factors of training of personnel and the availability of beds and the fact that the current level of federal support for construction of hospital beds is totally inadequate. I believe it was pointed out by someone that the capital grants supplied by the federal government have not increased since 1958, when they were increased 100 per cent by the then Conservative administration. I say to the minister that consideration ought to be given to increasing those grants again by 100 per cent.

I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, what changes have taken place in medical practice. I should like to know, for instance, what changes have taken place in Saskatchewan and the other provinces so far as general practitioners are concerned since the introduction of medicare. What movement has taken place? Have these men gone into institutions to operate in a combined way or is the trend still for the general practitioner to stay in private practice, particularly in the smaller municipalities and in the rural areas? I believe this trend is becoming very apparent across the country and the people of Canada will find increasingly that they are not going to have the personal type of service to which they have been accustomed in the past.

As a result the cost of the program is going to be great, I believe above the level of which anyone is thinking in 1966. Why is this so? It is so because doctors will not make themselves available beyond ordinary working hours except, as I said, on a co-operative basis. One can hardly blame them, since the government would be controlling their lives. I say to the minister, therefore, it is more important than ever before that he consider freedom of choice from the doctors' point of view as well as from the taxpayers' point of view. I beg the minister as well as the government to see that this principle is maintained, no matter what happens to the bill.

I should like to say one more thing with regard to practitioners. I believe that any professional man who is capable of supplying a service, which service is covered under the terms of the bill, should be allowed to render that service in the same way as if he were entirely eligible under the bill. As an example, I would cite optometrists who would be able to offer certain services, which I understand would be available under the bill but only through an ophthalmologist, at less cost and on a wider basis than the medical profession. The service could therefore be rendered in smaller areas. I should like to see that principle carried through as far as possible in every application of this bill. If we are going to offer the maximum amount of service to Canadians, I think we should involve the maximum amount of Canadians in offering that service because they may well perform certain functions that are necessary under this legislation.

So, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks by saying to the minister and the house that it is not the intention of this party in any way to stop the bill, as someone on my left has suggested. This is far from our minds. We believe that the terms of the amendment before the house are good ones. We believe that they are worthy. We believe, first and foremost, that with two years to wait it is the responsibility of the government now to call the premiers of the provinces back to Ottawa to find a common denominator on which they can agree so that the bill will be a truly national bill, so that the constitutional rights of the provinces will be maintained and so that we as federal legislators will have done our duty to the people of Canada.

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Waterloo North): I wish to make a few remarks, Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of Bill No. C-227. It is not my intention to delay the passage of the bill because it is, of course, a very important piece of social legislation which will be added to the many other pieces of such legislation on our statute books, most of which were introduced by Liberal governments. I might qualify that remark because I am well aware of the fact, as many other members are, that the previous Conservative government did finalize the hospital services bill, a bill which was conceived by the previous Liberal government.

I know what the hospital services bill has meant not only to the province of Ontario but to the people of Canada in providing additional facilities for people who are in need of hospital services. Having served for some time at a much lower level of government, I know what the hospital services bill has meant to the municipalities. Prior to the passage of this legislation there was a continual charge on the municipalities for operating services. Now, under the provisions of the hospital services bill, hospitals are able to pay their own way with some small provision for capital expansion.

During this debate several members have raised the question of additional allowances for hospital beds. This, of course, is a very important matter and was introduced yesterday by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). Some references were made yesterday and today to a certain meeting in Ottawa. I should like to identify that meeting. It was the 1966 convention of the national Liberal party whose delegates, 1700 in all, overwhelmingly endorsed the responsible decision of this government.

While the delegates and the members on this side of the house were disappointed at the delay of medicare, which was to have come into effect on July 1, 1967, the centennial year of confederation, it has only been delayed until July 1, 1968, one year later, and will be implemented earlier if possible. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the official delegates of a political party to a national convention have accepted the responsible decision of this government, I feel that the people of Canada, both those who support the government presently in power as well as those who do not will certainly recognize and accept that a responsible decision has been made.

Many other matters are involved in addition to the $40 million which it is estimated it will cost the Dominion of Canada to finance medicare. We are in a time of unprecedented prosperity which contrasts strongly with the situation we had just a few years ago. Even though we have so much and are producing so much, sometimes we have to sit back and, irrespective of promises which were made in good faith, decide whether or not in the interests of preserving the growth and development of this country we can afford to implement this legislation at this time, albeit an important piece of legislation.

I referred to the address given yesterday by the hon. member for Simcoe East, who I know conscientiously represents in this place not only his constituents and the people of Canada but also his profession. This is true of other members of the medical profession such as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), who has just spoken, the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) and many others. We need the co-operation of the medical profession which, according to standards of comparison, is a very excellent profession. Within its limited facilities it has provided over the years great service to the people of Canada, has assisted in research development, and has brought forward new ideas and new cures for the sick.

I mentioned that this was a very significant piece of legislation, as is other legislation such as the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, unemployment insurance, youth allowances and many other acts, all of which have provided much to the very fortunate people of this very wonderful and prosperous land. Perhaps I am a bit too realistic, but among many letters I have received from my constituents is one asking for additional assistance for people receiving old age assistance and who require additional help. The day after I received that letter I received another from a constituent who wanted a great deal more assistance for underdeveloped countries, a plea which was very eloquently expressed by one of the speakers at the convention held this week to which I have referred. Some members of the Canadian community are concerned about others and are very critical of what we do for our own people. Conversely, some people want everything for themselves and have no concern at all for less fortunate people.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length on this matter. I was sorry I was not able to hear the introductory remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday because I always enjoy hearing him. Unfortunately I was called out of the house at that time. But I should like to congratulate him on bringing in this legislation and on the very co-operative stand which he has taken under circumstances which were rather difficult.

When this legislation becomes law, Mr. Speaker, it will provide complete medical service for all Canadians. As I said in connection with the previous bill, this bill is not designed for a great many people in my constituency in the province of Ontario but for those who never have had and never would have had an opportunity to obtain even minimal medical assistance in this country, a country where every citizen should receive this assistance as a basic right and be provided with medical services whenever they are needed.

Medicare

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when this medicare legislation was introduced last summer we in this party welcomed it very enthusiastically as something long overdue and very much to our liking. We felt it was sure to be welcomed very much by everyone across Canada. It is a curious thing that today we are now playing the role of trying to save this legislation. The government is playing the role that for purposes of propaganda only it is going to submit the legislation to the house and then turn around and by making amendments kill it, ably assisted by members of other groups in the house.

I want to make abundantly clear that we in this party recognize what is going on for exactly what it is—a betrayal of medicare. I also want to say that people across the country in their thousands are going to recognize this for what it is—a betrayal of medicare. The bill as it will be sought to be amended by the government will not provide genuine medicare of the type we were going to support and for which we were going to vote. It will have been mutilated in three or four respects, thus depriving the people of Canada of what they need. The biggest mutilation of the bill is that it is not going to come into effect until at least a year later than it was supposed to become effective, namely, not until July 1, 1968.

I was very much interested to discover that apparently the government has taken the precaution of obtaining the signature of the finance minister to the provision that the bill should come into effect not later than 1968. I remember it was also necessary to obtain the signature of a prime minister of this country much earlier in time so as to make it possible to get on the books the first social security legislation providing old age pensions. For some years the Liberal party had been promising old age pensions but nothing had happened. It was only when a couple of members representing labour obtained the signature of Prime Minister Mackenzie King that finally there was leverage enough to obtain passage of the old age pensions legislation. It is interesting to note that this time it is the Liberal party itself which has taken the precaution of obtaining the signature of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), who is quite evidently the strong man of the cabinet today, to try to ensure that medicare will not be delayed even beyond July 1, 1968. It may be that this will not be sufficient to prevent yet another sell-out.

This manoeuvre on the part of Liberal governments of promising, promising and promising, getting elected on promises and then discovering suddenly that economic conditions unfortunately will not let them carry out their promises, is nothing new. In my province of British Columbia we have had Liberal governments too, and they have promised at elections that medicare would be brought in. It was called health insurance in those days. During the 1930's the promise was made by the Liberal party, as it ran in successive elections, that we should have health insurance. Each time we were told, as an explanation of the failure to implement it, that "regrettably this cannot be done at this time". The members of the Liberal party in that legislature fell into line just as those of the Liberal party in this parliament are falling into line.

During an election in 1936 they had to go so far as to put health insurance legislation on the statute books of British Columbia. In my hand I hold an act, not a bill, to bring about health insurance in British Columbia. This measure was passed, signed and assented to by the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia in 1936. But it has never been proclaimed by a Liberal government since that time. So, Mr. Speaker, some of us are understandably dubious whether even the signature of the Minister of Finance on the dotted line will ensure enough leverage to get this measure through by 1968. The date of the act in my hand is April 1, 1936 April fool's day. That was a cruel April fool's joke if ever there was one. I think that what is being perpetrated at this time is a Halloween hoax which may go on for a few years yet. I say that because each time in the past, despite honest intentions here, there and everywhere, it has been discovered by the government that conditions would not permit the passage of a genuine medicare bill.

Was the situation different this summer for the people across this country who voted for the Liberal party in the last election? Again, I have one of the party's big advertisements before the last election. Here is the Liberal party's plan for medicare, setting out the four solid points. People voted in the innocence of their hearts believing that the Liberal government, when it said it would do something, would in fact do something. That is the Liberal party for you. The people voted for medicare as set forth in this advertisement. I believe that the people this summer thought, as we thought, that at last there was to be an honest fullfilment of election promises. We saw in the Minister of National Health and Welfare a man of new ideas who recognized that medicare was a necessity now and should be proceeded with. He had the four solid points of the medicare legislation in mind and he was backed solidly by the Prime Minister. Neither one of them could be shaken either on the date or on the principles underlying this bill. The date was always to be July 1, 1967, Canada's 100th birthday, and the principles were always to be foursquare.

We saw the Minister of National Health and Welfare giving the most precious and the most needed thing to our country at the present time—leadership. But this fall we saw that minister crumple up under the pressure of the Minister of Finance who had emerged as a power with the backing of the big, vested financial, insurance and professional interests in this country which do not want medicare now nor for a long time to come. They do not want genuine medicare. They will never want it. We saw the Minister of Finance simply pulling the rug from under the Minister of National Health and Welfare by saying that medicare could not be brought in this year. There he stands today—I am referring to the Minister of Finance—a russet lion rampant barring the road to medicare. The Liberals behind him are torn between two leaderships.

During the recent convention they did not try to disguise the fact that they are a party not without leaders but with so many leaders that they are riding off in all directions at the same time, getting precisely nowhere. That is a fact that cannot be disguised. As a matter of fact, we have the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the one side, the Minister of Finance on the other, and between them the mass of jellyfish Liberals who wish they had the strength to stand by their principles but who are afraid of the Minister of Finance who is backed by the pressure groups of this country which do not want medicare.

This is the situation as we in this party see it. We have no intention of doing what we are asked to do. We are being asked to rush legislation onto the statute books now when it is not intended to be brought into effect for at least a year and a half. The legislation may never go into effect without being watered down so much that it will not be genuine medicare, and would not be recognized as such by Mr. Justice Hall who has been quoted so often in this house. We will debate this legislation which the people want. Having given the impression that this is the legislation under which it will operate, the government is proceeding to mutilate it and will put on the books something that is completely different, something with the principle of universality undermined. Much worse than that, the government will be opening the door to all the profit-making insurance companies to enter in and destroy the very basis of complete health coverage for everyone, making this measure into some sort of profit-making vehicle, as they have done with other things.

It is perfectly naïve to say that these profit-making insurance companies have certain departments which do not operate at a profit, which are loss leaders and gimmick affairs, and that under this heading the insurance companies will be allowed to come in as provincial carriers. The operations of the insurance companies cannot be separated. They are still profit-making institutions and will destroy the basis of any genuine medicare if they are permitted under the legislation to come in as carriers.

In other words, we are being asked to help to murder medicare and then to build a mausoleum to its memory. We will not do any such thing. We support genuine medicare legislation, and we will certainly have nothing to do with the mutilated version which will be trotted forth by this government and put on the statute books.

The people voted for medicare, they intend to get medicare, and the members of all parties in the house know this. Members of all parties, except those of the party to which I belong, have been wriggling, squirming and twisting the meanings of words to prove that medicare will make a pretty corpse, a dead duck, as a member of the party to my right described it last evening. They have mutilated it in this house while posing as its friend. I think it is worse to have it done to death by enemies who pretend under a cloak that they are friends than by outright enemies, because at least you know what you are dealing with when are dealing with outright enemies.

Each speaker opposing medicare has prefaced his attack by professing his undying devotion to the principles of medicare and to the contention that everyone in this country has the right to full coverage. Then each one has gone on to do his level best to prevent medicare coming into effect. The Progressive Conservative party to my right has introduced provisions in its amendment which it knows will delay medicare until after the millennium if the Liberals are left to introduce it.

I suggest though that there are provinces in this country whose governments have not dared to wait until the Liberal party or, for that matter, the Conservative party, is prepared to take action. The minister and Liberals across the way like the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), who spoke last evening, have attacked medicare by first of all watering down its principles and then by endeavouring to have it postponed indefinitely.

Members of the official opposition have attacked medicare by sheltering behind the undoubtedly serious shortage of doctors and the fact that the premier of Ontario does not like the present legislation. Mr. Justice Hall has often been quoted during this discussion, but there is one statement of his in particular which has not been given, and I intend to read it now because it underlies so much of the report. I read now from Volume I, the first report of the commission, page 91:

> While we are aware that shortages of physicians, dentists, nurses, and other paramedical personnel will make it difficult to establish the full personal health services program our charter envisages, nonetheless the fact that there are shortages must not be used as an excuse to delay initiating programs and plans.

Mr. Justice Hall was appointed by the Conservative government. His name has been used today to prove that medicare should be delayed. It has been used by the Conservative party for this purpose. But Mr. Justice Hall has said that the fact that there is a shortage of medical personnel must not be used to delay the institution of medicare. I commend this section of the report to those who sit in the Conservative party to my right.

[Translation]

The Créditistes base their attack, just like the Ontario Conservatives, on the fact that the premier of their province does not like the federal bill. Therefore, they oppose it too.

[English]

Social Credit members do the same thing only in their case it is the premiers of Alberta and British Columbia who are mentioned. I do not think they should be too sure about Premier Bennett. He has a well known habit of opposing a certain measure until he finds out that the people are likely to change the government if he does not himself put it into effect. Then he takes up the measure as if it had been his own plan from the beginning. As soon as public opinion in British Columbia in favour of medicare becomes stronger, and it is growing stronger every day, we shall find Mr. Bennett preparing to advocate medicare as a plan which has been his baby since the beginning of time. That is the way he does things in British Columbia.

So many people pretend to be friends of medicare, those who would water it down, those who would delay it, those who shelter behind the shortage of doctors, those who shelter behind the fact that provincial premiers do not want it. In the meantime they are killing it by whatever means they can.

I say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that had the federal government acted years ago we would not have experienced this difficulty with the provincial premiers. It is because the Liberal government refused to take action that the provincial premiers, one after the other, have been obliged to do the best they could according to their lights to meet the needs of the people in their provinces by bringing in what they thought would be a stopgap measure until such time as Ottawa moved. Had the government in Ottawa moved years ago to bring a proper scheme into operation we would never have been faced with the 67 varieties we now see scattered around the provinces. The longer hon. gentlemen opposite postpone the implementation of a genuine medicare program the greater their difficulties will be, because other provincial premiers, according to the resources available to them, will build the best things they can into their schemes and every one of these variations will have to be interpreted and dealt with separately. It will be exceedingly difficult for the federal government to undo the harm which its procrastination has made inevitable.

There is one province in this country which believes in genuine medicare and which has proven its belief in medicare by instituting it. That is the province of Saskatchewan—I do not intend to be modest about it. Saskatchewan was the first province to introduce medicare, back in 1962, and, if there is no other memorial to my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), the fact that this program was first introduced in a province which is not one of the wealthy provinces, not one having the largest number of medical personnel, not one with the largest number of hospital beds, will be a memorial to be proud of. In that province, the C.C.F. government of the day, the forerunner of the N.D.P., had the courage under the leadership of Premier T. C. Douglas to institute a system of medicare identical with the one proposed in the Hall report. The scheme is based on the principles of that report. There was no promising, promising, promising. It was promised before the election and it was instituted immediately afterwards. There was none of this talk about building flexibility; there was action to fulfil a promise.

That government had to fight against all the pressure groups concerned, because they knew it was the first pilot plan in the country. That government had to lose its life in the process because it was the fight over medicare which in a large measure enabled the marshalling of all the forces opposed to it. But that government which lost its life in the process brought new hope and new help to the people of Saskatchewan in doing so.

If there be any in this house who still think that medicare in Saskatchewan is an evil thing or that it is likely to be displaced in the near future, I should like them to tell me how it is that the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Ross Thatcher, a sworn foe of public medicare for a long while, has not dared to repeal the legislation.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Hon. members to my right have talked about all the difficulties and trials of the national health scheme in Britain. Undoubtedly there have been difficulties—trials and difficulties of all kinds. I would like to ask how it is that several Conservative governments have been in power in Great Britain since the time medicare was instituted there and yet they did not repeal this "terrible" piece of legislation? The answer in both cases is the same. Neither in Saskatchewan nor in Britain would a Liberal or a Conservative government dare to repeal medicare because the people, having once tasted of medicare, would have no more of this housebroken variation that is being trotted out before elections by our Liberal friends and carefully tucked into mothballs afterwards, ready for the next election campaign.

How is medicare getting on in Saskatchewan? To answer that I quote briefly from a dispatch of the Co-operative Press Association issued in September, 1966. The facts in it can be easily checked. It reads:

> Opponents of medicare, who prophesied that the costs of a comprehensive plan, like the one set up by the former C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan, would steadily mount, are being confounded by the facts. The costs of the medicare plan in Saskatchewan are now actually going down.
> The Liberal government of the province, upon taking office, raised the premiums without waiting to find out from experience if it was necessary, but they have found no reason for any further increase and have announced that the premium rate for 1967 will be the same as for 1966.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, other things will go up, the things that are run by private business, but medicare premiums in Saskatchewan will be same in 1967 as they are in 1966.

> When the C.C.F. government first set up the plan the rates for combined hospital and medical insurance were $72 for families and $36 for single people. After the plan was well launched the C.C.F. reduced the premiums to $52 for families and $26 for single people. When the Liberals took office in 1964 they almost immediately raised the rates again to their original level. Now they are making money on the plan and may have to face a public outcry for a return to the lower level set by the C.C.F.

These are the facts when one gets done with all the windowdressing, electioneering and all the other things that go along with a lack of will to institute medicare.

We hear much about the terrific fight which the Canadian Medical Association put up against the institution of medicare in Saskatchewan. Members of that association did, but even for them the proof of the pudding is in the eating. The strongest indication that the plan was being successful in every way came at the time of a meeting of the general council of the Canadian Medical Association in Edmonton this summer. At that time Dr. E. W. Barootes of Regina, who had been one of the most vigorous leaders of the opposition to medicare, told his colleagues that some of his profession's fears about medicare had proved unfounded.

Dr. Barootes made a courageous admission when he said:

> Some of the qualms we have had have been disproved and some of us should revise our thinking. The idea that total medical care results in constantly mounting costs has been shattered.

Then he went on to say that the fact is that the total cost of Saskatchewan medicare dropped last year by $500,000 from $23 million to $22½ million.

> He said in an interview later he could not explain why medicare costs have not shot up as he and other doctors had predicted. He said it may be because Saskatchewan residents have been saturated with medical service—that they now have been treated for all the ailments that, before medicare, went untreated.

That is one of the things I would like to stress today. It is said that medicare will cost more and more and that doctors are opposed to it. Well, Mr. Speaker, do you know one of the things doctors in Saskatchewan fought the hardest for was to get the right to practice outside the plan? Having secured that right, during the first year of operation in Saskatchewan only 6 per cent of doctors' patients sent in bills separate from the medicare plan. Only 6 per cent of the doctors exercised the option to go outside the plan. Even the doctors are coming around to the idea that medicare is something which is good and valuable for the people of Saskatchewan.

Last evening my colleague from Hamilton South spoke about the costs of administration. In the Saskatchewan plan the cost of administration has been about $6 out of every $100, just 6 per cent, but the Hall commission report shows that private insurance plans in Canada use 28 per cent of every dollar for purposes other than direct aid and benefit to patients. To any government that was in earnest about medicare these facts would speak loudly enough for it to implement the scheme. The pilot plan has shown that it works. Nothing is lacking today except the will to proceed with the scheme.

The scheme could have been proceeded with if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) had had the strenght to stand up against his colleagues in the cabinet and against powerful lobbies across the country. It could still be proceeded with if those in the Liberal party, occupying both back and front benches, could only see the handwriting on the wall before it is too late. I say, and say strongly, that the people of this country want medicare and they don't want it in heaven; they want it now and they are going to get it.

The next place where the government is going to get a very rude jolt is in the Ontario elections when they roll around next spring, because I prophesy now that government members will discover that the people in the province of Ontario are not satisfied with the makeshift medicare plan there which does not incorporate the foundations of universality and complete public administration of the program.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

I cannot conclude without giving another quotation from the Hall report, a report which has been much bandied about, with bits taken out of it here and there that do not reflect the whole spirit of that report. This is from page 18 of Volume II where Mr. Justice Hall says:

The right to education is one now universally recognized in Canada. It is an entrenched right which no one would dare to challenge. It is now beyond question that all our young people must be better educated and more competently trained if Canada is to survive in this highly competitive age of specialization and automation. It is equally true that health services are as much an investment as education. Health services and education must now be regarded as twin endeavours, advancing mankind. Neither will attain its full potential for good if one is allowed to lag behind the other. Progress in one must be paralleled by progress in the other. The fruits of this progress must be available to all—not just to those whose incomes are high enough to pay the permiums demanded to provide coverage against expenditures for physicians services alone, but to everyone, and for the whole range of health services, including hospital care, dentistry, drugs, home nursing, and optical services.

I say that that also includes optometrists, chiropractors and other health service people who are not yet being let in under the wire of the physicians' profession. This is what Mr. Justice Hall has recommended, and I firmly believe that the people of Canada are determined to have medicare and will not wait for it forever. After what has happened, their feeling now is that they have been duped once more.

If the government is not going to give it to them, then they will elect a government that will. In my province we have a premier who manages to do quite well about staying in office. Before elections he opposes new policies violently and says they are impractical. Then he turns around when he sees the strength of the opposition and spends his time implementing the impossible policies of his opponents in order that they will not replace him at the next election. I commend this recipe for longevity to hon. gentlemen and the hon. lady opposite. Unless they implement medicare and get it into operation very shortly their chances for survival not only as the government but as a party across this country are very bleak indeed.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it would be rather academic at this time to discuss the fact that the medicare program has been delayed. I am prepared to accept the government's word that there are adequate reasons for delaying it, but I am rather disturbed by the fact that promises in respect of medicare have had a very serious effect on the thinking of some our people, particularly at election times. I have in mind particularly the experience of my own province where a provincial election was held this summer during which time promises in repect of medicare were blatantly flouted. It is my conviction that this did have quite an influence on the voters and that partially as a result of their belief that medicare would be put into effect they elected a Liberal government in Prince Edward Island.

It is also rather interesting to note that after the results of that election had been declared the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) told the people of Prince Edward Island that medicare was coming into effect. He had just made a trip to Newfoundland and he decided to visit Summerside to congratulate the new Liberal premier. During the course of the conversation with Mr. Campbell I understand he said: "We cannot stay too long; we are in a hurry to get back as we are putting through medicare tonight." That was on July 13, but apparently "tonight" is not going to arrive until July 1, 1968.

It is also rather surprising that the government and the minister have not consulted to a greater extent with the Canadian Medical Association before the introduction of this bill for second reading. I understand the minister promised the executive of the Canadian Medical Association that before this bill was presented for second reading in this house he would confer with the executive officers of that association. I understand this association asked for this conference just days before the bill was actually introduced, and it was set for October 17.

Let me make it abundantly clear that I believe in the principles of medicare and it is most unfair of any member of this house, including the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), to suggest that merely because we stand up on this side to propose what we feel are improvements to the bill we are against medicare. Because we on this side suggest how we think the bill could be improved does not necessarily mean we are opposed to the principles.

I am in favour of the principles of medicare because I think it is in the public interest that medical service insurance be made available to Canadians. However, I cannot go along with the inflexibility of the requirements for participation as outlined in the bill before us.

A statement made by a past president of the London, Ontario, chamber of commerce impressed me and I should like to repeat it at this time. He said:

> A little flexibility in the federal government's approach to a nation-wide medical care scheme would enable the provinces to develop plans best suited to the needs of their own people.

That seems to sum up the situation very well. There must be a more rational approach which will allow provinces to decide the form of the plan they wish to introduce. That is particularly important in those provinces which feel at the present time that they cannot afford to institute a plan to cover all their residents. The minister recognized this problem when he spoke in the house on July 12, 1966, as reported at page 7546. At that time he said:

> At the same time not all of the provinces have the same fiscal capability of providing such programs or of meeting the costs of programs designed for all residents. Thus, although Canada is one country a Canadian resident of one province may be at a distinct disadvantage when compared with a Canadian resident of another province.

That suggests the exact situation in which my province finds itself at the present time so far as medicare is concerned. As closely as I can estimate, the cost of a medicare program in Prince Edward Island on the basis of the requirements set out in this bill would be $1½ million. This money would have to come from the people of our province whose per capita income is the lowest of any province in Canada.

I have before me a report of the Economic Council of Canada which I think will give hon. members an idea of the problems we must meet in the Atlantic provinces. This study revealed that the average earned income per capita in the Altantic region was 34 per cent below the national average, 47 per cent below British Columbia and a staggering 52 per cent below Ontario.

Translated into dollars and cents, these percentages mean that while employees in the Atlantic provinces receive an annual wage of $3,033 the national average is $3,810. In Prince Edward Island the situation is even more acute because our average weekly wage is $63.06 as compared with the Canadian average of $93.51. Can our province therefore afford to go further in debt in order to provide a comprehensive medical scheme? Right now we have a total debt, direct and indirect, of something of the order of $60 million or about $555 per capita.

Premier Campbell has already said that Prince Edward Island cannot afford a medicare scheme unless it gets a better share of tax money. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) suggested in this house yesterday that he expected the co-operation of all provinces. Prince Edward Island is one province which has already served notice on the government that it cannot co-operate unless it gets a better share of federal money. It appeared at the preliminary conference held here in Ottawa just a few days ago that Prince Edward Island stands to gain only about $200,000 or $2 per capita. Is it any wonder that Premier Campbell told his confrères here in Ottawa that this increase amounted to merely a skunk bounty? That is what the premier thinks of the generosity of the federal government so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned—a skunk bounty. The premier reiterated his stand that in Prince Edward Island we cannot afford medicare on the basis suggested by this bill unless we get a larger share of federal moneys.

At the same conference just a few days ago, while we were promised only $2 more per capita the province of Newfoundland was promised $45 more per capita, and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick $25 more per capita. So the per capita amount is only $2 more for Prince Edward Island, a province in which the personal income is away below the national average and where there are virtually no industrial corporations from which large tax revenues can be derived.

I suggest that this is one of the reasons why the government should introduce more flexibility in this medicare bill. The fiscal reason is not the only one, although it is fairly important. There are reasons other than financial why we in our province cannot go into such a program on a 100 per cent basis at the present time at least. We have at the present time, and we are proud of this fact, a higher per capita number of medical students in colleges than all the other provinces of Canada. At this time 30 of our young people are in medical schools, but unfortunately on the average only one or two of these will return to Prince Edward Island to practice.

The reasons for this are probably academic. First of all, in a small province there is naturally a lack of opportunity for continuing medical education. Second, practising in rural areas, with long hours of work, is not too attractive to young men entering the medical profession today. Unfortunately, too, in many cases the remuneration is not as adequate as it is in other provinces. So we lack in our province today sufficient doctors, I suggest, to implement this plan on a 100 per cent basis.

There is a serious shortage of doctors in our province, just as there is in the whole of Canada. At the present time there are only 67 practising doctors in Prince Edward Island. At least 10 of these are doing specialist work. This leaves about 57 doctors in general practice to service 108,000 people, or one doctor for approximately every 1,900 people. In the constituency I represent the situation is even worse. We have a population of approximately 18,000 and we have only seven practising doctors, or one for every 2,600 people. I most earnestly suggest that with this serious shortage of doctors we cannot provide adequate, competent medical services to all our people.

I suggest quite seriously to the minister that perhaps it is not necessary at the present time, although we favour medicare, to institute it with such a broad coverage, particulary in respect of those provinces which cannot afford it and are not equipped for it. I am convinced that there is a large body of people who need free medical services, who need to be relieved of the stress and strain of what may happen to them should they suddenly become ill. I notice that the report of the special committee of the Senate on aging, published in 1966, has this to say with reference to the income status of older people, who are among those we are chiefly interested in now:

> Without question the most serious problem encountered by the Senate committee in the course of its investigation was the degree and extent of poverty which exists among older people. Witness after witness at the hearings spoke of incomes insufficient to ensure proper food, housing and medical care; and every form of analysis made for the committee, on the basis of the 1961 census and the 1962 survey of income statistics, supported the proposition that older people are a low-income group, and that many of them eke out an existence at or near the subsistence level.

It is obvious, therefore, that people in this category need medicare protection and of course should be provided with it. I have examined the situation in my own province as carefully as I can. It would appear that about 30 per cent of our population are totally self-supporting, that is, 30 per cent of our 108,000 people can, when required, pay for their own medical services without any undue hardship to themselves. About 20 per cent of our population can be quite correctly classified as indigent. These people very definitely need help. The remaining 50 per cent are in the class that is in between; they are neither self-supporting nor can they be classified as indigent. However, I feel that they too should be given the security of protection against sudden illness so that if they do take sick they will be assured that they will receive adequate medical attention at no cost to themselves.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, approximately 70 per cent of the people of our province do need medicare right now because only 30 per cent are totally self-supporting. This is the situation in a province which cannot afford to expend the $1.5 million or $2 million which will be required to provide medical services to all our people. I suggest that the 30 per cent who are self-supporting would be perfectly satisfied to go along with any plan which will provide medicare to those who cannot afford it themselves. So if the federal government would give us the $1.5 million or $2 million which would ordinarily be appropriated for medicare purposes in our province, we would insure those people who need insurance.

As a matter of fact, we now have a plan in operation in our province which is working out very successfully. People in receipt of old age assistance, people in receipt of widows' allowances and those in receipt of welfare assistance of this nature are provided by our government with medicare. What the government does is enrol them in the Blue Cross and Blue Shield, so that if they are sick they benefit from these plans.

I suggest that this scheme is perhaps a much more reasonable approach than insisting that out of our own revenues we provide $1.5 million or $2 million to help give medicare to some people who actually do not need it at the present time because their incomes are such that they can take care of their medical expenses as they arise. Therefore I submit that at the present time a compulsory medicare plan is neither necessary nor in fact desirable in our province by reason of its fiscal position and the fact that we have not the facilities with which to provide medical services for all our people.

I suggest that we institute a combination of government and private plans whereby government funds will be made available to the province to provide for those in need and other plans will still be available through insurance companies and so on to those who are financially able to pay their own way. At the present time 47 per cent of our people are enrolled in plans of their own either privately or through employer-employee groups. Such a plan as this would permit our province, which is of course concerned with the ultimate cost of a plan such as the present one, to make its own choice, and I think it is very important that the provinces should be permitted to do so.

The minister said yesterday in connection with subclause (d) of our amendment which states that the plan should immediately provide for those persons who are unable for financial reasons to provide medical services for themselves, and I quote him from page 8625 of Hansard:

> I might say that this house has already taken action this session through the Canada Assistance Plan to provide for this very item.

That is not exactly correct, Mr. Speaker. The Canada Assistance Plan does not provide for all of those who for financial reasons are unable to provide for themselves. The plan that we have inaugurated in Prince Edward Island does so because it covers those who are in receipt of widows' allowances, disability pensions or old age assistance. It does not provide yet for those who are in receipt of old age security, but we in our province are only too anxious to see funds made available for this category of people. However, a goodly number of people in our province are already covered—those in receipt of Old Age Assistance, etc—and I think they amount to approximately 10 per cent of our population. I therefore suggest to the minister very earnestly that the plan I have outlined, or something very similar to it, would for the time being give adequate protection to those who actually need it. Perhaps as time evolves and, as we hope, we become richer, our government will be able to provide complete coverage.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, on second reading of Bill No. C-227, an act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, I would like to make a short and modest contribution.

If I sat here as a Liberal member, Mr. Speaker, needless to say that I would rise immediately to support that bill with the vigorous partisanship which allegiance to a party implies. And I would be very proud to go over the list of all the social measures introduced and put on the statute books by the Liberal government. I would look at the Conservative opposition with a degree of provocative satisfaction and I would say: "What have you done?" Because it is impossible to escape from that partisan point of view when one belongs to a party.

Of course, if I were a Conservative member, I would remember that I belong to the official opposition and that it is my duty, as a member of the house, to filibuster. I would like to think that I would find reasons to annoy the government and help my party politically.

If I were a member of the New Democratic Party, I would step on the accelerator to promote socialization, and even socialism under all circumstances. And God knows that such a piece of legislation is a favourable one.

If I were a member of Social Credit, I would miss no opportunity to advocate monetary reform. This is another field where, when speaking of the needs of the people one can easily ring the bell of monetary reform.

If I were, like my colleague the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), a professor of constitutional law, who knows all the shades and the subtleties of these legal matters, convinced as he is that provincial-federal responsibilities have to be protected by conscientious watchdogs who have this ability to study the subtleties of legislation, I would say also, in each of these circumstances, that it is part of my duty to ring the alarm bell and prevent infringement of this constitution governing the relations between the federal government and the provinces.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am just a layman who, moreover, benefits by this favourable condition and does not have to deal with those things. Anyhow, these things have been perfectly well done. I would be redundant in trying to start over again. I am content with gathering what has been said by all the parties, because very constructive things have been said, and we must recognize that this debate has brought light on the subject.

Therefore, very calmly and very objectively, I will be content with drawing from everything that has been said by all parties and thus make this contribution to the bill before us.

First of all, what strikes me, Mr. Speaker, is that I noticed a consensus in favour of the medical care plan. That is reassuring in itself. I think everybody, or nearly everybody, said they were in favour of the principle. That is something in itself. Objections were raised for constitutional reasons, for more specific reasons concerning some aspects of the bill, but I think it can be said for once that everybody agrees on the principle of the bill.

The Progressive Conservative amendment impressed me, Mr. Speaker. At first sight I was inclined to support it and vote for it. I see, for instance, that they ask that consideration of the bill be postponed so that the co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada may be secured in the first place. This is a serious argument, Mr. Speaker. It cannot be dismissed without due consideration. The other point does not recognize the principle of voluntary choice by the individual. This is another worthy point. I believe that the report of Mr. Justice Hall mentioned that very eloquently when it says that this should be a basic condition.

The third point is to the effect that the plan will not be satisfactory unless it makes adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research, as well as the training of adequate numbers of doctors and other medical personnel.

• (3:00 p.m.)

To be sure, there is a serious deficiency in this field; the argument is therefore serious. The amendment also says:

> (d) immediately provides for those persons who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services for themselves.

I believe that here also, everyone will agree that the matter is serious.

However, Mr. Speaker, having listened to all the arguments and weighed the evidence, I feel I cannot support the amendment because I fear it will delay the passing of the bill.

I would submit, however, that the government should at least consider the principle of the amendment, consider it seriously as a statement of constructive suggestions which should eventually be incorporated in the bill before us, if they are not already fully incorporated.

But Mr. Speaker, I must say that I share the opinion of the majority and I approve the principle of the bill; I even approve it as it now stands, while recognizing that certain aspects could be improved and will eventually be improved, I hope, following future consultations with the provincial authorities.

To my mind, the most serious objection was raised by my colleague, the member for

Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), who raised a constitutional objection. For the hundredth time, perhaps, I have gone over the British North America Act to determine exactly what are the respective prerogatives of the federal and provincial governments and, after reading the act, it remains obvious that health matters are a provincial government responsibility. I see nothing, with regard to federal government prerogatives, which would enable it to take over health matters. It is clearly stated in paragraph 7 of the summary drawn up by Dr. Maurice Ollivier, and I quote:

The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

These are exclusive powers of provincial legislatures.

Obviously, the conditions 100 years ago were different from those in 1966, but the statement is to the effect that health matters are a provincial responsibility.

Moreover, there have been famous instances which showed us that this was a provincial responsibility. For instance, you will remember that in 1930, the Bennett administration had tried to introduce unemployment insurance and that the bill was declared ultra vires, since it was maintained that the federal government did not have the power to collect funds for programs dealing with provincial responsibilities, even if it returned these funds to the provinces.

Mr. Justice Hall and the members of the royal commission were certainly concerned with this constitutional point, since they tell us on page 11 of their report, paragraph 4:

Canada's evolving constitutional arrangements take into account the primary jurisdiction of provincial governments with respect to health matters including staging, scope and administration of health services, as well as the necessity for federal financial assistance to enable each of the provinces to implement a comprehensive, universal health services program.

And further on, on page 14, the commissioners urge the federal government to call together within 6 months all provincial authorities in order to discuss health matters, since it is recognized in the report that provincial governments may not have all the required financial powers to establish such plans.

Nevertheless, the commissioners add something that I find very sensible. I quote:

The responsibility for leadership must be accepted by the federal government and plans made so as to ensure that every phase of the development of the programme is consistent with its over-all objective. The unity of the programme and its application to all Canadians must be safeguarded.

I find therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the constitutionality of the law has concerned everyone who has dealt with the matter. And I find again the same concern in the very title of the bill which reads.

—pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

And further on, in paragraph 1 (a) of section 4:

The plan is administered and operated on a non-profit basis by a public authority appointed or designated by the government of the province—

Therefore, the federal legislation expresses some concern about the important matter of safeguarding the constitutionality of the act. In paragraph 2 of section 4, one can read:

Any such designation—

This is a reference to the responsibility of the provincial authority concerning the implementation of the legislation.

—it is a condition of any such designation that all individual accounts so rendered to which the designation extend are subjected to assessment and approval by the provincial authority and that the amounts to be paid in respect thereof shall be determined by the provincial authority.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a theoretician nor a purist in constitutional matters. I am one of those Canadians raised in a social class where authorities are required to act according to the needs of the people and if I am assured that all those interested in that legislation are basically concerned in protecting provincial rights from the constitutional point of view, I will be satisfied, because I am one of those who believe that the problem of tax sharing between the federal government and the provincial and municipal authorities cannot be solved in a jiffy. It is a matter which should be solved gradually. Surveys have been made and reports submitted in that connection. The opportunity will present itself to hold meetings and I hope that eventually, at the three levels of government, satisfactory arrangements will finally be entered into, the responsibilities of each government will be defined as precisely as possible and sources of income which each government needs to assume its responsibilities will be distributed fairly.

But in the meanwhile, and this is the point I wish to make, can the Canadian people be denied the benefits of medicare. I do not believe so. I should then be given the assurance that those principles which I hold as intangible will always be taken into account because I believe that from then on, universally acceptable formulas must be sought to meet the health needs of all Canadians. In fact, what is the point of asking the government to try and work towards developing this country's economy if, basically, public health is not adequate?

Therefore, to summarize what I have just said, I have noted plenty of objections, say about ten, that I would like to put forward briefly to express my point of view.

For instance, it was suggested that the bill was to be used for electoral propaganda.

This does not surprise me, it does not scandalize me, for were the plan not carried out by the Liberals, it would be carried out by the Conservatives, by the N.D.P., or by the Créditistes. Then, I think it is impossible to expect that politicians who are concerned about the next election will never engage in electioneering. Therefore, this does not impress me in the circumstances.

Then someone claimed that it was not going quickly enough, that 1968 is a quite remote date. No, Mr. Speaker. I am of the opinion that the theory of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) was quite justifiable, for if the financial situation of the country is such as they say it is—and I believe it is so; besides we have evidence of this in all the newspapers, and this situation prevails not only in Canada but throughout the world—it might be wise to postpone this legislation. Therefore, his argument is a valid one. It is sound also because it was precisely suggested that all the provinces were not in agreement. There are still five or six of them which do not agree with the plan as it is; they may agree with the principle, but not with the plan in its present form.

Therefore, it may well be that the one- or two year delay for the implementation of the plan will provide an opportunity for all competent authorities to get together and reach an acceptable solution. It was suggested in other places that this is socialism. Well, I am for private enterprise, but inspired by the principles of the great masters of the religion I practice, that is the religion of the Pope and of the bishops, I am also ready to accept a mitigated form of socialism in the field of human needs. For instance, I would probably not accept socialism in trade or industry, or at least, not in all spheres of trade and industry, but as far as basic needs such as health and education are concerned, socialism does not worry me much, especially if we always remember that, in the field of health and education, we will have to leave most responsibilities in the hands of provincial authorities.

It is said that the plan was not intended to be compulsory. Evidently, that depends on the meaning of the word "compulsory". In my opinion, it would be unthinkable to force people to receive medical treatment at one place instead of another. But when national health is at stake, surely we can set some requirements so as to be sure that the careless ones, those who do not care for their health, would not contaminate the others. Therefore, we should be forced to contribute to the plan to some degree, but this obligation will have to be flexible, so that it does not become slavery.

Mention has been made of the shortage of doctors. The matter is serious, and it is a fact. There is a shortage of doctors but, to my mind, that is no reason to delay the passing of the act, for I know efforts are being made to train more doctors in Canada. I see, precisely in the passing of that act, a stimulant toward greater efforts; who knows, it might soon spur the government into granting the universities more assistance toward training better qualified and specialized doctors. I fail to see in the argument a reason to delay the bill. I therefore feel that the Conservative amendment becomes a dilatory amendment; on the other hand, if the argument is serious, it still is no reason, in my opinion, not to pass that legislation.

It has also been said that it would be very costly. Can we afford it? Will the people not overdo it? Of course, it will cost a lot. But I agree with the Hall commission when it says: if we can afford to spend between $600 or $700 million a year on tobacco, if we can afford to spend $700 million on liquor and beer, we can certainly afford to spend $400 million, or rather $800 million the contribution of the provinces included, to safeguard national health. Nor is it a serious argument. It is merely a matter of knowing when, under the present circumstances, the act can become effective. I say, therefore, that the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) has found an acceptable compromise. With regard to this argument, I should like to say something which struck me when it was mentioned earlier: that the provinces known as rich should forget a little their so-called constitutional demands and remember that we are all interdependent to a certain extent and that if, for example, we felt it was our duty to help underdeveloped countries because all the nations in the world are interdependent, we should apply the same principle at home and the rich provinces should be ready to contribute to the cost of this legislation to help the poorer provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I come back, therefore, to what I was saying earlier. What struck me most was the constitutional argument, and I quoted texts earlier to show that this argument is serious and valid, that it must on no account be dismissed, and that those who, by profession or experience, qualify as defenders of the constitution, must recall it at every opportunity. We must not forget that the most important objective which must be reached as soon as possible is the revision of the constitution and its explanation in some cases to prevent a recurrence of the present clashes and duplication. I think this is something which should be repeated.

Mr. Speaker, even if this is repetitious, I do not believe this bill should be blocked, and I was glad to see that my colleague from Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) did not seem to oppose the bill in his remarks either, but merely wished to sound the alarm, which he did with a competence which, for my part, I do not possess.

But this leads me to say that my own province is worried, and with good reason, about the fiscal adjustments. In my opinion, there are two kinds of fiscal adjustments, Mr. Speaker. There is one which might mean that, as soon as the bill is implemented, the federal government would give the province the amount of money it would normally be entitled to and expect it to make do with it. It would very likely be the ideal solution.

And I remember that we asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen)—when the resolution concerning that bill was passed and as a matter of fact I asked him myself—if he would be willing to consider granting a fiscal adjustment to the province of Quebec.

I remember that the minister did not give us a satisfactory answer then. He did not seem ready to accept the principle of a fiscal adjustment with regard to the provinces which, for constitutional or other reasons, cannot accept the bill as it is. I was struck by an article which appeared, shortly afterwards, in a newspaper, Le Devoir of July 15, 1966, written by Miss Françoise Côté and entitled:

Medicare—Even if its plan goes into effect after July 1967, Quebec will be able to obtain the fiscal equivalent.

It is reported that the minister, in reply to a question, was not too explicit, far from it; but, on the other hand, a spokesman—I am now quoting, Mr. Speaker—a spokesman from the office of the Canadian Minister of Health was more explicit on the procedure concerning the fiscal equivalent which will be available to the provinces after the 1972 revision.

It goes on to say that it will not be necessary for a province to have had its medicare plan in operation for five years, that is since July 1, 1967, to obtain the fiscal equivalent. The plan will have to have been in operation for a sufficient number of years to permit a full appraisal of its cost. It would seem that the minister has changed his mind somewhat since then and that he is concerned himself with this question of fiscal compensation.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, because of my education, my background, atavism and what I have been doing all my life, I believe that, important as those fiscal matters may be, they should not delay the passage of such a momentous bill which will mean so much once it becomes law. Rather, we must try to find an acceptable formula, for the time being, attempt to improve it from year to year so that eventually every province will have its own revenues and will attend to its own affairs. I think conditions are nevertheless improving since the province of Quebec has had its commission on taxation since the federal government has reconsidered its position. I think that, eventually, the convening of other federal-provincial conferences will be requested and that such an ideal goal will probably be sought in the end, but I still believe that the benefits of this legislation must not be delayed. It is to be hoped that the government will not consider this as an accomplished fact and say: "Well, you accepted that kind of compromise, why not accept another one?"

I, like everybody else, have heard very categorical statements from certain politicians of my own province, such as hon. Mr. Bertrand or hon. Mr. Couturier. There are even some in other provinces who say that they will not accept any condition laid down by the federal government. Again, one cannot blame them, as they are the custodians of those prerogatives which are basic, in my opinion. But, in spite of that, I think it would be possible to find an acceptable formula which, even if it were not perfect upon the inception of the act, could, since there is still a year and a half or two years ahead of us to improve upon, be improved, as far as those arrangements are concerned, at each new session so that the time would come when every province would have its own sources of revenue and attend to its own affairs.

But, in the meantime, the federal government cannot be blamed, I believe, for showing leadership, for initiating commendable action, and, in all objectivity, it should be said that had the federal government not taken the lead in the field of insurance for the unemployed, the aged, the disabled and with respect to all the other social schemes, it is most likely that three quarters of the provinces would still be without them.

It might be argued that that would be because their means are insufficient. Perhaps. Anyhow, let us try, little by little, to provide them with the necessary means so that, eventually, each of them may tend to its own responsibilities. But, once again, I say that I am not one of those who would criticize the government for showing initiative and leadership at a time when the needs of all Canadians are so interdependent that we cannot hope to develop our trade and our industry without first considering the safeguard of that human capital, health and life.

It is with such feelings, Mr. Speaker, that I am prepared to accept the bill, taking into account the restrictions I have mentioned during my contribution to the debate and insisting that the government must not, later on, come and tell us: You have made a concession, we are asking you to agree to another.

• (3:20 p.m.)

As it is, I believe that the bill meets the requests of certain Canadian leaders, as, for instance, Mr. Jodoin, of a well-known labour union, who stated at the beginning of this session that medicare should be given top priority. I think that Mr. Jodoin was perfectly right in saying so and that in implementing medicare, the government is promoting the commonwealth. Thank you.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, yesterday and today we heard so many speeches on Bill No. C-227 now before the house that I am wondering whether members are able to explain it objectively to their constituents who elected them to the house of commons.

It seems that once again, everything has been mixed up, which is nothing new. Socialistic methods have been discussed, but a distinction should have been made, because Bill No. C-227 is a social measure rather than the implementation of a certain socialism. This makes a basic difference, since under a social measure, the individual co-operates with the government, whereas under a socialistic method, the government acts alone.

At this point, I refer especially to certain arguments put forward by members opposite to the effect that special emphasis has been put, for instance, on the free choice of the doctor. I have seen nowhere in the bill, which basically reflects the four criteria that are actually principles to be applied by all the provinces if they expect any federal contribution, that the free choice of the doctor is to be denied. Nowhere have I seen it in the bill. In my opinion, such an assertion is completely untrue or, at least, a misrepresentation. It is not a health insurance plan as it exists in England, which is a strictly socialistic measure under which a doctor is not free to select his patients, while the latter are required under the law to consult such and such a doctor. Following lawsuits which created quite a stir, the medical profession had to withdraw because it had no right to appeal.

It also seems that something else has been brought forward, that is practically the same arguments, set forth in 1958 when the province of Quebec opted out of a hospital insurance scheme. And by the same token, the province of Quebec was the last province to take part in the hospital insurance plan as advocated by the federal government.

It was argued that we were not ready to participate in the hospital insurance, because apparently we were short of beds in the province of Quebec. We adopt this reasoning to the health insurance by saying that we are short of doctors. We shall always be short of doctors. All countries have lacked doctors and Canada is short of them today and will still be short of them tomorrow. Is that a sufficient reason not to implement the health insurance as advocated?

I shall go further. Today, institutions, universities, medical schools are filled up right from the day of registration and, therefore, a very great number of candidates are not accepted. If people say that we do not have enough universities, I admit it. But I object to the proliferation of universities, because in medicine especially, we must expand our existing universities rather than opening new ones which are simply the ramifications of great universities.

Today, standards in medical school are too high. Automatically, we exclude some students who could pursue good medical studies, and become good general practitioners all across Canada. But they are excluded right from the start. Furthermore, doctors who practised in Canada are leaving for the United States because they cannot practise anymore here as they are offered better positions there.

And in the third place, the physician had formerly no social security. He had to work till his death under difficult conditions. He had to provide his own old age pension. He had to provide for his own future. At the present time, the proposed legislation already makes such provision. Those who wish to dedicate themselves to the medical profession will be sure, at least as long as they will be in a position to do so, to work and take advantage of other social legislation.

It is claimed that there is a shortage of medical equipment. There is a shortage of staff, because under the present circumstances, university students are inclined to specialize before practising medicine and this is absurd. But, do not see why there should be some objection to that bill simply because there is a shortage of medical personnel.

Today, there are 24,000 doctors in Canada but only 9,360 are general practitioners, which is nonsensical compared to 10,320 specialists. This is contrary to common sense. General practitioners represent 39 per cent and specialists 43 per cent. Twenty years ago it was the opposite. In the province of Quebec things are even worse.

Then, do you suppose when we say that in medicine we do not have the necessary human material, it can be a valid argument for maintaining that this bill should not be passed? Everybody seems agreeable to recognizing the great principles. However, we would like to evade the issue by stating arguments which are strictly deceptive.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that we have here a principle which is valid for all the provinces, which is based on common sense, on the basic right of the government to take care of human health. Health as well as education is a basic right, and the government must do everything in its power so that all citizens may be in good health.

Yesterday, I heard a member say that we were putting the citizens in a political strait jacket. I would want us to work together, with a little common sense and not too much discussion, which is a loss of time, and pass a social piece of legislation which will be, I hope, the first step toward "pharmacare" and "preventicare".

People who want to cure a nation must see to it that preventive measures are made available to every one. Let the drugs from the drugstores be available to everybody, just like medicare.

I should not like to prolong this debate any longer. I already told the house that had the federal government not participated as they did, in a direct way, even though this may be a constitutional matter which is perhaps not entirely under federal jurisdiction, I am wondering where we would stand today, in 1966, if that had been left in the care of the provinces, as set out in the constitution.

I believe the federal government have set a precedent, that they have been generous; they even went beyond their rights, so to speak, so as to remind the provinces that they had their own rights. It may be all very well to say that in 1966, but in 1919, when those medicare plans came up for the first time, the provinces were not financially ready or were not considering the setting up of plans and legislation of that kind. I see that the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) is looking at me. He knows very well that those who practise medicine have 150 ways of filling in insurance forms, about 350 plans in order to submit their claims, as most insurance companies have restrictive clauses. Payment is often made only after the third, the fourth or the fifth visit. The hospital is not paid; visits at home are paid; visits at the office are paid also, but this or that is not paid. But why not have an overall plan, that would be uniform throughout Canada? Moreover, most of the insurance companies do not fulfil their contracts nowadays with the people who relied upon them, with their clients. You are promised wonders when you take out insurance; but most people do not even know what the contract means when sickness strikes.

Some insurance companies have deluded and continue to delude the public. Will that still be tolerated in Canada in 1966? If insurance companies are in earnest, let them form one large company, provincial in scope, on a non-profit basis, so that everyone can have the same protection; and let provincial governments ask this one company to act as their agent as Bill No. C-227 stipulates. This bill is just, fair, and above all intelligent, accessible to all; it will show that the federal government is not interested merely in constitutional controversy but also in giving back to the citizens what belongs to them, namely their health.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I rise with some hesitancy to take part in this debate. Frankly I am puzzled that we as legislators should be asked to make a decision, now, on a plan which will not come into effect until 1968?

A few weeks ago we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) enlarging on his reasons for contemplating the introduction of what some people term a baby budget. He said that from time to time governments are obliged to establish priorities in respect to legislation. I think we would all agree with that. I ask this question: How, and in what order of priorities, are we to deal today with a bill which is not to take effect until 1968, almost two years hence?

All across this country people are wondering why parliament is not getting down to business. As we travel across Canada we hear people saying that this house is doing very little and that it is high time it got down to work.

Today we are being asked to debate a program of far reaching significance which is not to become effective until July 1, 1968. Surely the people of Canada are not likely to think we are really doing something of benefit for them? I can think of many pieces of legislation with which this house should proceed in preference to the bill now before us. When we consider the social needs of the public we should surely consider the position of senior citizens who are being asked to live in a climate of increasing prices on pensions which do not meet their needs. Why does the government not set up a list of priorities and come forward with legislation allowing senior citizens to receive the increase they have been tentatively promised? The carrot has been held out. It will be available, they are told, some time this fall. Why is the government not proceeding with this measure instead of with legislation the results of which will not be available for two years?

There are other fields in which legislative action is necessary. We should consider the situation of veterans, disabled people, and others in similar categories whose incomes do not allow them to enjoy a reasonable standard of living in these days of rapidly rising costs. Canadians throughout this country find themselves in strait-jackets because of the inflationary policies followed by the present government. The fact that so little urgency attaches to the present debate indicates poor management on the part of the government, and I am sure the public generally, considering these circumstances, will come to the conclusion that once again this house is doing very little by way of social legislation to bring immediate relief to those most in need.

I am tempted to think that no other legislation is ready for submission, and that the present measure is before us merely because it has been ready for a long time. Let us consider some of the other things which should be done in this field before legislation is undertaken. Surely when such a bill as this is drafted the government in office should strive to bring about some degree of co-operation and understanding with the provinces?

The measure before us cannot be implemented in the absence of direct co-operation from the provinces. But what do we find? We find that provinces are at cross purposes. The province of Alberta from which I come does not like this bill at all. Ontario is lukewarm toward it. Mr. Roblin said a few weeks ago that he was pleased the government had decided to hold up the legislation until 1968, at which time Canada could take a better look at it and the provinces could decide whether or not they would go along with it. By failing to reach some degree of agreement with the provinces on this legislation before bringing it into the house, the government has been derelict in its duties.

The medicare scheme now operating in Alberta will not fall within the confines of this legislation. Hon. members might ask why this should be so. The onus is on the government to seek provincial co-operation and agreement whenever legislation which concerns the jurisdiction of the provinces is concerned, as is certainly the case in this instance. Anyone coming from Alberta can readily see that this government has not gone to any real trouble to achieve any significant degree of co-operation with that province, at least.

Today we are living in a rapidly changing society, a society in which one thing may not be a crying need at the moment but tomorrow will become one, a society which, during my short time in this House of Commons, has greatly changed and speeded up. I am sure hon. members will agree that we are living in a fast moving society. If we accept this, then why should we be asked to pass legislation that will not come into effect for two years, at which time we may find ourselves in a different set of circumstances than that which we are facing now?

In 1958 the hospitalization scheme was introduced. It was a good plan. Eight years have elapsed since it was introduced, yet we still see a crying need for hospitals. People in every major city in the country have to be waitlisted, placed on a priority list or a needs list before they can obtain hospital beds. I think we should smooth out the wrinkles in that plan before foisting this medicare scheme on the public, a scheme which has not got the full approval of the provinces and which we are being asked to pass two years before it will come into effect.

One of the criteria laid down by the government is that the scheme must be operated by a government agency, a public authority appointed or designated by the government. It must also be operated on a non-profit basis. Will the M.S.I. scheme operated in the province of Alberta qualify? We are told that it will not, yet it is supposed to be a non-profit scheme. It may not be a public authority which is operating it; but any federal government that is moving into a provincial field should do so with some degree of hesitancy, with some degree of formal consultation with the provinces, and should give the provinces latitude in which to vary their plans so that they may fall within the ambit of the general medicare program to be supported by the federal authority.

Under this bill the federal government is to pay 50 per cent of the cost, up to $14 per capita. That is a large amount of money. No province can say to itself, "We will do without this money," because most provinces are in search of areas which will provide them with more revenue. This is one area in which they would gladly pick up that extra revenue, but they must match it dollar for dollar, and must comply with a set of rigid regulations laid down by the federal government on matters which really fall within provincial jurisdiction.

I am not in any way trying to boost the Alberta Social Credit medicare plan. I think it has many shortcomings, but it is the plan Alberta has chosen. It is the plan the people of Alberta have accepted. One has only to look at the composition of the provincial legislature to see that the people of Alberta have accepted it. Why then is the federal government making an all-out effort to force its wishes upon that province in a field which lies within provincial jurisdiction?

Another provision of the bill is that 90 per cent of the insurable residents of a province must be covered by medicare before the federal government will give assistance. By 1968 those provinces which wish to introduce their own plans could be expected to have 90 per cent of their insurable residents covered. But supposing they do not, supposing they had only 75 per cent covered, why should the federal government insist on such a high percentage before allowing a provincial scheme to qualify for assistance?

Coverage of 75 per cent of the insurable residents would be high enough to ensure the implementation and success of a provincial scheme, and would be high enough to ensure that the other 25 per cent would wish to join after the scheme came into effect. But the federal government, because of its dictatorial attitude, its authoritative manner, is laying down four rigid criteria, and one is that 90 per cent of the insurable residents be covered. Why should not a voluntary plan be acceptable to the government? It should move less authoritatively when entering a provincial field, and should move only after a greater degree of co-operation has been reached with the provinces.

When one considers that this scheme will not come into effect until July, 1968, he must ask why the government does not now introduce medicare for senior citizens receiving pensions? This is something which we in Alberta have had for a number of years. If a person is receiving a pension he can acquire a card which entitles him to free medical services. Why does not the federal government do something about that? If it feels that the complete plan will have too great an inflationary impact, why not bring in a small portion of it?

In effect the federal government is now saying to a pensioner, "You have lived and served your work years in Canada. You are entitled to a pension, but if you take sick you are out of luck, you are on your own. We will prevent you starving to death but don't dare get sick because then you are on your own."

All across Canada senior citizens who are in poor health are having to buy expensive drugs and stay on waiting lists when they want to get into hospital. If this government really wants to move ahead with good social legislation, and bring about some degree of social justice in Canada, this is one of the things that should receive top priority in its priority ratings of legislation to be presented to the house.

Let me say, in answer to the charge that the opposition has filibustered on occasion to hold up the work of this House of Commons and parliament, that the opposition has no way of bringing legislation forward, but can only debate after passing judgment on whatever legislation is before the house. We are now being asked to pass judgment on legislation which will not come into effect for two years. This is legislation which the government has indicated is needed. The only conclusion I can come to is that the government has decided it is wise to wait until July 1, 1968 before bringing this social program into effect, because it intends to call an election in the fall of 1968. The government must be doing this with the hope that it can once again buy the votes of Canadians by the introduction of social legislation. It is difficult for any member of parliament to stand up and oppose a medicare program. I am trying to rationalize the thinking of the government. If it was really felt that some action of this kind should be taken, the government should bring in immediately legislation which would provide free medical services for all our senior citizens now on pensions.

A program of free medical service for our senor citizens would not be of a magnitude sufficient to create additional inflationary pressures. Some provinces already have programs of this kind, Alberta being one, and I am sure other provinces could afford and would like to move into this field.

I can only conclude by the government's action at this time that it has decided to delay the implementation of this program until 1968, because it will not call an election in 1967 and intends to call one in the fall of 1968 in the hopes that it will be returned to office. Surely that is a mean trick to play on our senior citizens who are looking eagerly to Ottawa for assistance both in relation to pensions and medical care services. This government should reconsider its position and do something for those people who need assistance in meeting the expenses involved in medical and dental care. We here in Ottawa have a responsibility to help the people of Canada in this changing society of ours.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group intend to support and vote for this bill because we have over the years felt that medical care should be provided the people of this country without regard for their ability to pay. We believe that such care can only be provided through a plan organized and operated by the government of Canada.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

In this party we do not just talk about things. We are not like the Liberals who have been promising to implement this kind of legislation since 1919. The government headed by the present leader of the New Democratic Party when he was premier of the province of Saskatchewan implemented a medicare plan in that province which should be a guide line in Canada.

The bill before us embodies the principles enunciated and explained so clearly by the Royal Commission on Health Services headed by Mr. Justice Hall. Let me point out to those hon. members of the Conservative party who have spoken during the last two days, calling for the killing of this bill, that the Hall Commission was appointed by a former prime minister, the present Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

When Mr. Justice Hall brought down his report in 1964 the basic principles enunciated were greeted with enthusiasm by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I have in my hands an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 22, 1964. For the benefit of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), who introduced the killer amendment now before us, I should like to read from this article which is headed "Diefenbaker Endorses Health Plan Proposals". The articles states:

> Opposition leader John Diefenbaker came out strongly in favour of the recommendations of the royal commission on health services Saturday and urged an immediate federal-provincial conference to discuss them.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Accadia (Mr. Horner), who just suggested there were many other important matters which ought to be discussed, let me quote another paragraph from that same article which appeared on June 22, 1964. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker termed the commission's report the most momentous and outstanding one in Canada in the past 50 years.

In spite of that fact, a host of Conservatives spoke yesterday and today, and I supposed many will speak in days to come, arguing that we do not need this kind of plan because we do not have the facilities to operate it, and because voluntary plans can do the job as well or better. They have argued that we do not have enough doctors, nurses, facilities and other things needed.

Yesterday we witnessed the amazing spectacle of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Ballard), quoting ostensibly from the Hall Commission report. He must have been looking through a microscope at the footnotes and back pages, because anyone listening to him would have got the impression that Mr. Justice Hall said in his report that we ought not to go ahead with a universal government-operated and sponsored medical care plan, because we do not have sufficient doctors or facilities.

I have before me a commission press release which summarizes the main recommendations of the Hall Commission report, and I should like to put on record for the benefit of some Conservative members just what Mr. Justice Hall said about this question. It is obvious to anybody who can read that every important proposal Mr. Justice Hall recommended has in fact been ignored and rejected by the Conservatives in their amendment.

This is what the commission headed by Mr. Justice Hall said. I am quoting from the official press release and hon. members will find these words on pages 7, 8 and 9.

> The commissioners, after examining various alternatives for providing Canadians with health services, recommend that the health services program be made universally available. They recognize that many Canadians have availed themselves of the benefits of health prepayment plans but these are principally those who can afford protection or are employed where health insurance is provided or subsidized as a part of working conditions. They also recognize the initiative shown by Alberta and Ontario in developing legislation that provides for voluntary coverage of certain medical services, with subsidies for some citizens.
> After prolonged study and investigation the Commissioners conclude that coverage of all, or virtually all, Canadians could not be achieved through the voluntary system and that only a universal program could achieve maximum coverage. They recommend against the adoption of the Alberta and Ontario plans in their present form because they are too restrictive and they fail to reach a great percentage of the population who need protection more than anyone else.

Later there is this passage:

> In view of their recommendation that Canada develop an integrated comprehensive health services program, the commissioners reject all methods of subsidizing individuals that involves means testing. They do so on the grounds that the proportion of the population to be means tested would be too large and the administrative costs high, but also because it is not in harmony with human dignity. Instead they recommend that a health insurance fund be established in each province, administered as recommended in the preceding paragraph, contributed to by the federal government from general revenue and by provincial governments from premiums, sales or other taxes, or general revenues as they may best determine.

I think it is obvious from the few quotations I have put on the record that Mr. Justice Hall and the commissioners recommended essentially the principles which are embodied in the bill we have before us. We are being told by members of the Conservative opposition that we cannot go ahead with this plan now because the provinces are not supporting the proposal. I suggest to those hon. members that they look at the record of what happened when this country implemented hospitalization. It was the Liberal government under Mr. St. Laurent which brought in the bill for government hospitalization. It was a Liberal government which said that that legislation would not go into effect until the majority of the people of Canada as represented by the provincial governments agreed to participate.

That bill gathered dust and did not reach the statute books. It was Mr. Diefenbaker and his Progressive Conservative government who, after they came into power, brought hospitalization into effect by saying to the provinces, "We are ready to go ahead. We are ready to pay the federal share of hospitalization to any province, even one province, if it is ready to go ahead." When Mr. Diefenbaker said that, it was not very long before we had hospitalization in every province of this country.

Is there a single member of parliament or a single person in Canada who thinks this country made a mistake when we implemented hospitalization? People who are close to me have had hospital bills of $6,000, $7,000 and $8,000 paid by their provincial hospitalization plan, which meant that they did not go into debt for a year, or two, or ten as would have happened earlier. These hospital bills were paid because we finally had a government plan.

I suggest to the government and the members of the Conservative opposition that if the government stand fast on this bill and say, "These are the principles which the bill will embody, the principles which Mr. Justice Hall enunciated so clearly and eloquently, and we, the federal government are prepared to help finance a plan which is universal", the provincial governments, whether they like it or not, will go ahead with the plan because they will not be able to stay out. I do not believe for a moment that Premier Roblin of my province, although he is for voluntary medicare, as he was for voluntary hospitalization, would dare to stay out, because I cannot think of anything on which we would rather fight an election than a program of medicare if Mr. Roblin stayed out of this plan.

Mr. Woolliams: Your leader was defeated in Saskatchewan on medicare.

Mr. Orlikow: Well, there is that chance in Manitoba; and I suggest that if Premier Manning wants to fight this issue, the people of Alberta will show him what they think about medicare. We are told by the Conservative opposition that the plan which the government proposes is no good because it ought to be voluntary and is not. All the evidence is that voluntary plans just do not work. Mr. Justice Hall demonstrated this conclusively in his report, and every expert who has considered the question has come up with the same conclusion.

