Having said that, however, I can say that many veterans were unhappy at how the contribution of Canadians was portrayed in those particular episodes. They wrote me and expressed their feelings very forcefully. I can tell you they wrote to other ministers, the Prime Minister and, of course, the CBC as well as the National Film Board.

The fact of the matter is war is very often violent and destructive and unpredictable. Obviously decisions have to be made at a time of duress. While it is easy for us to criticize, it is much easier to make a comment some 50 years after the fact.

REFERENDUM ACT

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: With regard to the procedural argument made earlier today in relation to certain amendments being offered at the report stage of Bill C-81, I indicated this morning that I would return to the House as soon as possible. I am now ready to share with hon. members the consequences of my consideration of their interventions this morning.

[Translation]

This morning's discussion was about whether Motions Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34 standing in the names of the hon. members for Annapolis Valley—Hants, Yorkton—Melville, Churchill, Jonquière and Papineau—Saint-Michel were in order.

[English]

These proposed amendments all seek to change the bill by adding to it specific provisions which would relate to the effect a referendum would have.

The bill as it is now before us and as agreed to by the House at second reading makes no mention of the effect of a referendum. It deals only with the process of holding a referendum. The question of effect is a very vital one of fundamental importance to this country.

The problem faced by the Chair, however, is that proposed amendments are examined, not in relation to their significance, but from a strictly procedurally perspective. Do they seek to alter or amend existing provisions of this bill, in which case they are normally in order and allowed? Or do they seek to import new provisions into the bill which exceed the scope of the bill as already agreed to by the House, in which case they are out of order?

I have examined these particular amendments very carefully and listened attentively to arguments made this morning in the House.

[Translation]

The Chair is bound by quotation 698(1) in the 6th edition of Beauchesne, and I quote:

> 698. An amendment which is out of order on any of the following grounds cannot be put from the chair:
> (1) An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the bill, beyond its scope or governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived.

[English]

In considering these proposed amendments and the arguments made, the Chair is of the view that proposed amendments Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34, in seeking to add to the bill provisions relating to the effect of a referendum, go beyond the scope of the bill as agreed to at second reading.

The bill deals now only with the process of conducting a referendum, and to add provisions relating to the effect of a referendum goes beyond its scope as previously agreed to and is not in order.

The hon. members for Churchill and for Cape Breton—East Richmond both suggested to the House this morning that even if these proposed amendments were to be ruled out of order, the House could decide by consent to consider them anyway and to vote upon them.

That suggestion is absolutely correct. My ruling these amendments out of order does not preclude the House from dealing with them if there is consent. That is a question for the House to decide.

Procedurally, I am bound by the rules and practices of this institution. I must rule proposed amendments Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34 out of order.

The hon. member for Churchill drew the Chair's particular attention to Motion No. 19, which he agreed was substantially different from the motion which was moved and negatived in committee. On this point, I am persuaded that the member's argument has merit.

Motion No. 19 will therefore be allowed. It will be grouped with Motions Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 for debate and voted on only if Motion No. 18 is negatived.

I wish to close by thanking all those hon. members who participated in the procedural discussion this morning for their succinctness and their courtesy.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, for clarification and guidance from the Chair, it is my understanding that the Chair has now found that Motion No. 34 from my colleague from Papineau is procedurally out of order. Is that correct?

The only way that the Chair can see that this particular motion could come forward for subsequent debate is there would have to be unanimous consent by all members of the House to allow that to come forward. Am I correct in the interpretation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, in consideration of the remarks that the Chair has just made, is exactly correct in the interpretation.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, would it be appropriate at this time to ask whether there will be unanimous consent within this House to have the provisions of Motion No. 34 as produced by my colleague from Papineau put before this House and be debated upon and thereafter adjudicated?

Would there be unanimous consent from all parties in this House?

Mr. Speaker: I understand completely the position of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

On a point of order he has suggested to the House that there might be possible consent. If that is the case it should probably follow discussions between members on both sides of the House. Certainly there was some indication that at the moment at least there is not unanimous consent. We have to move on to other matters.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, earlier, my colleague for Cape Breton—East Richmond asked for unanimous consent. We, from the Bloc Quebecois, said yes. I did not hear anyone say no. If somebody said no, where did he come from?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I did not put a motion for unanimous consent. I said that this matter ought to be properly discussed between members and if then the matter is put to the House we would see what the House did. I did say that I clearly heard some members indicating that at least at the moment there was not a mood to have complete consent.

Mr. Nystrom: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your ruling and I appreciate your comments of a moment ago.

The government House leader has asked for the consideration of unanimous consent for Motion No. 34 in the name of the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. I would like to ask for the same consideration for the other motions that you have ruled on, for the simple reason that the government House leader, a week or two ago, said the government would be willing to entertain the possibility of dealing with amendments that were really out of the scope of the bill. To do that we need the unanimous consent of the House. I would like to ask for the same consideration for the other ones as well.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty I am in is that there is no motion before the House. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has made a suggestion by way of a point of order and unless this is picked up and clear directions given to the House, I cannot proceed with the debate on this point.

As I have said, the appropriate thing to do is if there is to be further discussion between members, it should take place and then perhaps the Chair could have some indication of what is prepared to be put in front of the House by agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, considering that our colleague is asking for unanimous consent of the House to debate Motion No. 34 and that you, Mr. Speaker, in the ruling you gave this morning, referred to Motions Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34, I would like in that context, that all those motions be debated as a whole to see if their is unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I understand perfectly well the hon. member's position but, with due respect, it is the same position as was taken this morning and without unanimous consent, the Chair cannot change position. For the time being, it is up to the members of this House to discuss it.

[English]

Perhaps I can ask if it is on the same point.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, what you are telling us is that we cannot consult our colleagues. I heard with my own ears the Liberal Party House leader say he was in agreement, the NDP spokesperson say he was in agreement, a spokesperson for the Conservatives say he was in agreement. Everybody agrees, so why postpone until later something we can do right now?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard my concern about the Chair's intervening in something which I think should probably be discussed between members, but I will settle this.

Perhaps the House could give some guidance to the Chair. There has been a suggestion made that if by unanimous consent particular amendments which I have felt were not acceptable procedurally be debated, that would take consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the motion of Mr. Murphy (p. 11215).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–81 be amended

(a) by striking out clause 1 line 7 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"chief agent", in respect of a ref—"

(b) by substituting the words "referendum committee" for the words "registered referendum committee' wherever the latter words occur in the Bill; and (c) by making such modifications as may be required in consequence thereof.

That Bill C–81 be amended in Clause 2

(a) by striking out lines 39 to 41 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

""referendum committee" means, as the case may be, the committee comprised of such persons and groups as support a referendum question or the committee comprised of such persons and groups as oppose a referendum question"; and (b) by striking out lines 14 to 16 at page 4,–

Motion No. 35.

That Bill C–81 be amended by deleting Clause 13 and the heading preceeding Clause 13 and substituting the following therefor:

'REFERENDUM COMMITTEE

13. The Governor in Council may make regulations governing referendum committees, including regulations

(a) providing for such matters as may be necessary for the proper operation of referendum committees, including the name under which they are to be known and the manner in which they are to be established;

(b) providing for the setting up of local branches of referendum committees in each electoral district;

(c) providing for the affiliation to the referendum committee supporting the referendum question or to the referendum committee opposing the question, as the case may be, of persons who, or groups that, support or oppose the question, as the case may be, and prescribing norms and terms and conditions with respect to the affiliation and financing of such persons or groups;

(d) prescribing, for each province, the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee;

(e) prescribing the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee throughout Canada or in two or more provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1).

14. (1) A referendum committee intending to incur referendum expenses throughout Canada or in more than one province shall file with the Chief Electoral Officer a request for approval of the proposed apportionment of such expenses.

(2) A request for approval shall be signed by the leader of the referendum committee and shall name the provinces in which the referendum expenses are to be incurred and the amounts which the referendum committee intends to incur for each province.

(3) Not later than five days after receipt of a request for approval, the Chief Electoral Officer shall notify the leader of the referendum committee of the Chief Electoral Officer's decision to approve or not to approve the proposed referendum expenses apportionment.

(4) The Chief Electoral Officer shall approve a request for approval if, in the opinion of the Chief Electoral Officer, the manner in which the referendum expenses to be incurred by the referendum committee are intended to be apportioned among the provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1) in which such expenses are to be incurred fairly reflects the distribution of the Canadian population between such provinces.

(5) A referendum committee that incurs referendum expenses throughout Canada or in more than one province without prior approval by the Chief Electoral Officer is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty thousand dollars.

15. (1) Where the total referendum expenses incurred by a referendum committee throughout Canada or in more than one province are less than stated in the request for approval referred to in section 14, the referendum committee shall ensure that the apportionment of the referendum expenses of the committee among the provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1) in which such expenses are to be incurred fairly reflects the distribution of the Canadian population between such provinces.

(2) A referendum committee that contravenes subsection (1) is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty thousand dollars.

(3) Where a referendum committee commits an offence under this Act, the leader or chief agent of the referendum committee who directed, authorized, assented to, acquiesced in or participated in the commission of the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence and is liable on summary conviction to the punishment provided for the offence whether or not the referendum committee has been prosecuted or convicted."

That Bill C–81 be amended in Clause 17 by striking out lines 10 to 14 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

"maintain a registry in which shall be recorded the name, address and telephone number of the chief agent of each referendum committee."

That Bill C–81 be amended in Clause 18 by striking out lines 15 to 46 at page 17 and lines 1 and 2 at page 18, and substituting the following therefor:

"18. (1) Every referendum committee shall appoint a chief agent and an auditor.

(2) Where the position of chief agent of a referendum committee becomes vacant or the chief agent is unable to perform the duties of chief agent, the committee shall forthwith appoint a new chief agent and file with the Chief Electoral Officer a notice in writing, signed by the leader of the committee, of the name, address and telephone number of the new chief agent and a statement, signed by the new chief agent, that the signer has accepted the appointment as chief agent of the committee.

(3) Where the position of auditor of a referendum committee becomes vacant or the auditor ceases to be qualified as an auditor or becomes ineligible to act as an auditor before having complied with this Act in respect of any referendum finances return of the committee, the committee shall forthwith appoint a new auditor and file with the Chief Electoral Officer a notice in writing, signed by the leader of the committee, of the name, address and telephone number of the new auditor and a statement, signed by the new auditor that the signer has accepted the appointment as auditor of the committee."

That Bill C–81 be amended by striking out lines 40 to 47 at page 20 and lines 1 to 45 at page 21 and lines 1 to 24 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"polling day, allocate equally between the two referendum committees the broadcasting time to be made availabe under section 21.

(2) Each referendum committee shall indicate on which networks it wishes broadcasting time to be made available to it.

(3) In order to allocate broadcasting time, the Broadcasting Arbitrator may request additional information from the referendum committees.

(4) The Broadcasting Arbitrator shall, as soon as possible after completing the allocation and, in any event, not later than Monday, the twenty–first day before polling day, send a notice in writing of the allocation to the referendum committees, every network affected by the allocation and the Canadian Radio–television and Telecommunications Commission.

(5) An allocation of broadcasting time to be made available by a broadcasting network is final and binding on the network and on the referendum committees.

23. The Broadcasting Arbitrator shall, on request, provide the referendum committees with the names and addresses of all network operators."

• (1520)

That Bill C–81 be amended in Clause 25 by striking out lines 36 to 38 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"25. (1) Each referendum committee shall, not later than Tuesday, the".

(a) by striking out line 6 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"travenes subsection 15(4) or (5) or"; and

(b) by striking out lines 10 to 15 at page 28.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to know whether or not Motion No. 35 was withdrawn.

Mrs. Venne: You stopped reading at paragraph (b).

Mr. Lapierre: Because, Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of hearing you read it.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I am somewhat ill at ease to see the members from the Bloc Quebecois—

Mr. Lapierre: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): —insist that you read the entire motion, especially when they have it before them.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be helpful to the debate. The question from my friend opposite was whether or not you had read Motion No. 35. I believe that I did hear you read Motion No. 35.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully as you read Motion No. 35, and you did stop at paragraph (b).

In view of the fact that these motions were introduced at the last minute, that we did not get to look at them yesterday—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Very well.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Jonquière—those who witnessed what the members from the Bloc Quebecois just asked you to do will tell you—this is called misuse of power.

So we have—

Mr. Lapierre: I rise on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saint-Hubert on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, you asked if we would dispense, but we said no because these motions were introduced in a hurry yesterday, so we have not had the time to read them yet and we are reading them along with you even if you are going quite fast.

That is why I ask you to resume.

[English]

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, we have all had an opportunity to read these motions on at least two occasions. First, the hon. member for Jonquière mailed copies of his motions to all of our offices, second these were handed out yesterday. We have had an opportunity to read them at least twice, and I think we should move on.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, the eight amendments that are on the table and that are grouped together all refer to the same objective, namely to put a ceiling on expenses during a referendum, as well as to set up a referendum committee for the yes side and one for the no side, which we call umbrella committees.

In our democracy and in our country we have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms which contains various provisions. Two of those provisions are invoked depending on the group of people who want to achieve a specific objective. Some people ask us this question: Based on the freedom of expression and the freedom of association, can we force people to be grouped together under a committee for the yes or no side during a referendum? On the other hand, section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and of the Constitutional Act of 1982 says: "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

In Quebec we have already had a referendum in 1980. At the time, there was a referendum committee for the yes side and a one for the no side, in which the principles of equity regarding expenses related to the referendum were complied with. Today, in 1992, at a time when our country is possibly getting ready for a national referendum, I am motivated by the same kind of spirit, a desire for equity and the need for both sides to have access to the same means. In that context, I feel that it would be appropriate to include in this bill very strict rules to ensure that the yes side and the no side can potentially get the same public funding to promote their respective views. It is in that context that I tabled these amendments to the bill, which my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois as well as all the members of this House were informed of more than 10 days ago. I tabled these amendments in order to ensure fairness. Generally speaking, the moneys available for the yes and the no sides regarding referendum expenses would be the same across the country, as well as in each province and constituency.

I would like to mention a newspaper article dated May 20, in which Minister Marc–Yvan Côté was reported as saying the following: "Under our system, there must be a minimum of fair play between the two opposing camps. Referendum legislation must reflect this attitude, said Minister Côté." The article went on to say: "While recognizing the federal government's right to conduct a referendum, Mr. Côté referred to an unconscionable free–for–all in which anyone could spend $20,000, as a slap in the face of democracy."

Our government does restrict what a registered committee or group of persons may spend to 56.4 cents per voter. However, there are no restrictions on the number of committees that may be set up across the country. There could be 10, 20, 100, 1,000, or tens of thousands. Nobody knows. As a result, we could end up with an entirely inequitable situation in our democratic system. That is why I tabled the amendments that are before the House today, which our colleagues will be asked to discuss and possibly vote on later.

I have no desire to prolong the debate. I think the gist of what I wanted to say is there. My colleagues will be able to consider the kind of ceiling I wanted to introduce in the bill to achieve a certain degree of fairness.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today is one that is basically acceptable and fair, one that the Bloc Quebecois will support.

The hon. member for Jonquière found the basis for his arguments in Quebec's referendum legislation. It so happens that this legislation exists and has stood the test of time for a dozen years or so as part of Quebec's statutes.

This is not just a formal reference to existing legislation or past experience, but proof positive that democracy is far better served when both sides in the debate are on equal footing.

Just imagine what will happen if the bill is not amended, considering the kind of rules it contains. We can assume there will be an appeal for corporate funds, which are practically unlimited. There will be an appeal for money from the big corporations, while the government will be able to draw on public funds with practically no restrictions. We can assume that in the sovereigntist camp, there will be a basic imbalance. I think we just have to accept the fact that those who support sovereignty for Quebec will never be able to raise as much money as the federalist across the country, especially if they have access to the financial establishment in this country.

Mr. Lapierre: And abroad.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): At this point, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to refer to a tried and true democratic tradition. The Canada Elections Act has from the very beginning of its existence provided that it was imperative in an election for the parties to be subject to the same spending limits. Why? Because choosing those who govern us is so important, the consequences are so far reaching, we must ensure the electorate makes its decision in a context devoid of any brainwashing, where serious debate can take place and where it is possible to make an objective decision.

In other words, when important decisions are to be made in a democracy, money should not be the deciding factor. We want the citizens of the country to decide. That is the most elementary and essential principle of how democracy operates, a principle that has been recognized and applied in the Canadian democratic system.

One wonders why, when the stakes are much higher than in the case of electing a government, the House of Commons should decide to depart from a long tradition of democracy in this country and proceed to destroy the equality and balance that exists between the opposing parties?

On what grounds would the Canadian legislator depart from a tradition that has made our democratic system one to be proud of?

The only argument I heard was the existence of the canadian charter. It is a strange paradox that a charter that was supposedly put in place to protect freedom of expression, maintain civil rights and prevent unfairness is now invoked to prevent legislators from maintaining a democratic tradition that would preserve fairness between the parties in an essential debate on the future of Quebec and Canada.

We must believe that this argument is invalid. We must have at least enough respect for the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to say it does not stand for such unfairness, that it would not force legislators to act unfairly or in a discriminatory fashion. Quite the contrary.

If legislators had to take a risk on the chance that opponents of the bill would challenge it in court, they should err on the side of freedom of expression; they should take a risk for fairness and balance between the sides.

I submit that regardless of antagonisms, because I know there are some, and regardless of bitterness, because of course there is bitterness, but only out of respect for this long unbroken democratic tradition in Canada of which Quebec is a part and which Quebec will want to follow if it becomes sovereign, because we believe in Canadian democracy; we respect it and it is one of the great values that we recognize in our country.

Why, when we want to rebuild the country, when we want to give people a chance to speak out on a basic issue concerning its existence, its fundamental rights, why would we break with the principle of fairness with respect to spending?

I did not hear a single demonstration or justification from the government that would lead us to believe that this principle should now be set aside. It is true when I say that Quebec has experience with it, because Quebec had a charter of rights too in 1980, when the government held a referendum with spending limits and yes and no committees. Anyone could have used the Quebec charter to prevent the government from holding a referendum which allegedly violated freedom of expression. That did not happen because basically, we well know that the best way to violate freedom of expression is to swing the balance, deprive one of the parties in the debate of financial resources and give them all to the other side.

I believe that we legislators should ensure that the people decide and to the extent that this referendum seeks to let the people speak and not the political establishments, and not get around public opinion in an important debate, to the extent that the people's voice is to be heard, we should ensure that the big corporations, the banks, high finance and fundraisers do not sway the decision on the side of money. Just out of respect for the referendum principle, which would refer the matter to the people, let us trust them and ensure that they can decide freely and fairly.

I cannot understand that in a Parliament where legislation has been debated for 125 years in order to defend democracy and protect democratic rights that are always threatened, we are today pleading against a government that would have us believe that for the sake of freedom of expression, it has to limit that freedom and trample it under foot.

We are not demanding anything subversive. We are asking for rules of fairness that respect democracy, so that people can speak freely. On that, we fully support the efforts made by the hon. member for Jonquière. We may differ, but we believe that he is right on that and we hope that many voices will be raised on both sides of the House and more and more among the Conservatives to uphold freedom.

Second, regarding these two committes, the bill allows a multiplicity of committees. It seems to limit the number of committees since the expenses are limited for each committee, but it allows for an infinite number of committees; it does not fool anyone. It is essential however, for the sake of coherence, to have two referendum committees, one for and one against. Otherwise, the whole process will be ruled by the law of the jungle. It will be an incredible mess. It will be a sorry sight to see committees being created by the thousands, sometimes by people who will cut the pie into strategic pieces.

What a pitiful sight these thousands of committees created all over Canada without a clear mission in the absence of two distinct kinds of committee, the yes committees and the no committees. They will lack direction. Confusion and ambiguity will be rampant. No one stands to gain anything whatsoever from such total confusion especially when dealing with such a fundamental decision.

To conclude, I would like to say that we will of course vote in favour of the motion.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I cannot miss this opportunity to look at the motions tabled by the member for Jonquière and to tell him that I also believe this to be a fundamental aspect of the democratic value of this potential exercise. Obviously, if the government decides not to follow the basic rules of democracy with this bill, the member for Jonquière, like us, will oppose a piece of legislation that would be undemocratic and illegitimate. The real test for the member for Jonquière will be the final vote. That is when he will find out if his colleagues support his amendments or not. If he cannot convince his government, I hope that he will not want to be an accomplice of an exercise that he himself calls undemocratic.