We are being told that we cannot go ahead with this plan because there are not enough doctors in Canada. It was not so long ago that the leaders of the organized medical profession thought they could block medicare. They were arguing that we did not need medicare because people received all the medical services they needed. How many doctors and spokesmen for the medical associations in Canada made speeches in every city in this country to the effect that any person who was sick in Canada could obtain medical service, because if he did not have the money the doctors would look after him without payment; they would do this in a spirit of charity.

Now the organized medical profession realizes that, like it or not, medicare is coming, the argument is: Well, it is coming, but we cannot have it now because there are not enough doctors. They have made a complete reversal; and of course the Conservative party has made the reserval which one would expect, because they always speak for the organized groups which have power in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the unions?

Mr. Orlikow: There are not enough doctors in our country, but this situation is not caused by the possible implementation of medicare. We heard the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Ballard) reading horrendous figures into the record yesterday about the number of doctors leaving Great Britain. There are many doctors leaving Great Britain, and the British people have a problem with regard to medical services. But, if one makes an adjustment for the difference in population, he finds there are fewer doctors leaving Great Britain this year, even though they have medicare, than there are comparatively leaving Canada, for the United States, because for the last five years at least 500 or more doctors have left this country for the United States.

This has not occurred because we have medicare; doctors started to leave Canada long before medicare was even talked about. Doctors, being pretty practical people, know that even though this government are promising medicare for 1968, it may be much later when we get it. Therefore I say that the arguments advanced by members of parliament speaking for the Conservative opposition are not only wrong but are completely opposed to the principles enunciated by Mr. Justice Hall who headed the commission appointed by the Conservative government. Those principles were endorsed, when the report was published, by the leader of the Conservative party.

I should like to deal with just one more argument put forward by the Conservative opposition. We have been told that we do not need this kind of plan; that we do not need a compulsory universal plan and should have a voluntary one.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I want to put on the record part of an article which appeared on the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press, a Conservative newspaper.

Mr. Nowlan: What did he say?

Mr. Orlikow: I apologize, I meant the Winnipeg Tribune. Anyway, both newspapers are Conservative, although one still continues, I suppose out of a sense of history, to support the new conservative party, which is called the Liberal party. An article appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on October 7, 1966 written by one of their leading newspapermen, Val Werier. It dealt with the voluntary medical plan which we have in the province of Manitoba and which was sponsored by that great Conservative premier, Premier Roblin, possibly the next leader of the Conservative party in the federal parliament. I want to read just a few paragraphs from this article to show how this so-called voluntary medicare plan works:

It must come as a shock to many people, but a pensioner living solely on $75 does not automatically qualify for provincial medicare. This is the government scheme subsidized by doctors to help the needy elderly.

It would be taken for granted that a person living on $75 would be welcomed and encouraged to receive free medicare.

The fact is that old people today with nothing else but their federal pension of $75 a month are being rejected by the province for free medicare. If the test, which is unrealistically calculated, determines he is getting by, the pensioner must pay for his own medical coverage.

The provincial government uses its scale of social allowances as a yardstick for extra aid to those getting the federal pension of $75.

Under this scale, for a single person living alone, the following is allowed: $26 for food; $10 for household and personal needs; $5 for clothing; $5 for health costs. Rents vary with the need, with up to $35 allowed for a heated room; $25 for an unheated room, plus extra for utilities.

The person on $75 does not qualify for medicare if he cannot prove that his costs for rent, utilities and special needs bring it above $75.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the voluntary medicare which the Conservative opposition in this parliament and the Conservative premier of Manitoba not only are thinking about but have implemented, and I suggest it is completely unacceptable.

We believe that what this country needs is a universal, comprehensive medical insurance plan, and we believe that it should start now, as this government and its spokesmen repeated ad nauseam as their platform in every city in this country for the last two or three years.

If I had any doubts that I was right in my belief that this plan should be implemented on July 1, 1967 as was proposed initially by the Liberals, they would have been dispelled by the letter which I received today from the city clerk of the city of Winnipeg. Although that city council has more N.D.P. aldermen than most cities, the substantial majority is made up of Liberal and Conservative members of the council, as are most councils in this country. Nevertheless it passed a resolution on October 11, part of which is as follows:

Whereas the government of Canada, which had undertaken to inaugurate a universal, national medicare plan on July 1, 1967, has announced a delay of one year in implementing such a plan; And whereas the Manitoba government has failed to support a universal plan of medicare; Therefore be it resolved that this council urge the government of Canada and the Manitoba government to press forward with government medical insurance on a universal basis as outlined in the Hall report, beginning July 1, 1967.

The council of the city of Winnipeg knows what the people of that city want, and the same is true of the people of Canada. They want medicare and they want it now.

Mr. Speaker, we support this plan and this legislation. We will vote for this bill as it is on the order paper today. We are completely opposed, first of all, to the killer amendment which emasculates the whole bill; we are also opposed to the whole concept of universal medicare as proposed by the official opposition, and we are opposed to the amendments which I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) will be bringing in with a great deal of regret, and under a great deal of pressure, to delay the implementation of this plan to July 1, 1968.

Having said that, I want to spend a little time commiserating with the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the extremely unpleasant position in which he finds himself. I want to say to him and to the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), who had to express his public penance yesterday by supporting what a week or two ago he was opposing so bitterly at Peterborough, that we believe there is no reason for the delay in the implementation of this legislation.

For years we have urged governments to go ahead with such a plan. As I said earlier, the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan introduced such a plan, which is working so well that the present Liberal premier, who is dead set against socialism or what he considers to be socialism, has not dared to oppose the bill or to change it as one would have expected him to do.

I am curious, as I am sure are other people of Canada, as to why this government reneged on its promise made so often and so eloquently to go ahead with medicare on July 1, 1967. I will not place all the relevant quotes on the record, because I would need weeks, not days, to put on the record everything which every Liberal candidate said. I suppose the government could say with justification that they are really not responsible for some of the irresponsible and less knowledgeable things which some Liberal candidate in some backwoods constituency might have said; however, Mr. Speaker, that promise was made by the head of the Liberal party, by the Prime Minister. It was also made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, by parliamentary secretaries and by other ministers, and it is very clear, plain and precise. There were no if's, but's and maybe's.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said yesterday, that this promise was first made in August of 1919, and that even for a party which is as slow as the Liberal party has been about all its promises, 47 years is really too long. Finally after some 47 years the Liberal party woke up and started speaking about medicare, not in the vague and general way in which they had spoken of it for so long, but specifically. They set a specific date. What did they say? The Ottawa Citizen of September 21, 1965 carried the following news report:

> Prime Minister Pearson today announced a pledge to have a full medicare scheme operating in Canada by July 1, 1967.
> In a speech before Liberal candidates here today Mr. Pearson said his government needed a mandate from the people November 8 to realize this medicare objective.

The Prime Minister was giving the lead to Liberal candidates going into an election. This was his pitch, the thing to emphasize, this was the promise made by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada.

He did not get his majority but he was awfully close, and here we are in the New Democratic party with 21 seats. Mr. Speaker, the government has more than enough votes to put medicare through as of July 1, 1967 if they really believe in it.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Well, Mr. Speaker, here is that great left wing Liberal from Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), the parliamentary secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What does he say? I quote again from the Ottawa Citizen for June 17, 1965, which quotes the hon. member for Hamilton East in this way:

> "Subject to agreement with the provinces," he said, "I think we could implement soon a program of universal medical services under which everyone would be covered, there would be no deterrent cost, and commercial carriers as such would be discontinued."

Where is that great, radical Liberal from Hamilton East? I know where he is going to be after the next election, he is going to be back in Hamilton practising law because the people of Hamilton will not forget the betrayal of the promise on medicare which he made to them.

Here is one of the contenders for the Liberal leadership, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). He is supposed to be a right winger. I am not inside the Liberal party, so I do not know who is right or who is left. I doubt if there is anybody who is left, but he is said to be right. We have this from the Toronto Star of September 23, 1965:

> Cheering Liberals were told by Defence Minister Paul Hellyer last night that under a Liberal government Canada would have national medicare by July 1, 1967.

Could anything be more definite, Mr. Speaker? Could anything be more specific? Are the people of Canada not entitled to think that when a political party makes a promise, if that party is supported by the people that promise will be kept? Obviously that is too much to expect from the Liberal party or from this government.

We on this side were chided last night by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) because we continue to say today what we have said over the years. The hon. member for York-Scarborough supported medicare beginning in 1967, before the Minister of Finance issued his ukase that this thing could not be, and he still supported it when he acted as chairman of the meeting at Peterborough which expressed dissatisfaction with the postponement. We are not disposed to curl up and die just because the Minister of Finance says medicare cannot be now, we do not have to worry what the Minister of Finance thinks. We do not have to worry that if we do not support him we may not get the funds necessary to fight the next election. We continue to say today, therefore, what we have said in the past, the same thing which the hon. member for York-Scarborough said and the same thing which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) said. We say now, as we have said for years, that the medicre plan is necessary and that it ought to start on July 1, 1967.

As I listened to the hon. member for York-Scarborough, Mr. Speaker, I could not help but be amused at the charge that we are filibustering. How could one filibuster a measure which will not come into effect until July 1, 1968? It could not matter less to the people of Canada who want medicare whether this parliament takes two days, two weeks or two months to pass this legislation because no matter when we pass it the bill will not come into effect until July, 1968, at the earliest.

It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, how courageous, how outspoken and how radical the members on the other side are, paricularly if they come from urban ridings where they know the New Democratic Party is breathing down their necks. It is amazing how radical they can be at home, but how lamb-like they are when they get to Ottawa and come under the eagle eye of the Minister of Finance who is now the undisputed boss of the formerly great Liberal party. We are not alone in our thinking. I should like to refer to the Ottawa Citizen. I do not have to tell the members of this house who spend nine months of the year in Ottawa, how close the Liberal party is to the Ottawa Citizen. I am sure the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, when he wrote the editorial I am going to quote, wrote it with a heavy heart, as heavy a heart as the minister had when he introduced this legislation yesterday.

I want to say that never in my 20 years of public life have I heard a minister introduce an important bill, a measure as close to his heart as this one, as hesitantly, as apologetically or as quietly as did the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not blame him. It must have been a bitter pill he had to swallow. In any event, here is what the Ottawa Citizen had to say and I quote from the editorial headed, "Challenge on medicare":

> Reform-minded Liberal MP's are quite right to challenge Finance Minister Sharp and the cabinet on their decision to postpone for a year the inauguration of national health insurance. This is a Liberal commitment, made in the 1965 election campaign. Anyone who carried the Liberal colours in that election must feel he is in danger of breaking an important promise if the program is delayed till July, 1968. Before that time, there may very well be another general election.

There is what the editor of the Ottawa Citizen had to say. Let us look at another Liberal newspaper, the Toronto Star. Certainly, it is Liberal at election time, although it is very critical of the Liberal party between elections. Here is the editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star of Friday, September 9, 1966. The headline is, "Medicare delay is outrageous deceit", and it goes on to say:

> Once again the Canadian people have been deceived and disappointed in their expectation of health insurance—by the party which began promising it in 1919.
> Federal medicare is to be postponed for a year on the excuse—and it is merely an excuse—that this is necessary to fight inflation.
> A one-year postponement would be bad enough for the 4,000,000 Canadians who have inadequate medical insurance coverage and the 6,000,000 who have none at all.
> But who, in view of the 47-year record of Liberal nonfulfilment of this promise, can have any confidence that the delay will be only for one year?

I want to remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that his integrity and the integrity of his party is being questioned in that quotation, not by opponents, not by members of the New Democratic Party, but by the newspaper in Canada which has the largest circulation of any I know supporting the Liberal party. This is what they say. This newspaper came back to the argument yesterday in an even stronger editorial. I am going to put it on the record because the language is so strong that it might be considered by some people as unparliamentary if they saw it. I can only say that what I am repeating is not my view, although I subscribe to it, but the view of the Liberal Toronto Star as stated in its editorial for Tuesday, October 11, 1966. The editorial is headed, "The faltering course of true Liberalism". I am not going to read it all because I think my time would be up, but I am going to read this substantial section from it:

> The reform elements within the party are disorganized and dispirited. The rightwingers, mainly from the prairies and the west coast, are clearly dominating the conference. And the party leadership seems as smug and complacent—though not as arrogant—as it was in the last days of the St. Laurent administration a decade ago...

> Maybe no one could really expect the delegates to embarrass the government by condemning its decision to postpone medicare from July 1, 1967 to July 1, 1968. But we hoped enough Liberals would be sufficiently concerned to register a strong and loud protest.
> Fourteen did—out of a total of 2,000 delegates. The overwhelming majority uncritically accepted Finance Minister Mitchell Sharp's bland explanation that medicare had to be delayed on the ground of "fiscal responsibility".
> It was a curious performance by Mr. Sharp. He spoke of the "great pain" he had endured in announcing the delay in medicare. He said the greatest task of the party was to maintain full employment by making the right economic decisions. And he said failure to make the right economic decisions—such as the postponement of medicare—would jeopardize the future of "the little man".
> Thus vacillation is turned into a virtue. And a giant Liberal assembly sits by, with scarcely a murmur of protest, as a Liberal finance minister offers the dubious proposition that he is helping the "little people" of Canada by denying them the protection of medicare for another year.
> What kind of curious Liberal logic is this? Is this going to impress the aged, the sick, and the poor who have waited patiently for decades for the Liberal party to honour its pledge on medicare? Are they exepected to postpone their ailments and their medical bills until 1968?
> In the whole range of Liberal policy in recent years, no issue has constituted so firm a moral commitment as the pledge to launch medicare by July, 1967.

If the Liberal party can ignore so solemn and so clearcut a commitment, how can it be trusted to honour its new pledge to launch medicare by 1968, especially when a large majority of the Liberal cabinet is known to be opposed or indifferent toward a medicare program?

And if inflation can be used to justify a delay in medicare this time, what assurance can Mr. Sharp offer that it won't be used to justify another delay in 1968?

I suggest to the minister of National Health and Welfare that the views expressed in that editorial in the Liberal Toronto Star cannot be refuted, because they are 100 per cent true. The decision of the government to postpone the implementation of medicare was a betrayal of the solemn promise which was made by Liberal leaders, from the Prime Minister down, and which is long overdue.

The people of this country will not forget this betrayal. In the next election the people of Canada will demonstrate what they think of this kind of shabby and disgraceful treatment on the part of this government and the Liberal party. I am sure that when another election is held the predictions of recent Gallup polls will prove correct.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that our party, which has made it clear over the years that we believe in the implementation of medicare, will gain a great deal in the next election both in terms of votes and seats. But much as I believe in my party, and much as I want my party to grow and to become the major party in this country, I say that the price of such election is too high. I would rather have medicare introduced today and implemented in July 1967 by a Liberal government than that it be implemented later, even though I am sure that another election would mean that our party would gain a great deal.

This is a sad time for the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker. It is particularly sad for the tens of thousands of people who are not receiving the kind of medical service they need, the kind to which they are entitled and which they ought to have had long ago—the kind of service promised by the Liberal party, the kind of service which was endorsed by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he supported the basic principles of the Hall Commission report, and the kind of service which we in this party have been urging and advocating for many years.

Medicare will come, Mr. Speaker; but it will come much later that it ought to have come, thanks to the weak-kneed vacillations of this government.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I do not stand in my place today to give members a lecture on what other people should do. Rather I stand to declare from my place why I support this amendment.

Our job in the official opposition is to tailor legislation which comes before this house. If in a man's conscience he supports certain legislation, he is not necessarily bowing to the will of the government or bowing to the will of his own party. It is still possible for a man in this country to make his own independent assessment of what should be done in a given situation. I claim this on behalf of the district I represent, because that is the kind of representation that not only my constituents expect and demand, but it is the kind of representation they get.

In the nine years I have been in this house, Mr. Speaker, I have never been bullied by my party. If I had I would not be in it. I have never even been unduly pressured by my party. If I had I would not be in it. One has only to observe the differences of opinion among the independent members of the Conservative party ot see that this is the kind of party we are; and I say that this is the kind of man I am. Let us stop the class war. There is no need for a class war in Canada. But there is need for co-operation in every branch of our society in Canada today. Those who yell the loudest about the degradation of parliament are self-condemning.

I am not cynical and I do not believe that the members of this house are a pack of sheep; far from it. It is very hard indeed to line up our party as being a pack of sheep in relation to any proposal put before the house. One has only to go over Hansard for the last few days to see that there are differences of opinion over this question of medicare. I am entitled to my own personal view just as I am entitled to support my party if it reaches a consensus. I also have the right to criticize this government or any other government —including that of my own party when in power—if it acts against my own personal conscience and the will of the people I represent.

My constituents at the provincial level have made it abundantly clear what they think of Alberta's idea of medicare. No one can accuse me of being a supporter of the Social Crediters, but if the Social Crediters happen to have landed upon an answer to a specific problem which affects the welfare of the people of my province at this time, I will try to keep an open mind politically and decide here and now what should be done.

I think that the four paragraphs contained in this amendment are eminently sound on every count. I also maintain that many fair-minded members in all parties in this house will agree with the basic principle which applies to the rule of law under our constitution in Canada. We have chaos unless we have a constitution in a democratic society, and our democratic society makes no bones about the fact that we have given the provinces the sole right to decide matters of health and welfare. The section in the British North America Act makes this provision is only too well known and I am not going to remind members of it. There it is clearly laid down that health and welfare will be the sole responsibility of the provinces involved.

To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, all governments have over the years recognized this basic principle in our constitution. There is a clause in this bill which in its very wording purports to honour this principle. In clause 3 of the bill it says that the contribution is payable, pursuant to a medical care insurance plan of the province. When Bill C-227 becomes law, will it not completely negate the right of any province to have its own medical care plan? Right from the start, under our constitution the bill would be null and void if we follow the principle that the provinces have the right to legislate and administer everything connected with health and welfare. The fact that the federal government has taken on the responsibility for collecting taxes in no way gives it the right to dictate to the provinces their almost inalienable right under the constitution. To hide behind double talk is to set a dangerous precedent in this and in other pieces of legislation. What we cannot do openly, under the constitution, we should not be able to do with a financial stick; and that is what this measure purports to be.

I support the principle of medical care for all. I believe in social justice, but I do not believe in state manipulation of every corner of my life. I am not a socialist, but I do believe in social justice. I think the provinces are quite capable of giving social justice under medicare, provided they have the money to pay for the service. The fact is that because the dominion government collects taxes, it has no right to dictate to the provinces in those fields where they have an inalienable right under the constitution. In my personal opinion the whole bill violates that principle. But I realize perfectly well that if you bury this bill, as some hon. members suggest, we may well delay medical care for years. That is true of course.

I beg the government to look at the real thing we are trying to do, which is to provide medical care for those who need it most, and if possible to do that within the framework of our constitution. Otherwise, the government essentially is saying that the provinces are not capable of handling those household affairs which the Fathers of Confederation in their wisdom allowed them to settle for themselves.

This is where we part company with our friends on the left, because they are cynical enough to say that nobody has the right to run his own affairs. They say that that can only be done by an omniscient, all powerful government. If one carried socialism to its extreme, this entails a one party government, which means that the people have no voice.

We have four parts to our amendment, the first part of which says that no legislation will be satisfactory unless it—

—(a) secures co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada.

One wonders why we have not had any consensus from the provinces. We do not expect them to abandon their rights, do we? Unless I am wrong in my guess at least two of Canada's great provinces will not knuckle down. They saw long ago the financial stake, which is very poorly disguised in words. Is this a question of getting out? I do not know. I am not going to impute bad faith to the government, saying that they are trying to welch.

I say that if we are going to get the kind of medical care we want to see, and that the people of Alberta want to see—and even though the system in Alberta is not yet perfect, it is not widely hated—the house must accept the amendment of this party. In Alberta they do not use the language I heard the last speaker use. One would think that around here there was a declaration of war. I will not repeat, in my speech, that kind of language. We have heard about betrayal, emasculation, and things like that. This is not necessary. Instead, let us offer reasoned arguments.

I say that this amendment is correct, because underlying all principles of law in Canada is the principle that Canada must be ruled according to its constitution. I shall paraphrase what was said by a former prime minister of Canada, who held office for a long time. I get the quotation from no less an authority than the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). Paraphrasing, the quotation shows that the Right Hon. Mackenzie King did not believe any party or any minority had the right to force the acceptance of its views or its policies upon the community. He felt that persuasion and willing consent were an essential preliminary to political change.

It is my pious hope that the bones of Mackenzie King do not roll in their grave when his ghost sees his successors wielding this financial stick. Is this bill Liberalism? Is this consultation? Is this willing consent? Is this moral persuasion, rather than force? The spiritual leader of the Liberal party said that persuasion was an essential preliminary to political change.

What greater change could there be than forcing the provinces of Canada to knuckle down under a financial stick, and imposing what to me looks like the rankest of socialistic measures. The only real criticism from those on my left is as to the speed with which we ought to impose this bill upon the people. Those hon. members are quite satisfied that it is socialist, but for them it is not socialist enough, nor is it going fast enough. You can hear the old criticism of the Liberals which says that they are socialists, but going too slowly.

I do not believe that. I think it may be that the government, finding itself in financial difficulties and on the crest of inflation, at the eleventh hour is trying to put on the brakes. I think that this wagon has brakes, and it is the duty of every member in this house to put them on to prevent disaster. I am not saying that we must abandon medicare as a proposition, but I say that we should watch inflation carefully.

I do not want hon. members on my left to put words in my mouth, and to say that I am attempting to kill the bill because I do not want to pay the shot, or because I refuse to give social justice. That is far from the truth. I do not want to kill this bill. I want to tailor this bill to make it work. If necessary, I want a reasonable delay to get willing consent from the provinces.

The second part of the amendment states that legislation would be satisfactory only if, among other things, it—

—(b) recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by the individual.

[Mr. Bigg.]

Again, I do not want to accept the process where I am fed through the mouth, or force fed, as a goose is, with all foods. I may not want some of the foods. If I have enough initiative to be able to pay for my own, should I not have the right to choose what I want?

• (4:50 p.m.)

This is not to say I do not believe in looking after people who are incapable of looking after themselves. Paragraph (d) of our amendment makes it clear that we believe no citizen of Canada should go without medical care. That is what I believe. I, for one, am willing to pay for that medical care. I always hope I shall be in a position to look after my own medical needs and that I shall always be in a position to help those less fortunate than myself. That is conservatism at its best, whether with a capital "c" or a small "c". The fact that I am willing to look after my father and my mother is not an invention of the socialist party. It is as old as Moses, and even older than that; we find it wherever decent animals congregate, let alone human beings.

I give hon. members credit for not criticizing that part of our amendment which speaks of the importance of making prior provision for sufficient medical research, and the training of adequate numbers of doctors and other medical personnel. There is nothing gained by building a race track if you do not have any horses.

With the best wishes in the world, you cannot have your children's tonsils cut out unless you have a doctor who is skilled, and who is ready and able to fiddle around your children's throats with a sharp knife. Let us make sure that in the plan to bring about this Utopia we all desire we do not forget the preparations which are necessary, and if we have to do a little more planning, or spend a little more money to get the desired results, we should be ready to do so.

Do not think I am against taking out the tonsils of your children or my children or anyone else's children. That does not wash. I hope the people of Canada are getting sick of this, and the sycophant treatment of every question that comes up. If I do not agree with you I am something vicious, something terrible, something obscure. Do you think I want any of your children to go without medical care? I want them all to have it. All I ask is that we should put our minds to it and find out the best, the most efficient and the most economic way of doing it.

There is another element which I think is very sacred indeed: Where I have the ability and the money to make a choice, I should be allowed some leeway in this matter. In some of the progressive provinces of Canada great steps have already been taken without the necessity of leadership from a socialist government or premier. Great steps have been taken in this direction. It is nonsense to say that because we do not subscribe to any one pattern we are antisocial or members of a ruling class.

It is not 1840 any longer. The ruling class today is probably the labour class, and I venture to say the labour people themselves do not want to be regimented to the extent certain hon. gentlemen pretend they do. I have been a labouring man most of my life, working with my hands. Perhaps I speak for a minority of one, but I do not want to be regimented. I want the opportunity to earn a good living in a rich, young, progressive land. That is all I want, and our main thought would be to see that every individual in Canada has a right to stand on his own feet. Only in a society where a lot of men are standing on their own feet shall we have provinces able to stand on their own feet, provinces which do not need to go to the federal government on their knees—and there are some provinces in exactly that position.

In my own province of Alberta there are many opportunities, for we are desperately short of labour. If there are any young men in Canada who feel they are not getting a proper deal, let them come out to Alberta and we will give them a shovel, or let them climb around an oil rig and earn wages of a kind which would make their fathers sick with envy. Then they will be able to stand up on their own feet and say what they think of anything, and not have to buckle under to the opinions of others, whether they are Conservatives, Liberals, Socialists, or anything else. There are still a few people in this nation who think that way.

We are not antisocial. We are men. You have to start there. If you do not have the desire to be independent, then for my money you are not a man, no matter with what political party you ally yourself. If you are young and healthy it is your duty to get out and help raise the gross national product so that we can afford social justice, no matter how high the price may be, in order to give every individual in this country a reasonable standard of living, a reasonable standard of education and a reasonable standard of medical care.

That is where I stand. That is where every member of my party stands, those who are known to me—and I have spoken to most of them and I have also listened. That is where we stand. That is why this amendment is not only reasonable but essential, particularly to those who call themselves Liberals, if they have not abandoned the stand taken by their great leader who said we must have unanimity of consent and a consensus of opinion.

Is there any hon. member in this chamber who does not believe, in the depths of his own conscience, that his father or his mother trying to get along on $75 a month should not be forced to pay for his or her own medical care. We say: Oh, let us not give the rich anything. If a man has $1,000 in the bank, cut him down to the bare bones and make sure he lives on crackers and tea. Or if he hides his money and puts it in a barrel in the basement and claims he is broke, he can get assistance. But if a man is honest and has a little shack or $1,000 in a saving bond, he is to be denied free medical care.

I think I know why the Liberal party has postponed the coming into force of this measure. I think there are men in that party who believe we have gone too far in our current spending for social justice and that we cannot afford more immediately. I was happy to hear the minister say that in the near future we shall have legislation before the house to look after those who are in need. This problem is to be fixed up. If this is the case, it will certainly plug one of the holes in the plan. But I think this is needed at this time. These people require medical care now. I do not want to be accused of filibustering or of trying to kill the bill when I am merely emphasizing the needs of those people who today cannot afford the cost of the pills and the medical care needed to keep them going.

I abhor the idea of a means test, in the first place. I do not know why an affluent society like ours—and it is affluent; look at the cars on the highway; look at the houses they are building, those who can afford them—should need such a test.

We are an affluent society and it seems to me that if it is necessary to tighten our belts a little bit to provide this kind of social justice, then we had better do it now, and never mind waiting until next year or three years from now. If I could sit down right now and pass this thing I would do so.

Mr. Orlikow: Sit down, sit down.

Mr. Bigg: I should think my hon. friends to my left would like to hear at least this part of my address. It is urgent; it is necessary, and paragraph (d) of our amendment is an effort to say, regardless of party, regardless of class, regardless of personal income or lack of it, that we need action and need it now. This is one of the things we cannot delay any longer. Our people, even in the great province of Alberta, are not all getting it, and I think they should get it as a matter of right.

I do not think this is socialistic. This is a debt we owe. It is a debt to the people who pioneered this country, who have earned a right to have their broken, tired old bodies looked after for the remaining few years of their lives. How can I do otherwise than support this amendment in all four of its phases?

Before I sit down I want to reiterate that I believe in medical care. But that does not necessarily mean medicare, which is beginning to have a bad smell, so far as I am concerned, because it means some kind of state-imposed strait-jacket on the individual, on the doctor, on the province, and perhaps on the whole economy. I am willing to accept the principle of looking after our old people. I am even willing to accept what looks like socialism, or anything else you want to call it, so long as we can give our people social justice, something which we can well afford and which we have no excuse for delaying one more day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

RAILWAY ACT

REVIEW OF TRANSPORTATION COMPANY REPORTS BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-18, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, earlier this week a private member's bill was introduced which was very timely. I refer to Bill No. C-234, to amend the Criminal Code by providing for the elimination of premium stamps in food establishments, and which was introduced by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein). If there were any inclination to proceed with that bill I would be quite happy to yield my place because of the importance of the subject. However, as the hon. member is not here I would like to give him notice that we in this party will be willing to yield our place any other Friday that private members bills come up for discussion, because his is one of great concern at the present time, due to high prices.

Bill No. C-18 is the same as Bill No. C-55 which I introduced in 1964 and which was debated on September 18, 1964. To explain the purposes of the bill I shall simply quote a few sentences from what I said on that previous occasion, as recorded at page 8221 of Hansard for 1964:

> This is an act to amend the Railway Act by requiring transportation companies operating under the Railway Act to file a copy of their reports with the House of Commons. My idea is that such reports should be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where they could be examined.

I went on to say that officials of the companies in question could be summoned before the committee where they could be examined by its members, as is done in the case of the Canadian National Railways. The purpose is still the same, Mr. Speaker, to have the companies in question, companies operating under the Railway Act, file returns with the House of Commons. These companies already file returns with the Board of Transport Commissioners and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. My idea would be to have similar returns filed here and referred for examination to what we now call the transportation committee.

Government members who participated in the debate in 1964 spent a great deal of their time defending private enterprise and denouncing socialism. According to some of their remarks it appeared as though I were introducing a bill to nationalize the Canadian Pacific Railway. That may be a good idea in itself, but it is not the purpose of the bill and I feel their remarks were largely irrelevant. The purpose is simply to get officials of the railway companies—and I admit I have the C.P.R. particularly in mind—before a committee for questioning.

As we all know, the Canadian National Company officials appear each year, including the president, the vice presidents and all members of senior management. They are available to be questioned by members of the house. The C.N. is an organization that affects just about every community in Canada, and it is a good democratic practice that the elected representatives of the people are given this chance to have a face-to-face meeting once a year with the officials of this very important corporation.

If one examines the minutes of the transportation committee proceedings he can see the type of questions which are put to the management of the C.N. We have questions about passenger services, about freight services, about the C.N. pension plan and other related employee matters, questions about Canadian National Steamship services which are so important to some of the Atlantic provinces, about telecommunications, about the operations of hotels and about trucking operations, but it seems strange that the second largest transportation company in the country does not have to appear before the elected representatives of all of Canada to subject itself to the same kind of questioning that the largest transportation company must do.

I would say the C.P.R. has just as great an effect upon the lives of the people of Canada as the C.N., perhaps even greater because the operations of that company are spread far and wide throughout the country. It not only operates its railway services and air line services but is now venturing into many other fields. It has a subsidiary company called Canadian Pacific Investments which has been busy buying shares in a great many other companies.

It has an interest in the following companies, and I cite these to show the diversity of its interests in Canada: Canadian Delhi Oils, Canadian Del Rio, Great Lakes Paper, Huron and Erie, Husky Oil, Investors Group, Montreal Trust, Provincial Bank, Rio Algom, Texas Gulf Sulphur, and of course Consolidated Mining and Smelting. It can thus be seen that the company has a very great effect upon the lives of the people in practically every community in the country.

It has been argued that the reason the C.N. appears before the transportation committee is because the C.N. is a crown corporation, and we are told that the C.P.R. is not, that it is private enterprise. However, we know that the Canadian Pacific is no ordinary private enterprise. I do not know of any other private enterprise in Canada which has received, as of December 31, 1963, $106 million in cash from the federal government, from provincial governments and from municipalities, and 44 million acres of land, including the mineral rights. Ordinary private enterprises do not receive that type of public help, but this one continues to receive federal money each year for a number of reasons. And so I feel there should be accountability by it right here before the House of Commons, or before a committee of the house.

There are a number of things that could be said to illustrate that the Canadian Pacific is no ordinary enterprise. I am not going to use my own words on this occasion, but will refer to a speech made in this house on February 22, 1965 by the then member for Halifax, Mr. Gerald Regan, who is now the leader of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia. I quote from page 11614 of Hansard of that date, where he said:

> I would preface my remarks by saying that a national railway, even if it had not received vast governmental assistance in the years gone by—as it has—cannot, in a country whose population is strung out along a narrow belt 4,000 miles long, ever be considered as just an ordinary private company engaged in competitive free enterprise. A national railway in this country must be part of the very holding together of our nation and its operations must, to some extent at least, be directed in consequence of this fact.
> We have a situation where the top officials and the president of the railway have been going around the country saying quite openly and blatantly that which for years they said secretly, namely that they were plotting to get rid of their passenger services and carry only freight.

At that point the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) interjected these words:

> Regardless of the profits of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Mr. Regan then continued as follows:

> My constituency of Halifax is only slightly involved. We are concerned with the continued service of a dayliner on the Dominion Atlantic Railway, which is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railways, from the Annapolis Valley into Halifax. However my main concern is a national concern. My attention has been directed to the subject because of the fact that the C.P.R. has served notice on the postal department that on June 23 they are going to abandon their mail contracts on trains 7 and 8 from Montreal to Vancouver and on trains 3 and 4 from Toronto to Sudbury, which is just one more step in drying up the revenue so that they can later on justify the abandonment of the service. This is the sort of program which this railway has been following.
> I said earlier that this railway had received substantial governmental assistance over the years, and of course they have. In addition they received a strip of land across the country, some of which has been sold off. They found minerals on some other parts, received subsidies and have built up the vast prosperity of the empire known as the Canadian Pacific Railways on the strength of these governmental gifts. And now, like the son who receives an inheritance from his father on the basis that he is to maintain his mother, and then throws her out into the cold winter night—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Regan:—the C.P.R. would keep only that part of its service for which it is responsible to the Canadian public that it feels like keeping. It wants to cast off its passenger service and other services which are of such great importance to keeping this country of ours tied together.

I merely quote that to illustrate the point that we are not dealing with an ordinary private enterprise when we ask this particular company to come and give an accounting to parliament each year.

Earlier this year the Canadian Pacific Railways did appear on an order of the house before a committee of the house when the subject of the proposed cancellation of the Dominion passenger service was under discussion. I suggest that if the house can make an order for their appearance in respect of that subject it should do so in respect of a great many other subjects. There are other matters which members of this house would like to question C.P.R. management about, including the same sort of thing we question C.N.R. management about—rail abandonment, branch lines operations in general, and passenger services. There are one or two other things we would like to question them about in particular.

During the past year a great many members of this house have received complaints from constituents who are employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company concerning the pension plan of that company and how the investment of the pension funds has been made, as well as how changes were made in the pension plan consequent upon the Canada Pension Plan, without consultation with the employees. We feel we should have a chance to ask management questions about these subjects and cross-examine them.

I have mentioned Canadian Pacific Railway Company investment in a subsidiary company which has been established to handle the non-railway operations of the C.P.R. This has an important bearing on the total financial picture of that company, and I think members of parliament should have the opportunity to question the company about this very considerable subsidiary which it has established and which now has an interest in many enterprises in Canada.

This bill is a very simple one and again I want to emphasize for the benefit of government members who may speak—because I would not want them to make the same mistake they made last time—that this is not a bill to nationalize. That is a separate subject. This is simply a bill requiring railway companies, and particularly the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has such an important effect on the lives of all the people in many communities in Canada, to appear before the committee of the House of Commons and answer questions.

This might be a good thing for the management of the C.P.R. They are not very well liked at the present time. As a result of the appearance of Mr. Donald Gordon year after year before this committee, a certain grudging admiration has been built up for him on the part of members of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Including the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire).

Mr. Prittie: Yes, including the hon. member for Lapointe. As I said earlier, it might be good democratic practice on the part of management of that company to appear and subject themselves to questioning by representatives of the people, whose lives are affected by the operations of this company from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) rose to his feet to address us on Bill C-18 I became curious as to its exact purpose. The bill appears to be innocent enough, designed to enable the house to look at some statistical returns. Having heard it said so often by the Chair, and rightly so, that one must not impute motives to a member, I waited, without imputing anything, to learn what imputations were contained in this bill. I found that the bill was designed to enable the hon. member to make a speech about the C.P.R., and it was a very interesting speech indeed. I want, however, to stick a little closer in my remarks to the bill itself than did the sponsor.

There are some things contained in this bill which are of considerable interest. I want to touch upon some of the remarks made by my hon. friend. In the explanatory note the hon. member has stated the following:

The purpose of this bill is to permit parliament to inquire into, as is done with the publicly-owned Canadian National Railways, the financial structure and the operations of those private railway, telegraph, telephone and express companies and carriers by water which come under the Board of Transport Commissioners as public utilities and quasi-monopolies.

The explanatory note then quotes from section 384 of the Railway Act. The first subsection of that section reads as follows:

> Every railway, telegraph, telephone and express company and every carrier by water shall annually prepare returns, in accordance with the forms and classifications for the time being required by the board, of its assets, liabilities, capitalization, revenues, working expenditures and traffic.

About a year ago, perhaps in the spring when we thought this bill was to come before us, I had a conversation with statisticians of the Board of Transport Commissioners and of the Bureau of Statistics regarding the nature of these returns and the preparation of them, and I asked what would happen if such returns were brought forward in the house. It might be of some interest to hon. members if I took a moment or two to reveal some of the conversations I had.

The basis of the statistical information on the operations of railways, telegraph and telephone companies, and so on, used by the Board of Transport Commissioners in their work, which forms, the basic statistics used by the Bureau of Statistics for its purposes and for the purposes of anyone who wants to make use of them, comes through these statistical returns. That is why it was written into the act that the statistical returns must be made.

The procedure for filing these returns is approximately as follows. The forms are sent to the railways and other companies which are asked to make returns. Over the years they have built up into quite complex forms, some of them running into dozens of questions, and in the case of the railways into well over 100. The railways fill out the forms as required as soon as the year-end statistics have been compiled, and forward them to the Board of Transport Commissioners, who then proceed with the business of editing. You can realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is a complex matter, with returns of this kind. I might say that nine returns come from telegraph companies, about five from express companies, eighteen railways are involved and some six waterway companies on the Mackenzie river. All these companies send in the returns requested by the Board of Transport Commissioners. Not all the information sent in is exactly in the form which the Board of Transport Commissioners requires. Notes have to be sent back and forth, and so several months pass before the statistics can be obtained in a uniform style for analysis by the Board of Transport Commissioners. At the same time these companies send to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics a complete set of the original returns and of the edited returns so that the bureau has the same information as is available to the Board of Transport Commissioners.

Some of the information which these companies are asked to submit is of a type that they certainly would not want to publish immediately with the year-end statement, because they are in competition with other carriers and enterprises. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it certainly would not be fair to approach these companies and say, "We have singled you out from among the corporate enterprises of Canada to force you to make returns under an act of parliament, although we do not ask other companies to make such returns, and these statistics will be revealed to the public and your competitors."

We would not do that. No parliament of Canada would do such a thing. Therefore these reports initially are given in confidence and are used by the Board of Transport Commissioners for compiling total statistics to indicate the progress of transportation, telegraph, communication and so on throughout the country. This is a very legitimate procedure and one that is valuable to us in maintaining all kinds of statistics and records in regard to the economic growth of the nation. So these are valuable returns for this particular purpose.

I think it would be very wrong of us to introduce into the Railway Act a section which suddenly altered the entire purport of the section of the act that is designed only for statistics gathering, and make it the means whereby we would bring a railway company or any company, as far as that goes, before a committee of the house for annual examination, when the company is not now brought before a committee of the house for examination under any other act.

It is proposed under this bill to bring the C.P.R. before the house for examination. It may be wise to do this in the long run, because it is indeed an important company, as my hon. friend suggests. But other ways ought to be found to do this and the matter should be debated in some other form than that in which we are today debating this bill.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to be a party to passing a measure of this kind which alters this section of the act in order to achieve an entirely different purpose than was originally intended.

My friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond and I have just returned from a most interesting visit to Iran and the city of Teheran, the capital of that country, where we were attending the annual meeting of the Interparliamentary Union. There we took part, with the Canadian delegation, in the deliberations with delegates from 63 other countries over the period of a week or so. One of the things that was most noticeable to Canadians visiting that country and city was that they do not have available the statistical tools that are available to Canadians, with which we are very familiar in our daily working in this house and with which Canadians in commerce everywhere are so familiar.

In that country you cannot get a mortality rate, you cannot get a birth rate, you cannot get any statistics in regard to the G.N.P. There really is no logical body of statistics in that land. This is characteristic of developing countries, namely that they do not have statistics to use as tools for economic analysis or for day to day use in a modern country such as Canada.

One of the ways in which we have acquired these tools is by keeping faith with the companies from whom we collect statistics. These companies have learned that when they give a body of statistics to a government agency such as the Board of Transport Commissioners for analysis, which statistics if they were given to the public at large would be used by their competitors, we will keep faith with them and the statistics will be used in a proper fashion and not against them by their competitors in industry. The companies have no reservations about filing these returns with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other government agencies which collect statistics in Canada because they know we will keep faith with them in this regard.

In the gathering of statistical information we have obtained an enormously valuable tool for research into the economic growth of the country whenever we require to have such information available. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say it would be an improper thing for us to take this section of the Railway Act and expand it into achieving some other purpose than the very simple purpose for which it was intended, namely the collecting of statistics for the benefit of the country at large.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate; it is a little refreshing to do so after the long discussion we have had on medicare.

[Mr. Deachman.]

First of all I want to say without any reservation whatsoever that I back the bill presented by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie). I think it is a good bill.

I support the hon. member's bill on one main basis. I say this in answer to the argument presented by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I say that the railways are in an entirely different situation than other companies. There are only two major railway companies in Canada, although there are several small companies. It has been said that this nation is being held together by its transportation system. When we consider the way this nation has been going lately, especially under this government, and see that we are beginning to divide into regions, one region against another, and the country is falling apart, I am sure that many of us are very thankful that at least we have a transportation system that holds us together.

The railways in Canada, particularly the C.P.R. have a virtual monopoly on railroading in certain sections of the country. I support this bill because other railway companies would have to appear before a standing committee of the House of Commons, the same as the C.N.R. does, to answer questions on their operations. I believe this should happen, because in the province of Alberta, from which I come, the railway has a virtual monopoly in the southern part of the province. Calgary is a C.P.R. city. When you travel south of Calgary you find that all the lines that serve the agricultural enterprises are owned by the railroads. There must be a reason for this. It is true that we have had our largest grain sales ever under both Liberal and Conservative governments. In this regard they are both to be congratulated. But these sales would have been even bigger in 1964, 1965 and 1966 if we had had a better transportation system.

The minister tells us that the government are doing everything possible to move the maximum amount of grain from the country elevators to the ports from where it can be exported.

Now we know that the government dilly-dallied with reference to strikes which caused us to be unable to deliver the grain according to the contracts of sale. However, one of the major problems also is that the ports in Vancouver, through which much of our grain goes to the Far East, are not sufficiently automated, as I remarked the other day in the House of Commons during orders of the day. They are not as highly automated as are the U. S. ports, and I say that automation will not take place there unless we get the C.P.R. to do something about it. I think the hon. members for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) and for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) made a special trip to Vancouver and saw the slow rate at which grain is unloaded from the C. P. R. cars to the boats. The fact is that the C. P. R. should be brought before a standing committee of this house and interrogated. They control many of the docks, as well as the property there, and therefore they control the whole enterprise. They should be asked why they cannot move grain from the farms. I estimated, and my estimation was somewhat conservative, that this year we would produce in western Canada 800 million bushels of grain. We see now that western Canada has produced between 840 million or 870 million bushels.

The government says it has solved this problem not only for this year but in the projected future, which is all to the good. Nevertheless we will have lost those markets, as we did some of last year's sales to Russia, because we could not move the grain from the farms, and from the country elevators to the ports.

Very few people in Canada seem to realize that this is a $2 billion industry. Very few people in Canada seem to realize that the wheat producers of this country— and I want to emphasize this—are the only producers in the world who are not subsidized. We are the only exporting nation of the world that does not subsidize the farmer. Many people in Canada believe that the cheques from the Canadian Wheat Board come from the Canadian treasury. The Canadian Wheat Board is a separate board and it gets its money from the sale of the wheat which the farmers sell through the board. From the initial payment to the final one, it is the farmers' money, for their wheat, and there is no subsidization.

The situation was that wheat was left in the country elevators. I blame the C.P.R. for this, and I believe the C.N.R. is also responsible. When this crop was being harvested there were farmers in Alberta who were not able to deliver one bushel of wheat to the elevators to pay their expenses. When I mentioned this to a member of parliament from another section of the country, he was at a loss to believe that the farmer could not sell his wheat. He said: "But your wheat crop is sold". It is sold on paper, but what can the farmer do? He has to build bins and go to extra expense to store the grain himself because the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. have not done their duty to transport this grain from the country elevators to the ports and on to the ships of those nations who bought it. That is why I go along with the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) when he says that C.P.R. officials should be brought before a standing commiteee. The wheat industry is the biggest industry in Canada, and the railroads of this country are letting the western farmers down.

I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on a bill such as this one, because this is the most important matter facing the government today, except for the question of the cost of living. Yet all we have been doing in the last two days, and all we will be doing for the remainder of this hour, is to talk about a bill which the government does not intend to implement for two years anyhow: What a window dressing.

I say that the C.P.R. should be brought before a standing committee, and I want to come to grips with this. My home city is a city of 350,000 people. Our original railway station was knocked down because the railway company was unable to come to grips with their financial commitments and their city land arrangements. We have in Calgary a C.P.R. station now which serves the Canadian on the main line. Yet in a city of 350,000 people, that station is not big enough to serve a hamlet of 3,000 people. It is usually overcrowded and in the summer it is a filthy place, full of flies—not a very attractive place for tourists. Believe me, that railway company should be brought to task before a standing committee of the House of Commons. The railway station in Calgary is a disgrace to the city, even if it were a temporary structure—which I do not believe it is. They say it will be there for two years.

I endorse the Liberal member's remarks when he says that the C.P.R. wishes to get out of the passenger service. I believe him. Let some hon. member try to make reservations on the "Canadian" in my home city. The line is usually busy in the summer, and I sometimes wonder whether they just take the phones off the hooks. You cannot make the reservations, and when you do get down to the station it is terribly overcrowded. Most of the time the "Canadian" is full to capacity. Matters having to do with the station are in a terrible shape in Calgary. It is time this company were brought before a standing committee to answer questions.

I sincerely believe the C.P.R. is trying to get out of the passenger service. When they wanted to cancel the "Dominion", they were brought before a standing committee. Did anything happen then? Of course it did not. Some employees of the C.P.R.—and I cannot reveal their names—told me that the service on those trains was so bad because the company wished to discourage passengers. Neither the union nor the employees were consulted; they did not know what would happen to them when this service would be discontinued. The company ran roughshod over the employees and the brotherhood of railwaymen in the city of Calgary, and they have done the same thing in the rest of the nation. It is time they were brought before a standing committee.

I now wish to deal with a third point regarding the national park policy, which is one of the worst policies that has ever been implemented by any government. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) has behaved in the most autocratic manner. Why has he discouraged the construction of buildings to serve tourists? There are 1,700,000 tourists coming to the Banff national park. The only people who have a monopoly in that park today, and who can build anything, are the ones who seem to have an "in" with the department of northern affairs and the C.P.R. They can build hotels, motels and restaurants. Canada Power can go in and develop a great skiing enterprise. But let the average man who has served the tourists in the parks for 30 years try it, and he is not permitted to do so.

The people who owned freehold land in the parks had their land expropriated. Has the same happened to the C.P.R.? Why is there one law for the C.P.R. and another law for the citizens of Canada and the national parks of Canada? What connection has the C.P.R. with this government or with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? I would like the C.P.R. officials brought before a standing committee and asked those questions. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) said we would be sneaking into their financial reports if we did so. It is true that you cannot find here the financial reports of the C.P.R., but you can go down to the New York Stock Exchange and get one. The Americans can get them, but not the Canadians. You can get a C.P.R. report from the New York Stock Exchange if you are a shareholder. Maybe the C.P.R. managers do not know themselves what is going on, but they would soon find the information if they were interrogated by a standing committee of this house. They should be interrogated first on their passenger service, second on their freight service, and third on the automation of facilities for unloading grain in the ports.

This last mentioned is a point with which I should like to deal for a moment. Recently I read an article stating that the Americans can unload more grain in 15 minutes than the Canadians can in 24 hours. That is why we have tie-ups and the grain is still on the farms. I therefore say that the C.P.R. should be questioned on their passenger service, on freight, on the monopoly in the national parks and on the "in" they have with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this government. The C.P.R. has now a new system. They are transferring their assets to the Marathon Realty Company, —I think that is the name of the company. Why is that being done? The petroleum wealth of western Canada was given to them because we knew, when they built the trans-Canada railway, that for a time it would not pay. So, this company was given so many sections of land in western Canada along with the oil rights. These oil rights were developed, like the rest of the enterprise in western Canada. Today they are being removed from the railway company to another company. These assets are being stripped from the railway company and placed in the hands of a holding company. When the trans-Canada transcontinental line is run ragged both in freight and passenger services, when the railway company can no longer say it is making $16,634,324 as it did in 1966, according to its financial report, the company will then say to the government: Take it over; we have our wealth stacked away. This is the wealth the Canadian government and the Canadian people gave them for the right to build this monopoly, and it will be in another company.

This is not good enough. This is not carrying out the terms and conditions of the charter for the railway which was given by the government—by a Conservative government —at the time it was built. In my opinion, this company should be brought before a standing committee of the House of Commons. This company runs railway services, steamships, hotels and the petroleum industry, and we should find out now whether or not they have lived up to their contract.

It is pitiful to think that people now pay $12,800 for a medium sized wheat combine, yet they cannot deliver a bushel of wheat to the market because there are no quotas in this area. If people cannot deliver wheat, they cannot even make the down payment on these combines. People sit around and talk about the big crop out west. They say the farmers are all rolling in money. There is no money in the west until the farmers can sell their grain and get the money out of the wheat board. There is no money coming to the farmer until the wheat is sold and delivered. Grain cannot be delivered to country elevators today, and this is a serious problem.

The Liberals can bring as large a delegation from the west as they want, but it will not do them any good. Do you know what a farm union man told me in my office? He was a Liberal and he went to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Pearson) office and asked for action. This man lives at Rockyford, and if there is any question I am sure he would own up to his name. The Prime Minister said: Because you people did not vote for us, why should we worry about you? If that is the attitude of this government, then you have not got a vote left in the west because you have deserted us.

Mr. Walker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member, to whom I have listened with great interest, because he is a member of the legal profession would not want to enter into the record hearsay conversation. I want to make this particular point now because I know the hon. member, and he is fair. He knows enough to realize it is not right to put hearsay evidence into the record which comes from another person.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, my idea of hearsay evidence and that of my good friend is entirely different. This is not hearsay when the farmer, a member of the United Farmers Union of Alberta, told me that. This is absolutely the fact.

An hon. Member: What is his name?

Mr. Woolliams: Do not worry about that; I am telling you the facts. If there is any question about it, I will give you his name and you can write to him. However, I am not going to put his name on Hansard; why should I? Those are the facts. This worries my good friends because it happens to be true and they happen to know that is exactly what goes on.

Coming back to the problem, I want to state that the passenger service, the freight service and the whole general financial structure of the Canadian Pacific, which as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) said we bonused to the tune of $106 million, should be brought before a standing committee and examined.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say that since the Canadian Pacific is a national transportation system and since I am one of those who complained earlier this session about the service, I can see no particular reason for that company refusing to appear before the committee on transport if it were asked to do so. I feel the company has a certain obligation to do this.

Now, having put that on the record, I should like to make a few comments about the other aspects of this bill. While the bill deals with the financial structure and operations of those railway companies, telegraph, telephone and express companies as well as carriers by water which come under the Board of Transport Commissioners as public utilities, it does in some ways indicate a trend that seems to have become a part of our everyday society. This trend is one toward an increasing amount of paperwork and government regulation of private enterprise.

Many small businessmen have told me that the paperwork they are called upon to do by various levels of government has become very arduous indeed. When this country was in its pioneering stage, one of the major reasons it moved ahead in spite of many difficulties was the fact that there was lots of room for people who had the initiative to work and the desire to build a country that offered them many opportunities. While this bill deals with transportation and communication facilities, in so far as additional regulations are concerned it can be said that these are only part of the additional regulations that could be placed on any other type of business in the future. These businesses are already required to submit reports to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Board of Transport Commissioners. If anyone wants any information about these transportation or communications companies, he can check with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure we are all aware of this, that during the days of the robber barons in the United States, that country passed legislation to control the giant enterprises. We in Canada, as well, have passed legislation to control the greed of some of these businesses. I refer for example to the Combines Investigation Act. Today we have legislation and other organizations that tend to offset any privileges or advantages that big business had in our economic structure. I am thinking here of the trade unions. Under our legislation businesses are forced to negotiate with the trade unions. The government provides for arbitration of disputes. When wage levels are arrived at, the wealth of the company is one of the factors that is taken into consideration. I should like to say here, Mr. Speaker, that I, like many other people, am in favour of a square deal for the labouring man as well as for the businessman. Labour should receive a fair return for services rendered, and the businessman who has a lot at stake must receive a fair return for his investment.

If in our future society we are going to continue to place regulations and many additional requirements upon businesses, we are going to discourage smaller business enterprises and this will speed up the process of driving small business enterprises into the hands of bigger businesses. Some room must be left in this country to encourage initiative in private enterprise if we are going to retain a reasonable amount of competition. Otherwise a greater measure of legislation will be necessary to control the giants. Canada is a young country; let Canadians have the opportunity to build it. You cannot take away initiative and discourage ambition and expect this country to grow and to develop.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, these transportation and communications enterprises which are mentioned have to report to the Board of Transport Commissioners. In this way their business operations are reviewed in a fair and independent light, and they must answer for any irregularities. The transportation bill that has been introduced in this house and agreed to in principle provides for the setting up of a national regulatory body. Are we going to question this new body before it even has a chance to start its work or to prove itself?

We have in this house now a committees system that gives members considerable opportunity to air grievances. The order paper allows members to submit questions to appropriate departments. As hon. members in this chamber know, committee work is already quite onerous and if we intend to load committees down with work which is already being done by some other body, the committees system may very well be damaged.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

I have however no complaint about bringing giant corporations such as the C.P.R. before a committee. If any of the enterprises mentioned in Bill No. C-218 do not provide service, they are investigated. If there are complaints concerning safety factors, these complaints are investigated. If there are complaints about inefficiencies, these enterprises have to answer to the Board of Transport Commissioners. Are we in parliament going to set up a regulatory body, and then regulate the regulatory body that is responsible for enforcing the regulations? When there are inefficiencies in the new board, this parliament can complain about them; but at least we should give the new national regulatory body a chance to prove itself. Let us have efficient services, fair play to all parties and have controls where necessary; but let us not destroy initiative and the spirit of challenge of the Canadian people. The point in the bill, Mr. Speaker, concerning a particular giant corporation might be very well taken, but I should not like to see this measure applied to all when we have other means of control.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this has been something of a freewheeling debate, particularly the contribution made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams). It provided him with an opportunity to speak on his pet subjects, the Canadian Pacific Railway and national parks. Obviously the hon. member for Bow River either has not spent too much time in the house this session or has not been reading the reports of the committee on transportation and communications. If he had, he certainly would have known that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has quite willingly come before a committee of the house. Indeed, if I recall the statement of the president correctly, he said he would be happy to appear at any time to answer the charges that had been made by members of parliament and others about whether or not they have lived up to their commitment to Canada in respect of their contract to build a trans-continental railway.

The hon. member stated that the railway companies of Canada have fallen far, far behind the railways of the United States in the provision of dock and grain handling facilities. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as is usual for members of parliament or for any politician who wants to become successful in his career through the practice of condemning railways generally, forgot to note that the railways of the United States are paid something like 300 per cent more for handling export grain than are the railways of Canada, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) pointed out that something like $106,000,000 had been paid in subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway over the last several years. He again neglected, of course, to point out that this was a subsidy which was paid in lieu of freight rate increases that were granted by the Board of Transport Commissioners, a body which is set up to do the things which are required to protect the shippers of Canada.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond feels that the Canadian Pacific Railway, and others, should be brought before a committee of this house so that in that forum their labour relations problems can be discussed by members of parliament. Up until a few years ago when the heavy hand of government regulation fell upon them very strongly, the Canadian Pacific Railway was far, far in advance of all other industries in the field of labour relations in Canada, providing its employees with a good annual income, a pension plan and so on.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Byrne: So that he certainly could not improve the circumstances of its employees simply by bringing the corporation before the House of Commons on an annual basis to discuss its relationships with the shippers and its employees. I think that in every respect this is another indication of the socialist trend toward domination of businesses.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Byrne: I have no objection.

Mr. Herridge: Does the hon. gentleman think that the C. P. R. lived up to its obligation in respect of passenger service on the Kettle Valley railway?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for the consideration of private members business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the acting house leader what the business will be for Monday, and the beginning of next week.

Mr. Pepin: The order of business will be, I am informed, first, medicare; second, feed grain; and third, the immigration appeal board.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 17, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NUGENT—OBJECTION TO STATEMENTS BY DEFENCE MINISTER

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege arising out of statements made by the Minister of National Defence as reported in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, October 15 under the by-line of Victor J. Mackie, the words giving rise to such question of privilege being the following:

> "It is apparent that he has had second thoughts and is now engaged in the complete 'back-off' which substantiates my contention that the charge was 'spurious' designed to damage my reputation rather than to get at the facts."

Those are Mr. Hellyer's words. The minister was speaking about me and his statement clearly imputes an improper motive. His words are so strong as to impugn my very honour and integrity.

Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members know, the facts of the case are that I made a very serious charge against the minister, that I made it in this house in the only manner in which it could be made—that is by rising in my place and taking full responsibility for my words—and having done that, the charge is now complete and stands against the minister as it stood when I made it. Having made the charge, I could have merely sat down at that point, but naturally when very serious matters are at stake we try to assist the house in finding a way in which the matter can be dealt with.

The reason for not going further was simply the procedural difficulties which I have been unable to overcome. I would remind the house that on Wednesday, October 12 these difficulties were almost overcome but the minister, who as an honest gentleman should have been looking for a way to have the matter investigated so that his name could be cleared, was the only member in the house to refuse unanimous consent which would have made it possible for this matter to be investigated.

Then on Thursday, October 13 the minister, having barred further consideration of this matter, made some statements against me which caused me to rise on a question of privilege suggesting that he was attacking my motives. Your Honour will remember that when you dealt with this matter on Thursday the minister got up and made a statement which in my opinion did not clear the minister of imputing motives; but Your Honour, on considering the matter, said the following:

> My limited experience in the house indicates that it is not per se, unparliamentary to say of another member that the statement he makes is false, untrue, wrong, incorrect or even spurious, unless there is an improper motive imputed—

Further on you said:

> The minister has taken the opportunity to do what I would have asked him to do in any event, to say that he did not impute motives.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that it is no longer open to the minister to suggest that he was not imputing motives. He made the statement to the press expressly for the purpose of imputing motives.

The manner in which he made that statement makes it quite obvious that he was imputing motives.

I would ask Your Honour to rely on the statement with which you ended your ruling that I did not have a prima facie case of privilege, which appears at the top of page 8599 of Hansard:

> I realize that in some instances words may be used which are so strong as to impugn the very honour and integrity of the individual member against whom the words are directed.

Now, sir, in the circumstances you did not feel that was the case; but I submit to you, sir, that your ruling cannot apply now since the minister has suggested that the charge is not well founded, that I am responsible for not proceeding with it, and am backing down. He has gone even further and said that I am proceeding with the case only to embarrass him.

In view of your remarks on Thursday indicating that the only difference between Your Honour and myself as to a proper case of privilege so the house might consider the very serious matters I raised was based on the minister's statement at that time. I ask Your Honour to rule that I now do have a prima facie case in this matter.

Question of Privilege

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: On September 7 a question was raised on this point, as nearly as I can find the precise—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the Minister of Public Works is allowed to make a statement in reply to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona I should read, for the guidance of the hon. member, a citation from May's seventeenth edition, as recorded on page 135. It refers to a procedural point which should be clarified:

> When complaint is made of something published in a newspaper or book, a copy of the newspaper or book, and when complaint is made of a letter sent to a member, the original of the letter said to have been written, must be delivered in at the table by the member who makes the complaint and passages complained of read aloud by the Clerk for the information of the house before any further proceedings are had in relation to the complaint.

I believe it is the practice of the house for the article complained of to be tabled. I assume the hon. member will have a copy, and he should table it with the Clerk. I suggest that the relevant portions be read into the record so we may continue the discussion thereafter.

The Clerk:

Ottawa Journal, Ottawa, Saturday, October 15, 1966. Says MP "Backing Down".

Nugent having second thoughts Hellyer claims.

By Victor J. Mackie, Special Journal Correspondent.

Defence Minister Hellyer said Friday that it was now apparent that Alberta Conservative MP Terence Nugent has "backed down" from his original charge against the minister of having "tampered" with evidence before the defence committee.

"It is apparent that he has had second thoughts and is now engaged in a complete 'back-off' which substantiates my contention that the charge was 'spurious', designed to damage my reputation rather than to get at the facts", Mr. Hellyer said.

Mr. Speaker: Again for the guidance of the house I will read a second citation from May's seventeenth edition, page 143:

> Where the member complained of is present when the complaint is made, or attends pursuant to the order of the house, it is the rule that he should be heard in explanation or exculpation as soon as the question on the motion founded upon the complaint is proposed from the Chair, and then withdraw, unless the complaint is founded upon a written paper or other document, in which event the member complained of should be heard as soon as the paper on which the complaint is founded has been delivered in at the table and read, and before the question founded upon the complaint is proposed from the Chair.

[Mr. Nugent.]

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I did not hear that injunction.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I did not hear what the Minister of National Defence said.

Mr. Hellyer: That was precisely my difficulty; I was unable to hear your instructions.

Mr. Speaker: They were not instructions. I just mentioned that after the paper or document complained of has been filed with the Clerk of the House, if the member whose declaration is being complained of wishes to make a statement, this is his opportunity to do so. There is, of course, no obligation on the member to make such declaration.

Mr. Hellyer: If that is the rule I should like to make a brief statement. Unfortunately I do not have with me the statement I would have made if the hon. gentleman had proposed a motion accusing me of improper conduct.

Mr. Nugent: It did not do any good the last time.

Mr. Hellyer: In respect to this whole matter I would like to state what I believe to be the constitutional practice in the parliamentary system in respect to departmental officials or military officers appearing as witnesses before parliamentary committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the minister, but I suggest that the only statement he could make at this time would be with particular reference to the document tabled. I do not think he should be allowed to make a general statement. The purpose of this is to enable the Chair to determine whether or not there is a question of privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, if that is the only point at the moment I would have to wait until I have had a chance to examine the newspaper and check it against my recollection of the events.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no further comments perhaps the Chair, with very little to judge upon, should be allowed to reserve its decision. But before even having the opportunity to consider the matter I believe that after the minister has read the article he should have the opportunity later on, possibly tomorrow, to make a statement, following which the Chair will be in a better position to determine whether there is a question on which a motion might be founded.

FISHERIES

TABLING OF REPORT ON FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies in English and French of the report of the royal commission of inquiry into fresh water fish marketing. In July, 1965 the government announced the establishment of a one man commission to consider and report on the export marketing problems of the fresh water fish industry in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Ontario, and the Northwest Territories. George H. McIvor, C.M.G., an outstanding authority on board marketing was named as commissioner.

The inquiry arose from recommendations made by the federal-provincial prairie fisheries committee which had been studying instability of prices and demand in fresh water fisheries products, as well as the means for improving returns to primary producers by more efficient marketing.

The report of the royal commission of inquiry into fresh water fish marketing recommends that a fresh water fish marketing board be established under federal legislation. It further recommends that the board should handle all export and interprovincial sales of fresh water fish in the designated area consisting of northwestern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories.

The report proposes that the board should be the sole buyer of fresh water fish from the fishermen, but that the services of the present exporters, packers and processors be utilized under contract with the board. The report is being studied by the government which will consult with provincial governments and with representatives of the trade before decisions are made regarding its recommendations.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members of the house and the fishing industry, especially that segment of the industry directly concerned, will welcome this report and will study its recommendations with interest. I think it should be noted that the designated area, as the minister has said, consists of northwestern Ontario, the prairie provinces and the Northwest Territories.

I should like to interject at this point that the problem of the lack of bargaining power in the hands of primary producers, especially the producers of highly perishable products, is a general problem. After the government has held consultations with the industry and with the provincial governments concerned and, of course, after they have studied the report, as the minister promised they would, we will await with interest any change in government policy which may result from this report.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we have not had an opportunity to see this report. From the preliminary summary the minister has given this royal commission seems to have done an excellent job of investigating the problems of the inland fishermen, particularly those in northern Ontario, the three prairie provinces and the Northwest Territories. The suggestion that there be a board to market the products of these fishermen commends itself to us. We know something of the difficulties which the fishermen have faced, and the very considerable exploitation of the fishermen. They have received low incomes over a period of years.

We want to study the report, because there are constitutional problems as to how this will fit in with the various provincial administrative bodies which have been set up to deal with this matter. Certainly in our opinion the idea of an over-all board rather than provincial boards would commend itself provided the various provincial authorities were prepared to co-operate and delegate the necessary powers. I hope that as quickly as possible the government will send this report to a committee of the house so that fishermen can be heard, the industry can make representations, and the legislation can be prepared. Alternatively, the government itself might quickly draw up legislation and put it before the house so the house could send the measure to a committee.

I hope this report will not suffer the fate of so many royal commission reports, which contain excellent recommendations only to find they have been pigeon-holed. This is a matter which has been of concern to federal and provincial governments for many years. I am delighted that some action has been taken to ascertain the facts and make recommendations. It is to be hoped that some action will be forthcoming now.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): It is well known that for a number of years the price of fresh water fish caught in western Canada and the Northwest Territories has been subject to wide variations.

The findings of the royal commission indicate that this situation is due in a large measure to the uncertainty of the export market from one year to the next, or even from week to week during the season. The only major recommendation we find in the report is that a government marketing board be set up to purchase all this fresh water fish. However, this in itself would not appear to be a complete solution; it would not necessarily present the variations which are apparent in export prices.

It is well known, however, that in the past the bargaining position of individual fishermen in the industry has been very weak. If the setting up of a purchasing board could strengthen the marketing position of fresh water fishermen we would certainly give some support to such a move. At the same time we should realize that purchasing boards established in Canada are not always effective in finding solutions to problems concerning the export market.

I think the fishermen should be consulted. They should be asked whether they want to market their fish in this way and whether they are willing to submit to the regulations which accompany such a scheme, for instance quotas and market sharing by means of quotas. We should certainly support them in an effort to find ways and means of strengthening their position.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCOMES OF CANADIAN FAMILIES

Question No. 1,619—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What were the average salaries and wages (excluding military pay) for 1964 earned by Canada's labour force?

2. What was the average income for 1964 of Canadian Indian families excluding general assistance and family allowances?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows: 1. The average weekly wages and salaries in 1964 (industrial composite) was $86.68. No information is available regarding the number of weeks employed in 1964.

2. It is not possible to give the average income of Canadian Indian families for 1964, but according to figures obtained from a housing survey in March 1965 estimated annual incomes of Indian families residing in Indian communities, excluding general assistance and family allowances, were in the following ranges: $2,000 or less, 22,640 families; $2,001 to $3,000, 4,929 families; $3,001 or over, 3,769 families.

The figures given in response to parts 1 and 2 of the question come from different sources and should not necessarily be construed to be comparable. Many Canadian Indians obtain non-cash income such as food from domestic fishing, meat from their hunting activities and housing provided under programs financed in whole or part from public funds. This is not reflected in the figures in part 2. In the 1964-65 fiscal year, welfare assistance amounting to more than $5,000,000 and housing assistance in excess of $4,500,000 was provided to Indian families through the Indian affairs branch. The amounts of additional payments for such benefits as family allowances, disability and old age assistance are not compiled or maintained separately for Indian families.

FORT SMITH AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,949—Mr. Orange:

1. For what reasons was construction of the terminal building at the Fort Smith airport not proceeded with this year?

2. Will construction be carried out next year and, if so (a) what will be the cost (b) how long will it take to complete?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Construction of the terminal facilities to be added to the operations building at Fort Smith did not proceed during the 1966-67 fiscal year due to heavy program elsewhere and limited availability of funds.

2. It is the present plan, subject to availability of funds, to call tenders for construction in the spring of 1967: (a) The estimated cost of the project is $275,000 including related works. (b) Construction has been phased in two stages, to keep the airport fully operational at all times. It is expected that it will take approximately two years to complete the project.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—NORTHERN PROJECTS

Question No. 1,956—Mr. Orange:

Are there any projects sponsored by the Company of Young Canadians in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and, if so (a) how many (b) what is the nature of these projects (c) how many volunteers are involved in these projects (d) are there any plans to increase the number of projects in these areas?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: Yes. (a) one; (b) the project, in co-operation with the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada, consists of developing a radio forum of the north; (c) two; (d) discussions about other possible northern projects are now taking place.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION ON INDIAN RESERVES, NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Question No. 1,963—Mr. Reid:

2. If so (a) how many contracts have been let (b) what is the value of each contract (c) what are the names and addresses of the successful and unsuccessful bidders?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, in constituencies of Kenora-Rainy River and Port Arthur; nil in constituency of Fort William.

2. (a) 3, since April 1963. (b) Bearskin (near Pickle Crow) (Port Arthur): 2 classroom school, 3 bedroom residence and power house, $112,489.83. Grassy Narrows (Kenora-Rainy River): 3 classroom school, two 3 bedroom staff units and power house, $109,530.87. W. Sawatzky Ltd., St. Boniface, Man.; A. K. Penner & Sons, Blumenort, Man.; Surety Construction Co. Ltd., St. Boniface, Man.; McLeod Construction Co. Ltd., Fort William, Ont. Grassy Narrows: Successful bidder, A. K. Penner & Sons Ltd., Blumenort, Man. Others: Harry Christianson Construction Co. Ltd., Fort Frances, Ont.; E. R. Norman Ltd., Kenora Ont.; Bergman & Nelson Ltd., Kenora, Ont.; T. Zelmer Construction Co. Ltd., Winnipeg, Man.; Surety Construction Co. Ltd., St. Boniface, Man. Big Trout Lake: Successful bidder, B. COLOUR TELEVISION OVER RELAY TRANSMITTERS

Question No. 1,964—Mr. Reid:

Has the C.B.C. drawn up a schedule to provide for conversion to colour television of the off-network relay transmitters and rebroadcasting stations which serve small communities across Canada?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. that after authority is given for this second stage of colour development, the corporation will proceed on a phased basis with priorities. In the meantime, the corporation has only tentative schedules and some preliminary financial forecasts, all of which are subject to change.

TAB CERTIFICATION FORMS, GENERAL MOTORS

Question No. 1,983—Mr. Orlikow:

Has General Motors agreed to complete the necessary forms for certification by the adjustment assistance board that the workers at General Motors Oshawa plant have been laid off as a result of the Canadian automotive program, so that those who are eligible may receive their transitional assistance benefits?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Yes. General Motors has already supplied an initial list of those affected by the lay-off and is assembling additional information to complete the forms. General Motors has also supplied information on the nature and causes of the lay-off. The application for certification in this case was made by the United Automobile Workers.

1. Does the National Capital Commission propose to prepare and issue a motion picture film on the national capital?

2. If so, when is it anticipated that this film might be available for distribution?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. Two motion picture films.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST OF POSTAL WORKERS FOR RIGHT OF NEGOTIATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a communication from the Ottawa local and affiliates of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, asking that the Prime Minister intercede immediately so that postal workers may be granted the right to negotiate under the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, also asking the Prime Minister to accept the principle that until the report of the Montpetit commission is released, Bill C-170 be not finalized in committee hearings to enable representatives of the postal workers to make their representations regarding this matter which they consider of first importance.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this morning I received the telegram to which my right hon. friend has referred, but I have not yet had the opportunity to discuss it with the Minister of Labour or the minister in charge of the Treasury Board. I propose to do that at once, and I hope a statement can be made on the matter very shortly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say whether he can see any difficulty in the way of accepting this suggestion on the part of the postal workers, who ask that the bill presently before the house should exclude them in view of their peculiar circumstances?

Mr. Pearson: Whether or not I can see any difficulties, Mr. Speaker, will depend on the opportunity I hope to have to look into the telegram and discuss it with my colleagues, and possibly I may make a statement tomorrow.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED YOUTH PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the government's very regrettable decision not to proceed with the youth parliament as part of Canada's centennial celebrations in 1967, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether any further consideration is being given to staging this project, which was recommended by an all party ad hoc committee of the house, particularly in view of the fact that there seems to be very great interest among young people all across Canada in this project.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposal as put forward was not recommended by the centennial committee that looked into it, but the whole question that has been raised by my hon. friend of youth representation in an appropriate way during centennial year is now under consideration, and either I or the Secretary of State hope to make a statement on that matter shortly.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question may I ask the Prime Minister, would the government consider reconvening the all party ad hoc committee which looked into this matter, to give them an opportunity to examine it, in view of the fact that members of parliament are probably much closer to young people in the various constituencies and might be able to make useful suggestions as to how a youth parliament might operate successfully and effectively?

Mr. Pearson: I shall take the matter under consideration, Mr. Speaker, but it may be that as a result of the statement that will be made to the house on this matter no further meeting of this kind will be required.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the report he tabled in the house today. Is it the intention of the federal government to initiate action or to propose to the provinces that a fresh water fish marketing board be set up? If that is anticipated, would it include taking a ballot of the fishermen involved?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is not our intention to make recommendations at this stage. We are sending the report out for study, and when we receive recommendations we will consider them.

URANIUM

REPORTED POSSIBILITY OF SALE TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister any information to give the house regarding a change in the uranium situation as it applies to Canada, which would cause the recent unexplained fluctuation in uranium securities?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. I presume the hon. member is referring to reports that were prevalent in the press and over the radio during the week end of an imminent transaction between Canada and France, and I have no knowledge of any developments which would support any such rumour.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister inform the house as to the present situation in negotiations with the French government with regard to the sale of uranium to France, and would he be in a position to tell us if this sale is about to be made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that this question was asked earlier this afternoon.

[English]

EXPO '67

REPORTED INVITATION TO HIS HOLINESS THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to inform members of the house whether an invitation has been extended to His Holiness to visit Expo '67 next year; and if such an invitation has been extended is he in a position to tell us whether it has been accepted?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Canada would welcome a visit from his Holiness the Pope, just as recently we warmly welcomed the Archbishop of Canterbury, and as the people of Canada would welcome any great religious leader to this country. However, I believe some of the press reports on this subject are inaccurate. It is my understanding from the office of the Apostolic Delegate that in response to press inquiries it has been stated that there is no truth to the rumours that the Pope can come to Canada in 1967.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF H. G. WALKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, and in her absence the acting minister, and his absence her parliamentary secretary, regarding a C.B.C. information services release late Friday afternoon referring to the establishment of a Commonwealth Caribbean-Canada broadcasting centre in the West Indies. It is stated in the release that the nominee for co-ordinator of the undertaking is Mr. H. G. (Bud) Walker, former vice president of C.B.C. network broadcasting. Has this gentleman been released or suspended from his previous position?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this question might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Winkler: It is a very urgent one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It may be, but I fail to see the urgency. I suggest to the hon. member that he might indicate the urgency of the question since it is not readily apparent to the Chair.

Mr. Winkler: The urgency is very evident from the controversy that existed previously and possibly still exists within the C.B.C., and it is of such urgency that I now put the question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall be—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The fact that the hon. member is now putting the question to the Prime Minister does not make it more urgent. I suggest to the hon. member that the question might well be debated later on this evening.

GRAIN

CHURCHILL, MAN.—STORAGE IN TERMINAL ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether the wheat board has made a decision regarding the storage of grain in the Churchill terminal elevator this winter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation from the wheat board they are now having discussions with the railway companies about the availability of cars to move as much as possible of Canada's crop to port in all directions. I further understand that at the present time there is some difference of opinion as to the availability of box cars, and this is now being discussed between the railways and the wheat board.

Mr. Simpson: As a supplementary question can the minister say when the wheat board will be in a position to determine whether or not it is going to store grain at Churchill this winter?

[Mr. Winkler.]

Mr. Sharp: No, I am not certain about that matter, Mr. Speaker. I do know there is some difference between the board and the railway companies. This concerns matters of facts, not of opinion, and until these facts are settled the wheat board will not be in a position to make a decision.

Mr. Simpson: I wish to direct one further supplementary to the Minister of Transport. Can he say whether the wheat board has been made aware of the large rehabilitation program which is planned for Churchill terminal this winter, and which can be more satisfactorily carried out if the elevator is filled this winter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. gentleman. I did not realize that question was for me. Since the question concerned the Canadian Wheat Board, for which I do not answer, I felt it would perhaps be inappropriate for me to say whether they were made aware of it. I was aware of it. I think probably this is one of the considerations which has been brought before the Canadian Wheat Board, but I would not be able to speak for them.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware of the hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain being stored in makeshift bins across the prairies which the producers would like to get into permanent storage?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker; we are very much aware that this is the greatest crop this country ever has produced, and I imagine there will be difficulties regardless of the very great success the Canadian Wheat Board has had in selling and moving the grain.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister say whether the terminal elevators in both Moose Jaw and Saskatoon will be used to their fullest capacity this winter? They have not been so used recently.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the wheat board what are their intentions.

[Later:]

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I should like clarification of the answer he gave. When the minister answered, was it his intention to indicate that Canadian National Railways were not in a position to say definitely whether they could handle the transportation of this wheat to Churchill?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, a discussion has been going on between the wheat board and the railway companies on this important point, and neither side has satisfied the other yet.

Mr. Simpson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have a definite conflict of answers coming from the treasury benches. I refer Your Honour to Hansard of Thursday last, October 13, and an answer given by the Minister of Transport who stated, among other things, that this year there are box cars available—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that it is not a question of privilege when there is a discrepancy between statements made either by two members of the government or two other members of the House of Commons. This is a point of debate which the hon. member may wish to raise in other circumstances, but it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Simpson: Then through you, Mr. Speaker, could I ask the two ministers to get together and give us an answer?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will use its good offices to achieve this.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF ADDITIONAL BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Does he still intend to produce a baby budget this fall? If so, could he inform the house how soon it may appear?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I made the government's intention in this regard clear to the house. I have nothing to add to what I said at that time. The date has not been decided upon.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is not unknown for the government to change its mind. I just wanted to know whether you were still intending to do this.

Mr. Sharp: The government intends to bring before parliament the guaranteed income plan. The reason we will be having a small budget is to meet the needs of this very important program.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HIGHWAY SAFETY

FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Addison (York North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with the meetings taking place in Toronto today and tomorrow of ministers responsible for highway safety across Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether the federal government is represented at this meeting.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the government hopes to enter the motor transport field soon, does the minister not consider it would have been prudent to have at least an observer in attendance at the meeting of the provincial transport ministers today in Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question is argumentative.

[Later:]

Mr. Addison: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Transport. Was the federal government invited to attend the highway safety conference taking place in Toronto at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer, sir, is no, the federal government was not invited either to send a representative or even an observer. If we had been invited to send an observer I think we would have done so.

Mr. Addison: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not think that on such an important affair as this we should have taken the initiative and sent an observer?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is obviously argumentative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ROLE OF CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question which I put to the Prime Minister on Friday and to which I understand the Secretary of State for External Affairs has an answer. In light of the fact that three of our major allies, Great Britain, the United States and the German Federal Republic, apparently are reconsidering the force goals of NATO, does the Canadian government contemplate making known to its allies any desire to alter the future role of Canadian forces in NATO?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that no country or group of countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance can take a decision which is in any way binding on all. The only way decisions of that kind can be taken is by all members of the alliance participating in the decision.

Mr. Brewin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, assuming what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said was an answer, although I do not think it was an answer to my question. Is the Canadian government proposing to suggest to its allies that it might alter its future military role in NATO?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot go beyond the answer I have given.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Could the minister inform the house whether he has given consideration to using the New Democratic Party program with regard to NATO as guide lines for the government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have given consideration to a lot of guide lines proposed by the N.D.P. and have not found too many that were worthy of adoption.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LOUISBOURG, N.S.—LAY-OFF OF WORKERS AT HISTORIC SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It is a repeat of the question I asked on October 7 in respect of lay-offs at the Louisbourg project because of the lack of funds for the winter works program. We had assurance from the government that the only change in the winter works program was in that part of the program affecting the bonus for winter building of homes. At that time the Prime Minister assured me that they would do their best to see that these lay-offs did not happen. There have been lay-offs at the Louisbourg project, and I should like to ask the Prime Minister to take a very serious and fast look at this project to see that those who have been laid off will be reinstated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These are not questions; they are representations made by the hon. member, and I assume they will be taken into consideration by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister look into the problem immediately and have it rectified.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Fridays's Halifax Chronicle-Herald contained a statement by a leader of the British fishing industry, who also has important holdings in Nova Scotia, that unless action is taken soon on the implementation of the 12 mile limit, over-fishing could kill the Canadian fishing industry. Could the minister give any indication when the geographical co-ordinates will be established so that proper base lines for territorial and fishing zones may be drawn in accordance with the provisions of Bill S-17 as passed by parliament in 1964?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before answering the question, I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that we have a distinguished visitor in the gallery today, Mr. Louis Joxe, one of the most important ministers of the French government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am grateful that this question has been asked. We are now discussing this particular matter with a delegation from the government of the United States. I am sure the fact that this question has been asked will impress on this delegation the great concern which the Minister of Fisheries and I have for a satisfactory solution of this problem.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Has he received a letter from the Quebec minister of agriculture, Hon. Mr. Vincent requesting financial assistance for farmers in certain areas of the province of Quebec who are suffering considerable losses again this year due to unfavourable weather conditions?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST OF MEDICAL ASSOCIATION FOR AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a brief from the Canadian Medical Association, and if so will the government consider amending clause 4, subclause (c) of Bill C-227 from 90 per cent to 30 per cent for purposes of interim coverage in accordance with the terms of the brief?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member is anticipating discussion of a bill which now is before the house, and which I am sure will be discussed later on this afternoon.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED INTENTION TO REMOVE ROYAL COAT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and has reference to a number of answers given to the house on Friday last by the Prime Minister to the effect that the royal coat of arms is to be removed from mail trucks, mail bags, and so on. Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether it is the intention of the government to remove the royal insignia from all government buildings, correspondence, publications, and even from the Speaker's chair?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the announced decision to remove the word "Royal" from "Royal Navy", has the Prime Minister looked up the record when a similar view was being expressed during the St. Laurent administration and it was decided that constitutionally under the British North America Act the change could not be made and accordingly no change was made at that time?

Mr. Pearson: Records are always very interesting, Mr. Speaker, and I will be glad to look up this one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish you would.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister tells us that it is not the intention of the government at the present time to take such action, could he tell us when the decision was taken to take such action with regard to the Post Office?

Mr. Pearson: To remove misunderstanding in this matter, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General will be in a position to make a short statement in a day or two which will remove some of the misunderstandings that have been created.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no misunderstanding at all. It is very wrong.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EVIDENCE BEFORE COMMITTEES BY SERVING OFFICERS AND DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman advise us, in view of the large number of committees which are sitting and so that members may estimate the value of evidence given, if he subscribes to the view of the Minister of National Defence that serving officers and departmental officials can only appear before such committees with the consent of the minister, and evidence given by such witnesses must conform to departmental policy irrespective of what the facts may be?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF INTEGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether today's news reports are accurate to the effect that the government is giving consideration to delaying the implementation of the integration of the armed services until there has been a further review of this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that it is not in order to ask whether press communications or views are correct or incorrect.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, there will be no delay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order and cannot be answered.

IMMIGRATION

SEDGWICK REPORTS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the government proposes to refer the white paper on immigration to a special joint committee for study, would the government also consider referring at the same time the two reports on immigration recently made to the government by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., for study?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will take this point under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REQUEST FOR SPEEDIER SUBSIDY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Might I say that it was a pleasure to have the minister visit our county last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKinley: My question is this. Many dairy farmers are wondering whether any progress is being made to speed up subsidy payments to them and what kind of guide they might be given as to when they might anticipate receiving their cheques?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member will be pleased to hear that approximately 290,000 cheques have now gone out, totalling nearly $27 million. These cheques have gone out directly to the farmers. In regard to those areas where there has been a slow reporting by the factories, the stabilization board is sending its officers to the areas to deal directly with the factories to try to get the returns in as soon as possible in order that they may speed up the procedure in the very small percentage of areas where returns have not yet been made.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give us some kind of guide that the farmers could go on as to when they might receive their cheques?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the second question is in order.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is a question that I thought one of my Conservative colleagues from Manitoba might ask, but as a Manitoba member perhaps I could put it to the Prime Minister. In view of Premier Roblin's declaration that the government of Manitoba is ready and anxious to proceed with medicare on July 1, 1967, will the government review its position in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is very similar to one that was asked earlier today. It is argumentative, and refers to a debate on a bill which is before the house at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will take part in the debate and answer the question then?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the best way to proceed with medicare at the moment is to get second reading of the bill and go into committee where the necessary amendments can be made, to ensure that it will be brought into effect as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Talk of hypocrisy.

Mr. Knowles: Wouldn't the best way for it to be brought into effect as quickly as possible be to leave the bill as it is?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed, from Friday, October 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate on medicare. I think it can be said at the outset that every member of parliament, wherever he sits in the house, is in favour of a national health insurance scheme. As a Liberal member pointed out, it is only as to the kind of program we are to get or to have forced upon us that members of the house may differ.

It might be well at this time to review the definition of the words "compulsory" and "universal" when applied to a national health scheme. "Universal" means applicable to all, and "compulsory" means tending to compel, a compulsory obligation. It can therefore be said at the outset that the universal, compulsory medicare plan of this federal government is, under the bill which is now before us, a plan forced on all the ten provinces. Of course we have heard the Prime Minister say that amendments may be introduced between second and third reading. We do not know what amendments the government has in mind, but we may be sure that this plan will be enforced in all the provinces.

At the time of the grandiose medicare conference at Ottawa just before or after the election, when the provincial premiers of health met with the federal authorities, it became known at that time that Alberta did not wish to support a universal compulsory plan. The former lady minister of health said at that time, as reported in the press, that either the province will accept the national plan or if they do not they will be taxed for it anyway. That will really be the result of a universal, compulsory national health plan. Even if a province does not agree to it, the people of that province will still be taxed for it if a sufficient number of provinces accept the plan. Therefore it does seem to me that, in spite of the urging of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the first step that should have been taken was to have a meeting of the provinces whereby agreement could have been reached among them before presenting a universal plan.

This question arises: Will all the provinces succumb to this force, this duress, this compulsion? I suggest, and I think most hon. members will agree, that this sort of enforcement is a violation of the constitutional rights of the provinces because implementation of medicare is, under our constitution, under the jurisdiction of the provinces. The government is saying they will not implement the plan for two years. As I see it, the most important problem facing the government today is the high cost of living. Yet parliament is debating a plan which the government says will not be implemented for another two years, and I even question that because it is uncertain whether the provinces will agree to this plan. It seems to me that it is superfluous for us to debate the medicare plan at the present time. All we can do is to express our viewpoints on the bill which has been brought before the house even though the plan will not be implemented for at least two years.

Will this government allow some of the provinces to opt out of the plan? Will Quebec opt out of it, and will the federal government force other provinces to subscribe to it either directly or indirectly by saying to them: We now have a majority who agree to this plan? The government may say to a smaller province such as Alberta: Take it and like it. That would be a way of forcing a province through compulsion, through duress and through financial measures, to subscribe to the plan.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said the other day that he speaks for all Canadians and he cries and mourns for all Canadians because the medicare plan is being delayed for one year—of course it may be longer because in 1968 there may be a recession and not an inflation and that may be a reason for further delay—what Canadians was he speaking for? I know a number of Canadians in my own area who would not go along with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, and yet he says he speaks and mourns for all Canadians.

What about the union members? There is a large number of union members, not only in my own province but throughout the country, who have their own medical plans. Do they want to substitute a plan that would cost them twice as much? I recall asking the Prime Minister over two years ago what the plan would cost. He said, and it is on record in Hansard, that the cost had not yet been ascertained. The first thing that has to be determined is what the plan will cost the taxpayer and the nation. I want to make myself clear. We are all in favour of some national health scheme but today we are talking about a universal, compulsory scheme. I would think that union members would not be in favour of such a plan.

What about people covered by M.S.I. or other similar plans in other provinces? M.S.I. is the plan used in the province of Alberta, but there are many other plans which cover thousands of office workers in the Canadian commercial world. Can these people afford more taxes? Can they afford more deductions? Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre say he speaks for all these people? Let him go and ask them and he will receive a different answer from the one he suggested in the House of Commons.

What about the farmers? Does the hon. member speak for the farmers of western Canada where the cost of living has outstripped productivity even though this year the wheat crop has been one of the greatest in history? Can the farmer pay more taxes? Can he afford more deductions? Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speak for the farmers of western Canada? Let him go and talk to those farmers. I suggest to him that when he says he speaks for all Canadians and when he blames the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), he may be speaking for a small group of Canadians who need such a national plan, for those in need, for the disabled, the senior citizens and the blind, but we have to look at the other side of the coin. What about the people under M.S.I., the office workers? What about the farmers who have their own plan and what about the union members? What is the percentage of Canadians now covered by their own plans? I question the hon. member's statement when he says he speaks for all Canadians.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Is the hon. member speaking for those Canadians who refuse to take their responsibility in society, such as men who have deserted their wives and families, who are then reduced to living on social welfare because, as we in this house know it is difficult to force a man to accept the responsibility of maintaining his wife and family when he deserts them? I have tried to get some figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to find out how many such people there are in Canada. Apparently there are from 100,000 to 200,000 such families. If the hon. member is speaking for those irresponsible people, then I might go along with him. He may speak for a group of men and women who wish to shift their responsibility to other Canadians but I suggest he is not speaking for all Canadians.

We all believe in the need for a medicare plan. I certainly believe in the need for a plan that will assist senior citizens, women, children, the neglected, the disabled and the blind, but I am not in favour of a universal, compulsory plan like the Canada Pension Plan under which both the poor and the wealthy have to pay the same amount. Can people earning $600 a year or a little more contribute to the Canada Pension Plan? The suggestion is that they can.

Now we come to the question of how much this plan will cost. We have not heard much about that. We are told the plan will cost the taxpayers of this country $600 million to $800 million per year. We all know that when medicare was started in Great Britain a certain sum of money was provided for it but before the plan was implemented the cost had doubled. Should such an expensive outlay be made in Canada at a time of inflationary crisis? Should such a plan be made universal and be enforced on people whose heads are just above water, speaking figuratively? Those people living in the provinces where inflation is not in progress do not in my opinion accept the views of the economic experts of this nation and other nations.

Let us take a look at the real cost. If the 200 recommendations of the Hall report were immediately implemented, then by 1971, less than five years hence, the cost of this plan to the nation would be $4.4 billion, which is half the Canadian budget today and the budget for 1956. I want to repeat that. The total cost of the 200 recommendations suggested by the Hall report would be $4.4 billion by 1971 or half the Canadian budget. Farmers are concerned about this. Office workers are concerned about it. Labour is concerned about it. These people cannot afford any more income taxes or deductions from their pay cheques or their profits.

When the hon. lady was Minister of National Health and Welfare, she discussed this plan and said that it must be realized the implementation of the recommendations of the Hall report would involve—listen to this —substantial expenditures from the provincial and federal treasuries. According to news reports the leader of the New Democratic Party said in a speech in the Pincher Creek by-election that increases in wages do not increase the cost of living and that the introduction of grandiose plans does not do so. Economists do not agree with him.

I believe it is time we put on the record what businessmen are thinking today and what our leading economists say in relation to what governments are doing not only in this nation but in other nations. We know that today Great Britain is in a mess. We have seen Prime Minister Wilson forced to change his plans to implement things in Great Britain because the grandiose plans they have implemented have forced him to bring in severe controls and go back on what he said to labour.

Here is what economists are saying, and it is time this was read to the New Democratic Party, whose members are really the socialist conscience of this nation.

Mr. Brewin: Did you say "the conscience"?

Mr. Woolliams: That is right; you are the socialists of this nation.

Mr. Brewin: I thought you said the conscience.

Mr. Woolliams: From your conscience flows your socialism; I think you would agree with that. I should like to quote from Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly for August 8, 1966:

> Old and new, all such techniques are designed to divert public attention from the real villain of the peace, the inflationary fiscal and credit policies which government continues to pursue. On this score Dr. Arthur F. Burns, a rare scholar who values truth above party preference, plainly deserves the last word. "In all countries and throughout the ages," the economist recently told the House of Representatives, "it has been common practice of governments, when prices rose materially, to point the finger of blame at tradesmen or at industrialists or, in recent times, at trade union leaders as well, and to call them irresponsible and greedy. In a time of war still another epithet is frequently hurled at private groups; they are then described as unpatriotic. Very rarely does any government have the courage to blame its own management of finances or its own failure to keep a tight rein on the money supply.

This applies to all governments, not only the Liberal government today. This is what one of the leading economists had to say. I am sure he would agree that increases in wages, and they are necessary when you have an inflationary trend, increases in profits and grandiose schemes that cost large amounts, are inflationary and will continue to aggravate the inflationary crisis in this country. I say that when you hear someone crying about the people of Canada someone has got to speak up for that class of people in this country which comprises the majority, those who contribute to the productivity of this nation. They are the taxpayers. Productivity can only continue to grow at a rate of 6 per cent or 8 per cent, as it has since 1961-62, if these people have enough money for capital purposes in their businesses.

We must have in parliament—I hope I fit into this category—men representing the people of Canada who will speak for those people who produce the gross national product and who pay the bill for this nation. I am not suggesting they should have the total say. However, I am suggesting to the New Democratic Party it is time they had a say. They pay the bill and they produce the gross national product of this country.

How dishonest can we get when we as members of parliament, either in the house or outside, say that increases in wages or increases in profits or increases in plans do not increase the cost of living?

Mr. Douglas: Who said that?

Mr. Woolliams: I say this to the hon. member, with the greatest respect, that although he may have been misquoted I read in the newspaper that he had said that increases in wages in this country do not contribute to the increase in the cost of living. This was a report of a speech he made in Alberta recently. If he denies that, I will accept his denial.

Mr. Douglas: The statement I made was that the reason for the increased cost of living was not the increase in wages because wages had not kept pace with increased productivity.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I am quite willing to accept the statement that the leader of the New Democratic Party makes in that regard.

I can only say that the newspaperman on that occasion in Pincher Creek misunderstood what he was saying. Nevertheless, increases in wages, increases in profits, increases in plans that lead to higher taxes, aggravate the inflationary trend. When you get increases in wages, up go the costs the consumer has to pay and away go the increases in wages because these people have to pay more for their goods. It become a vicious circle. These high profits, high taxes, high wages and government spending for grandiose socialistic plans all increase the cost of living. I do not think anyone can deny that. This country is crying for the kind of leadership that will categorize the peoples' needs by a priority formula.

What should come now? What should we be doing? We cannot be criticial, Mr. Speaker, unless we have an alternative. I suggest that instead of introducing plans we are not going to implement for two years—this plan is universal as it stands now—we must financially assist the provinces and municipalities to escalate and accelerate educational opportunities. We will need more doctors, nurses and technicians before a universal medical plan can be implemented. Schools, colleges and universities must be built now and masses of people given an equal opportunity for an education so that they will be more productive economically and socially. Above all, we should be assisting the individual in the state to assume more of his own responsibilities instead of becoming a burden on the state, as is the case when there are a number of unemployables. We should lower the percentage of the needy through education.

Let us take a look at things from the point of view of local governments and municipalities. The leader of the New Democratic Party should know something about this because he was the premier of a province. Since 1959 local governments' costs of education in Canada has increased from $548 million to $797 million. However, this has not even scratched the surface of the need and demand for higher education in Canada. In so far as the age group from 10 to 14 years are concerned, educational opportunities are almost equal for 97 per cent of this group. In secondary schools opportunities among the age group from 15 to 19 years are not equal. Retention of students who remain at high school varies from province to province, for example, from a high 68 per cent in British Columbia, with Alberta and Saskatchewan coming a close second, to a low of 50 per cent in the province of Quebec. That means that 50 per cent of the people in the province of Quebec who finish grade eight drop out of school. It also means that 30 per cent of the students in British Columbia drop out and about 34 per cent in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

We are all aware that I.Q. determines retention in school to a certain extent, but lack of educational opportunity is the greatest cause of the drop-out. Let us take a look at the position in universities. In the age group 20 to 24 opportunities are not equal at universities, ranging from a high in British Columbia of 9.5 per cent to a low of 3.9 per cent in Newfoundland. With a Canadian average of 8 per cent this means that only 8 out of 100 people go to university. The minister does not have to take the blame for this, of course; I am pointing out that only 8 people out of 100 who are poured into productivity in Canada have a university education.

On top of that there is a big brain drain to the United States. I suggest that these statistics are important because I believe that education should have higher priority than the implementation of the bill now before the house. The average Canadian child receives approximately 8.2 years of schooling. The latest figures on this point are those of the last census in Canada; they may be higher now but not much. The provinces are spending from a high in Alberta of $417 per student to a low of $140 in Newfoundland.

In 1961, Mr. Speaker, Canada devoted a greater proportion of her total gross national product to health services than any other nation surveyed by the Hall commission—this in spite of what some of my hon. friends say on platforms at times—except Australia, in terms of the percentage of the gross national product spent on health. For example, Canada spent 5.8 per cent of its gross national product on health, England spent 4.7 per cent, Israel 5.1 per cent, Sweden, which has been held out as an example, 4.7 per cent and the United States 5.5 per cent. These figures were checked today.

Canada ranks favourably in terms of population per hospital bed compared with other countries, and our government can take some responsibility for that. In 1959, of 20 western countries Switzerland had the lowest ratio with 80 persons per hospital bed, followed by Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Sweden with population ratios of 90 persons per bed.

The United States, the United Kingdom, Denmark and Norway had 110 persons per bed, and the Netherlands 130 persons per bed.

Canada's ratio of population per physician is 920, ahead of the ratios for countries that have compulsory medicare such as France where the ratio is 950 and the United Kingdom and Sweden. How long will that state of affairs last? Will there be a big brain drain of our doctors and specialists, who are among the finest in the world, to the United States if we bring in a universal, compulsory medicare plan?

The Canadian crude general mortality rate of 8.0 deaths per 1,000 of population is better than the United States where the rate is 9.4 per thousand, or England and Wales with 11.6 or Denmark with 9.3. Canada's record in regard to infant mortality is not as good as that in other countries.

Any increased health benefits to Canadians will come primarily from increasing the numbers of personnel. This demands programs to expand educational and training facilities. I say to the government that when the cabinet is considering these matters they should decide that education should have priority over this type of legislation, because it is as a result of education that we will increase the productivity of the nation and the individual's ability to assume some of the responsibility for the welfare of the country, instead of it becoming a burden on the taxpayer.

In saying that, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat what I said at the beginning. I, and I am sure most of us, believe in some plan to deal with this problem. The Royal Commission stated at page 14, volume 1:

> The first requirement is sufficient trained personnel. This demands crash programs to expand the educational and training facilities.

What crash programs has the government instituted to date? None. There has been nothing since the introduction of the vocational training plan at the time we formed the government.

Rather at variance with that statement, at page 295 of volume 1 of the report the Royal Commission on health services stated:

> . . . that in proceeding with a comprehensive program for health services a country does not have to wait until shortages of health personnel have been fully met.

I suppose those two statements are not completely contradictory and that what that means is that the shortage has been partially met. But we must have a crash program on education first in order to get the trained, skilled personnel to cope with the implementation of this plan and, second, the trained individuals who can take on more responsibility and increase the productivity of the nation.

Also difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker, is this statement of the Royal Commission on health services at page 10, volume 1 of its report:

> However large this group may be—

That is the insured group.

> —it is not large enough.

I suppose by that they are referring to the percentage of persons left out of plans. I suggest that the government take a look at this aspect because those people are in need of some plan. But why put the taxpayer, Mr. Speaker, to a cost of $600 to $800 million a year, or $4.4 billion by 1971, in order to provide a plan for people who already have a good plan? This is the point of my argument in analysing this bill at this time, which will not become law, even if the government keeps its promise, until two years have elapsed. It is indeed doubtful that any additional expenditure in the nature of compulsory health insurance will improve either the health standards of the Canadian people or increase their prosperity and productivity.

On page 135 of the second annual review of the Economic Council of Canada there is this statement:

> We are not at all certain as to what further net stimulus either to national or regionally balanced growth might accrue from increased public investment in health services.

At page 90 there is the following statement:

> It has been estimated that the returns on the human investment in high school and university education in Canada are in the range of 15 per cent to 20 per cent per year.

Again, at page 91 of the Council's report it is stated:

> The over-all rates of return to the economy for total investment in education would be relatively high—perhaps in the range of 10 per cent—15 per cent—suggesting that relatively greater emphasis should be placed in facilitating expanding investment in education—

I suggest to the government that this should receive priority. Why does the government now waste the time of parliament on a plan that it does not intend to implement for two years, and at a time when there is the highest cost of living in my generation? The government will not measure up to its responsibility. Let it go to the electorate—although I do not mean that we should have another election—and find out what the people think of a government which allows a continual escalation in the cost of living and then suggests that it will bring in grandiose plans such as the Canada Pension Plan.

Education, I repeat, should receive priority and should come first. We must educate more doctors, nurses and technicians, but above all everyone must be educated to a higher level than an average of 8.2 years of schooling so that their productivity, at least in 75 per cent of the cases, will be such that they will rise above what we classify as the level of need. At the same time this 75 per cent of the population will be able to carry the burden for the other 25 per cent. Only through increasing productivity can we derive taxes to pay for these types of plans. The Utopia, of course, would be to have only 2 per cent in need, but that is more a dream than a reality.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that he spoke for all Canadians. I am not saying that this constitutes real evidence that a medicare plan was forced on the people of Saskatchewan, but I would remind the leader of the New Democratic Party—in fact, I think he would make this admission—that had he remained leader of his party in Saskatchewan and not brought in compulsory medicare the N.D.P. would still be in office in that province today. I see the hon. member smiling. I have to compliment him because, though I have been a Conservative all my life, I felt that the hon. member provided a better administration on the whole than did the Gardiner machine.

I wish to refer to page 13 of a book by Mr. Robert Tyre, and I put this on record because it has reference to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, formerly premier of Saskatchewan. It is interesting to note what is said about universal, compulsory plans. I quote:

> Citizens who had not forgotten those fine promises of 1944 would find something tragically ironic in a news story that appeared in the Regina Leader Post of January 6, 1962. The story reported that a 76-year-old Regina man had collapsed and died in city police court while facing trial. The man had been charged with failing to pay his hospitalization tax in 1956. And it was the government of Saskatchewan that brought him to trial—a government that won election on a promise to provide the people of Saskatchewan with free health services.

That little story, though it may be on the fringe of what may happen under a compulsory plan, may show us one thing. It may show us what a universal compulsory plan may mean to the lives of all Canadians and to people who accept some individual responsibility. When the unions have their own plans, when the office workers have their own plans and when the farmers have their own plan, what we should be doing is helping those people who have no plan at all.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the manner in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) introduced one of the most historic and far reaching pieces of legislation ever to be presented to parliament. The minister would have been forgiven if he had, with oratorical fire and fervour, dramatically ushered in this bill which has finally arrived after years of turmoil, delay and debate. Instead, in a very succinct, nonpartisan way he has launched this tremendous bill which will affect the future welfare of millions of Canadians and many generations yet unborn. I hope that further debate will be of the same calibre and that hon. members, devoid of partisan politics, will express their views forcibly but with reason and restraint.

Personally I have always supported the concept of a national medical scheme, because I feel it is simply a recognition that all of us have a collective responsibility for the hurts of others. It is as simple as that. I know many people argue that most people are already covered by medical insurance, that this measure is another unwarranted intrusion by government into private lives, that it is another example of creeping socialism which is undermining the individual's desire and ability to fend for himself and look after his own needs. I can fully appreciate the honesty and good faith with which this argument is advanced, but I feel most strongly that in a nation with our vast riches and resources every man, woman, and child as of right, regardless of income, is entitled to the best possible medical attention that science and research can provide.

On humanitarian grounds alone medicare is justified. I firmly believe that each of us is our brother's keeper and our brother's brother. By furnishing good universal medical care and relieving human agony and suffering, the government is carrying out the noblest Christian precept.

From a strictly economic standpoint medicare is certainly most desirable. It is argued that the majority of people do get good medical attention but, as the Hall Commission indicated in its report, there are still millions of Canadians living in genteel poverty who are unable to afford medical bills or medical insurance and consequently are not receiving the medical attention they deserve. Thus, although it would be impossible to guess with any certainty the amount of productive labour lost through sickness as a result of the lack of early preventive medical attention, it is well known that there is a staggering loss to our economy when incipient disease lies undetected or worsens because the individual through fear of medical expenses denies himself the advantage of prompt and thorough medical care. Simply stated, from an economic standpoint alone the health of our nation is the most precious of all our resources bar none, and a comprehensive, universal medicare scheme is the best way to husband and improve this basic ingredient of our national welfare. We must recognize the principle that, while an individual's health is a highly personal affair, in many respects his or her good health is of direct benefit to the entire nation.

I do not intend to delve into the details of the plan, but it must be constantly remembered that under our constitution health is a provincial responsibility and therefore federal initiaitve in this field is limited to encouraging provincial action. The federal proposal of offering the provinces money to support provincial medical care insurance programs which meet certain established standards is a sound one and the wisdom of this principle is amply demonstrated in the tremendous success of the provincial hospital schemes. There is nothing to suggest that a comparable plan for medical insurance will not work equally well. The four conditions to be met by the provinces are that their plans must be comprehensive, universal, government run or supervised, and transferable. All these criteria, as set out in the Hall report, are necessary if we as a nation are to achieve our objective of providing the best medical care to the greatest number at the lowest cost.

It is clearly recognized that any such gigantic scheme, with its long and tortuous history, will be beset with many serious problems. To make this scheme work with maximum efficiency we must accelerate most drastically our plans to provide more facilities for medical research, teaching hospitals, and an ever-increasing number of doctors without which the plan is grandiose in name but stultified in reaching its true achievements. A veritable crash program with these goals must be initiated immediately. To ensure the success of our national plan the provinces which have evinced a reluctance to participate must again be approached and negotiations continued until we have obtained their acceptance.

To make this plan a living and workable reality the most important consideration should be the role of the doctor. The medical profession, rightly concerned about its integrity and independence, must be treated with tact and delicacy, and its professional status and relationship to patients must be most clearly enunciated. It must be categorically stressed that no matter what system of financing is used there will be no interference with or compulsion in regard to the basic relationship between patient and doctor. Individuals will remain free to choose their own doctors; they will be under no compulsion to use any particular services, and an individual doctor will be free to operate outside the plan if in his judgment he can do so successfully.

In regard to the time for implementing the plan much has been said, and I do not want to burden the house with many further observations. As a staunch advocate of medicare I was disappointed when the government in its wisdom decided to delay the plan for one year, and I made representations opposing this decision. However, the government, responsible for the national interest, decided with reluctance after the most searching debate that in view of present economic conditions a postponement was necessary. Most certainly it was a difficult decision, and as a member of the Liberal party I am prepared to support the government position.

At this time I make one plea. As a new member I have been appalled at times by the prevalance of partisan debate which has too often been indulged in for political advancement at the expense of the national interest. Repetitious, irrelevant debate has crept into our proceedings many times to poison clear thought and distort the issues.

Shining through all the smoke of this debate is one salient point. We now have before us a medicare bill which many members have pleaded for, and worked for, for years. It is the privilege and duty of those who oppose it on its merits to speak up clearly and forcibly. It is also the privilege and duty of those who support it, but have objections to its postponement, to use restraint and reason in their attack.

A spokesman for the New Democratic Party said that all members of that group would be taking part in the debate. I suggest that their position could be well stated by a small number of chosen advocates, thus saving a considerable amount of valuable parliamentary time for other priority legislation such as the announced government plan to provide a minimum monthly guaranteed income of $105 for our needy senior citizens. If members of the N.D.P. are sincere in wishing medicare to pass quickly and easily, the present debate would be a splendid opportunity for registering objections to the postponement of its application as concisely as possible while enthusiastically supporting the measure in principle and giving the government its proper credit for introducing one of the most progressive pieces of social reform ever to brighten this house.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr Speaker, I gladly use my first words to give the government the credit which is its due for bringing in legislation which in my view has more importance for my constituents and for the people of Canada generally than any legislation that has come before the house in the few years during which I have been here. If I have a few slightly critical, even conceivably, partisan words to say at the end of my remarks, I hope the hon. member will forgive me for allowing a partisan note to creep into my observations.

It has always seemed to me to be plain common sense that the right to health services to minimize the ills the flesh is heir to, is a universal right. It is the mark of a civilized community to provide these scientific and healing services to all through the provision of what we now call medicare. I recall that our sister dominion of New Zealand pioneered in this field in the '30's. Many European countries have for decades regarded the provision of medicare as one of the basic functions of government. In Britain the Labour party provided for universal medicare services in the '40's in the midst—I call this to the attention of the house—of daunting economic problems caused by the second world war.

I have always been proud to be a member of the party which, when it formed the government in Saskatchewan, was the first government in North America to provide universal and comprehensive medicare service. This was done in the face of highly organized opposition and perhaps, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) suggested, to their immediate political disadvantage. If it was to their political disadvantage at that time, all the more credit to them that they had the gumption to bring it in.

I subscribe to the words in the preamble to the charter of the World Health Organization:

> The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.

I subscribe also to the words of the Hall Royal Commission on Health Services:

> The commission is convinced that quite apart from humanitarian considerations the health of Canadians is a matter of concern to us as a nation, and no enlightened government can ignore that the economic capacity of its citizens to be productive depends upon their health and vigour as much as upon their educational attainment.

I consider this to be relevant when we come to consider the postponement of this plan for so-called economic reasons.

Then there is the statement of Sir Arthur Newsholme which the commission accepted:

> Civilized communities have arrived at two conclusions from which there will be no retreat, though their full realization in experience has nowhere been completely achieved.
> In the first place, the health of every individual is a social concern and responsibility, and secondly as following from this, medical care in its widest sense for every individual is an essential condition of maximum efficiency and happiness in a civilized community.

I accept the recommendations of the Hall commission that these objectives of national policy can only be achieved through a comprehensive universal health services program for the Canadian people financed through prepayment arrangements. Such a plan must be comprehensive and universal and, in accordance with our constitutional situation, it must be provincially administered, though it would be financed, as the present legislation proposes, in substantial part by federal grants. I accept furthermore the sense of urgency which impelled the commission to call for a federal-provincial health services conference within six months of the publication of the report in 1964, and for prompt action thereafter.

Fortunately there is no need for us to be unduly concerned about the details of what appropriate action is needed or whether the Canadian economy is able to bear the burden of bringing into effect the recommendations for the implementation of a health charter for Canadians. This has all been reviewed in detail by the distinguished commissioners, headed by the then Chief Justice Hall. It seems to me we are not now talking about a bold, new experiment but about action required before Canada's 100th birthday to catch up with other countries in meeting a vital social responsibility.

All these general conclusions have been reinforced powerfully in my mind by contact with my own constituents in Greenwood since I have been their representative in parliament. I have made no scientific or detailed survey of need but I have run into case after case—no doubt this has been the experience of others in this chamber—where the absence of such a plan has caused personal tragedy. I have met people whose life savings have melted away because of tremendous unanticipated expenses occasioned by illness.

I know people who, because of the illness of some member of their family, have had to "moonlight" and work 15 or 16 hours a day to make enough money to pay their bills. We all know something of the anxiety which is inevitably caused by illness. This anxiety is tremendously increased by financial worry. To the extent that we implement this bill we shall be lifting a great burden of care from the shoulders of the people of Canada.

I deeply regret that the government has seen fit to postpone the date on which its offer to the provinces to implement the legislation was to become effective, because I believe that this delay will strike at public confidence, if any remains, in the good faith of political parties. I believe that the postponement was totally unnecessary. The excuses for the delay are without substance and every possible pressure ought to be put on the government to reconsider its decision.

The decision seems to me, Mr. Speaker, not to be based on any economic necessity caused by inflation but to be caused by effective lobbies and a lack of conviction on the part of some of those dominant in the present government. The sad part of the postponement is that it may not just be a postponement, because it encourages all those opposed to this basic and beneficial plan to concentrate their fire on further whittling away and watering down the plan during the postponement period.

It encourages every provincial government that seeks to alter the plan to bring in a partial and inadequate plan and to get such a plan established and occupying the field. Therefore the decision postpones the effective date not just for one year but very probably for a good deal longer, and no amount of lip service to the desirability of bringing this plan into effect as soon as possible will be able to eradicate the conviction many people will feel that they have been betrayed by this postponement decision.

I was afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I might take a slightly partisan view on this matter, so in my remarks I have confined myself to quotations from a well known Liberal newspaper, the Toronto Star, which certainly used to be favourable to the Liberal party, and I want to review briefly the recent history of this question of the bringing into effect of medicare.

On March 6, 1965, Mr. Peter Newman, whose means of knowledge of what goes on within the cabinet are unknown to me, wrote a very prophetic article. He wrote that massive pressure was building up within the Liberal party for a general election in June with medicare as the central issue of the campaign. He added that there was a strong lobby inside the cabinet opposed to the idea. I do not know whether he meant opposed to the idea of medicare or to the idea of an election. This plan to hold an early election on the central issue of medicare was, he said, based upon the view that a strong Liberal stand for medicare would cut the policy ground from under the N.D.P. in the campaign and presumably garner a great many Progressive votes.

On May 27, 1965, the Toronto Star reported the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), who was then parliamentary secretary to the previous minister of national health and welfare, as saying:

> The Pearson government is bracing itself to fulfil its election promise of a comprehensive medical insurance plan within the life of the present parliament.

It appears recently to have become unbraced, Mr. Speaker.

On June 15, 1965, the Star revealed that after six months of study 24 Liberal caucus members had issued a unanimous report in a three page document—and I ask the house to note these words—which urged an immediate start on a national medicare program. In June of 1965 the Prime Minister announced to a dominion-provincial conference that the government would in fact contribute to a nation-wide medical insurance plan.

In September of that year Mr. Norman Phillipps, a top-flight reporter, now unhappily deceased, had an article in the Star under a banner headline which read, "Medicare By '67 Appears Almost Certain." Also in September we had the announcement of the election, and on October 13 the then minister of national health and welfare, when she opened her campaign, announced in clear, positive and no doubt ringing tones—I was not there, Mr. Speaker—that the date for coming into effect of the government's medicare plan would be July 1, 1967.

On November 1 the same minister, who presumably spoke for the government on this matter at that time, speaking in French, English and Italian at Montreal, pledged the Liberal party to the introduction of medicare. "This government," she said, "will lay aside the fear all have of crippling expenses for medical care."

Perhaps most significant of all was the statement made by the Prime Minister in Hamilton during the campaign:

> In 1963 I promised a Liberal government, as the economy expanded towards full employment, would take steps to provide Canadians with medicare .... Well, we have our expansion and we have placed our national medicare proposals before the provinces, and we have set a deadline of July 1st, 1967 to start the program, and we'll do it.

Perhaps I cannot reproduce the eloquence of the Prime Minister on the hustings, but if words mean anything the meaning of this was a clear pledge by the Prime Minister, in a most dramatic way, that "this is the date, and we'll do it."

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note the difference between what I might call the Pearson doctrine on medicare and the Sharp doctrine. The Prime Minister said we could not have a medicare program in 1963 because we did not have full employment, because we had a recession, but as soon as it was over his government would introduce such a program. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) comes along later and says: we have expansion in 1966 and it may well be that we will have the danger of inflation; therefore because of expansion we must postpone medicare.

I suppose in 1968 we may have another recession and then the Pearson doctrine that we cannot do it in a recession will come in again, and with an expansion in 1969 the Sharp doctrine will come into effect, which will say we cannot do it then either. The people of Canada are somewhat in the position of Alice in Wonderland who, in Lewis Carroll's famous words, said, "Always jam tomorrow but never jam today." One of my colleagues says the Liberals are always in a jam. That is a pun I would not have perpetrated personally.

Private members on the Liberal side, encouraged by their leaders, made medicare by July 1, 1967 a central plank in their campaigns. I know that my own Liberal opponent, a distinguished gentleman named Martin O'Connell, I think very much in the confidence of his own party, campaigned on the basis that if his constituents wanted medicare and wanted it promptly then they must vote Liberal and vote for him and not for any other party. I do not know whether Mr. O'Connell, if elected, would have stood by his guns or caved in like some other members have done.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) is quoted as saying, and I do not doubt his sincerity:

> I discussed it (medicare) at every campaign meeting. I was elected to put it into effect. I'm committed to it.

The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), who I believe is chairman of the Liberal party caucus, is quoted as saying:

> It (medicare) was second only to national unity in my campaign. I am a great believer in medicare as Mr. Pearson outlined it last July—

Incidentally, with a target date of July 1, 1967.

> I won't tolerate any watering down.

Mr. Woolliams: Who said that?

Mr. Brewin: The hon. member for Verdun, the chairman of the Liberal party caucus. He said he was not going to tolerate any watering down, but there were other voices, influential voices, which even during the election campaign created doubt as to the determination of the Liberal party, and these voices have prevailed.

• (4:30 p.m.)

On November 5 last the present Minister of Finance is reported as having said that the shortage of doctors and nurses could delay the Liberal government's hope to introduce a national medicare plan by July 1, 1967. I quote his words:

> I don't know if we'll be able to reach that target. In any case, it is better to have a target date than a mere promise.

I suppose he meant that a mere promise which had been made repeatedly for 47 years lacked any electoral persuasive power, while a target date sounded a lot better and, after all, it would not be too difficult to find a pretext for changing the target date after the election.

The government spokesmen, after the election, continued to stick to what they themselves described as a pledge. In the Star of February 2, 1966 Mr. Michael Best wrote an article in which he said the Pearson government was brimming with confidence that its battle for national medicare in 1967 had been won and all that remained was a clean-up operation. We have had a clean-up, but it did not come from the right direction. This optimism was voiced, apparently, by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) who said that most, if not all, of the provinces would be in on medicare when the plan started on July 1, 1967.

An hon. Member: That was before he became a "Sharpie" too.

Mr. Brewin: On April 1 the Globe and Mail produced a story headlined "Cabinet Reaffirms 1967 Start For medicare". The story led off with the statement, "Medicare Start By July 1, 1967 Ottawa Pledge". On May 17, 1966 the Star told us that a national medicare program to start on July 1, 1967 "appeared certain today with the announcement by health minister MacEachen that health services will start no matter how many provinces are in the program by that date." He is quoted as follows:

> There will be no retreat by Ottawa from either the July 1967 date or from the four basic conditions. The plan will commence on Canada's 100th birthday.

Those are the words of the present minister as recently as May 17. I say to the minister that I have a great deal of respect for him but I would have even more respect if, when his colleagues failed to live up to the pledge so clearly and so publicly made by him on their behalf, he had chosen to resign from the cabinet.

On May 18 of this year the Toronto Star, under the heading "National Medicare Proud Liberal Achievement", published an editorial in which it said:

> The Liberal government's conclusive commitment to introduce a national medicare program on July 1, 1967, whether all the provinces signed up or not, redeems the pledge that has been gathering dust for the past 47 years.

Then on July 7 the Prime Minister told this house that the government would bring forward a resolution and seek approval with the least possible delay. It was only after that that the medicare bill, against the protest of the members of this party, was held over until the end of the planned recess in October.

On August 2—you will realize I am using Liberal quotations throughout—a prominent Liberal, Eric Kierans, who apparently knew something not revealed to the public, is quoted in the Star as saying:

> National medicare plan may be delayed by up to four years because of indecisive federal leadership.

As late as August 3 the Prime Minister is quoted as saying that Ottawa would stand by its medicare plans. At that time he referred once again to the government's offer as being available to the provinces on July 1, 1967, although he said that that was not the deadline for provincial acceptance. Then on September 9 this year we find a headline in the Star, "Medicare Pigeonholed Again". It was neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of National Health and Welfare but the Minister of Finance who made the announcement in this house.

The Toronto Star described this in language which, coming from a journalistic supporter of the Liberal administration, is stronger than I as an opponent would perhaps choose. Under the heading "Medicare Delay Is Outrageous Deceit" the Canadian Press report said:

> Canadian people have been deceived and disappointed in their expectation of health insurance by the party which began promising it in 1919. Federal medicare is to be postponed for a year on the excuse—and it is merely an excuse—that this is necessary to fight inflation. The one year postponement would be bad enough for the four million Canadians who have medical insurance coverage—the six million who have none at all. Who in view of the 47 year record of Liberal nonfulfilment of this promise, can have any confidence that the delay will only be for one year. This latest betrayal of medicare and of Health Minister Allan MacEachen, was accomplished in the manner of a Machiavellian intrigue.

Later in the article they say:

> Whether the Prime Minister was in on the scheme or not, it is clear that the conservative wing of the cabinet has succeeded, temporarily at least, in sacrificing medicare on the altar of sound finance.

A day or two later members of this house within the Liberal caucus met at Peterborough and, in view of what they said at the time, it really is quite unnecessary for me to give my interpretation of the events leading up to postponement of medicare. This session, which the newspaper said was attended by 20 Liberal members of this house, indulged on Saturday night in what they call "a wholesale denunciation of the medicare postponement". They were very brave then. I hope they will recover their brave feelings later.

Mr. Thompson, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, used words which I am going to adopt, although I do not always wish to adopt his words. Referring to the postponement he said:

> This is a moral issue. The Liberal party went to the people and said it would bring in medicare.

Another prominent Liberal did a very good job; he is the editor of Liberal Action. He expressed the view that many delegates found it hard to understand how the medicare postponement could be an anti-inflation move. If they did not understand it then, I wonder how they can understand it now? I do not see how they could ever understand it. He pointed out that most of the money needed to finance the medicare program was already being spent on medicare. The extra spending needed would not be required until after the problem of inflation had been solved. Of course that is true. How does it make sense to say they are going to postpone something which starts in July, 1967, because of a recession in October of 1966? Any neophyte in economics knows the situation may totally change in the meantime and that this is a very feeble and phony excuse. I entirely agree with the editor of Liberal Action. He goes on to say:

> The Liberals have been promising a national medicare program since 1919. The cheque the Liberals first wrote in 1919 has been bouncing ever since.

Mr. Speaker, it is still bouncing; it has not stopped bouncing in 1966. According to the Star, in discussing the same matter in Peterborough a Liberal member of parliament is said to have interpreted what happened as being unnecessary and irresponsible and a victory for the cabinet establishment which, according to this anonymous Liberal member, has long been opposed to this legislation. I do not know who the member is but I really think he had something. He went on to predict a growing rift between the members of the cabinet establishment and some members of the Liberal parliamentary wing which, he said, could lead to the destruction of the party. I do not know who this member was but I am sure the house would be interested to hear from him now in explanation of the views that he put forward in Peterborough at that time. In what I have said I have relied upon expressions of opinion from those who have either supported or who owe loyalty to the Liberal party. I am not in either of these categories, but I say that even now it is not too late, if people of good will and conviction have the gumption to stick to their convictions, to redeem the situation.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Canada ought to have its national medicare scheme in effect on its 100th birthday, July 1, 1967, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare so eloquently pointed out to this house not very many months ago. The supposed inflationary obstacle is a complete and utter phony. I urge those in the Liberal party, and there are many of them, who clearly were elected on the faith of the promises made by them in this regard, to show good faith, or even one or two of them to show good faith to those who relied on their promises. This would do something to dispel the cynicism with which we are regarded when these pledges, made so unequivocally, are brushed aside for reasons which are so phony. If only a few of the Liberals who had this conviction, and I believe many of them had it, would stick to their conviction with determination, despite all that has happened, Canada could have this enlightened, this necessary, this urgent legislation in effect by its 100th birthday.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, when one enters a debate of this type at this stage of the game it is rather difficult not to be repetitious. A previous speaker said that this is an historic and far reaching piece of legislation. We all agree that it is far reaching, as any program is that improves the welfare of every man, woman and child in Canada. As to its being historic, I agree with the Liberal speaker in this respect because it has been appearing and wobbling in and out of Liberal election propaganda since 1919. We are faced with the fact that the plan is not going to come into force until 1968, almost two years hence, and who knows what may happen to it between now and then.

Last week I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) a question in connection with the possibility of sending this piece of legislation to a committee for study. The minister's reply was:

> It is not the intention of the government to send the medical care bill to a committee for study. It is a very short bill and it speaks for itself. In my view it can properly be studied in committee of the whole.

That is quite an interesting statement. It would almost appear that this bill is just another routine matter in the house that it is a short bill and does not require a great deal of study, that having been introduced it will be carried forward without too much difficulty. I would refer the house to the description of this bill:

An act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada towards the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

I do not think too many of us in the house object to the philosophy that if the provinces are willing to bring forward medical care insurance plans the federal government should assist them to do so. However, one section of the bill provides that the plan must be universal. It was rather interesting that when the minister introduced the resolution preceding the bill he spent so much time trying to convince us that the universality of the plan did not mean compulsion; it did not mean that everybody in Canada would have to participate. I maintain that if the minister would see fit to revise the idea of compulsion, which will interfere with the freedom of the provinces, the freedom of the individual and the freedom of the doctors, there would be very little doubt that we in this house could come to general agreement on the question of medicare.

I do not think there is a person in the house who is not in favour of medicare of some kind and its being made available to all Canadians. Such plans are available in the provinces at the present time. There are private plans in which people can participate; there are co-operative plans and plans of all kinds under which people can recieve medical attention. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned, very many of the organizations in this country, labour unions, manufacturers, teachers, doctors and small businessmen have medicare available to them. I am very proud of the fact that co-operative medical services plans are operated in the two counties I represent. I refer to the Wellington County Co-operative Medical Association plan and the Huron County Medical Co-operative Services plan. These two organizations have done a tremendous job in providing economical and serviceable medical care to all those within the area who wish to avail themselves of these services. I too, am interested in those people faced with critical illnesses which might use up their entire financial resources. In our province there is a medical care program which pretty well prevents this situation developing.

It is rather interesting to hear other people, particularly members of this house, indicating that people are just crying out for this type of a poll taken by a newspaper, The Independent Businessman. I am a small businessman and receive this newspaper and am probably more interested in it than some people. However, I was very interested in the results of the poll taken on the question of medicare. This newspaper is read by 100,000 small businessmen in Ontario. I do not know how wide its circulation is throughout the nation but it has over 100,000 readers in our province. In answer to the question, "Do you approve of medicare," only 27 per cent of these people indicated in the "yes" column that they were interested in this type of program. On the "no" side 68 per cent of the people said they were not interested in medicare, and only 5 per cent of the people polled had no opinion.

Therefore it is difficult to accept the statement that a great mass of people are clamouring at the doors of the parliament buildings asking members to bring forward this piece of legislation to relieve them of their medical cares and financial responsibilities in this connection. Apparently this is not true. In talking to my constituents over the holiday about medicare I found that a great many of them said, "I think it is about time the government quit participating in our business and let us look after ourselves. We are sick and tired of the big clubs that are held over our heads saying that we have to participate in pension plans, we have to participate in medicare, and so on." This is a popular feeling in Canada today. People are sick and tired of these social security programs. They are beginning to realize that there is no pie in the sky, that the money for these programs does not grow on trees and somebody has to pay for them. If more people realized that I think they would come to the doors of the Liberal government and say; "Take another look at this piece of legislation and see whether there are so many people interested in it."

• (4:50 p.m.)

In the same connection it is rather interesting to read what a very famous senator who retired a few months ago said about this house and what is happening in Canada. He was quoted in an article in the Globe and Mail of July 11, 1966, headed, "Crerar Urges Western Liberals To Back Away From Socialism."

It goes on to say that he would not attend a party conference in Saskatoon next month where policy would be developed for this year's national Liberal convention. He said:

I would tell them they are supposed to be a Liberal gathering. They should get back to the sound principles of Liberalism, and compulsion in areas in which it is the right of the individual to decide isn't one of them.

He then goes on to speak about another piece of legislation which the Liberal party brought in and which was supposed to benefit the elderly and the retired in Canada. He said:

The only objectionable feature of the Canada Pension Plan is that it is compulsory. How you can reconcile compulsion with Liberal philosophy is beyond me.

These are the words of a man who has spent a great many years both in this house and in the other place, a man who, in spite of his years, had an understanding of the conditions prevailing in this nation, a man who was interested, as we all are, in the welfare of all Canadians.

We have an amendment before us proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) which, if it were accepted, would make this piece of legislation more palatable to all of us in this house. First of all, it deals with the co-operation of the provinces. We all realize the importance in this great nation of working in unity with the municipal, provincial and federal governments. Unless we do that we cannot hope to bring in legislation for the good of all the people. Today three provinces have their own voluntary medical schemes because they realized the necessity of making available to their people a medical plan of their own choice. Most of the provinces have medical schemes for people on low incomes who do not have the means to look after themselves. These plans allow the people to choose the plan to which they wish to subscribe.

I was rather interested in Premier Johnson's statement that he was not going to have the middle class harassed by social legislation, or words to that effect. Who are the people affected by legislative programs of this type? It is the poor people, people on minimum incomes, those on very small or no incomes who are in most cases given free assistance. A medical care program does not mean anything to wealthy people because they have the means to look after themselves. It is the small storekeepers, the farmers, men working in the factories and professional men who are affected by this type of program.

Quite a number of the provinces feel that they cannot participate in a medical plan unless the federal government carries most of the load. Therefore it does not look as if this legislation will receive much co-operation from them.

The amendment also deals with a concept I have already mentioned, namely, the freedom of the individual to select his own plan. We have seen in this house governments who believed they could spend the people's money better than the people could themselves. I was interested to read a publication which we all received on our desks entitled "Industry", for June, 1966, published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I quote from an article headed "Call Back Yesterday".

The following editorial first appeared just ten years ago in the June, 1956, issue of "Industry" under the caption "Worth Pondering":—

At that time the minister of finance was Mr. Walter Harris. The article continues:

Mr. Walter Harris came up recently with a revealing statement and an interesting comment, both of which deserved a good deal more prominence than they got.

The statement: "One-third of the annual income of the Canadian people is taken away from them in the form of federal, provincial and municipal taxes".

The comment: "This is a situation worth pondering."

There is another comment farther down which I should like to quote because it deals with the concept I mentioned earlier regarding the right which people should be given of choosing their own plan. It reads as follows:

The doctrine that governments can spend the people's money better than the people themselves is not a new one. But it remains highly fashionable. More so than ever.

Mr. Speaker, that was in 1956. You were not here then but we all remember how the front benches revelled in the surpluses which they were able to build up year after year by taxing the people for money to run the ordinary services of the country. This got through to the people and created the situation which we inherited in 1957, the tight money policy and increasing unemployment. The arrogant crew over there thought they could spend the people's money better than the people themselves. Are not compulsion and insistence on everyone's participation in this plan an indication that the government feels that individuals are not even able to look after themselves, have no right to do so, and that this great magnificent government can look after them better than they can?

All this has happened before, Mr. Speaker. As I sit here and watch what is going on over there, I sometimes think that if those people who were kicked out in 1957 had learned their lesson they would not be saying now that they have all the answers, that this program should not go to a committee to be discussed and that this program will look after the people better than the people can look after themselves. There are a lot of people in Canada who are becoming wise to the situation and who are realizing there is no pie in the sky and that this plan will cost them money. The people of Canada want to be free and they want the opportunity to look after themselves.

The fourth item in the amendment proposed by my colleague from Simcoe East has to do with a matter which was so ably expressed by him when he spoke on the resolution. I refer to the necessity, before any such plan is implemented, of there being an adequate number of doctors, an adequate number of hospitals and an adequate amount of research to look after the people. Every effort should be made to ensure that in Canada the best type of medical care is provided for our people.

As the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie) mentioned, a plan such as this one is not going to bring the very best brain specialist to the door of every person in Canada; it is not going to bring the best heart surgeon to the door of every person in Canada. There are just not enough of these men to go around. I cite my own case as an example. I live in a village of 1,200 people and we have one doctor to look after all the people within ten miles of that village. Granted, some of those people go to other places, but they have to do so. This doctor has only one pair of hands and he can only be in one place at a time. We do not have enough doctors in Ontario or in Canada to service a program of this type at the present time. We will not have enough by 1968, the time it is proposed to start this program.

I am certainly in favour of this part of the amendment. Before we bring in any comprehensive plan we should do our utmost to see that we have the medical people and the medical facilities available. We should have sufficient personnel to look after all our people, and we do not have enough at the present time. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned this as one of the priorities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the amendment mentions something we have been seeking and that is a plan to look after the people who do not have the money to look after themselves. I do not believe we have to wait for two years to implement such a plan. This is a priority and something we should be thinking about. Of course, we think of some of the other plans that were introduced and which were supposed to look after many of these people. We think of the Canada Pension Plan. We well remember that great plan which was introduced by the hon. lady and when she finished speaking she said it was a plan to ensure that all the people of Canada would be able to retire in security and in dignity. What a wonderful plan that was! It was wonderful in conception but terrible in prosecution. We know that the government has introduced another piece of legislation to remedy the deficiencies in the Canada Pension Plan and look after the very people who were not allowed to participate in that plan and who should be looked after immediately.