Obviously the only way to have a fair referendum is by establishing two sides. Right now, there could be hundreds if not thousands of committees on all sides. One can imagine the free-for-all that this situation could trigger. Just think that any small group in the country could decide to form its own committee. Any businessman could set up his own committee. There could be a Paul Desmarais committee and a Guy Saint-Pierre committee. In the end, every businessman will want to have his own committee.

In reality, this would make no sense. I hope the government realizes that if it does not adopt civilized rules, nobody will take this exercise seriously. There is even one of my colleagues who would recommend a committee for the former colleague of the member for Jonquière, Mr. Gravel, and a Michel Cogger committee. There could be an unlimited number of committees and all kinds of them. Obviously, nobody would take such an exercise seriously. Therefore, if the government wants to make a fool of itself, it simply has to keep going in that direction.

The beauty of the referendum legislation in Quebec is that all those who participated in this democratic exercise recognized its fairness. The reality is that the sovereignist government lost its referendum but it recognized the democratic value of the result that same day. Everybody accepted the rules of the game. And that is what was extraordinary in the end. I am not commenting on the result but on the democratic process. In fact, at that time, I also thought that the result was extraordinary. But what I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that all the participants in this exercise agreed it was a fair and equitable process.

Here, the government started off on the wrong foot. There is nobody in this Parliament, except the leader of the government and a few other ones who want to use this issue for political expediency rather than for sound motives, and we can see that people do not take this exercise seriously. Even the Liberal Party leader, who had himself suggested the idea of a referendum, was forced to admit that the rules established under this bill are undemocratic. I was surprised to hear, for example, that even if the bill was undemocratic, he was still willing to vote for it. That worried me a little during the press conference. I know that the hon. member for Jonquière made similar remarks, so I wonder how elastic his conscience is.

When we talk, for example, of the Quebec referendum bill and the principles that guided it: first, the umbrella committees, and second, the spending limits, it is obvious that in a democracy, with Canadian democratic values, we agreed that in order to get elected here in the House of Commons, we could not let people spend millions and millions of dollars. We did not want to accept the American jungle where everybody has to—campaigns are so expensive that we become the victims of various lobbies. We must virtually submit ourselves to the power of money.

This Parliament gave itself some rules and each of us who sits here recognized the value of spending limits. Why is it that, with such a fundamental issue as the Constitution, it would now be the free-for-all? There is something indecent about all this. It is so indecent, so blatant, that it is staring you in the face. That is why the citizens, particularly from Quebec, will never feel bound by the result of a process which is distorted from the beginning. If the government thinks it can solve anything with such a trivial process, it is grossly mistaken.

As soon as there is a free-for-all in the establishment of the committees, as soon as the power of money overrides the content of the debate and the decision of the citizens, it is obvious that there is absolutely no fair play. We are in the heart of the British institution which should be the perfect example of fair play. I know some days you doubt it, Mr. Speaker, but I also know you are trying every day to apply that fair play.

I tell you there is no fair play in this bill. All political parties, except the Conservatives, who have their eyes completely blindfolded, recognize that there are problems with the democratic value of that exercise. Why not solve at least that detail?

The hon. member for Jonquière has the merit of at least raising the issue. I must also tell you that it is obvious that the financing criteria—I did not have time to thoroughly examine the proposal from the hon. member for Jonquière—I do not know if he limited the contribution to individual financing or if he allowed large corporations a free hand. I suppose that with its slogan that almost says "Let the people decide", the government would want to make sure that the decision would be taken by the citizens, and not by the multinationals. It is obvious that a decision by the citizens should be financed and managed by the citizens themselves.

I would like to return to the attack in order to emphasize a point. A bill that is flawed from the beginning, such a weird exercise will get no credibility in the eyes of the public, particularly in Quebec considering the precedent and the democratic values that are essential to that exercise.

I cannot imagine the government thinks for a minute that anybody in Quebec could feel bound by such legislation. I cannot understand why English Canada does not object to that. I cannot understand why Conservative ministers and members from English Canada are willing to accept such unworthy legislation. They should oppose it, they who claim to be the great protectors of democracy. The most stupid argument I heard was from the Government House Leader, who used the excuse of the charter of rights to violate those same rights.

You must have quite a bit of imagination to think that Canadians and Quebecers are going to swallow the argument that the Canadian charter of rights prevents us from putting some democratic principles into this referendum bill.

This is insulting for the charter of rights. In 1980, all parties involved accepted the results. The problem in 1980 was not a weakness in the statute, it was a weakness in the Constitution. Her Majesty was not bound by the statute. In other words the spending limits applied only to Quebec citizens. The federal state was not bound by a provincial statute, which means, unfortunately, it was able to abuse the system. Everybody now recognizes this was the only weakness of the process in 1980.

Consequently, I congratulate the hon. member for Jonquière, I am looking forward to testing the depth of his convictions and I hope he will stand up to the end.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, members of the Bloc Quebecois do not have to decide for me what I will do on third reading.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order, it is a point of debate.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, these amendments are very important and I want to speak generally in favour of the initiative taken by my colleague and friend, the member for Jonquière, in bringing this group of amendments, which the Speaker has clustered together. There are eight different motions that we are looking at together.

It is important to understand that there are three main elements to this package of amendments. The first element is that it recognizes the importance of having committees, or as some call them, umbrella committees, to organize the activity for the yes side and the no side in a national plebiscite.

The second element is that there would be spending limits that would maintain an over-all balance and fairness in the process so that spending does not become the name of the game, but that the whole effort is proceeded with on a balanced footing.

The third element in this group of amendments by my colleague is to deal with some reasonable exceptions. This is done by accommodating the exception that is already in the bill as drafted by the government, an amount of $5,000. This is to ensure fairness and balance for the rigorously independent of mind.

Briefly, it is important at this juncture of the debate to note the origins of each of these three elements of the package; the umbrella committees, the spending limits and the reasonable exceptions. The first concept of having the umbrella committees is something that interestingly enough was developed in the United Kingdom for its plebiscite in 1975 on whether the U.K. should continue to adhere to the European Community.

I know that a great many Canadians think that holding direct votes, referendums and plebiscites is something that is unparliamentary and not in our best British parliamentary traditions. It is a sobering thing though to actually look and see that it was the British who developed this concept in 1975.

It worked well enough there to attract a positive interest of legislators in our country and in the province of Quebec. The National Assembly embraced this concept in La Loi sur les référendums and has seen it used not only in the direct vote on May 20, 1980 on the question of sovereignty association, but also one time since the charter has been in force. It was used in the October 1989 vote in northern Quebec on the whole question of the forming of a new constitutional system of government for the aboriginal people, the Inuit of northern Quebec.

There has twice been the experience in our country with umbrella committees, both of them in the province of Quebec. Quebec has again given our country leadership, not only on this issue, but on how to have modern structures that permit the necessary balance.

On the second area, the spending limits, the origins are equally important for all of us as we consider these amendments because it was the Barbeau commission that reported in 1966 on spending laws for Canadian federal elections, election expenses and so on. That report, like a great many commission reports in this country, languished for not just months but years until it was picked up by a Liberal member of Parliament who was quite interested in the subject, Mr. Hyliard G. Chappell. He got a committee going and all of that initiative led to the Barbeau commission's report coming forward in 1974 when Parliament passed the Election Finances Reform Act in 1974.

Since then we have had a couple of decades of experience at the national level with rules that govern how money is raised and spent in the conduct of our national elections. The effort here is to see those same principles and the values that underlie them carried into this legislation that will pertain to a national plebiscite on constitutional matters.

Those rules from 1974 had one feature that was very significant and that was where Parliament decided to draw the line between freedom of expression on the one hand and the efficacy of these election finance laws on the other. As long as we are a country there will be debate over where that line should be. There is clearly a trade-off here. The issue of having that line in the right place so that there can still be adequate freedom of expression but also respect for these rules that Parliament wants so that our political processes do not simply become a process dominated by the wealthy is the fundamental issue.

When Parliament passed, very rapidly, amendments in 1983 to shift that line dramatically in favour of the finance laws and against freedom of expression, that put in place a law that was certainly challengeable. It was challenged by the National Citizens Coalition. In Alberta that case came before the Court of Queen's Bench and, interestingly enough, the National Citizens Coalition, an organization that is often denigrated by many in the country, was found to have led an important fight there. Subsequently, many others who often speak up for civil liberties in Canada, freedom of expression and so on, were latecomers to climb on board that bandwagon. It was very important that that issue was before the courts and that was a decision in Alberta that struck down the place that Parliament had put that line because it too greatly infringed on freedom of expression.

Perhaps the government of the day should have challenged that law, should have appealed that decision, but it did not and the fact is that right now we have that same issue here before us in the House of Commons in this bill. It is the content of the amendments by the member for Jonquière. Regardless of whether the member for Brant thinks that it should have been appealed—I agree, it should have been—the fact is it was not. At least Parliament, better than the Supreme Court of Canada in my view on this matter, is now going to have a chance to consider again where that line should be on freedom of expression.

That is why I think the third point about reasonable exceptions is the point that raises the role of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Supreme Court of Canada in relation to Parliament and what we do here.

I am glad that the approach taken by the member with his amendments dovetails with what is already in the government's bill where there is exception made, as I say up to $5,000, for those who want to operate outside the two umbrella committees.

• (1600)

Let us be careful. I would caution those in government who try to draft legislation before they bring it to us here to be careful, to not be so anxious to have legislation that is charter proof that it becomes plebiscite proof. We will end up with something that could never be challenged in court because it has nothing left in it to be challenged but it does not have either any of the substance, rules, and procedures necessary to see the plebiscite will be fairly carried out in accordance with the values that for 20 years have become deeply enshrined in our Canadian political culture.

In short, it is important in speaking to support these amendments to make these two final points. Talking about umbrella committees is not to talk about strait-jackets. The creation of umbrella organizations, under which the many different groups would maintain their integrity and positions could operate, is quite different than something that would unduly restrict them as a strait-jacket would.

The view that they would have to be the exclusive vehicles for those supporting or opposing has been an unfortunate attitude with which to view the umbrella committees. They can operate to advantage to bring structure, purpose, and channelling the energies of those who want to divide up the broadcasting time, who want to raise and spend the moneys, but they do not have to cut it off entirely. That is the reason these amendments deserve support.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) or 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time for report stage and third reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specific number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words here in support of the motions before us calling upon the government to consider forming umbrella committees in order to conduct the referendum campaign in a more orderly way.

I realize there are certain problems with umbrella committees. There are legal opinions. There may be violations of the charter under section 2(b), which is the freedom of expression section, or section 2(d), the freedom of association section. That is not known for sure and legal opinions on this are divided.

We have had many legal opinions saying that exclusive umbrella committees are probably a violation of the charter. Other people have said if we have certain reasonable limitations in terms of spending they may not be violations of the charter.

The suggestion I made before and I want to make again to the government is a quick reference to the Supreme Court so we can clarify this particular issue. This issue will go to court anyway in this country very shortly. There is going to be a court action launched in the province of Quebec to challenge the Quebec referendum law under freedom of association and under freedom of speech in that particular province. There will be a court judgment rendered on whether this is in violation of the charter.

I suggest the government consider at this time referring this issue to the Supreme Court and try to get the Supreme Court to fast-track it so we can get a decision on whether we can establish umbrella committees.

The province of Quebec is recommending the use of the notwithstanding clause to make this charter proof. I certainly would not recommend that action at this time for this House but that is one possibility of what could be done.

If we can set up umbrella committees, that is the way the House should go. In a referendum question, a referendum bill, as seen before the House today, we will have one question, maybe two or maybe three.

I think one option is to set up a yes committee for each question and a no committee for each question. People who are on one side or the other can be part of that committee like they were in the province of Quebec.

It worked very well in the province of Quebec in 1980 in terms of how it was organized. I was part of that in terms of the federal New Democratic Party on the no side. I was the person who was delegated by my party to attend some of the no meetings.

[Translation]

I remember when the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer was also a member of the no committee in 1980 in the province of Quebec. He was mayor of Hull at the time, if I remember correctly. He was there, and I was there as a federal delegate for the New Democratic Party.

[English]

We had no problem in terms of the organization of the no committee or the yes committee in terms of allocation of time for advertising, or allocation of time in terms of money. It was orderly. It was very well done. We did not have any problems in terms of the organization.

If it is the will of Parliament, if it is the will of the people of this country that we set up an umbrella committee again, surely we can argue before the court that would be seen as a reasonable limitation on freedom of association or expression in this country.

After all, in a referendum question there are only two answers. It is either yes or no. It is not maybe or maybe but. It is yes or no. If everybody is on the yes side or the no side, surely to goodness you can get together and organize, as in the province of Quebec, fair treatment of all the organizations in each umbrella group and make the argument before the court that is not unfair limitation under section 2(d) of the charter which is freedom of association.

In terms of freedom of speech, another suggestion I have made in terms of the motion before the House here today is perhaps if people do not want to be part of these umbrella committees, we can take an idea from the Lortie royal commission on electoral expense in which he said that if you do not want to belong to a political party, you will be allowed to spend $1,000 as an individual in terms of third-party advertising.

You, Mr. Speaker, are supposedly not part of the yes side or the no side of this referendum. You could if you were a private individual spend $1,000 in buying ads, printing brochures, renting halls and persuading people to vote either yes or no. Therefore, you do have an outlet in terms of political expression and I wish the government would take a serious look at that as one of the options.

Also in terms of freedom of speech in this country and freedom of expression, all we are talking about here is the freedom of paid expression. No matter how we organize this, people can still write letters to the editor, phone the open-line shows, knock on doors to persuade their neighbours and talk to their neighbours. They can still participate in public meetings.

There is no inhibition in terms of their freedom of speech, and that is a very basic part of this country as well. The freedom of speech is there. All we are talking about here is the freedom of paid speech in this country. We could construct rules and regulations that are charter proof if we had national umbrella committees in this country, one for the yes and one for the no.

If we have more than one question on the referendum, we could have an umbrella committee for the yes and for the no for the first question. We could have an umbrella committee for the yes and for the no for the second question or, if there are three questions, have the same thing for the third question as well.

Again, there is a parallel here with the Elections Act. There is no limitation in this country on the number of political parties. What we have in this country is a limitation of what each political party can spend but there is no limitation on the number of political parties.

If we had two, three, four, five referendum questions, there would be a limitation on the umbrella questions in terms of the number of questions that were asked, but the limitation would be the number of committees in so far as we have the number of questions.

There is a parallel here to the Elections Act. Before I sit down, I ask that the parliamentary secretary across the way take a serious look at this proposal.

• (1610)

I know the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has made many recommendations as a recognized expert in this House on referenda as to how we could have a yes and no committee, how they could be charter-proof, how people can guard and keep their right for freedom of speech and freedom of opinion, freedom of association being given respect in this country and still have an orderly referendum campaign where there are reasonable spending limitations so that people on both sides of the question have the same access to the paid media.

In the final analysis, what we have to make sure we do is that we have a fair piece of referendum legislation, where a referendum cannot be bought or be perceived to be bought by one side or the other.

If there is a perception that somebody is buying the referendum, somebody has access to all kinds of money that the other side does not have, it can create a backlash in this country, a backlash in one of the regions of the country, in the province of Quebec, in western Canada, in Newfoundland, or anywhere else. We can find that people are voting against the perception that big money is buying the result, rather than voting for or against the question in the referendum itself.

Those are some of the basic arguments as to why, if there is to be a national referendum, we have to have spending limitations. The only way we can have real spending limitations is if we have umbrella committees. It was done in the province of Quebec. It was suggested by the member across the way from Etobicoke—Lakeshore, suggested by the Liberal Party, supported by our party and suggested by our party in terms of the committee. The government itself has said in principle it would like to have limitations on what could be spent.

Let us be a little bit imaginative with all the legal advice we have in this country and draft legislation where we can have yes and no committees for every question. We would still have freedom of speech for third party advertising, if that is what they call it. I would say $1,000 limitation per person and have a referendum campaign in this country that is fair and just.

I want to stop here and just ask the parliamentary secretary to go back to the government to see whether or not there is a possibility of taking another look at it, a different way of organizing this, so we can have meaningful limitations.

In the final analysis, if we have legislation that is perceived not to be fair it could come back to haunt all of us. We do not want that.

What most of us want in this House is a constitutional package in the end that is supported by the three national political parties, all the provincial governments and the aboriginal people. Then if we have a national referendum, a package that the people of this country will feel good about going out and saying yes to, we will all be on the same side in saying yes to Canada and saying yes to this new federation.

Now we have a bill that is drafted in such a way where certain organizations can spend an awful lot of money. If we are not careful, we run the risk of souring the atmosphere and having people vote against a reasonable package when they otherwise would not do it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North—Revenue Canada; the hon. member for Edmonton East—The Environment; the hon. member for London East—Housing; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap—Atmospheric Contaminants; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration and Refugee Board.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a few minutes to support the motion moved by the hon. member for Jonquière. I find it totally acceptable, and all my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois agree.

I know very well the 1980 legislation Quebec used to hold its referendum. As my colleague from Yorkton—Melville mentioned earlier, I was mayor of Hull in 1980. The no umbrella committee asked me to chair the western Quebec committee and demand a renewed federalism from the federal government.

At the time, I thought it was still possible for us to get along in this country. I chaired the no committee in the Outaouais region, and in that referendum, the no side won with 59.8 or 59.9 per cent of the votes. The PQ government, which initiated the referendum legislation, bowed to the will of the people and accepted the results of the referendum, and from then on we waited for the renewed federalism we had been promised. I know all about it.

On April 20, 1980, I stood on the same platform with Brian Mulroney, Jean Chrétien and Claude Ryan, at the Robert-Guertin arena in Hull, in the riding of Hull—Aylmer. At the time, this was 12 years ago, we were fighting for renewed federalism.

Today, 12 years later, we are discussing ways to put Quebec in its place, right here in Ottawa, in the Parliament of Canada.

The Conservative member for Jonquière tabled a motion that is very similar to Quebec's referendum legislation, which reflects a respect for democracy. It respects both the yes and the no sides. There is a balance between the yes and no umbrella organizations, and there are specific spending limits within those organizations. We call that fair play. We call that democracy. We call that respect for the other side.

Today the government has decided to practically ignore the motions tabled in this House. Only two members of the Conservative Party bothered to speak to the motion tabled by the hon. member for Jonquière, and the leader of the government has already moved a motion of closure for tomorrow. Yesterday those members said: we will not give the 48 hours provided under the Standing Orders, and we will move closure to end debate after 24 hours. Today, another motion for closure.

I think this kind of interference is unfortunate. I think it is sad to see democracy flouted this way, especially when we are dealing with the Constitution of the country, a Constitution foundering on the distrust of two founding peoples, a Constitution they want to ram down the throats of Quebecers. They want to put Quebec in its place.

Mr. Speaker, I joined the Bloc Quebecois in this House after June 23, 1990, when Meech Lake lost any significance it may have had and was turned down by two Canadian provinces. I did so to defend the greater interests of Quebec within the precincts of the House of Commons and to serve the interests of Quebec, with the respect owed to democracy and the integrity we can expect from our elected representatives.

I think it is a great pity that a Conservative member would put forward today amendments relating to the very substance of democracy and the freedom of expression and that this government refuses to be tolerant, and moreover ignores it.

As for the fact mentioned when Bill C-81 was tabled that a ceiling could not be put on expenditures because this could be challenged under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this raises serious doubts about the confidence placed in the charter. If we do not have confidence in it, let us change it or repeal it. Why not have used the notwithstanding clause? If that had been the case, it would have been possible to use the clause to maintain democracy, to maintain expenditures for such a major consultation process, as Quebec will be consulting its people at the same time on its political future, under a yes umbrella and a no umbrella, in face of the constitutional rejection of English Canada.

Are you suggesting that this House force down the throat of Quebecers a deal bought through a massive publicity drive, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, such as the one this government has already embarked upon? That is absolutely incredible. It is unthinkable.

People in my riding were telling me just the other day that they could not even watch a simple game of hockey on TV without an advertisement on what a beautiful country Canada is being flashed on the screen every five minutes. It is not ads such as those that will bring unity between the two founding nations. That is not the point. It is much more a matter of Quebecers mistrusting English Canadians who cannot even agree among themselves.

Mr. Bourassa cannot be blamed for not attending the federal-provincial conference, when the nine English-speaking provinces do not agree among themselves. How do you expect Quebec to reach an agreement on its own?

We will support the motion of the member for Jonquière. For those who are watching us on TV today, especially in Quebec—I can understand where English Canada is coming from—I think it is a great pity to have such an undemocratic piece of legislation forced on them. Unfortunately, we can find only a few members to stand up for Quebec in this House, including the hon. member for Jonquière who supported it and proposed amendments. The others caved in, and are grovelling. They will be remembered in history—not that of Canada, but the Quebec history—as members sent to Ottawa to defend the interests of Quebec and caved in on such a fundamental issue. I urge Conservative and Liberal members from Quebec to prevent this from becoming a reality.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to intervene in this debate to support the motions presented by the hon. member for Jonquière.

I want to congratulate him on presenting Motions Nos. 2, 7, 35, 50, 51, 54, 55 and 59, which in many respects take some provisions of the Quebec Referendum Act that advocate not only the creation of two umbrella committees, one for the yes side and the other for the no, but that set limits on what each of these two committees can spend in a referendum campaign.

Of course, the Liberal Party of Canada hopes a Canadian referendum will not only give Canadians a chance to express their opinion on thorough changes to their Constitution but also give them a chance to say yes to Quebec and give Quebecers a chance to say yes to Canada. We are not afraid of such a public consultation. The Bloc Quebecois representatives seem to fear like the plague a referendum in which Quebecers would be asked their opinion on a series of constitutional amendments in line with the traditional five demands of the Quebec government headed by Robert Bourassa.

We think that the Government of Canada and the provinces are moving towards a compromise on a package of constitutional proposals that could considerably change our Canadian system, but that could also satisfy Quebec's legitimate aspirations. What better way than to ask them directly, in a referendum, whether or not they approve of this constitutional package put forward by the Government of Canada and the provinces. I think that is a completely democratic exercise which is quite legitimate and in no way contravenes the basic rules of democracy.

Certainly it would be better to bring all the yes supporters together on one side and all the no supporters together on the other and to impose strict spending limits on them. That is the purpose of the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Jonquière. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the Liberal Party of Canada will support these amendments enthusiastically.

We hope that the government will think it over and see that these amendments are justified. If, unfortunately, the government did not accept these amendments, we would at least hope to see a government representative, either the parliamentary secretary today or even better the Prime Minister himself on third reading, assure us that if the government holds a referendum on specific constitutional offers, it will not abuse its spending power and intervene in a heavy-handed, undemocratic way. Then both the supporters and the opponents of this proposal can fight it out on a level playing field with equal chances for both sides.

It seems obvious to me that it is not necessary—as I have already said in this House—to spend excessively to point out the merits of Canadian federalism. I do not think that it is necessary to spend excessively in any province of Canada, including Quebec. I am convinced that it is not necessary to use money to convince Quebecers of the merits of a good constitutional reform that would provide a favourable response to the five traditional requests of the Government of Quebec.

This is why I regret that, so far, the government has not deemed appropriate to impose more rigid limits to electoral and referendum expenses, and more importantly, does not see the opportunity to copy the referendum legislation of Quebec.

Some of our colleagues in this House ask themselves this question: if the amendments tabled by the member for Jonquière were to be rejected, should the member for Jonquière or other members in this House who support these amendments vote against the referendum act?

Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that at this time we hope these amendments will be agreed to. We also hope the government will recognize that it is essential to have a bill that will not only be fair but will be perceived as being fair and equitable for everybody, including the separatists, the independantistes and the members of the Bloc Quebecois. It seems certain to me that whatever we do, those indépendantistes, separatists and members of the Bloc Quebecois will always be disappointed and unsatisfied, but I nevertheless think the referendum legislation is essential for the Government of Canada.

We believe that if the Government of Quebec has an act that enables it to hold a referendum, and if the government of British Columbia has an act that enables it to do the same, it goes without saying that the Government of Canada should also have a piece of legislation enabling it to hold a referendum and to consult Canadians across the country or in specific regions of Canada.

I do not know what this government will do following the constitutional negotiations. I do not know if the Government of Canada will invoke section 3 of this bill to hold a Canadian referendum in some provinces but not in all of them. This means that the Government of Canada could, provided it reaches an agreement with the provinces, allow those interested in doing so, to hold their own referendum according to their provincial legislation. The Government of Canada could therefore hold a referendum in the provinces where there would be no desire to hold such consultation at the provincial level. It is quite possible that all these discussions which seem to scare the members of the Bloc Quebecois are totally useless. Indeed, it may well be that, under this legislation, there will be a referendum in several provinces, but that in the case of Quebec it will be its referendum act that will apply. Should this be the case, all the antics and fears of our friends from the Bloc Quebecois will have been useless and unnecessary.

Whatever the situation may be, I will end by saying that we must have a referendum act that enables the Government of Canada to act if it deems appropriate to do so. Also, this legislation must, as much as possible, ensure a level playing field for the two sides, and be democratic by allowing those who want to belong to either group to be subjected to the same rules and be allowed roughly the same electoral and referendum expenses.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments made by my friend from Jonquière, a Quebecois patriot, who nevertheless works hard for a renewed Canada.

My friend was a member of the two special joint committees and he was present at the organizational meeting of the legislative committee on that bill.

[English]

He is a member of Parliament who has truly made a constructive contribution to this debate and to many preceding debates. He has presented a series of amendments which would have the effect of bringing into Bill C-81 the concept of exclusive umbrella committees as in the Quebec legislation on referendums. Only two umbrella committees would be set up: one in support and one in opposition to the question or questions.

The mechanics for the administration of this scheme would be left to the Governor in Council to make by regulation. There are numerous issues raised by this approach, issues which were also canvassed in the legislative committee which completed its work last Tuesday.

The first of these would be the restriction of participation to two exclusive committees and that, as has been touched on in this debate, raises charter concerns with respect to freedom of expression and to freedom of association.

I heard my colleague from Lac-Saint-Jean seeking to deprecate the importance of that. I wonder if he was perhaps speaking in the context of the 1980 situation which preceded the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I know he referred to the Quebec charter, but I do not think it is exactly four-square with the situation we have here.

My friend from Papineau—Saint-Michel referred to the charter issue only very fleetingly. I was looking forward to his grappling with that issue because I know he had the opportunity to read the opinions which have been submitted to the government on the issue. I wonder, with all due respect to that distinguished gentleman, whether he was so much persuaded by those opinions that he did in fact skate around the issue of charterability.

The Governor in Council, under the amendments proposed by my friend from Jonquière, would be obligated to control the process in detail. That would include apportionment of funding among affiliates, rules for affiliation, maximum spending limits, the manner in which the committees and affiliates would be established and indeed the names of the committees.

I would ask with great respect whether it is really the intention of my friend that the cabinet would be setting those rules.

It seems to me the exercise we are talking about here is an exercise of maximum involvement of the people of Canada and a democratization of the process. To have cabinet intervening in matters so intimately involved with the exercise of freedom of expression would I think be somewhat abusive to the process.

The Chief Electoral Officer under these amendments would have to approve the apportionment of expenses of a committee which operates nationally or which operates in more than one province. These are important matters which have not been addressed in the amendments as to how they would work. In the Canadian context testimony was given in committee that this scheme would likely be contrary to the charter.

The question of freedom of association is in many ways more profound and more challenging than even the fundamental question of freedom of expression, which is inextricably wrapped up in the question of the spending limits in particular.

It is interesting that the Bloc Quebecois would be in support of these amendments. What would happen if they were to become the law of Canada and if members of the Bloc Quebecois were participating on whatever side? I would guess they would be negative to any propositions that would be put forward to the people of Canada. They might find themselves under the same umbrella as—these are just examples because we cannot be certain of this—Mr. Manning and the Reform Party; Mr. Elmer Knutson, the founder of the CORE group, which is fundamentally opposed to the use of the French language in Canada as is the Association for the Protection of English in Canada, which I think would be under the same umbrella with them and who knows who else. The National Citizens Coalition, the Assembly of First Nations, REAL Women and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women might all be together under the same tent. I wonder if they have really thought this through.

It was an excellent intervention that my friend from Etobicoke—Lakeshore made. He is an authority on these matters and he quite correctly described the three main elements of these amendments: the setting up of the committees, the spending limits, and the issues of balance of fairness that flow from those and the reasonable exceptions.

I listened as well to the intervention from my friend from Yorkton—Melville who has been working with these issues since 1980 and has made a great contribution to the debate in our country. He observed that the challenge is to set up committees and rules that are charter proof. It was the intention of the government to try to find those rules, and those committees that would be charter proof. The truth be told, the government would prefer to have committees if only they would withstand the test of the charter.

At this stage I would venture to say it is certainly imprudent to risk the challenge of the charter in the face of the very overwhelming opinion to the contrary.

With great reluctance I would advocate the defeat of this cluster of amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I think we just heard a repetition of the government's arguments justifying the passage of a bill which is a true conscription of democracy. What is really extraordinary is that we refer to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to justify rules which impose no limit on spending.

The federal government will be allowed to spend millions of dollars. Each committee will be allowed to spend up to $8.5 million and the number of committees will be unlimited and all that, in the name of democracy and freedom of speech. It is really unbelievable. I think it would appear utterly ridiculous to the Supreme Court, whose opinion we could have sought, and certainly to any normal democracy that a charter of rights and freedoms would give the richest and most powerful such a disproportionate influence. Allowing everybody to express their opinion on a major issue is the simplest way to improve the democratic process.

Once again, we invoke individual rights to deny this democratic exercise. A group or an individual, let us say a billionaire, could decide to spend freely to express his views.

We are told that the government will reject the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Jonquière. He already knows about it. The hon. member for Jonquière is part of this government. He knows where his party stands, and he will have to decide what to do.

This was a nice attempt at showing some national pride. He dared propose amendments to make this bill a little more democratic. He did it knowing full well that they would be defeated. At least he was called a patriot, a great patriot, by our friend from Edmonton Southwest. Then he said he would vote against his amendments, he is a patriot, but a patriot who is going to be hanged. Of course, he knows the government will use its majority to defeat his amendments.

We also heard from the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who said he agreed, he was going to vote for the proposed amendments which provide for an umbrella group on the yes side and another umbrella group on the no side, as well as some control on spending. The hon. member was very sanctimonious.

This bill is essentially the same as the one tabled by Marc Lalonde in 1979. As far as the hon. member for Jonquière is concerned, we can still speculate whether he acted in good faith, whether he will have the guts, one day, to make a decision? There is no doubt the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was here to vote for the War Measures Act. There is no doubt about his sincerity when it comes to democracy and the future of Quebec.

The jury is still out about the hon. member for Jonquière, but it will not last much longer. The crucial moment is fast approaching. In his area, editorialists do not trust him too much, but we can still expect a surge of pride, we can still hope he will draw his own conclusions, since the government said it will defeat his motion. It is not enough to look good, you also have to push the conclusions to their logical end. If the hon. member for Jonquière really believes that to be democratic the referendum process needs spending limits and a grouping of people on each side of the issue, and if he knows that his motion will be defeated, he can draw his own conclusions.

Several other members should also reflect on that and draw their own conclusions, because we are told that we need that bill, but we will not use it. This measure is totally anti-democratic. This is a preparation for a showdown, a conscription of democracy, but it is not going to be used. They are inching their way towards some kind of show of force. History repeats itself. The first time it is tragic, the second, ridiculous. Nobody in Quebec takes seriously people who have been procrastinating for months. That is what they have been trying to do by putting things off for the last two years by spending millions of dollars, by having people changing their mood from good to bad and back again, by riding the roller coaster of hope and despair and by being totally unable to make a decision because they know that at the end of the road, there will not be any proposal worth considering.

The member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was saying earlier that the federal government has the right to hold a referendum on serious proposals that would be favourable to Quebec. Everybody knows that the Quebec premier is hoping for serious proposals, but he is losing hope of ever receiving some serious proposals and is even considering holding a referendum. We know full well that if the government and the Liberal Party had some serious proposals to make, the premier of Quebec would be the first one to want to submit them to the people of Quebec, but Mr. Bourassa will never have any to present.

This is why we are planning to pass a law which is nothing short of a violation of democracy, because nothing in the constitutional package will be acceptable. On top of that they want to gag us. Since the beginning of this debate those members have tried to gag us. We had been told that during the important report stage we could speak our mind on each clause. Now they tell us they are bringing the guillotine in tomorrow. Well, I think there is still some hope before they drop the guillotine tomorrow. We can still pursue the debate on this bill and hope that by arguing with our colleagues from Quebec they, at least, will understand how important it is to oppose this bill.

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 26, I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-81.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have the seconder?

Mr. Tremblay, seconded by Mr. Lapierre, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) moves:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of consideration of Bill C-81.

Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places?

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): More than 15 members have risen. Pursuant to Standing Order 46(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks all day from members of the Bloc Quebecois and to listen to them you would think that they were the only ones in the House who cared about the people of Quebec.

They seem to come across like they have some special gift for giving counsel to the people of Quebec.

This kind of nonsense that has been going on today is really counter productive for the people of Quebec. I heard the member for Jonquière speak earlier today. He is an example of someone who is trying very hard to be constructive and creative in a very difficult circumstance.

As someone from downtown Toronto who does not understand all of the complexities that you are facing in your province right now, and I admit that openly, I salute you for your attempt to try to bring some order to this debate because the people who were opposing you today from the Bloc were not being constructive.

This is just small-time tactics. It is not a productive exercise and the more it goes on, my prediction will be the more they will sink themselves into oblivion.

The people of Canada are having a very difficult time understanding what is going on in this House the last two days. First of all, they tried to shut down the South Moresby National Park and now they are trying to infer that we are jamming some kind of exercise down the throats of the people of Quebec.

I believe that Quebecers are much more intelligent than the Bloc Quebecois is giving them credit for. I have many friends in the province of Quebec and they tell me that right now the thing that is uppermost on their mind is the economy. There are many, many people right now, not just in Quebec but in every part of this country, who are in deep economic pain.

There are people who are not working. There are businesses that are having difficulties making ends meet and the quicker we get rid of this divisiveness that is being promoted, the better the chances of this economy coming back together. We have so much in this country to work on, but it is pretty tough when you have this kind of counter productive spirit working, especially in this place.

I listened to the member for Hull—Aylmer who talked about the fact that in 1980 he was on the same stage as Prime Minister Trudeau. I am sure that many members of the government who are in power today were also on that same stage. He seems to forget it was his participation with that spirit and leadership that was responsible for this man not only being the force that he was as the mayor of Hull, but was also one of the reasons why he was elected to this Parliament of Canada.

The people in his riding did not elect him to work at separating this country. They elected him to come to this Chamber to work at keeping this country together. I have great difficulty in understanding where he is coming from. He talked about the fact that the day after the Meech Lake Accord went down it was the end of his life as someone who believed in Canada.

The fact of the matter is that there were many, many people, even in the province of Quebec, who believed that there were serious flaws in the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I hear the member regretting the failure of Meech Lake.

I accuse him and his colleagues of killing Meech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

BAN ON IMPORTATION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ban the importation of all hazardous waste.

• (1700)

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on this timely issue on the eve of a conference which could have overwhelming implications for the future of our planet.

The motion I am introducing is a very simple motion but it flows from the work done by the Brundtland commission dealing with our common future and the work that will be examined in great detail at the conference in Rio de Janeiro. I would like to read the motion into the record:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ban the importation of all hazardous waste.

It is a simple motion but it speaks to the issue which has gripped our nation and indeed the world for the last number of years and that is the issue of what constitutes sustainable development.

One of the messages from the Brundtland commission was clear: think globally and act locally. This particular motion enshrines the notion of local action into parliamentary law. What it says is in future industrial development and in future residential development in our country we have to be prepared to deal with our own hazardous wastes at home and likewise that other countries must feel compelled to do the same.

It is an important concept because in the world of garbage in which we live, and Canada is one of the greatest garbage-producing nations in the world, it is critical that we not only find ways of disposing of our garbage, but begin to take responsibility for our own waste. This particular motion enshrines that as a principle, specifically in dealing with the issue of hazardous waste.

I first introduced this motion in 1989 when we learned that Canada was importing BPC contaminated gasoline. At that time, customers had no idea that the gasoline and heating oil they were purchasing might be toxic. Farmers did not suspect that the oil used to heat their greenhouses might be toxic. I tabled the motion hurriedly in order to ban the importation of hazardous waste into Canada and to make Canadians understand that we should treat our own BPCs. It is not enough to encourage BPC exports. It is absolutely essential also that we have the means to dispose of our own waste. I had this matter slated for debate in early May last year because I knew that the situation not only had not improved but had worsened.

It is a fact that Canada remains, on the eve of the Rio de Janeiro meeting, the single largest producer of waste material in the world. Canada is the most wasteful country in the world. On the other hand, we have yet to adopt a policy requiring that, as a matter of principle, we treat our own waste material and especially our toxic waste.

In fact the situation keeps worsening even now. In its May 27 issue, La Presse reported that Canada is the world's largest importer of toxic waste material.

[English]

We are the largest world importer of toxic waste. Canada, a country that wants to be a world leader in Rio, is also the world leader in importing toxic waste.

It reported that 95 per cent of all hazardous waste material imported into Canada comes from the United–States. Canada imports 142,000 tons of dangerous waste, and exports almost as much.

So we have nearly 300,000 tons of hazardous waste crossing the border between Canada and the United States.

[English]

Think of it, 300,000 tonnes of toxic waste is passing our border on an annual basis. Small wonder that the fire–fighters of Canada are doing their level best to get legislation which would ensure that transportation of toxic waste be properly computerized. In that amount of tonnage, clearly there is the possibility for some very serious accidents and very serious public ramifications.

[Translation]

Canada is the biggest carrier of toxic waste. As luck would have it, I am raising this issue at the very moment the international community is meeting in Rio to try to find answers to the major ecological problems of this planet.

[English]

It is just a coincidence that this motion is coming forward on the week that we are moving into the real conference but it is also critical that as Canadians, before we preach to the world, before the Prime Minister unveils another empty green plan, we should tell the world we are the number one world importer of toxic waste, a fact that most Canadians are not aware of.

I hope conference delegates in Rio are not aware of these statistics because it would be very embarrassing for Canada. It is embarrassing to rank first as a carrier of toxic waste when we want to tell the Third World it should clean up its act.

There is plenty to do here. In fact, there is a whole industry that depends on toxic waste for its very existence. There is a company north of Montreal that advertises in the United States, saying that it assumes full responsibility for waste upon reception.

This goes against the principle that producers should be responsible for their own waste.

[English]

That violates a basic principle that those who produce waste should be responsible for its disposition.

There are now more than 1,000 sites where toxic waste can be found in Canada. More than 50 of these sites are orphan sites, which means no one is responsible for them.

[English]

Fifty orphan sites, 1,000 toxic sites across this country, and 50 of those that nobody is taking responsibility for. They are simply washing their hands.

In Quebec there are 333 depots for toxic waste.

[English]

Three hundred and thirty–three depots for toxic waste, 66 of them are dangerous for health.

It would cost $500 million to clean them up. While we are arguing here in the House about what should be included in the referendum bill, we have a situation where we already have 333 hazardous waste depots in Quebec alone, and we would need $8 billion to clean up the 1,000 contaminated sites we have across Canada.

[English]

It would take $8 billion just to clean them up.

This year, 6.5 million tons of hazardous waste will be produced.

[English]

Six and a half million tons of toxic waste will be produced in this country in this year alone.

[Translation]

As long as people think they can get rid of their toxic waste by exporting it abroad, they will continue to produce it.

[English]

The point is, as long as we have the option of sending our waste elsewhere and developing an international traffic in toxic waste, it becomes very easy not to deal with the issue of waste. Stick it on a barge, send the PCBs off to a Third World country. As long as we fail to enshrine the notion of looking after our own waste, we will not have any initiative locally to actually deal with our own toxic waste.

• (1710)

The practice of Canada–U.S. trading of toxic waste encourages waste production.