There is another class of people who need help, Mr. Speaker. Somebody mentioned the genteel poor. This is a class of people which is increasing day by day because of the inflationary tendencies in our economy. I have heard some people say that this great medical plan will not affect our finances so there is no reason for not introducing it now. Our experience has been that social measures cost money. We are wondering why we are having inflation. I wonder how much the Canada Pension Plan has contributed to the present labour unrest. On January 1 of this year every man working in a factory, store, foundry or mill had a payroll deduction for the Canada Pension Plan. He was probably buying a house and a car and had debts or perhaps sick children at home. He went home with less money than he had the month before. Do you not think he was provoked? He was not so worried about what might happen to him 10, 20 or 30 years from now; he had problems now. What about the manufacturer who has to pay the other half of the pension contributions? We are talking about socialistic schemes. Do you think he can afford to pay his half? Do you not think that amount was added to the price of the product he sells?

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) made a great name for himself last week when he told the women of Ottawa how to shop. There are some women in Ottawa who are not too happy about his program and they wonder if he were doing the shopping day in and day out, whether he would do any better than they do. We have inflation in this country and many of the things that are causing inflation are things that we feel we have to introduce to look after other people. As I say, we believe there should be a program developed immediately to ensure that people who cannot look after themselves are looked after. The provinces should be assisted in this field.

There is one more point I should like to mention in connection with this plan. I have referred before on occasion to the cost of social programs. I do not always agree with the Minister of Finance but I do agree that we cannot afford this program. Many people have medical plans now which are going to disappear. I have yet to see any program instituted by a government that could not have been provided more cheaply by private enterprise. As I say, I commend the Minister of Finance for realizing that.

Let us look at one or two of our socialistic programs. We are happy about the hospitalization plan. This was good legislation but it was not compulsory legislation. The individual had a choice. I mentioned costs. In 1958, when the Conservative government instituted hospitalization, payments by the federal government to the provinces amounted to $158 million. In 1962, four years later, these payments had increased to $420 million, nearly three times as much. I was a member of the committee which discussed the Canada pension program. Time after time it was brought to the attention of the government that rarely, if at all, does the cost of a plan of this type remain stationary. We know about the United States experience and their plan has proven five or six times as costly. As one speaker said the other day, when we introduce social legislation of this type it is forever. It is almost impossible to roll back such legislation. It can be amended and changed but the principle has to be carried forward.

I sometimes wonder what we are doing for future generations besides polluting our streams and destroying our good agricultural land. Are we encouraging thrift among our young people through these social programs? Is this program from the cradle to the grave about which we hear so much talk really good for all of us? What right have we to legislate for future generations? In fact, what right have we to discuss legislation to bring in a program like this which will not be instituted for two years? No, Mr. Speaker, I think another look has to be taken at this piece of legislation.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for the amendment. I am not worried about the people who say that we are filibustering this piece of legislation. Neither am I worried about the people who say that if I vote against the legislation I shall be committing political suicide.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, because a lot of people in my area who have voted for me in a number of elections have sent me here to speak on their behalf and to see whether, if possible, I could influence the government to let them live their lives, to let them choose their own type of programs. I think that this is what I was sent here for, sir.

In closing I should like to make reference to an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette for Wednesday, October 12, 1966. It is headed "Not Just When But How", and the article indicates how shallow a lot of the discussion which has taken place on this question has been. The article is discussing the timing of this program and suggests that the debate has not indicated how it will be paid for and how much, in the final analysis, it is going to cost. The article concludes:

> But the heated debates of the last few weeks have not even raised the questions, much less begun a search for the answers. The debate has been on the irrelevent question of whether the scheme should be started next year or the year after.
> It may be hoped that between now and July 1, 1968 there will be more discussion about the real issues which medicare raises, and less about the secondary ones; more about substance, and less about style.

Mr. Milton L. Klein (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of medicare. I look forward to the time when the services to be provided will be increased and the members of our society who, for example, require eye glasses or dentures will be able to obtain them under this plan. When we seek to legislate we try to make improvements. We can never achieve the ideal legislation in regard to any question. As a matter of fact, even nature itself is not perfect. For example, I have never been able to understand why human beings are given a second set of teeth at five years of age; it would have been far better had nature provided a second set of teeth at 50 years of age. But we cannot argue with nature.

As the previous speaker said and as has been pointed out, when medicare does come into force it is important that it comes into force forever. It is far more important that this legislation be passed by this house than that it shall come into effect on July 1, 1967 or July 1, 1968. The important thing is that it does become part of the legislation of this country. I would suspect that no party would be more disappointed than the New Democratic Party if in fact this program does come into force on July 1, 1967.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Explain.

Mr. Klein: Very obviously, Mr. Speaker, for political reasons. They would be very happy if the plan did not come into force prior to July 1, 1968. They would be most unhappy if it did come into force before that date.

Mr. Lewis: You are as wrong as your finance minister.

Mr. Klein: It has been stated, that there is a shortage in this country of medical practitioners. I should like to deal with this point for a moment and to speak about the high cost of providing education, both in time and in money, to train the medical students of this country.

For example, I am told that in the province of Quebec the requirement for entry into the career of medicine is a pre-medical course of some four years duration, at the end of which a degree either of Bachelor of Arts or Bachelor of Science is necessary. Once this degree has been obtained and the qualifications are met for entering medical school, the medical student has to spend another four years at medical school. In addition, he must then spend another year as an intern in a hospital. This means that a student who wants to become a general practitioner—the requirements are different for someone who wants to specialize in medicine—has to train for nine years.

Beyond this, Mr. Speaker, if the student wishes to specialize in any particular branch of medicine I am told that he must intern in a hospital in the province of Quebec for a further period of five years. Therefore this means that if a student wants to practise as a pediatrician or as a surgeon, or to train for a particular specialty, he must give up 14 years of his life after leaving high school. This would mean, that if a student of 17 or 18 enters the liberal arts to obtain a B.A. degree or a Bachelor of Science degree and wants to specialize in a particular branch of medicine, he will not be able to earn his own living in his particular specialty until he is at least 32 or 33 years of age. I am also told that the approximate cost of educating a doctor is $25,000 a year.

I would think that the conditions which are laid down for people who want to choose medicine as a career must be looked into with a view to reducing the period of time it takes to become a doctor or a specialist, as they desire. We should also use whatever influence we can to convince the medical association of this because the association itself is contributing to a shortage of doctors. The medical profession itself is creating a shortage of medical practitioners in this way.

I do not see the necessity for a person who wants to become a doctor to apply himself to a four-year pre-medical course to obtain a B.A. or Bachelor of Science degree. I think there ought to be a crash program in which the pre-medical requirements should be done away with until such time as we have sufficient doctors in this country and under which a person could enter upon medical training immediately on graduation from high school. If more time is required for training, I suggest that a student's time would be far better spent in the actual study of medicine than in the study of Keates or Shakespeare.

I believe we are coming to the time when we all want to see universal free college education or the opportunity of a free college education for all people in Canada. We are probably heading in that direction. I think we ought to establish priorities and not wait for a universal plan. For example, we cannot offer opportunities for free university education for every person in Canada in every type of profession. But in this country we are short of doctors and therefore we ought to say that we will provide free education to anyone qualified who wishes to take up the profession of medicine. Such a program for such a purpose ought to be established immediately.

An hon. Member: Too late.

Mr. Klein: We must persuade the medical profession to co-operate. I may be wrong in what I am about to say, and perhaps this is not so today, but in the past different associations, whether medical, legal or others, set up standards in order to prevent their respective professions from being overcrowded. Perhaps the whole matter needs a new look to see what can be done to facilitate an increase, particularly in the medical profession. In the present circumstances we ought to have a crash medical program, first, to convince the medical profession to lower its standards, and, second, to make the pre-medical course unnecessary and allow students to enter medicine immediately. Furthermore, we ought to make the course available free of charge to qualified people.

Also, I do not think that the universities are making enough use of their quarters. If in this country, for example, we need doctors, engineers, physicists, or whatever professions for which we should establish priorities, then courses such as liberal arts, commercial and the like which do not produce scientists, doctors or physicists ought to be taught at night. The building facilities should be used during the day to further the studies of those students who may now be turned away in the fields of science, medicine, physics and so on. I admit that the universities have to expand their quarters in certain instances but the need for some of this expansion could be overcome by staggering the hours at which different courses are taught.

I hope that the establishment of medicare will bring the doctor back to the patient. I hope that the medical profession will not even wait for medicare but that, for example, a pool of doctors will be established which can be drawn on in the middle of the night. If you do not have a family physician it is impossible in an emergency to get a doctor in the middle of the night. Under medicare I hope that this problem will be taken care of so that a person or a family may call the College of Physicians and Surgeons say at two o'clock in the morning when somebody is ill and in need of a doctor. From this pool of doctors it would be the duty of the college during such hours to direct a doctor to the patient.

I suggest that many of the ills a patient suffers from today are often aggravated by the fact that he has to go to the doctor's office and take all kinds of tests. In the past, when the family doctor came to his house and reassured him that his illness was of minor consequence, the patient often recovered more quickly than in these days. I hope that the human relationship that existed at one time between doctors and their patients can be re-established.

[Mr. Klein.]

I also think that the legislation we implement with respect to medicine ought to be part of a concentrated war on poverty. Not enough effort is being concentrated in this direction. I say that because many of the persons requiring medical attention today require it because of malnutrition.

I should like to see the day when, as part of the war on poverty—and I think that medicare is part of the plan of zeroing in on poverty—we designate in certain urban areas pockets of poverty bounded by certain streets, and within those streets we ought to impose rent control. If there are other areas in a city with buildings which, for example, are classified as third class, then those buildings should also be placed under rent control.

I should also like to see the day, and I do not think it should be far off, when we can call dieticians before an appropriate committee of the house to tell us what basic nutrients a person requires in order to exist for a 24-hour period. If those nutrients constitute, for example, milk, bread, certain cuts of meat, whatever those basics are, I think that price controls ought to be enforced on such basic human needs. I am not talking about luxury items or luxury meat cuts. I am talking about basic nutrients.

The government might consider, for example, subsidizing the producers of these basic nutrients at the source of production so that the price spread between the producer and the retailer will always remain constant. I suggest that price control on these food essentials could be worked out. I do not suggest the manner in which that should be done. But, for example, when we give a franchise to a transportation company we say that the company, irrespective of any loss it may incur in providing passenger service in certain areas, must, as part of the franchise, accept the duty of carrying passengers. Before a food market is permitted to establish itself it is placed under an obligation to carry certain essential food products at a price which is controlled or set by the government —I recognize this is a provincial field—or else lose its right to conduct a food market.

The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Isabelle) has told us there are 24,000 doctors in Canada, only 9,360 of whom are general practitioners with the others practising in particular branches of medicine. This may account in some measure for the high cost of medical treatment in Canada. I believe that if the proportion were reversed and we had more general practitioners than specialists, more illnesses would be treated at home and there would be less reference to specialists resulting in heavy expenses. Reference to specialists results in many cases in going from one to another.

I support this legislation. I suggest that we in this country must seek to educate the affluent society as to the necessity for such programs as this. Before the election in Quebec in 1966 one enterprising reporter predicted that it might produce many surprises. I should like to read from his article in the Montreal Gazette in which he quotes an observer as saying:

> People are ungrateful. They would as soon get half what they get now with all the new programs like hospital insurance if they just knew their neighbour was not getting anything at all.

The reporter ends by quoting one man as saying:

> I paid my children's way through school and now I am paying for other children. And my taxes are still going up.

I suggest we should go to the people of Canada on a non-partisan basis and say to them: we want these social programs and they are coming whether certain people like them or not. But these programs require money from taxation. In my view no political party should go to the people in future and say it can reduce taxation while increasing services. On the contrary, the people should be told that we intend to increase social benefits and that this will mean increased taxation.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I feel duty bound to make some comments on this motion for the second reading of Bill No. C-227, an Act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans. From the social point of view, this bill is excellent since it offers to help the provinces with regard to health insurance. But from the financial point of view, this bill becomes dangerous for the provinces, like a pill that is candy-coated so the patient will swallow it easily. It is all very well to give, but not to steal for a charitable purpose.

As in the case of all other similar bills tending towards centralization, the federal government continues to progress toward absolute control over the provinces in all fields, while letting them think it is helping them. By what means is this help given? The government will impose heavier taxes on the population of each province, in accordance with its famous saying: you don't get something for nothing.

On the other hand, the people are not told that under all those famous joint plans, the taxpayer must pay twice for the same service. As a matter of fact, the federal government recognizes that health comes under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It will therefore be up to the provinces to administer medicare. The provinces will have to decide whether a medicare plan is beneficial and set the date and the terms of its implementation. I am therefore very much surprised when the government starts considering whether the plan will be implemented in two, three or four years.

If it is really up to the provinces to determine the form, the financing and the effective date of the plan, then what is the use of Bill No. C-227?

It would be much more logical, it seems to me, to simply say that the federal government will support the provinces as much as it can, without subjecting the Canadian people to double taxation. Because, after studying Bill No. C-227, I wonder what would happen if the province of Quebec, for instance, decided against implementing its insurance plan before two, three or even four years, or flatly refused to take part in a program laid down by the central government?

Will the federal government levy the same tax that will be imposed on the participating provinces? I feel this would a flagrant injustice towards the Quebec people. We also consider as unfair any action by the central government to impose on its own a further tax in order to hand over part of it to every province.

We maintain that if the central government recognizes the rights of the provinces in the field of health, it should let them make their own decisions and levy their own taxes.

I heard a Liberal member tell us that we have no right to prevent the government from assisting the provinces and that the central government is fully entitled to lay down conditions for that assistance.

Mr. Speaker, such is the policy of the federal Liberal party which would like to interfere in all provincial fields, when it is a known fact that the same ones always pay. What we want in Quebec is the abolishment of double taxation. We would like to be taxed only once and directly by the responsible government, which in the present case is the Quebec government. We should stop acting on the federal scene for the sole purpose of political prestige. One move by this government would settle all deadlocked discussions; it would drive away from the federal scene all those actors trying to give an impression of generosity on the part of the central government, while it is just pure hypocrisy. One move by parliament would do justice to the provinces and that is to give back to the provinces the taxation rights that belong to them, namely personal and corporate taxes and succession duties.

As I told the house, let the federal government give back to the provinces what they voluntarily lent it for the duration of the war and what it has wilfully kept for more than twenty years, thus depriving the provinces of their own taxes and causing the headaches now bearing down on provincial parliamentarians.

When you borrow, you must pay back. That is precisely what Ottawa has always refused to do and still does today. I say that is dishonest, and that because the federal government acts that way there have been misunderstandings for twenty years, and that we may have anarchy in the years to come. Will the members from all provinces realize this before it is too late? I certainly hope so, for otherwise I would prefer not to be around to witness the atrocities to come.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that as far as the Canadian community is concerned, its days are numbered unless we revert to a more honest dialogue. Federal-provincial conferences were invented in an attempt to dialogue, but one soon realizes that the federal delegates flaunt an obvious lack of good will.

Bill No. C-227 is still the best proof we have of this. Whereas several provinces have voiced serious objections to the present bill, the government proceeds as if nothing had happened, to the extent that we wonder if it really has discussed the matter with the said provinces.

Sticking to the strong central government principle, the government carries on as if provincial governments were mere vassals, or simply did not exist. And this we dare call co-operative federalism. This reminds me of popular socialist elections in Russia, where only the Communist party candidate may run for election. Thus, the Liberal party will be able to tell the people: "As promised, we have given you a medicare bill, although we will not be the ones to give you medicare; this is up to the provinces. We will help the provinces, but on condition that they accept the conditions in our bill. If they refuse, nothing."

That is why I maintain that it would have been much more logical to simply offer federal assistance to those provinces wishing to introduce medicare for their residents, and this help should be granted in the form of new credit made available to the government by the Bank of Canada, and not by an additional tax levied particularly on Canadian workers. In this light, we would have several amendments to present to the hon. minister who introduced the bill.

I note in the bill under its present form that the expression "insured services" means:

—all services rendered by medical practitioners that are medically required—

I wonder if the government has considered all the paramdeical services. Optometrists, for instance, whose vere valuable services are required daily to care for the eyes of all our people.

Last Wednesday the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Messrs. Pearson and MacEachen) clearly stated that they would consider the advisability of including the optical services under medical services to be covered by the proposed medicare plan for Canadians. But these are only considerations, possibilities; there is absolutely nothing of a positive nature either in the ministers' words and even less in the letter of the law itself. And since our party believes only in what is written in black and white, in present laws, we urge the honourable Minister of National Health and Welfare to incorporate it in the act by an amendment, when he moves third reading, so that there may be justice for all. Moreover, the minister must have received a good many requests in this regard, coming from the optometrists themselves or from their association. For the information of the house concerning petitions, I have here an excerpt from the C.O.A. president's report in which he requests the co-operation of the members to force the government's hand.

Here is a paragraph concerning that invitation to the members of the association. I quote:

Every optometrist should make it his duty, before the fall session, to get in touch with his federal member either personally or by letter, to explain the unfairness of such a decision or those Canadians who seek the optometrists' services and for the optometrists themselves.

The C.O.A. will make new representations to the federal government to reinforce previous representations. Provincial associations should endeavour to have their respective provincial governments specify what their position is on the matter.

At this point I should like to give just one more example of the letters received asking that the act be amended by the minister. On October 14, 1966, I received a letter from an optometrist in my district of Roberval. Here is a summary of that letter sent by Mr. L. G. Deschênes, optometrist in Dolbeau.

Dear Sir:

I gave you at my office last year a brief concerning the inclusion of services given by optometrists in the medicare bill.

Since we do not seem to get anywhere in spite of all the representations of our federal and provincial organizations, in view of the strong opposition in the high circles of organized medicine, I take the liberty once again to ask you to take part in the present debate so that our services to the people will be included as are those of the paramedical professions.

If that is not done, it will be a great injustice against us and those who come to us; in other words, for our riding it will mean that the Canadian government will pay the cost of the examination by the optician at the hospital and will not pay anything for those who will come to see us.

I am also including some literature to that effect—

And he sends me newspaper clippings. This is similar to all the other letters; it gives an idea of the letters we receive from every optometrist. The minister must have received some from the members, and I am sure that he will recall having stated that the government was studying the possibility of including services given by the optometrists.

Therefore, we hope that his consideration will be translated into an amendment to Bill No. C-227.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), National Defence—inquiry as to salary scale of naval lieutenants; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Transportation—installation of signal lights at all railway crossings; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), Public Service—representations respecting relief for red circled employees.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on the amendment before the house. Before doing so, however, I should like to express what I am sure is the appreciation of all members in the house of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and his parliamentary secretary have been present throughout this debate. We have appreciated their presence and their attention to the speeches which have been delivered in the last few days. In this debate the speeches have been of a very high calibre. I am sure the minister and his assistant on reflection and on a re-reading of the speeches will find that many of the points which have been made should be taken to heart. As a result of this they might even go so far as to postpone the implementation of this bill, or at least make several important changes.

For purposes of clarity I will divide my speech into four headings. First, why are we taking the valuable time of the house now? Second, keep out of medicare—it is none of our business. Third, the country is not prepared at this point for medicare and, fourth, it is discriminatory and it is compulsory. First, why are we taking the time of the house now to pass this piece of legislation which we are told will not come into force for at least two years, on July 1, 1968?

I think the minister might well refer to the confession which so often is read by those of all religious faiths; indeed, he might even suggest that it be read or said at the commencement of every cabinet meeting. It goes something like this: We have left undone those things which we ought to have done and we have done those things which we ought not to have done. I think this would be very appropriate right at this particular time. We are asked to take the time of the house to discuss this bill which, as I said, will not be in force for two years. Ask the old age pensioners what they think about the house taking up time on this particular bill at this point.

Last summer before the house adjourned, I believe about July 14, the minister made a promise that he would introduce a measure to increase the old age pension to a minimum of $105 a month. The $30 extra to bring it up to $105 is urgently needed. This becomes apparent when we see how these old age pensioners exist, the type of accommodation they have, the type of rooms in which they are living often in the basements of houses which are damp and poorly lighted, and at the same time trying to spread out the $75 to make it go as far as possible. While they are living in this manner we in this house are debating a piece of legislation which will not come into force for two years. So we come back to that great Liberal slogan of "60 days of decision". I think it is more like six months of indecision, six months of inaction, or maybe it is six months of reversals.

The latest reversal we have heard of today is that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) is being asked by his fellow cabinet ministers to reverse his decision on unification. Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare should be asked to reverse his decision to go ahead with medicare at this particular time when there are so many other matters which should be debated in the house. There are supplementary estimates with which we should be dealing. The first thing we know we will have reached our 100th anniversary and will not have chosen our national anthem.

We have before us a bill dealing with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not need to remind hon. members that we need a change in the C.M.H.C. regulations so that we can get on building more houses. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) has talked about bringing people to Canada but if we do not have housing for them, why bring them here. People will be living in tents soon if we do not do something about this. We also have the export credit legislation. There is the matter of a budget and the problem of inflation. We should be dealing with all these things but instead we are spending our time on a piece of legislation which will not come into effect until 1968.

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit an interruption for a moment? We have had a request that the house suspend its sitting for an hour for the purpose of a dinner break. If this is agreeable to the members of the house opposite, we have no objection on this side.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it agreed that the house suspend its sitting for one hour?

Some hon. Members: Two hours.

Mr. McIlraith: The request is only for one hour. There would be no willingness to agree to two hours.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the house suspend its sitting for one hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 6.02 p.m. the sitting of the house was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, before the supper adjournment I only had time to introduce the four points upon which I propose to speak: first, why we are taking the time of the house now to discuss this piece of legislation that will not be in force for at least two years, if passed; second, my feeling that the federal government should keep out of the medicare business because it really is not its responsibility, up to a point; third, that the country is not prepared for medicare at this particular time; and fourth, my belief that this plan is discriminatory in its compulsory aspect.

I had dealt with my first point and now wish to proceed under the second heading, namely that I feel the federal government should keep out of the business of medicare except to the point where the federal government would pay its share of the subsidized costs experienced by the various provinces which institute a program of medicare. When we stop to look at the situation we find that the province of British Columbia has a good plan of medicare, as have Alberta and Saskatchewan. Manitoba is just waiting for the "go" sign for its plan. Ontario has a good medicare plan, and Quebec is working on a plan. Quebec is looking after the people who cannot afford a medicare plan, and the other provinces in the east are all considering a medicare plan.

I am not a lawyer, but I am led to believe that from the constitutional viewpoint the business of medicare is the responsibility of the various provinces. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I reiterate that I believe our responsibility as a federal government is to pay our share of the costs of those subsidized by provinces which have a plan—and they will all have such a plan eventually. We should pay our share of the subsidized portion whereby the provinces will take care of everyone who cannot afford medicare. In other words, no one would go without medical care.

Another point is that this is a very costly proposition for the provinces and the federal government. It will be a major cost item, and the largest portion of the cost will fall upon those provinces which are objecting to the federal plan, particularly Ontario. The federal government will pay half the average cost of basic medical care to participating provinces. Ontario, which provides half the federal revenues, will thus pay half the national cost, but its own share of the cost will be larger per capita than that of the other provinces.

Basic medical costs in Ontario average about $40 while the national average is estimated at $35. Ontario would receive only $17 per capita from the federal purse and would have to pay $23 itself. The position of Quebec would be little better, and probably worse because they are now faced with the improved program of education, and with an industrial program which they find should have priority. And yet upon provinces such as Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario which together contain over half of Canada's population, the minister is trying to force an enormous and costly program. Moreover he is doing it without making any effort to determine what other needs the provinces will have to meet—for each and every province has its own obligations and problems. It would have been only right and proper for the minister to have waited for the Carter royal commission report, the Ontario committee on taxation report, and the Belanger royal commission report in Quebec, so as to give each province an opportunity to find out whether or not it could enter into such a gigantic program as this national medical plan. The minister says: "You will come in on my terms or get no help from Ottawa. While you will pay for a program you may not be able to afford if you stay out you will pay for those who come into the plan." These are his terms.

Medicare has not yet become legislation. It will not become so until, as I said, these taxation reports are in, at which time the provinces will have a much better opportunity to re-assess the whole situation. I feel that the various provinces are living up to their moral obligation which is the requirement to see that medicare is provided free or subsidized for all the low income or high risk groups in the provinces; this is already being done. I say we should keep out of this; we should leave it to the provinces to decide which plan they want, but pay our portion of the subsidy.

I should like to make my position on medicare clear. I am fully in support of a comprehensive health service. I do not like the term "medical service" and later on I will explain why. In my view we should use the term "health service" rather than "medical service". It should be made available to every citizen, whether his income is large or small, and both the federal and provincial governments should bring it within the reach of every family. This is what is being done under the provincial schemes. However, there are too many people who are willing and anxious to imply that a member who stands up in this house and says he is against this particular plan because of its compulsory aspects, its cost or the quality of medicare that will be provided under it, is against medicare. That is far from the truth.

My third point comes under the heading: Canada is not prepared. One could speak a very long time under this heading, but I am of the opinion that before we find ourselves in the strait-jacket of a universal and comprehensive plan of medicare we should assess the whole situation, and maybe set down some of the priorities as we see them.

Can we afford the expansion of education which our economic growth requires, as outlined by the Economic Council of Canada, at the same time as the added cost of an expanded nationalized health service? These are some of the questions we should stop and ask ourselves before we go into this plan at this particular time.

It is alarming to hear the plan being advocated as a program to provide free medical services to the Canadian people. A service does not become free simply because the government foots the bill. It is misleading to give the Canadian people the false impression that their government can take on additional expenditures, which will amount before too long to over $1 billion a year, without imposing heavy additional taxation at both the federal and provincial levels. It is most unfair therefore to say that these plans are free. Nothing in this world is free.

There are not enough doctors and medical facilities available to make such a program available. I will not labour this point because the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), a practising medical doctor who understands the situation well from his daily practice of medicine, outlined it to the house very fully and thoroughly.

All we have to do is to go into the rural area of any riding and see whether they have a country doctor ministering to them. One would be surprised to find that many villages lack a medical doctor. One does not exaggerate when he refers to the great difficulty of obtaining a room in the hospital these days. Hospitals are crowded beyond description, and neither doctors nor medical facilities are available in sufficient numbers, to say nothing about the medical science and research in this field which are badly needed. I shall not dwell upon this aspect of the matter, because this subject has been well covered in the debate.

My fourth point is that I feel this bill, if instituted, would be very discriminatory. As I said before, the title refers to the cost of insured medical services. I maintain that the word "medical" should be changed to "health" because medical care services includes only those practising medicine. What about optometrists, ophthamologists, chiropractors, osteopaths, physiotherapists, psychologists and dentists? All these people have spent years, at great cost, training themselves.

I understand it takes four years for an optometrist to learn his profession. There are around 1,500 of them in Canada, and only about 300 ophthalmologists. We therefore cannot say to an optometrist, a chiropractor or an osteopath: "You do not come into this plan because you do not qualify" because it will put these people entirely out of business.

I am sure each member has received representations on this subject. I should like to refer to a letter I received from an optometrist. It refers to clause 2 of the bill which outlines the terminology of "insured services", and as I mentioned leaves out all these people. The letter reads in part:

[Mr. Hales.]

• (7:20 p.m.)

> If the definition "medical practitioner" was amended to include optometrists, opthalmologists, chiropractors, osteopaths, physiotherapists, psychologists and dentists, for the purpose of this act the discriminatory aspect of this act would be removed.
> It is unthinkable that the Canadian parliament would contemplate legislating any group of fellow Canadians out of business.
> During that period 1939-1945 when the very existence of our nation was in jeopardy, optometrists served in all branches of the services. Some gave their lives, some were wounded and maimed, some merely gave up years of their lives —willingly and voluntarily in the war to "defend democracy."
> Does this act, as it now reads, "defend democracy"?

I think he has put it in a rather forthright manner. This bill is discriminatory toward private enterprise. We have the Wellington Co-op Health Plan in my own riding which is serving the community very well and efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will be voting on this amendment which is before the house, an amendment which is carefully worded so that it will secure the endorsation of all members in the house. The first part of the amendment refers to the co-operation of all provinces. I do not believe there is a member in this house who does not think we should co-operate with the provinces. Indeed, if we are going to have this great country of Canada develop the way we would like it to develop, we must have the co-operation of all provinces. This bill will not be satisfactory unless it recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by individuals.

I know our good friends down in the corner, the New Democratic Party, might find this rather difficult to get around when it comes to voting for the amendment. However I would remind them that the present plan violates a fundamental principle of a free society, namely the freedom of choice a citizen may exercise in matters relating to his own or his family's welfare. I am sure these members believe in that principle. I hope therefore that they will not fail to vote with us when the division is called on this amendment.

The amendment would make provision also for those who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services now. This is something that is very important, and it is in the amendment. I was surprised the other day—as a matter of fact it was on October 13—when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, as reported at page 8620 of Hansard:

> Second, this is a sad day because the action of the government in proposing the postponement of medicare for a year is a discrimination against the needs of the people in this country, particularly their medical needs, and I refer particularly to those people who cannot afford the medical care they require.

The needs of these people are taken care of by those provinces which have medicare. Those who cannot afford medical care should be looked after by the provinces. We say that, rather than wait for two years to implement this legislation, these people should be provided for immediately. I am sure hon. members of the New Democratic Party will not find any embarrassment whatever in voting for an amendment such as we have before us now.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I must conclude, and I can think of no better way of doing so than by putting on the record these few lines which are attributed to Abraham Lincoln. We should take them as representing the viewpoint of this house for a good many years to come.

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer . . .
> You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money. You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you can earn.
> You cannot build character and courage by taking away men's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves.

So, I would give this warning to hon. members of this house, and to others: Let us beware of being sheep.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are now studying a motion for second reading of a bill providing for the payment of the contribution by the federal government towards the cost of insured medical services.

Mr. Speaker, under the B.N.A. Act the field of health falls under provincial jurisdiction. Today, the federal government seems to want to meddle with another matter which is a provincial responsibility. It is very easy for it to do so, since the federal government levies the greater portion of taxes in Canada. It is richer and, therefore, can afford to do more. As if might were right.

Mr. Speaker, if nine provinces in Canada prefer to have a medicare program governed, administered and paid for by the federal government, I for one will not object to their wishes. If they want a federal plan well, let them have it and let Ottawa find a way to implement a federal medicare plan for the nine other provinces. But Quebec does not seem to want to participate in this federal medicare plan, and it has the right to refuse. The present Quebec premier and the minister of health have both stated that they would not submit to the terms of the proposed plan as it now stands. On another occasion, the premier of Quebec said that Quebec would have its own medicare plan.

And I will be the first to support him in this regard, if he really wants Quebec to develop its own medicare plan, since this responsibility lies with Quebec and not Ottawa. Besides, on page 8, clause 8 of the bill to come before the house, we read the following:

> At least six months before the 31st day of March, 1972, the government of Canada shall review the provisions of this act respecting the amount and manner of payment of the contributions payable by Canada pursuant to section 3 with a view to formulating proposals for any changes therein that appear then to be necessary or desirable with respect to the amount and manner of payment, whether by the transfer or allocation of specified tax revenues by Canada and the making of equalization payments and other fiscal adjustments by Canada in lieu of the contributions that would otherwise be payable pursuant to section 3 or in any other manner, of the contributions to be paid by Canada pursuant to this act for years commencing after that day.

Mr. Speaker, this means that, if a provincial government refuses to take part in the federal medicare plan or wishes to develop its own medicare plan, ignoring the conditions stipulated in Bill No. C-227, then, in these circumstances this province or these provinces must pay the same taxes as other Canadian provinces, but they do not in any way benefit from the advantages of the federal medicare plan, and if these provinces have their own medicare plan, they are forced into levying a second tax in order to develop their own medicare plan.

This was also the case with the hospitalization insurance bill which was passed here, in the house, in 1957, if I remember right. The province of Quebec did not participate in the hospital insurance plan until 1961. During four years, therefore, the Quebec people, like all other Canadian citizens, paid taxes which were collected by the federal government for distribution in nine provinces under the hospital insurance scheme. The province of Quebec did not receive anything, but kept on paying. Exactly the same thing is happening today with regard to medicare.

If Quebec decides to set up its own medicare plan, it will pay taxes to Ottawa which will be distributed in the nine other provinces to help them establish a medicare plan, and if Quebec wants to set up its own plan, it will have to subject its citizens to double taxation.

• (7:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is illogical and unfair toward the Quebec people.

As I was saying earlier, I am not against the nine other provinces setting up their own centralized medicare plan, but I object to the province of Quebec being taxed in order to provide the other provinces with medicare. If the other provinces want such an insurance plan, let them stop taking money away from Quebec and let them seek within their own boundaries the necessary funds to finance their own medicare plan.

Such joint plans have been set up on several occasions: the technical training and trade schools assistance plan, the hospital insurance plan, the trans-Canada highway building project. The province of Quebec paid its tax share, but obtained nothing in return, because it wanted to adhere to the Canadian constitution which provided that the Quebec government and not the federal government is responsible for education, health and roads.

Mr. Speaker, if I object to that bill, it is not because I want to deprive the nine other provinces of what they are seeking. Not at all. If I object thereto it is because the legislation does not provide and the minister cannot provide for the provinces which do not wish to take part in a federal medical scheme and would rather set up their own.

There are in the house some Quebec members. They know quite well that if the province of Quebec does not take part in this scheme, it will pay taxes from which it will derive no benefit, but which will be allotted to other provinces.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): And what about fiscal compensations?

Mr. Grégoire: Well, the fiscal compensation, under clause 8 of Bill No. C-227, cannot come into force before March 31, 1972, as seen on page 8 of the bill.

I have just read it, I read this clause in full a while ago, and no fiscal compensation shall be paid before March 31, 1972, even if a province does not participate in this plan. Let us have some clarification.

Mr. Choquette: This can be improved.

Mr. Grégoire: It can be improved? Well, if the hon. member for Lotbinière says: "It can be improved", let him rise and make it binding upon the minister to improve the matter—

Mr. Choquette: I am just a private member.

Mr. Grégoire: —or let him move an amendment. Can the minister then clarify the situation? I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen)—I am not quite sure whether the minister now has his earpiece on to hear the interpretation—whether he proposes to amend clause 8 of the bill, so that, if a province refuses to participate in the plan, as soon as it comes into force, such province should get fiscal compensation? Could the minister answer yes or no whether it is his intention to move an amendment? I see the minister shaking his head. Now, this is the strongest denial thrown in the very face of the hon. member for Lotbinière, from his own minister. Therefore, if Quebec refuses to participate in the plan prior to 1972, it will pay without getting any fiscal compensation in exchange. What are Quebec members going to do?

Mr. Choquette: The future will prove the contrary.

Mr. Grégoire: Then they may as well call the Minister of National Health and Welfare a liar.

Mr. Speaker, the minister who is responsible, who has much more responsibilities than the hon. member for Lotbinière, has just stated that there will not be any change. Over four or five years, Quebec will pay taxes without getting anything in exchange, if it should decide not to participate in the plan. And I urge Quebec not to take part in this plan and to develop its own medicare plan.

Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances and in view of the unbending attitude of the minister, can a member from Quebec in all conscience vote for such a bill? I say no. The premier of Quebec asked all the federal members of Parliament from Quebec to unite in protesting against the unwarranted interference of the federal government in fields which come under provincial jurisdiction, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all the Liberal, Conservative, Créditiste and independent members from Quebec should indeed unite against the interference of the federal government in a field over which it has no jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, some wonder why the people of Quebec are not satisfied. Well, here is striking proof of the intrusion and unwarranted interference of Ottawa in matters which are no concern of the central government.

And it not only interferes with something that is none of its business, but it also makes Quebec pay for it, so that other provinces will have their own medicare plan.

If the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet) has something to say, let him rise and say it.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Quebec East): A yacht bought in Toronto, by an independent leader in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, see how serious he is. I extremely regret that the province of Quebec should be so badly represented. When I look at the hon. member for Quebec East, I realize how poor, pitiful and small it is for a man, rising for the first time in three months or in a year, to say such a trifling thing. I think the hon. member had better remain seated, because—

Mr. Duquet: The hon. member is not often in the house, for he would know that we rise more often than that.

Mr. Grégoire: I believe I am here more often than the hon. member for Quebec East. I think the member for Quebec East had better remain seated and keep his mouth shut.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: But the government does not worry too much when it comes to introducing legislation such as this, for even their own members from Quebec, who sit on that side of the house, do not object, do not say a word. The remarks from the hon. member for Quebec East will appear in the record and people will then see the irrelevant remarks that were interjected. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think I have sufficiently substantiated my argument, with the confirmation given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to the effect that the province of Quebec will be paying during four years for a plan that will bring it nothing.

Mr. Speaker, this is a glaring breach of the Canadian constitution and the first to violate it is still the federal government. In view of the fact that the taxes collected in Quebec are so badly used by the federal government, I hope the Quebec government will stand firm on its request that direct taxation, that is personal and corporate income tax and succession duties, be returned to Quebec. Then a little less of our money would be used to pay the cost of the medicare plans in the other provinces.

Mr. Choquette: But what you are advocating now is Mr. Johnson's formula. You are advocating the return of direct taxation to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to both hon. members that this is not the right time for a debate between the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). The hon. member for Lapointe has the floor now and he should continue his speech.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I find that there is nothing wrong with the question and I think that the hon. member can ask it.

Mr. Choquette: When he advocates the return of direct taxation, is he asking for the present quota or advocating the return of direct taxation itself to the provinces? In other words, the federal government would no longer have the right to exercise that right which is its own under the constitution, namely to levy an income tax.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that my objective goes further than that. I feel that the whole field of direct and indirect taxation should be given back to the province of Quebec.

I support the present premier's request for direct taxation only because half a loaf is better than none and we must not refuse any improvement. I feel that the return to Quebec of all direct taxation is an improvement over the present situation because the present situation allows Ottawa to levy taxes anywhere in Canada but give them back to some provinces but not to others. And that is what is going to happen with regard to bill No. C-227 on medicare. If Quebec collected all its taxes, I would say to the other provinces: If you want centralized medicare, go ahead, those are your taxes, this is your money. But in the present case it will be our money which will be used to pay for medicare in the other provinces.

• (7:40 p.m.)

And nobody protests against that, not even those from Ontario. If I were in their place, if I were a member of another province, I would be embarrassed to see that taxes are collected in the province of Quebec to pay for me. One could wonder after that: what do you want exactly? What we want? We want to keep what belongs to us.

Now, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is just doing the opposite. If he provided in his bill that, in the event a province, as it is entitled to according to the constitution, rejected interference by the federal government in the field of health, it could recover, as a fiscal equivalence, the amount which it would not recover by refusing to participate in medicare, then I would not object to the bill at all. I would say to the other provinces: You want it, take it.

Now, I object because no formula is provided enabling Quebec not to take part in the plan, but to enjoy a fiscal equivalence so that it can develop its own plan. Is that asking too much, Mr. Speaker? I do not think so.

Mr. Choquette: That was done for the pension plan and that can be done for medicare.

Mr. Grégoire: But it is not provided for; the opposite is provided for in that bill. Before criticizing the bill, I asked the minister: "Is the minister ready to amend section 8 to provide for a formula enabling a province to recover the amount involved, otherwise if it does not want to take part in medicare?

And the minister answered categorically: No, nothing is provided for that. To know what is provided for now, the member has only to read section 8 where it can be seen that before March 31, 1972, provinces which do not participate in medicare will not be entitled to any fiscal adjustments; that is what is provided for.

Yet we do not ask for the impossible; it is not something illogical, irrational. We simply ask that a province refusing federal interference in the field of health can receive a fiscal equivalence so that it would not have to pay taxes twice, or pay taxes for other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, that is the point I wanted to raise during the debate on second reading of Bill No. C-227. I want to add that if I vote against the principle of the bill, it is not to prevent other provinces from having a centralized medicare plan, if they want to. No, it simply is because the bill forces Quebec to participate in the plan or else lose a considerable amount of money and pay double taxes. This becomes discrimination, especially since health has always been a field under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, seeing the federal government act like this now, in 1966, one realizes beyond doubt that if the Canadian confederation can no longer continue as such, it is first and foremost the fault of the federal government which has always violated it as much as possible. The federal government does not seek to correct its mistakes. Even today, in 1966, it is trying to violate the Canadian constitution. Those responsible for the destruction of the Canadian confederation will not be the people of Quebec, but the federal government which will have infringed on the rights of the provinces.

Therefore, hear this: the real responsibility lies with the federal government and not with the province of Quebec.

This province reacts to the intrusion and interference of the federal government.

Mr. Choquette: Will the hon. member agree that there are nevertheless matters of national urgency which allow the federal government to take some action, permissible under the constitution itself? I feel that the hon. member is much too radical in his interpretation of the constitution.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, this is another good question. If there is any national urgency, let the federal government institute medicare. On the other hand, if there are nine provinces which want it as is, let the program operate for those nine provinces. But as Quebec also intends to establish a medicare plan, but her very own, well, let the federal government establish a clause providing that any province, or at least the province of Quebec, if the other nine provinces are satisfied, may draw some fiscal compensation for its own medicare plan; then, should not this meet the situation of national urgency as concerns medicare? Yes, it would, completely, and without the slightest doubt, since the ten provinces will have their medicare plan, in nine instances administered by Ottawa and in the tenth, administered by Quebec, as is the case at present regarding the pension scheme and others that were in the past joint programs and are today separate. This is our request: that the federal government have a plan for nine provinces, which is perfect, if the federal government wants interfere in that field for the nine other provinces. But, at least, let the province of Quebec free to reject this intrusion and interference. There is no—

Mr. Racine: Can the hon. member for Lapointe tell us this, since he knows all about matters of provincial jurisdiction: provided the nine other provinces had medicare through federal channels, whether the province of Quebec would be prepared to grant the same social legislation to its citizens?

Mr. Grégoire: Actually, before the medicare plan comes into effect at the same time in the nine other provinces and in Quebec, we shall have to wait until July 1, 1968.

I think that it would be a good idea to get also some explanations from the Quebec government. I think that Quebec should also make known its priorities; I am not here to defend the opinions of the Quebec government in office at the present time. However, I believe that questions will be put to the Quebec government and that it might even be advisable to ask some in order to know when it will set up its own medicare program. However, I believe that Quebec must be assured of a fiscal equalization the day it would want to set up its own medicare program. We are asking for just that. This is not provided in the bill and the minister does not want to include it. This is why I object to the principle of that bill. And I do so on the ground that it is another interference, and because we do not want anymore the federal government to keep on interfering in matters such as those. Besides, we want Quebec to be the master of its own taxation so as to be able to administer its plan according to its wishes and its distinctive characteristics. That has always been denied by the federal government.

In conclusion, I should like to say today that instead of gradually improving in Ottawa, at least provides me, since I have openly declared myself for the independence of Quebec, with the best argument to the effect that instead of gradually improving in Ottawa, things are worsening. This debate provides me with the best argument to show my Quebec fellow-citizens that Ottawa is not only unwilling to understand, but that it is getting more involved in centralization, in the taking over of Quebec powers and privileges, and in the control of all the fields reserved up to now to the Quebec jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, this further argument will allow me to show the people of Quebec that Quebec has only one solution and only one choice to make: to become independent.

• (7:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): We have before us in this legislation what has been described as one of the most important measures to come before parliament for some time. We in the New Democratic Party have already indicated our basic agreement with the plan, subject to some reservations which were outlined earlier by our leader and which he elaborated in the debate which is to follow.

It is not my intention at this stage to go into the technical aspects of the bill. This will be done by others who will follow me. I am more interested in the change which has been made in the commencement date and the reasons advanced for such a change, together with the interesting light this casts on the sincerity of the minister, his colleagues in the cabinet and all those backbenchers who misled the country in the last election and who, by their actions now, have betrayed the promises they made.

It is unnecessary to say anything further about the need for medicare in this country. The Hall Commission adequately set out the need for this type of service. Nobody in the house has denied that there is a necessity for a plan of this kind. Some members of the Conservative opposition—it would appear from what has been said that the Conservative party is opposed to medicare—have raised the question of the cost of the scheme, and suggested we cannot have it because it will be too costly. I suggest to them that they re-read the Hall Commission report which establishes the cost of the plan, sets out the means by which it can be financed and makes the point that Canada is more than able to afford it.

Then again, Conservative critics of the bill are failing to look at the other side of the coin, which is the cost of sickness to Canada. For example, it is estimated that in 1963, the latest for which statistics are available, 100 million man days of labour were lost to our labour force through illness, with a consequent economic loss of $1,630 million or 3.8 per cent of our gross national product for one year.

All this sickness could not, of course, have been prevented by medicare, but these figures do indicate the tremendous economic loss which Canada suffers because we do not have an adequate medicare scheme operating in this country. This is not because we have not waited for it. The party presently in office has dangled medicare before the electorate for about 47 years. And now, of course, the legislation has been brought in, but its operation has been postponed for another year.

It is interesting to learn that postponement was not supported by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). Indeed, with the clairvoyance which only Peter was given to possess, we were told in great detail of the anguished conversations which took place in the Chateau Laurier, of threats of resignation on all sides, of luncheons and cajoling by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to persuade the Minister of National Health and Welfare not to resign.

Mr. MacEachen: Fiction.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I thought for a moment he might be "doing a Marchand". The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) has not resigned this week, but it is still early in the week and we may yet hear one of his weekly threats to resign because something has happened that he does not like. It is becoming boring, now, though no doubt the charade will be repeated within the next few weeks.

The reason originally given for the postponement of this scheme was that we could not have it because of inflation. This was greeted by a roar of derision from coast to coast, because it is obvious that if we are trying to deal with inflation today we add nothing by postponing a scheme on which we are not going to spend any money until next July at any event. That reason did not last very long. Indeed, as my hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) suggested, if we accept the philosophy of this government we will never get medicare, because when we are in a small recession we cannot have medicare because we have to get the country rolling; and now, when members opposite claim they have got the country rolling, we are apparently so prosperous that we cannot have medicare because it would damage the economy.

No matter which way you go, you cannot win with the Liberal party. I sometimes wonder just how gullible the Liberals think the people of Canada are. I notice the Minister of National Health and Welfare is smiling and nodding his head. He obviously believes they are able to absorb a great deal more of the hokum they have been getting from this government.

As I said, the reason initially given for postponement was greeted with a roar of derision from coast to coast. In a way, it is amusing, the manner in which the Liberal party has played around with this scheme over the years. But there is a more serious side to it. I am bound to think back to the period of the last election. I will not put on record all the commitments which were made but those of us who were here in 1962 and 1963 will remember the great debate we had about nuclear arms. I remember the pontifical way in which one minister after another got up to say: We must honour our commitments; the Liberal party always honours its commitments; the government is committed to nuclear arms and we must honour our commitment, above all. We heard this for days and days. It is a pathological obsession with the Liberal party that they honour their commitments—when it suits their purpose.

Well, in the last election campaign they made a pretty strong commitment. I have an article here from the Toronto Daily Star of September 23, 1965. The heading is: "Medicare by July 1, 1967, Hellyer tells Scarboro". The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) was attending a meeting at which the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) was nominated. This was a positive commitment by the hon. member for Trinity and, incidentally, the hon. member for York-Scarborough made a similar commitment. It was received, we learn, with standing ovations. Then, of course, the Prime Minister went up and down the country telling people that we would have medicare in Canada by July 1, 1967.

The then minister of national health and welfare, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh), went so far as to say everything was fixed, there were no problems, no hurdles, that this Liberal government had cleared away all obstructions and there was no reason in the world why we could not have medicare by July 1, 1966.

An hon. Member: That was L.S.D.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): An hon. member suggests that L.S.D. was involved. I do not want to make any such allegation, but the hon. member will be speaking shortly and he can elucidate further on that particular point of view. But, Mr. Speaker, member after member after member, candidate after candidate after candidate on behalf of the Liberal party trotted all over the country telling the people they were going to have medicare by July 1, 1967. Never was there a commitment more solemnly, more concretely made, and never was there a commitment more quickly jettisoned after the election was over.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein) says some of us on this side of the house would be happy if medicare does not go into effect. That is the most spurious statement I have heard since the last spurious statement was made. We on this side of the house were pleading with the government before the recess last July not to recess the house but to stay on and pass the medicare bill. But they did not listen. They decided to recess and deal with it in the fall. Of course in the meantime the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) got his finger into the pie and great changes took place. And as soon as the announcement was made by that minister, then of course we really had a reaction.

We heard a roar of dissent from the Liberal members themselves, and everywhere one went and talked to members of the Liberal party they were saying, "Don't worry, we are not going to accept this. We, the young Liberals; we, the people of reform; we, the aggressive reformers in the Liberal party, who are its real strength and power—we are going to go down to Ottawa and face Mr. Sharp and that bunch of rightwingers who want to kill medicare."

They told me this in Toronto. Then of course we had the famous Peterborough scene, where we had all the real reformers, the people who were going to change the face of Canada, the leftists, and they were going to tell Mr. Sharp and everybody else off, everybody who was going to kill medicare. They said they were coming to Ottawa to the big Liberal convention to reverse this.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we had the charge of the bright brigade. They came charging down to Ottawa to the great Liberal convention. And what happened? They lay down like a bunch of dead dogs and rolled over, and stared in hollow-eyed admiration while the Minister of Finance crammed his decision down their throats. And when it was over they came out and said they got what they wanted. They got it all right, Mr. Speaker, but it was not what they wanted.

At that meeting they also had that other great proponent of Liberal reform, Andrew Thompson, and his story is even more tragic.

Mr. Fairweather: Who is he?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Is he forgotten already? He campaigned all over Ontario on this. He said this was a Liberal party commitment, and Liberals honour their commitments. He said, "I am going to head the charge of the light brigade. I am going to head off to Ottawa and reassure that the Liberal party reverses its decision." We all know what happened, Mr. Speaker. The gore was running a foot thick out of his back by the time the votes were in, and he went back to Ontario with his tail between his legs.

What I am trying to say, perhaps imperfectly, is that this is a test for all these bright young Liberal reformers who talk behind curtains month after month and tell us in the corridors, "We are the reformers, the left thinkers in this House of Commons. You are just a bunch of do-gooders over there. We are not all going to accept these decisions by the government. We are going to stand up and tell them off in caucus, and reverse these decisions that are wrong."

But what happens inside the chamber? Nobody gets up. Neither the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) nor my own member of parliament from York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury)—as a matter of fact I am one of his constituents because I live in his riding—has spoken. I am now telling my member of parliament that he broke his promise, and if he persists I might not be able to vote for him next time. We want to hear from all these reform-minded Liberals whose reform stops at the curtain.

I say to them: This is your test, you talk all the time outside the chamber, let us see you get up on your feet here and repeat the things you whisper out in the corridors. Now they tell us, "Don't worry, opposition, because we now have a commitment that will give us medicare on July 1, 1968, and this commitment we won't change. This is a firm commitment. This commitment we won't back down on. The other commitment, "which was as firm as anything could hope to be," was jettisoned because the Minister of Finance did not like it. But now the date is July 1, 1968, and you don't have to worry, because you will have it."

I suggest that the commitment for July 1, 1968, is absolutely worthless. So far as I am concerned no commitment of this government will ever again be worth anything until it is translated into legislation. Then we will believe them. But I would make a wager now that we will not have medicare in 1968. In fact we will not have medicare by 1970, not necessarily because we cannot train people, and not because we cannot find the help. We will not have medicare because the establishment, which really rules the Liberal party of this country, does not believe in it and does not want it, and all the hot air from all the young eagle-eyed reformers is not going to change that. But we will wait and we will listen, and we will hear what happens.

We can think about the uncomfortable position of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). I extend him my deepest sympathy for the embarrassing position in which he finds himself. I can think back to how he introduced first reading of this bill, the eulogistic cries, the booming voice, the waving arms, introducing the greatest social measure in the history of Canada. Joy reigned supreme among the Liberal backbenchers. They thumped their desks and the house shook with the roar.

What a difference from his speech on second reading—sneaking into the house, making an apologetic, quiet restrained statement, slipping the bill before the house shamefaced and embarrassed. I can think of all the things the minister has said to us about medicare, and the firm commitment that it was going to go through. In the light of that, I think if he had any guts he would have resigned. If he had resigned he would have won the universal respect of the members of the house, and he would be well on his way to being the main contender for the leadership of his party, because he would have rallied around him all these so-called reformers.

But the minister did not do that. He swallowed the pill, and now we have this thing that is before us.

Mr. Fairweather: He would have had Andy Thompson with him.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I am not sure that would be any great advantage at the moment.

The other minister we want to hear from is the Minister of Finance, and we are also entitled to hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). They should come into this debate and tell us why they are betraying their commitment to the Canadian public. After all, Mr. Speaker, it was the Prime Minister who made the commitment. He was the one who told Canadians they would have medicare by July 1, 1967. It was not the Minister of National Health and Welfare who changed that; it was the Minister of Finance who changed it.

Therefore we are entitled to have both these gentlemen come into the house and explain why this change has been brought about—and I do not mean the nonsense we have heard about inflation, because the postponement is not an anti-inflationary thing. Neither do we want the story that they have to prove their good faith to the business community. The business community knows where this government stands and is not worried about that at all. We are entitled to a proper explanation why this great social change has been denied to the people of this country.

In a sense, Mr. Speaker, it is symptomatic of the Liberal party which always has posed as a party of great reform; yet, what kind of a Liberal party is it, what kind of a reform party is it when, whenever it thinks something has to be done about its so-called inflation, the two things that are affected are the national medical health scheme, and research and education aid? What a travesty of a reform party that is. But where business is concerned, that is a different matter. When they want to cut down the amount of money in the economy they let business prepay some $350 million into the treasury. And then what do they do? They do not keep it; they are only going to hold it for 18 months and give it back to business with 5 per cent interest. That is a real progressive reform-minded party.

We saw again the great Liberal party in our discussions about the automobile trade parts agreement, where dislocation was brought about by government action, and where the people who paid for that were the workers. You bled their futures to pay for dislocation brought about by government trade policies. We are seeing this in the research field, where Canada is starving for research money. It is not just money these people want in the form of salary. Our country is starved for research in almost every conceivable field, and the great reformers are urging a cut-back in the name of inflation.

I think about hospital beds. When I came here in 1962 I, and most of the population, had been pleading that the government wake up to its responsibility in the field of hospital beds. We have been pointing out that it costs approximately $30,000 to furnish a bed in our metropolitan centres, and we get $5,500 from the province and a lousy, measly $2,000 from the federal government. The rest we have to raise by public subscription in our municipalities. The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) well knows the desperate shortage in our area. I am sure he has made representations; I am not suggesting he has not. This is just another symptom of the phony progressive Liberal party in this country. The whole medicare thing is symptomatic of it.

Who is being asked to bear the brunt of this? Not the rich and powerful, not the wealthy, not the "haves". You are asking this of the little people, the sick, those who cannot afford help but who desperately need it. They cry out to us in letters all the time saying that they are bankrupt, and are looking to us for help and aid. These are the people on whom you are putting the screws.

As I say, it is a bitter, sad, shoddy affair from beginning to end. I know how hon. members over there like to sit, laugh and pound desks when the opposition makes a plea of this kind. I do not really expect them to have a change of heart over there because of what has been said in this debate. I do not expect that anything I say will change their views: But I want to promise that we are not going to forgive and are not going to forget your betrayal of the people of this country. You can laugh or pound your desks all you like, but we are going to go out in the country, travel the length and breadth of the country, and expose this Liberal party, this pseudo-party of reform, for the sham and facade that it really is.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to follow the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), not because I can agree with everything he said, but because I am delighted he did say it. As a matter of fact he reminded me of a very auspicious event. One night about the beginning of September, when I was driving down Peterborough, taking my boy to school, I saw very strange portents and omens. The sky had a luminous quality. There seemed to be stars which had never been there before; other stars were falling, and there was a rumbling of strange noises. I thought something indeed must have happened. Later on that night I heard on the radio that there was something unusual—a Liberal revolt. I thought, good; it is about time the Liberal party had a revolt, not only because it is some years since they had one, but because they have so much to revolt about. I thought if ever there was a chance for a political party to revolt, here was the moment. I thought, as the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) said tonight, that we would have speaker after speaker standing up expounding views on the necessity for doing something. I thought that the grass was going to overtake the brass; but we have not had it. Somewhere, somehow, there must have been a reconciliation or some strange change in the views of those who attended this historic conference.

The hon. member for Danforth spoke about the bright brigade. I suppose you could call it that, but I think the bright brigade at the Liberal convention had Sharp to the right of them and MacEachen to the left of them. This might explain the change of mind.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke extensively at the resolution stage, so my remarks tonight will be very limited. At the resolution stage I did propose an amendment which was ruled out of order. I do not intend to renew it, but I do want to mention it briefly, because I thought I made a very logical suggestion to the government at that time and they now may be able to take advantage of it. I suggested that this proposal, together with a variety of other proposals dealing with welfare and development in the country, might well be referred to the Economic Council of Canada so that there might be a careful appraisal of the economic consequences, the possibilities and the needs and so that priorities might be assessed and evaluated, and recommendations made.

Objection was taken at that time on the ground that the government cannot, of course, abdicate its responsibility. And I understand well that it cannot. But, Mr. Speaker, that was never my suggestion. It did seem to me, however, that because of the confusion, the doubt, and the obscurity which had been engendered that an objective, honest, non-political view and approach to all these matters might well be better. The result could be made known to the House of Commons and to the government. It is not that this would be accepted; quite properly of course this could not be the case, but the benefit of a study in depth of this kind could be made available so that the House of Commons, the country and the government might have the advantage of it.

This was my view. At this time, now that it appears there is going to be some serious delay between the time this bill receives second reading, is ultimately passed, and the time the program comes into effect, I only hope that this might in fact be done so that parliament, the government, and the country might have the benefit of the views of this body. I do not agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), who says there is an inflationary aspect to the delay. Merely because the coming into effect of a program of this kind is going to be delayed for 20 months rather than eight months, with a possibility that the moneys which will be required to pay for this program will not be reflected in the tax structure until the year afterward cannot, I think, be accepted as a valid reason or excuse for delaying the implementation of such a program as this which parliament may ultimately pass. However, if there is to be this delay I suggest that the minister and the government might well give consideration to the proposal I made.

Some suggestion was made about the reference of this bill to a committee after second reading. I note that while the minister in response to a question said this would not be done, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon rather indicated that the bill might be referred to a committee. I have in mind however that the Prime Minister probably was not giving his attention to it and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in his statement that there would not be a reference to a committee, was indicating what would happen.

I felt initially that reference of the bill to a committee was desirable. It is true enough that hon. members to my left have pointed out that this issue has been discussed exhaustively be a royal commission which made a complete and detailed study, and whose report is a persuasive and enlightening document. I do not necessarily accept all that is in the report, but it certainly has made a notable contribution to the social writings and philosophy of our country. But despite that, as a matter of principle it has been my view that at no time is it possible for parliament to substitute for its judgment the judgment of a royal commission. The terms of reference of a royal commission, the evidence, report and recommendations are useful and valuable material from which we can reach our own opinions, give our own judgment and assess the negative and positive values of any particular program; but I think it must be laid down as a principle that it is quite wrong to say that merely because the matter has been considered by a royal commission which has made a report, and a good one, we must accept that report in its complete finality.

My views as to the necessity of bringing this matter before a committee have been changed since that time. We have heard in this house a statement by a responsible minister which leads me to question the virtues of the committees system, as we have been experimenting with it this year and last year. I refer to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), in another context, that departmental witnesses appearing before a committee only do so with the consent of the minister, and their evidence must be limited to the views of the department in question.

Mr. Woolliams: You mean tampered with.

Mr. Baldwin: This is a serious position. This is a very grave challenge to the value and virtue of the committees system. So long as it persists, and until such time as it has been clarified and a statement made on behalf of the government, I am reluctant to waste the time of this house by referring to any committee any matter of any consequence. Surely we are entitled to have and to demand that any witness, no matter whether he be a departmental witness, a serving officer or one who has retired, must be allowed to give evidence when subpoenaed, and his evidence must be uninhibited—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: —untrammelled and free from undue influence or pressure of any kind. Until that situation has been clarified I suggest that it is a complete waste of time for this house to refer any matter to any committee.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Baldwin: Some mention has been made of the Hall Commission report. As I said, I have read it almost in its entirety and I have refreshed my memory by reading it through lately. I should like to put one or two aspects of it before the minister now, so that when he comes to close this debate he can, if he sees fit, refer to them. In the first instance I would refer the minister to recommendation 194 on page 88 of the report. I think this recommendation is a very sensible and salutary one. It is as follows:

> That taxes collected by the federal government to pay for the expanded health services program be identified in such a manner as to make it clear to the taxpayer that the taxes paid cover the health service benefits made available to him.

It seems to me this is plain, simple and sensible. In the past there has been a great deal of intellectual dishonesty and economic nonsense spoken about various programs of this kind. People have been deceived and beguiled, for political purposes, into believing that they can secure certain benefits without paying any compensating cost, either the immediate and direct cost or the indirect cost which is implied in the program. In many instances it is quite likely that the people directly concerned or as a whole would have accepted the cost, knowing what the program is going to do; but I think it is only fair, proper and equitable that when the government proposes measures such as this, or any similar measure or enactment they should set out wherever possible the precise cost involved.

This is what the Hall Commission recommends. It may well be that the minister feels such a provision cannot be incorporated in the legislation. This may be a matter of budgetary consideration that the Minister on Finance (Mr. Sharp) may in due course see fit to implement. However, I draw it to the attention of the minister, and hope that before the debate is concluded he will indicate that this matter will receive the attention of the government.

The other point I wish to bring to the attention of the house has also been raised by other members, most recently by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). It appears—heaven forbid—that I must agree with the hon. member for Lapointe on this particular issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baldwin: In this connection I should like to refer to recommendation 199 of the Hall Commission report:

> That a federal-provincial conference be convened within six months of the tabling of volume I of this report:
> (a) to initiate the necessary planning and fiscal arrangements for the co-ordinated implementation of the program as a whole;
> (b) to reach agreement on the implementation of the health services program we have recommended.

I think this is repeated in the very first recommendation:

> That the federal government enter into agreements with the provinces to provide grants on a fiscal need formula—

The type of agreement envisaged there is not the type of agreement involved when a highwayman pulls out a pistol, points it at his victim and says, "Stand and deliver." That is an agreement of a kind, but it is not the type of agreement the Hall Commission had in mind. The agreement referred to in this recommendation is one reached before the fact, and not after.

It is notorious that the state of federal-provincial relations in this country has reached a delicate and sensitive period. In any federal system this is always the case; but it is particularly so in Canada, having in mind that federal-provincial relations today are compounded in their difficulty by a number of other situations, notably ethnic and language difficulties. At this time, surely in the name of heaven it is incumbent upon this government to exercise the utmost caution to proceed only when agreements have in fact been reached prior to the event, particularly in an area about which there can be absolutely no doubt that the jurisdiction lies completely within the scope of the provincial governments. I suggest that to proceed the way in which the government is proceeding is akin to the situation of a bull in a china shop. It cannot fail to have the effect of inflaming and aggravating the existing problems and difficulties between some of the provinces and the federal government. It is true it might have taken a little longer, it might have taken a number of conferences—I am not in a position to know exactly what the minister or his predecessor have done—but it does seem to me that it would not have been too high a price to pay to maintain an equilibrium in our provincial federal relations to comply with the explicit recommendations of the Hall Commission. I am afraid the course has been fixed. The government is determined to proceed, and when this has been completed there will be a greater degree of disruption between some of the provinces and the federal government, a situation which we can ill afford at this particular time.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I propose to support the amendment because I think it is a sensible one. If it is passed it will compel the federal government to seek out the provinces and to secure their individual and collective agreement to a type of program which is acceptable.

I think there is no doubt that in the not too distant future an agreement will be reached which will be acceptable to all governments and to the people of this country, because there is a need and a demand for a program providing health services for the people of this country. Second, it would compel the government to launch a program of research and training which is an absolute necessity and a condition precedent to the successful introduction, establishment and continuation of the measure which we all need and which, to a large extent, is covered by the Hall report. Finally, it would drive the government immediately—and I stress the word immediately—to turn its attention to the provision of medical health services for those people who at this time are really in urgent need of them, rather than to compel these people to wait for the stops and starts, the trials and errors as well as the political overtones which prompted the present bill and will remain with it for some time. I am supported in this last suggestion by a letter which came to my desk from the Canadian Medical Association and which indicates that a conference was to be held today with the minister and with the Prime Minister.

For all those reasons I suggest that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) is a very sensible and reasonable one, and merits the support of the members of this house.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say in favour of this amendment. I was glad to hear from my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that the government party have now finally been recognized as a revolting party. This evening we have been accused of being opposed to the principle of medicare. That I cannot accept. I think every hon. member in this house favours the principle of medicare and we all agree that health services should be available to all, as they are now to many citizens of Canada. Of course I think that our first concern should be for those people who cannot afford medicare, and this includes many of our older citizens. Some provinces already have medical schemes in operation and others are planning to bring their own in, while still others will require financial help from the federal government to start and maintain a medical care plan. For instance, my province of Alberta has a plan in operation which I am sure compares favourably with the plan of any province in Canada. It is not a compulsory plan and it allows free choice by the individual because private plans are available at competitive premiums. This plan provides in some cases lower premiums for the needy and the older citizens.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

The federal government should not force those provinces which already have plans of their own to change them, but other provinces should be brought up to the same level of medical care. I think the federal plan should be dovetailed into the existing provincial ones.

I should like to ask the real reason why the government's medical care plan was delayed. Was the date moved ahead to curb inflation, or was the reason for its delay the shortage of doctors and related personnel and the cost of the proposed scheme? Our first concern must be for the present shortage of hospital beds and for the overworked doctors. More doctors must be provided if this scheme is to provide adequate medical care. For example, medical care has been provided in Great Britain for 20 years and yet the people there are not too happy with their national health scheme. The shortage of doctors in Great Britain has become acute. We in this country also have a shortage of doctors which is becoming more and more obvious. Recently I saw in the press that there are now many small centres without general practitioners.

Is the shortage of doctors not caused to a large extent, as it is in Great Britain, by a drain of our doctors to other countries, in our case chiefly to the United States, and also by a lack of funds for medical research? Should we aggravate this situation by bringing in a compulsory national medical scheme without adequate preparation?

If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would now like to refer to an omission in the present bill which was brought to my attention by a letter from a constituent. I will read an excerpt from the letter, which begins in this way:

> It has been brought to my attention that Bill C-227, a medical care act, discriminates against optometrists and their patients. Apparently there is also discrimination against other health professions which perform services which are also performed by physicians—
> It appears that if the act remains as is, our services are being included, but we as optometrists are cut out of the bill. This could seriously affect the livelihood of the 1,500 optometrists in Canada. I feel that if a service is included in the act, any practitioner who is legally and academically qualified to provide this service should be eligible to provide that service under the legislation.

He goes on to say:

> Statistics show that 65 per cent of your constituents who seek vision care, seek it from an optometrist.

There is no one else available there, Mr. Speaker. He then says:

> They would not longer have the traditional right of choice of practitioners unless they pay extra for the services of an optometrist.
> I feel that both optometry and ophthalmology must be included if the visual welfare of the nation is to be properly cared for.

I think this appeal deserves serious consideration.

I would also like to comment, if I may, on a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). I would like to read this statement but before I read it may I say that I agree with it wholeheartedly, and I think it is well said. The statement was made by the minister in a speech given by him to the Dental Association in Halifax on June 15 of this year. It reads as follows:

> Good health is a national goal and the federal government has a responsibility to initiate, encourage and support programs and safeguard the health of Canadians generally.

I agree that this is a field in which the federal government has a great responsibility; however, I would like to ask a question in connection with that statement. What example are we, as members of parliament, giving the citizens of Canada? I am speaking of the members in this chamber. What provision is made, for example, to keep our bodies trim? Surely, keeping fit enters the medical care question. I should like to ask, what facilities are provided on the hill? This is the question I have wanted to ask for a long time, Mr. Speaker. At the present time in this country we provide wonderful facilities for our school children, wonderful gymnasiums. There are many in my small city, and with this I agree heartily.

But I go on to point out that those children would exercise anyhow because in most cases they have the natural exuberance of youth. You could not hold them down if you tried. But what about our lack of facilities here? Is it due to an acute shortage of funds or to a fear of public opinion? Could we not even afford a ping-pong table to relieve some of the tensions built up by sitting for hours on end? In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I may say I obviously intend to support the amendment, which I hope will make the bill worthy of support.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) mentioned a letter which members have received from the Canadian Medical Association. This letter was addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and copies were sent to all members. I feel the Canadian Medical Association should get an "A" for effort. In the past, they put their efforts into opposing medical care altogether. Now that the general principle of medical care insurance has been accepted in this country, they seem to be putting their efforts into making the plan as innocuous as possible. I am surprised that they still make these efforts, after all the debate that has taken place in this country and the general acceptance of it by the population. I am surprised they make these efforts in view of evidence we have had from other countries that medical care plans work very well. We hear a great deal of criticism of the United Kingdom plan. I think much of the criticism is injustified. You can turn to other countries with medical care insurance plans in effect for much longer than the United Kingdom and find those plans working very well.

Even if you ignore the experience of other countries, one finds enough evidence here in Canada that a plan with universal coverage will work very well. The Saskatchewan plan has been in operation for nearly four years. Even many of the doctors who were opposed to that plan in 1962 recognize the value of the plan today. We had an exhaustive study made of medical care by the Hall Commission, a very complete study. It would seem to me that all of the possible objections which the Canadian Medical Association and other critics could have raised were answered by that very complete report of the Hall Commission. However, in spite of all this, we still get these letters from the Canadian Medical Association asking us, in effect, to introduce something less than a complete, comprehensive plan which would cover the whole of the population.

On page 2 of their letter to the Prime Minister, the association lists seven major criticisms of the plan as outlined in Bill No. C-227. The first objection is as follows:

> That the virtual compulsion contained in the bill restricts unnecessarily the individual rights of citizens to choose the insurance best suited for their needs;

This point was dealt with by the Hall Commission. They pointed out that the plan must have universal coverage in order to give Canadian citizens the best possible medical care for the lowest possible cost. The commission is speaking of health care based on a much wider type of coverage than is included in the private plans available in this country. For example, most plans in operation at the present time do not provide for psychiatric service. If they do, it is on a very limited basis. The Hall Commission report envisaged psychiatric coverage. This is a very important point because this can be a very expensive type of care for persons who have to receive it. The Hall Commission, therefore, did go to great lengths to explain why we had to have universal coverage.

The first objection in the letter from the Canadian Medical Association refers to the right of a citizen to choose the insurance best suited to his needs. There is a suggestion here that the private plans which are now in existence should remain in existence so that a citizen could pick and choose what he wants. This means you would have a great many insurance companies remaining in the field, and you simply could not get good health care at the lowest possible cost if you have all these companies in the field.

I should like to refer to an article which Mr. Justice Hall wrote, and which was published in the Winnipeg magazine Canadian Dimension for the months of March-April, 1965. I quote this from page 13:

> Why not many carriers?
> Now why not a multiplicity of carriers: because it would cost too much administratively. If one carrier is designated in each province, such as we felt could be done by some adjustments to the structure of Manitoba Medical, the annual saving would be in the order of approximately $180 million a year. In our opinion that was too much to pay for the luxury of having upwards of a hundred carriers in each province. It is either one carrier in each province, or all commercial carriers being recognized in each province. Otherwise, how could the selection be made? A free enterprise government in Australia rejected the use of commercial carriers because it would cost too much. The administrative costs of the hospitalization plan are approximately 5 per cent. The administrative cost of operating the Saskatchewan medicare program in 1963 was slightly less than 5 per cent. An average retention figure for acquisition costs, taxes, profits, etc. . . . by commercial carriers is approximately 27 per cent of the premium.

So, if you allow a plan to operate with a multiplicity of carriers you are going to have excessively high administrative costs. The people of Canada will not get the kind of health care they could get at the lowest possible cost. I note the point he made there that you could save $180 million, by having a single carrier in each province.

[Mr. Prittie.]

Now, point No. 2 in the Canadian Medical Association letter to the Prime Minister is as follows:

> That pressure has been exerted on provincial governments to curtail them in establishing their own health priorities, since they are required to introduce unnecessarily expensive programs when less expensive programs would suffice.

This leaves the suggestion that the type of program which would be introduced as a result of the implementation of this bill as originally drafted would be more expensive than other health plans which are now in operation. In any case, every provincial government should make health its first priority.

At a meeting which was held with the provinces to discuss this plan, it seems to me that the poorer provinces raised no particular objection. The Atlantic provinces, if I remember correctly, all agreed that they were ready to go ahead with this plan. Saskatchewan, which is in the middle ranks of the provinces so far as per capita income is concerned, has had a program in effect for several years. This leaves provinces such as Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta which could well afford this program. I suggest the government should go ahead, as the government did ten years ago with the hospital insurance plan. They should pass the bill to make the program available. If a province is ready it can come in; and if it is not, it can wait until it is ready to do so. I suggest that if the poorest provinces in Canada are ready to go ahead, the others can well afford to pay.

Now, another point raised in the Canadian Medical Association letter listing their major objections is as follows:

> That the underlying assumption that a government authority can administer an insurance program more efficiently and more economically than private programs operating on a non-profit basis has not been established, and we doubt its validity.

I suggest to you that it has been established, and I quoted earlier the case of Manitoba Medical. I noticed just this week a press report from my own province. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from Vancouver dated October 15 and reads:

> Medical Services Inc., a doctor-operated medical insurance scheme in British Columbia, announced Friday it will abandon the field of individual medical insurance because it can't compete with the B.C. government medical plan.
> About 7,500 individuals will be dropped from the M.S.I. plan when the change takes effect Nov. 30.

The British Columbia government did during the past two years eventually introduce a medical care program which was particularly designed to cover those persons in the province who were not already covered by doctor-sponsored programs. Obviously this plan is cheaper than the M.S.I. plan, which is now being dropped. But it is not as low in cost as it could be if this bill were passed and the province chose to participate. However, the plan which is in effect, imperfect as it may be, goes to prove that the government-sponsored plan does operate more cheaply than the doctor-sponsored plan, which is now withdrawing from the field.

Item six of the major objections of the C.M.A. is as follows:

> That a universal program will aggravate the existing shortage of medical and other health manpower, particularly in the field of general practice. The alleviation of these acute shortages should be given first priority in spending public funds.

We have heard this a great many times before, Mr. Speaker. It is the old argument which is raised—that we are not ready to do this. I suggest to you that if the Saskatchewan government nearly 20 years ago had not taken the initiative in the field of public hospital insurance, we would not have it yet in Canada. At that time there were not enough hospitals, or doctors and nurses and still today there are not enough almost everywhere in Canada.

I suggest once again that if the same government had not taken the initiative in instituting medical care insurance, we would not be discussing this bill today. There were not enough doctors in the province at the time and there are still not enough doctors in Canada. What country does have enough doctors?

I also suggest to hon. members that we do not stop the building of schools just because there are not enough teachers. These things have to be done. We do build schools and we do spend money to train more teachers. Some teachers come into the country as immigrants, and we get along as best we can. If we wait until there are enough hospitals, doctors, nurses, radiologists, technicians and all the rest of it, we will wait forever. We must proceed with what we have.

The ratio of doctors to the population of Canada is a great deal better than in other countries in Europe that have had medical care schemes in operation for a long time. Therefore the argument that there is a shortage of medical personnel has to be rejected.

In this connection we are making some progress. A year ago the government did announce health grants for medical schools. Much more needs to be done in this field, but this part of the Hall Commission's recommendations has to be taken into account and a start must be made. Let us not use this excuse that there are not enough doctors.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that not all of the horrible things that some people have said will happen in Canada will in fact occur. It has been stated that we will lose doctors as a result of the introduction of medical care. Once more if hon. members read the report of the Hall Commission carefully they will notice there is a close relationship between the income of doctors and recruitment to the medical profession. I am not suggesting that this is the only reason people go into the medical profession, not at all; but income is certainly an important factor and doctors in Canada are among the highest paid anywhere in the world.

With a medical insurance program which insures payment to the doctors, one can expect their income to go up; and I have no doubt that there will be enough young Canadians in the future who will be ready to serve in the medical profession whether or not we have medical care. However, this sort of plan and the certainty of payment which it will bring will help recruitment to our medical colleges.

As some other members have said, Mr. Speaker, we should not at this time be debating the merits of universal medical care. We have had enough debate on this subject. Enough study has been done on the question in Canada and it has already been put into practice in one province in this country. It has also been put into practice in other countries. I suppose really the government is not debating the problem either; we are now down to the question of the implementation of such a plan.

Before I leave the question of the Canadian Medical Association I want to raise one doubt which comes into my mind. The C.M.A. purports to speak for the doctors of Canada. This seems strange to me because I have spoken to a great many physicians at different times and in different provinces. Some of them support the C.M.A. official position on medical care, but many do not. I do not know whether these doctors are silent when conventions of the association are held, but I know from my own experience that there are many doctors in Canada who do not oppose the kind of medical care insurance suggested by the Hall Commission. So I really doubt whether the C.M.A. does speak for the whole profession when it makes these pronouncements.

In this debate we have heard a great deal about the year 1919, the year in which health insurance became a plank in the Liberal platform. The Liberal health insurance plank was born in the same year as I was. The baby born in 1919 is now getting on a little bit, has grey hairs and recently had to obtain some glasses. All the signs of physical deterioration which come about in the mid-forties are beginning to appear. In fact, I will be well over the hill, if this government is going to stay in power, before medical insurance is ever brought in in Canada. However, we can always live in hope.

An hon. Member: You won't live that long.

Mr. Prittie: Somebody says I will never live that long, Mr. Speaker, and that may be true.

There are two or three other members from whom I should like to hear before this debate is concluded, Mr. Speaker. Certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) should speak on a matter of this importance. The subject should commend itself to him, but particularly he should take the responsibility for helping to explain why this postponement in the implementation of the bill is being made.

I also think we should hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) because he is the man who has told us that there are economic reasons why medical care insurance should be postponed until 1968. However, I do not accept what he has said about this because he has not explained his reasons in very much detail. Some members of his own party do not accept what he has said. I heard the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) on television last night and he did not seem to accept it. So I think the Minister of Finance owes us an explanation in detail, with figures to back him up, as to why medical care insurance cannot be introduced into this country at the present time for economic reasons. If he does not do this during the debate on second reading, he should give us a thorough explanation of this point during the committee stage.

Mr. Orlikow: If he does not, it will not pass.

Mr. Prittie: There is, Mr. Speaker, another member of the house from whom I should like to hear on this subject, and this is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was while he was prime minister that Mr. Justice Hall and the other commissioners were appointed to make this study. When the Hall Commission report came out he praised it fulsomely. Therefore I should like to know whether the Leader of the Opposition is in full accord with the items in the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), because it seems to me that at least two of those items do not square with the recommendations of the Hall Commission.

I think that on a subject of this importance we should hear not only from the Prime Minister but also from the Leader of the Opposition. He is usually quite willing to give us his views on any number of subjects, and I think we should hear from him on this particular subject too, because it does seem to be in line with what he has said in the past.

The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, have been waiting a very long time for the implementation of the type of program that is in effect in practically all other western developed countries. There is no reason why we should have to wait any longer. We are told by the government that we must wait another year, but many of us will not be satisfied to let this debate come to a close either on second reading or in committee until the Minister of Finance has appeared and given the type of explanation we are entitled to have for the delay he is responsible for imposing upon us.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I think I can have some sympathy for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and for his charming parliamentary secretary. As a fellow maritimer I do feel sympathy, because they fully anticipated that this season of the year would bring their moment of triumph. But, after the handling they have received from the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his parliamentary secretary look as if they could stand some medicare themselves.

The minister sat around the Chateau Laurier in the company of misguided Canadians, who had nothing to do a few days ago, waiting for an opportunity to go front and centre, grab the football and seize the limelight, only to have it snatched away from him by the Minister of Finance. Even worse than that the Minister of Finance scored the touchdown against the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and all the time the Minister of National Health and Welfare thought they were playing on the same team. So one can be sympathetic.

I think the explanation given for the postponement of the medical care program, which has been a political football of its own kind for almost 50 years in Canada, is a cruel jest upon the poor people of Canada. Medicare is described as inflationary; yet what is inflationary about providing medical services for those who are ill? If you examine the arguments you see either that it is improper to treat a person who is ill, gravely ill, because treatment costs too much, or you do not treat that person who is ill. If it is improper to treat a sick man because he is ill, and because treating him would be inflationary as it takes money to look after him, you are really equating the dollar in a strange and un-Christian way with human suffering that can be alleviated. It takes money to alleviate suffering. The thinking seems to be that above all we must protect our money, or we do not protect Canadians. I think the idea is nonsensical.

There is nothing inflationary about seeing that poor Canadians who look to society for help receive that help. I think most of us in the House of Commons would feel ashamed to think that we were a party to the sort of reasoning indulged in by the government of the day. Indeed we have two victims of this phony war on inflation. One is medical care, and the other is scientific research, which includes medical research. So shortsighted are our policies in this direction that by accepting the postponement and by accepting the very thesis of the argument made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), which is aided and abetted by the government of which he is a member, we are condemning ourselves to being a second class nation in the intellectual and research fields for decades to come. This is what we are asked to be party to.

I have a letter from the Associate Professor of Medicine at Dalhousie University, Dr. John F. L. Woodbury, and he has given me permission to quote from it. I advance his arguments as my own, where he says:

> As a medical educator I am deeply concerned with the need for training and keeping teacher scientists in our medical schools. It is most disheartening to see one's colleagues leave Canada or abandon research careers in which they have invested years of training because the climate for medical research in Canada is poor.

I interject parenthetically to say that this man knows whereof he speaks. He is associate professor of medicine. To continue:

> A better climate is one of the most important considerations in increasing the number and quality of medical teachers which is, in turn, vital to produce the increased numbers of good doctors which will be demanded by a program of health insurance.
> It is therefore alarming to learn that the Minister of Finance has made a statement in the House of Commons on September 8th to the effect that "While the government is strongly in favour of increasing grants for research as a basic long term policy, we will have to exercise more restraint in the rate of increase this year than we had hoped would be necessary.

That is a remark made by the Minister of Finance. I do not find any of his colleagues opposite applauding, though.

The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) placed on record on a previous occasion—I do not think he did this in his excellent contribution to the current debate—some of the appalling statistics that have come about because we in Canada do not take any pride in being a nation which could be an intellectual or research centre of the world. Heaven only knows, we have the wealth to do it; we could afford to put money into these fields. As the hon. member for Simcoe East said before—and he confirmed my figures a few minutes ago—our medical brain drain amounts to some 200 Canadian trained doctors per year, each educated at a cost of some $50,000 and each likely to have earned $500,000 over an average working career of 30 years.

Putting it in another way, Mr. Speaker, what does this brain drain amount to? In positive figures it amounts to a $10 million loss in the medical training that goes on in this country. That is the money spent on people who go elsewhere to practise their profession or carry on research.

In addition there is the loss of income tax. Income tax is one way by which the state can recover part of its contributions to the education of these doctors. Five hundred thousand dollars will yield a tremendous amount of income tax.

The third loss is the loss of the enhancement of the medical services we have in this country, so that instead of gaining we have to run like squirrels in a cage to remain where we are.

The fourth loss is the loss to our international pride and national prestige, coming from the recognition abroad of Canada's failure to cultivate an intellectual atmosphere.

One would say this is inexplicable: One also has to say that it is true.

In an editorial reprinted in the Fredericton Daily Gleaner of Saturday, October 15, the Toronto Globe and Mail put the matter in this way recently:

> Finance Minister Mitchell Sharp's plea for greater restraint in the rate of research grant increases as an anti-inflationary measure might lead one to believe that in the field of medicine, for example, research could fairly be regarded as a peripheral activity in the work of providing medical care and training doctors, that it is a dispensable adjunct to the main operation and can be painlessly amputated.

The Minister of Finance amputated part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

An hon. Member: He was decapitated.

Mr. McCleave: An hon. member suggests that he decapitated the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare had lost his head long before that.

• (9:10 p.m.)

The editorial quotes four men who have offered opinions on the subject recently—Dr. Louis Siminovitch, head of the division of biological research, Ontario Cancer Institute; Dr. John Armstrong, executive director of the Canadian Heart Foundation; Dr. John Evans, dean of medicine at McMaster University; and Mr. Edward Dunlop, member of the legislature for Forest Hill and executive director of the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society. The article sums up their views in this way:

> Four men who are, in their individual ways, concerned in medical research and training, give views which suggest that restraining medical research funds could be one of the most ill-conceived economies in the history of Canadian medicine, and that it could condemn Canada to at least a decade of second-class medical care.

Here are the words of one of these men —Dr. Siminovitch—as quoted in the editorial:

> If Mr. Sharpe's announcement (concerning research funds) is followed through, and means what it says, we are in danger of dealing a mortal blow to the future of medical science in this country for many years to come.

The editorial notes what we have all noted in this house, namely that government response to the Gundy report for medical research calling for large increases in such funds has been "less than breathtaking". It says:

> Partly as a result of the Gundy report, medical research grants for this year were increased by $3 million to a total of just over $12.3 million.

The report had suggested $40 million in federal grants this year rising to twice that figure by 1969-70.

The editorial ends as follows:

> The government may be thinking in terms of temporary restraints on research spending but it is clear that the results in medical education and, eventually, medical care will be anything but temporary. It is an economy Canada cannot afford.

The case for all this has been put much better and more eloquently by a man who is closer in heart and mind to the need for these things—I refer to my hon. friend from Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). But if we continue to emphasize and re-emphasize in this house the need for medical and scientific research in this country, some day somebody will listen to us, or else there will be a change of government—God bring it about quickly—which will set the hon. member for Simcoe East in motion on these vital questions.

The third point I wish to make is one which has been made from time to time. Speakers in the debate have frequently quoted the statement of the royal commission that "the problem of visual deficiency is one of our most prevalent health defects." In other words, a lot of Canadians suffer from poor eyesight. Perhaps if this is repeated often enough even the government may get around to seeing. I present the plea which has been made by other hon. members that some consideration be given, when dealing with this medicare program, to those who are not of the medical profession. The optometrists of Canada, for example, will be the subject of my own particular remarks but I think we could also include chiropractors. I know this is a fearsome word to the medical profession, but a skilled chiropractor is more apt to send one home with a broken back kneaded into shape than is the surgeon who simply rushes for his knife and slices out whatever does not fit exactly.

The royal commission stated that the shortage of ophthalmologists and the long period of their training makes any proposal for restricting all prepaid eye care in the Health Service Eye Program to that profession wholly unrealistic. Mr. Justice Hall and his confrères are saying there are not enough medical men with training in eye care to go round in Canada, and some regard has therefore to be paid to the inclusion of optometrists in this program.

I have some figures to back up this assertion. They come to me from Bruce Wallace, an optometrist in Dartmouth with whom I have had the pleasure of jousting on Nov. 8, 1965. He has been good enough to furnish me with material and I present his arguments as my own because I think they are sound. He points out that there are some 1,500 optometrists in Canada and only 300 opthalmologists. In Nova Scotia there are a few eye doctors, to get away from that tongue twister, who serve in Halifax and Sydney. The rest of the province has to depend on the optometrists.

Then there is the report of the Canadian Association of Optometrists—I am not reading anything new to the house; we have all received these documents in the mail, and some of us have even read them. The Canadian Association of Optometrists says the bill before us would demolish, or severely interfere with, the public's method of obtaining health services from optometrists as well as from other members of the health professions, such as dentists. Then the association adds:

> The bill makes it clear that all eye services will have to be included if the provinces are to qualify for the federal grant. This means that such services as major ocular examination, tonometry and orthoptics as listed in the schedule of fees of the Ontario Medical Association, will be included. These services are regularly provided by optometrists for their patients.
> Optometrists are legally and academically qualified in all provinces to perform—with the exception of such services as surgery and treatment of disease—all of the services required in the major ocular examination referred to in the Ontario Medical Association schedule. Optometrists prescribe treatment if the defect is functional, which it is approximately 95 per cent of the time. If there is indication of disease, referral is made to a medical practitioner.

I suggest that the standard is just as high among optometrists as it is among ophthalmologists, that is, the patient is given the best treatment possible and the best advice possible. So I think it behooves the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) to take a serious look at this departure by his own government from a sound recommendation by the Hall Commission. It also occurs to me that the optometrist might charge less than the ophthalmologist. The optometrists have not presented this as part of their argument. Nevertheless the minister might be able to save a little in that direction and in a small way I think I have suggested a better method of fighting inflation than the minister has by listening to the siren screeches of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp).

There are two other points I wish to make. The first concerns the question as to who should administer the program in each province. Reading the set-up proposed by the minister I was not sure whether this could include the long established stand-bys which have been operating programs in the provinces. In the case of the province from which the minister and I come, it is Maritime Medical Care.

I think it would be a pity if these privately run schemes should be brushed aside simply for the glory of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and for the sake of building up some super-bureaucracy across Canada. Over the years these people have proven their ability to come to grips with the nuts and bolts and the collecting of money for doctors involved in medical care. I hope the minister will give an assurance before this debate concludes that these privately operated associations will be allowed to carry on.

One point made by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) concerned the 90 per cent formula in the legislation, whereby at least 90 per cent of the people of a province must be covered. This is not going to be of concern in Nova Scotia. A number of years back when we adopted our hospital insurance plan, as the result of the sensible formula devised by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, we had complete coverage in Nova Scotia. We still have the best hospital insurance plan in Canada and no one from any other province can stand up and deny that.

I am sure that when medicare comes into effect Nova Scotia will give 100 per cent coverage under it. In some other provinces, included in the 10 per cent who will not be covered will be a lot of unfortunates who will be in need of medicare. I speak strongly on this point because I believe it is an abandonment of responsibility to suggest that 90 per cent coverage is enough.

I have enjoyed taking part in this debate, which has been conducted on a very high level. I hope that wittingly or unwittingly my own contribution has not changed the level. I have enjoyed listening to the other speakers. I share the sentiment expressed by the last speaker that we anticipate hearing from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and also from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

I began with a football analogy and I might as well end with one. Seeing the sweeps of the Minister of Finance around the Minister of National Health and Welfare, it must remain for that great quarterback, the Prime Minister, to come in and get all his team pointed in the same direction, and going downfield—not downhill, Mr. Speaker—at approximately the same speed.

I support the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe East.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, one thing astonishes me very much in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) to Bill No. C-227 on medicare insurance. First of all, it says that the bill does not provide adequately for medical research or the training of doctors and auxiliary personnel in large enough numbers.

Now, the hon. member who spoke before me sympathized with both the minister, because his bill is postponed, and the member who moved the amendment. If it is true that we are not medically ready in Canada, that we do not have enough doctors, implementation of this bill should not be postponed till 1968, but rather till 1975. As far as I know, doctors are not trained in one or two years. I think that medical studies take much longer. Thus, on the one hand, the government is blamed for postponing the implementation of that bill and, on the other hand, an amendment is moved which says in part that Canada is not ready at the present time to adopt that legislation.

Moreover, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) said a few minutes ago that the health field comes under the provincial government. I have no intention of getting into constitutional matters but there is one thing I would like to say. It is always interesting to hear experts on constitutional matters. Besides, in the last few years we have been hearing a lot about that on television and we get the impression that the constitutional aspect becomes the main problem for the citizens of the province of Quebec. I have no doubt that this problem is very important. But other problems are just as important. I am wondering if a federal member is not as concerned about the needs and problems of his electors as the provincial member for the same riding.

Mr. Speaker, in the last election we proposed to the people the same medicare plan which is submitted to the house and it might be one of the main reasons why we secured the confidence of the electorate in several ridings.

In our midst, several people advocated in the past that family allowances be increased and we know—it is a mathematical solution—that normally a large family is more liable to need the very legislation introduced in the house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen).

The hon. member for Lapointe asked the Quebec members what they would do. Well, I have made my choice. I do not know if my electors will agree with me but I have chosen to vote in a humane manner, which is what he undoubtedly advocated himself during the election campaign, as did his leader. I have chosen to protect as much as possible through that legislation the citizens of my riding and I thought that if the medicare legislation was implemented in 1968, the new premier of Quebec, who asked for our help here in the house, would have more than enough time to make representations to the federal government.

In the past, we have often met with a refusal from our own provincial government. For instance, one can well remember that many family heads in the province of Quebec were deprived of unemployment insurance payments while we took a negative stand, instead of tackling the problem and discussing it. The situation was the same in the case of grants to universities and grants for the construction of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time is gone when a prime minister would say that cure for disease was health. To-day, I do not believe either that cure for disease is the constitution; however, let the experts discuss the matter between now and 1968. As for me, I wish to state that I do not fear at all to fully support the bill which is before the house, and I repeat that most Quebecers wish, I am sure, to see this legislation come into effect as soon as possible and are ready to wait for a possible discussion on the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my wish to show sympathy for the Minister of National Health and Welfare in closing, but I wish to state that I for one, was anxious to see this piece of legislation submitted to the house since it was certainly the issue of major interest for our people during the last election campaign. And I hope—this is my wish—that this bill will be passed as soon as possible, in the greatest interests of all Canadians.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I believe everyone in the house agrees as to the need for medicare. I would like to have the views of the expert on decent housing, the expert from Quebec East (Mr. Duquet), if he has anything to say on the subject. Everyone agrees upon the need for medicare, and admits it. We are told that one person out of three is unable to pay for medical treatment. This reason alone would justify the introduction of a medicare plan. But the urgency of such a plan must not lead us to forget the responsibilities and the rights of each of the participating members. We cannot ignore the rights of the provinces in this field, no more than we can ignore the priority of the provinces in the field of education. Public health, like education, is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces and, for this reason, we cannot do otherwise than recognize the fact that the piece of legislation at present before the house constitutes an infringement upon the rights and prerogatives of the provinces. This fact alone would justify immediate rejection of the legislation before us. But there are still other factors which support the objection which we may have to the bill in its present form.

Everyone knows that the present Liberal government is blackmailing the provincial governments. The present Liberal government not only trespasses in a provincial field, but takes it over and says: "Gentlemen of the provinces, here is the plan you need; this is the medicare plan which we have to offer. Take it or leave it."

Furthermore, I said that the Liberal or the central government was blackmailing the provinces. Yes, it is blackmailing them, Mr. Speaker, because it is luring them with millions which are to become theirs if they will promise to be gentle and accept the terms worked out by the Ottawa bureaucrats.

Mr. Speaker, such a situation has lasted long enough, and I think it is time we made it clear to the present ministers that they must stop this blackmail and stop treating the provinces as minors.

Mr. Speaker, less fortunate provinces certainly need assistance and this should be the starting point to determine the urgency of negotiations with the provinces.

Whoever has followed our discussions and the methods used to bring this bill before the house cannot but admit and realize that the provinces have not been consulted as they should have been.

Medicare

Mr. Speaker, as a result of Bill C-227, we are faced with an election promise made by the Liberals during the last election campaign and to prove my point, I have in hand an excerpt of the notes prepared for the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on September 21, 1965 along the same lines as the opening speech delivered by the Prime Minister at the Chateau Laurier.

On page 9 of the speech, the following can be read:

> Our aim would be to have a comprehensive medicare scheme operating in Canada for the centennial of confederation, on July 1, 1967.

Other people referred to statements made by other ministers during the last election, which is evidence that that was an election promise made by the Liberals at that time. Hence the anxiety of those who have to implement this liberal promise as soon as possible. They have broken so many others that they want to keep at least a few, even if it means encroaching on provincial rights and prerogatives.

The measure now before the house is known by all. It was a cause for dissension not only within the Liberal party, but also within the Liberal cabinet. One has simply to refer to the caucus held upon the return to Canada of the right hon. Prime Minister from his trip to England to recall that the discussions between the members of the Liberal party were heated and acrid. A caucus was demanded to ask the right hon. Prime Minister for a report and for explanations as to why the implementation of medicare was delayed for at least one year.

The discussion was also bitter and acrimonious at the convention which took place last week in the Chateau Laurier. There were rumours of the resignation of some ministers. At times, it was mentioned that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) would submit his resignation. It was said also that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) would leave the cabinet, since he was displeased with the way he had been treated. In a word, this caused an uproar and a dispute beyond words among those who, in public, show a united front as if nothing had happened.

Mr. Choquette: Are you aware that there is some division inside the Conservative party?

Mr. Ricard: Yes, but at least we do not profess hypocrisy as the Liberals do; we admit the fact, whereas the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) is one of those who dress up in hypocrisy to hide some dissensions between himself and some members of his party, as always, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, a very short one.

The hon. member uses words which are not in keeping with parliamentary tradition. There are no hypocrites on this side, the only difference being that we, Liberals, are not scared stiff of our leader, we can speak to him, because he is a great champion of democracy, which the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, if you find that there is a question of privilege in what the hon. member for Lotbinière has just said, you are smarter than the rest of us. This is a senseless statement, similar to those he so often utters, and you cannot make heads or tails of it.

Mr. Speaker, all those rumours about dissension have been denied, as in the past, and all interested individuals drew in their horns. To promote the weal of the party, everyone retracted what he had said before, and nobody resigned, since this could have endangered the life of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that it was impossible to ignore the views and position of the provinces in the field of medicare. It is, for instance, a well-known fact that the Quebec government is now making an enquiry in that field before committing itself completely and passing legislation providing for the necessary assistance to Quebeckers.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, to take into consideration the Quebec premier's remarks because he is responsible for Quebec's future; not later than last Saturday, as can be seen in this morning's Le Devoir, the Quebec premier, Mr. Daniel Johnson, gave a severe warning to the federal government, stating that never, for any consideration, Quebec would allow the federal government to interfere in the field of public health and education.

Moreover, someone who held an important office in the former Quebec government, Mr. Kierans, who, I believe, would have headed the Department of Health, is of the opinion that there is now in the province of Quebec a shortage of medical practitioners and technical personnel.

Another reason why it is urgent to study this question from all angles is that many collective agreements include a medicare program to which the employer in some cases contributes 75 per cent, in others 90 or 100 per cent.

What shall we do, Mr. Speaker, with schemes already in operation and with which the workers concerned are satisfied? Shall we force these workers to spend more without getting more protection I think these workers and heads of families are now happy with their lot and would not like to see the federal government intervene in a field under provincial jurisdiction, in other words carry on with the implementation of its program, without consulting the provincial government.

When he announced that the coming into effect of Bill C-227 would be postponed for a year at least, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) referred to the threat of inflation which, as he said, he wanted to check. Now, his former Quebec colleague, Mr. Kierans, formerly minister of health does not agree at all with the federal Minister of Finance, for he was saying, himself, last Saturday, at a symposium held at McGill University, that there was no relationship whatsoever between inflation and medicare.

He said Canada would perhaps be faced with a recession next year, and what guarantee have we that the government will be in a better position then to put the medicare plan into force. No, Mr. Speaker; to be frank, the best advice we can give this government is to withdraw from a field of activity that does not belong to them. The sooner they will leave to the provinces the freedom and duty to legislate in the field of public health, the better it will be.

And the richer provinces are willing to reach agreements with a view to helping the provinces that are not as well off.

The amendment moved by my hon. friend for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) deplores the lack of co-operation on the part of the provinces. I agree fully with him. That is why, and also because this legislation constitutes on the part of the present Liberal government further intrusion in a field of provincial jurisdiction, I shall vote for the amendment, and reserve my decision on how I will vote when the bill comes for final adoption before the house. I shall most probably not change my mind between now and then. If the bill continues to encroach upon provincial rights, I shall most likely vote against it.

I am in favour of a medicare plan, but a plan that respects the rights and prerogatives of the provinces, since this is within the realm of the provinces. And I would like to have the support of the other Liberal members for the province of Quebec so that we may convince their colleagues sitting on the treasury benches that they should leave to the Quebec government that which belongs to Quebec.

If the present Liberal government really wants to establish an harmonious relationship between the various levels of government here in Canada, they must respect the rights of others if they want others to respect their own prerogatives.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat to the Liberal members opposite: take the same stand as you did when you were in opposition.

• (9:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, as all other hon. members have done, I want to begin with the premise that I believe sincerely in the principle of providing a medical care plan to everyone in Canada regardless of his or her ability to pay. I believe that everyone in the house is in favour of providing assistance for those in our country who are unable for one reason or another to provide for themselves and their families, particularly with medical services. I do not believe any hon. member would disagree with this principle, nor have I heard it so stated.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have to examine why there is a difference of opinion on the manner in which such a plan should be put into effect. In the first place this difference is a philosophical one existing among the parties, as to whether there should be a universal plan compulsory on everyone in the country or whether there should be freedom of choice for those who wish to provide themselves with medical services insurance.

In my own view we must first provide for those who cannot support themselves, second, for those with low income, and finally for those who can provide for themselves. I do not believe it necessary to jump into a medicare plan providing for all three strata of our economy. As I will explain later, the very fact that the government has seen fit to postpone the introduction of this plan for a further year for economic reasons proves that it could be done by degrees, and that it could be done in accordance with a plan such as obtains in the province of Ontario and in two other provinces. If this were done, we could have medicare by July 1, 1967 for everyone in Canada unable to provide it for themselves.

I agree with the amendment that is now before the house—and you would rather expect me to do that, Mr. Speaker. It is not difficult to do so, however, because I support it both philosophically and politically. I wish I could look for some support for the amendment from hon. members on the government side. If there are any free enterprisers left over there they have not made themselves obvious as yet although it may be that before the debate is over someone who feels strongly about it will say so. However, as far as I can gather, any free enterprisers in the Liberal party have lost the battle and they are now marching down the road with the others and with their friends in the New Democratic Party. I do hope there are some left, even if we do not hear from them.

This amendment has been described as being against medicare. In the first days it was described in one of the newspapers as a roadblock to the present bill. I think that fundamentally medical and health services are provincial matters. Medical services, medical training and the licensing of doctors, are all provincial affairs. The provision of hospitals in which the doctors train and practise is also a provincial affair. The ancillary services such as public health units, sanitation inspection and nurses' training are also provincial affairs. The provinces now provide medical services for the aged, the ill and the indigent. Four provinces are now providing prepaid medical services under individual plans in which provision is made for free medical care for those unable to pay.

It is interesting to note, as has already been pointed out by another speaker, that in spite of the fact that the present Liberal party appears so anxious to inaugurate a medical care plan in Canada, none of the four provincial plans now in effect was brought in by a Liberal administration. I presume the federal government is trying to make up for these deficiencies. Nevertheless, fundamentally this is a provincial matter and that is where these plans should begin.

Under these circumstances it seems incomprehensible to me that the government is going ahead with this bill without the full agreement of the provincial governments. If the government wishes to consult the provinces and to see medical plans established across the nation, it would seem reasonable for it to support each provincial plan financially. After all, these provincial plans are prepared by the elected people who are given the responsibility to bring medical care into each province of this diversified country. If the people of a province choose through their elected legislature to have one kind of a plan, why should the federal government impose another plan by the blackmail method of withholding support of those who do not submit to the plan of the government?

Finally, why do the government supporters oppose the principle of co-operation with the provinces, and the principle of immediate medical care for those who are in need, as provided in the amendment? I think that these two proposals in the amendment are worthy of consideration, and if adopted will make the passage of this bill much easier—and I say this sincerely.

If this amendment is adopted it will not kill the bill. There is plenty of time for consultation with the provinces, and there is plenty of time to put the bill on a proper basis so as to obtain the acceptance of the provinces, rather than to push it through as the government is doing now. I think the government could and should accept our amendment in good grace and say: "All right, we can accept it; it is a sensible amendment. We will consider it as our mandate to go to the provinces, and after a reasonable time we will bring the bill again before the house, after we have secured the co-operation and agreement of the provinces."

Mr. Speaker, it is now ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What about the business for tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: The business as announced Friday will be followed tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO SALARY SCALE OF NAVAL LIEUTENANTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): I understand that the Minister of National Defence is on his way again to partake of maritime hospitality. I am pleased to see the Associate Minister of National Defence here, and I may say that the tone of my remarks will be entirely different since I have nothing but admiration and respect for the Associate Minister.

The point I should like to make deals with the pay increases that were recently announced by the minister for the category of non-commissioned officers, and the lowest rank of the officer group. If I may read these figures quickly into the record in tabular form, they are as follows:

Lieutenant	$6,792	$7,140	$7,416

The point I wish to make is that up to the present a warrant officer 2, the highest level in the non-commissioned end of the service, used to be paid somewhat less than the lowest rank of officer. For example, in 1964 the difference was $6,468 as compared with $6,792. However, under the new pay scale, the warrant officer 2 ends up with $7,512, an amount greater instead of less than the pay received by the lieutenant, which is $7,140. Then, this differential is carried into the next year, which I have cited.

I think I should like to make two points to the associate minister, if I may, Mr. Speaker. The first is that a certain amount of vexation, a certain amount of friction is bound to arise when two people are working side by side in the relationship of n.c.o. to officer, especially when the officer is normally the man to give the orders and he is receiving less pay. The WO 2 may have greater experience or a longer service, but I think there will be friction when the officer receives somewhat less pay.

The second point is that in Canada for many years we have tended to look to the senior n.c.o.'s as the class of people from whom we took our junior officers in the armed forces. There was an incentive when the n.c.o. could look forward to promotion and an increase in pay. I know how much the minister and the associate minister have done in connection with assuring proper pay for all groups in the armed forces, and for that I compliment them. However, I point our there is now no incentive for an n.c.o. to advance to lieutenant, because he would be suffering a loss in pay. I can say that I had many calls from people on the evening the new pay scale was announced, lieutenants who were simply enraged because they suddenly found that they had dropped in the pay range as compared with WO 2's.

I think this is a very big weakness in the pay scale as announced. My final point would be that there is a danger in adopting this method of setting up two classes. First, one would go to WO 2, and there is no incentive to go any further; and the other would be a return to days which we hoped had long since gone by, when the officer class was drawn from a level of society higher than those with the humbler backgrounds, who did not have an opportunity to rise to His Majesty's or Her Majesty's commission.

This is the real danger, and I hope the Associate Minister of National Defence, in whom I have a great deal of confidence and trust, will undertake to look at the argument I have advanced here this evening.

[Translation]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who has just resumed his seat for the kind words he had for me. I must return the compliment, because he is one of the members of the opposition with whom it is most pleasant for me to work and I am sincere in saying it.

[English]

I have taken notice of the first question posed in the house, Mr. Speaker, and I was prepared to answer that question. However, the hon. member has now expanded it a little bit.

The prepared answer that I had ready to give relates to the question which was asked the other day, but I hope it will partly cover the subject matter which he has raised tonight. As a matter of fact, I think it does more than indicate that there is room for compromise both on the chief petty officers' side and the naval lieutenants'.

In a number of cases it is true that the pay received by a chief petty officer is greater than that of a naval lieutenant. I suggest, however, that this is not a situation which exists solely in the armed forces. I can think of many instances in business and industry where a master craftsman receives more than a junior executive.

In the case of the armed forces, a chief petty officer does not attain that rank unless he has the experience of many years of service and has achieved substantial trade qualifications. He is, if I may be permitted to make a slight comparison to industry, the master craftsman or the foreman. He has often been referred to—and I agree with this assessment—as the "backbone of the navy". He has attained the peak of his non-commissioned career.

The naval lieutenant, on the other hand, is, by and large, on the threshold of his professional career. He has received the training necessary to enable him to begin practising his profession. He has every opportunity to compete for higher rank, right up to chief of defence staff. He has the opportunity to receive far more remuneration in the long run than the chief petty officer.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the situation referred to by the hon. member for Halifax was in existence long before the recently announced changes in the pay structure. The new structure continues to reflect this principle and has in all probability enlarged the number of chief petty officers who can be given recognition for their trade qualifications and service experience.

From the reports being sent to national defence headquarters, this and the other aspects of the new pay structure have been most favourably received by the servicemen.

I want to repeat for the benefit of the hon. member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

TRANSPORT—LOTBINIÈRE, QUE.—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AT LEVEL CROSSING

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). I thank him most sincerely for the generosity he is showing by being here to answer personally.

This week he announced that an inquiry on the Dorion tragedy will be carried out by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. That is undoubtedly an appropriate step.

However, I would like to make the following reservation, Mr. Speaker. I would find such an inquiry rather pointless if the citizens concerned did not appear before the board to voice their grievances and to offer solutions on the whole problem of level crossings.

If that were the case, it would be merely another of those fine inquiries whose only merit consists in providing attorneys with generous fees and which seldom results in the taking of efficient steps.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the people to appear before the board so that ingenious ideas may be voiced in such a way that we may once and for all settle the problem of railway crossings.

Indeed, railway crossings are a danger in themselves. That is where the principle of maximum security comes into the picture. Regardless of what happened at Dorion, some newspapers seem to have the solution. The accident may have been caused by an irresponsible act on the part of a teen-ager. Nobody knows, but it would be unfortunate if such were the case. But that does not solve the problem of level crossings.

Solutions must be proposed, Mr. Speaker, and maximum security must be ensured now, under existing conditions. There are thousands of level crossings across the country where maximum security is non-existent. I realize that heavy expenditures would be involved, but nevertheless, realist solutions must be considered.

First of all, there is an overlapping of jurisdiction when it must be decided whether or not to install a protective system. As a matter of fact, the Board of Transport Commissioners pays 80 per cent of the cost of grade separation, whereas the railway company pays 5 per cent; on the other hand, the local authority, whether the province or the municipality which is the owner of the road contiguous to the right of way, will pay up to 15 per cent. The overlapping of jurisdiction: there is a sharing of expenses which at times prevent an efficient, positive and even immediate action, when desirable. This is why this overlapping of jurisdictions should be simplified and arrangements should be made so that a single authority will decide and pay.

In the second place, the following principle must be set. Emphasis must be laid on security everywhere. In certain places, tunnels and overpasses are necessary, especially in large urban centres where trains must travel at a rather high speed, because after all the traffic of trains cannot be stopped, trains must travel at a certain speed to reach the end of their journey.

However, Mr. Speaker, in large communities, such as Dorion, for instance, regardless of the expense incurred, it is essential I think, that there should be tunnels or viaducts.

Third, in cases where there are signs only, I believe that this is not enough, no matter where the railway crossing is located, whether it be in a small locality, like Val Alain in my constituency, for instance a very small locality where four persons were caught by a train—where there are signs only, barely visible at night. Then perhaps consideration should be given to installing signal lights or, if the cost is too high, there is the system of convex mirrors which has been referred to and to which we could come back later.

That convex mirror system, Mr. Speaker, makes is possible to see the train coming from any direction. It has been studied by engineers and I have read the plan of the consulting engineers who say that its trial is worthwhile. That system is not expensive and could be used where there are signs only.

And then, Mr. Speaker, the problem of the speed of the trains should also be studied. When a train is going 80 miles an hour, there is certainly a danger no matter what small village or locality it goes through. Under the Criminal Code, a car driver who would travel at 80 or 90 miles per hour might be guilty not only of dangerous driving but probably of criminal negligence. The problem should be studied and steps taken to enforce a speed limit on all trains when they reach a railway crossing.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I come to the conclusion that the principle of maximum security is needed and, whatever it may cost, I think that in some places security must be increased, that the simple sign system must be abolished and either warning lights or convex mirrors set up; in short, steps must be taken to show that we care for human life. The minister has proved it and will do it again tonight because it is characteristic of the minister who is kind enough to answer me.

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to express my appreciation and, I think, the appreciation of all hon. members in our part of the house, of the eloquence and of the persistence with which the hon. member for Lotbinière has followed up this tragic business at Dorion. I quite agree that the tragedy at Dorion, important though it was in itself, shocking though it was, is intrinsically no more important than any other accident anywhere else in which a person loses his life at a level crossing.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that if any person in this country who has any suggestion to make for dealing with any aspect of this problem cares to write a letter to me I will undertake to see that the letter is brought before the Board of Transport Commissioners and considered fully and carefully. I do not think it is necessary to write to me, but some might feel that if this were done the letter might get more attention than if it were written direct to the board. If letters are written direct to the board I am confident they will get the same attention.

It might be pointed out that there has been a steady increase from year to year in the number of motor accidents in this country in which human beings are killed. But as far as rail crossings are concerned there has been a steady diminution in the number of persons killed in the last 10 or 12 years. I believe there were more in 1965 than in 1964; but in every other year the numbers killed and seriously injured have declined, both relatively and absolutely.

While manifestly, we are not doing everything that could be done, I think a better job is being done in preventing motor accidents at rail crossings than is being done in preventing motor accidents generally. This is some encouragement. We have spent large sums of money in this direction—about $15 million a year; and this, over 10 years, amounts to $150 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING RELIEF FOR RED CIRCLED EMPLOYEES

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): The answer given by the president of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) to my question about red circling appearing at page 8512 of Hansard is so unsatisfactory and so unrealistic as to lead one to the irresistible conclusion that the cabinet, Treasury Board and the Civil Service Commission are totally out of touch with conditions existing throughout the public service. Never in my experience has resentment been so dangerous and so threatening.

Throughout the public service there is seething discontent, deep-seated anger and bitterness, with the most serious immediate and potential consequences to morale.

The president of Treasury Board in his answer last Tuesday promised a review of red circling as of December 31 of this year. That is not good enough. The time for review is now—forthwith. A total change of policy must be made at once if irreparable harm to the public service is to be avoided.

Red circling is the result of the classification review undertaken as a preliminary to the implementation of collective bargaining. The objective was the simplification of the structure of the service and a very great reduction in the number of grades and categories. Those whose existing position carries a higher category at present than under the new classification have been red-circled and thereby deprived of increases in salary. In some departments almost all employees in certain branches have been deprived of the increases they had the right reasonably to expect.

Sir, I laugh when I think that six months ago I had never heard of the expression red-circling. During the past three or four months more than two thirds of my working hours have been taken up by bitter and angry civil servants, resentful of their red-circling, and quite frankly it has become so bad that I sometimes think I never talk to anyone who is not angry.

I want to make quite clear that these civil servants are not in any way to blame for their plight. Their existing classifications were determined by the Civil Service Commission and Treasury Board, and it is these very bodies who now gaily say, "Oh yes, we were wrong when we established that category or grade for the job, but we will rectify our mistake now regardless of the detriment to you."

How the Civil Service Commission could have been so dead wrong in so many thousands of cases in past years, and now be so satisfied it is right at this time, I am at a loss to understand. But the fact is that either the Civil Service Commission has been dead wrong in an atrocious number of cases over the years or it is dead wrong now, and my opinion is that it is dead wrong now.

I reiterate that the individual civil servant, not in any way himself to blame, is being penalized for the mistake or default of the Civil Service Commission at an earlier time. Can anyone blame him for being bitter? Can anyone blame him if morale is at low water mark?

But the commission has now compounded its own errors. Allegedly to help red-circled civil servants, it has created in the various departments pools of red-circled civil servants who have priority in promotions. What does this mean? It means simply that non-red-circled civil servants are deprived of the opportunity of promotion until red-circled employees are satisfied.

In other words, there is the rankest discrimination against all civil servants, and I emphasize "all civil servants." Non-red-circled employees are held back and refused promotion for reasons extraneous to their own merit. In my opinion this is a direct breach of the Civil Service Act by those very persons who are sworn to uphold it.

What can be done, now that the cabinet and the Civil Service Commission have created this unholy mess? The only realistic answer, I submit, is to divorce the individual incumbent from the red-circled position. Because the red-circling is not his fault, the present incumbent should enjoy all the increases and other benefits which automatically would have been his if the position had not been red-circled. When the position is next filled, its new and lesser status would become effective.

In effect this is a deferment of red-circling and no individual would suffer thereby. The present incumbent keeps his old status and all its ordinary perquisites so long as he holds the position. The new status of the position would become effective when it is next filled, and filled by ordinary promotional competition, with the competitors knowing all the facts.

So, sir, in moderate but the firmest possible words I want to submit to the government that corrective action cannot be deferred. Immediate relief should be given, and by immediate I mean in this month of October. Otherwise permanent harm will be done to a very great public service.

Classification review was started as a prerequisite to collective bargaining. If the injustices are not rectified at once, belief in collective bargaining will be destroyed generallly among civil servants, and at the same time morale in the public service, already endangered by the government's precipitate action in imposing bilingualism, will suffer a blow from which it will take years to recover.

So, I appeal to the government tonight for action now, this very week, and I say to it that the time for stalling, for evasion of governmental responsibility, is long past. I ask the minister, the cabinet and the commission to act.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government has long been concerned with the problem of classification in the civil service, and as a prelude to the introduction of collective bargaining the Civil Service Commission, through its bureau of classification revision, undertook to bring order into the chaos that existed.

The Civil Service Commission has done an outstanding job in constant consultation with the staff associations in an effort to reduce the incidence of protective red-circling to a minimum. When the problem first appeared in July of this year the staff associations agreed to hold a series of weekly meetings with the Civil Service Commission in order to reduce as much as possible the problem associated with pay conversions.

The number originally red circled—and incidentally I dislike that term—totalled 15,800 in the administrative support and administrative categories. Through action on the part of the government, this had been reduced by October to approximately 4,500 positions. Such schemes as vacancy preference were instituted to resolve some of the problems being encountered. It was also agreed that the commission would re-examine the whole situation if red circling had not been completely eliminated by December 31. With the announcement of the conversion for the administrative and foreign service categories in September, the incidence of persons whose present pay must be protected was once more highlighted by the staff associations. At that time the staff side conference requested the commission to re-open consultations, in order to resolve the issues involved, at an earlier time.

These consultations have been taking place and I understand that certain recommendations are now in the hands of the staff at Treasury Board for analysis. The staff proposes to have the usual consultations with the staff associations, and I suggest to my hon. friend that the normal process of consultation be allowed to take place. The government is deeply concerned with the effect that the conversion program is having on employee morale in the public service, and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) can rest assured that we will do everything possible to bring the matter to a mutually satisfactory conclusion.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 18, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NUGENT—OBJECTION TO STATEMENTS BY DEFENCE MINISTER

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps before the minister proceeds with the statement which yesterday I invited him to make, I may say that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona communicated with me earlier today and mentioned that he wanted, as he should have, to indicate the motion that he proposed to move if, yesterday, a question of privilege had been declared to exist by the Chair. This does complicate things a bit for the Chair procedurally, to have no question before the house and I submit that the hon. member should be allowed to read the motion which he should have read yesterday.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): May I apologize to the house, Mr. Speaker, for overlooking this motion previously. I thought Your Honour would make a ruling on the prima facie case and I awaited the call of the Chair but I should not have. I should have indicated the motion; and since the minister can comment not only on the charge but on the motion he should have heard it.

If I may read it now in order to get it before the Chair, my motion is:

That the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona this day—

That refers to October 17, yesterday, and is the question of privilege found on page 8715 of Hansard.

—together with the charge, formally made on Wednesday, October 12, 1966, Hansard page 8577, against the Minister of National Defence, Hon. Paul Hellyer, be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections to deal with and to inquire into the evidence and the witnesses before the standing committee on national defence during this session of parliament, and the practices and procedures involving witnesses, and evidence in appearances before the said committee, and in particular with regard to Admiral Landymore's appearance and evidence, and should further report on the conduct and statements of the hon. member and the minister made in connection with this matter before the house and to the press.

Mr. Speaker: I would invite the Minister of National Defence to limit his remarks to the point of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member yesterday.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman did not make his motion yesterday, or read the intent of his motion, I am not in a position to do anything except to comment in accordance with the invitation so graciously given yesterday in respect of the narrow point which had been raised by the hon. member when he rose on a question of privilege yesterday afternoon. The matter complained of appears on page 8715 of Hansard. First of all I should like to quote from the Ottawa Journal, Saturday, October 15:

It is apparent that he has had second thoughts and is now engaged in the complete "back-off" which substantiates my contention that the charge was "spurious" designed to damage my reputation rather than to get at the facts.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona then continued:

Those are Mr. Hellyer's words. The minister was speaking about me and his statement clearly imputes an improper motive. His words are so strong as to impugn my very honour and integrity.

• (2:40 p.m.)

The operative word in the quotation attributed to me in the Ottawa Journal is the word "designed". The Concise Oxford Dictionary, fourth edition, gives several meanings for the word "design", including "mental" plan; scheme of attack upon; purpose (whether by accident or)".

In order to be a genuine question of privilege based upon imputing motives, the allegation would have to be that the charge was designed deliberately or knowingly by the hon. member for the purpose of damaging my reputation. The use of the word "designed" by itself indicates quite clearly that the charge could have the consequences I described accidentally, rather than deliberately or knowingly.

I stated in the house on Thursday that I imputed no motive to the hon. gentleman; neither did I in the newspaper article referred to, nor do I now. I did not intend to impugn the honour and integrity of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

An hon. Member: Who is backing off now?

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he has already made his statement. A statement has been made by the minister, and I am sure it is not the wish of the house to engage upon further prolonged debate at this time on this question.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, it is open to me to suggest whether I accept this statement, or to bring certain matters to your attention. I think the rules do permit that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order now, suggesting that the rules permit him to answer the statement that has been made by the Minister of National Defence. I have some serious doubt about that, but perhaps he would speak to the point of order.

Mr. Nugent: With regard to the citation which was quoted yesterday by Your Honour as to the method of dealing with this problem, which perhaps has been alluded to only fleetingly before, where complaint is made against a member, and before being required to withdraw while the house considers the matter, he is given a chance to make a statement. I do not have the citation in May in front of me, but if some explanation or clarification is required in answer thereto, he may be heard further. I would ask Your Honour to consider—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly give me the citation? I can assure him that this is something entirely new to the Chair. The citation he will find in May is to the effect that the member who is accused and whose statement or conduct is being impugned—in this instance the Minister of National Defence—should be given the opportunity to make a statement, which is what has now been done. I am sure there is no suggestion in May or any precedent to the effect that after that statement has been made the hon. member who raised the matter originally should be allowed to make a second statement. Perhaps the hon. member could find for me the citation or a precedent which would justify the position he is now taking.

Mr. Nugent: The citation is in May, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour quoted last night the citation at page 143, and it follows immediately thereafter and concerns the method of dealing with these points. It says that where a member makes a statement it may be accepted by the house or he may be asked for clarification. I think it follows within one page thereafter.

I do not want to mislead Your Honour, and I do not have May in front of me, but it does seem to me that a statement is not always completely explanatory and that the house may ask for clarification of it; and I am asking for clarification of it from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rose on a point of order claiming that there is a precedent or a citation which he can bring forward in support of his claim that he should be allowed to make some clarification of the statement made by the minister. I have May in front of me; the hon. member can obtain the book from the table. The hon. member said that within one page of the citation that was quoted yesterday there is such a statement. I have the book before me, but I certainly cannot find anything here to justify the claim made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Far from trying to limit the hon. member in his contention that he should be allowed to speak a second time on the question he has raised, I think he will admit and all hon. members of the house will agree that I have been as lenient as possible.

Mr. Nugent: On a point of order, I have not asked to speak a second time on the point I raised. I asked to speak once on the explanation raised by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The advice I have received is that there is no precedent to justify the position the hon. member seeks to take now. I have looked at the citations. I am advised from the table that there is nothing to support the contention advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and I must take my responsibilities and face the situation as it is.

The hon. member yesterday raised a very limited question of privilege. It had nothing to do with that general motion which he seeks to move at this time and which I suggest to him far exceeds the very limited signification of the point he raised yesterday. The hon. member suggested that the Minister of National Defence had used words outside the house which impugned the very honour and integrity of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I have studied those words. I have looked into the matter. I can assure the hon. member that since yesterday I have given a great deal of thought to it. I have looked at precedents. I have looked at the rules. I have considered every possible aspect of this matter. I find the difficulty is that the words, as spoken by the minister, were uttered outside the house.

Mr. Nugent: He has not backed off them. He must be taken to adopt them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I do not know whether Your Honour is prepared to hear argument on what I suggest is the question before you, which is whether there is a prima facie question of privilege. As I understand it there are two things which Your Honour has to decide; first of all, does this motion involve a prima facie question of privilege, and second, is it raised at the earliest possible moment? It seems to me we are now at the point where the question is, whether Your Honour will hear submissions on either or both these points before making a ruling. It would be my submission that it is in order for hon. members to address themselves to that point entirely to assist Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member thinks he has a question of order I will certainly allow him to speak on the point of order which he seeks to raise at this time. An alleged question of privilege was raised yesterday. The minister was allowed to make a statement. The hon. member has suggested that he should be allowed to speak on the point of order, and I will hear him.

Mr. Fulton: The only point to which I should like to address myself briefly is the one upon which I understand you are now required to make a ruling, namely whether the motion now presented by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona does involve a question of privilege and whether, if so, it has been raised at the earliest possible moment in order for the question of privilege to be taken under consideration at this time.

As I understand the rules of the house they are that if, in fact, what has been raised by way of this motion does involve a question of privilege, that question must be taken under consideration and given precedence over other questions in the house. This is the point to which I should like to address myself.

If I understand Your Honour's difficulty correctly, it is, first, whether the motion today presented by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona on the face of it goes beyond the question of privilege which he raised yesterday and which surely and admittedly was raised at the first possible moment, namely on the Monday following the Saturday when the article appeared in the press; and second, whether, if the point does go on the face of it beyond the subject matter of the question of privilege raised yesterday, it can refer back to the earlier charge of tampering with evidence.

Here I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in his press statement reported in Saturday's Journal the Minister of National Defence said the charge made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona in that respect was spurious, the charge made that the minister tampered with evidence or with witnesses. If then, the allegation by the minister that the charge is spurious does involve a question of privilege, as I submit it does, then it cannot be considered in isolation from the earlier charge made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

I submit that the minister's reply today does not dispose of the question of privilege. He referred to the question of the implication of the word "designed". In my submission that is not the question at all. What the minister said on Saturday was that the charges made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona were "spurious" and were designed to blacken his reputation. This, I submit, is a reflection upon the motives, the conduct, the very purpose of the hon. member and as such raises a question of privilege.

It follows, therefore, that the member for Edmonton-Strathcona was right in raising this matter and bringing it before the house yesterday. Today he has founded a motion upon that question of privilege. That motion necessarily goes back to the charges which he himself made earlier and which are now alleged to be spurious, something which in itself, I suggest, involves the whole question of privilege.

I submit that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, having now put forward a motion for reference to the committee on privileges has, substantially, two points; first, that the word "spurious" and the press comments of the minister involve a question of privilege reflecting on himself; and second, that the matter must necessarily embrace the whole question of tampering with evidence which is the charge now alleged to be spurious. The word itself cannot be dealt with in isolation from the subject of the charge to which it refers.

Since this is now the subject of a formal motion before the house, the hon. member has complied with the requirements; he must raise with you, sir, a matter involving privilege in order that you may apply the rules of the house which recognize the importance of taking such question under consideration at once.

If you find that there is a prima facie case of privilege involved and that therefore, notwithstanding the statement or explanation of the minister, this motion should go, as suggested, to the committee on privileges and elections—and I submit with respect that I do not see how Your Honour could find otherwise than that there is a prima facie case of privilege raised here—then, I submit, this matter having been raised yesterday at the earliest possible moment, the motion should be taken into consideration now by the house.

Mr. Nugent: May I speak to the point of order? I should like to ask Your Honour to clarify a ruling which you made last Thursday when I raised a similar question of privilege. The minister rose at that time and without withdrawing his remarks made certain statements difficult to comprehend, after which Your Honour felt and ruled that he was not imputing motives in my case going beyond my duty as a member of this house.

The substance of my argument on the question of privilege which I submitted yesterday was that the statement he made, and to which I objected yesterday, went beyond the simple statement that my allegations were spurious, which tied in the whole course of conduct with this case and made it such that the sole point of making that statement was to impute a motive.

I therefore suggested to you, sir, that it is no more a case of the possibility of the minister explaining it away or withdrawing. I would point out to Your Honour that I listened very carefully to the minister today, and while he gave us a lesson which showed that apparently he is able to look in a dictionary and read the meanings of words, there was nothing that could be accepted by any member of the house as an explanation of why he made the statements, never mind a suggestion that he was not imputing motives. As a matter of fact I suggest to you that his statement today was so carefully made that no one could accuse him of withdrawing a word of his original statements that would impute a motive.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest I need a clarification of your statement on this point with regard to the motion. Your first point, if your ruling is as I remember it and as I read it in Hansard, is that there is no question of privilege unless a motive is imputed; and since it is so very obvious here—and the minister has not denied imputing a motive—I must take it from your ruling that where a motive is imputed then I have a prima facie case of privilege, and I suggest the situation is very clear.

I do not want to bother the house every day with this, but the situation is very simple. The minister has been formally charged, and stands charged now, and he is the one member who blocked a review of the facts to determine whether he was guilty or not. I say that he brought a base and scurrilous attack against me last week—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nugent: —and the Chair has allowed him to do it again.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member is speaking to the point of order?

Mr. Nugent: I am, sir. The point is that last Thursday on an explanation that was not satisfactory to me—but it is the Chair that must be satisfied—the Chair on that occasion was satisfied that apparently no motive was imputed. I am certain that Your Honour could not be so satisfied with the words spoken by the minister today. There was no suggestion by the minister that he was not imputing a motive, and I suggest that if a man in his position does not have the honour to try to clear his name of very serious charges in this house, and goes on to make these scandalous and scurrilous attacks on me—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but will he please resume his seat. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona will agree that he has been given every opportunity on a number of successive days to make the statements he wanted to make. On each day I have considered them as objectively as possible, and I am prepared to do so again today. But the hon. member is now, I understand, speaking to a point of order, and he knows what a point of order is. It cannot be a substantial speech, and he should limit his comments strictly to the point of order.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I will. I am sorry; I got a little carried away. This is not a personal quarrel between myself and the minister. What is at stake here is a very serious breach of the rules of the house. What is at stake is the standard of honour and integrity that should prevail in the house.

If a member is to make a charge—and that is why the rules are so specific—he must stand on his feet and make the charge and take his responsibility, which is what I have done. But I think there is a corresponding responsibility that if another member is going to make remarks about me he must take responsibility for them; and certainly the standard of integrity of this house is such that where there is a difference such as in this case, then we have a duty to the house, to the honour, integrity and high standards of parliament, to search everywhere to find a way by which the matter can be inquired into and a proper finding made as to who is abusing the privilege of the house.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but a look at the motion I have drafted and brought before the house will indicate that it is a very deep, very important question. The remarks of the minister as to his powers and authority in briefing witnesses are certainly something that affects the very working of parliament and in this connection I would only bring to Your Honour's attention the way in which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), when there was a suggestion of irregularity in his election, immediately jumped to his feet and asked the house for an inquiry—and got it, sir.

I suggest that certainly when the matter is as serious as the entire existence of our committee system, its effectiveness, what may be made available to it, and the question of the responsibilities of ministers to bring forward all the facts, in view of the remarks made by the minister all I am asking this house is, that these very serious charges I have made in the only proper way be investigated and pursued so the minister's case can be cleared, or otherwise. In the name of the honour and integrity of this house these spurious charges cannot be allowed to stand. Otherwise there is no way we can bring about an investigation to defend one hon. member or another.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their assistance in enlightening the Chair on the point of order. I thank the Minister of National Defence for his ready acceptance of the suggestion I made yesterday to say a few words in explanation of the statement he is alleged to have made against the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Kamloops there are two points before the Chair at the moment. One—and it is not an easy point for the Chair to decide—is whether the motion presented today by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona follows upon the question of privilege which he raised yesterday. I think in fairness to the Chair it should be pointed out that no motion was moved yesterday, and that today the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona presented a motion which he submitted to the Chair. In my mind, looking at it very objectively, it certainly goes considerably beyond the scope of the limited question of privilege raised by the hon. member. This is the essence or purport of the words or the thought I was trying to express a moment ago before the point of order was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Obviously, to my mind, this proposed motion is not limited to the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. It seems to revive a point on which there already has been a ruling by the Chair. In looking at it, obviously it is the type of motion which the hon. member might have wished to move as a substantive motion, the type of motion which I suggested to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona he should have given some thought to last week and should not submit it to the Chair to accept as a privileged motion, and also suggesting to him that this is a matter of substance.

His motion actually is a motion of substance; but this is the second point. His argument would have to be considered and would be particularly relevant if I had ruled there was a prima facie case of privilege. The hon. member said that because I referred to the question of motive the other day, I must conclude that the moment there is an imputation of motive there is automatically a question of privilege. I suggest to him that is drawing a rather wide conclusion. It is a very generous interpretation of the words I used the other day when I was trying to give a ruling.

The minister is reported as having said that a charge against him is spurious and designed to damage his reputation. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona argued that the minister's statement imputed an improper motive and concluded that his honour and integrity have been impugned. As I also mentioned a moment ago, if the statement of the Minister of National Defence had been uttered in the house in the course of debate and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona had risen on a question of privilege to claim that these words were unparliamentary and that the minister was imputing motives—well, this is done regularly, and the Chair would have intervened, I suggest, and would have brought to the attention of the minister that he has no right to impute motives. The minister would have been given an opportunity to explain. Whether it should be explained to the satisfaction of the member complaining is another thing.

If this statement had been uttered in the course of debate and the members offended had not been satisfied by the explanation given by the member, I wonder whether he would have considered it a question of privilege sufficient to send to the committee on privileges and elections the conduct of the member who uttered the words which allegedly offended another member of the house.