Indeed, an entire industry depends on importing toxic waste to make a profit. Banning the importation and obviously the export of hazardous waste would force us as Canadians to deal with our own waste. The surest way to responsible management is to deal with it ourselves. As long as we can ship it off to another country, the tendency is to look the other way, to take the easy route.

In our own country we have some startlingly positive examples of companies that have done something to reduce their own waste and with stupendous results. At one office, an Etobicoke office, Bell Canada implemented a comprehensive program of waste reduction. Before the program, the building was generating 800 kilograms of waste a day; coffee cups, paper, beverage cans, packaging and organic wastes. Through education and provision of creative alternatives, those 1,000 employees at the Etobicoke office have managed to reduce the waste from 800 kilos to 22 kilos a day. That is hardly enough to fill three green garbage bags.

That is a 97 per cent reduction. They are so excited about this program that Bell intends to extend its program to all 110 buildings in Ontario and 85 buildings in Quebec with positive results.

Another company, Canadian Waste Exchange, specializes as an intermediary between car manufacturers, for example with extra paint, and schools which can use that material. There are other dramatic radical ways of eliminating waste. Quaker Oats Company has introduced an innovative way of looking at packaging. Non-marketable food because of faulty packaging or expiry dates instead of being thrown out is now recycled and used as chicken feed.

In 1986, the company began the process of recycling food that had not been used. It saved $1 million in the process and it has invested that money in a closed loop water cooling system, totally eliminating all discharge into a nearby river.

Dupont has decided to eliminate the production of virtually all hazardous waste by 1995 by substituting non-toxic products, for example, toxic products like arsenic. It is also changing its production technology.

Dupont is also committed to reducing junk waste by at least 50 per cent before the end of this decade. It is finding that reduction pays great dividends. Reducing waste by 38 per cent in the production of paint at Dupont has meant an increase of one-third in productivity.

This is what sustainable development is all about. Being environmentally responsible also makes economic sense. Instead of being the laughing stock of the world by being the largest trader in toxic waste as we speak, Canada could become a world leader by accepting full responsibility for the waste that we generate. The examples I have just mentioned show that it makes economic sense.

Surely there are some necessary adjustments and some investment costs in the short term but those will pay off in the long term economically and environmentally.

Canadians are concerned about the quality of the environment and about the effect of pollution on their health. We do not want to be the toxic waste dump site of other countries.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we do not want to be the world's toxic garbage dump.

They do not want our industries to keep producing waste that is a threat to the health of their children, their parents and their own health. We no longer want to ship our waste to our neighbours. Banning imports and exports of toxic waste would force companies to reuse, recycle, reduce and, in the long run, eliminate the production of toxic products.

If Canada does not act now, other countries will take the lead and Canada will remain behind, its procedures and technologies getting obsolete.

The demand for environmentally friendly technologies and industrial processes will give rise to a great innovative creativity. It will create new markets and jobs and it will allow companies not only to conserve resources but also to reduce costs and increase profits. Japan already has understood the enormous possibilities and so have certain European countries.

In 1990, Japan launched a 100-year plan, sto lat, as they say in Polish, a 100 year plan has been launched in Japan.

They will convert entirely to sustainable development and invest enormous sums of money in research in order to develop clean technologies.

During the seventies and eighties, Japan seized the opportunity of the oil crisis to change its production methods. Already it uses only 50 per cent of the physical resources and energy required by the United States and by Canada to create one unit of production.

[English]

The Japanese understood early that small cars not only make economic sense, they make environmental sense. Right now they have taken the approach to energy use that sees very specifically that for every unit of production created in Japan, they use only 50 per cent of the energy that we use in Canada and the United States. Why? Because they are operating in a much smaller geographic area. They understand that what we do to the land comes back to haunt us in the food chain in the Great Lakes, in the tainting of mother's milk that we see now in the Arctic and in the fact that the food chain in the Great Lakes has already seen evidence of potential brain damage as a result of toxic waste disposal.

Only if we adopt a long-term vision and if we have the courage to act shall we succeed in saving our planet.

[English]

In the United States the House of Representatives in Congress is looking at legislation to ban the export of hazardous waste and the import into the United States. The representative who introduced the motion said: "Banning exports supports and goes beyond the international agreements we have signed at Basel in 1989. It also represents good foreign policy".

As we know trans-boundary movement of hazardous waste is controlled by the Basel convention signed in 1989. Yes, Canada is a signatory and the Basel convention was created in response to concerns that hazardous wastes were being dumped on developing countries, particularly the African states, in a non-environmentally responsible manner. In other words developed countries were using the undeveloped countries as their cheap dumping grounds.

The underlying objectives of the Basel convention were to cut down waste, to recycle waste and to make sure that where possible home country responsibility prevailed for waste disposal and treatment.

However, African countries at that convention understood that the only effective solution was to ban outright the importation of waste on their continent.

It is important that we in Canada also take our own world responsibility seriously and we show the nations of the world, as they gather in Rio de Janeiro, that we too care about this issue, understand this issue and have the political will to act on this matter.

This House can, by way of this motion, unequivocally affirm our will to implement a real policy aimed at setting Canada on the path of world leadership and sustainable development. It is not enough to go to Rio and make fancy declarations to the international media. We have got to back it up with actions. This particular motion makes it clear that Canada will follow the objectives of our common future in thinking globally and acting locally. That is the direction in which we have to go.

I urge the House to support this motion.

• (1720)

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss this very important issue, although I fear it is sometimes a misunderstood issue. I will come back to that later in my remarks.

First of all, I want to stress the fact that certainly the Government of Canada, in co-operation with the provincial governments, very much agrees with the hon. member in her expressed desire to reduce all waste, including hazardous waste.

That is why the Council of Ministers of the Environment some time ago entered into and began to implement an agreement whereby waste within Canada would be reduced by 50 per cent by the year 2000.

I am pleased to be able to report to the House that good progress is being made at this very moment in that direction.

With respect to the specific motion before us, I must caution Canadians to ensure that they understand the fundamental question before us is how to recycle, if possible and if not, how to dispose of in an environmentally sound manner hazardous waste wherever it may exist.

Since 1986, the Governments of Canada and the United States have co-operated as a result of an agreement entered into in that particular year to ensure that hazardous waste is dealt with as efficiently as possible. We believe, and it has been our practice since 1986, that it is most efficient and most environmentally sound to try to dispose of by way of final disposition or by recycling of hazardous waste in the shortest distance possible between the site of production and the site of final disposition.

The very nature of Canada, Mr. Speaker, of which you are familiar as a result of your residency in Alberta, presents us with a unique problem. The problem within Canada is the fact that the vast bulk of our population lives within 100 miles of the Canadian-American border.

We are a huge nation in terms of the breadth of our country, but we are a nation in which our population is situated in a relatively narrow boundary. We have discovered it is very often to our collective advantage, and I would say as well to our environmental advantage, to take the opportunity to export hazardous waste to a disposal site situated in the United States which is closer to the point of origin wherever that might be, than some other disposal site which may exist within Canada.

In fact, we are a major exporter of such hazardous waste but under very strict and controlled conditions and under those circumstances where the disposal site, whether it be a final disposition site or a recycling site is situated closer to the point of origin than that which may exist within Canada.

In return we do indeed, as the hon. member has said, receive a considerable amount of such hazardous waste from certain parts of the United States. Again it is in those instances where the site of origin in the United States is closer to a point of disposition in Canada than would be the case if it were to be sent solely to other disposition sites within the United States.

Certainly there is a certain emotional appeal, and indeed probably a certain political appeal in the statement that countries, nations, provinces, communities, whatever the case may be, should dispose solely, only they should be held accountable for their disposition of their waste.

The most important consideration facing us in terms of our acceptance of our responsibility to try to manage our waste in as sound an environmental manner as possible is with respect to the need to keep the transportation distance as limited as possible. By doing so, we limit the possibility of any accident. We must also ensure that the depot to which it is sent, whether it be located in Canada or the United States, is operated in an environmentally sound manner and that the recycling process or the disposition process, as the case may be, is done under strict government controlled regulations.

At the moment, we and most Canadians believe the system is working to the advantage of both Canadians and Americans. Certainly, as Canadians we are able to export a significant amount of waste to American disposal sites which are closer to the point of origin than those which may exist in Canada.

In fact, the statistics I have available to me indicate that in 1991 Canada exported 223,079 tonnes and imported 135,161 tonnes of hazardous waste. It is important to note that 53 per cent of those exports were destined for recycling operations, in this case in the United States.

It is important that we do all we can to minimize the risk. When we speak of environmental problems it is important to understand that those problems are global in nature. As I have said on other occasions in the House, it is also important to understand that there must be a global response to those problems, in this case, an international response and an agreement entered into between United States and Canada in 1986.

As the hon. member referred to in her remarks, there was another agreement as well, the Basel convention. In 1989, Canada signed the Basel convention. We anticipate that this fall we will be able to ratify that convention. That convention, in essence, has the same kind of objectives as the agreement we entered into with the United States, the safe disposition of hazardous waste.

As a result of the steps we have made in that direction, I would like to take just a moment to inform the House of new import and export regulations which are being put in place with respect to hazardous waste. It is important to understand that, indeed, they are very thorough.

First of all, the existing controls of hazardous waste shipments such as prior notification and manifesting requirements will remain in place. In other words, these shipments must be done in such a manner that the receiving country and the receiving authorities are well aware of their anticipated arrival and the nature of the shipments.

Second, the exports or imports may not proceed until it is confirmed by Environment Canada that all the conditions and regulations are met to ensure that hazardous waste will be managed in an environmentally sound manner.

Third, the requirements for liability coverage will be implemented to ensure that costs for any damages from transportation accidents which could arise are met.

Finally, should a problem arise during the export of some Canadian hazardous waste, the Canadian exporter will be obligated to inform Environment Canada and to make alternative arrangements or to return the hazardous waste to Canada.

I agree thoroughly and fully with the hon. member when she says that the bottom line objective is to reduce the amount of waste. The Government of Canada for that reason has entered into a commitment to move in the direction of a 50 per cent reduction by the year 2000 and she is correct. She is correct when she suggests that this will be good economics. She is correct when she says that there is a considerable amount of enthusiasm in the private sector for making that happen.

Where she is not correct, in my opinion, is when she suggests that drawing up boundaries which conform with political boundaries will lead automatically to the safer treatment of such hazardous waste. The present arrangement where Canada exports hazardous waste to the United States when a disposal site there is closer to the point of origin and we receive hazardous waste from the United States when a disposal site here is closer to the point of origin is not only more efficient in terms of cost but it is also actually safer in light of the fact that the transportation routes are being kept as short as possible.

Mr. Speaker, coming from the province of Alberta you are well aware of the fact that your province has put an excellent facility in place. However, you are also aware of the fact that to transport hazardous waste to that facility from all across Canada would incur an immense amount of risk because of the distance, the vastness of Canada.

The present arrangement is one where there is an emphasis on safety and an emphasis on a minimum of risk and is the appropriate policy to follow.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this evening on the private member's motion that the government should ban the importation of all hazardous waste.

I want to indicate that I support the concept of the bill, for a number of reasons. Primarily it is because I believe the onus should be on the jurisdiction that generates such waste to be responsible for its disposal.

If a province is allowed to export its waste to the United States there would be less likelihood of two things happening. One is the development of an appropriate disposal or neutralizing facility in that particular region. The other and more important one is that without being forced to deal with the end product within that jurisdiction, that jurisdiction is less likely to force the creator to change the manner in which that particular good is manufactured or created so that it does not have hazardous waste as a by-product. For those two reasons I support this motion.

I also believe even within jurisdictions there should be a restriction that, for example, if an area of a province does not either have within its location the producer of the hazardous waste or benefits from the production that brings about the hazardous waste, it should not have to bear the responsibility for the storage or disposal of such material.

I am speaking specifically about the province of Ontario, and I am thinking specifically about high level nuclear waste. We all know that AECL has had a program for 10 to 12 years now of looking for an underground storage facility for nuclear waste that is created in southern Ontario by Ontario Hydro. It has been looking and drilling in northern Ontario. It has been drilling in the community of Atikokan in order to test the theory that granite is an appropriate medium in which to store for long periods of time, millenniums, high level nuclear waste.

Northern Ontario does not benefit from the nuclear reactor program that Ontario Hydro launched many years ago. In fact, residents of northern Ontario, like the residents of southern Ontario, are now finding there was a high price tag for those nuclear reactors. That price tag forced Ontario Hydro to increase its rates by over 11 per cent this year, 9 per cent next year, and who knows what thereafter, in order to pay for those mega-elephants. We still do not know what it is going to cost to de-commission them. We still do not know if we have the technology to not only handle the high level waste but also to handle the buildings and what have you.

A number of chemicals are created within our borders. There are a number of products which when released into the atmosphere or placed on the ground will destroy vegetation, animal life and human life. Those are the kinds of things we are talking about in terms of the private member's motion, the banning of importation of all hazardous wastes.

We should accept responsibility for what we produce, but I think it is the responsibility of our neighbours to the south to look after what they produce.

I visited Love Canal a number of years ago, in 1985 in fact, with the Canada-U.S. parliamentary association. We toured what once was a city, a city the size of Atikokan, Ontario in fact, that was closed because of the dumping of toxic wastes. We walked along the Niagara Gorge, along the Niagara River and saw the chemicals seeping out, in fact dripping from the walls as they leached through the ecosystem.

I have seen in other cases where hazardous goods are illegally transported between Canada and the United States. Not only are they illegally transported but they are hidden in trucks with other cargoes. The placarding has been removed from the tankers carrying toxic waste in order that the cargo goes across the border from the United States into Canada undetected. That is happening and is happening today. One of the ways we can deal with that is just by saying no to the importation of hazardous goods.

It works both ways. The province of Ontario should stop the exportation of garbage to the United States for a profit. That is our responsibility. At the same time we should not be exporting garbage from Toronto to Kirkland Lake or any of the other northern communities. He or she who produces the garbage should be responsible for it.

In this brief intervention I just wanted to give a quick outline of why I am supporting the member's motion. I would encourage all members of the House to do so as well.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the motion moved by the hon. member for Hamilton East:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ban the importation of all hazardous waste.

I whole-heartedly agree with this motion and certainly commend my colleague for bringing it before the House at this time.

We can look at the increased incidence of cancer in the Great Lakes basin, the continuation of industrial spills in the Great Lakes waters and our rivers. We can look at the thinning of the ozone and its impact on animal life in the southern extremities of South America, let alone what it is doing to human life at the present time. We realize that as inhabitants of this earth we must take action.

We can look at the saturation of the soils in some European countries with animal wastes, waste in such concentrations that it has affected the productivity of the soil and has got into the water tables and well water of those countries. Some of this waste is now being barged to other countries, some of which are Third World countries, to be disposed of.

This is simply not acceptable. Nor is it acceptable that just a few years ago cyanide chips were being transported from Chicago to a disposal site in Lambton county. They were being brought in without the knowledge of surrounding inhabitants until they found out accidentally. How much more can we get in terms of toxicity in cyanide chips?

We saw attempts just three years ago to build a low level nuclear waste disposal site in St. Clair county, Michigan, that would serve as a disposal site for several other states. This is a different aspect to importation of toxic wastes. That site was to be built near a stream that drained into Lake Huron. It would endanger the water intake of the city of Sarnia and much of Lambton county, and if a proposed pipeline goes through it will affect a lot of Kent county itself.

How can we allow such things to happen? More recently we had several truck loads of hazardous waste in British Columbia being brought to a site near Sarnia, Ontario. It was a similar site where cyanide chips were disposed of.

The member for Brandon—Souris mentioned that the reason we had an agreement to accept waste from other countries was that it was the lowest distance to travel. Certainly that did not apply to the volume of hazardous waste going from British Columbia to Ontario. Surely there must have been a closer site somewhere in B.C. or the state of Washington or Oregon. Why did it come our way?

More recently we learned of hundreds of truckloads of waste being trucked from Montreal to the same site in Lambton country. Surely there must have been a site somewhere in New York state or in the New England states that would have been closer than the 600 miles they had to travel to bring it to Lambton county.

More important, what was the impact of all this on the health of Canadian people? I am very fearful of the impact. I mentioned earlier the higher incidence of cancer in the Great Lakes basin.

A recent media article stated that no one really knows what is happening to millions of tonnes of toxic waste generated within Canada annually. This was from a federal report on the state of the environment. Even worse, we as Canadians have allowed increasing amounts of hazardous waste into the country. We still do not know if the monitoring system is working as it should because it will only work effectively if those who generate the waste are honest and responsible corporate citizens generally concerned about the future of this planet, of our children and of our grandchildren.

Imports of hazardous waste from the U.S. into Canada increased to 142,000 tonnes in 1990. Lax border inspections were at the heart of the 1989 case of alleged imports of fuel laced with PCBs, a prohibited import under the CEPA.

The Auditor General's 1991 report examined the compliance of customs operations with domestic regulations controlling import and export of hazardous waste. It found that there was no defined program within Customs Canada to deal with the movement of hazardous materials. No training was provided for customs staff on the subject of hazardous materials. Little has been done within Customs Canada to gather information, analyse and assess the risk of illicit transportation or non-compliance with relevant legislation, or to target cargo entries for examination of hazardous materials.

The substances banned from importation under CEPA were not found to be listed in the Customs Canada information base on prohibited imports. There is no evidence of Customs Canada enforcing a Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act.

The Auditor General's report also notes that in the event of a random examination to find hazardous materials the inspectors may in fact release the shipment out of concern for their own personal safety.

He also noted that a memorandum of understanding has been established between Environment and Customs defining the roles and responsibilities of both departments regarding inspections and shipments of hazardous waste.

We owe it to ourselves and we owe it to future generations. I have heard the argument that provinces have the responsibilities to regulate handling and disposable hazardous waste, but it is the federal government's responsibility to regulate international trade of the wastes.

The transboundary movement of hazardous wastes across Canada and across the Canadian border is governed by three pieces of federal legislation: the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the Hazardous Products Act and the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act.

It is ludicrous to pass the buck to provinces, to pass the buck to individuals or companies or to blame the United States. It is ludicrous to say we would like to act but we do not want to upset our international relationships. Frankly, if we pass this motion today, Canadians who have gone to Rio can hold their heads high and be proud of this decision.

It is clearly our duty to act on this issue. No one else can. We owe it to our children, our grandchildren and generations of children yet unborn to take actions like this. I urge the House to adopt this motion calling for the banning of importation of all hazardous waste into this country.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the remaining time of the member for Lambton—Middlesex to speak on this very important motion, a motion which contains 17 words, probably the most important 17 words that this House and this country have heard in a long time.

Prior to this we were debating the referendum and we saw how wordy it was and how complicated. Here in 17 words we can turn the environment of this planet around. If in Rio all countries adopted this policy, we would have the beginning of a turning point on this planet. If implemented, what would it mean? It would mean that every country would be forced to reduce the production of waste, especially hazardous waste.

I will be very interested in what the government members say on this because I cannot see or understand why they would oppose such an important motion contained in these 17 words. I congratulate the member for Hamilton East for being so creative, coming out with such a simple motion and yet so important.

I wanted to speak to this motion because of my experience recently, a little over a month ago, on the external affairs visit to Russian and Ukraine. What did Russia do? It exported their nuclear waste to the Arctic. We have been reading about all the nuclear waste that is being stored up in the Arctic. From that spot the entire northern hemisphere can be affected. If the former Soviet Union had a policy that it would have to look after its own waste, that waste would not be in the Arctic today.

I cannot stress the importance of these 17 words. This is the kind of policy that we should not even have to debate over an hour. At the end of a one-hour debate we should all pass it unanimously and get on with building this country, get on with saving the environment on this planet.

I add my congratulations to the member for Hamilton East for bringing in these important 17 words.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make some comments on the motion before us today. The motion speaks to the issue of banning outright the importation of all hazardous waste into Canada. The main concern of this motion appears to be with the hazardous waste imported into Canada. However, it is not clear whether the proposed importation ban would be imposed on all hazardous waste arriving in Canada from world-wide sources or only those hazardous wastes coming from the United States.

In any event, it is important to point out that the movement of hazardous waste between Canada and the United States has been controlled since 1986 through a bilateral agreement known as the Canada-U.S.A. agreement on the transboundary movement of hazardous waste.