What we have to determine, I submit, is the seriousness of the alleged offence in order to decide whether there is a question of privilege. The hon. member said that the statement made by the Minister of National Defence impugned his very honour and integrity. I have some doubt about this. I suggest to the hon. member that this is really the whole point; do the words spoken by the Minister of National Defence in fact carry such a serious import or serious connotation that the very honour and integrity of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is impugned, or that his integrity and his honour have been placed in question. He may feel they have, and some hon. members may feel his honour and integrity have been placed in jeopardy. But it is the judgment of the Chair that has to be considered, and I must say that in my judgment the minister's words—in spite of the fact that the hon. member may have been aggrieved, in spite of the fact that he may have a very serious grievance against the minister for the words which were spoken as reported in the Ottawa Journal—did not impute an offence to him.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I suggest the offence is not so serious that it could be considered by this house as impugning the integrity and honesty of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona to the extent that the Minister of National Defence should be asked to explain his conduct and his words before the committee on privileges and elections. I understand from precedents that it is only on very rare occasions that words spoken either in debate or outside the house by a member of this honourable house were investigated by the committee on privileges and elections. I understand this may have happened only perhaps two or three times in some 20 or 25 years.

In all objectivity and in all fairness to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, to the minister, and to members of this house I have looked at this matter, and to the best of my conscience I cannot see that these are words—recognizing the prima facie case of privilege—such as would justify sending the matter to the committee on privileges and elections. With regret for the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and in full appreciation of his difficult position, I must rule accordingly.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of what you said regarding the motion. I apologize to the Chair for not having presented the motion. There might be some suggestion that I had not been ready, and I should like to ask Your Honour to remember that last Wednesday when I gave the notice of the question of privilege I presented to you at that time a motion which I intended to move. I did the same thing on Thursday. On neither occasion was I asked to move a motion though I had one ready. I should like to make clear that at all times I had a motion ready and was waiting only for the prima facie case to be established first.

Mr. Speaker: I sustain the hon. member on this point. When he came to see me shortly before 2.30 to bring me the motion I did indicate to him that I recognized he had not been invited to make a motion. Perhaps we were both at fault. If it has caused any embarrassment to him, I apologize. It becomes theoretical, however, because even if the motion had been made I would have had to rule against it unless I considered there was a prima facie case of privilege.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I should like to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the house I should like to refer to the point raised by the house leader the other day when I mentioned some things in respect of Admiral Landymore's affidavits. Let me make it plain to the house that if hon. members wish the affidavits and attached exhibits tabled, I am prepared to do so. I did not originally offer to do so, but if any member has any question in his mind as to the validity of what I have said I shall do so today.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order for the purpose of obtaining some assistance from the Chair to clarify matters of privilege. It has been my understanding up to this time that when a matter of privilege is raised in this house Mr. Speaker makes a ruling as to whether it is in fact a matter of privilege. If the Chair rules that it is, it may be followed by a motion to be dealt with immediately or referred to a committee.

We seem now to have reached a different situation, and this is where I wish some guidance, as a result of suggestions made in this house last week on a matter of privilege presented by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. Today the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has strengthened his matter of privilege with a motion. That having been done, apparently the house is not to be given the privilege of deciding whether that motion is acceptable. We now have a ruling to the effect that there is no matter of privilege and, therefore, the motion is superfluous. I should like to know why there was a request last week that a motion be presented. Perhaps we should have some guidance for future matters of privilege that may be raised.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking an abstract question. I do not believe the Chair should at any time be placed in a position of having to advise an hon. member as to what should be done in any instance, or what ruling will be made. Certainly I do not wish to enter into an argument with the hon. member who has had infinitely more experience than I. I respect the point he is trying to make, but the decision I have made is based particularly on the authority contained in a statement made in this house by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton as reported on page 4141 of Hansard of June 10, 1964, as follows:

> I suggest that hon. members in future when raising questions of privilege, such as those raised last Thursday, should at the very beginning of their speech advise the Speaker that at the end of their statement they will conclude with a motion so that, if such a matter is found to be a prima facie case of breach of privilege and also if it has been raised at the earliest opportunity, the house may deal with it according to the rules and the recognized practice.

That is my understanding of the rules and practice. I shall certainly look into the matter further in an attempt to buttress my position with further precedents, and if a question of privilege is raised at any time in the future I will perhaps be in a stronger position to support the stand I have now taken.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ORIGINAL EVIDENCE BY ADMIRAL LANDYMORE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the allegations placed befor the house by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona regarding certain excisions, alterations and substitutions in respect of the evidence which Admiral Landymore was to present, which took place while it was in the possession of the minister's office, will he now table the evidence that Admiral Landymore intended to give which was placed before the minister, and the final evidence which the committee had before it following the deletion of certain pages and the substitution of innocuous ones?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take the liberty to bring to the attention of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that there is a motion for production of these papers which appears on today's order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I say with great respect that this cannot interfere with the right to ask a question. Surely this house will not be denied the opportunity of learning whether this minister or anyone connected with him induced an admiral to alter his evidence.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that there will be a shortage of 1,500 men required to man the remaining ships of the Canadian navy if all the older destroyers and frigates are disposed of, why did the minister refuse to let Admiral Landymore give that evidence to the committee on defence?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are too many allegations in that question for it to be dealt with on orders of the day, but if the hon. gentleman would check some of the information I gave at a press conference very shortly after—

Mr. Horner: Can we believe the hon. member's information?

Mr. Hellyer:—he would be more up to date than he is.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: What information did the admiral give?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What did you tell the women's association on Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: The statement I read was from Admiral Landymore's testimony which the minister refused to let appear before the committee. I ask the minister whether he is now stating in the house that the submission Admiral Landymore intended to give to that committee was wrong.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not so contend, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact the situation is difficult, just how difficult will be determined in the intervening months. However, I personally stated at the press conference to which I referred earlier that there was a shortage of 1,500 personnel. The admiral, in his evidence to the committee, stated there was a desperate shortage but that how many ships will be manned next year will depend on what will happen in the intervening months. On my trip to Halifax recently I was assured by the commander that every effort would be made to find from the available manpower pools people to man the ships next year, and we are hopeful we can man them all. I am not saying we will be able to, but we will be making every effort to do so next year.

Mr. Lambert: Does the minister agree this is desirable?

Mr. Churchill: I have another supplementary, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister the following question: Is it not right that by May 1967 we will be able to man only 13 or 14 of the total of 23 destroyers and have those 13 or 14 in full commission?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think it is the wrong time for a question of that kind, but I certainly think that forecast will prove to be very pessimistic.

Mr. Churchill: Why did the minister not permit that information to go before the committee on defence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did he delete it?

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; in view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence just admitted that Admiral Landymore said the shortage of manpower was desperate, would the minister care to explain to the house why he was so desperately anxious that this should not be revealed to the committee and therefore no such statement was allowed to appear in the brief submitted to that committee?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I was not desparately anxious, and as I will explain to the committee on defence when it meets—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that question is clearly argumentative.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSTAL WORKERS—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONCILIATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the imminent threat of a strike by the postal workers and the serious consequences which would follow from such an event, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government would consider setting up a conciliation board to investigate the wage demands of the postal workers, assess their wages to comparable posts in industry, and report on what they would consider to be the basis of a fair and reasonable wage settlement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are certain processes of law that have to be followed in connection with matters concerning civil servants and public officials in disputes of this kind. Those processes are being followed at the present time. Whether any exceptional procedures are required in a matter of this importance is now under consideration by the government.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Civil Service Commission is a government agency, and may not have the information with respect to wages paid in industry for comparable types of work, would the Prime Minister not think that the setting up of a conciliation board might be of considerable assistance to the Treasury Board in resolving this problem?

Mr. Pearson: In the first case I do not think my hon. friend is accurate in referring to the Civil Service Commission as a government agency. Second, I just told him we are taking this matter under consideration at the present time.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would give us a firm assurance that there will be no interruption in the mail service in this country.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no such interruption.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement reported today by the Postal Trades Unions Council that unless the decision of the Civil Service Commission is reviewed there will be a strike shortly after November 5, can the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General tell the house what action this government proposes to take so that we will not sit idle until the crisis is upon us?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that it would be quite improper at this stage of the proceedings to give an answer to a question of that kind without doing a great deal of damage to the negotiations that are now taking place.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—PROSPECTIVE IMPORTS FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he tell us whether he anticipates imports of butter for Canadian consumption during 1966-67? If so, can he tell us how extensive those imports will be?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this question might be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the situation existing in the Middle East at present and described yesterday in the United Nations as a fragile state of peace, and the statement this morning or late last night by the prime minister of Israel that retaliatory action will be taken against sabotage by Syrian forces, does the minister have any statement which he could make to the house in regard to this situation?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter is now before the security council. I would hope that the discussions taking place there will serve to bring a moderating influence in the Middle East.

HATE LITERATURE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the promise he made that legislation on hate literature will be brought down during this part of the session, can he tell us whether this legislation will be brought down now in view of its importance?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not recall saying it would be brought down in this part of the session, but we are studying this matter and we do hope to bring forward legislation which will deal effectively with this matter as soon as that can be done.

Mr. Starr: On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this legislation can the Prime Minister say how long it will take to study it?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. To some extent it will depend on how long it will take to deal with the legislation we are now considering.

Mr. Starr: I have another supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister avoided answering my question, will he say when this legislation will be placed on the order paper?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it will be placed on the order paper as quickly as possible. I hope my hon. friend will co-operate so as to make that even quicker than possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it expected that this legislation also will come into effect on July 1, 1968?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MALTON, ONTARIO—LAY-OFFS AT DOUGLAS AIRCRAFT PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question relating to certain lay-offs by Douglas Aircraft at Malton. On Friday the minister gave a partial explanation and indicated he was seeking to obtain more information regarding the lay-off of some 80 odd employees by Douglas Aircraft. At the same time certain other things happened.

Does the minister now have any further information about that lay-off, and particularly any comments as to steps to be taken to relocate the people affected?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, arrangements have been made whereby a committee composed of officials of the company, representatives of the provincial government departments concerned and a representative of this department has been formed to examine the full record of experience of the people being laid off as well as the experience record of the immigrants who are expected on October 25, with a view to absorbing both groups of affected employees elsewhere in the labour force. Qualifications, rates of pay and conditions of work will dictate the most appropriate course of action that can be followed under these unfortunate circumstances. Local 112 of the United Automobile Workers has been kept informed of the action that is being taken.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question. Reports have suggested that there were certain cut-backs in the operation of Douglas Aircraft because of certain events in the United States. Can the minister inform the house whether these cutbacks are permanent or merely temporary, and if they are only temporary is there any way of keeping these 80-odd people on the work force pending better circumstances?

Mr. Marchand: I do not know if they are permanent or temporary. I know that Douglas Aircraft cannot obtain certain parts from the United States and for this reason had to curtail production, but for how long I do not know.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question. When application was made for admission to Canada of some 80 assemblers and 20 machinists by Douglas Aircraft, was the minister aware at the time that there were going to be lay-offs for some 89 assemblers and these people from Great Britain were to replace them on the jobs?

Mr. Marchand: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware and I have no indication that the company was aware of the situation either.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address this question to the minister. He has just explained the unique and complete system under which arrangements are being made for people laid off by Douglas Aircraft. Is he giving consideration to doing the same thing for the 3,000 people who were laid off in the car industry, particularly in Oshawa?

Mr. Marchand: Definitely yes, Mr. Speaker.

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Russell Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I may have overlooked some information, but I would like to know whether the minister intends to make a statement in the house concerning winter works for 1966-67?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that has already been done more than a month ago.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is it the intention of the minister to table the report of Mr. Justice Wood so the house can ascertain the nature of the recommendations contained therein? May I ask a related question? Is it the minister's intention to bring in veterans legislation before the end of the current year?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I may say I have not yet received the report. This matter will be considered when the report is at hand.

In answer to the second part of the question, it is not intended that legislation, beyond those amendments dealing with pension rates and war veterans allowances, will be introduced before the end of the year.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister tell us when the veterans affairs committee will be called together to evaluate the wealth of information which was recently acquired, and which would assist the committee in making recommendations to the minister to improve the Pensions Act?

Mr. Teillet: As the hon. gentleman knows, this is a matter for the committee itself. Certainly I would welcome an opportunity to have the committee discuss the results of the work during the course of the summer. I think it would be helpful to the public and to veterans. I hope an occasion could be found shortly to convene that committee, but that is in the hands of the committee itself and its chairman.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister intend to institute any of the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee in its 1963 report?

Mr. Teillet: I think I dealt with that question on two or three occasions but I would have to check back on that to be more specific.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BRANTFORD, ONT.—REPORTED REFUSAL TO SERVICE APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the Canada Assistance Plan became law in July of this year, retroactive to April, can the minister advise the house why the provincial officials who administer the plan at Brantford, Ontario, have not been advised of the existence of the plan, because they are refusing to attend to cases referred to them under this plan, stating they have not received instructions about it?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubts whether this question qualifies for acceptance at this time. Perhaps the hon. member may want to take this up with the minister or discuss it later today.

Mr. Brown: Ten o'clock.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

UNITED KENO HILL MINES—CURTAILMENT OF PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: Welcome back.

Mr. Nielsen: Not having a Jetstar to get around in like the minister of northern affairs, it takes me a little longer. May I ask a question of the minister of manpower? What action is the government intending—he is gone.

Mr. McEwen: Another cabinet shuffle.

Mr. Nielsen: May I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the hope that he can answer. What action does the government intend to take to avoid the announced curtailment or early closure, because of inflationary costs, of the operations of the mining complex of United Keno Hill Mines, directly affecting 2,000 people, four communities in the Yukon and 20 per cent of Canada's silver production?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my first inclination is to say, "welcome home". In reference to the announcement made by Mr. Fraser in respect of Keno Hill, I think the hon. member would agree with me that if a careful study is made of the statement the very pessimistic interpretation put upon it by certain people in the Yukon and elsewhere seems scarcely justified. I am hopeful that the statement attributed to someone in the company yesterday to the effect it was hoped the mine would not be closed at all is much closer to the actual situation. We are making inquiries and asking for explanations of the statement made by Mr. Fraser. I am hopeful that we can probably clarify what I thought was a measure of optimism in the rather gloomy prediction that was first made.

COPYRIGHT

APPLICATION OF U.S. LAW TO CANADIAN PUBLISHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry and Defence Production on a matter which is of interest to many people in this country. Can the minister inform the house with regard to the latest developments in United States copyright law as they affect Canadian printers and publishers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question should be placed on the order paper.

COAL

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH UNION PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to meet the request of the president of the U.M.W.A. and, if so, when he intends to meet with him.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, offhand I am not aware what the request is.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question. Am I to understand that the Prime Minister has not received any correspondence requesting a meeting on the Nova Scotia coal industry? Is the Prime Minister leaving the impression with the house that he has not received any such correspondence?

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member would stop using initials when he speaks, I might be able to understand him more easily. This matter is under consideration.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A further supplementary question. Am I to understand from the Prime Minister that under the circumstances—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the Prime Minister that under the circumstances now prevailing in Nova Scotia he is unaware of what the U.M.W.A. is?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware. If the hon. member would not mutter the initials I might be able to understand them.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that I cannot get across a question of privilege to the Prime Minister without him imputing motive also? I now ask the Prime Minister to answer my question. It is the government's intention to meet the request of the president of the United Mine Workers of America to hold a meeting on the coal problem in Nova Scotia, especially in view of the $25 million promised by himself, by the Minister of Transport, by the former minister of labour now the Minister of National Health and Welfare, by the minister of mines and by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Starr: The whole government promised it.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he will be so kind as to advise the Prime Minister that we have a union in Nova Scotia called the United Mine Workers of America, and would he acquaint him with what is going on in Nova Scotia and that we do have a coal problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that there are approximately only six weeks left in the seaway shipping season and that new contractual arrangements are being drawn up now, is the minister now in a position to state the policy of the government with regard to tolls so that new arrangements can be made?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Unfortunately no, sir.

AGRICULTURE

SHOPPING AT SUPERMARKET BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister tell the house what he hoped to prove by his well publicized shopping trip, and whether he feels he was successful?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that question is out of order.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CROP INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he tell us if he has had talks or has exchanged correspondence with the Quebec minister of agriculture, Mr. Vincent, on the matter of crop insurance? If so, would he tell us if Quebec wants to join the crop insurance plan of the federal government?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the province of Quebec will take part in that program.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORT OF INQUIRY INTO GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. On October 6 he advised the house that the Montpetit report relating to conditions in the Post Office Department would be presented to him not later than October 18. I should like to ask him whether this report has been filed with him and what action he intends to take in regard to it.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Montpetit report was received this morning and it will be tabled tomorrow.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Postmaster General say that he is willing to turn this report over to the committee which is now discussing the civil service matter so that representations can be made based on that report?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am not the one who should decide that matter but I agree with what the hon. member has said.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—PRESERVATION OF INDIAN SHRINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have been seeking an opportunity to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which arises from a question addressed a few days ago to the Minister of Agriculture recorded at page 8447 of Hansard and entitled "Saskatchewan—Preservation of Indian Shrine". As I think the minister knows, the matter involves the possible flooding of an Indian shrine by the rising waters behind the South Saskatchewan river dam. What steps is the Indian affairs branch or the historic sites and monuments board taking or being asked to take to ensure that this ancient Indian shrine will in fact not be destroyed by the rising waters behind the South Saskatchewan dam?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have had some rather frightening estimates about the weight of this stone varying from 200 tons to 450 tons, with cost varying up to $150,000 and so on. I think the Minister of Agriculture has been speaking to some of his people in P.F.R.A., and there has been a suggestion that at least a modest part of the stone be removed. I have no knowledge whether a subdivision of the stone would be satisfactory to the people who are interested in its transfer.

Mr. Barnett: Has the government been in touch—

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I made that suggestion months ago and I hope it will be followed.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Barnett: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The question I was going to ask was whether the government has been in touch with any of the authorities who have become expert in the techniques of moving such stones to higher ground.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the Leader of the Opposition has a supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is it not possible to take a portion of that stone and set it aside? It is regarded as something sacred to the Indians, and with a government that has spent so much on so many things surely this shrine should be preserved in part. Does the minister not agree?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I must say that an Indian friend of mine not so long ago said there had been so much talk about the stone in the house that he was surprised it had not moved itself.

[Mr. Barnett.]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR DESIGNATION OF GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS AS DELIVERY POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Would the minister consider asking the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board whether it might be possible to lease the various government terminal elevators located in Calgary, Lethbridge, Moose Jaw and other points and designate them as delivery points so that the farmers would be able to haul grain directly to them and make use of the storage space there?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in so far as this question relates to my responsibilities as the minister reporting for the wheat board I would take this question as notice and pass along the suggestion. Of course the Minister of Agriculture is responsible for the board of grain commissioners.

NATIONAL PARKS

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS—WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, is the minister in charge of Canada's national parks in a position today to reply to the question I posed several days ago regarding a winter works program for the Cape Breton Highlands National Park, which at the time was kindly taken as notice by the Minister of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker, not at this time.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DEVELOPMENT OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the minister of Indian affairs in relation to the recent report and recommendations of the commission on government in the north. Will the people in the north have an opportunity to express their reaction to the recommendations of the commission prior to their implementation by the government?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there has already been wide distribution of this report and we expect to have a great deal of comment. We have no plan for any formal hearings at the present time. As a matter of fact, I believe the commission itself saw and spoke to almost 4,000 people in its visits through the territories, which I would think is between 25 per cent and 30 per cent of all the adult citizens there.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Can the minister tell the house if his department, with the help of its ice-breakers, will encourage winter navigation to the Montreal harbour this year?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): That is a very big question, sir. I do not think I can answer it properly at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that the question is not very urgent at this time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF TAB PAYMENTS TO AUTOMOBILE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour but in his absence I direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Does the parliamentary secretary know whether the revised formula for the payment of transitional assistance benefits to the laid-off automobile workers has been submitted to cabinet and whether a decision has been arrived at yet?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can only bring that question to the attention of the minister on his return tomorrow.

COAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Some months ago he informed the house that he would make a formal statement on what he intended doing with the Donald report when it came down. The other day the minister suggested that he is continuing to study it. May I ask him now when the house may expect a statement of government policy with respect to the Donald report on the Cape Breton mines?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, when we got the Donald report we said that we would expect representations to be made by the concerned parties. To answer a previous question, I hope to go to Cape Breton as soon as I can to receive these representations personally. After receiving these representations the government, which is studying the report, will make its policy known.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the minister has informed the communities, the company and the miners' union of the specific dates that he is going to be there and has invited their representations. When is this to take place?

Mr. Pepin: When I came back from Calgary just a few hours ago I received a telegram from one of these groups. I mentioned in my answer that I will make myself available in about ten days time.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, since I might be pardoned for confusing initials, I wonder if the Prime Minister would take it upon himself to do a bit of research and inform the house what the initials O.H.M.S. mean?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PARTICIPATION BY FINANCE MINISTER IN MEDICARE DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. When is the minister going to enter the debate on medicare to explain to the house the relationship between medicare and inflation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been looking for an opportunity to enter the debate. I thought the most useful time would be when the house is in committee, when I can deal with two or three matters which could be of particular significance to the Minister of Finance.

EDUCATION

ONTARIO—REPORTED DELAYS IN STUDENT AWARD PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the urgent financial needs of many Ontario college students and the widespread dismay at the restrictive terms and delays in the Ontario government's student award program, can the minister assure the house that no delays or restrictions have been imposed or dictated by the government of Canada? Also, will he press the province of Ontario to ensure a prompt and fair distribution of the funds which have been committed to student aid by this house?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this would require a rather longer answer than would be appropriate on orders of the day. I do intend to make a short statement on motions at an early date.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is making that statement will he also explain why the 10,000 $1,000 scholarships are not being awarded?

Mr. Ricard: They were in the program of the Liberal party.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Would the minister inform the house when the new appointment will be made to the senior position with the C.B.C. and if the policy of alternating between French speaking and English speaking presidents will be maintained?

[Mr. Prittie.]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that the appointment will be made at the time Mr. Ouimet leaves office. I should also like to say that the speculation I have seen in the press, both in news columns and in columnists' articles, is wholly without foundation.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON BOYCOTT OF FOOD STORES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister anything to report to the house on the housewives' boycott of food chain stores in Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is not in order.

GRAIN

CHURCHILL, MAN.—STORAGE IN TERMINAL ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Canadian National is satisfied it has sufficient box cars available to fill the elevators at Churchill and in view of the fact that the wheat board is of the opinion that the Canadian National has not sufficient box cars to haul the grain which the wheat board would like it to haul, will the minister not ask the top authorities of the Canadian National and the wheat board to get together to decide whether the elevators in Churchill can be filled this winter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the questions asked yesterday I have had a conversation with the wheat board. I should like to read a sentence or two from the message I received from the wheat board as to the reasons for its policy. I think it will answer the hon. gentleman's question.

When the shipping season at Churchill was completed the board had the choice of filling the terminal at Churchill or continuing to incur substantial demurrage costs at the port of Vancouver. We chose to ask the C.N.R. to divert the cars immediately into the Vancouver movement so that its sales commitments could be met.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not feel that this does not clear up the question inasmuch as the Canadian National still will not say whether it has sufficient box cars to do both jobs?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the position of the Canadian National. The Canadian National has a large but after all limited number of cars and it uses these cars as the wheat board directs in order to meet the shipping program and the needs of our customers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a supplementary question.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister has read part of the message from the wheat board, would be now table the entire message?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is a message that I received yesterday in response to a conversation. This is between myself and the wheat board. I have put these words forward because this is what the wheat board reported to me. I do not think I am under any obligation to table the rest of the message. Though I have no particular objection I think this is a matter in which the minister must exercise discretion. He should not be compelled by the house to lay before hon. members privileged messages.

Mr. McIntosh: On a point of order, I think the rules of the house make it necessary that the minister table the document, if requested to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is the exact rule.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALARIES OF POSTAL WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. About a week ago I asked the Postmaster General if he had received representations from the International Association of Machinists in Toronto protesting the inadequacy of the pay increases granted to its members. After orders of the day the minister indicated that he would take the matter under advisement. Has the minister done so and is he in a position to respond?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): I have received the letter, Mr. Speaker. I must advise the hon. member that increases in salary for all civil servants including postal employees are the responsibility of the Treasury Board.

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed, from Monday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I was making the point that medical care legislation is fundamentally a provincial matter and that in giving financial assistance to such plans the federal government should not attempt to rewrite them or to dictate them contrary to the wishes of the provincial legislatures. Each province knows what it can afford; it understands its local and immediate problems and is aware of the political philosophy which its people support. The fundamental requirement for federal support of a medicare plan should be social justice, that is, free premiums and care for those in need and assistance for those with low incomes. The remainder of the plan should not concern the federal government.

That is not what the present plan seeks to do. It would force upon the provinces a plan favoured by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) under the threat of withholding financial support. The mere fact that the plan is being postponed for a year for economic reasons is a potent argument in favour of the amendment before the house.

The fundamental difference between our approach as Conservatives and that of the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party is that we would provide first of all for the needy and for those in the lower income brackets whereas they are calling for a massive re-direction of income into state coffers for the payment of premiums. This not only directs more power to government but it reduces the freedom of the individual to choose the services and insurance he requires.

I wonder whether some members on the government side do not ask themselves why this bill is receiving such unanimous and enthusiastic support from the New Democratic Party. It is not because it provides for the poor and needy. The Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia plans already do that, as do the plans proposed by other provinces. The real reason is that this plan is in accord with the socialist philosophy of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Douglas: Also the Hall report.

Mr. Aiken: I would say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) that the Hall report did not spell out in detail what the plan for medical care should be to the point this bill does and to the point he has indicated. It supports an agreed medical care plan and we also support a medical care plan.

Mr. Douglas: Would the hon. member point out any provision in this bill which is not fully supported and recommended in the Hall report?

Mr. Aiken: I was coming to that question by a reverse process. The Hall report does not suggest this bill in its totality. I have read the report and it says, basically, that medical care must be provided for those in need. But I have seen nothing in the report to the effect that it must be a plan compulsory for every person in Canada.

Mr. Douglas: That is exactly what it says.

Mr. Aiken: I beg to differ.

Mr. MacEachen: Well, read it.

Mr. Aiken: I have read it and I am sure most of my friends have read it carefully. I say this bill is not what the Hall Commission recommended.

Mr. Douglas: It is exactly what it recommended.

Mr. Aiken: I think we are wasting time discussing it because we have all read the report. The commission made recommendations which are general in nature, not specific, to be implemented by agreement.

In addition to the fact that this bill reflects the philosophy of the N.D.P. it throws a gigantic burden suddenly on the national economy. Moreover, it is not simply a plan to provide for the needy. This could be achieved by supporting the three plans now in existence and, in due course, the proposed plans of other provinces. It constitutes another giant step toward socialism and it is unnecessary as a means of providing social justice. If the government really wants to provide free medical care across Canada for those who need it at a price the economy can afford and do it now, then the party opposite should support plans which provide, as a minimum, free premiums for those in need, reduced premiums for those with lower incomes, and membership for others on a voluntary basis at ordinary premium rates.

By supporting such a plan as the medical insurance plan in Ontario the government could move into the field of prepaid medical care across Canada in a reasonable and gradual way without swamping the economy. To put it bluntly, we could have federally supported medicare plans all across Canada by the original target date for this scheme, and ensure that all needy persons were looked after, if the government were to accept the principle of the amendment now before the house. By insisting on all or nothing, those who reject the amendment and push through the original bill will be depriving the needy in Canada of assistance in obtaining medical care for at least one additional year in six of our provinces.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the hon. member would comment on the plan he is advocating in the context of a means test? Is he not importing a means test into medical care by proposing that medicare be made available free to those who cannot afford it at all and that others should pay part of the premiums? Would it not be better to stay away from a means test in this important piece of legislation?

Mr. Aiken: I have to admit that I do not like a means test. At the same time, I have seen the Ontario plan in effect for some months and it appears to be working satisfactorily. It works well. People who have no taxable income have their premiums paid and those who have low taxable incomes get reductions. No one goes around to individuals who apply asking them what their incomes are, how they live and so forth. The plan is based entirely on the statements of those who make application. As I say, if they pay no income tax they pay no premiums. I do not like a means test but I think that in the context of what we are doing a plan on the basis of the Ontario plan is satisfactory and acceptable to the majority of the people; I should not say to everybody because there are always people who feel that any plan is improperly administered. I merely say that I think the Ontario plan is a suitable one, that it is working well, and that in my view the federal government could easily support it as of July 1, 1967.

In the same way, the government could support a number of the other plans, paying the premiums of the needy and of those living on low incomes. It could do this without swamping the economy as the present plan appears likely to do on the admission of the government itself. I am offering an alternative which would work, though I recognize that the hon. member and myself have different philosophies on this question. I do not hesitate to say that I prefer that those who can afford to pay their own premiums should not pay them under the government plan but should pay them somewhere else.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit one more question? He and I have different philosophies, but I want to get to the bottom of this. How does he reconcile his statement that he does not like a means test with his support of the proposition that a person has to declare his poverty in order to get free medicare?

Mr. Aiken: He merely declares his income. If he has an income that is not taxable then that fact is declared and accepted.

Mr. Knowles: That is poverty.

Mr. Aiken: I do not think it is a case of poverty at all. In fact, I suspect there are a lot of people who do not pay income tax who should not get an exemption, but this is erring on the wrong side. They may well be liable to income tax but do not declare their income. Nevertheless, the principle is that what they declare for tax purposes qualifies them.

I do not particularly object to this system. I have seen it work. If I had not seen it work I would be talking about something I did not know anything about. As I say, I have seen it work and nobody has ever complained to me about somebody from the government coming around and asking how much they use to support a wife and children, what further income is earned and so on. It is not that sort of plan.

My theory is that if the people of Saskatchewan want the kind of plan that the hon. member suggests, a universal plan, then all right, the federal government should support it. I do not say that the federal government should not support it, because that plan is providing for the needy and for low income people. If Saskatchewan wants that sort of plan, if the provincial legislature has passed it and the people have accepted it, then fine, the federal government should support it.

Likewise, if the people of Ontario are satisfied with the plan which that province's government has come up with, then the federal government should support it. Further, if the people of Alberta and British Columbia are satisfied with the plans their provinces have promulgated, then the federal government should say; "All right, that is your plan and we will support it." My contention is that the federal government should not come along and say, "We don't care what you want in the provinces. This is what we consider is a proper plan and we will give you money only for it."

My objection is based on constitutional grounds. The federal government is walking in over the top of the provinces and telling them: "This is your jurisdiction. We know we have no business in this but we won't give you any money unless you meet our standards." I am not going to argue against a universal plan if that is what is wanted and brought into effect in any province, but it is not the business of the federal government.

I have spent a little more time on this particular subject than I intended, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to mention another matter before I sit down. Sooner or later, unless the amendment is carried, we are going to have to vote on second reading of the bill. I must admit that my approach to voting on second reading has changed drastically since my experience with the Canada Pension Plan bill. At that time the house and the public were assured by letters from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) which I asked to have tabled and which were tabled—there were about a dozen of them—that once the Canada Pension Plan was passed in principle the government would be happy to hear all sorts of people make representations and to alter the plan to suit whatever the special joint committee recommended. It was a very magnanimous offer: "Give us second reading and you can do anything you like with the plan afterwards."

I went along with this. I voted for second reading because I believed in a pension plan, but when I came to serve on the committee, on which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also sat, I found that the government had no intention of making any changes in the pension plan bill, and it did not.

The government opposed every amendment that was put forward. It cajoled witnesses who were against the general philosophy that the government was putting forward, and I got the feeling that the assurances that had been given to us were not given with any intention of carrying them out but merely to get the bill past second reading.

This makes a very difficult problem for me and several others who might support second reading of this bill on the general idea that we would be supporting a bill for medical care, but my feeling right now is that unless there are some definite assurances that the government is not only going to consider amendments but will look at them wholeheartedly, we will be making a mistake in supporting the bill on second reading.

The interpretation which the government put on second reading of the pension plan bill was that we had supported every section of the pension plan. Every time in committee that we raised a question about a clause, they said that it contained one of the principles of the bill and we had approved it when we approved second reading.

The government had better let us know what it is going to do in the present case. We know one clause it is going to amend, the one stipulating the commencement date, and to my mind that is a pretty fundamental clause. Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) told us that in the committee stage he is going to make some major policy statements. This is not what I understood to be the purpose of committee stage at all. I think that on second reading we should consider the principle and then in committee consider details.

I am not at all satisfied about this yet, Mr. Speaker. From the experience we had with the Canada Pension Plan bill we can see there is something left very much up in the air. In the case of the pension plan bill a lot of people felt very much let down, and felt there was not a wholehearted—

Mr. Munro: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Aiken: When I finish my sentence. A lot of people felt that there was not a wholehearted and forthright effort made by the government in that special committee really to come up with a plan that would be acceptable.

Mr. Munro: Would the hon. member accept a question now?

Mr. Aiken: Yes.

Mr. Munro: The hon. member sat on the joint committee on the Canada Pension Plan. Would he not agree there were several fairly significant changes that came out of that committee and were implemented in the legislation?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I cannot remember one important change that was made in that committee. One point I do remember is that one of the hon. members from Vancouver seconded my motion in connection with a change in widows' pensions affecting what are called death-bed marriages, but even with the support of one Liberal member we did not get it through.

Mr. Munro: What about the transition period?

Mr. Aiken: The only things we got through were the amendments proposed by the government and they were not proposed after evidence or after debate. In each case they were introduced at the beginning of a hearing and government members said, "This is what we are going to amend". The hon. member may shake his head, but I never had such a traumatic experience in my nine years in this house. There was nothing which government members would accept.

Mr. Munro: The amendments were worked out by agreement.

Mr. Aiken: The amendments were voted upon and every opposition amendment was voted down; that was the end of it. I think the government can do this because it is their bill, but let us not go into the committee with any false understanding. That was the situation at the time of the committee hearing on the pension plan bill. In this particular case there is no special committee. The minister does not want to hear the arguments twice; once is enough. He is going to hear them in committee of the whole house, and I cannot blame him for not wanting to hear them again in a special committee.

We are on the horns of a dilemma. If I could trust the government to do what they have expressed their willingness to do I would support second reading. But I cannot because I do not think they have any intention to make any fundamental changes except in the date by moving it on a year.

Having stated my views, Mr. Speaker, how shall I vote? I am going to vote, of course, for the amendment. Second, if there is a choice later between the proposal we have before us and a better one, I will choose the other one. If voting against this bill will force introduction of another and better bill, then I will vote against it. Finally, if there is a choice between some type of medical care or none, I will vote for medical care now. We will have to see how things develop during the debate. Whatever happens to the amendments—and the other parties may bring forward amendments or the government may do so—I hope some good sense will find its way into the minds of the government members so that as a beginning we will have a responsible medical care plan for the needy and for the low income people immediately. If it has to be expanded later, that will be up to the provinces and not the federal government.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend who has just taken his seat would be called a hell-dodger in religious circles in respect of his last remarks.

Mr. Aiken: What?

Mr. Winch: A hell-dodger, one who goes to every church in the hope that when he dies he will not go to hell but to heaven. The hon. member has taken the same position on medical care. He has introduced so many "ifs" and "buts" that he is a political hell-dodger hoping he will come out on top no matter what happens. If that is not an example of political expediency demonstrating the attitude of Conservatives on this matter, then I have not heard one.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I do not know exactly what the hon. member's words mean. I am expressing an honest opinion. I do not care whether he likes it or not, and I do not care whether I am being philosophical. I believe in medical care for the needy.

Mr. Winch: Of course my hon. friend is expressing his honest opinion. A hell-dodger wants to get to heaven and goes to every church in the hope he will go there. My friend is the same. He wants to be on the top of the heap no matter what comes out. He uses all these "ifs" and "buts" so that, despite his tribulations, he can go to the people and say: "This is what I stand for because I stood for everything".

I greatly appreciate the opportunity to be able to speak on second reading of this most important bill now before us. I appreciate the opportunity to speak this afternoon because it will not be possible for me to be in my seat tomorrow. A subcommittee of the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate on penitentiaries is going to make its first visit to a penitentiary, namely, St. Vincent de Paul.

When I think of a penitentiary, Mr. Speaker, I think of the inmates, and when I think of the inmates I cannot help but think of the relationship between the inmates and the Liberal government so far as medicare is involved. Inmates of a penitentiary are considered to be anti-social because they have broken the law of the land, because they have not accepted a commitment and because they have not demonstrated an understanding of what authority, commitment or responsibility means to people generally. On this issue I have in my mind this relationship between the inmates in a penitentiary and the present Liberal government. I believe it is a very definite one because, in light of the basic principles of morals and ethics, the Liberals gave a commitment of policy to the people of Canada in the last election. Every Liberal candidate gave a commitment to the electorate. That commitment was a trust, because when you are running for election and give a commitment you are giving a trust that the promises you make you will fulfil.

What was the promise given by every Liberal candidate? The promise in the Liberal program was that if they were returned as a government they would immediately introduce and put into operation a universal over-all medicare plan. That was the commitment, Mr. Speaker; it was a trust to the people of Canada. I speak not only of the campaign, because I shall make reference to speeches made in this House of Commons only a few short months ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) gave a commitment to the members of the House of Commons that the medical insurance bill would be proceeded with and go into operation on July 1 of next year.

We have now been advised in the past two or three days by the self-same Minister of National Health and Welfare that we shall vote on second reading on the same bill in principle that was introduced a few months ago but that after adopting the principle on second reading it will be amended so as to postpone it for a further year until July 1, 1968. I say that the Liberal government has definitely betrayed the commitment and trust given to the people of Canada. It has betrayed not only the people of Canada but also the House of Commons both in respect of the statements made and the trust. Surely it is understandable that henceforth because of this betrayal the people cannot trust the Liberal party in the future nor can the House of Commons trust statements made by a Liberal Prime Minister and another cabinet minister in the House of Commons because they themselves have proven that they are guilty of betrayal.

It goes beyond that, Mr. Speaker. It is my contention that the government in general—I do not like to say this but I refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in particular—have not only betrayed their commitment and their trust but by their actions they have and are aiding and abetting influences in this country which would undermine the parliamentary system itself. In 33 years of campaigning I think I have stated at every meeting I have attended that I believe the parliamentary system is the greatest institution ever devised by man for the solution of man's problems. I stand by that proposition. It is also my belief that in the past few years, the last two or three in particular, the institution of parliament has been undermined and brought into ill repute and disrespect because in this forum there has been too much of personalities, prejudices and party expediency. As a result, "politician" to many people is now a dirty word. Convinced as I am about the correctness of what I say, let me add that in my estimation this Liberal government has done more to bring the institution of parliamentary democracy into ill repute and disrepute in the last few days than any other government by its actions over the years. They have done so by their betrayal of a commitment and a trust.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the majority of the speeches made during the second reading stage of this bill, as a result of which I believe I now have an understanding of the position being taken by the various parties. The Liberals are in favour of universal over-all medicare and want this bill passed in principle, but they want to postpone its effectiveness from year to year. The Conservatives also believe in a system of universal medicare, but rather than supporting over-all coverage they have moved an amendment which, if adopted, will effectively block any introduction of universal over-all medicare in Canada for at least the next 12 to 14 years. That is what they will accomplish if they have their way.

It is also evident from speeches made by members of that party that they believe universal over-all coverage can only be adopted on the basis of a priority given to private enterprise. This makes it evident that they put the profits of private enterprise in the medical insurance field ahead of the health and well-being of the people of Canada under a government operated non-profit system. To me this is a completely anti-social, inexplicable and unreasonable attitude on the part of a political party in this day and age.

I must admit I am not quite certain where the members of the Social Credit and Créditiste parties stand, but I think I am correct in saying that no matter what their final position is it will be a waffling one and one of political expediency, because that is their record in this house.

The position of the New Democratic Party is well known. We stand for universal over-all medicare in Canada and we mean by that a plan instituted now. We will, however, accept the commencement of this plan on July 1 of next year and will do everything in our power to block any postponement of the effective date. We intend to be, if I may put it this way, the conscience of the Liberal party in order to prevent it from postponing its commitment further. Just as we try to reclaim and save those who break the law, we are going to try to reclaim and save those political heathen who have betrayed Canadians by proposing that medicare be postponed.

We were very glad to hear this afternoon that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is going to speak on this bill during the committee stage. Personally I would prefer him to speak during second reading. As a matter of fact, he owes it to this house and the people of Canada to make it known on what basis he reached the decision to exercise his whip of persuasion and get the cabinet and the Liberal party to agree to this postponement. He owes it to us, when we are discussing the principle of this bill, to indicate how a one-year postponement is going to assist in curbing an inflationary trend. He owes it to this house to tell us what pressure was brought to bear on him from outside in order to persuade him to exert pressure on the cabinet and the government. It is my personal belief that his decisions was not reached only because of the inflationary trend but also as a result of pressure from outside. I believe that outside pressure forced the government to kneel abjectly because it is in a financial jam and requires the co-operation of the monetary powers to refund bonds and float new loans. We should like to hear an intensive, detailed, factual and honest statement by the Minister of Finance on second reading before we approve this bill in principle.

It is imperative that I explode a myth expounded yesterday by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein). I listened very carefully to what the hon. gentleman said and rather than take any chance I may misquote him I should like to read from his speech as reported at page 8742 of Hansard. He said in part:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of medicare.

At page 8743 he said this, and it is a jewel of Liberal wisdom:

> It is far more important that this legislation be passed by this house than that it shall come into effect on July 1, 1967 or July 1, 1968. The important thing is that it does become part of the legislation of this country.

Surely that is the greatest bit of political eyewash and political hogwash I have ever heard. He suggests that it is important to get the legislation on the statute books, but that when it is to come into operation is not important. Surely the only interpretation we can possibly place on those words of the hon. member for Cartier is that the Liberals' word is good, particularly after they introduce legislation and it is placed on the statute books. The implication is that the Liberal government, having introduced legislation and having had it placed on the statute books, would put it into effect. My hon. friend should look back on the record of Liberal governments in this country. Not only does their word mean nothing, not only does their commitment mean nothing, not only does their honour mean nothing, but their own legislation does not necessarily mean anything.

I had the honour of being a member of the British Columbia legislature from 1933 to 1953. In 1933 the Liberals campaigned on two slogans, "work and wages" and "over-all medicare" to cover every citizen of B.C. On November 2, 1933 they were elected with an overwhelming majority, so overwhelming that in a 48-member legislature the official opposition of which I was a member only had 7 seats. What happened to the Liberal promises regarding work and wages? Apart from the time of war when Canadians had to kill or be killed and our production was for destruction and not for consumption, there was no fulfilment of the work and wages policy.

How about the over-all medical plan which was promised to all the citizens of B.C. in the campaign preceding the 1933 election? The Liberals kept their word and in 1936 they introduced over-all medicare for every citizen of British Columbia. The B.C. legislature unanimously passed it and the commissioners were appointed. An advisory board was set up, literature was printed and the legislation was to be put into effect. But then what happened? The medical men of British Columbia said to the B.C. Liberals: "If you put that legislation into effect we will go on strike". That is what happened. Was the grand old Liberal party interested in their own magnificent medicare legislation for the citizens of British Columbia? No. They said to the B.C. medical association: "We bow to your wisdom". That is what they did. The legislation is still on the statute books of British Columbia in 1966 and we still do not have over-all medicare in our province.

The hon. member for Cartier had the unmitigated audacity to rise and say, speaking on specific medicare legislation: "Do not worry about when it starts. Just get the legislation on the statute books." Having had the experience of Liberal promises and kowtowing to the kind of pressure I have just mentioned, we want the legislation on the statute books and we want it written into the legislation that it will go into effect on July 1 of next year. I think we have the right to demand that what we request be granted and that the Liberal promises be fulfilled.

This government operates in a very peculiar manner. Day after day we read the pronouncements of that "Sharp" Minister of Finance sitting on the other side in regard to guide lines and in regard to holding the line on increases in the wages paid to the workers of our country. We are told that these increases should not exceed the increases in the gross national product. They should be held down to 3 or 4 per cent annually. The government tells the useful people of Canada, the workers, what they should do and what increases they should receive, but I have not heard any complaints from the Liberals about the action in the last few weeks and months of the doctors of Canada who have increased their fees in one fell swoop by 25 to 50 per cent. Newspapers of the last week end have reported that increases in doctors' fees in Ontario have been as high as 37 per cent. I presume that every member in this house received this morning a statement from the Seafarers' International Union regarding what is happening to their welfare and medicare plan. The increases are going into effect almost immediately.

Visits by doctors at a hospital have increased from $3 to $4, visits at the doctor's office have increased from $4 to $6 and visits elsewhere than at a doctor's office or at a hospital have increased from $6 to $8. The over-all increases amount to 25 to 50 per cent. They have gone away above the guide lines which the useful people of Canada, the workers, are supposed to follow according to this government. As a result of all these increases the average person cannot afford a single illness. That is why it is so necessary to have universal over-all medicare so that not only can the wealthy help the poor but so that the healthy can help the ill because the day can come to almost anyone when the healthy will become the ill.

The only interpretation I can give to the Conservative policy is that of medicare on the basis of a means test. Basically it is medicare for the needy and the indigent, but how many of them are there? The Conservatives have not mentioned how many needy and indigent there are. I was most interested to read this morning's newspaper report concerning an interview given by Dr. R. K. C. Thomson of Edmonton, president of the Canadian Medical Association. He does not like the government plan, nor does he like universal medicare. He agrees with the Tories, that is, he agrees with medicare on a means test basis. However, whilst the Tories do not state how many people would be affected according to Dr. Thomson the figures, 20 to 30 per cent of the population, or possibly 5 million people, require to be covered by a medical plan even on a means test basis because they cannot afford to pay for medical help and assistance.

I must say that the plan before us goes far beyond the indigent and far beyond those who definitely cannot afford to pay. The individual cost of medicare cannot be borne by 90 per cent of the people of Canada because it is such that one serious illness can bankrupt or put into serious debt any average working class family. A major illness today can run you into thousands of dollars, and I wonder how many working class people have $1,000 in their bank accounts. Everybody needs medical protection, and we insist that this the only progressive policy that can be considered at this time.

So, Mr. Speaker, we support the bill as originally introduced. We support the principle of universal medicare and we want to see it go into effect as soon as possible and not later than July 1, 1967. We will do everything we can in the interest of the people of this country to see that this is done and to stop the reactionary Tories and Liberals from postponing the date of the commencement of the plan.

Mr. Boulanger: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has he read the last speech made by the Quebec leader of the New Democratic Party—I hope he knows who he is—Mr. Robert Cliche?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Winch: I have not read the last speech made by Mr. Cliche.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on medicare during the last few days and have also been interested in earlier statements made about it. Frequently it has been an exercise in Canadian political history with a Liberal government and the New Democratic Party in the opposition, striving very hard to indicate that each of them was very much in the forefront in staking out the original claim on the homestead of medicare. Admittedly many years have gone by, and I suppose there is nothing sadder to the original homesteaders than to find that the people who follow after them may not have quite the same high regard for the homestead as they had when it was originally staked out.

We have heard some rather surprising speeches today, particularly the one just completed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Some members of this house must wonder just what the explanation is for some of these speeches. This afternoon I should like to give the house some explanation of the phenomenon that has been occurring. I am indebted to an interesting little book recently published called "The Elite In The Welfare State", which has a great deal to say about our present political situation in Canada. As we move ever increasingly into the welfare state, we seem to be running into sharp conflict as to just who composes the elite of this welfare state.

I should like to quote a bit from this—

Mr. Winch: Who is the author?

Mr. Johnston: The author is Piet Thoenes, a Dutch sociologist. The book is available from the parliamentary library. I quote:

It is a characteristic of the elite that its superiority imposes a task upon it. This task, either as a right or as a duty, includes that of determining the destiny of others. By accepting this task, every elite takes upon itself a certain burden of responsibility. Hence the selection of the ruling authority on which this responsibility is to be laid determines its character.

An elite, however, does not consider itself obliged to be answerable to its actual or future subjects. Indeed it has not received its commission from these people—

I believe this statement is true of the New Democratic Party who have never been given a commission from the people of Canada on a national basis.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Neither have you.

Mr. Johnston: I have not complained about that at all. I continue quoting:

—but this does not imply that it has, on this account, no sort of responsibility; it simply means that the elite seeks its responsibility from some other source, from the place from which it supposes itself to have received its commission. In abstract, this means that it will justify its actions by calling on an idea, a divine message, or a scientific law—a biological, psychological, economic or sociological law—or even a system combining a number of these elements.

This is one of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, that we have had so many references to history and why, at the opening of this debate, the spokesman for the New Democratic Party referred to this as being such a historic moment or he had hoped it would be but was afraid it would not be the historical moment that he had expected. It is important that a very heavy gloss of history be laid over this debate. I continue quoting:

In practice this means that it seeks a blessing on its ideas from an ecclesiastical or scientific authority, either one which is already in being, or else one which the elite itself has brought into existence.

From what sources of inspiration, from what divine promptings or scientific laws have certain groups been able to derive their claim to be set in the position of the elect? Although some elites imagine themselves to have been commissioned by a higher authority—sent down from on high—nevertheless the sociological observer finds that in actual fact they have never fallen from heaven. There has always been a concrete social situation which has resulted in their being called into the existence as a group.

Later the author goes on to state:

Generally speaking, elites as groups are not born easily. It is true to say that it is always flattering to human vanity to know oneself to be a member of an upper set; yet on the one hand, to cut oneself adrift from the greater, original whole and on the other to run the risk of failing to bring it off satisfactorily, demands of the people concerned a truly exceptional amount of courage—or, if one prefers it, of pride.

I have one more short quotation:

Now, if a group sets itself up as an elite under favourable conditions, then generally speaking it will need a different source of inspiration. The greater the difficulties in the way of acceptance of an elite, the more irrefutable a claim and an inspiration it has to have. The more revolutionary the character of its emergence (owing to the requirements of its situation) the more will it attempt to surround its message with a gloss of inevitability, of absoluteness and incontrovertability. A group in this sort of situation quite easily comes to confer upon its message the nature of a revelation.

Certainly we have the revelation, I suppose you would call it, in the Hall report. This report has been treated as absolutely divine writ which must be accepted without argument and must be implemented completely by the government of the day without alteration of any kind. In all of this, Mr. Speaker, the thing I find most surprising is that the government is always allowing itself to be pushed into a position where it seems to lose its own claim to being the elite in the welfare state. It has seemed so willing to hand its position over to the New Democratic Party without really any sound ground for so doing.

The book from which I am quoting has a sentence which applies to the government:

On the other hand, a group which moves in a situation of stimulating change can carry on in a somewhat calmer fashion.

I think the government has been wise in its decision to delay the implementation of medicare for a year. I feel it might have carried on in a somewhat calmer fashion and delayed the legislation as well. There is really no sound reason why we should be involved in this debate at the present time. The government is in charge and has been given a sort of mandate from the Canadian people. It should not always put itself in the position of being pushed into a series of panic reactions, fearful that somehow it may lose a particular position.

Medicare

I will return to the book a bit later. The thing that has amazed me about the many speeches has been the contrast between the speeches we had a few weeks ago on the back to work legislation when there was such tremendous concern expressed for the wishes of a vocational group, the railway workers who were involved in the legislation then before the house. Now the wheel has come completely around and we find the concern is that the government might consider the wishes of the vocational or, if you prefer the word, professional group involved in this matter. A completely converse point of view is taken. While it is certain that no back to work legislation totally repugnant to the railway workers would ever have been effective, I think it also behoves us to pay particular attention to the medical profession who are the people most directly involved and concerned in the question of medicare.

I feel that the bill can be supported in principle on second reading. Various provinces have shown how medicare can be instituted with the co-operation of the medical profession and the blessing of the people in the province concerned. One thing about the welfare state is that it finds itself in conflict with the democratic process. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) spoke movingly about his faith in parliament, but he might recall that this is not the only parliament in the country. There are legislatures or parliaments in the various provinces which have instituted medicare programs by the due processes of parliamentary democracy. I suggest it is not significantly or particularly democratic of this institution to lay down, somewhat after the fact, a set of principles for medicare that will be so stringent as to come into conflict with the schemes already in operation.

This is why I trust that in committee of the whole paragraph (c) of clause 4 (1) will be examined very closely and that the figure of 90 per cent will be seen as a somewhat variable figure and not as another bit of revelation that must be accepted as if it had been handed down. I suggest it is a figure that might bear alteration.

I also trust that when considering sub-section (2) on page 4, which refers to "the designation by the provincial authority of an agency or agencies to carry out any responsibility in connection with the receipt and payment of accounts rendered for insured services", the widest possible interpretation will be placed upon that wording so that the provincial governments will not be forced into instituting a monolithic organization which is unwanted by the medical profession and will be one of the things more than anything else which will jeopardize the success of the plan on the national level.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in committee of the whole it might be possible to amend the bill further to allow some of the groups who are not currently mentioned in the bill to be added. I speak of optometrists and chiropractors who perform functions of benefit to the Canadian people, who are regarded by average people as fulfilling medical functions and to whom they go for healing and relief. I suggest there is no reason why the bill cannot be so amended and these groups included in it.

I should like to conclude with another very brief quotation from "The Elite In The Welfare State":

> Democracy is still an immature system requiring care and attention if it is to thrive. Alongside this political system there is nowadays, moreover, an even younger social structure with a slightly different name, the welfare or the social security state. Both the political and the social form have many features in common, they are of the same family, so to speak, and live in the same house. Nevertheless, a close analysis of the character of the welfare state raises the query of whether there is the possibility of tension between the welfare state and democracy. Is there an equal chance of peaceful co-existence? Or, must one of the two go under? Such questions have certainly more than sociological interest alone, even though it is only within a sociological framework that the concept of the elite may be seen to lie at the heart of the problem. An elite appears indispensable to the welfare state and difficult to co-exist alongside democracy; for, it is always an essential characteristic of an elite as defined here that it is not obliged to make itself responsible for its actions to its de facto or its anticipated subjects. Democracy implies that it should be thus responsible.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the first question that occurs to me in speaking on the medicare bill is why the government brought this measure before the house at this time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) have stated that it will not be implemented until July 1, 1968. The question is particularly pertinent when there are so many matters that require the urgent and immediate attention of this house. For example, there is the problem of inflation. Some effective measure to deal with inflation should be immediately brought before the house by the government. Then there is the matter of assistance to education, the promised bursaries and scholarships for students.

Why not bring that matter before the house at this time rather than this medicare bill?

Another problem that has become almost critical is residential construction. In the October issue of the Monetary Times the following extract deals with the problem of residential construction:

> Squeezed by tight money and sharply rising costs, the industry—if their press notices are to be believed—is crumbling at its foundations, and this year will build only 140,000 houses, 110,000 short of the nation's needs. Those that are being built are horrendously costly in terms of the average wage earner's capacity to pay.

In the "Homebuilding News" for September there is a headline which refers to residential construction and states "July Starts Down 27 Per Cent". There is a resolution on the order paper, government order No. 101, in connection with amendments to the National Housing Act. Why has the government not brought this matter before the house at this time, deferring the medicare bill until a later date?

The New Democratic Party is making what appears to me to be a planned attack to try to pin the Conservative party with the label that we are trying to kill the medicare bill. I should like to place on the record, at least for the benefit of the people in my riding who will be reading my speech, the terms of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) on behalf of the Conservative party:

> This house, while of the opinion that provision should be made for medical services to be available to all Canadians at an adequate level on a prepaid basis, is nevertheless of the further opinion that no legislation for the provision of insured medical care services in Canada will be satisfactory unless it:
> (a) secures co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada;
> (b) recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by the individual;
> (c) makes adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research, the training of adequate numbers of doctors and other medical personnel, and
> (d) immediately provides for those persons who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services for themselves.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, how the socialists can interpret that amendment as designed to kill a national medicare scheme is beyond my comprehension. This falls into line with their holier-than-thou attitude. If our party tries to the best of its ability to improve a government measure, we are labelled as intending to kill the measure. To my knowledge all members of our party are in favour of a national medicare scheme. What we are trying to do is present to the government a plan that we think is better, a plan that will be more effective and that will help those who need help. We want to provide the help now, not on July 1, 1968.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who was naturally very sad that the medicare starting date was to be postponed, had a good point when, as found on page 8620 of Hansard, he said:

> This is a sad day, first, because we have before us today an open betrayal of the pledged word of the government of this country. Second, this is a sad day because the action of the government in proposing the postponement of medicare for a year is a discrimination against the needs of the people in this country, particularly their medical needs, and I refer particularly to those people who cannot afford the medical care they require. I submit that to treat the people of this country in this way is a shocking denial for which this parliament should not stand.

If our proposal is accepted it will do what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants, namely, provide immediately medical insurance for those people who need it. Roughly one third of the people of Canada cannot afford to pay the premiums required today for an adequate health insurance scheme.

Referring to the various clauses of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe East, we see that first of all the plan must be one which secures the co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada. Three provinces already have their own medical care plans. Other provinces have prepared studies and I believe are considering introducing their own plans. What assurance have we that if this bill becomes law the provinces across Canada, the major ones being Ontario and Quebec, will join the plan? We might end up with a statute that is not effective. The premiers have already indicated their objections and reservations with respect to the proposed government measure.

We say that to have an effective medicare plan that will be operative in every province of Canada the government ought to present a plan that will be clearly accepted in advance by the provinces. I do not hold any brief for the Canada Pension Plan, but the government had advance notice from the province of Quebec that the Canada Pension Plan which the federal government would seek to have passed would be approved of by Quebec. In other words, Quebec indicated it would institute a similar plan. There is lots of time before this plan is implemented in July of 1968. We say that the federal government should consult with the provinces to design a plan that will be acceptable to them. I am sure it would not be difficult to amend the present bill to make it acceptable to all provinces across Canada.

The next point in our amendment is:

(b) recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by the individual;

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has gone to a great deal of trouble trying to make it appear that the government proposal is not compulsory. It is obvious from the terms of the bill that it will be almost impossible for the provinces if they want to participate in the benefits, for which they have been taxed, not to compel their people to join the plan that the federal government is putting forward. In every sense of the word, therefore, it is compulsory. I do not know why the government should insist that the plan be compulsory. In view of the constitutional position, why does the government not give the provinces the option of joining the plan in such a way that the provinces can give an option to their people in regard to joining?

Another point overlooked by many people is that if the compulsory part of the plan is adopted those people who now contribute toward a private medical insurance plan and who have part of their premiums paid by their employers will lose the advantage of having their employers make that partial payment. It seems incongruous to have persons paying for two insurance schemes. Something like 60 per cent of the working people of Canada have private schemes into which the employer pays part of the premium. Once the compulsory scheme comes into effect those people will lose that privilege. I maintain, therefore, that it should be up to the individual to say whether he wants to join a government scheme—I refer to schemes such as exist now in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia—or whether he wants to stay with his own scheme, which might be better so far as he is concerned.

In case the government is of the opinion that the compulsory feature of this measure has been accepted by the people of Canada, I draw the attention of the house to "News & Views" of March 26, 1966, containing the result of a poll. The Toronto Star on February 10, 1966 printed the results of the most recent Canadian Institute of Public Opinion poll on compulsory medical insurance. According to this poll, as printed in "News & Views", 52 per cent of the people who gave an opinion were in favour of a voluntary government scheme as opposed to 41 per cent who were in favour of a compulsory scheme.

The next point in the amendment is:

I go back to my original statement. We propose a plan that will be effective. If a universal plan is passed and medical insurance is available to everyone it does not mean that medical services will also be available. It does not mean that at all. The fact of the matter, from what is contained in the Hall Commission report, is that, particularly if the government scheme is implemented, there will be a grave shortage not only of doctors but of all the other personnel involved in medical care.

For example, the Hall Commission report indicates that four new medical schools must be established by 1971-72. The report states elsewhere that it takes from eight to ten years to establish a new medical school. A fifth medical school should be established shortly after the other four. The report also recommends that the existing schools expand their enrolment. When the house is in committee I hope the minister will be able to tell us how the actual enrolment in medical schools existing in Canada has been increased.

The Hall Commission report also points out how a shortage of doctors may arise or be increased. At present in Canada the ratio of population per physician is 857. This ratio steadily improved between 1951 and 1961. The Hall Commission report points out that if the ratio continues to improve at the rate it has, by 1976 there will be a shortage of 4,691 doctors and by 1986 there will be a shortage of 13,329. We should keep in mind that today there are roughly 24,000 doctors in Canada. The commission indicates that the ratio of population to doctors might well remain as it is at present. However, judging from the circumstances in other countries, I submit there is room for much improvement in Canada with respect to the ratio of people to doctors.

In the United States, for example, there are 752 people per doctor, in New Zealand, 700, and in the U.S.S.R., 550. It seems obvious that in Canada, because of the vast distances to be covered and the way in which population is distributed, there must be a major improvement in the physician-population ratio. I maintain there is a real danger that if the plan now proposed is implemented even by 1968 people will be insured but will not be able to get adequate medical treatment because of the shortage of doctors and other personnel involved in medical care. Our amendment says, in effect, that adequate provision must first be made for the supply of such personnel before a national scheme is adopted.

The last point in our amendment is that immediate provision should be made for those who are unable for financial reasons to provide medical services for themselves. Surely our primary responsibility is to take care of those who are not able to care of themselves. This is a basic principle when government interferes in private fields and it does so because the private sector has not been doing the job of caring for those who cannot take care of themselves. There is no need for the government to help those who are capable of helping themselves, particularly when they may not desire government help.

As I have indicated, a large percentage of the working people of Canada have their own private insurance plans. In many cases the whole of the premium is paid by the employer. In others, half is paid by the employer. Many of these people would prefer to retain their own schemes. Why should they be forced to take part in a government scheme when they do not need it and in many cases do not want it?

So we maintain that the scheme should take care immediately of those who cannot provide for themselves by insurance. It may be expected that the provinces which have already introduced their own schemes have borne this thought in mind. In British Columbia, for instance, the province pays 90 per cent of the premiums of those who have no taxable income. In cases where the taxable income is less than $1,000, the province pays 50 per cent of the premiums. If the federal government were to assist the provinces further, surely the provinces would extend their insurance to cover not only physicians' services but all services, including eye and teeth care.

It is the people who are in need who should receive full coverage in respect of all medical treatment. It is more important to provide those who are in need with comprehensive coverage than it is to provide merely physicians' care for everyone in Canada. If we accept the fact that there is a shortage of medical personnel, which I think this is clearly demonstrated by the Hall report, then instead of acting initially to extend coverage to everyone in respect of physicians' fees only we should concentrate on those who cannot afford to provide their own insurance and make comprehensive coverage available to them.

I hope the government will consider our amendment in the spirit in which it is offered. We are in favour of a national insurance scheme and we feel that our proposal if accepted would provide for a more effective and a more equitable scheme in Canada.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member has been suggesting that there are not enough doctors or facilities at present to take care of a universal, comprehensive medical care scheme. Has he some idea as to the length of time which might be needed to acquire the necessary facilities?

Mr. Chatterton: According to the Hall Commission report five new medical colleges are required. Remember, that report was submitted in 1964. It takes between eight and ten years to establish a medical college. The commission also made recommendations as to increasing enrolment in the existing colleges. I think the responsibility rests on the government to make an assessment of the position today and say five years from now. There is a possibility of shortening the length of time necessary to establish a medical college and perhaps of shortening the medical course. The health resources fund, it will be remembered, was not approved until this year, two years after the Hall report was submitted. So I maintain that even by 1968 there will be a serious shortage of doctors.

I think it has been shown by the experience in Britain and in Saskatchewan that with the introduction of universal medicare there is an increase in the number of visits paid to doctors. So there is bound to be a shortage of doctors with an adverse effect on the quality of medical services, and I believe the situation will be worsened if we adopt the plan now proposed in its present form.

I maintain that the government should first make a thorough assessment of the position today, two years after the Hall report, as well as a year or two years from now, and that over-all coverage should be delayed until such time as the government is satisfied there are adequate personnel to take care of all reasonable medical needs.

Mr. Walker: One further question. Presumably the delay might amount to as long as five years, optimistically, or ten years, pessimistically. Is it the hon. member's suggestion that a comprehensive universal scheme should be delayed for that length of time, whether it is five years or ten years?

Mr. Chatterton: The first thing we think should be covered—and immediately, as of January 1 of next year—is the situation of those who are in need.

An hon. Member: They are already taken care of.

Mr. Chatterton: No. We should cover them immediately and others who wish to join should do so on a voluntary basis as is the case in British Columbia.

Mr. Walker: My question was this: the introduction of a universal, comprehensive scheme is recommended by the Hall Commission and, if I understand the hon. member correctly, he is suggesting that such a scheme should be deferred until facilities are available even if this means a delay of ten years.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chatterton: Our proposal provides first of all for the coverage of those in need and then for anyone thereafter on a voluntary basis. It could be introduced immediately as a national scheme. It is not compulsory; it is voluntary. It could be introduced immediately, and if there were a delay in respect of those not in need that would be all right. Our proposal could be implemented immediately, not in 1968 but right away.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have followed the course of this debate with considerable interest and it is not my intention, in speaking briefly, to repeat the many excellent arguments that have been advanced by members of our party for the introduction of a national health services insurance plan on July 1, 1967. However, during the course of this debate I have discovered that I am a pioneer in this respect in the advocacy of the need for a national health services insurance plan.

I find that I am the only member of the House of Commons at the present time who campaigned during the federal election of 1921 in support of a national health services insurance plan, which was adopted at the Liberal convention held in the fall of 1919 as the result of a motion moved by the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, seconded by the present Senator Turgeon. I will never forget that at that time my father was with me in that campaign because we were both interested in this type of legislation.

I might say I am very glad to note that many younger members of the house who have grown up since, and some who have even been born since that date, recognize the vision which many Canadians had with respect to the need for this plan at that time, and the essential soundness of the ideas which they expressed in resolutions from various local Liberal organizations to their provincial organizations, to the national organization and other conventions shortly after the termination of the first world war.

I remember quite clearly the atmosphere that prevailed at that time, the feeling that we had fought the last world war and were now provided with the opportunity to do something to build a sound society. I remember very clearly there were two things that particularly concerned the people of that day. The first was the need for a national old age pension plan and the second was the need for a national health services insurance plan.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, these plans were discussed at local organizations and there were what would be called seminars nowadays. I am not quite certain as to the exact meaning of that word, but there were get-togethers in the area I come from, the Kootenays, between various groups that discussed with great conviction the need for these two programs at that particular time, and also the need for the co-operation of local people if any plan, whether it be national, provincial or municipal, were to succeed.

I remember in my own case I happened to be the president of the local hospital board. The board met and members of the hospital society met and discussed what they could do in respect of our hospital facilities with respect to a plan of this sort and discussed the matter with the local doctor. There was that spirit of local participation which I think must be engendered and must be revived if any national plan of consequence is going to succeed to the full.