This agreement sets out the conditions for the export and import of hazardous waste between the two countries. The proposed complete ban on imports of all hazardous waste would be contrary to the Canada-U.S.A. agreement and would also remove the only viable waste management option available to many Canadian and U.S. companies.

Internationally, Canada is a signatory to the Basel convention which would limit the trans-boundary movement of hazardous waste to only those countries with which Canada has an agreement. This convention was designed to ensure the environmentally sound management of hazardous waste.

Nationally, current federal legislation in the form of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act also contains provisions that allow for the control of trans-boundary movement of hazardous waste. The transportation of dangerous goods regulations are quite specific as to the requirements for notification, manifesting, labelling, placarding and packaging for all classes of hazardous waste to ensure that a certain level of safety in transportation is maintained.

As the previous examples illustrate, there are numerous legislative and regulatory controls in place to ensure safety in transport and that hazardous wastes are dealt with in an environmentally sound manner to protect the Canadian public and the environment.

Hazardous waste only accounts for about 20 per cent of Canada's total waste requiring management. Both Canada and the United States export and import all types of waste, including hazardous waste, to ensure that it is managed at the closest environmentally-sound facility on either side of the border. These options allow both Canadian and American companies to ship hazardous waste across the border where facilities exist for proper disposal when facilities may not be available in the generating country. In other instances these very same hazardous wastes are valuable secondary raw materials for industrial processes or are recoverable to be reused once again. Therefore, it is readily evident that some of these wastes still have a market value.

The movement of hazardous goods is a two-way street. I submit that a total ban on imports of these wastes by Canada would invite a reciprocal action on the part of the United States and our European trading partners, thereby removing an important hazardous waste management option for many Canadian countries. This situation would have a negative impact on the recycling industry, especially at a time when the government is supporting the four Rs, of which recycling is an important element.

Another point to consider is that under the green plan a national goal has been established to reduce the generation of all wastes by 50 per cent by the year 2000. This waste reduction program will also permit the federal government to collect data on the trans-boundary movement of hazardous waste and other wastes. This data in turn would be critical to the development of effective policy and laws and to the enforcement of regulations.

Recently green plan funds have been committed to conduct co-operative research with universities, private sector and provincial governments as partners. Through green plan initiatives, the government has shown its commitment and support for new science, especially environmental science, aimed at reducing, recycling and reusing hazardous waste or at their safe destruction.

The green plan-supported research and development will be focused on environmental technology and science needed for the 21st century. This environmental science will also provide industry with additional options to meet regulatory requirements and will assist industry in measuring the programs made in compliance with regulations.

Through government support of the science and technology action plan, the development of environmental technologies to provide solutions to environmental problems would be encouraged and new economic opportunities would be offered to Canadians.

Combined with private sector research and development of these technologies, the net result would be the production of new investment opportunities and the creation of jobs in Canada's environmental industries. This can only happen so long as Canada does not isolate itself by closing the borders to the movement of hazardous waste.

Industry has shown a willingness to participate in the environmental arena with the commercialization of hazardous waste treatment, storage and disposal facilities, and through the establishment of hazardous waste exchanges. These types of initiatives should not be short-circuited by cutting of a source of raw materials.

In 1987 the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment commissioned a review of waste exchange programs. From this study, a number of recommendations were made on how to improve the effectiveness of waste exchanges and to identify opportunities which would increase the financial self-sufficiency of waste exchanges.

Following this review in 1991, the green plan also identified waste exchange as a key initiative worthy of pursuing. Through the green plan, moneys have been earmarked to expand and to help the waste exchange program achieve a strong economic base in order to sustain itself by the year 2000.

Environment Canada recognizes that the waste exchange program will play a major role in achieving the goal of cutting waste by 50 per cent from 1988 levels by the year 2000.

However, in order for such a program to be successful more support from Canadian industry, which also relies on recyclables imported from the U.S., will be necessary.

Waste exchanges and treatment, proper transportation, storage and disposal facilities are all components of waste management. Unfortunately, these types of activities, although essential, are not attributed an as favourable an image as recycling.

Recycling is only one, albeit very important, of the elements of the four Rs: recycling, reuse, recovery and reduce.

All these measures take time and are not all available at this very moment. It is true that hazardous waste is being generated through industrial processes right now. However, there are structures in place and tighter controls planned to manage these wastes in an environmentally sound manner.

For these reasons and the negative impact they would have on the Canadian economy, the motion before us today is unnecessary and, indeed, undesirable.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a moment or two to intervene in this very important debate.

On examining the motion before us it appears to be the intent of the motion to protect the Canadian environment by reducing the waste coming into the country, but the motion does not include any measures which would help Canadians to manage their own waste at home, nor would such a ban introduce any new measures for the actual reduction in the volume of hazardous waste being produced in this country. That is a very narrow view of the management of the global environment.

As well, a total ban on importations may cause other countries to forbid imports of hazardous waste generated in Canada. This would immediately be cause for environmental concern since not all areas of the country have facilities necessary to treat all kinds of hazardous waste.

In my own province of Alberta we have the Swan Hills treatment centre, which is one of the finest in the world, but it is situated some distance from the locations of production of hazardous waste. Inability to export waste would mean storing hazardous substances until new treatment plants could be built.

The construction would take several years and could lead to improper storage as storage space fills up or to other more dangerous practices such as dumping.

Even if the required types of treatment facilities already existed in abundance in Canada, those sites would probably be located at a great distance from some waste generators as in the case of Swan Hills.

Waste from Canadian generators would therefore be on the road for longer periods of time, increasing the possibility of transportation accidents. In addition, these facilities may not have the required capacity. Still more facilities would have to be built. Overall, a complete import ban could create severe problems for Canadian industry as well as the environment.

The cost in terms of dollars and of damage to the Canadian environment could be very high indeed.

Consistent with its commitment to global environment protection, Canada signed on March 29, 1989 the Basel convention on the control of trans-boundary movements of hazardous waste and their disposal. A convention which came into force on May 5 of this year requires all countries to control their shipments of hazardous waste crossing their borders.

Under the provisions of the Basel convention member countries have the duty to ensure that the waste generated in their country is disposed of in an environmentally sound manner. This means that each government must allow only those exports of hazardous waste which cannot be treated in an appropriate and timely manner in their own country.

At the same time parties to the convention must allow only those imports for which proper and safe facilities exist. In Canada, regulatory initiatives under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act to enhance the already existing tracking system for transfrontier movements of hazardous waste are now nearly completed. New regulations should be in place this fall.

In conclusion, it is a very long border. We have a very big country. A complete ban on the importation of hazardous waste should not be supported. Such a ban would not necessarily help the environment and would be of little benefit to Canadians or to Canadian industry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on March 10 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration to initiate an inquiry into certain unfortunate incidents reported with respect to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Such incidents were cases of members of the board sleeping while the tribunal was in session and refugee claimants were making their case. Other incidents were situations where members of the board were laughing or ridiculing refugees who were making their claim before the board. Then there were examples of racism or sexist remarks made by members of the board to claimants who were appearing before them. We also had a situation where a member of the board tried to exercise undue influence on another member of the board with respect to giving a judgment.

We have examples of inconsistent judgments where for example one member of a family was granted refugee status and another member of the very same family was not granted refugee status because they went before different panels of the board. There were situations where judgments were prepared in advance.

There were these many incidents which led me and many others to request an inquiry into the workings of the board, the Immigration and Refugee Board, to find out exactly what was happening and to take corrective action.

I wish to refer to some of the newspaper headlines with respect to these incidents. I have a clipping from The Toronto Star which states: "Snoozing adjudicator a problem for refugees". Another newspaper clipping states: "Tribunal member sleeps during refugees evidence". Another from The Globe and Mail states: "They're fired: two adjudicators laughed during man's story". This is about two members of Canada's refugee board snickering during an Iranian man's story of torture. Another one states: "Stress on the board drove official close to breakdown". Another from the Canadian Press states: "Rulings confuse refugees; Latin American community fears hard line attitude".

Then we have one from The Ottawa Citizen which states: "Refugee board official removed from the job". In this case the official was removed for trying to influence independent board members to turn down refugee claims.

I asked the minister to initiate an inquiry into all these matters. That was in March. Since that time I have met with the chairman of the board. This morning we had a committee hearing with respect to these matters.

While I still think many changes have to be made, I feel the chairman is taking steps in trying to correct these things. As a matter of fact, several of these people were suspended and now the chairman is trying to initiate further changes. I hope the government will co-operate with the chairman in making the necessary changes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the House that we are under new Standing Orders here and Adjournment Debate is four minutes for those who are asking the question and two minutes for the reply.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue)): Mr. Speaker, Canada's refugee determination system is admired around the world as one of the world's fairest and most humane and I think the member knows that.

In the little more than three years since its creation, the new Immigration and Refugee Board has handled 55,000 cases to their conclusion. Most of the 280 immigration and refugee board members have backgrounds in immigration, refugee work or law. Before they hear their first case, all members undergo the most extensive training program given to members of any Canadian tribunal.

The minister is well aware of the allegations raised against certain members. He expressed his concerns about these allegations to Mr. Fairweather, the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board, in the strongest possible terms.

Mr. Fairweather responded: "The complaints were thoroughly investigated. Several members were removed from the hearing schedule and apologies were issued in another case".

In short, where concerns have been raised, appropriate action has been taken promptly by Mr. Fairweather. If the member has concerns about other particular cases he too should bring those concerns, as he did, to the attention of Mr. Fairweather.

As for the guides which assist members in writing their decisions, the Appeal Division of the Federal Court rejected claims that these guides in any way prejudiced Immigration and Refugee Board decisions. It is time for the hon. member to give this board and its many highly dedicated members the credit they very much deserve.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the unique Experimental Lakes area in northwestern Ontario has enabled Canadian scientists to conduct world class research on fresh water ecosystems.

This cluster of wilderness lakes has served as an ecological laboratory and has answered several tough environmental questions.

This is the facility that helped convince the public in Canada and the U.S. that phosphates in laundry detergents caused the explosive growth of algae in lakes. This research was instrumental in convincing policy makers to control the use of phosphates. It is no exaggeration to say that the research at the Experimental Lakes helped save Lake Erie.

The ELA program established that even moderate amounts of industrially generated acid rain damaged Canadian lakes. This information was crucial in the fight for pollution controls on industrial smokestacks.

The ELA program is continuing to do ground-breaking scientific information on the effects on aquatic life by heavy metals. Using its 22 year string of uninterrupted data allows researchers to describe the horrific effects on northern Canada that are likely if the world fails to limit emissions that cause global warming.

Most recently an ELA program has been started, before new hydroelectric dams are built, to determine the amount of the greenhouse gas methane that is released when large tracts of boreal forest land are flooded for the creation of reservoirs.

There does not seem to be any question about the quality of research that is conducted at the ELA. It has led to the publication of 500 scientific papers. Last year its first scientific manager received the internationally prestigious Stockholm Water Prize for work that was conducted there.

No one denies either that pioneering research of this calibre cannot be done on a fiscal shoestring forever. The time has come for the federal government to make a long-term commitment to enable the facility to remain independent and its respected work to continue.

Simply put, the ELA needs money quickly. The Auditor General stated in his annual report released last December that: "The program has clearly reached a critical decision point. The secure financial base is eroded and the program currently relies heavily on unpredictable special external funding sources". Unfortunately, when it comes to money, the government's attention seems focused on other matters.

When I raised this subject in the Oral Question Period on March 12, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, whose responsibility it is to fund the program, apparently did not even know what I was talking about. He mistakenly called the project, "the Edmonton experimental lakes" and then asked: "Is it in Ontario" before admitting that: "Now you really know I have not looked at it recently". The Minister of Environment seemed to know no more.

When my colleague, the member for Skeena and the NDP environment critic and the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and our associate environment critic brought this up in the Standing Committee on the Environment, department officials indicated they were working with officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans but that no green plan money was expected to be available for this purpose.

The Prime Minister spends $840,000 each year to compile reports on newscasts and newspaper articles. Is it not high time that the government came up with at least that much so this excellent environmental research can continue?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the member opposite from Edmonton East, the Experimental Lakes area, which is run by the DFO Freshwater Institute out of Winnipeg is located 55 miles southeast of Kenora, Ontario.

The Experimental Lakes area, better known as ELA, is the Department of Fisheries and Oceans largest field research station. It is operated by the department's Freshwater Institute located in Winnipeg. The ELA contains approximately 50 small lakes and their watersheds in a remote and uninhabited area set aside for research through an agreement with the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources.

This station has been in place since 1968 and has long-term whole lake experiments that have been directed with application to freshwater fish habitat. Their research has contributed significantly to our understanding of the causes and the mechanisms and effects of the lake enrichment or eutrophication, and latterly the acidification of the Great Lakes as well.

Approximately 400 items of primary literature, reports and other scientific publications have resulted from the work there. There have been a number of Ph.D. dissertations and there has been 40 graduate theses work done there.

The 22-year database on water and climate conditions places ELA in a unique position in being able to detect early warning signals of global warming in fresh water.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is treating the current financial status of ELA very seriously. We contracted with the Rawson Academy in 1990 to develop long-term financial support through the establishment of partnerships with other government departments, universities and businesses. The business plan was received by the department in April of this year and a strategy for its implementation is now being developed.

There has been and will continue to be reductions in spending due to the spending pressures that affect the government as a whole. However, as the minister indicated in this House on December 10 of last year, the work at ELA is going to continue.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, there is more than one Canadian financial institution questioning the wisdom of the federal government's action in raiding the CMHC's mortgage insurance fund for $55 million.

This federal cabinet decision, implemented on March 31 of this year, was simply a last minute attempt by this government to reach its deficit targets. What this government is ostensibly doing is robbing Peter to pay Paul.

By siphoning the mortgage insurance fund's surplus, this government potentially is jeopardizing the solvency of the fund, which is used to insure home mortgages for Canadians all across the country.

The minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation said in this House on April 30 that the mortgage insurance fund is well able to make this so-called contribution.

However, what the minister failed to inform Canadians about is the fact that the mortgage insurance fund had a pre-tax loss last year of $27 million.

What the minister also failed to inform Canadians about is the analysis in the CMHC's five-year corporate plan which forecasts an increase in the number of mortgage defaults this year.

In fact, the corporate plan indicates that defaults are expected to rise from $161 million in 1991 to $614 million in two years.

This CMHC forecast for increased defaults is based partly on the higher risk involved in insuring mortgages with a 5 per cent down payment, but mainly because of the recession and the thousands of lost jobs and plant closures across this country.

Also this documented forecast in the five-year plan proves that statements made publicly by the CMHC's senior vice-president in charge of insurance are wrong. He told a national newspaper that mortgage defaults had already peaked in 1991. We know that to be wrong and the facts in the corporate plan indicate that the peak should come in 1993.

When the government raided the mortgage insurance fund, reducing its surplus to $94 million, it had the direct consequence of jeopardizing CMHC's ability to cover potential mortgage defaults, and potentially could undermine the availability of insurance for the 5 per cent down payment plan, which we as a party proposed and do support.

Let us not forget that the main reason for the escalating defaults are due to this government's economic policies that have created a general economic downturn, which also has put pressure on the mortgage insurance fund by raising the number of potential defaulters.

Another CMHC document indicates that before the 5 per cent down payment plan was implemented by this government, risk analysis was undertaken to ensure that the accelerated defaults would not jeopardize the solvency of the mortgage insurance fund.

Those risk assessments were calculated on the basis of the surplus available in the mortgage insurance fund. When the government siphoned $55 million from this fund, I suggest it put the solvency of the fund at risk. It is startling and irresponsible for the government to reduce the fund by this amount at a time when the fund is experiencing increased claims.

The money is in the fund for the benefit of homeowners and the home industry, nothing else and no one else. Despite the reassurances of this government that careful actuarial studies were completed before the money was taken, the fact remains that there is a risk involved.

This government cannot deny that it has chosen to take that risk, that it is this risk that potentially threatens the solvency of the mortgage insurance fund and, in turn, the availability of insurance to potential homeowners and home builders.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond today.

A portion of the surplus in the mortgage insurance fund was directed to the government's Consolidated Revenue Fund to help produce the federal deficit. It, of course, is one of the top priorities of this government to see that that deficit does get reduced. It was not a rating of the account. It was a planned move based on actuarial information.

I would like to draw the attention of the member to the information that was contained in the 1991 annual report of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It indicates that CMHC has done what it has for many years; it has done an excellent job of managing its mortgage insurance fund.

The balance sheet in fact shows that CMHC has increased its provision for claiming the losses from $282 million in 1990 to $447 million in 1991 in order to meet its mortgage insurance fund obligations in the coming year.

Even with this increase, the surplus is over $149 million. On the advice of its actuary, based on all of the information indicated by the member opposite, CMHC was advised that it could set aside an additional $92 million to further protect the viability of its mortgage insurance fund.

The remaining $57 million existing in the surplus of the fund was not needed for claims, for business on the books of CMHC. The government has taken that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

ATMOSPHERIC CONTAMINANTS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on March 18 I raised the issue about the possibility of atmospheric radioactive releases from the Hanford nuclear reservation in Richland, Washington, which is about 250 kilometres south of the British Columbia-Washington border and the possibility of contamination by atmospheric radioactive contamination over many years of both intentional and accidental releases from the reservation.

I might add that the reservation is home to some 63 per cent of all the high level nuclear waste produced in the United States and has, under the sands of Hanford, hundreds of millions of litres of high level waste and radioactive sludge that is stored in underground tanks.

At Hanford at this point, at least the reactors which were used in the weapons production during the cold war are now mothballed. However, during its actual years of operation the Hanford plant emitted into the atmosphere over 500,000 curies of iodine 131, and other radioactive contaminants.

It is the cumulative effect of these atmospheric releases over the many years during the time that Hanford was a weapons production facility that is concerning U.S. scientists that are now undertaking extensive investigations as to the extent of the radioactive contamination and the possibility of long-term health effects to those areas of the population exposed to that contamination.

My question at that time was whether or not the Minister of the Environment or the minister of energy would in fact recognize the need for Canada to send a Canadian delegation of scientists to Hanford to co-ordinate efforts that are now ongoing with U.S. scientists involved in the Hanford dose reconstruction project in order to better determine whether or not there was in fact significant atmospheric contamination of Canadian populations across British Columbia and possibly Alberta borders.

I also asked at the time whether or not the minister was prepared to initiate studies similar to the epidemiological studies now being undertaken throughout the greater Washington area and the Pacific northwest to determine whether or not there are long-term health effects as a result of those radioactive releases going back as far as the late 1940s.

I might add that the children exposed to the Hanford releases years ago would now be in their thirties and forties. Many of those children in the community surrounding Hanford are now in fact demonstrating clinical symptoms of thyroid disease which are consistent with evidence of radiological damage. Health studies have shown an alarmingly high incidence of thyroid cancer and thyroid disease in those communities surrounding the Hanford reservation.

I think it is a real legitimate concern that we also investigate whether or not there has been any long-term health effect to those population centres in Canada, in British Columbia, that may have received any significant level of that radioactive contamination.

I have made the argument that the federal government should involve itself in these ongoing U.S. studies. We should seek to determine the cumulative level of exposure to B.C. residents from the years of Hanford releases.

I have been pressing for the government to implement a co-ordinated emergency response plan in the event of a more current danger and that is the possibility of explosion of some of the underground storage tanks at the reservation itself.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to once again inform the member opposite that the Canadian government is aware of the concerns with the Hanford nuclear site and has brought these concerns to the attention of the U.S. Department of Energy.

In 1988 the Department of External Affairs raised concerns about the impact of past releases of radioactive material from Hanford, Washington. An investigation was made by the Atomic Energy Control Board to provide a preliminary assessment of the issue. Their investigation included estimating the radiation doses possibly received by Canadians from historic and current atmospheric releases from this and other American facilities.

I would like to state very clearly that based on the history of atmospheric releases from the U.S. nuclear facilities under study, the AECB estimated that the maximum radiation dose to an individual at the border between the United States and Canada would not have been higher than one fifth of 1 per cent of the AECB's annual dose limit for members of the public.

In other words, as you have been informed previously, based on preliminary analysis, the historic and current atmospheric releases of radioactive contaminates from the Hanford nuclear facility are unlikely to pose any negative impact to Canada.