This was in a period when the majority of people looked forward to the end of all world wars and seized the opportunity to build a just and sound society. However, over the intervening years we have been disillusioned by the course of events. There is no need to go into recent history in that respect, including the failure of successive federal governments to introduce a national health services insurance plan.

The demand for a health services insurance plan was strong in British Columbia and this ferment continued from 1919 until the Liberal party was re-elected provincially in November, 1933. As I say, it was a subject discussed at all the local meetings of the organization and by other organizations. I remember that once again I campaigned as a member of the Liberal party in support of this program, but once again there was a delay in giving legislative effect to the overwhelmingly expressed will of the people.

When he spoke this afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) referred to what happened in the legislature of British Columbia. However, the pressure was so strong in this respect that in 1936 Dr. Weir, the minister responsible, introduced legislation in line with the Liberal provincial program which provided for a health services insurance program on a provincial scale. The legislation was passed by the legislature. A commission was established, but that was the end of it. I ask why, because we have heard nothing since of that legislation? The reason that plan was not given effect to, although the legislation is still on the statute books of the province of British Columbia, was that the medical profession at that time opposed the introduction of the plan on a provincial basis, although I did know of some who thought it could be more satisfactorily introduced on a federal basis.

Since that time more and more people and organizations have come to realize that all Canadians should be covered by a national health services insurance plan. Successive Liberal governments have been aware of public sentiment in this respect. The late Right Hon. Mackenzie King was very aware of it. In fact, I remember on one occasion having a conversation with that former prime minister of Canada on this subject because he stopped me to tell me to send his kind congratulations to my father who was having a birthday in the near future, and I did so.

This desire was emphasized by trade unions, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, farmers unions, women's organizations of various types, and other organizations, and the government mildly responded to these representations by the introduction of legislation to provide for further research into this problem, to provide for grants for hospital beds when hospitals were being constructed, and by legislation to provide for further contributions toward provincial hospital insurance plans that were appreciated at that time. When those plans were introduced members of this party actually thought the government was introducing those proposals before launching on a national health services insurance program.

I rise at this time, Mr. Speaker, to express my support for the principle and purpose of the bill, although I must say it has suffered from a very Sharp frost in recent days, and to express my opposition to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). I have great respect for the hon. member, but on reading his amendment carefully I am of the opinion that he has, in somewhat different terms, expressed the opinion of the Canadian Medical Association. I read their letter when I received it and at this point I would like to quote in part from a letter I received from Dr. R. K. C. Thomson, president of the Canadian Medical Association. This is what Dr. Thomson had to say:

> The enclosed letter in respect to Bill C-227 was forwarded to the Prime Minister and will be discussed with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We hope that all members of parliament will seriously consider and support our more practical approach to medical services insurance—
> 1. which would provide insurance for those who need financial assistance;

That means on a means test basis.

> 2. which could be serviced by existing medical personnel;

That was the very same argument used in 1921 with regard to the national program proposed at that time and in 1936 when the legislature of British Columbia adopted a bill to provide for provincial health insurance.

> 3. which would maintain the quality of medical care;

We also heard that argument on those two occasions.

> 4. which would not be too costly for the provinces or the federal government;

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we in Canada with our vast natural resources would not find a social welfare measure of this type too costly when the governments of Great Britain and other European countries have had plans of this type in effect over a good number of years and have improved them as a result of experience.

> 5. which would have the support of the doctors of Canada.

I must say, after listening to the hon. gentleman and the terms of his amendment, I cannot reconcile his speech and the terms of the amendment with the remarks made by his leader when the Hall Commission report was tabled. At that time and in the press later in eulogistic terms he said that that report laid the foundation for legislation which his government intended to introduce.

As a matter of fact, very similar arguments were used by some sections of the medical profession against the introduction of the national health services insurance plan in 1921 and again in 1936 when Dr. Weir introduced a similar plan in the legislature of British Columbia. I remember the disappointment among many members of the Liberal party at that time who were sincerely concerned about these matters. I remember one cabinet minister who was very disappointed—the hon. member for Vancouver East will bear me out on this—the former Hon. Mary Ellen Smith, who was a social reformer and who did great work in the legislature of British Columbia, particularly in connection with establishing the rights of women, non-discrimination and so on.

Although I know outstanding doctors who supported the plan—as does the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) whose remarks we listened to the other day with great interest—in this house and in the country, I think that owing to the political climate which existed between the federal and provincial governments in Canada in 1921 and even in 1936, it would have been easier to introduce even a modest national plan at that time which could have been developed with co-operation and experience. I am not suggesting for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that any plan which is designed as a result of legislation will not be open to improvement. There will be defects. We will find there is a shortage of doctors in certain areas and that there are certain requirements which have not been foreseen. But our point in this group is that we should have got on with this legislation years ago.

I oppose the amendment also because on page 91 of the Hall Commission report the following appears:

> While we are aware that shortages of physicians, dentists, nurses, and other paramedical personnel will make it difficult to establish the full personal health services program our charter envisages, nonetheless the fact that there are shortages must not be used as an excuse to delay initiating programs and plans.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I think the Hall report completely offsets the remarks made by the hon. member for Simcoe East. I presume they mean that some members of the medical profession are also opposed to what they are pleased to term socialized medicine. I am always interested to see how some doctors are sort of confused concerning the application of socialized measures. What about socialized education? According to Hansard of April 22, 1964, the actual cost to the community for each doctor who graduates in Canada is $16,900. Multiply this by the number of doctors in Canada and it amounts to a considerable total.

I fully realize the need to increase the number of doctors if the Canadian people are going to receive the medical services to which they are entitled, and I will support government assistance to that end because when this legislation is adopted we want it to work as effectively as possible. When we come to the matter of training doctors, however, we do not hear any objection to socialization of education in this regard; yet I have heard doctors object very strongly to what they call socialized medicine. Without a doubt experience will indicate, as I said before, the need for amendments to this legislation and the need for the inclusion of dentists, optometrists, chiropractors and other medical services. If the government does not see fit at this time to include these groups, we hope the plan when it comes into effect will indicate that if people are going to have over-all medical attention these other groups should be included.

Let us recognize the wishes of the majority of the people as expressed by numerous organizations and as expressed during the last election by the votes that were given on behalf of the Liberal candidates, by the votes in many cases given on behalf of Progressive Conservative candidates, by the votes given to members of this party who have always taken a firm stand on this issue, and by some votes given to members of the Créditiste and Social Credit parties who have indicated a support for the principle some time in eternity when they hope sufficient doctors will be available.

As I said before, if the people of Great Britain and Europe can give effect to sound health insurance plans, surely we in Canada with all our vast natural resources, if we manage them properly—and all wealth depends on natural resources; the foundation of all wealth is natural resources—can do even better than the people in those countries have done to date. I find in volume I of the Hall Commission report on health services, page 6, these paragraphs:

> The enjoyment of the highest attainable standards of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition.
> The health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security and is dependent upon the fullest co-operation of individuals and states.

There is no question that it is economic insecurity which raises the risk of war in a good many parts of the world at this time. Therefore, because I have believed in the need for a national health services plan since I returned from the first world war and have advocated it on all occasions whether I was a member of the Liberal party, the C.C.F. party or the New Democratic Party. I have no hesitation in supporting the second reading of this bill. I shall look forward to its implementation soon and, as a result of experience, its improvement and amendment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), Public Service—representations respecting salaries of postal workers; the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Historical Monuments—Sherbrooke, Que.—demolition of Sir Alexander Galt's house; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), Old Age Security—continuation of payments to dependants of deceased pensioners.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate to express my position in respect of Bill C-227. I have lived for a number of years with the troubles and worries of Canadian workers and citizens brought about by the expense of illness and adversity. During the past years unions in this country have been able to raise the standard of living of industrial workers through collective bargaining. As a result these Canadian citizens enjoy a high and excellent standard of living. The unions have been able to negotiate the institution of medical plans which offset the worries of the average Canadian who now knows that in time of sickness his expenses will be covered. A great many people in this country have no protection in this regard and are unable to take care of themselves.

Bill C-227 does not in effect institute a universal medicare program in Canada. Medical health care is under provincial jurisdiction and four provinces now have medical plans which cover the people who are unable to provide for their own needs. The province of Manitoba is now in the process of devising a plan to cover these people in that province.

This bill will not institute a universal medical plan in Canada. By its very title one can see this. It states that it is:

> An act to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans.

All this bill does is ask parliament to authorize the government to set aside moneys to be paid to provinces, which now have or will institute medical schemes, to the extent of half of the cost of their medical schemes. The bill states as an objective that these plans shall be universal. That is a laudable objective. By the provisions of this bill payment will be made to those provinces which institute a program of medical care insurance. Some provinces may not do so, in which event this will not be a universal plan. As a matter of fact, it is doubtful that through the provisions of this bill all the costs incurred by provinces under their own medical schemes will be covered.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has said time and time again throughout this country during election campaigns that he hoped by July 1, 1967, the centennial year of this great country, he would be able to provide a medicare program for all the people of Canada in commemoration of this event. However, since those promises we have heard sharper words which have overruled the laudable aims and promises of the Prime Minister and of every Liberal candidate, because the bill now before us will not institute a universal plan.

I disagree particularly with the provision of the bill which puts medicare on a compulsory basis, because Canadians are not prepared to accept compulsion. We have observed some evidence to that effect as a result of the Canada Pension Plan. The Canadian people are resentful of compulsion. In spite of my belief in this regard, and because I believe in the principle of medicare, I will support this bill on second reading.

The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) proposed the amendment before us because we believe in medicare and hope to improve the bill now before us. A great deal of criticism has been made of this amendment. I do not know why that should be, except perhaps because those who have levied the criticism are playing politics.

What is wrong with the first part of the amendment which states that the government should secure the co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada? If the plan is going to be universal it is important that all provinces institute a valid program to cover their residents. In that way only can it be a universal plan. Naturally we need the co-operation of the provinces, which is something the present government does not have.

The second part of the amendment refers to a recognition of the principle of voluntary choice by the individual. It is my belief that if the government does not accept that principle it will be making a mistake. In spite of any mistake it might make in this regard I will support and vote for this bill on second reading.

Third, the amendment suggests that we should make adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research and the training of adequate numbers of doctors and other personnel in order that we may provide the care and attention that people will need under the coverage of a universal plan.

The fourth part of the amendment suggests that the bill should immediately provide for those individuals who are unable for financial reasons to provide medical services for themselves. Are these people in the various provinces to wait until July 1, 1968 before they are covered? If they must wait until then, they wait because of a whim on the part of this government.

[Mr. Starr.]

It is utter nonsense on the part of anyone to suggest that because we support this amendment as an improvement to the bill now before us we are against medicare. Surely we are here to put forward suggestions as to how to improve legislation brought forward by the government. We have merely suggested some alternatives to what the government has brought forward in an effort to improve this bill to the benefit of those who will be covered. I am sure that it would be more readily acceptable in the form we have suggested. That is why we have put forward the amendment. It was not proposed for the purpose, as has been suggested, of killing this bill in opposition to the principle of medicare.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to ask for the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions in order to permit the Prime Minister to make a statement.

Mr. Peters: Will the minister agree to a recess between seven and eight o'clock after the Prime Minister's statement?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think that suggestion is agreeable at this time because we are trying to get this very important legislation through.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yet it does not come into effect for a year and a half.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will ask the question again. Is there unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: If we do, we should have some indication that we will have a dinner hour afterwards, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Make it seven o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will repeat the question. Is there unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

URANIUM

CONTRACT FOR SUPPLY OF URANIUM OXIDE TO U.K. ATOMIC ENERGY AUTHORITY

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked for permission to make a statement at this hour will, I think, become apparent from the nature of my statement because I would like to inform hon. members of the successful completion of negotiations between Rio Algom Mines Ltd. and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority for the sale and purchase of a minimum of 8,000 short tons of uranium oxide (U_3O_8) for delivery to Britain from Rio Algom's Elliot Lake properties during the 1970's. This uranium is needed by Britain for her civil nuclear power program.

The contract was signed subject to the approval of the Canadian and British governments and the issuance of the necessary export permits by the Canadian authorities.

The new contract provides for a continuation of deliveries by Rio Algom to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority following completion of deliveries under previous contract arrangements which run until 1971. A minimum of 8,000 short tons of uranium oxide will be supplied up to the end of 1980, and at the option of the buyer that amount may be increased to 11,500 tons. The basic annual rate of delivery is 1,000 tons, but within prescribed limits the quantity may be varied from year to year.

Mr. Speaker, on June 3, 1965, I stated in the house the policy of the government with respect to exports of uranium. At that time, in recognition of Canada's major interest as a world supplier and the vital importance of the Canadian industry being in the best possible position to take advantage of expanding markets for the peaceful uses of uranium, I announced that the government would be prepared to authorize forward commitments by Canadian producers for fuel supply to reactors in operation, under construction, or committed for construction, for the anticipated life of such reactors. I also announced that the export of reasonable quantities of uranium for the accumulation of stocks in importing countries would be authorized for periods up to five years.

The arrangements which have been made by Rio Algom to supply uranium oxide to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority for Britain's civil nuclear power program are consistent with these features of our policy.

An important feature of the Canadian government's policy in respect of foreign sales of uranium is the requirement that the government of the importing country accept appropriate verification and control to ensure that the uranium is to be used for peaceful purposes only.

The British and Canadian governments have agreed that uranium supplied under this contract will be used for peaceful purposes only, and that safeguards based upon the principles and procedures of the International Atomic Energy Agency's safeguards system will apply to the use of this material. Discussions on detailed arrangements for the application of these safeguards will be held between Canada and the United Kingdom before commencement of deliveries scheduled to begin after 1971. Such arrangements will be in accord with our international obligations, including those which might arise under a non-proliferation treaty to which the two countries might adhere.

The arrangements that have been made for safeguards and the fact that the contract is in accord with announced government policy on the export of uranium have made it possible for the government to authorize this contract.

Mr. Speaker, the new contract which has been entered into by Rio Algom with the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority augurs well for the future of the Canadian uranium industry. It is concrete evidence of the greatly increased world demand for uranium for peaceful purposes to which I referred in announcing government export policy in June, 1965.

Hon. members will appreciate my satisfaction in making this announcement which ensures continuity of operations at Elliot Lake until at least 1980. This city, which was born of such great promise, has endured much with resolution and fortitude. Its people will now be in a position to look ahead with greater confidence than has been possible for some years.

This contract between Rio Algom and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority is, as I have said, an indication of the increasing world demand for uranium. Other countries are also demonstrating interest, and in the knowledge that uranium will make an increasingly important contribution to meeting world requirements for power for peaceful purposes, we can look forward to the revival of this important segment of our economy.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is always a matter of gratification when any of our products are sold, and I am naturally pleased that this arrangement has been entered into. I think it is only a matter of coincidence that it does not apply to uranium from any other part of Canada than Elliot Lake, but I would point out that there are other parts of Canada which produce uranium and would have appreciated being included in any agreement that was made. One is in the province of Ontario and another is in northern Saskatchewan. The fact that the agreement is restricted to only one area is, I believe, purely coincidental.

I would also point out that it is significant that in the last few days there have been unexplained fluctuations in uranium securities on the market. Yesterday the hon. member for Northumberland asked what the reason was for those fluctuations, and it might be worth while to look into the reason why some people on the exchanges seem to have had information which caused rapid fluctuations in the prices of uranium securities in the last few days.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister is very happy at being able to announce the completion of negotiations for an agreement to sell these large quantities of uranium which has been signed by Rio Algom Mines Limited and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority. I am sure the Prime Minister, both in his capacity as head of the government and also as the member for Algoma East where Elliot Lake is located, is pleased at the outcome of the negotiations. I think all of us are delighted with any contract which will expand our exports, particularly exports of a commodity which has been having a rather difficult time in the last few years.

I do not object to the fact that Rio Algom Mines Limited is getting this particular contract because undoubtedly Elliot Lake has suffered more than any other mining community in recent times. But I do want to say to the government, having in mind the concluding remarks of the Prime Minister indicating that there will be an increasing demand for uranium and that there is likely to be an expanding market in the future, that I hope the government will keep these other areas in Canada in mind.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I am thinking in particular of the government's own crown corporation, Eldorado Mining and Refining Company which has had to curtail its operations very considerably. At the time when the government first began to curtail the production of uranium, the house will recall that many members of our party advocated that the government continue to produce uranium and in particular use its own crown corporation to the maximum to stockpile uranium because we were convinced there would be a growing demand for this resource. All indications throughout the world with reference to existing supplies and possibilities for future demand were that the uranium industry was bound to come back. This has proven to be the case. I hope that in this expanding situation the government will not forget its own crown corporation and will use this expansion to the benefit of the Canadian people. I hope the government will take advantage of the greater demand for uranium.

• (6:10 p.m.)

We are glad also to have from the Prime Minister the assurance that the policy of ensuring that exports of uranium from Canada will be used for peaceful purposes only is being continued. The Prime Minister says that the British and Canadian governments have agreed on methods for ensuring this. I hope that at some future time, either on estimates or orders of the day, we will get some statement from the government as to what these steps are so we can be fully assured, not only with reference to this order but other orders, that exports of uranium will not be used for other than peaceful purposes. I want to congratulate the government upon completing this agreement. I hope, and I am sure, it will be of great assistance to the people who are employed in the uranium industry.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): We are equally pleased, Mr. Speaker, with the announcement the Prime Minister has just made to this house and to the Canadian people concerning the export of uranium. It is one of our natural resources which has undergone many fluctuations in the past and this is particularly true of Elliot Lake in the Prime Minister's riding. I believe this will be welcome news for these people and they can thank the Prime Minister for having thought of them. They have undergone their share of hardships resulting from the closing down of the mines.

In the latter part of his announcement the Prime Minister referred to the fact we can look forward in the future to an increased demand for uranium on world markets. As producers of uranium we in Canada have to give consideration to the use to which this uranium will be put. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has mentioned, if this uranium is going to be used for peaceful purposes we can look forward to other orders of this kind, not only for Rio Algom mine but for mines in other areas of Canada. Exports of this nature, of course, will have a favourable effect on our economy. We must emphasize the peaceful uses of uranium because we must remember that the same product can also be used for the destruction of the world.

It is the responsibility of the government before any contract is signed to make certain the uranium will be used for peaceful purposes and for advancement in fields of endeavour that will ensure a better living standard for nations of the world. Since I come from a mining district I can appreciate the hardship that results from the closing of a mine. I can appreciate what happens to those people who are left without jobs. I think the Prime Minister has had this in mind and we can be grateful to him for that. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said, there are going to be further contracts in the future because there will be an increased demand for this product in world markets. I think the Prime Minister would do well to keep in mind giving other districts an opportunity to share in these contracts to as great an extent as possible. The government should keep an eye on the movements of this product to ensure that they not only help the Canadian economy but help people all over the world.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): It would be redundant at this point, Mr. Speaker, to say more than that we express our satisfaction at the announcement which has been made concerning the export of uranium to Great Britain. I am sure the remarks the Prime Minister has made will be greeted with particular satisfaction by the people of Elliot Lake and the other constituents of Algoma East. I am certain they are grateful to their member of parliament for his role in making such an event possible. I believe that this announcement tonight points up the fact that we are immensely rich in natural resources. If we can just put our own economy in sound shape, and not only export such natural resources as uranium but also develop within Canada processes such as that requiring heavy water for the nuclear reactors that Canada is building all over the world, this will augur well for Canada. If we can make certain that our own economy is in a position to develop these resources and that our government has the ability to conclude these trade agreements, then these resources will benefit not only Canadians but people all over the world.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will be very happy to learn of the Prime Minister's announcement tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the interest of the hon. member but the usual practice in the house is for statements to be made by representatives of the different parties.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister and all members would agree that the hon. member who has just risen has a very vital interest in this matter because of the fact that uranium mining is an industry in his riding. I hope the house will agree to allow him to say a few words on this matter.

Mr. Webb: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am certain all Canadians will be happy to learn—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member again, but if the hon. member is to speak I hope it is by unanimous consent. I refer hon. members to standing order 15.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Webb: I am certain all Canadians will be very happy to learn of the announcement made by the Prime Minister tonight. However, in spite of the numerous promises made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry to the people and the many delegations from the Bancroft area who have visited Ottawa that they would be given every consideration—

Mr. Pearson: And they were.

Mr. Webb: —if any new contracts were signed, the fact is that the present government has closed the uranium mine in the Bancroft area resulting in economic problems for the people there. Mr. Speaker, I plead with the Prime Minister and the government to reconsider the allocation of these contracts and share them with the people of Bancroft and the area.

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Public Works thought of permitting us to have 40 minutes for a supper break?

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the current debate has been going on at considerable length and we do not seem to be making much progress. During a supper hour we could get a few more speeches on the record and this would enable us to get on with the debate. I think everyone is eagerly awaiting passage of this bill.

Mr. Douglas: I can assure the minister that we would make a great deal more progress by having a supper hour than by sitting right through.

Mr. Winkler: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

MEDICARE—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD COST OF INSURED MEDICAL CARE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-227, to authorize the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rynard.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in participating in this debate I am inclined to disagree that we are not making any progress. This is a very important and vital matter to the people of this country and every member of this house may wish to express his opinion on this subject. I think that we have been making very good progress in dealing with this important matter.

I do not agree that we should rush this debate because, after all, the bill is not going anywhere. The government does not intend to pay the provinces anything for their medical services schemes until after July 1, 1968. If the government were to come forward and amend the bill to help those who are not now covered in provinces which have no medicare scheme and were to give those provinces encouragement by contributing 50 per cent out of federal funds to cover medical care for the needy and the poor, especially in the maritime provinces where the people cannot afford any coverage at all, there would be a great deal of urgency to this whole matter and we should put the bill through so that these people might receive coverage now. But the government is not prepared to do this.

The government says that we should put the bill through because they have to prepare to put it into effect possibly after July 1, 1968. What is the rush? Is it merely a question of passing this bill which will authorize the federal government to pay 50 per cent of the cost to any province which puts into effect a medicare scheme so that the Liberals can wave it around the country and enable the government to say that they were responsible for this?

What is to be done for the people who are not covered now? Will they have to suffer and carry the heavy cost of medical services in this country until 1968 simply because this government is torn asunder by a political battle in the cabinet and in the caucus? Who are the victims of the battle that has been raging within their midst? The victims are the people of this country.

I charge, Mr. Speaker, that the government has been playing politics with this very important matter. It has postponed the effective date of this legislation until July 1, 1968, for no purpose except a political one to pacify those in the cabinet and in the caucus who feel that the financial participation of the federal government will cause inflation. This step has been taken to combat the present inflation. Even if this bill does pass in its present form permitting the government to participate financially in this medicare scheme, the bill will not go into effect until July 1, 1968.

I suggest that the government should consider the position of the provinces which are not able to finance a medicare scheme for their own people. These provinces should be given an incentive now, not on July 1, 1967 or July 1, 1968, but now, to look after their needy and poor who cannot look after themselves.

The Prime Minister has said on a number of occasions that our objective is to have full medicare in operation on Canada's 100th birthday, July 1, 1967". This was the theme throughout the election campaign last November. The Prime Minister promised the people of this nation medicare by July 1, 1967 and he said that a Liberal government would bring this about. He said that this was one of the reasons the Liberals had to have a majority. But they did not get one. This is not the reason that the government is not bringing medicare in now. No one is stopping them from doing so. The Liberal government is deliberately putting medicare off for two years, they are doing that and nobody else.

It has been pointed out that this is not a bill which brings in medicare but a bill which puts off medicare for two years. It is a delaying, a postponing bill. Let us suppose that the opposition brought in the kind of amendment which this muddled government proposes to bring in. What would happen? We would have been accused across this country of putting off medicare by the same people who are now doing exactly the same thing.

Because this Liberal government is going through the motions—I repeat, going through the motions—of placing before this house a meaningless bill with the label "Medicare" printed on it, we are told that the government is bringing in medicare. What the government is doing is condemning Canadians for two more years to go on bearing the heavy cost of medical bills which the Minister of Finance has said are such a burden. He said this with a great deal of emotion at a Liberal convention in order to pacify those who want medicare to be brought in now and in order to heal the wound that has been created both in the cabinet and in the caucus.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that medical costs are a terrible burden to the ordinary family. The Minister of Finance weeps crocodile tears at a Liberal convention and agrees. The Liberals decided that everything was lovely in the best of all possible Liberal worlds, that God was in his heaven while the Liberals were in office, and they knuckled down tamely while the main plank in their social welfare platform was taken out and ruthlessly scrapped by their smiling Minister of Finance.

The Liberals promised medicare by 1967. They trooped right across this country telling Canadians they would get it. The Prime Minister of this country pledged his word. The situation now is that Canadians want medicare, that Canadians are entitled to have medicare, that Canadians should have medicare and should have it now, not in 1968.

I do not know what some of the hon. gentlemen opposite think of this, but I recall that many of them travelled about the country during the last election campaign promising medicare by July 1, 1967. It is interesting to note that on October 5, 1965, the present Prime Minister said that with provincial cooperation the Liberals hoped and expected that medicare would be a fact on Canada's 100th birthday, July 1, 1967. Well, Mr. Speaker, happy birthday to you too. What has happened to all those hopes and expectations the Canadian people held? In one word —"Sharp's" the word.

The Liberals now come before parliament in a terrible rush saying that this bill must go through. They also say that they made a mistake, that the Liberal party cannot bring in medicare by July 1, 1967. They want to be relieved of their promise but still want to get the credit. How foolish and ridiculous can a government be? This is all a mess of their own creation. The important thing now is that they are trying to use the parliament of this nation as a rubber stamp to absolve them from their sins of omission. We on this side of the house will not buy this. Canadians will not buy this because Canadians from coast to coast know what the Prime Minister promised and they cannot be snowed by this government.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member but I do not see a quorum. I think it is incumbent on the government to maintain a quorum in view of the position that was taken.

An hon. Member: The quorum is there.

Mr. Winkler: The duty is clear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Bruce rises on a point of order and points out that there is not a quorum present. It is my duty therefore under the standing orders to ask the Clerk to count the house.

Mr. Pennell: I should point out that when the hon. member for Ontario was addressing the house there was a quorum present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the argument that the hon. minister is making but I point out that the attention of the Speaker has been called to the fact that there is no quorum present. That does not give rise to debate or comment. May I ask the Clerk to count the house?

Mr. Pennell: There are 20, sir.

Medicare

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Standing order No. 3 states:

3. (1) The presence of at least twenty members of the house, including Mr. Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the house for the exercise of its powers.

I declare the house to be properly constituted. The hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, it is terrible that the government, which is bringing in this important bill, this bill that must be passed without too much debate, that must be put on the statute books now to bring it into effect on July 1, 1968, does not show enough interest to maintain more than a bare quorum of its members in this house.

I say to the government that it should bring in medicare if that is what it wants to call it. In fact the bill is not a bill on medicare. It is a bill to provide payments to provinces which want to institute medicare. The bill will not be universal unless every province has a scheme of its own. I say to the government, do what you said you would do. Put this measure into effect by July 1, 1967 and parliament will back it. But we will not back this government on another dodging, squirming, unprincipled retreat, because we want medicare now. All Canadians want medicare now. They are entitled to have it and this government must keep its promise.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would be derelict in my duty to the constituents of the riding of Broadview, if I did not express their bitter disappointment and my own at the intended postponement of medicare by the government from July 1, 1967 to July 1, 1968. For the Liberal party to campaign during the election that they and they alone would implement medicare forthwith and then to procrastinate, delay and postpone after the election has made many Canadians disgusted with their performance and has completely erased faith in the promises of the Liberal party.

The Canadian people are now fully aware of the dragging delays of the Liberal party, begun in August, 1919 by Mackenzie King and still continuing today, 47 years later, with promises still unfulfilled with regard to complete medical insurance. This indicates the patience of the Canadian people and the apathy and callous disregard of the Liberal party of their promises to the electorate.

[Mr. Pennell.]

In debating the resolution on medicare the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated as found on page 7549 of Hansard:

Members of the committee may be interested in knowing that some 6 million Canadians still lack any medical insurance coverage, and 3 million more have only limited coverage. Probably not more than 10 million Canadians at the present time have what could be called adequate comprehensive coverage. Those without adequate coverage include primarily residents of rural areas and people with moderate or low incomes, unable to acquire low-cost group insurance. I might mention that these figures do not include those who will benefit from the health provisions set out in the Canada Assistance Plan.

The minister is saying that 6 million people do not have coverage and that another 3 million probably have restricted or inadequate coverage. He indicated the response of the provinces to the intended medicare scheme. I quote again from page 7549 of Hansard:

The response from the provinces has, I must say, been most encouraging. Some provinces have already indicated their readiness to proceed by our target date of July 1, 1967. Others have not been in a position to commit themselves, although some of these pointed out that they would be able to change existing plans to meet the principles described above. I should like to state that no province has stated that it will definitely not participate although, as hon. members are undoubtedly aware, the premier of Alberta has expressed criticism of the proposal.

These statements indicate the need for medicare, and the response was set forth by the minister during that debate when the leader of my party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), asked the minister when the government intended to proceed with the legislation. The minister replied:

—I am not in a position to indicate what the situation will be or at what stage we will terminate, but I should like to have second reading of this bill today if possible or before the summer adjournment. That is not a commitment on the part of the government; it is what I should like to see.

One can appreciate the thinking and the feeling of the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to the need for medical care insurance and the responsibilities of the different provinces. Also, when asked by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) whether the bill would be referred to the committee on health and welfare he repeatedly stated that he felt it was not necessary to refer the bill because the bill merely embodied the principles regarding the requisites for the provinces to be entitled to payment.

All this took place on July 12. We in the New Democratic party told the minister we would be prepared to give the bill second reading before the summer recess. It was not done, however, and the next announcement of government intention came not from the Minister of National Health and Welfare but from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) in early September at the end of the emergency session on the railway strike. What does this mean? It means that the Minister of National Health and Welfare carries little or no weight in the cabinet and that some of the other cabinet ministers can blandly disregard his well-meaning intentions.

It would be interesting to speculate what the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) would have done in these circumstances. Would he have resigned or would he do what the minister is now doing—sit in the house hearing members underline the shameless course of events and the spinelessness of the minister?

The least the government could do would be to make the Minister of Finance tell us in detail why he thinks this measure of social welfare is inflationary and back up his statement with figures, not speculative fantasies. The Minister of National Health and Welfare set forth the estimated cost of medical care insurance when he spoke during the debate on the resolution. He said, as reported at page 7549 of Hansard:

> It has been estimated that approximately $600 million would be spent next year on physicians' services if no change were made in the present methods of providing these services.
> I would ask hon. members, therefore, to compare the estimates on which we are basing public expenditures for public programs covering the whole population if these go into effect next year, namely, a total of $680 million including the provincial share of half the costs. Thus, by redistributing the estimated $680 million and adding another $80 million, all residents of all provinces of Canada will have physicians' services available to them.

This indicates that all we are talking about here is the sum of $80 million and I ask: Is this inflationary? If the estimated cost is $680 million and the Canadian public spends, by and large, $600 million, all we are talking about now is the difference between $600 million and $680 million. There are many ways of taking care of this small amount. One is by means of government savings in all departments. Doubtless the savings brought about as a result of the integration policies of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) would in themselves amount to double the $80 million required.

Opponents of medicare have made many statements about the additional services medicare would necessitate. It would be as well to remind ourselves again of the experience of Saskatchewan where full medical insurance has been in effect since 1962. In an article which appeared in one of our periodicals under the heading, "Saskatchewan Medicare Costs Now Actually Going Down", we read the following:

> Opponents of medicare who prophesied that the cost of a comprehensive plan, like the one set up by the former C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan, would steadily mount, are being confounded by the facts. The costs of the medicare plan in Saskatchewan are now actually going down.
> The Liberal government of the province, upon taking office, raised the premiums without waiting to find out from experience if it was necessary, but they found no reason for any further increase and have announced that the premium rate for 1967 will be the same as for 1966.
> When the C.C.F. government first set up the plan the rates for combined hospital and medical insurance were $72 for families and $36 for single people. After the plan was well launched the C.C.F. reduced the premiums to $52 for families and $26 for single people. When the Liberals took office in 1964 they almost immediately raised the rates again to their original level. Now they are making money on the plan and may have to face a public outcry for a return to the lower level set by the C.C.F.
> The strongest indication that the plan was being successful in every way came at the time of a meeting of the general council of the Canadian Medical Association in Edmonton this summer. At that time Dr. E. W. Barootes of Regina, who had been the most vigorous leader of the opposition to medicare, told his colleagues that some of his profession's fears about medicare had proved unfounded.
> Dr. Barootes made a courageous admission when he said, "Some of the qualms we have had have been disproved and some of us should revise our thinking."
>
> "The idea that total medical care results in constantly mounting costs has been shattered," he said. The fact is, he said that the total cost of Saskatchewan medicare dropped last year by $500,000 from $23 million to $22½ million.
> He said in an interview later he could not explain why medicare costs have not shot up as he and other doctors had predicted. He said it may be because Saskatchewan residents have been saturated with medical service—that they now have been treated for all the ailments that, before medicare, went untreated.

When one compares the rates of medicare insurance in Saskatchewan with those in effect in Ontario some startling figures confront us. In Ontario, for hospitalization a single person pays $39 a year and a married person with children pays $78 a year. Under the medical service plan commonly known as OMSIP, a single person pays $60, a married person $120 and a married person with children $150. If we add up the cost of hospitalization and medical insurance for a single person in Ontario we find it amounts to a total of $117. A married person with no children pays $198 and a married person with children pays a total of $228.

If we compare this with the rates in Saskatchewan, $72 for a married couple and $36 for a single person, we can well appreciate why so many people in Ontario are anxious to have this federal medical care insurance plan implemented immediately. It would mean that the people of Ontario would find their premiums cut by 50 per cent at least, with consequent relief from some of the financial pressure caused by the high cost of living.

We in the New Democratic Party were hoping that the legislation would be open-ended so that the provinces would have an opportunity to include among their services dental care, optometric care, chiropractic care and any other necessary services which would advance the health and well-being of the people. We feel that the government should make such changes in this legislation as are necessary to provide for the inclusion of these services as they become available in the provinces.

Many Liberal speakers, especially those on the back benches, have underlined their faith in the principle of medicare during the course of this debate and have expressed their regret that the government does not intend to make the legislation effective on July 1, 1967. They have full right to do so. But their speeches are indicative of the disregard which members of the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Finance, have for their views.

Some backbenchers have indicated in their speeches that we in the New Democratic Party are filibustering and holding up an increase in pensions to senior citizens. This is not so, Mr. Speaker. According to the government the medicare legislation will not come into effect until July 1, 1968, so time is not of the essence, even according to the government itself. With respect to blocking any pension increase for our senior citizens, legislation to provide for that could have been introduced at the commencement of the session when the opposition parties moved an amendment and subamendment to increase old age pensions to $100 a month at age 65. But this the government rejected. At no time have opposition members raised any blocks with regard to legislation that could be introduced to take care of our senior citizens. Therefore the fault lies not with the opposition but fully with the government.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare would be helping many Canadians, more especially those Canadians who are not covered and those who have restricted and inadequate coverage, if he were to make the effective date July 1, 1967. He would also establish his position as a Liberal leadership candidate by showing members of the house his determination to lead in something that he has believed in, something he has fought hard for, and something he has now been pushed back on. We in the N.D.P. will give full support to the bill on the basis of the legislation being implemented on July 1, 1967.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended originally to become ensnarled in this debate but some of the remarks I have heard from my left and from the government side of the house require that I should try to straighten out the thinking of those hon. members to a slight degree, if this is possible.

I must say, in view of the statement made by the house leader about the urgency of this debate, that I as a new parliamentarian found it rather strange that he and most of his colleagues immediately left the house, leaving only one member of the cabinet in the chamber. Apparently the urgency does not extend as much to the government as it does to the other side of the house.

Since I come from Saskatchewan—I believe I am the first from that province to speak in this debate—my views will naturally be coloured to a certain extent. We do have comprehensive prepaid medicare as you, Mr. Speaker, have heard from some hon. members. All is not sweetness and light as they, of course, would have you believe, but it is a plan that is working, a plan which no one in our province would ever change except to improve it. It is a plan with which the majority of the doctors are now quite satisfied, and most certainly the patients are satisfied.

My hon. friends in the N.D.P. are so fond of taking credit for implementing this scheme, but I would point out to them that it took 23 days of withdrawal of service and numerous arguments, negotiations and so on before a plan was arrived at that was acceptable to both sides, something that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas)—I am sorry he is not present—is fond of forgetting. However, I was happy today to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) point out that it is he, and not some of the others in his party, who is the real pioneer. But I found it rather strange that when he was a pioneer he was a Liberal. Nevertheless, to him I extend my congratulations and best wishes on being the true pioneer in this house, having supported medicare since 1919 and in the election campaign of 1921. Incidentally, I am one of those who were not around when he was supporting it.

With respect to the decision to delay the introduction of medicare, I support the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). I think it is wrong for the government to delay this plan. As you can understand, Mr. Speaker, my remarks are perhaps coloured a bit by my experience in Saskatchewan, but all this delay is going to mean to my province is that we are not going to get $14 million, $14 million we need and need now, to take care of some of the deficiencies of the plan brought in by the government of Saskatchewan, deficiencies because of the fact that the provincial government of that day, as with the federal government of this day, did not listen to reason, did not listen to some of the problems placed before it by the medical profession.

I am not speaking, as has been suggested about the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), for the Canadian Medical Association. This is a red herring that is always thrown by socialists into any debate involving medicare. As a matter of fact, I am a little surprised that they are not claiming the American Medical Association is in on this as well, because they certainly did that in 1962 and previously.

The government claims that the delay is due to inflation. I am not going into all the reasons that have already been given as to why the delay has nothing to do with inflation, but I can say just one thing, that the simplest method to control inflation, as most economists would agree, is to increase taxes. That is a simple economic fact of life, and to bring this plan into being the government will have to increase taxes. I am sorry the sharp Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is not present so that I can point this out to him.

There are other reasons, Mr. Speaker, and some of them have to do with points in our amendment such as the shortage of doctors. But before I deal with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe East I would like to point out what we would have done and what we will do when we get the money from the federal government as its payment for medicare. I and other hon. members outlined some of the deficiencies back in July when the resolution stage of this bill was being debated, and I would like to mention a few briefly.

Under the present plan in Saskatchewan, which I am sorry to say does not provide the quality of care that we would like, we do not have sufficient doctors. Some hon. members from Ontario say that this is a specious thing to talk about. As recorded at page 8641 of Hansard for October 13, the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) referred to "the old cliché that there is insufficient personnel to handle medicare at the present time." He went on to say, "I am fed up with this old cliché."

I would point out that Ontario has a ratio of one doctor to every 756 people. Saskatchewan, with a medicare plan, has a ratio of one doctor to 1,100 people, and in the maritimes the ratio is about one to 1,900 or more. It is all very well for this hon. gentleman, who practices medicine in the province of Ontario where they have a much better doctor-patient ratio, to say it is an old cliché, but in Saskatchewan it is a fact and in many other areas of Canada it is a serious fact. In Russia, for example, the ratio is one to 550. The hon. member says it is an old cliché. Really. Far from being a cliché it is a very serious problem indeed.

There are deficiencies in the Saskatchewan plan. There are deficiencies in proper care for the chronically ill, in home care programs, and in nursing homes with proper rehabilitation facilities. We need proper clinics for the mentally ill. We need all these things but we do not have the money to provide them. We need equipment for our hospitals. And in case there are those who have not heard that medicare, unless it is properly brought in, results in deterioration, let me cite a few specific examples.

Because of the lack not only of personnel but also the lack of facilities in our University Hospital in Saskatoon this year, accreditation by the specialty boards has been removed in all except one or two specialties that were training specialists at this hospital. It has been removed because they feel there is not sufficient personnel. We do not have the money to obtain the personnel nor do we have the money to keep them there—and I will go into that a little later. We do not have the facilities. There is a serious deterioration in the quality of care. The government wants us to train more doctors, but as a result of lack of funds and a lack of proper planning we are in no position to train them.

I have heard hon. members say that we need more general practitioners. Yes, we do; we set up this medical school in Saskatchewan for this purpose; but as a result of lack of facilities and many other things in that province, what do we have? We have a situation where, while formerly 46 per cent of our graduates remained in our province, now the figure is well below 25 per cent. It has been going down in the last few years. What has this government proposed? I am sorry to see that neither the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) nor his parliamentary secretary are here. I think these are the two persons who should be learning what is happening.

Mr. Pennell: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have a watching brief for the minister and I am following very carefully the interesting remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. Brand: I am glad to hear this, and I am sure that the minister's discussions with the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be of benefit to that minister. I am optimistic. What about research. We do not have sufficient research facilities in Saskatchewan. I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare make statements about the health resources fund and these other funds which will provide money for research. I have somewhere placed on the record—and I could read it into the record again if it is so desired—the discrepancies between what this government proposes and what has been proposed by the Wood Gundy report, the Canadian Association of Medical Colleges and the Canadian Association of Clinical Investigators. It has been pointed out that we need much more than has been provided so far. Because in Saskatchewan—and this is true also all across Canada—we have this lack of research and we cannot get the clinical teachers we need. I am going to go into that in a little more detail in a moment.

May I make a proposal which I hope will be carried to the minister. I am sure, according to some of his remarks, that he would have no objection to this. I should like to see made available now this $14 million which our province needs. We need it to round out our medical plan. I should like to see a medical research fund set up in our province. I should like to see $7 million or $5 million of the $14 million put into this fund to provide a ready source of immediate funds for research, so that we could attract doctors back into our province, those who have gone to the United States. Seven million dollars is a lot of money, but it is what we need. I may point out that only 12 million is to be paid out by the medical research council for the whole of Canada; but I would like to see $7 million brought into Saskatchewan so that we will have an opportunity to attract proper teachers to our medical school. This would enable them to obtain the kind of assistance which is needed in research. Just as it is needed in every other part of Canada, we need it now, and not in 1968.

While I am on the subject of 1968, I wonder just what the date really will be when the government will bring this in. There has been enough said on this subject. They have promised this and promised that. What guarantee do we have that this promise will be kept, any better than the others we have heard before. I think we need it now. I see that the minister now is in his seat and has with him his legal advisor. Perhaps he will agree that he has said that so long as the provinces comply with the four criteria he has laid down we can take the money for medical care and use it as we see fit, and that none can be taken back. We do comply with this in Saskatchewan. I take it that the minister now has the impression I am in favour of the principle of prepaid medical care.

As soon as this bill is in effect Saskatchewan will be in a most fortunate position, because we have the $7 million to put in the research fund and the other $7 million we hope to use to fill in the other gaps in respect of the supply of equipment for hospitals, to take care of the operating costs and the costs of research at the University Hospital and other hospitals, and also to take care of premiums for those who still, despite the widespread nature of the plan, have a great deal of difficulty in paying the premium in Saskatchewan.

This is all right for Saskatchewan. We are going to be in a very fortunate position. There is a proviso, of course—as to whether the present premier will see the light; and he has not yet done much about research or anything else. Since it is all right for Saskatchewan, what about the other provinces in Canada? Since taxes will be collected from all parts of the country, is it not reasonable to assume, if the funds are used for research, for the training of doctors, for the bringing back of teacher-scientists for training of ancillary personnel—and you could go on—that the government should allow the provinces this money to take care of the plans they do have?

I think it is iniquitous that there should be an idea that the government will take the money from them, and then say: "Either you do exactly as we say or we will not give you any money at all." I think this is wrong. I should like to take a look now at our amendment, to show why I support this amendment. In this I am sure I will be agreeing to a large degree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). The amendment, as set out at page 8618 of Hansard of October 13 reads as follows:

> This house, while of the opinion that provision should be made for medical services to be available to all Canadians at an adequate level on a prepaid basis, is nevertheless of the further opinion that no legislation for the provision of insured medical care services in Canada will be satisfactory unless it:
> (a) secures co-operation of the governments of the provinces of Canada;

I merely echo the words of my colleague for Ontario when I say that surely this is basic to any plan, any plan that will work in this country. Without this co-operation how is the government going to get portability. It must have the co-operation of the provinces and these provinces should have the opportunity now to discuss this with the minister and with the government in the long, long time before this will be made law by the present government. Then turning to paragraph (b):

> (b) recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by the individual:

I think that is also basic. The minister has said, and I can quote him if he likes, that there is no problem in respect of choice. When I questioned him on July 12 in the house I asked him how we could have a voluntary choice for the physicians when their services are insured. After all, the government is insuring people against the cost of medical care, as its bill suggests—and I will discuss this in greater detail at the committee stage—but then it goes on to suggest that physicians' services will be insured. Any physician who takes out somebody's appendix or tonsils, or in the case of some members of this house, a larynx—and that might be very beneficial to mankind—he is performing an insured service? In spite of this the government is outside of this act. How could he do so when everything he does in his profession is an insured service? In spite of this the government calls this an insurance program, and I cannot understand that.

What are they insuring? Are they insuring people against the cost of medical care, as members of the N.D.P. have said, or are they insuring the doctors' services so that each and every doctor will come under the direct control of the provincial government of the province in which he carries on his profession, and the control of the federal government as well?

The minister said that every doctor will be free to practise outside this plan if he so desires. Let me point out that in the province of Saskatchewan doctors can practise outside that provincial medical plan because doctors' services are not insured. In Saskatchewan the people are insured against the cost of medical services. This is a point which I will discuss in greater detail at the committee stage.

A great deal has been said about the fact that we should recognize the principle of voluntary choice by an individual. We should recognize that principle in those provinces which feel that this is the kind of plan they want. In spite of my objections I will, like the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), support this bill because I believe in its principle.

Paragraph (c) of the amendment states that no medical care service will be satisfactory unless it—> —makes adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research, the training of adequate numbers of doctors and other medical personnel.

Let me read into the record two paragraphs from the summary which appears at the beginning of the Woods Gundy report, which is entitled "Medical Research in Canada; An Analysis of Immediate and Future Needs". The first paragraph begins:

> Medical research is essential to the provision of high standards of medical education, health services and health care. This fact must be recognized in any programs aimed at broadening health services and raising health care standards in Canada. If these are to become objectives of public policy, provision must be made for expansion of medical education in Canada and this, in turn, necessitates a greatly expanded scale of medical research effort.

The Royal Commission on Health Services recognized the need to expand Canada's output of physicians to overcome a prospective deficiency between physician supply and requirements. The task of expanding Canadian medical education facilities is made even more urgent by the likely introduction in the near future of a comprehensive medicare program.

This is a pessimistic report, but when it says that a comprehensive medicare program is likely to be introduced in the near future, surely it is optimistic.

The report then continues:

It takes eight to ten years to plan, build and recruit staff for a new medical school and to graduate its first class, and a further eight to ten years for such graduates to become trained teacher-scientists that will staff new schools.

The minister is well aware of this fact because he pointed out when he spoke to a dental convention in Halifax in June that it would take 20 years to provide enough dentists to increase the dentist population by 5 per cent or 10 per cent. He now proposes to double the doctor population in a year.

At page 2 of this same report the following is stated:

Medical research is inseparable from medical education at the level of under-graduate, post-graduate and continuing education. Teacher-scientists provide the research-oriented education that is appropriate to medicine and science in universities today. It is essential that Canadian universities be staffed with leading teacher-scientists if they are to train effectively new generations of physicians and scientists in their rapidly changing fields.

I will skip a line or two and read the next paragraph as follows:

Medical research is therefore a key consideration for the expansion of medical education and for the development of future health services in Canada. Immediate provision of expanded programs of medical research is required if future physician requirements are to be met and if standards of health care are to be safeguarded and improved.

Let me point out that this is a basic difficulty which faced the national health services in Great Britain. I am sure the minister has seen the editorial which appeared in the Gazette on Wednesday, October 12 of this year, which reads in part as follows:

In Great Britain, the 20-year-old national health scheme has helped to promote real difficulties in personnel. Only last month the health minister, Kenneth Robinson, admitted the shortage was becoming acute. The British Medical Journal said recently 550 doctors left Britain last year. In mid-September a record 600 British doctors took examinations in London to qualify for practice in the United States.

I will not read the whole editorial as I am sure the minister has seen it, but I think it would be appropriate in view of the situation at hand to read the last paragraph, which is as follows:

[Mr. Brand.]

It may be hoped that between now and July 1, 1968 there will be more discussion about the real issues which medicare raises, and less about the secondary ones; more about substance, and less about style.

The heading of that editorial is "Not Just When But How". I have heard a great deal of talk during this debate about when this scheme is to be instituted, but very little about how it is to be instituted. We in this party have said a good deal about how it should be instituted, in fact so much so that I felt perhaps we should refer our suggestions to the minister on indian affairs.

Let me read one line from page 3 of the Woods Gundy report as follows:

Although financial support has been increasing, medical research in Canada today is being conducted on an inadequate scale.

The report then quotes from the Royal Commission on Health Services, which has been quoted often during this debate. The debate is beginning to sound like an evangelical meeting at which everyone is fighting with everyone else to ascribe different meanings to the Scripture they are quoting.

Let me point out that this is an excellent report from a commission that was established when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister. This is a report to which we subscribe; but we read it in full, and I will have a few more words to say about that before I conclude.

The report then states:

A substantial increase in capital and operating support for medical research in Canada is needed at once.

• (7:20 p.m.)

I do not think there is any question about this. I can quote extensively from this very excellent report which, incidentally, was not paid for out of government funds but was a result of the co-operation between the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges and university teachers. It is very commendable indeed that they brought in this most excellent report.

In the summary on page 45 of this report they say:

Deficiencies exist, however, at all levels and in all categories of support—

Here they are referring to support for research. They go on to say:

And it is apparent that these deficiencies stem more from a shortage of funds than from a lack of scientific merit in the applications.

In other words they point out that a lot of these various difficulties in research have been caused by a lack of funds. I can give hon. members the statistics, but they are very long so I will not bore the house with them. The report goes on to say:

> This lack of fuller support for medical research in Canada has a serious effect on the individuals conducting, or considering engaging in, medical research. If a major expansion in their numbers is to be brought about, the degree of support must be greatly increased above present levels.

The minister will undoubtedly say that the answer to those problems is to be found in the health resources fund bill, which, however, does not deal with the operating costs necessary for research. The Royal Commission on Health Services points this out on page 113, volume 2, where it is said that the operating cost was found to be 28.2 per cent of the entire operation. The minister will agree that this is a very substantial amount. We know that the projections of researcher requirements are much higher than allowed for by the government, and that is why our amendment reads—

> (c) makes adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research,

I could read all of this subclause into the record, but I already did this when speaking previously on this bill.

A few minutes ago I said I thought it would be useful if we in Saskatchewan could use the money for setting up our own medical research fund. The Gundy report suggests at page 65 that the federal government is not alone in its concern. It uses the expression "for scientific development, and within that broad field for medical research." And it continues "As has been observed, provincial governments are also interested in setting up their own funds for this purpose." And I suggested a method in which this can be done. I could go on at length but I do not think this will make the point any clearer.

I now wish to deal with the fourth part of our amendment, which reads as follows:

> (d) Immediately provides for those persons who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I think this requirement also is a basic one. I have heard a lot of pious statements from the left side of the house regarding how tough it is going to be for the people who are not able to afford medical care. I agree with that statement. But then hon. members from that party go on to say they will not support an amendment which provides for this category of people. I cannot understand this attitude, in view of this statement by hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on October 13 as reported at page 8620 of Hansard:

> This is a sad day, because the action of the government in proposing the postponement of medicare for a year is a discrimination against the needs of the people in this country, particularly their medical needs, and I refer particularly to those people who cannot afford the medical care they require.

We on this side of the house agree with this statement, and that is why I wish to ask hon. members of the New Democratic Party whether they do not also agree that this is a necessity which should be provided now.

On page 8620 of Hansard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said:

> We want this bill to go through and we are prepared to vote for it, but when we vote for it we will be voting for it in its present form.

Of course he is referring to the fact that his party does not wish this legislation to be deferred. However the hon. member is not prepared to vote for our amendment because he thinks we are trying to stymie medicare. This is not so, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Hymmen) quoted a passage from the Hall report which I now wish to read, and which was also referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). It appears on page 8680 of Hansard and is as follows:

> While we are aware that shortages of physicians, dentists, nurses and other paramedical personnel will make it difficult to establish the full personal health services program our charter envisages, none the less the fact that there are shortages must not be used as an excuse to delay initiating programs and plans.

We agree with this absolutely. The hon. member went on to say that we are using this to try to kill the bill, and to try to delay everything. The contrary is true. We think there should be no excuse for delaying the initiation of programs and plans. We want the scheme started now. These two hon. members forgot to quote the rest of the passage, which I happen to have in front of me. I will quote from the Hall report, part of which appears on page 7585 of Hansard of July 12. I do not like quoting myself, but since this passage is the handiest one at the moment I will do so now.

I am quoting from the Royal Commission on Health Services, page 1, volume 2, where it says:

> We consider quality as the most essential element in health services, and every aspect of the programs must be constantly directed to that end.

A few lines further on they say:

> Quality depends primarily on the supply, availability, knowledge, skill, and dedication of professionally qualified personnel, second on the facilities at their disposal and third on the organization of the services.

Those are your priorities: first, supply; second, facilities; third, organizations, and in that order. Those who use the Hall Commission report as their bible should pay some attention to the report and should not quote it out of context. When we say we are in favour of starting programs and plans now, we mean it; we mean now—not in 1968 or on whatever other date the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will decide. Of course we do not know it because who can read his mind.

I must confess that I consider the speech made by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Klein) to have been one of the most fatuous speeches to which I have ever listened. I am amazed at some of the statements he made. For instance he mentioned that we should cut down the standards of medical care and let more people in so we can have more doctors. Does the hon. member mean to tell me this could possibly be the government's policy, that what we want is just quantity, not quality? I could not believe my ears when I heard this in the house yesterday. He made some further comments which are quite beyond belief. I do not think they are even worthy of comment. I sincerely hope, for the sake of the hon. member's profession, that the same does not happen to his particular profession of law.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I do not believe that this bill need be delayed. I think this is a smokescreen to cover some of the difficulties that have occurred in the cabinet. It is a smokescreen to cover up the fact that we do not have enough doctors to properly implement such a plan, and we do not have the co-operation of the provinces. Just imagine: We are unable to bring in a medical care plan now to cover those who are in need, and this during a time of prosperity. If we cannot bring it in now, I ask you Mr. Speaker, when we will be able to do so. Will it be in 1968, 1969, 1970 or 1975? This complete disregard of those who need help now is something to which we on this side of the house will never subscribe.

There are those who say we are trying to kill this bill by the introduction of an amendment. I ask them to go back to the railway legislation and the amendment introduced on August 30, 1966. This amendment can be found at page 7804 of Hansard, and reads in part as follows:

> This house declines to proceed with the second reading of a bill—

Surely that amendment and the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) would have had the effect of killing the bill. Evidently they believe it is all right to do this in connection with the railways, but not medicare. As a result of those amendments we got a bill that was at least acceptable to the railway workers, so why can we not get a bill which will be acceptable to the people of Canada and to those who have to provide the service?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to repeat at any length the criticisms my colleagues have so ably made of the government's failure to proceed with medicare. I do not think there is any need to reiterate the fact that the government has actually reneged on a rather basic undertaking to the Canadian public. Nor is there any need for members on this side of the house to emphasize the fact that many members, particularly the backbenchers on the other side, are embarrassed by the situation in which they find themselves. There is no need to say again and again, as has been pointed out by many members, that government spokesmen have not really given any realistic explanation of why after all the promises, the government is not going to proceed at this time, with medicare. Certainly, there is very little need to underline the fact that the failure of the government to go ahead, as they had undertaken to do, is leaving a great many Canadians in need of medical care, without that care.

I noticed in the newspapers today, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Medical Association, a body not usually given to enthusiastic support of the principle of medicare, has said that the government by its failure to go ahead with this undertaking to introduce a comprehensive universal medical plan, is leaving some five million people who really need medical help right now without that help. I have no doubt that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and some of his colleagues in the cabinet have already brought these or similar facts to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and his colleagues. I think a good many members on the other side of the house, well meaning people, who really want to see medicare brought in, just as we do—and as the Conservatives do, if I can accept their word for it—are feeling rather embarrassed and rather miserable tonight as a result of the situation in which the government finds itself.

I have no wish at all to add to that embarrassment. I want to say that, do what we will in the New Democratic Party, which I think it is fair to say is the only party in the house at this time which stands clearly for the introduction of a comprehensive universal health insurance plan by the government on the proposed date, we are not going to be successful in stopping the retreat of the government from this undertaking. The government is going to be successful one way or the other in shelving for a year or a year and a half, perhaps more, the implementation of a system that is so much needed in this country and which it is so obviously appropriate to introduce right away.

I have heard arguments about the need for medicare or health insurance by people who do not say exactly "no" to it but who certainly say "whoa" or "slow", and I believe these arguments sound very much like the arguments I have read and which were expressed nearly one hundred years ago concerning universal, comprehensive education. The same sort of criticism was expressed about that plan. There is no question but that there is a need for health insurance in Canada. There is no question that we can supply it. Nor is there any question that if we do so, collectively, we can save money and get better results for all those concerned.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that having made very little criticism of the government for its failure to act, I have a proposal to make to it at this time. I suggest that they give consideration to this proposal, namely that on the date originally scheduled by the government for the introduction of this comprehensive universal medical plan in Canada, we make a decision in the house to introduce a federal-provincial medicare program to cover at least all those citizens who are 60 years of age and over. I have three reasons for making this proposal. In the first place, such a plan would at once reduce the cost of living, and in some cases the cost of dying, to a great number of people in Canada. A great number of these people are those who are least able to afford the cost.

Second, if the government should make a start next year upon medicare for all those citizens over 60 years of age, this would improve our national health. If a comprehensive medical plan were put into operation it would permit the cure and prevention of disease, thus easing the health problems of a great number of our citizens in the age group I have mentioned.

Third, Mr. Speaker, it seems obvious that if we are going to make a start, even at the postponed date in 1968 which the government has suggested, it would probably be a practical thing for us to introduce a plan of health insurance across Canada for the age groups of 60 and over, so that we would have a practical test run of health insurance in this country. So, Mr. Speaker, without more criticism of the government or anybody else in the house, I leave the idea that if we cannot proceed with the national medicare plan on the date originally planned, at least we should give consideration to implementing that plan for all those citizens 60 years and over, beginning in our centennial year.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), in whose speech I took particular interest. I was very much impressed by his convincing argument and sound logic put forward with full professional medical knowledge. I also congratulate all other members who have taken part in this dabate.

I am a layman with no qualifications to speak in medical terms and with a limited knowledge of many of the references that have been made, so I am going to put forward by argument to the best of my ability from the standpoint of a layman-citizen-taxpayer of this great country of ours.

I followed with interest this debate on medicare, which concerns a subject vitally important to all of us, affecting as it does every citizen of Canada both today and in generations to come. One theme running through the whole debate to which I believe all in this chamber would subscribe is the need for a medical health plan. As we approach our centennial year, for the good of the country and in the interest of unity among the people we should have a functioning medical plan by 1967. But the government says no; it balks.

At this point I should like to refer to an editorial which appears in this evening's issue of the Ottawa Journal entitled "A strange promise on medicare". I should like to attach a little footnote of my own and entitle this editorial "The psychics and their indecision". Because the government through their action are qualifying themselves to become psychics, to be seers into the future.

The article begins:

> The curious noise heard across the land last week end was that of Liberals purring in satisfaction that they had been so courageous and wise as to postpone medicare for a year, from July 1, 1967 to July 1, 1968.
> We must put the country's welfare first, said Mr. Pearson proudly, and so said they all, all proudly.

Is not the medical health of the nation the most important welfare consideration in the country? The article continues:

> The Journal believes it was wise to postpone medicare. But what are we to make now of the Liberals' all-out pledge to bring in medicare July 1, 1968?
> They seem to be saying this:
> "We can't give you medicare now; with inflation and our general financial position as it is it might be fatal to the national interest. But we will give it to you without fail not later than July 1, 1968".
> Presumably on that magic date—

—and this is why I call the members of the government psychics—

> —no matter whether inflation is worse or trade has gone to pot—come hell or high water medicare will be given us July 1, 1968, the national interest be hanged.
> This is pitiful policy, reckless promising.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I will just quote the last paragraph of this very sound editorial.

> It is annoying to the average Canadian to have his leaders speak to him as though he were a nincompoop. This unnecessary promise must also be annoying to the provinces which are by no means in agreement with the government's medicare scheme even now and who in a year and a half could be still less in agreement.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would agree with me about the folly of passing a bill at this stage which will not come into effect until July of 1968. Many of my colleagues have risen to support the amendment that has been so ably presented by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). We have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) boasting of the brevity of his bill—only nine clauses, he said. As a medicare measure dealing with the health of 20 million people inhabiting an area of $3\frac{3}{4}$ million square miles, the bill certainly does not qualify in that regard.

Bill No. C-227 is simply a financial measure. It refers to such terms as "the insured person", "contributions", "the calculation of contributions", "advances" and "payments". The reason that the bill clings to this narrow language is that medicare is not a federal responsibility. In other words, the federal government cannot compose and put before this house a bill containing numerous clauses dealing with medicare because the entire responsibility for medicare lies with the provinces. All legislation regarding the health and welfare of the people comes within the power of the provinces. Yet this government—and this is typical of their legislation in the past as well—tries to impose Bill No. C-227 upon all the provinces of Canada. I say that this will not work.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has my political sympathy in that again he has been frustrated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and by the upper echelons of the cabinet. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has spoken. Medically speaking, he has assumed the role of the great witchdoctor of the Liberal party and of the cabinet. He has even put on the record implausible excuses for postponing that for which the people of Canada were hoping. He uses the unsound excuse that medicare will contribute to inflationary tendencies.

Why did the Liberals not say this when they were advocating medicare one year ago? If the Minister of Finance knew that medicare and inflation are directly related, he should have made allowances for this not only in the election promises of the Liberals last November but also in the legislative program that now ensues, or that the Liberals are contending ensues. The excuse of the Minister of Finance is simply poppycock. The people of Canada, provincially, collectively, geographically and individually are too intelligent to have this poked down their throats, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister, the members of the cabinet and the government have painted themselves into a corner. In their election promises the Liberals promised that priority would be given to medicare. Why, then, did they not give priority to medicare in their legislative program? This is nothing but a grand deception, Mr. Speaker, to delay the adoption of medicare on the ground that it is inflationary. The Liberal party cannot be depended upon any more, as far as the electors are concerned. That statement was made by one of their respected delegates to their recent convention held in this city.

The Ottawa Journal for Thursday, October 13, quotes a delegate from Oshawa to the recent Liberal convention as saying this:

• (7:50 p.m.)

Voters treat our candidates with a considerable amount of scorn. We can't put up our candidate as a man of confidence, judgment and influence and be believed any more.

It is regrettable, Mr. Speaker, that such a great party which has done so much for our great dominion, has now sunk to such an unreliable level because of its fooling around with the rights and wishes of the Canadian people.

The house has agreed that medicare is a provincial matter. Of course, the federal government has jurisdiction over the health of the peoples inhabiting the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. On the recent trip made to the Arctic by the committee on northern affairs and national resources, of which I have the honour to be a member, it was found in many areas that there was a lack of general health services for the Eskimos and the Indians. We found the medical services in the town of Frobisher Bay rather good, but the remainder of the eastern Arctic depends on the ship C. D. Howe which calls once a year to bring medical attention to the outposts. This ship, which costs $15,000 a day to operate, was stuck in the ice for 15 days in 1965. I remind the house that at that time it was unable to bring the vital medical services to the Eskimos of Baffin island and to those of the eastern Arctic. I found by asking questions at a meeting held with the Eskimos at Frobisher Bay that there is no doctor, and no medical service of any kind at Clyde River, which is an outpost of 300 people on the upper coast of Baffin island on the Canadian side of Davis strait. Medical services are needed immediately at Clyde River and at another point called Pond Inlet, which is a village of 250 people.

We found that medical services in the central Arctic were intermittent and not as effective as they should be. The public health nurse at Fort MacPherson on the Peele River in the Mackenzie delta has a transportation problem and badly needs a car for transportation services for the Indian patients. I would hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would take note of this and see that this problem at Fort MacPherson is solved.

I have said that this bill is strictly a financial measure. It is also a discriminatory measure in that it does not democratically define the term "medical practitioner". It is discriminatory against the optometrists of Canada. This is a shame, since so many people need and use the services of optometrists. I now quote from a letter received by all hon. members I presume, from the Canadian Association of Optometrists, 807 Metcalfe Building, here in Ottawa:

To put it bluntly, the medicare bill, which is Bill 227 and called the Medical Care Act, discriminates against optometrists, and their patients. It also discriminates against other health professions which regularly perform services which are also performed by physicians.

The letter quotes clause 2(d) of the bill and comments as follows:

The stickler is that all services, including those of ophthalmologists, will be covered. And who will decide which services are "medically required?" As it reads, 2(d) advocates discrimination against optometrists, and their patients.

Next the letter quotes clause 2(f), which reads:

"Medical practitioner" means a person lawfully entitled to practise medicine in the place in which such practice is carried on by him;

The comment of the Canadian Association of Optometrists is that they will be pushing strongly in Ottawa to have this definition amended so that it will read that for the purposes of the act a legally licensed optometrist will be regarded as a medical practitioner, as he should be regarded.

I quote again from their brief, where they confirm that——unless the bill is changed the following can be expected to happen:

The public will be deprived of its traditional and fundamental right to freedom of choice of health practitioner. Optometric patients (almost six million, or 65 per cent to 70 per cent of Canadians who seek vision care) will be influenced to quite naturally seek out the favored-by-legislation practitioner, i.e. the medical practitioner.

Optometrists would be placed in the suicidal position of having contributed to public funds which will be used to drive patients out of their offices.

What a chaotic situation this bill will create in that respected profession. To continue the quotation:

It will have a serious impact upon the number of young people coming into optometry. There would be little incentive to study for five years to become a member of a profession legislated to fade from the scene.

It will provide a service which if restricted to medical practitioners will be unavailable to a great proportion of the public, particularly outside the metropolitan areas. The optometrist is the only vision care practitioner in 60 per cent of the communities where there are optometric practitioners.

There are almost 1,500 optometrists in Canada and only around 300 certified ophthalmologists. The need for both practitioners seems obvious.

We recommend that the restrictive and discriminatory elements of the bill be removed and that the definition of "medical practitioner," for the purposes of the bill, be changed to include optometrists.

I am sure the house will agree with me that the recommendations and request I have read are reasonable. Then according to clause 2, paragraph (f) of the bill, eye examinations cannot be conducted except by a medical eye practitioner or ophthalmologist. Such person is not the only person licensed to provide professional services to the general public, because the optometrists are licensed and do provide most of these services in most communities. By this bill optometrists are excluded and discriminated against.