As you are aware, the site is no longer an active weapons production facility and the problems on site are now largely related to the local leaking and seeping of chemicals, and this the hon. member has acknowledged. Present Canadian concerns with this facility are related to the cleanup work, reconstruction, and the risk or possibility of accidental radioactive releases from waste material.

In October 1991, an ad hoc Canadian Interdepartmental Committee on Hanford, chaired by Health and Welfare, with representatives from the AECB, Environment Canada, External Affairs, and Emergency Awareness Canada were formed to review the past, present, and future effects of Hanford operations on Canadians.

The U.S. officials are willing to address the Canadian concerns and to provide information on an intensive dose reconstruction project currently under way on the ongoing operations at this facility and on the development of emergency procedures.

The U.S. Department of Energy has undertaken a massive plan to clean up the site and safely dispose of the waste permanently. Currently the U.S. Department of Energy does not have all the information available to make some decisions and therefore research and development is required to get to the decision-making points. As this information becomes available the risk to Canadians can be reassessed.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, justice delayed is justice denied. My constituent, Mr. Zvi Gitter, president of Imperial Cabinet in my riding of Winnipeg North, has been waiting for justice for much, much too long. He and nine other cabinet makers in Manitoba have lost over $300,000 unfairly and unjustly and the minister of internal revenue is yet to rectify this injustice. My constituents alone lost over $82,000. The money was lost when the cabinet makers were not given rebates due to them from the federal government.

A year ago last March I brought this matter to the attention of the minister in the House of Commons. In a press interview following Question Period the minister said, and I quote from the March 27, 1991 issue of The Winnipeg Free Press: "The bottom line is that I am satisfied on a case-by-case basis everything was done in accordance with the rules and regulations that were distributed fairly and equitably to everybody, every manufacturer in every province, every town and every region".

Nearly a year later, on March 2, 1992 the Canadian International Trade Tribunal rendered its decision on this issue and found that Revenue Canada's memorandum of information, which was to benefit manufacturers of kitchen cabinets, was not made available to the industry served by the Winnipeg district office even though the information was being used by the ad industry in other parts of the country.

I would like to quote from this decision: "I. The error can be directly attributed to Revenue Canada; II. The error resulted in an inequitable and unjustifiable application of departmental policy to the industry in one region of the country; III. The memorandum that was unfairly applied to the Winnipeg region was not a regulation made pursuant to the Excise Tax Act".

The discredited departmental policy allowed one region of the country to benefit to the detriment of my city. Promulgation of such a policy, were it deliberate, is unconscionable. Not knowing such a policy was promulgated was, to me, a classic example of ministerial irresponsibility.

Therefore, I ask how the minister would explain to this House that he caused such a policy to be issued in violation of the tax law he has sworn to uphold. How will the minister explain to this House this determination by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal with the minister's statement of a year ago: "Everything was done in accordance with the rules and regulations."?

Nearly three months ago, March 12, I again raised this issue in the Chamber and the minister again failed to give a satisfactory reply. Therefore, in light of this I ask the parliamentary secretary and I challenge him to reply to these concerns. I seek the support of this House to have the minister admit his mistake and make the appropriate restitution to my constituent and other cabinet makers in Manitoba in the name of fairness and justice. I would like the parliamentary secretary, as he replies on behalf of the minister, to remember the universal truism that justice delayed is justice denied.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet makers in Manitoba were treated equitably and the member for Winnipeg North knows this full well. The minister even gave the hon. member a brief regarding this subject.

In answer to the member's concerns regarding the Canadian International Trade Tribunal's decision to dismiss the appeals by Imperial Cabinet and other Manitoba cabinet makers concerning the use of a determined value to account for federal sales tax, I must emphasize here that all kitchen cabinet makers across the country were well advised of how to apply for this discount. There were two separate excise news publications sent to all the licensees across the country, including those from Manitoba. Information was available at any excise office. The industry was well informed.

The facts of the matter are very simple. If licensees met two criteria, they were eligible for the discount. First of all, it must apply only to a regular product line and, second, they must have a published list price. If they met these criteria, Manitoba cabinet manufacturers like any other manufacturers across the country were then allowed to use a discount to calculate the amount of tax charged.

In conclusion, as the minister has already stated, Manitoba cabinet makers were treated in a fair and equitable manner, the same as all other cabinet manufacturers across the country.

An hon. member: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no points of order.

SUDBURY, ONTARIO

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, today the regional municipality of Sudbury is being recognized by the United Nations and has been presented with the 1992 United Nations Local Government Honours Award at the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro for its work in land reclamation.

Sudbury is green and getting greener every day. Lands once barren and devastated are covered in grass and trees; all this due to the co-operation of all within the community as well as with the help of all levels of government.

First, Sudbury's efforts were recognized in Ontario and in 1990 Sudbury was awarded the Lieutenant-Governor's Conservation Award. Again in 1990 Sudbury received the Government of Canada Environmental Achievement Award.

Earlier this year Sudbury's work was recognized by the United States and received the Chevron Conservation Award, and now the world recognizes Sudbury's achievements. Sudbury has become a world leader in vegetation enhancement.

All Canadians can be justly proud of these outstanding achievements and of the international recognition. Congratulations Sudbury.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, shelters for battered women give out only their phone numbers and not their addresses because it would endanger the lives of women and children. Abusive men are most likely to kill their partners when the women attempt to leave them.

Shelter workers and others who have helped battered women have also been threatened, beaten and killed. A Liberal member of Parliament, without consulting the organizations involved, published the addresses of all the shelters for battered women in his riding. Women's organizations wish to hold the member for Broadview—Greenwood accountable.

Women's organizations who help battered women are the experts on this issue. I urge all members of Parliament to consult with these women's organizations in their ridings before sending out any material dealing with violence against women. This recent action which puts abused women and children at further risk could have been completely avoided.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, a constituent of mine has brought to my attention the following matter of great importance.

Future eastern Canadian summers without the monarch butterfly are a certainty because of the logging of the few Mexican mountain top sanctuaries where these insects stay over winter. Saving the Mexican winter range for the monarch is of great importance.

Currently our Minister for International Trade is on a mission to Mexico to discuss environmental technology and has said that the President of Mexico has placed a very high priority on improving Mexico's environmental protection and control capabilities.

Sustainable growth should blend a genuine commitment to the environment with a consistent focus on quality. It will take effort by all of us to make this a reality.

Today, as the earth summit convenes in Rio de Janiero, I encourage all members of Parliament to support and encourage efforts to preserve the world's forests, wildlife and beautiful species for the enjoyment of North Americans now and in the future.

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, this year alone there will be almost 16,000 newly diagnosed cases of breast cancer and 5,200 women will die of this disease in Canada.

We cannot understate this problem. Breast cancer today is a crisis of epidemic proportions, and yet it is still being largely ignored.

According to the Laboratory Centre for Disease Control, breast cancer research is severely underfunded. In fact the Medical Research Council only spends $1 million a year out of its $182 million research budget to combat a disease that affects one in nine women. The National Health and Research Development Program spends a "whopping" $40,000.

I suspect these figures are correct because when I contacted health and welfare for confirmation it would not release any figures to me despite the fact that it had them. The reason for this was that they had to be cleared by the director of the department.

Could it be that the government was too embarrassed to tell us the truth? It is time that we recognized the scope of this problem and allot the necessary funds to it.

When the government can find $20 million for ad campaigns, I am certain it can do more to combat breast cancer. If we are really interested in equality for women then the logical starting point would be to ensure basic equality for the health and welfare of all our citizens.

RACISM

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, whereas the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the right of each individual to have and to exercise on an equal basis human rights and freedoms without distinction, discrimination or preference based, in particular, on race, colour, religion or ethnic origin;

Whereas the Sorel area, as well as the rest of the province of Quebec, is intended to be a host territory for any person who wants to settle there;

Whereas the citizens of Richelieu condemn the distribution of hate propaganda and any other form of violence or discrimination based, in particular, on sex, race, colour, religion or ethnic origin;

Whereas the people of the Sorel area, as well as the people of Quebec, long to live in a harmonious society where each and every man and woman has equal opportunities to live, grow and work;

I decry, as federal member of Parliament for Richelieu, along with several organizations in my riding, any racist, discriminatory rally promoting hate and violence to be held in the Sorel area.

HUMAN TISSUES AND ORGANS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Law Reform Commission of Canada released paper entitled Procurement and Transfer of Human Tissues and Organs. The document contained several important recommendations regarding this vital medical practice, among them that organs and tissues for use in transplant or research should be obtained through donation rather than purchase.

I believe this recommendation is excellent and I call on this government to act upon it. Besides the moral argument for respect for the living and the dead, there are very sound practical reasons for this recommendation.

Canada has an impressive track record for blood donations. We do not pay for blood, and thus generally those who donate do so for purely altruistic reasons. The United States health care community is forced to pay for certain blood products. This has created a market where people who are knowingly unqualified donors can sell bad blood for the sake of personal gain or compromising their own health for money.

The same holds true for organs and tissue. People should be donating these for the purpose of preserving and protecting life. I support the commission's call for making the purchase or sale of human bodies, organs and other non-regenerative tissue a Criminal Code offence.

BUYING CANADIAN

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, we can never stress enough the importance of buying Canadian. That is why I want to emphasize the importance of encouraging Canadians to shop at home and buy our products.

The economy is getting back on track slowly but surely. Therefore, we must be vigilant in order to keep this recovery going. Yet, certain aspects of the economy are not protected enough, which could jeopardize this upturn.

An example of this is that lots of people want to work in Canada where salaries and wages are the highest in North America. However, a number of those people spend the money they earn in Canada in the United States, and that will have negative effects on our economy. No country in the world can resist such a regime very long.

Therefore, I urge everyone from all regions, particularly the people of my riding, to deal with their own people with trust. Our economic future depends closely on our capacity to save what we have.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the Organization of Economic Co-Operation and Development recently published its annual farm subsidy figures and again the figures are misleading.

The OECD claims Canadian farmers receive subsidies totalling $8.8 million. It has been calculated that this figure is five times the actual support level. The OECD assumes that any amount above the world price for any product is a subsidy.

In the world market, the so-called world price of most commodities is far below the cost of production because of subsdized surpluses. The Canadian domestic price is higher than the world price because the world price is rock bottom.

If we use the OECD's rationale, we could say that a Canadian factory worker is being subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer because his or her wage is higher than the world salary rate. The OECD's definition of world price misrepresents the real picture.

Canadians receive the best value in the world for food in terms of price, quality, wholesomeness and safety.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for many months, Canadians and Quebecers have been discussing the Senate reform. In today's La Presse, an article written by Maurice Girard is entitled: "Benoît Bouchard: Should the Senate be abolished?" And further: "Having spoken very clearly today, Mr. Bourassa can take the lead in favor of a more equal Senate". It is quite possible. I ask again: Should we not abolish the Senate outright? It would be a lot simpler.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a "triple E" Senate. First, Elect the senators as federal members of Parliament, since several of them are competent; second, Eliminate it; third, End it, for the good of taxpayers.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, a Nigerian refugee claimant facing deportation has sought sanctuary in the Vancouver Collingwood United Church after he received a deportation order in early May.

Steven Ogunwuyi was implicated in the April 1990 failed coup in Nigeria, and Amnesty International and the Vancouver Refugee Council oppose his removal because of widespread evidence which indicates that executions, torture and inhumane treatment have been meted out to all who have been accused of attempting to overthrow dictator Ibrahim Babangida.

Moves to provide sanctuary to refugees facing life threatening deportation orders can only increase as the Conservative government further restricts the asylum it provides to people fleeing persecution.

I call on the government to establish a moratorium on deportations to Nigeria until the political situation has been clarified and the outcome of the upcoming elections determined.

CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, last week I was in Cyprus. I would like to take the time I am allowed to say to you, and through you to all Canadians, how proud I felt while spending an evening with the Canadian soldiers who are acting as peacekeepers and peacemakers in that region.

I attended the presentation of the United Nations medals to the 3rd Battalion of the Royal 22nd Regiment. I met Lieutenant-Colonel Gagnon and I spoke with French Canadians from the Saguenay, Lac Saint-Jean, the Eastern Townships, Lac Mégantic, Laval and other regions. I listened to O Canada being sung in French by all those military, I saw our flag fluttering quite high and well in view, I heard the band of the 1st Battalion of The Worcestershire and Sherwood Forester Regiment play a song I had learned as a child when my mother sang it for me: Vive la Canadienne.

Mr. Speaker, I was proud to be a Canadian and I cried with emotion. I thank the commander of the force, his officers and all the military who gave me the opportunity to strengthen my feeling of belonging.

OPEN HOMES CANADA

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, an exciting event is taking place in London, Ontario this summer which will foster the spirit of goodwill and unity in the country.

Open Homes Canada, Bienvenue Canada, is a unique, Canada-wide exchange program which was initiated in London, Ontario.

Londoners will be opening their homes to fellow Canadians for a four-day visit on the civic holiday weekend of August 1.

This exchange is an attempt to bring people together to share their homes, interests and activities and to understand each other better.

All MPs will be contacted by Open Homes Canada and challenged to try and send one visitor or family from their constituencies to London, Ontario.

Ordinary people from all walks of life have a crucial role to play in renewing Canada. Open Homes Canada is one way we as Canadians can be part of the unity process.

I encourage and challenge each of you to get involved and inform your constituents. With everyone's support and participation a renewed Canada may be only a weekend away.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology spoke in Toronto last week with a message to Canadian business people which deserves emphasis.

The minister stated that prosperity in our country greatly hinges on increased investment levels and cited Japan as an inspiration to follow in the sense that long-term planning accomplishes a higher state of competitiveness.

Our standard of living in Canada is 25 per cent higher than that of Japan and we are second only to the United States. Therefore the benefits of increased investment by the private sector will not only maintain that standard but it will also improve upon it.

We have set an impressive record over the past 30 years by establishing the second highest economic growth rate of the G-7 nations.

These are encouraging statements made by the minister and the message is clear: Increased competitiveness is the key to future prosperity.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in Toronto the Minister of Finance told bankers that he was very optimistic. However, since he brought down his budget the minister has revised his economic growth predictions for 1992 downward from 2.7 per cent to 2.3 per cent.

That being said, will the Minister of Finance revise his forecast for unemployment upward to reflect the impact of his economic policies?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is encouraged as I am that we have had positive growth in the last three months of this year. It has been modest and moderate but, nonetheless, it is going in the right direction.

Today we have had new evidence that the economy is strengthening inasmuch as on the manufacturing side shipments are up by 0.9 per cent. Orders were up by 0.8 per cent in the month of March. That, too, is encouraging.

We have indicated all along that because of the restructuring accompanying this slowdown the job side of the picture is not as optimistic as we would like to see it.

Nonetheless, with the continuing decline in interest rates, with the strengthening of the U.S. economy, with the initiatives that have been taken in the budget, and with the improvements in productivity, it all augurs well for a stable and durable recovery.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Bank announced its forecast for the economy yesterday and predicted growth of only 1.4 per cent. This is very much in line with what the Conference Board predicted two weeks ago: growth of only 1 per cent.

In releasing the report the bank said: "That type of growth is not enough to stop the unemployment rate from rising or lead to a substantial recovery in profits".

Why is the minister sticking to his predictions at this moment for jobs when every indicator makes it very clear that he was wrong on that forecast? Will he revise it so that the Canadian people know the real unemployment situation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Very simply, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to quote from the observations of the Royal Bank of Canada, I will do the same thing.

Mr. Earl Sweet, the Royal Bank's assistant chief economist said in connection with the release of his projections: "On the plus side the significant restructuring by Canadian business needed to regain and increase their share of world markets is beginning to make itself felt in stronger productivity and exports to the United States are growing".

The hon. member and his party continually harp at the government's initiative to try to expand trade opportunities.

It is quite obvious it is the merchandise trade, the exports out of Canada particularly to the United States but also to other countries, that will create jobs and economic activity and is what will improve our standard of living. That is what we are pursuing on all fronts.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since we have been in a recession for virtually 30 months, it is obvious that sooner or later, something will happen. Something will suddenly happen in the Canadian economy when we have a new government in Canada.

In the meantime, we have problems which cannot be denied. Manpower temporary services says that this summer the employment situation is worse than last year. In some sectors it is the worst situation since 1978, when surveys in that field were started.

Why is the Minister of Finance being stubborn? Why does he not want to do anything concrete to give jobs to the young people who want to be employed this summer so that they can go back to university next fall?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not being stubborn at all. What we have to do is try to get the fundamentals in place.

We set out in the budget of 1991 to bring down inflation so that we could bring interest rates down and keep them down. As of today treasury bills are trading at 5.95 per cent, one of the lowest levels in over 20 years.

That is a clear indication that if the fundamentals are right and the initiatives are in place it will spur economic activity, particularly in the manufacturing and processing sector.

If productivity is increased you are then more competitive. You can then compete for those markets abroad, not only in the United States, but also in other countries of the world. That is what my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, is working at.

On the training and retraining side, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has expanded the budget for training and skills upgrading.

Those are all important components of a rational, realistic approach to economic recovery. That is what we are following.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has not expanded the budget. In fact, last year, the minister cut $100 million for job training from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. This year he slashed another $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy for training. Now he has the unmitigated audacity to admit: "We have a problem. There is no money". Is it any wonder?

Exactly what does the minister intend to do to solve the problem that he himself and his government created?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the minister intends to address the problem by looking at ways where a plan can be developed within the UI account to provide additional funds this year for developmental uses.

If we are able to put such a plan in place, it will mean that unemployed Canadians in need of training will benefit from even more than the $400 million that we included in the last budget by another increased amount. I should be able to finalize that within the next few days.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the minister has admitted that the UI training fund has run dry.

Under the Canadian Jobs Strategy he has admitted that his government has slashed $200 million to help unemployed Canadians reintegrate into the workforce.

I ask the minister in all sincerity if his government really wants to help the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed get trained, at the very least will he restore the $200 million that he cut from job training under the Canadian Jobs Strategy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with Liberal traditions, of course the member does not say who in Canada should be taxed more to raise $200 million. Or maybe he is suggesting that we increase the deficit.

The hon. member leaves the impression that we have used training funds. If he wants to be honest with the House and the people he will admit that training funds in Canada have gone up $400 million this year for UI recipients. That is the reality.

We are in the process of finalizing a plan that will provide additional funds for developmental uses this year. In order to achieve this we will, of course, have to be reallocating funds within that envelope in order to clearly show the government priority to training.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Certainly, there are many outstanding issues and difficult issues being dealt with in the Constitution now. Every Canadian is aware of that, as is everyone in this House.

I congratulate the minister and all those from the provinces who agreed to have aboriginal people at the table and to discuss aboriginal issues. All Canadians agree it is time for that long-outstanding historical issue regarding Canada's First Nations to be dealt with.

Today the minister is quoted as saying that provinces uncomfortable with the proposed constitutional agreement on aboriginal self-government could opt out of a new constitutional arrangement.

Could the minister tell this House whether or not in his view this jeopardizes the legitimacy of the tentative agreement that was reached last week on the inherent right to self-government for aboriginal peoples?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the leader of the New Democratic Party for her question. Let me take the opportunity to thank all members of the House for the encouragement they have given me through these negotiations.

The answer to her question is that in my judgment, it does not jeopardize the agreement. The question was raised by one of the premiers who indicated that it should not be interpreted that he would be intending to invoke that right. I think that as a matter of law he is correct, but I have no reason to believe that there will be any unravelling of the agreements that occurred on aboriginal issues.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the fact is the matter has been raised. I am sure the minister is quite correct. We all agree he is certainly very familiar with all aspects of the Constitution. It may be that Premier Wells, who made this comment, was not necessarily suggesting that he on behalf of his province would do so, but it does raise a very important question.

I believe Canadians and indeed aboriginal people feel that any agreement reached on aboriginal issues would apply to aboriginal people and First Nations in every part of this country.

I ask the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, on behalf of himself and his government, will he assure this House that it is his intention to support and to ensure that the final agreement will contain a clause on the inherent right of aboriginal self-government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Let me deal with that question directly, Mr. Speaker.

Yes, it is our intention. We think that there has been historic progress made on these matters, not simply in the establishment of the inherent right, but also in the recognition by aboriginal peoples that that must be exercised within Canada, that there must be other recognitions of the sovereignty of Canada, that the right would be inherent, and most important, the agreement by all parties that there would be a three-year period before which anyone would take it to court.

That should give a great deal of comfort to everyone. It gives us three years in which we can work out by negotiation, not by court decree, not by the decision of politicians or by native leaders, but work out by negotiation the form of aboriginal self-government.

The one other thing I should say has to do with the word "agreement" coming out of the process that I am chairing. It is understood by everyone that any conclusions we come to at that table have to be approved by respective governments. So in a sense, there is no formal agreement, but there is a willingness around the table to work to secure the agreement of governments to the proposals that have been the subject of consensus there.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the minister this question. In terms of the position taken by the federal government, if it is clear and if it is his intention to ensure that the recognition to the inherent right of self-government for aboriginal people, as negotiated in this round, is advocated by this government will be that it will be the right of inherent self-government for aboriginal peoples, first nations in all parts of this country. Is he prepared to commit today that this is the position he is taking on behalf of the government and that it is his intention to see this in the final package?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is our intention. We have dealt in the discussions with the principle of the equity of access to the right. We are agreed that the right should be available to all aboriginal people.

The other thing that has been done which is of potentially historic importance, if we are able to carry it off, is that the provinces have been forthcoming with regard to undertakings to make available land and to keep in place social and other services for the Métis people in a way that would allow the Government of Canada, with those assurances, to move forward to have all aboriginal people, including the Métis, included under section 91(24).

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the European Community has recently agreed to reform its common agricultural policy in such a way as to contribute to an early conclusion of the Uruguay round of the GATT.

Throughout these negotiations the government has assured Canadian dairy, poultry and egg producers that it will deliver a clarified and a strengthened article XI. Does it still believe that it can do that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is the position of the government. We are encouraged by the movement on the part of the European Community on reform of the common agricultural policy which I would say is a necessary ingredient to a successful resolution of the export subsidies and the internal support limitations for the Uruguay round.

That does not in any way affect our position on article XI. We still have the position of strengthening and clarifying article XI. We continue to discuss this with our trade partners. We would note that other countries have specific items that they want to have dealt with in the negotiations as well. So the book is not closed on that one by any means.

AUTO INDUSTRY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the current North American free trade negotiations, the United States has demanded that automobiles entering its market duty free must have a higher North American content.

In 1988 the government fought hard against higher North American content on the grounds that it would discourage further foreign investment and jobs in Canada.

Is that still the government's policy or is the government now agreeing to a higher North American auto content in the NAFTA negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the rule of origin is a very important part of the negotiations of the NAFTA, particularly as it affects the automotive sector. It has been a key objective of the Government of Canada in the negotiations to have a clarification, a greater transparency, a greater ease of administration and compliance to the rule of origin. We seem to be achieving that during the course of the negotiations.

The question of the level of content has not been negotiated. Some flexibility is provided as a result of the acceptance of the Canadian approach to the calculation of the rule of origin and that will enter into a final negotiated position on what that level might be.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister yesterday in this House compared the very existence of Canadian supply management and the livelihoods of tens of thousands of Canadians to the importation of bananas into Europe. No Canadian farmer has any idea what the Prime Minister was talking about.

For months now we have been told the Prime Minister's strategy has been to get onside individual leaders, particularly President Bush.

What support did the Prime Minister get from President Bush after his latest round of talks with the President? If he did not get any support, what further action is he prepared to take to get that support?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend surprises me with his question. First of all, the misstatement is very substantial. I made no comparison whatsoever of article XI and bananas. The Liberals got no bananas; the hon. member is bananas.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: This may take awhile, but let us start again.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I will not go any further. I was indicating simply that other countries seek exceptions as Canada has been doing.

If my hon. friend does not know it, the European countries which formerly had colonies are seeking a very important exception to allow for the entry of the primary product of bananas into the European Community as an exception in much the same way as the United States of America is seeking an exception for the provisions of the Jones Act in respect of its maritime industry, and in much the same way as Canada is seeking an exception in respect of the products under article XI. That is the point I was trying to make.

That is the point I made and that is the point that President Delors of Europe acknowledged here when he said that he would rather have an agreement that was 90 per cent complete with a few exceptions than no agreement at all.

I am sorry that my hon. friend did not understand the background to this complex issue. If there is any other information he would need with regard to developments in the agricultural file, please let me know.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister should know that article XI is now in GATT. There is no comparison between article XI and those two situations. Surely the Prime Minister of this country should know that.

The Prime Minister and the government have been telling us to depend on the Prime Minister's personal brand of diplomacy. Canadians have seen this diplomacy in action and they do not like it. The Prime Minister has given away fish to France and has received no support.

He has caved in on a number of trade issues to Washington and he has received no support. In fact, the head of GATT, Arthur Dunkel says: "Tariffication with no exceptions for Canadian supply management".

What is the Prime Minister prepared to do to get this support from other countries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that if a guy does not know about bananas he does not know about fish.

The fact of the matter is that we have given away absolutely nothing to France. Due to the efforts of the distinguished Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the European Community has stopped overfishing off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador and that is a tribute to the leadership of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: All I can do is indicate to my hon. friend that while there are no guarantees in this business, we have been working very hard with the stakeholders and with the producers to try and protect that provision of the agricultural industry which is so important to a number of Canadian producers and to the Canadian family farm in many instances.

We view it as a legitimate exemption. Other people do not share that view. Perhaps my hon. friend does not share that view because he tries to trivialize it by failing to understand that it is an exemption in much the same way as the maritime industry is an exemption for the Americans, and in much the same way for a developing country whose only export product is bananas constitutes an exemption.

The Liberals laugh at it, but for developing countries which only have that produce to secure foreign exchange, it is of vital importance that they secure an exemption in that regard.

What we are trying to do is encourage that exemption for developing countries. We accept the exemption in respect of the United States and we hope that others will view the exemption we are seeking on behalf of article XI as an appropriate instrument as well.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I hope the House will bear with me. I am going to depart from our usual practice and recognize certain visitors.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of a parliamentary delegation from Australia led by the Honourable Peter Walsh, Senator for Western Australia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

When declaring 1985 International Youth Year, the United Nations warned of the potential for explosions among unemployed and alienated youth. We have had youth disturbances now in Canada—in Toronto, Halifax and elsewhere—to which the Ontario government has responded by initiating an emergency job program for youth.

Is the minister and his government prepared to join with Ontario and other provinces in initiating an urgent program for job creation for youth this summer in order to respond to the deep concern about the potential for a long, hot summer?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, obviously nobody is pleased with certain developments that have led to violence in this country and other countries around the world. I am sure nobody condones that.

With respect to this government's programs for youth, my hon. friend will admit we have had programs in place for a long time. We are very pleased that the provinces are ready now to do their part in order to help us find jobs for those students during the summer.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, Manpower Temporary Services indicates the job situation this summer will be the worst since 1982. Meanwhile, this government is spending only 70 per cent as much money now as it was in 1989 for summer youth employment.

With an unemployment rate among youth already at 17.7 per cent and going up this summer, it is more important to have action than rhetoric. Will this government act to introduce an emergency summer program for youth with the urgency it deserves before there is more trouble in this country?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people agree they prefer action to rhetoric; that is why we are on this side of the House and the hon. member is on the other side.

With respect to statistics, Statistics Canada has indicated recently that students have better chances of finding employment this summer than they had last summer. Notwithstanding that, we have increased the Challenge Program this year as we did last year.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and ask him about unemployment in Hamilton.

The Minister for Science, the ministers who visited Hamilton last week, and the minister of employment himself, have all claimed recently things are looking up and are good in the Canadian steel industry.

There are thousands of unemployed steelworkers in Hamilton and they know the situation is not good. What is the minister prepared to do to help these unemployed steelworkers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I met with the steelworkers a couple of weeks ago in Toronto, and one view among them was that they were quite happy with the efforts this government is deploying to help them adapt to the changes that are happening in their industry.

If the hon. member would like to get details of all the assistance we have given the steelworkers I would be pleased to provide it for her.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, if the minister really believes he is doing enough for the Canadian steel industry then he is totally out of touch with reality.

This government promised free trade would bring jobs to Hamilton. In fact, we have lost thousands of jobs in the steel industry alone. The American steel industry's threatened trade actions against Canada will make the situation even worse.

This government has not resolved the trade dispute. It has run out of money for job retraining. What is the minister prepared to do for the unemployed in Hamilton, except talk through his hat?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I share the member's concern for the steel workers. That is why with CSTEC we have entered into an agreement where I and my predecessor have committed very substantial amounts of money to help these workers retrain and adapt to the restructuring that is taking place.

The member talks about the steel industry. Mr. Fred Telmer of Stelco Inc. made a comment that is quoted in the Hamilton Spectator which I invite her to read. He says: "Indeed, during the first quarter of this year, steel shipments were up 3 per cent, making a 5 per cent year–over–year increase quite feasible. Canadian steel–makers and their customers are also benefiting from interest rates that are at their lowest level in 19 years". That we owe to the economic policy of this Minister of Finance.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Two weeks ago the minister confirmed that his department would honour the retraining commitments for 1992 that were made to the workers of both the Abitibi and Red Rock mills in Thunder Bay and in Red Rock. He further undertook at that time to review the retraining commitments that had been made to those workers for the years 1993 and 1994.

Would the minister be prepared to give us a status report as to the funding that will be available for those commitments made by his people for the retraining programs to Red Rock and Thunder Bay for 1993 and 1994?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the government is in the process of finalizing a plan that will provide additional funds for developmental use this year. In order to achieve this, we will be reallocating funds to meet what is clearly a government priority. I should be able in the next few days, I hope, to be able to apprise members of the House and Canadians of these changes that will help meet this heavy demand for training on the part of unemployed people.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): A supplementary, if I may, to the same minister. Let me just say that the people of Thunder Bay appreciate the extra added effort that the minister has shown for those unfortunate workers in Thunder Bay and Red Rock.

However, since our last meeting further permanent layoffs have been announced, mainly because of the policy for downsizing the shipbuilding industry in Canada.

My question to the minister would be what plans does his ministry have to make commitments to those unemployed workers who have not yet had commitments made with respect to retraining?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member I am sure would agree with me that what we cannot do, nor should we do, is put every UI recipient on training.

What we have to do, what we can do and what we want to do, however, is to make sure that those who most need training get it. In the case of further layoffs in the area that my hon. friend mentions, adjustment committees are being set up in order to work with both the labour and the business side of the equation in order to find ways where we can help those workers. The hon. member can be assured that in the case of these other lay–offs they will get as fair treatment as we can muster for their benefit.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

According to the media this morning, this year Canadian taxpayers will have to pay $390 million in interest and recovery costs to lending institutions because students failed to pay back their loans to these institutions.

• (1450)

Can the minister tell us today when the legislation will be amended with a view to making banks toe the line with respect to recovery of student loans in case of defaulting students?

Once again, Canadian taxpayers are footing the bill.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that negotiations with the banks are on the right track. Clearly, the student loans program needs some drastic changes. I have had talks with all the provinces in recent months, and we have now spent about 10 days negotiating with the banks to ensure that the cost to the Canadian taxpayer will be reasonable, considering the program students are being offered. We also want to ensure that students are the real beneficiaries of this program which is not the case today.

GRAIN HANDLING

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of grains and oilseeds.

As the minister knows the grain handling system in Canada is grinding to a halt. Elevators on the west coast, in Thunder Bay, and the river ports are filling up, if they are not full, and we have a real crisis on our hands.

I would like to ask the minister what action the government is taking to ensure that our customers, primarily Russia, are able to receive our grain that they have already purchased.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the member exaggerates considerably when he says that the grain system is grinding to a halt.

There is no question that we have a problem in the seaway and the St. Lawrence River, but there is space in the country elevator system. The west coast ports are likely to set a record this year. In fact, the grain is moving out of the country and we have the possibility of setting an over-all record for grain movement and exports for this crop year.

With regard to the Russians, I think there were erroneous press reports around last week. There have been no lost sales to the Russians because of their lack of ability to pay freight. We have extended considerable credit to the Russians to buy our grain, in fact on a per capita basis, more than any other country except Germany.

We think our credit facilities have been very good and the results are there because, as I said, over all we have the possibility of setting a record this year for grain movement.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

The minister should know that this week, CSL scrapped two of its lake boats as a direct result of the situation that exists. He should also know that both the U.S. and the Europeans, which are pumping grain into the Commonwealth of Independent Nations like they have never been before, are outdoing us and are also subsidizing the transportation from their country to the CIS.

Will the minister act today to find a solution so that we can get the grain moving again, and instead of putting people on UI they can be there moving the grain from farm gate to port?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, again there is a serious problem on the lakes. We know that over half of the Great Lakes fleet is tied up. In fact, the number of boats being tied up is increasing every day. There is a problem.

Let me say again that there have been no lost sales or shipment of grain to the Russians to date because of their inability to pay freight on Canadian grain purchased on Canadian credit. I am aware of what has been going on as far as the Americans are concerned. We are very competitive with the Americans.

I point out that we are the first country to sign a long-term grain sales agreement with the Russians. We did that back at the end of February when President Yeltsin was here. Again, the Wheat Board is dealing with Export Khleb on a continuing basis and has had very good results as far as sales commitments are concerned.

To suggest that we are going to solve all of our problems with the Russians by extending them credit for freight certainly is not going to solve all of their problems.

With regard to what we are doing, we are going to be meeting with the Great Lakes shippers in Winnipeg at the Wheat Board next week. We have also decided to convene some meetings with the shippers to see what we can do to address the over-all problems.

We do not find ourselves in the situation that the member raises.

CALGARY AIRPORT

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

When the Conference on North Atlantic Assembly was being held in Banff from May 14 to May 18, the international airport in Calgary was flying the flags of the participating nations, including the flag of the former Soviet Union and the old flag of communist Bulgaria.

I advised the manager of the airport that the Soviet Union has ceased to exist, that the flags of Ukraine, Byelorussia, Russia and the Baltic States should have been there and that the flag of the Soviet Union ceased to exist many months ago. The manager said that he did not receive orders from Ottawa to remove the flags. They are still there.

When is the minister going to order the airport management to remove those flags?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member took his complaint to the manager of the airport where it rightly belonged.

I was not aware that those flags were flying, but I will contact the manager.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Sixty per cent of women murdered in Ontario, we now know, are murdered by their partners. Obviously the Minister of Justice is aware that peace bonds and restraining orders are ineffective in protecting women in their homes.

Will the minister indicate to the House today what action plan the Government of Canada has to stem this tide of death and to replace what is clearly an outmoded procedure?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very good but somewhat complex question. She will know that the firearms legislation which was passed by the House contained a provision requiring the possibility of a prohibition order for firearms to be considered in all applications for bail or peace bond hearings, the hope being that firearms can be taken out of those very, very dangerous situations.

Arising out of the National Conference on Women, Law and the Administration of Justice in June 1991, there is a federal-provincial-territorial task force addressing the question of the workings of the system of the administration of justice with respect to women.

There is an action plan coming forward that will be presented to me and my provincial colleagues at our national meeting in October. We had hoped to meet in May. Many of my colleagues are involved in the constitutional discussions. That meeting is scheduled for October.

That will enable us to have included in our action plan the results of the interim report of the blue ribbon panel on violence against women. We are approaching this very serious question in a serious and systematic way.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments and I know her efforts are sincere, but we are in the position of this being an hour late and a dollar short.

Within the last month a woman in Sydney, N.S. applied for a peace bond and was told to return three weeks later for her hearing. Less than 48 hours later this woman was dead, allegedly at the hands of her estranged husband. We cannot wait until October. We cannot wait another few weeks.

When can the minister give us a response that will protect Canadian women in their homes as soon as possible?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if I thought there was a legislative initiative or a policy initiative that I could sponsor, I would do so immediately with, I know, the support of all members of this House.

A similar situation was brought to my attention some months ago by the Attorney General of Manitoba. What we are attempting to do is to raise the level of awareness and co-operation with all levels of government that have responsibility in this area through policing, through the prosecutorial function and through our efforts in judicial education, to try to make more widely known what that article or what the recent study has reflected, that is that the pathology of spousal assault is unique and must be dealt with on its own terms in the courts.

The bail laws are strong. They give the tools to the courts, but judges have to know what they are dealing with when they have certain kinds of applications brought before them. They must know the likelihood of reoffence and make their decisions with respect to restraining orders on that basis. We are working with our provincial colleagues and with those who have responsibility in the policing area to—

Mr. Speaker: We must move on.

MEDAL AWARD CEREMONY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): As you know, Mr. Speaker, I was in Cyprus last week where I experienced some exceptional moments with our Canadian soldiers.

My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. How could a special medal award ceremony for soldiers of the Royal Van Doos, a truly impressive occasion, be completely overlooked in this country? Why do the media choose to ignore these colourful ceremonies which would make us even prouder to be what we are?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Outremont was right to draw our attention to the important job being done by Canadians as peacekeepers, in Cyprus in this case. I understand he attended a medal award ceremony, a way to recognize the professionalism and dedication of our soldiers, and I think such ceremonies should be brought to the attention of all Canadians.

AIR TRANSPORTATION INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Transport.

Recently, Air Canada released a study on the air transportation industry in Canada. The study identified two basic options for the industry: first, the acquisition of Canadian Airlines International by foreign interests, and second, a merger of Canada's two airlines with foreign partners.

Which option does the government prefer, and what does it intend to do to promote that option?

[English]

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, indeed a report has been prepared and has been presented.

As the hon. member knows there are discussions being held with Canadian Airlines, with a partner. We have yet to be presented with a recommendation on that particular one. When we hear from that airline we will have more information on which to base our decision.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, everybody is quite aware of the developments that are occurring in the industry with great losses being suffered by both Canadian Airlines.

We now know that Canadian Airlines is close to a deal. We know that Air Canada is talking about a deal possibly including equity with U.S. Air.

When is the government going to take some action to give policy leadership on this important issue which confronts the Canadian airline industry?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the concerns of the airline industry and losses are not concentrated in Canada alone.

Indeed there are changes taking place in the airline industry around the world. Much of the losses that are being incurred are not through policy decisions but rather through changes in the economy and changes in flying patterns.

The airlines are private companies. They are making private company decisions. We as a government will work with them as best we can to make sure we have a healthy industry.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR NEW WESTMINSTER—BURNABY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

I believe the member for New Westminster—Burnaby made statements in the House today which were factually wrong. I would like to review the "blues" and speak to the House at the earliest date.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege. I remind the hon. member that statements that may be disagreed with may not necessarily be privilege, but I will certainly go along with the request of the hon. member to have a chance to look at Hansard and bring the matter back to the Chair.

PROGRESS REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I rise to report to the House of Commons on the Canada round, on the distance we have travelled on the road to constitutional renewal, and on the distance we must still go to succeed.

At the invitation of the Prime Minister during 19 days of meetings in seven cities across Canada, ministers and aboriginal leaders have met to find ways to move this country forward.

I believe we are closer than ever to healing the wounds that bind us, to keeping the country that unites us. The progress we have made is unprecedented.

We had set May 31 as a target to conclude, but in Toronto we agreed that we had come so far that we should continue. Our purpose is agreement on all aspects of the Canada round, and that goal is within reach. We agreed in Toronto to a pause to consult, to gain some perspective, to identify areas where compromise might occur.

We have all learned hard lessons from the past. We have realized that we cannot make Canada more inclusive unless the process to get there is inclusive as well. We have all realized that no single part of this country can move forward in isolation and that the Canada round is necessary not just in name but in substance. We have all realized that no single part of this country can move forward in isolation, that a Canada round is necessary not just in name but in substance. We have all realized that closing doors does not open minds. So we are discussing a wide range of issues today: equalization, a new Senate, a common market within Canada, a new relationship with aboriginal peoples.

Nothing is agreed yet. There will be no final agreement until there is full agreement on a full package of change. But we are on the way to real change.

I will not review in detail every issue we have discussed, but I want to report on the major issues. Although serious questions remain to be resolved, the progress we have made is without parallel in the constitutional history of Canada. The glass is much more than half full.

[Translation]

First, we have reached consensus on ways to make Canadian federalism more flexible and more effective. That includes explicit recognition of exclusive provincial jurisdiction in eight areas that we believe are best handled locally—forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, and municipal and urban affairs, labour market training, culture.