Yes, the house can see that this is a financial bill. I remind the minister that this is public money he is spending and that the 1,500 optometrists of Canada are also taxpayers of considerable stature. They are being taxed by this bill as it now stands to help to pay for services to the general public, which services, they are precluded from providing.

Optometrists provide and perform services for the following departments and government bodies. I shall name some of them: the Department of Indian Affairs, the Department of Veterans Affairs; the Workmen's Compensation Board headquarters in Toronto; the boards of education across our country and county health units. But the optometrists are not recognized in this bill. They are provincially and federally licensed.

I submit that this bill outlaws itself when it discriminates against any professional persons who are licensed to practice their professions and who are professionally and academically qualified to minister to the physical needs of our people. The same principle applies to the government's discriminatory attitude toward the chiropractors of Canada; they, too, should be included within the provisions made by this bill. There are many people in Canada who suffer from disabilities—spinal ailments, for example—which require the attention of chiropractors. Medical practitioners appear to be of little use to patients suffering from this kind of affliction.

In connection with medical care and the concern shown by this government for the health of some of the people of this country, I should like to draw attention to some additional fields in which the government could be rendering valuable assistance to respected bodies who work unstintingly and voluntarily in the interests of the health of the Canadian public.

First, there is the Victorian Order of Nurses, an order well known and highly respected across our land. They need assistance and the government could do nothing better than to make grants of a size which would help this altruistic and charitable organization. Then there is the Canadian Cancer Society whose campaigns I have assisted in our county. This organization is in the forefront of the fight against cancer in Canada, and the government might well manifest a greater interest in its work and support the society extensively.

I have here a clipping from the Toronto Star of Monday, October 17 under the heading: "New cancer case every 56 seconds U.S. society's prediction for 1967". This information comes from a convention held in New York city at which an increase in the incidence of cancer was predicted. As I say, the government might well participate to a greater extent in the work of the Canadian Cancer Society.

Another organization which I wish to commend is Alcoholics Anonymous for its great work in rehabilitating the wrecks of men and women—wrecks created by the government sale of alcoholic beverages. All governments across our country will soon have to face the fact that we derive millions of dollars in revenues from the alcoholic beverage trade, while doing little or nothing to assist helpless victims of alcoholism. I say to the minister and to the government: You are trying in a very ineffective way to manifest your concern for the health of the Canadian people. I have outlined a few fields where we should be at work. Do not let your acute concern for this bill restrain you from wrestling with the problems I have just outlined.

I wish, now, to congratulate the government of the province of Ontario on the medicare measures now in effect in that province through OMSIP. I am sure all the provinces will put their own versions of medical programs and medical care into effect in accordance with local needs and conditions. I wish at this point to express my admiration for the Hall report, the work of a commission which was set up before I was elected to this chamber.

I have read all I have had time to read from those two copious volumes which were, of course, sent to every hon. member. I appreciate the work which was done by the commission and the storehouse of knowledge which has been placed at our disposal. Indeed, as one member of this house, I would venture the opinion that we do not use it to the extent we should. The government is certainly not following the guidance offered by the commission in the bill now before us, but I hope that in the near future hon. gentlemen opposite will wake up to the value of the recommendations of the Hall report and be governed thereby.

I firmly support the amendment which was put forward so ably by my hon. friend from Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). We appreciate the professional knowledge which he brings to this house. I support the amendment because it voices the principle of co-operation with provincial governments. Moreover it recognizes the principle of voluntary choice by individuals. I do not think we have the right to legislate a private profession out of business or to make it unlawful for any person to employ the professional services of his family doctor and pay for them out of his own pocket, if he wishes.

Our amendment would also make adequate prior provision for sufficient medical research, the training of adequate numbers of doctors and medical personnel to cope with future demands.

I should like to quote a letter I have received from a member of the Department of Pathology at Queen's University. I think I am fortunate to have received this letter. I quote this learned doctor as follows:

> I am concerned that Mr. Sharp included the reduction of expenditures to research in his statement about the projected baby budget. It is of course difficult for me to write to you in what would appear to be completely logical or objective terms since I have a very personal interest in research. Nonetheless, I should like to make the following comment, which I believe can be made without reference to my own personal interest in medical research.
> In the past few years, almost every responsible member of government, and responsible advisory board, such as the Canadian Economic Council have emphasized that the one way to prevent inflation in our nation is to have a higher percentage of university graduates, highly skilled people and scientists, in order to increase our productivity through the application of the most advanced means known. In this context, it is also true that to train some people in a highly skilled fashion has the effect of influencing the productivity of our whole nation through a relatively small expenditure of money. It would seem, therefore, that one of the anti-inflationary methods would be to increase money in education and research, rather than cut back these expenditures. It is, therefore, rather alarming to hear a statement from a responsible member of government, since the statement seems to indicate a lack of knowledge as to the effect this would have on the very abnormality he is concerned with treating. I trust his comments have been a mistake. In any case, if they were not a mistake I trust other forces within the government will do what can be done to re-assess this possible action.

I think we are very fortunate to have advice voluntarily conveyed in this way from such a learned professional person with regard to the legislation now before us. Has this government manifested any interest in medical research in the past? Does this bill manifest any government interest in medical research at the present time? The answer is obvious: It is, no.

One of the election promises made last November was that 10,000 university scholarships would be created. Mr. Speaker, the government has welched on even that promise. Not long ago they announced they were not interested in that program. I did have the words in my text, Mr. Speaker, that they are no longer interested in the scholarship, but I will not make that accusation because I hope that at some time in the near future they will come to their senses and become interested again in these 10,000 scholarships. But at the present I reiterate that it is obvious that they have welched on them and are not now interested in them. You must agree, Mr. Speaker, that 10,000 government scholarships, if they were now in force throughout the universities across this country, could serve well the cause of medicare in all our provinces, could serve well the principle of scientific research along medical lines, something we lack so badly today.

Finally, our amendment would immediately provide for those persons who are unable, for financial reasons, to provide medical services for themselves. I have heard various figures and it has been estimated that there are up to one third of the Canadian people in that category.

I had an appeal yesterday, before I left home for Ottawa, from a man with a family. He is 48 years old, partially crippled but not totally disabled. He earns a meagre living under the greatest of physical difficulties as a hired agricultural labourer. He cannot afford medically to protect his family. In fact he deserves assistance commensurate with his physical handicap but so far he has been turned down. Does the government show any concern for this category of Canadian citizen in Bill C-227? The answer is no.

The government refuses to recognize any amendments. But I will make one prediction, Mr. Speaker. This bill will be amended, and in more than one instance, before it becomes operating legislation in July, 1968. It will not suit the provinces as it now stands. That is why I support the amendment as put forward so well by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), and now I urge all hon. members in this chamber also to support it.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, when implemented, the measure now before the house, will have a far-reaching effect upon all Canadians for many years to come. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has moved second reading of Bill C-227 which authorizes the payment of contributions by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans, and I think it only fitting that members of parliament in all parties give careful consideration to this legislation.

At the outset I wish to state it is my sincere belief that plans for comprehensive medical insurance are not only necessary but are also feasible, and that physicians' services should be available to all through co-operation within existing plans and the government, or through voluntary non-profit plans and the government. These plans should be acceptable to the doctors as well as to those receiving the services.

Since the government first talked about medicare—and that is going back to a long time ago—many people have expressed their concern over the cost of free medical care. In fact it is evident that this factor is of vital concern to this administration, for despite the announced pledge by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) last fall during the election campaign, that the Liberal party would have a full medicare scheme operating in Canada by July 1, 1967, that date has now been moved ahead to July 1, 1968, as a curb against inflation.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, the press in recent months has decried the low esteem in which parliament is held at present. But, Mr. Speaker, how can it be otherwise when this country has a Prime Minister, supported by a cabinet, whose statements cannot be accepted by the public as truth? All too often this Liberal government has taken a stand, only to retreat from that position, and this indecision and this lack of leadership have caused confusion throughout Canada, and a disregard for parliament which must be laid at the feet of the government.

At this time I think it advisable to examine the medical services we have, and what we hope to achieve by this legislation. Today in Canada almost all citizens in all ten provinces are covered by basic ward hospital care through a comprehensive plan of hospital insurance, substantially financed by the federal government but administered by the respective provincial governments. This program was initiated by a Liberal government and implemented by a Conservative government, and it has won wide-scale public approval.

The legislation as enacted goes beyond the provision of ward care coverage. Diagnostic services are included as insured benefits. The medical profession in Canada does not agree that laboratory and radiological services are hospital services, but has asserted that these services are medical services. Nonetheless, they are now insured services when in hospital, and private physicians believe it is grossly unfair for them to be required to compete with a free service when they provide this type of treatment in their own offices. I mention this because it is just one area in which problems have arisen.

As stated earlier in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, the government's main excuse for deferring medicare is its cost and the effect it will have on inflation in Canada. In view of this attitude I am concerned, and I think this house should be concerned, about the long-term implications, as they could affect this legislation. I ask, will rising costs in the future suggest to the administering agencies certain budgetary restrictions which will be reflected in reductions in the quantity and quality of the services available? Will the inability or unwillingness of governments to assign sufficient revenues for this purpose adversely affect the general implementation of scientific advances in medicine? We have already been made aware that these things are possible by this deferment to July 1, 1968, of a national medicare program.

It is with this background that Canadians must analyse and assess the future of physicians' services, and especially the future of medical services insurance. Most Canadians have now made the philosophical decision that health services should be provided by the provinces, assisted by the federal government, and that the next step, medicare, is a problem only of timing and finance.

Hospital care and medical services are different in kind rather than degree. Hospital care is an impersonal, institutional service, but few relationships are more personal than that which exists between a doctor and a patient. Hospital care is controlled by the doctor, but medical services are initiated by the patient. Therefore to me the implementation of a medical services program that is compulsory for all, and controlled by government, is an entirely new concept which requires a quite different philosophical decision. Few of us can resist a bargain, and medicare, underwritten by government, is almost irresistible.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I am opposed to compulsion in any form in what is supposed to be a free democratic society. I believe we should recognize the principle of voluntary choice by the individual. After all, the cost of free medicare cannot be analysed except in terms of its success in attaining its legitimate objectives. Health insurance is one manifestation of a deep seated concern in each of us for protection against the hazards of medical costs. It is a part of our search for security, a phenomenon which is not confined to our generation. Health insurance began in Europe more than 200 years ago. With the advent of the industrial revolution, workers banded together to form craft guilds. These were the forerunners of the friendly societies which still exist in Europe today. An important feature of these guilds was their attempt to meet collectively the financial hazards of illness. At first participation was voluntary, but widespread compulsion was introduced in Germany in 1884.

Compulsion was first applied on a selective basis to wage earners below a stated income. However, subsequent developments saw political pressures being used to widen both the occupational groups and the income classes to be included in the scheme. Bismarck's reasons for introducing a compulsory form of health insurance were not humanitarian; they were political. One of his biographers stated:

> To his mind, the state, by aiding the workers, should not only fulfil the duty ordered by religion, but it should obtain in particular a claim on their thankfulness, a gratitude that was to be shown by loyalty to the government and by loyal pro government votes in elections.

His program was financed by premiums from participants with some employer and state contributions. His scheme only provided a minimum level of medical service because only a minimal service was available, but Bismarck's pattern was adopted by a number of countries during the early years of the 20th century. However, the social security schemes built on the Bismarck pattern were not geared financially to accept the change from preventive to curative medicine, with its consequent increases in expenditure.

Additional moneys could not be allocated for health insurance because of more pressing demands on limited funds. It was not politically possible to demand that employees and employers increase their contributions, so substantial reductions were made in the benefits provided and in the method and amount of payment to doctors. A few countries did learn something from the failure of the Bismarck plan. In 1945 France introduced a program which did not attempt to provide insurance against the full expense for medical services. Payment to the participant represented 80 per cent of the cost of the medical services, if obtained from a physician who by contract had agreed to charge not more than a scheduled amount. The participant, if he wished, could obtain services from a private non-participating physician and receive the same amount of reimbursement, but of course under these circumstances he was required to make a larger contribution from his own resources since the fees of private physicians were likely to be higher.

Norway and Sweden adopted arrangements similar to those of France, insuring all, or almost all, of their populations and providing an indemnity basis or a reimbursement basis. Both these countries amended the French system to suit their own specific purposes. Both schemes have worked out reasonably well. One other country has avoided a major degree of compulsion and has used a government subsidy of much smaller proportions. This is Switzerland. Switzerland has a large group of health insurance associations of varying size which, for the most part, provide health insurance on a voluntary basis. In addition to premiums of subscribers, these organizations receive a subsidy from the federal government of approximately 15 per cent of their total expenditures. Under Swiss law participants in these funds are obliged to meet directly a proportion of their own medical care expenses, usually about 15 per cent.

I mention these facts to illustrate that in many other countries of the world the trend has moved away from a relationship of direct control between the government dominated plan and the doctor, and now is based on a refund system which returns to the participants a major proportion of the expenses incurred, but which requires a personal contribution from the insured when he obtains a service. In Australia and Switzerland the trend to compulsion has been reversed. The activities of government are limited to the provision of a subsidy.

One measure of the cost of free medicare is the total of the expenditures made, weighed against the benefits obtained. We must also remember that a change to a government service does not automatically increase the supply of physicians, which is Canada's most pressing need at the present time. I believe a much more practical method to relieve the medical needs of those of low income would be through a process of selective subsidization of medical services insurance premiums. This would greatly reduce the financial commitment of government and as a result would allow the government to concentrate financial assistance in depth to those areas of real need.

Too often the introduction of a government system, backed by relatively limited finances, has resulted in the provision of an unsatisfactory system for all, without substantially alleviating the area of real need. For example, why has the government of Great Britain now found itself in a position where it cannot provide the service it promised at the outset of the national health service? There is one basic reason. Under the national health service the government promised to provide and pay for health services rather than assist in their payment. Thus the government is placed in a position of providing and paying for a service without being able to control the demands for services. This does not apply to any other service underwritten by government. Governments decide what grants shall be made to education and what buildings should be built. In each instance the government controls the amount of expenditure and can defer projects to next year if financial resources are not available. This is not true in the case of health insurance. The basic decision in respect of whether or not he should see a doctor is made by the participant, and his visit can set off a chain of events reflected in expenditure by the government on medical, hospital, and other services.

If the demands and the expenditures are too high, there can be no deferment of payment until the next fiscal year. The only action the government can take is to restrict its services and when this happens the government negates its reasons for introducing this program. For these reasons I believe the government should confine its activities at present to providing assistance in areas of real need to the low income groups and the aged. Eventually a voluntary participating program could be implemented along the lines I have mentioned. As stated, I am opposed to the compulsory aspect of this bill. I believe the medical profession must be allowed freedom of thought and action so that as free-thinkers they will continue to make progress in their chosen field.

These are not my views alone. Since this bill was introduced I have received numerous letters from doctors in my constituency, and I am aware that this also has occurred in respect of other members. I should like to quote from one doctor who wrote to me as follows:

• (8:30 p.m.)

> In accepting such schemes as Maritime Medical Care, Physicians Services Inc., we have accepted the basic philosophy of medical insurance, but only as pure insurance.
> Now then as to whether these insurance schemes should be run by ourselves or by the government. The government would have the advantage of being more comprehensive, probably taking in a larger sector of the public than our schemes could afford to cover. I feel we must have the freedom to develop our philosophy of, and skills in, medicine as free men only can do. This means, of course, that we must resist being put in the position when any bureaucrat, medical layman can say to us, in regard to the practice of medicine, you must do thus and so. We just have to resist developing this slavish mentality that acceptance of such dominance will entail. We just cannot permit considerations of party politics to come between our duty and our patients. If 'government' is the sole paying agent, remembering that he who pays the piper calls the tune, consideration of party politics will inevitably intervene. The future of medical care of our patients will be subject to that all too prevalent political coercion, political expediency, political patronage.
> It is my sincere belief that the consumers of our medical care would suffer just as if, by analogy, the press were nationalized. It is not difficult to see how the consumers' interest would suffer also.

I believe this quotations sums up the views of many medical men in Canada. The medical profession must find and train the doctors who will provide the increased volume of services required by our people. Governments must assist the low income groups to obtain insurance, and must subsidize the older age groups whose expenditures are double the average and whose costs continue to rise with advancing years. We must set up a system which is flexible and which can adjust to the challenges of tomorrow. It is for these reasons I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), for it will provide immediately for the people in need in my province, a thought which I would commend for the consideration of the minister from Nova Scotia.

Thank you.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to participate in this debate. At the outset I should like to object strongly to those on the other side of this house and those of the fourth estate who suggest that because a member participates in this debate he is protracting the debate, obstructing the passage of this bill or filibustering.

As a result of this legislation we will write into our statute books a piece of social legislation which will remain with Canadians perhaps for all time. I have very little patience with those who criticize us because we participate in this important debate. I wish only that members opposite, such as the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner), would take part in the debate, as members on this side have done.

Having singled out the hon. member for Peterborough, and before he rises on a question of privilege, let me say that I agree with him. I know what he and the young Turks who met at Peterborough think. There are people in this party who think I perhaps could be a young Turk. Where in the world are all the young Turks tonight who are worried about this important piece of legislation? Surely we in this house should be concerned with this measure and should present our views. I hope the hon. member for Peterborough will rise in his place and state his opinion. I hope that other hon. members opposite will participate as actively as members in this party, and in the party to my left.

I come from a province which has Dalhousie as the fountainhead of medicine in the maritimes. I do not apologize for participating in the debate on this bill dealing with medical services. Let me point out that only last week a graduate of the same class to which the previous member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings belonged won a Nobel peace prize in the field of medicine. I wish I could speak with the knowledge as well as with the conviction and sincerity which would be obvious if that man had the privilege of speaking on medical matters in this house. I refer of course to Dr. Charles Huggins of Chicago who graduated from Acadia in 1920.

I am sure that eastern Canadians as well as other Canadians have a very real interest in this bill. We support the principle of medical services, without qualification, for all Canadians. The hon. member for Peterborough I am sure wants to say something. In view of what he has said in private at certain week end seances I will sit down and give him the opportunity of speaking.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me remind the hon. member that when a member rises to speak he must be in his own place.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to relinquish my opportunity to speak, but simply to allow the hon. member for Peterborough to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member is now back in his seat.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on what I hope will be accepted as a question of privilege. I should like to take exception to the remarks of the hon. member to the effect that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It appears that the hon. member intends to argue with his hon. friend across the house. An argument is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Faulkner: My question of privilege relates to the suggestion that I came into this house in order to—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is already a question of privilege before the house. I will hear that question and then listen to the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On the contrary, there is no question of privilege in what the hon. member has to say. He said he was not rising on a question of privilege. I heard it on this side of the house, and I am sure the Chair, heard it. Unless the hon. member states his question of privilege the Chair should put him back in his place, now that he knows where it is.

Medicare

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, the point I wish to assert is that I came into this house when I was advised that the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings was going to speak, because I was sure he was going to make a useful contribution. I did not come here simply to josh and interfere, as he has alleged.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am often amazed at the divine powers that are sometimes possessed by hon. members on the opposite of the house. If the hon. member for Peterborough knew that I was going to take part in the debate tonight he must possess some occult powers, because I had intended to speak tomorrow. Let me say that I did not yield the floor, but simply sat down as a matter of courtesy to give the hon. member an opportunity of presenting his question of privilege, which he has done now in a somewhat agitated way.

I spoke with some conviction, perhaps because I do not always agree with the general attitude adopted by members on this side of the house. One thing that made me chuckle this week end was an article which appeared in a good old Tory Toronto newspaper, and before I refer to it let me ask how many members there are on this side of the house who are from good old Tory Toronto. This paper, in recounting events during a recent convention, suggested that those people were not playing politics, but that they were going for ideas. I have not seen any hon. members on this side of the house or on the opposite side going against the current, but I still think that it is necessary for some members to do so from time to time. That is why I was willing to give up my position to the hon. member for Peterborough, to allow him to hold forth his views in public—which some people suggest he may have already expressed in private—or at some meeting, some place, somewhere. However, since he does not want to speak now, he can follow me, because there have not been too many hon. members on the opposite side of the house participating in this debate today—in fact none have—and he can add to whatever I say, or answer anything I have said.

Mr. Winkler: They haven't got the guts.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare listening to me from behind the curtain, because I have a few things to say to him about Nova Scotia. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I believe that all hon. members should participate in a debate of such consequence to the health of all Canadians concerning legislation which will affect the taxpayers of Canada forever after.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

With all due regard to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) and any aspirations he may have, or statements he may have made in the past, I think this country will be here for a long time to come and I hope he thinks so also, despite certain things that have happened lately. Nevertheless I am of the unequivocal opinion that there is no member on any side of the house taking exception to the principle of this legislation. Be that as it may, we have to be realistic.

I think that the problems in the area from which the Minister of National Health and Welfare comes are especially serious. In this legislation he is not selling a Trojan horse from which soldiers come out under the cloak of darkness to bring havoc and problems on Troy; and yet the lack of doctors in this country and the lack of medical facilities make it necessary to implement this program. This is especially so in Nova Scotia, and in the east generally, where this problem should be dealt with regardless of whether it be in July of 1967 or July of 1968. The people there are anticipating legislation on medical services, and yet this legislation does not guarantee the provision of this service to the taxpayers of Canada and to those who cannot pay taxes. I am directing my attention to those people in particular in view of the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard).

This legislation does not guarantee that service to the 20 million Canadians; all it guarantees is that the bills will be paid, and although I support this as much as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) supports it, let us not kid ourselves. Much time will elapse before this legislation is implemented, in spite of all this hocus-pocus across the way, this Liberal convention and this leadership convention and the Prime Minister's speech on heirs apparent and heirs-not-so-apparent, and senators apparent and not-so-apparent. I understand the Prime Minister has been anointed again, so we do not have to worry about any leadership problems. That side of the house should be worried about leadership because leadership provides vitality to the party and therefore I do not want to go into any further leadership problems.

I will suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that he comes from an area where the ratio of doctors to people is so high now that it even surpasses the figure given by the hon. member for Simcoe East, as applying to the whole country, of one doctor to over 2,000 patients.

I was disappointed that the minister did not speak a little longer. Usually he is concise and very logical but—and it is the first time that I can say this of any hon. member opposite—he was too brief on such an important piece of legislation. I do not know whether the reason for his brevity was his disappointment at not speaking at a certain time with some of the people around, or whether it was because of some problems within the hallowed sanctuary of the caucus or of the cabinet—because we never know what goes on in caucus or in cabinet, even though we read the papers, and we read Peter Newman. The fact of the matter is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was abnormally brief, even though he had the grace to make a short speech.

Usually I make short speeches, but tonight I do not think I will be as brief on this very important topic as was the Minister of National Health and Welfare who, as a member of the house advised the Prime Minister both when he was in office and when he was out of office in the twilight years not too long ago. Those twilight years may return if this government continues to force this bill down people's throats without regard for the opinions of the people at the grass roots level in the area from which the Minister of National Health and Welfare comes, and continues to rely on the opinions of the professors and retired civil servants who dominate hon. members opposite.

I will now deal with the question of co-operative federalism about which we have heard so much in the past two or three years. I will refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and also to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), not because I think they will enter into the debate, like the hon. member for Peterborough did, but perhaps because they would not find too much fault with what I will say. I will ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare who, when in the ivory tower advised the present Prime Minister—and unfortunately too many hon. members on the opposite side are still in their ivory tower—how he could reconcile the compulsory nature of this legislation with what was done previously in the case of hospital insurance.

As I understand it, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Mackenzie King had a formula. Part of the problem in politics today is that there is no demarcation line, and the old rules and traditions and precepts of politics have gone by the board. Mackenzie King, St. Laurent and now Mr. Pearson have all upheld the ideal of co-operative federalism, which is now being done away with. I believe that in the matter of hospital insurance, which is a related subject, the plan was only to be brought into effect if 50 per cent of the population of the provinces agreed to it.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) can correct me, but I understand this was the basic guide line which applied to Quebec and Ontario, the two largest provinces of Canada. I think the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), who seems to have some problems with the lower part of the anatomy of this head—which is most abnormal because normally that part of his system works very well—should be concerned because Quebec and Ontario are the two biggest provinces of this union and yet this plan which involves matters under their jurisdiction is to be rammed down their throats.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) who, when speaking on the resolution, suggested that this government is setting a precedent in the way it is dealing with this legislation for setting guide lines on education. We all know education is a hallowed subject and we are not to discuss it now, but the principle in both cases is the same. If we do not rely on principles in politics, then the disenchantment with this government will continue in this country to the extent that in time hon. members on the left side of the house will be helped.

They would be misguided if they followed this precept. But as far as the principles of the two main parties are concerned, there is a real disenchantment on this side of the house, even though there have been many catcalls from the other side of the house. Even though I may disagree with some of the things which the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said, a good many of the things he has said in the last few years have come about. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) made a speech last night regarding the principles involved in this legislation, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, it is time we got back to principles. This brings me back to co-operative federalism, which is a fine sounding principle and the Prime Minister supports it.

Precedents have been set when the majority of the provinces have agreed with the policies of the federal government regarding areas under their jurisdiction. Yet this time, when we are concerned with a field that cuts right into provincial jurisdiction, the 50 members from the province of Quebec, even in the light of the precedent on education, have hardly uttered a murmur. I have great respect for la belle province, since I worked there for three summers,—although my language would not seem to justify it. I find myself amazed at the compliance, the aquiescence, the lack of intestinal fortitude, of these members from Quebec to stand up on a basic jurisdictional question.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has now to take these plans back and have a conference with Mr. Johnson. This has not happened. I have some good friends over there, and I hope I will have even after tonight. However, I believe the people of Quebec can quite rightly condemn the members of that province for their failure to take a stand on this issue. The people of Quebec have quite rightly urged the people in the other nine provinces to have regard for the constitution. I do not go along with this myth that the B.N.A. Act cannot be changed. I am all for change. There could be a constitutional conference.

I am not saying this B.N.A. Act is a hallowed instrument. It has given certain basic rights, and it has provided the basic seed for change in Quebec. You can call it a quiet revolution or a loud revolution, but it is a revolution that is going to be good for Canada. Unfortunately, there are too many members from Quebec on that side of the house. I believe that Canada would be a better place if many uncommitted young people from Quebec would come on this side. There would be a better dialogue, a better discussion. In this case, we have a vacuum,—we have a vacuum in many areas. But this is a fundamental area, because a precedent will be set for any government to say to the ten provinces, "We have a certain pot for educational purposes; if you subscribe to certain rules you can have some of it, but if you do not, you do not get it".

[Mr. Nowlan.]

The political power flowing from this position is fantastic because, while so many of the provinces in Canada today agree with the principle of medicare, they do not have the fiscal ability to implement it. Well, the carrot is held out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Trojan horse has been wheeled up beside the wall, but it is not going to seduce the people behind the wall. They are going to have to do something about that horse. Any provincial premier in any of the provinces of Canada has to react to that horse that has been placed there. I say that it is a gilded horse; I say it is a tainted horse. This horse has no more substance than the wooden horse of Troy—and I am not talking about the ends of the horse. As I say, this horse is made of wood and I think the intentions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to implement a basic service in Canada are built of the same wood because we are not going to have the service. We cannot have the service. We are going to have our bills paid, and I am all for that. I want my bills paid, too. Most of us in this house are the fathers of children and we have some bills to pay. I am happy about the principle of the payment of bills.

I come back to this vacuum in the dialogue between members. I am not going to single out any member. I may have embarrassed one member by singling him out. I can see a member sitting in the backbenches who was very vocal in the press and on the radio and was a member of the thinkers conference. Since he is a new member, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we are in the same class. I feel he and I are colleagues at the bar, so to speak. I read his columns with interest. However, as I say, there is a passive acquiescence in connection with this fundamental problem. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) spoke to me once privately, and I echo what he said at that time. I do not know whether or not he has made a speech, but he said that those at the grass roots quite often are not concerned about fundamental, constitutional problems. This is understandable. They want their bills paid, and this is understandable, too.

I spoke at a meeting in Digby last night, and I know that area is quite concerned about an announcement that the base at Cornwallis is going to be closed. I believe this question may come to the floor of the house. I drove by the base at two o'clock this morning. It is understandable that such people are not too concerned with anything connected with constitutional problems. They want their bills paid, and I want mine paid. However, as members of parliament, and I include members opposite, we have a higher responsibility than to just sit back and say that we all want medicare; we all want our bills paid. We have to protect some of the basic, constitutional rights of the people. In spite of this, we have this passive acquiescence opposite on so many constitutional problems, and this has caused problems within that party. This will be taken as a precedent in the future in connection with a field that is as basic as education.

A future government is going to look at this medicare bill, and will take the lack of a constitutional stand as a guide line. There will not be too many members who will be able to stand up and say, "This is a very bad thing because it cuts into provincial jurisdiction, so we really should complain." The members of the government of that day will then be able to say: You sat silent on medicare which covers a fundamental provincial responsibility. This should be a provincial problem because the ability of the people of a province to handle this basic problem of human need varies from province to province. The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows this better than anyone else. My province cannot provide the services that Ontario can provide. Perhaps with federal guidance, federal co-operation and consultation, we can get a good plan that will work across the board. However, we cannot have it forced down our throats.

We did not have hospital insurance forced down our throats. Many members opposite were not in the house when that bill came forward. I know that right hon. Mr. St. Laurent was a political scientist, and many years ago there was a formula on these things. This is all being swept away. I spoke about health insurance, and that involved another government in another day. I come back to another field within the jurisdiction of health and welfare, and it represents a complete contradiction of this phrase "co-operative federalism". This Madison avenue ballyhoo has given that phrase a fine sound, but what does it mean? Does it refer to what happened at the health resources fund conference? The health ministers of the provinces were to discuss their needs with the federal government, but then the day the conference was to meet there was an announcement in the newspaper that the federal government had $500 million to be applied in a certain way. This announcement was made before the health ministers from each province had discussed and defined their needs. Is this co-operative federalism? When the Prime Minister talked about this $500 million, Mr. Speaker, I noticed it was to be spread over 15 years and there were to be special regional payments for the maritime provinces.

I know that at one time in Nova Scotia we thought, perhaps somewhat selfishly, that we were going to get the benefit of the $20 million. We liked the sound of that. Once again, however, an announcement was made without consultation with the health ministers of the provinces, and we hear that in Newfoundland they are going to build a medical hospital and a medical education centre, and that in New Brunswick there is going to be a medical health centre to train doctors. We need those doctors, but we have an institution now in the maritimes which has been performing that service for the maritimes and the rest of Canada in a very admirable way. I do not believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare would object too much if I say that institution has provided doctors for this country and for the United States. We need more doctors, and we could utilize them in Nova Scotia. We could utilize this $20 million in Nova Scotia; but this is a selfish point of view, and the fund could have been apportioned after there had been consultation. But no, Mr. Speaker, co-operative federalism means the answers beforehand and the dictation afterwards. That was certainly the case with the statement that was made about health resources.

I do not imagine I have disturbed too much the very able and amiable Minister of National Health and Welfare, though as far as this legislation is concerned he is more amiable than able. He is a man who is logical, and who before he came to the house devoted his attentions to an institution which also had some logical people inside it. This is why I am a little disturbed that the minister is acting in such an illogical way on a matter affecting provincial jurisdiction, and in an area where provincial members speak out every day for the people who want their bills paid.

We have a responsibility to the future and must be guided by the past. If the minister has been guided in this legislation by the action which was taken on health resources, then he is ignoring the past. He is ignoring Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent, two previous Liberal prime ministers, as well as the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). So I am wondering where co-operative federalism leads.

I notice that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) made a statement, which was reported in Saturday's Montreal Star, when he addressed a dinner meeting of the Canadian Alliance. I am a little surprised that some hon. members did not ask the minister about this statement on Monday. I was out of the house on that day or I would have asked him whether this was another stated change in government policy. I do not know whether I should quote the minister directly or paraphrase. I heard some paraphrasing earlier in this session which sounded almost like a direct quote, and I do not know whether that is good or bad. However, according to the Montreal Star the minister, who also believes strongly in provincial jurisdiction, rights and priorities, said that Ottawa had systematically invaded fields of provincial jurisdiction since the war and that this would have to stop. Then the minister went on to say that the federal government must get out of fields of provincial jurisdiction. That is, I presume, other than education.

With the constitution and tradition which we have, there is no more fundamental field of provincial jurisdiction than the administration of health in the provinces. This is a subject which touches human needs and compassions, and with regard to which we need a program for all Canada in order to have close administration at the provincial level of the medical needs of the people who unfortunately become afflicted with disease, and who require assistance to pay their bills. This is a basic in education. Yet here is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who choses to remain silent in this debate on a bill which is basic to provincial rights, last Saturday having the temerity and effrontery to insult the people of Quebec and the rest of the people in Canada. I know he is a fine man, but on this particular point, as a constitutional lawyer and as a responsible minister, he makes the statement that Ottawa should get out of provincial jurisdiction, and does not try to reconcile that statement in this house with the provisions of the bill.

The Minister of Finance, long before there was any conclave at any Chateau close to these hallowed halls, told a fiscal meeting of finance ministers on September 14 that he was going to bring forward a whole new concept in order to help implement this co-operative federalism that we have all heard so much about. Among other things, the Minister of Finance suggested that we must recognize that the provinces have more and more wanted to assume full responsibility for initiating and operating their own programs, and that their ability to do so has grown demonstrably since the war. He said that this has been especially true of Quebec and that we must recognize the aspirations of the provinces.

You have probably heard that statement before, Mr. Speaker, which was uttered by the present Minister of Finance; whether he is heir apparent or heir not-so-apparent, I cannot say. He is a responsible minister and was pinpointing the real and valid interest the provinces have in their own fields, and how Ottawa should not cut into these fields, as is the case here.

I have talked about the constitutional problem and why I think members opposite should speak out on it, especially the great phalanx from the province of Quebec. I have no hesitation at all in voting for the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). This postponement has had several birth pangs. I think in the early stages of the debate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said something about midwives. That was in connection with immigration; but there have been many stages to this gestation period. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said, we must not forget this long period of 47 years which it has taken hon. members opposite to bring forward medicare. There have been many stops and starts.

This is why once again I find it illogical for the minister of health not to pay heed to the part of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East which suggest we institute this pilot project to which I have referred. If there is a doctor shortage, as we suggest there is, the problem will only be compounded by giving the provinces an across-the-board payment. Let us start with a pilot project. What is wrong with that? I think especially of those who cannot pay for medical care now, such as those on provincial assistance, old age assistance, those over 65.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government meet this cost, especially in view of the increasing cost of living. Why is this suggestion so revolutionary? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) made a speech yesterday in Vancouver, which was reported in the press, in connection with certain guide lines which had been laid down by the government opposite and to which some Liberals take exception. Nevertheless we have the plain fact that members of the government opposite were called in to approve a wage contract which gave 85 cents an hour increase to the longshoremen in Montreal and to the seaway workers.

Yet the same government is not prepared to increase by 85 cents a day the old age pension. If you work it out, Mr. Speaker, 85 cents a day comes to $25 a month approximately, which when added to the existing pension would give our pensioners $100 a month. If there ever was a need to pay the old age pensioners $100 a month, in view of certain actions which have taken place in Montreal in connection with the wage contracts of the longshoremen and the seaway workers, it is now, in a time of spiralling cost of living.

I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) that the cost of living is not due solely to an increase in wages or to any one contingency; it is a combination of factors. But when you boost a wage structure by over one third in a two-year contract, there are bound to be spiralling costs. Yet the government is not prepared to give 85 cents a day to the old age pensioners, even though they have given 85 cents an hour to the longshoremen. They should make this concession to the old age pensioners because they need this money now to pay their doctor and hospital accounts.

Therefore I suggest that the government regard this action I have suggested as a pilot project, so that by the time July 1 comes along we will have learned something. If the plan is implemented on July 1, 1968 any of the kinks which exist in the plan will have been ironed out. I suggest that this is a logical approach and I am a little surprised that the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not subscribe to it.

Another factor in connection with this plan is this. The government will not take a piece, but want the whole shot. In other circumstances this might be acceptable, but it is not in this case, especially when they think the matter over and give it the proverbial six months hoist. In fact, they have given it a 21 months hoist. As far as I can see, this program does not give any consideration to the provinces for their cost of administration.

Medicare

We have heard much of Mr. Justice Hall's report in two volumes. He spoke of a comprehensive program, and we have used the term "comprehensive" pretty loosely in this chamber in the last few days. This plan will not give us the comprehensive program that the Hall Commission recommended. It is going to pay for physician services. It is not going to pay for dentists' care and psychiatric care and the many other cares and needs recommended by the Hall Commission. In fact, this plan does not follow the Hall Commission. The Hall Commission says: Lay the groundwork first and then come in with the plan. This plan does not do that, and it is not comprehensive. That brings us back to the Trojan horse which the minister has dragged before the Canadian people. This plan calls for treatment by a doctor when there is a doctor to treat anyone. The bill proposes paying for medical services to those who are lucky enough to have a doctor in their area.

I suggest that we should have a pilot project to iron out the kinks which we are bound to get. Let us have a plan which will pay for the cost of the administration. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will explain no doubt, in his closing statement, what has been done with respect to the escalation of costs. In every federally administered scheme costs escalate. We have seen what happened to the costs of social security in the United States, and how those have escalated. We see what has happened in England. Frankly, I think government schemes go up more quickly than private schemes. This is where I disagree with my friends to the left.

Let us have some provision so that the provinces may have a chance for a dialogue to probe those areas, and to provide some protection where costs might escalate. Let there be a dialogue so that you will not have a situation as described by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. McQuaid) and deplored by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) where you have one doctor for 2,400 people. What difference will a medical scheme make to those people? Their doctor is overwhelmed now. But in the areas where there are doctors, and where costs will increase, protection to the provinces ought to be given with respect to escalation of those costs.

I have spoken frankly in an area where all members should speak frankly. In his closing statement I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will state the position as it relates to costs of administration, and the escalation of those costs.

Canada is a land of compromises. Why cannot we compromise on this scheme. We have already had a compromise from hon. members opposite, which came as a result of other problems, and which was thrown around at another meeting not too long ago. Why cannot all Canadians in this country compromise, and have a compromise at a national level regardless of party politics? I suggest to the minister seriously that we should iron out some of the kinks of the scheme, but that we should at least go so far as providing this service to those who need it now but who cannot afford to pay for it. I refer especially to the old age pensioners. If you are not going to give them any old age assistance increase, at least let us have a pilot project to help them. With that we could also iron out the kinks of the plan. Before ramming a compulsory provision down the throats of the provinces, why not have a dialogue to discuss with the ministers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous agreement to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members of the house for listening to my rhetoric. This is the first speech where I have gone the full length—whether in committee where you can speak for 20 minutes, or in the house where you can speak for 40 minutes. I have been so long because of the importance of the speech, and because I have tried in a limited way to express my conclusions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who I hope understood the spirit in which they were expressed. I do not want to trespass on what any other hon. member might wish to say, but I hope the minister shows to the Canadian people that he has the capacity for logic and that he can meet problems, and not just use many, many words.

I hope that the minister can bring the ten provinces together in a spirit of compromise, because we have had that spirit and we shall continue to have it if we are to continue growing. I suggest that the greatest pilot project and the greatest birthday present for Canadians would be to have such a project implemented by July 1, 1967, for those who cannot pay for it and who need it. I think there should be discussions with the provinces about the ramifications of this scheme, so that we can have a plan that is not rammed down our throats, that does not trespass on provincial jurisdictions but that not only the members of the government but all members of the house can be proud of —because all members of the house are in favour of the principle.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Now you will get it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): —may I inform the Liberal members across the way who have indicated that they do not want to hear anybody on this side of the house that I should be perfectly willing to relinquish the floor if anybody would guarantee to me that they would get up and tell the truth. If my hon. friend for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) could not think of a name to apply to the minister, the minister ought not to worry: I know another name.

On Thursday the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) when speaking on this bill mentioned two reasons why the medicare program is delayed. He said, first of all, that the provinces representing 85 per cent of the population of this country have refused to go along with it, and that the remaining 15 per cent of the people would be unable to make it work successfully.

The second reason is, as the Hall Commission report made very clear, that we do not have enough doctors, dentists, nurses and medical technicians to enable this program to operate successfully. The hon. member for Northumberland should have mentioned a third reason, a reason which throughout my province and throughout the maritimes is gaining publicity. The minister is basking in the glory of that publicity.

I do not think he has allowed this type of publicity to circulate throughout the maritimes, but an impression has been left with many people—and as I say, it has not been created by the minister—that the medicare program was blocked by the Minister of Finance in order to stymie the bid of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the leadership of the Liberal party. This is ridiculous I think, and I do not subscribe to it; but I have not heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare take occasion to deny this story, for the simple reason that he must be getting much favourable publicity from it. I say this because as recently as Saturday of last week, in the Halifax Herald there appeared this blazing headline: "Mac Wins Medicare...".

An hon. Member: Oh, yes?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): "Mac" I presume is the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When he comes before the house on another occasion I hope that he will be able to win another battle of equal importance to the welfare of the Cape Breton miners. I hope he will make sure that another very important promise will not be broken. I do not think I need interpret that any more clearly for the minister to be able to understand what I am talking about. This article in the Halifax Herald goes on to explain how "Mac" won the medicare battle:

• (9:20 p.m.)

When Health Minister Allan MacEachen finally brought the revised scheme for medicare before the Commons this week, the one seat on the front benches noticeably vacant was that of Finance Minister Sharp.

And I would remind him he is battling on that other promise with that same minister. The article goes on:

Mr. Sharp had good reason for his absence. He had gone to Montreal to fill a luncheon speaking engagement but many in the Liberal benches regarded it as a trip on which he would be licking the wounds of the first real defeat of his political career—even though his aides had been able to project the idea here in recent days that the latest revision in government plans for medicare was a major victory for him.

There is the odd person who can claim victory out of broken promises, but how anybody with a reasonable approach or a common sense approach can consider a broken promise to be a victory is beyond me. I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker: It could only happen on that side of the house among the Grits.

In the tense rounds of cabinet infighting over the postponement of medicare's implementation from July 1, 1967 to July 1, 1968 the chief adversaries were Sharp and MacEachen.

The former took the stand that it was necessary in order to cool the fires of inflation and prevent a stiff increase in taxation.

It is interesting to note that they come along at Liberal conventions where they pass resolutions referred to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) as "only resolutions passed by political parties" and leave the impression across this country that if things improve medicare will be implemented no later than July 1, 1968.

Is this not a ridiculous situation—a situation nobody else but those on the Liberal benches could bring about? We have a Minister of Finance who says medicare has been postponed to kill the fires of inflation. Then we have a Liberal convention and Liberal ministers going before the people of Canada and saying: If things improve, we can have the scheme. What needs to be improved? The economy of the country, they say. Now the medicare program has been postponed because of the economic condition of the country—it has been done in order to slow down the fires of inflation as the Minister of Finance says—to slow down the boom. How are we going to improve on a boom? What improvements will take place to allow the Minister of Finance to permit medicare to come into operation not later than July 1, 1968? How in the name of heaven can any Liberal reconcile these two things, which are by their nature directly opposed—on one hand, "slow down the boom," and on the other, "if things improve we can put medicare into effect"?

The Minister of Finance took the stand that it was necessary to slow down the inflationary trend. However, the Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) could not accept this and he is reported to have made his views plainly and vigorously known. The report in the Chronicle-Herald goes on to say this was because——medicare would not come into operation until half way through 1967, and because only some of the provinces would be ready to participate, the federal cost in the first fiscal year would run to no more than $40 millions.

I would remind hon. members that the Minister of Finance, in a defiant and arrogant manner in this house the other day when questioned about the $7 million which will be spent on the B and B Commission said it was all right to spend such a large amount in that way, though he would say nothing in favour of medicare which would cost only $40 million in the first year.

Of course, the $40 million needed could easily be provided if this government would look closely at some of the programs it has initiated this year. There is the $7 million for the B and B Commission; there is the $10 million provided for the arts—whatever they are—and there is to be a Canadian film association formed, or something. A few moments ago the minister found it necessary to go behind the curtain. This time it looks as though he has found it necessary to come over to our side. Maybe while he is over here we can sell him the idea. Don't let him get away. The article continues:

But Mr. Sharp was able to sell a majority of cabinet on his case—and proceeded to announce the postponement to parliament early last month while Prime Minister Pearson was in London.

Still unconvinced by the Sharp argument, Mr. MacEachen advised the Prime Minister on his return from the United Kingdom that as Minister of Health and Welfare, he could not, with a clear conscience, introduce the necessary amendments as they were proposed in the Commons and speak in favour of them.

So what's new?

Should he reverse the postponement of the decision and risk a resignation by Mr. Sharp, one that would follow that of former Finance Minister, Walter Gordon by less than a year.

Should he go ahead with the decision and risk the resignation of Mr. MacEachen, one of his closest associates in government?

Should he undertake another cabinet shuffle to give the health portfolio to another minister?

Whatever course he followed would cause himself and his government embarrassment and invite a new stage of ridicule from the opposition.

He found the possibility of solution in an offer by Mr. MacEachen to accept some form of compromise.

The Prime Minister asked the Health Minister and Manpower Minister Jean Marchand, who was supporting the MacEachen position throughout, to try to work out one with Mr. Sharp.

With Mr. MacEachen scheduled to fill a speaking engagement in Vancouver last Friday, Mr. Marchand took on the role of negotiator.

And while the minister was still on the west coast he was able to telephone to him the news that Mr. Sharp had agreed on changing the fixed postponement date of July 1, 1967 to July 1, 1968 or earlier if national economic conditions and government finances took a change for the better in the meantime.

Here again, I would remind hon. members of the other statement which is a denial of the policy announcement of the Minister of Finance, and his request that medicare be postponed because, he says, we must slow down the boom. Then they say they will wait to introduce medicare until the economic situation has improved to such an extent that it can be implemented. The article goes on:

Mr. MacEachen readily agreed to this new measure of flexibility. And Mr. Marchand went happily off to Montreal to fulfil an appointment there.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

But by the time he got back to Ottawa last Saturday, the Minister of Health was informed by the Prime Minister that Mr. Sharp was not ready to go along with any change.

The issue was back where it had started—and to make matters worse, 1,800 delegates were beginning to stream into Ottawa from across the land for the big Liberal party policy conference at which medicare was certain to be a contentious issue.

Here again I would refer to the resolutions passed by the Liberal convention and what they mean to the Liberal government—they are "only resolutions passed at a party convention." The article goes on:

The Prime Minister felt that in his convention opening speech he had to say something about medicare. Unable to get an agreement between Mr. Sharp on one hand, and Mr. MacEachen on the other, he proceeded to write into his speech that July 1, 1968 remained at that point, the commencement date but by adding that the government was keeping a flexible approach to it, inferring there could be a change.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Then with the convention's chief policy makers hot on his heels for a resolution which would be acceptable to the gathering, he called all three ministers, Sharp, Marchand, and MacEachen, to his Chateau Laurier suite to get the matter settled in a face to face environment.

While MacEachen and Sharp remained relatively cool, Manpower Minister Marchand is reported to have exploded in anger at the finance minister for, as he saw it, welching on the agreement reached the previous Friday.

May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is supposed to have exploded at the Minister of Finance for welching on an agreement made the previous Friday. Why do not the Liberal backbenchers, led by this same minister of manpower, explode because there has been a broken promise? They are not only welching on themselves but they are welching on the Canadian people.

Reports seeped out into the conference halls below that Marchand had threatened to resign if July 1, 1968, was to remain as the firm date and that Mr. MacEachen might follow him.

Turning to his diplomatic best Mr. Pearson was able at the end of the controversy, covering a few hours, to get an agreement from all three ministers on the "not later than July 1, 1968."

The wording of the amendments to the bill was settled and everybody gave his blessings to the text of the statement Mr. MacEachen would make to the house in introducing second reading.

This was the statement which Mr. MacEachen delivered in the house:

"We are determined not to proceed later than July 1, 1968 . . . . In the meantime the government will keep the financial and economic climate under close scrutiny . . . . nothing would please the government more than to proceed with it before that date."

The Prime Minister sat attentively in his seat and when Mr. MacEachen had finished, nodded his approval with a smile and left the chamber.

Mr. Marchand, who followed every word with equal attention was also happy. From the gallery above one could almost see the five other ministers present also heave sighs of relief that another cabinet crisis was apparently over.

But backbench M.P.'s who were in the know of what really happened, were wondering what Mitchell Sharp was thinking as he sat somewhere beyond the confines of the house.

If there was a victory for anyone, the odds were on the side of Mr. MacEachen and Mr. Marchand—not on the side of Mr. Sharp as the stories that were circulated around the Liberal conference had implied.

The implication here is that the majority of the people at the Liberal convention were on the side of the Minister of Finance and the inference that there has been a real battle going on between that minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare is probably quite factual. Now we have this medicare legislation before us, and the government has taken the position that it has to watch the economy. The Minister of Finance says it is being delayed to slow down the boom, and out of the other cheek tells us that when economic conditions are better they will introduce medicare not later than July 1, 1968.

One wonders what goes on with this government when it wants to rush this legislation through, legislation that actually means nothing unless it is implemented. Just the other day a question was ruled out of order when a member asked about the 12 mile territorial limit. It was ruled out on the basis that it was asking for a policy statement. That was not the case. Legislation to establish a 12 mile limit was rushed through by the government two years ago, but has never been enforced.

At that time we had what was referred to as the Pearson gunboat philosophy, and we may have been able to exercise that gunboat philosophy if it were not for the fact that we have a Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) who has stripped our gunboats. But possibly we can now depend on the fact that just today President Johnson signed a bill to invoke a 12 mile limit in the United States. Who knows, the Minister of National Defence may now go to the United States for the necessary equipment to implement the gunboat philosophy.

This legislation has been rushed into the house, despite appeals from this side that at first there should be at least a pilot project. In the past the Minister of National Health and Welfare said it would only cost $40 million to put medicare into effect for the latter part of 1967.

The latest word I heard from the Canadian Medical Association over T.V. last night was that they want medicare for people who cannot afford to pay doctors' fees. They also made it quite clear to the minister that if he puts the over-all plan into effect there is not sufficient medical personnel to implement it. I ask, why cannot the government agree to make medicare available now to those who need it, since the doctors say they cannot possibly service the whole program if it is put into effect immediately? They will not even be able to service it should the Liberals finally get around to keeping one promise, and we do have medicare implemented by 1968.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say it is my hope that "Mac" will win another battle concerning the health and welfare of the miners in Cape Breton. Despite the interpretation of a few people that he has this time won a victory, when the minister gets on his feet to wind up this debate I hope he will explain for me, because I cannot understand it, how anybody can say people gained a victory out of a broken promise.

No matter how you look at it, Mr. Speaker, this government stands condemned regardless of how you examine their position and regardless of the arguments of the Minister of Finance. This still constitutes a broken promise, and the Minister of Finance has led the way in breaking it. What is most discouraging to me as a Nova Scotian is the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a Nova Scotian himself who should be fully aware of the implications of this particular program, has given formal approval to breaking that promise.

To test the attitudes of the government all one needs to do is quote the words of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). On September 1 in this house he turned right to the Prime Minister and said, "The Prime Minister as usual will have to backtrack." Those were the words of the Minister of Transport spoken directly into the face of the Prime Minister. With the Prime Minister backtracking it has become a simple matter for the government to break promises from which it elicited considerable mileage during election campaigns, and I cannot see how broken promises mean a victory.

This medicare bill is discriminatory. Clause 2(d) reads:

"insured services" means all services rendered by medical practitioners that are medically required

This means that the services of ophthalmologists will be covered but not the services of optometrists. In like manner oral surgeons and other dentists are not included, but if a physician performs the same services then those services will be covered. This I feel is quite discriminatory.

• (9:40 p.m.)

It has been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that somebody else is blasting the government. Second, this will also impose an undue hardship on those citizens of the country who dwell in rural areas and small centres. Ophthalmologists tend to locate in larger urban areas which have hospitals in which they may work. Optometrists on the other hand, not needing such facilities, tend to practice in smaller semi-rural areas. By not making the services of the optometrists available to people dwelling in such areas, these people will be forced to pay doubly, either to engage a local optometrist outside the coverage of Bill C-227 or by having to absorb the cost of lost time from work, and the cost of having to travel to the large centre where the ophthalmologist is located. In addition he will have the loss of the inalienable right of Canadians to the choice of practitioner.

Another aspect to be considered is the fact that optometrists constitute the largest body of legally qualified practitioners in the vision care field. Already they are performing their services at all levels of government and are serving over five million Canadians, or 70 per cent of all Canadians seeking visual care. At the present time 1,500 optometrists are available, compared to 300 ophthalmologists. Thus, to cut off the public from the optometrists, as in Bill C-227 as it now stands, would be detrimental to public health and would produce chaos in this field.

The solution to the problem lies in the definition of the term "medical practitioner", as it appears in clause 2, subclause (f) of Bill C-227. This definition is as follows:

"medical practitioner" means a person lawfully entitled to practice medicine in the place in which such practice is carried on by him.

If this definition were broadened to include all duly qualified—legally and professionally—practioners, whose services are covered by Bill C-227, these problems I have mentioned would be solved. In other words, where one profession performs a service that another profession legally is licensed and qualified to perform, and which is covered by the terms of the act, then the second profession also should be covered.

Again I have pointed out only one very discriminatory aspect of this particular bill. In the area from which the minister comes he should know the ratio of patients to doctor. He should know this also from the information provided to him by other speakers in this house. Today we do not have and cannot possibly have available in this country, in order to make medicare work effectively, the trained doctors, nurses and technicians required to carry on a successful program. This should be known to the minister, because in his own home town and own area it has been pointed out to him by qualified people—people in the medical profession—that there are areas where there are over 2,000 persons for each available doctor.

I should like to suggest to the minister that he give every consideration to the appeal made last evening on national television, I think by the president of the Medical Association of Canada, that medicare be implemented at once for those in need or those who cannot afford to pay. This is very acceptable to them and they are prepared to service this type of program. Bear in mind also that the medical profession, those who should have access to this information, have made it quite clear that they do not have the personnel to service the over-all program when it is implemented. The minister also is aware that we have had a certain form of medicare in our own area of industrial Cape Breton for a number of years now.

In order to substantiate my arguments, I suggest to the minister that it might not be a bad idea for him to go into the mining areas of Nova Scotia, where he will find out that those who are hard pressed for assistance cannot anywhere near keep up with the demands made upon them. He should be very much aware of the fact that not only throughout this country but in our own neighbourhood there is a great need for more trained personnel, in order to make the present facilities function as they should, let alone handle those which will be in effect once the medicare legislation is brought to fruition.

I should like to appeal to the minister that he give every consideration to those persons who cannot afford the needed services. I am quite sure he would get a lot of support from his own followers, although they are not very vocal in their support for any of their ministers at any time. They just sit back and never speak for or against. I think the attitude of the Liberal backbencher these days is "I am neither for nor against it". In fact it is the reverse; they themselves will speak privately outside this house concerning what this medicare program needs.

Mr. Pilon: Do not coach him.

An hon. Member: You will find he does not need coaching.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The Liberal whip seems to have something to add to the debate. I will be only too happy if he says yes. I have invited the Liberal whip and he has accepted the invitation. I will ask him to appeal to his minister to put the medicare program into effect for those who need it. Let us now hear from the Liberal whip, who has invited me to give up the floor.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; my colleague on this side of the house suggests that the Liberal whip be given an opportunity to speak. We all are anxious to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod appeared equally anxious to speak and I have recognized him.

An hon. Member: The whip was saved by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for saying I am anxious to speak. I do not know how true it is. I do, however, have a few matters concerning medicare which are tremendously important to the people in my riding, and which I know are important to the people in western Canada, in particular Alberta. No more important bill has been brought before this house. After reading the bill I am to a large extent disillusioned to note the number of things it does not cover. I refer specifically to the clause which has to do with adequate provision for medical research. The minister should know that there are two basic types of research; one is what you might term basic research and the other is applied research. In the field of medicine you have these two separate fields.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Basic research relates to work done by skilled individuals in biochemistry and other fields, and is essential to the proper treatment of human diseases and to the alleviation of suffering. Once knowledge and hidden methods of treatment are brought to light by these skilled people it must be translated into practical knowledge so that members of the medical profession can apply this knowledge. That is what is called applied research. There are these two fundamental fields of research, basic and applied; yet there is no mention of either in this bill, although research is referred to in the amendment.

Let me now refer to another weakness in this legislation. There is no mention of any method which might be used to encourage young people to train as doctors, dentists and technicians. Aside from the lack of any reference to medical research in this bill, I think it is inadequate because the government has not included any provision for the encouraging or training of young people in the medical profession. We must find more people to train in these basic fields of research and applied medicine before any adequate medicare program can be implemented.

Although the adoption of training programs in universities falls within the jursidiction of provincial governments, surely this federal government can provide some encouragement. Nothing is being done to help provincial governments train people in the field of medicine, or in the field of dentistry. Nothing is being done in this way by this bill, although there is mention of such a need in the amendment before us.

This bill seeks to take care of the medical expenses of those who are unable to pay, but it will not come into effect until 1968, 18 months from now. For that reason it will not take care of the needs of those people who are unable now to meet their medical bills. There is a great deficiency in this legislation in that it does not make those services available now to at least those groups who are unable to pay for adequate medical care.

In the province of Alberta there is now in effect a medical insurance plan commonly referred to as M.S.I. This plan is going through a gradual evolution, but it is not offering everything I should like to see offered to the citizens of Canada through a universal medical scheme. M.S.I. coverage now costs approximately $114 for an unassociated individual and his wife. Surely we should adopt some scheme under which everyone would contribute approximately the same amount, except of course those who are unable to contribute. In those cases the government would have to pay the major part of the contribution.

It is essential in order to devise an adequate universal medical scheme to obtain the co-operation of provincial governments. That is fundamental to any adequate scheme. This should be worked out completely before any legislation of this sort is brought into being. Individuals must also have the right to choose their own doctor, and surely a doctor must have the right to decide whether or not he is able to look after patients, in view of time limitations. He should not feel he is duty bound to accept more patients in these circumstances. There must be freedom of choice on both sides of this medicare service coin.

It is my belief that the postponement of the effective date of this scheme to July 1, 1968 was a second thought on the part of this government. Certainly the minister and those closely associated with him are disappointed because of this lengthy postponement. When this legislation is implemented I hope that as a result of amendments it will contain the necessary elements. If it does I am sure it will be of great assistance to many people in Canada.

I have spoken privately to the minister about the serious medical needs of many people in my area. As late as this evening I spoke to him about that need in the Gleichen area where there are approximately 3,000 Indians who require adequate medical attention from time to time. There is at the present time no doctor in that area, so the Indians and others who live close by have no access to proper medical attention. I mention this fact to emphasize the need for additional trained people, so that every citizen in every community in Canada may take advantage of the services which can be provided.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Would the house leader indicate the business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the debate on second reading of the medicare bill. At the conclusion of that we will consider item No. 48 on today's order paper, the committee stage on the bill to provide assistance to livestock feeders in eastern Canada and in British Columbia. This will be followed by a consideration of item 83 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board. We will then consider item No. 101, the resolution preceding a bill to amend the National Housing Act, followed by item No. 100, the resolution preceding a bill to encourage scientific research and development.

[Mr. Kindt.]

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the house leader whether he would consider bringing forward this week estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if we can get through some of this other business. We also have to bring forward the bill dealing with the armed forces.

Mr. Churchill: That is not on the order paper as yet.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is not, but we will try to bring it forward as quickly as possible.

Mr. Churchill: Should we not deal with the estimates first, before we start on new business?

Mr. McIlraith: I will take the point under consideration but I think it would be well to have the bill before the house so that the discussion which I anticipate—if I anticipate it correctly—will be relevant to the subject matter before the house.

Mr. Knowles: May I put a question to the house leader? Is it not the intention of the government to proceed immediately from second reading of Bill C-227 to consideration of the bill in committee of the whole?

Mr. McIlraith: The second reading stage has taken a bit longer than I had anticipated and we have some other legislation which it would be desirable to move forward. There are also some motions to come to the house tomorrow which need immediate attention. I had proposed a break of a day or two before the committee stage, but there is no intention to delay it any further.

Mr. Churchill: Is this not an urgent bill to be implemented in 1968? Should we not go to the committee stage quickly?

Mr. McIlraith: I think it is a bill of major importance to this country and I think there is some urgency in getting it through so that the provinces can make their plans and decisions consequent upon it.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe if the government will have a break of two or three days it might reconsider its intention to delay the implementation of the legislation.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HISTORIC SITES—QUEBEC—DEMOLITION OF HOME OF SIR ALEXANDER GALT

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, last October 12, I put the following question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing), and I quote:

> In view of the fact that the minister, last Thursday night, notwithstanding his wishes, did not have time to finish his remarks on the memorial to Sir Alexander Galt, would he inform the house today of the nature of his project?

Well, we all know now that Sir Alexander Galt's house has been demolished. It is not my intention to revert to the matter. The minister gave explanations the other day. Tonight is not the time to comment on that.

What we want to know is the policy the minister wants to pursue for the present and for the future. There are still some outbuildings adjoining the Dominican Sisters' convent that the Eastern Townships Historical Society would very much like to preserve.

I would very much appreciate a quick decision by the minister, for the reverend Dominican Sisters are in the process of erecting new buildings and it is important that the minister take a decision in this regard before they demolish those outbuildings.

I would also very much appreciate it if the minister would contact the Eastern Townships Historical Society, the vice president of which is Mr. Desmond McKeon. I received, this very day, a telegram from the vice president of that society, which reads as follows: [English]

> We extend our thanks and congratulations for your efforts to save what remains of the Galt Home. Please continue to fight until Laing promises to save what remains.

[Translation]

Well, the minister can decide to restore the outbuildings and to appropriate a certain amount in order to carry out this project or, following an investigation, he may prefer to purchase part of the property that the Dominican Sisters are ready to sell to the department for the purpose of erecting a monument.

I do want to stress once again the importance of honouring the memory of Sir Alexander Galt, who was member of parliament for Sherbrooke in 1867 and also one of the Fathers of Confederation.

When the minister makes his decision, I would ask him to advise the Eastern Townships Historical Society, as well as to the member for Sherbrooke, so that I may be kept informed of developments in this matter.

[English]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, I wish to say that I think it is one of the happier circumstances that matters of this nature are being more seriously considered by our people in Canada all the time. It is essential, I think, that we do preserve these buildings and these places that are of historic importance. I want to thank him, and I want to thank the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Asselin), who has persistently brought this matter to my attention.

I think the fact that we were unfortunate in attempting to move the building has not dimmed interest in preserving the Galt home. The other night I did have the opportunity of reminding the house that the previous government of Quebec had undertaken to support, to the extent of 50 per cent, the cost of maintenance of the Galt house, were we successful in moving it. I want to tell the hon. member that this support was not forthcoming from the present government. They withdrew the offer and said they could not carry that. This had no effect whatever on our intentions and hope of moving the building, which was otherwise going to be torn down in any case.

We somewhat hurriedly put people in to move it, and our attempt to move it was abortive. I am of the opinion we should not attempt to move that type of building in which the mortar is over 125 years of age, because it crumbled as soon as we moved it. I want to tell the hon. member that the idea for the preservation of Galt house originated with our Historic Sites and Monuments Board. They recommended that we do this, and we undertook it. It was unfortunate that we failed. I am going to refer this matter again to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, and leave it to them to suggest how we can commemorate Galt's name and that particular era which, historically, is so important to us.

I do want to thank the Historical Society of Sherbrooke and the city of Sherbrooke for their co-operation in this venture. I hope when we get a recommendation from the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, which is a very valuable body to my department and to the government of Canada, that we will be able to carry out that recommendation, and that we will do justice to the thing we attempted when we lost the house.

OLD AGE SECURITY—CONTINUATION OF PAYMENTS TO DEPENDANTS OF DECEASED PENSIONER

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, on orders of the day I sought to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to quote the question I raised at that time, as recorded at page 8661 of Hansard:

> Can he say what consideration is being given to the request of the pensioners and senior citizens federation of Canada that the old age pension of a deceased pensioner be continued for six months in order that the surviving spouse be enabled to meet debts incurred by terminal illness?

At that time the suggestion was made that this question should be more properly put on the order paper, and this suggestion resulted in the question being raised on the late show. We have, I think, hundreds of these cases across Canada in which old age pensioners are suffering as a result of the last illness of one or other members of their families. I do not think there is any need for me to stress that fact; I am sure every member of the house is aware of many cases of this. We have all had contact with elderly couples suffering in one way or another from the physical, emotional and financial pressures which are bound up in the final illness of one or other of them.

[Mr. Laing.]

The proposal which was raised by the senior citizens and pensioners organization seems now to be a very pertinent one, particularly at this time, Mr. Speaker, when the government has indicated that there is to be no real, basic increase in the old age security pension, and at the same time has indicated that there is to be a delay in the implementation of health insurance which might have helped these people at least one year earlier.

My question is this: Is the government sufficiently impressed with the practical need for action in this sphere by continuing the old age pension of one deceased pensioner to his or her surviving partner? To help the government give consideration to this matter, Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out that the statistics I have indicate that, in respect to people in the age group 64-69, if this proposal were taken up and implemented and the pension continued to the surviving spouse after the death of the other, the cost would be approximately $6 million a year to the country—and this at a time when my figures also indicate that the taxpayers are paying approximately $4 million a day by way of defence costs. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the government whether they will consider this request which has been made by the national organization of pensioners.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will sympathize with the motives behind the hon. member's proposal, but I would point out that some provision has already been made by this parliament in this area. Also of course there are a number of difficulties involved in a general program of the nature outlined by the hon. member.

The first is the question of cost. There are approximately 1.2 million pensioners in Canada now receiving payments of $75 a month. This amounts to $1,080 million a year in federal expenditures.

In addition, the government will shortly be introducing a program to provide a guaranteed income supplement to old age security recipients. It is estimated this program will cost more than $225 million per annum.

An additional program to provide the estate of a deceased pensioner with a further six months benefit—at $75 per month—would cost at least $38 million a year. This is based on the current death rate of 85,000 per year in this age group.

As hon. members know, the Canada Pension Plan provides for a death benefit equal to six times the monthly retirement pension of the deceased contributor. As the plan comes into full operation, more and more people will be covered for death benefits under this provision.

It should be remembered as well that the Canada Assistance Plan—which was recently approved by this parliament—makes provision for supplementary payments to needy pensioners. These provisions can include such things as funeral expenses.

The Canada Assistance Plan of course is a provincially administered program in which the government of Canada reimburses the provinces for half the cost of various payments made to persons in need. This would apply to any expenses relating to the death of a pensioner who is eligible for benefits under the plan.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.17 p.m.