In the special case of culture, the Constitution would also explicitly affirm that the federal government would maintain national cultural institutions and granting programs. Any federal-provincial agreements in these areas, and in immigration, could be protected by the Constitution and thereby shielded from unilateral change.

That would also be the case for agreements respecting regional development. Powers made available to any one province would be available to all. The Constitution would constrain the federal government from using its spending power in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

If provinces want to opt out of new national shared-cost programs, they could do so, with compensation, if they undertake programs compatible with national objectives.

The Constitution would protect Canada's transfer payments from unilateral change. The commitment to national economic infrastructure and regional development to reduce disparities would be strengthened. There would be a requirement of regular consultation on equalization.

[English]

The fundamental objectives of the Canadian social and economic union would be entrenched in the Constitution. These would include social services, education, protection of the environment, the goal of full employment, of a reasonable standard of living, and a commitment to strengthen the Canadian economic union through the free movement of persons, goods, services and capital.

There is agreement to repeal the federal power of disallowance and to limit the federal declaratory power.

Second, there is consensus on a new, more inclusive vision of the country.

We have agreed on a Canada clause that would guide the courts in interpreting the Constitution, a declaration of the fundamental features of this country, of Quebec's distinctiveness, of Canada's linguistic duality, of aboriginal rights and responsibilities, including a new third order of government, of our democratic values, of the equality of women and men, of cultures and races, of the provinces in this federation.

We are recognizing the distinct society of Quebec and ensuring that provincial governments have the means to express their identity and goals.

We have agreed to open a new partnership with the aboriginal peoples of Canada, based upon a mutual respect that involves the recognition of their inherent right to self-government within Canada. That idea is not new. The Iroquois Confederacy and other aboriginal governments practised forms of democracy here before most European countries did.

Nor should the idea cause alarm. There are forms of aboriginal self-government now in Canada and they work better than the colonial systems which have created such despondency and such despair among Canadian aboriginals. The difference is that now those governments would be rooted in the Constitution.

The right would not be contingent, nor delayed. It is agreed that all parties would choose to wait three full years before that right was taken to court. That would give everyone time to begin to agree on what self-government would mean in particular communities, and to agree on what it would not mean. This three-year period ensures that the definitions can be worked out by agreement, by negotiation, not by the courts.

Existing provincial and federal laws would continue to apply until aboriginal governments have the authority to adopt new regimes which would operate within the Canadian system but would reflect aboriginal reality. The charter of rights would apply as it does to provinces.

Existing treaty rights would be protected and interpreted in a manner that is just, broad and liberal, taking into account their spirit and intent.

There have also been undertakings by the provinces with respect to land and the maintenance and services that would allow the federal government to include all aboriginal peoples, including the Métis, in section 91(24) of the Constitution.

Third, we are well on the way to improving substantially the national and federal institutions of Canada.

The Constitution would finally entrench the composition of the Supreme Court, including three civil law judges from Quebec. The appointment of Supreme Court judges would be based on lists submitted by the provinces.

First Ministers' Conferences would be strengthened as instruments of Canadian co-operation and the Constitution would require an annual meeting of Heads of Government.

On the Senate, we have not yet settled the basic questions of the basis on which the Senate is chosen, or its powers. But a great deal is agreed. Senators would be directly elected. A system of proportional representation would be defined by Parliament to ensure that the Senate would fully reflect the diversity of Canada. The new Senate would ratify federal appointments or reject them. It would have a 30-day suspensive veto over supply bills.

There would be guaranteed representation for aboriginal Canadians. On issues of French language or culture, a double-majority rule would apply.

[English]

On all of these issues there is broad agreement on the principles and on the essence of the proposals. In many areas exact legal text has been agreed word by word, line by line.

The work of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee has been an invaluable guide in our discussions. In many cases the specific language has been borrowed. Where we adopted a different approach, for example, in describing the jurisdiction of the provinces, I believe there was agreement among the federalist parties whose unanimity gave such authority to the report of Parliament.

There has been extraordinary agreement. But it could all come to nothing because these discussions are not about one item and not about one agenda. This is a Canada round and we need agreement on the whole if we are to have agreement on any parts.

A question of critical importance to Canada is our ability to have the kind of common market in our country that has allowed Europe to offer such tangible benefits to its citizens. When Canada was formed trade was in goods, and the barriers to that trade were brought down by the original Confederation agreement. In that same nation-building spirit we must reduce Canada's own barriers to the free movement of people, capital, services and goods.

Two other major issues stand out: the Senate and the constitutional amending formula for changes to national institutions. I do not believe we can reach agreement on either unless we reach agreement on both. I am confident we can. But that will require flexibility and vision on the part of everyone who wants this country to continue and succeed.

Three Senate models are being considered: equal representation of provinces; equal representation of regions; and equitable representation. All models share the principle that a new Senate must be much more broadly based. All models have aspects that commend them to serious consideration by provincial and federal governments. Each model obviously presents difficulties for others.

Those who argue the absolute equality of provinces put that forward as a principle of a federation, equal in importance to the principle of representation by population. Not everyone agrees and there is equally genuine concern about a reform that would allow six provinces representing 17 per cent of the population to stop or to appreciably delay decisions of a democratically elected House of Commons.

The federal government has said that if there is a consensus in the country on a particular model we could accept that model. However, if it were to be composed on the basis of the equality of provinces its powers must be much more limited than if it were more broadly based.

We need a system that represents the different parts of Canada better but we also need a system that works, reforms that will improve government, not prevent it.

In Toronto I put forward some views on the powers I saw as being appropriately associated with the different models under discussion. I hope this may provide some basis for agreement. So far there is no consensus on the model or the powers of a new Senate.

We must find a consensus or this whole Canada round will fail. Everyone has agreed on Senate reform. The question is whether provinces who have hard positions now are prepared to find some way to agree and to make the Canada round whole.

I believe that if we can find an acceptable model for the Senate we can find agreement on an amending formula.

Sometimes we might wish that we were a simple country: one language, one culture, one clear identity. But that is not who we are and has not been for centuries. We are a complex, accomplished society, whose success depends on our respect for ourselves and our respect for others. If that mutual respect was important in the past, it is even more essential in the modern world in which we must co-operate and compete.

These present constitutional issues are of crucial importance to Quebecers who must decide whether to stay in Canada or not. They are of crucial importance to aboriginal Canadians who have been left outside longer than anyone else. And they are for western Canadians who have felt shut out of national decisions.

We all understand that the only way to achieve our goals is to achieve them all together. But there is more to it than that. Issues which interest Quebec are of profound importance to every other Canadian because if Quebec rejects Canada in October, every Canadian will suffer, materially and for generations.

Aboriginal issues are of profound importance to Quebec because if we can establish an acceptable framework for self-government that can lead to greater certainty for Quebec and more harmony in pursuit of the goals of Quebec.

Institutions which give Canadians a sense of belonging to their country strengthen the whole country. We need each other after the Constitution too, and the respect we show each other now will make it easier for us to make progress together later.

• (1520)

Generosity is not a luxury in Canada. It is what keeps us together as a community, just as the absence of generosity could break us into bitter pieces.

I am encouraged by the sense of generosity I have found around the constitutional table, in this House and in this country. Our real challenge now is to find the ingenuity and the generosity to make the Canada round work and to make Canada work.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I would first like to thank the minister for his statement in the House today.

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and all Liberal members and senators, I can assure him that we hope for a resolution of the constitutional impasse. We support him without reservation in his efforts on behalf of the government to bring the provincial and federal governments to agree on a series of proposals that could break the constitutional deadlock.

Of course we on this side of the House are watching him with some trepidation and even impatience. It is still good to keep in mind that back in April 1991 the Leader of the Opposition and leader of the Liberal Party of Canada submitted not only a procedure for resolving the constitutional impasse but also a nine-point program that the Liberals thought would settle the constitutional issue fairly and equitably.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: We are very pleased on hearing the report that the minister just gave us to see today that considerable progress has been made and that almost all of the nine suggestions made by the Liberal Party of Canada were accepted not only by the government but by all the provincial representatives who negotiated with the minister in recent weeks.

Nevertheless, I would like to draw the minister's attention to some points that we consider absolutely fundamental. I will quote what the minister himself said in his speech a few minutes ago: "The constitutional developments now under way are of the utmost importance for Quebecers. Secondly, they are also very important for native people, who have felt excluded for a very long time, and finally for westerners who also feel left out of national decisions".

If you allow me I will return briefly to each of these three points. We Liberals believe that it is absolutely essential in this constitutional round to give Quebec back its veto on constitutional issues and amendments. That is why we proposed a constitutional amending formula that would ensure a veto for the government and people of Quebec.

We think that the minister will have failed in the discussions now going on if he is unable to convince all his provincial discussion partners of the absolute necessity of an amending formula that guarantees a veto for Quebec.

Secondly, we want to recall—

[English]

It is absolutely essential that it be fully understood, as this round cannot only be a Quebec round but ought to be a Canada round, that we do something for the aboriginal people.

I heard the minister saying here today, and I will quote him again: "We have agreed to open a new partnership with the aboriginal people of Canada based on a mutual respect that involves the recognition of their inherent right to self-government within Canada". Then he went on to say: "That idea is not new, nor should the idea cause alarm".

It is quite clear that the Liberals profoundly believe the time has come to recognize the aboriginal right of self-government within our Constitution. For us, there is no alarm. We are very concerned when on the one hand we see the minister speaking and being very open and generous in order to achieve this and on the other hand we see his colleague, the minister of health, on TV making all kinds of difficulties or so-called difficulties about this very simple fact that ought to be part of this current negotiation round.

We are hopeful that every Canadian from every political party and every level of government will be generous enough to understand and accept the wording that has been put in the Beaudoin-Dobbie reports in relation to aboriginal issues.

Finally, the third component of what we think is essential as part of the Canada round is a tangible progress in reforming the Senate in a way that would be satisfactory to the legitimate aspirations of westerners and people of less populated provinces, who think that the overwhelming representation of Ontario and Quebec in the House of Commons makes them a smaller part of the decision process in Ottawa.

We Liberals believe that there ought to be a reform of the Senate that will allow a better representation, if not in the House of Commons then certainly in the Senate, in order to meet these legitimate aspirations of these provinces.

I want to be quite clear that the Liberal Party, under its leader, has made a series of suggestions regarding the Senate. We made these suggestions thinking that the west and the Atlantic provinces would be well served by this. In the Beaudoin-Dobbie report we dissent in relation to the Senate because we felt that the level of representation could be improved on what was suggested by the government and more particularly we felt that if we are talking of an elected Senate and a more equitable Senate, it ought to be an effective Senate also.

We felt that the proposal of the government was not going far enough in the directions of an effective Senate. Frankly, we are not afraid that the House of Commons would be paralyzed because there would be a more effective Senate.

We believe that if there is a certain price to pay in order to meet the legitimate aspirations of westerners and Atlantic Canadians it ought to be paid.

We are saying that the minister ought to work diligently to convince the representative of the provinces who are meeting with him that they have to give a veto to Quebec on the amending formula. He has also to convince his counterpart to respond in a positive fashion to a reformed Senate which seems to be needed and desired by the Atlantic provinces and the western provinces.

Finally, for everyone to win in this constitutional round we think it is essential for the Government of Canada to clarify its spending power and a new, more efficient, and functional distribution of powers to the federal and provincial governments and also to strengthen the federal government's position in the economic field.

While we want this constitutional round to please Atlantic Canadians, Quebecers, Ontarians, and westerners, there must also be something for those who believe in a strong and effective central government for Canada. We think that depends on strengthening section 121 of the Constitution.

We were pleased with what the minister said about this desire to ensure greater freedom for the movement of goods, people, services and capital in Canada and we want to tell him that we support this effort to ensure that Canada is really a common market and that the Liberal Party of Canada will always fully support his efforts to convince the provincial representatives to accept constitutional changes to strengthen Canada's economic union.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the minister that he is entering the crucial phase of negotiations, as he himself knows. Obviously, unanimity would be the best outcome. Of course a unanimous position of the federal government and all the provinces on a set of proposals would be the best of all worlds, but it certainly will not be easy to achieve or even possible.

I would like to quote an article that appeared on May 30 in La Presse. Journalist Marcel Adam wrote that Meech failed because of the unanimity requirement:

> That is why Brian Mulroney promised in February to come up with a plan that all provinces would support.
> "I do not want nine tenths of an agreement," he emphasized. "I do not want two thirds of an agreement; I want all provinces to sign—"

That is what the Prime Minister of Canada said.

Mr. Adam continued:

> Believe me, that statement was heard by all the premiers, who will make a point of reminding him of it when the time comes.

Mr. Adam concluded his article by saying:

> If my analysis is correct, the present process will fail for the same reason as Meech: the sacrosanct principle of unanimity.

I think it is very important that we understand why the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada suggested quite a while ago that we had a national referendum to make sure we are not dragged down by provincial Premiers who in their talks and discussions with the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Prime Minister of Canada will always try to get more. They will want this or object to that on the basis that it might not be popular in their province.

But at the present time the Canadian interest is paramount. If we can satisfy the legitimate demands of Quebec, the demands of native peoples, and the demands regarding an effective, equitable and elected Senate, I say to the Minister: "In the end, if you are unable to get unanimity, trust the population of Canada, organize your referendum and you will win it".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: It seems certain to us that we can get a majority in the four main regions of the country in favour of a constitutional reform which serves the best interest of Canada as a whole.

We say to the minister: "Good luck. You are entering the final phase of the negotiations; you must succeed. We are behind you, but beware, nothing must be perceived as a gain for some at the expense of others". In this constitutional round, all Canadians, no matter where they live, must be winners.

We believe that if you have a set of proposals which has the support of a majority of premiers, most of the population, including that of Quebec, will vote in a referendum in favour of a renewed Canada, a Canada which would say yes to Quebec and which will let Quebecers say yes to Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, first of all I welcome the minister back to the House. I congratulate him on both his endurance and his patience throughout this process. He has been working very hard at it and I think we owe him a debt of gratitude for the work he has put into this particular issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nystrom: The most important thing as we continue into the final phases of the Canada round is keeping this country united and getting Canadians marching in the same direction once again.

I am pleased from what I have found out about the negotiations to note the state of play to date in terms of what is being tentatively agreed upon. As the minister said there is no agreement until the final negotiations are completed, but the state of play to date reflects a great deal of what we agreed in this House on the Beaudoin—Dobbie report.

I am very pleased with that because as the minister said to have an inclusive Canada round we must have an inclusive process. Let us turn to what the three parties did in terms of the Beaudoin—Dobbie committee. We had public hearings. We had six national conferences. We involved Canadians in these mini-constituent assemblies across this country. We had long and hard negotiations between the parties. We put aside our political labels. We stood up for Canada and came up with a report that is reflective of what the Canadian people want.

I say today that I am pleased to see that the provinces in the main are listening very carefully to what the Canadian people had to say. I hope later on when the premiers become involved that they too will keep an eye on public opinion and an eye on what the three parties said in the Beaudoin—Dobbie report. I think it is very important.

To date we see in the discussions held across the country some positive news for the aboriginal people of this country. We see an agreement now by all the provinces participating, plus the aboriginal people in the territories, and the federal government, to recognize the inherent right to self-government of aboriginal people. This is long overdue. It is finally going to happen. It is about time in terms of doing justice to our aboriginal people.

[Translation]

As regards the province of Quebec, I think that people everywhere in the country feel that Quebec is different, that it is not at all a province like the others. It is truly a unique and distinct society. Now there is agreement, and that includes Mr. Clyde Wells from Newfoundland, to enshrine the distinct society clause in the Canadian Constitution. There is also a consensus across the country to reform the Supreme Court of Canada in order to amend the Canadian Constitution and allow three civil law judges from Quebec, as well as six common law judges.

It is important for Quebec to protect its unique society, to protect a province which is different and which constitutes a minority not only in Canada but also in North America.

[English]

There has been progressive movement in terms of regional fairness, in terms of regional development and in terms of protecting transfer payments to the provinces from being unilaterally ended by the federal government in the future. There has been progress made in terms of strengthening section 36 of the Constitution, the section on equalization that is so important to six or seven of the provinces including my home province of Saskatchewan.

In terms of the new idea of a social covenant or of an economic union, I am pleased the governments have agreed with a report we made in this House on the details of what should go into a social covenant: the protection of medical care, higher education, primary education, the environment, the right of workers to collective bargaining, and the importance of things like full employment in Canada, decent housing, and a decent standard of living for all Canadians regardless of where they live in this country.

It is the same in terms of minorities and openness: to have some positive changes for minorities, visible and other minorities in Canada——and also a change in the Canadian Constitution for linguistic minorities, French speaking and English speaking ones across Canada.

[English]

Then we have the Senate. We in the committee probably wrestled more with the Senate issue than any other. I am not surprised the minister is having problems with the Senate issue when he meets with his counterparts across the country.

This is indeed the most important issue, next to perhaps the division of powers, but certainly a very difficult issue to settle in terms of trying to get a compromise and a consensus in the country.

Substantive progress has been made. We now have, for example, agreement all around to have an elected Senate, progress after over a hundred years. We have a very important agreement to have the Senate elected by proportional representation, something that I would not have predicted six or seven months ago would be agreed to by not only the three national political parties but all the provinces, the aboriginal people and the territories.

With proportional representation we can have a Senate where we can achieve the important goals and objectives of gender parity and representation of minorities, a House that reflects the diversity of this country more than we have today in the House of Commons or indeed in the appointed Senate. Very important progress has been made on the Senate issue.

For the aboriginal people we have agreement now to have aboriginal representation in the Senate. Even three months ago we did not have that agreement. The three parties said in our report that we would recommend aboriginal representation in the Senate if the aboriginal people agreed. At that time there was no consensus in their community. Now there must be a consensus because the aboriginal people have agreed that they should have aboriginal representation in the Senate, again very good progress. There has also been some progress in terms of Senate powers. Again I think it is very important.

Finally, in terms of the substantive matters we have on the table to settle the whole issue of whether or not the Senate should be equal or the Senate should be equitable. Tied into that is the amending formula in terms of how we should reform the Constitution in the future.

In terms of the amending formula we have a couple of new ideas on the table. One was proposed by Saskatchewan which would give Quebec and Ontario, the big provinces, and a combination of smaller provinces a veto namely seven provinces representing 85 per cent of the population. This is something we did not have that is worth considering.

We have another idea that is new for the Northwest Territories. Again it is worth considering in terms of the amending formula.

The important matter that will have to be resolved—and this is why I am glad there is a pause this week where people can go back and reflect—is whether the Senate should be equal or equitable.

In the House we have given some pretty clear directions to the minister that we believe the model should be one of greater equity between the provinces.

We have notionally the idea that we have five regions in the country, each with around 20 per cent of the senators. That would give the small provinces a lot more representation and a lot more clout compared to what they have now. That is the important issue. When we talk about whether it is equitable or equal in the Senate it leads directly to the powers of the Senate. Those two things have to be worked out over the few weeks that lie ahead.

There are one or two other things I want to say. I would like to say to Robert Bourassa, the premier of Quebec, that the rest of Canada has shown its good will. The rest of Canada has gone a considerable distance. The rest of Canada has made some very substantive progress. The time has come very soon when the premier of Quebec should come back to the bargaining table and have some input on behalf of the people of his province.

Madam Speaker, I know that it was difficult following the failure of Meech Lake. However, I also think that the rest of the country is now acting in good faith. We feel that we have the necessary flexibility to make arrangements, not only for Quebecers but also for the aboriginal peoples, the rest of the country, the smaller provinces, and everybody because this is truly a Canada Round.

Given this good faith, it is time for Mr. Bourassa to act. It is time to go back to the negotiation table to represent the population of Quebec. Now is the time to act.

[English]

In conclusion, we have a great country. Canadian people are now saying to those of us who are politicians that the time has come to negotiate the deal. The time has come to make the accommodation. The time has come to make the arrangement and to settle the constitutional issue in the next few weeks and put this issue behind us so that in a few months' time we can get back to dealing with the real issues which are issues of hunger, employment, jobs and the recession, real issues that real people face.

Mr. Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I know that this House prides itself on recognizing the right to a dissenting opinion and to freedom of expression. Consequently, I request the unanimous consent of the House so that we can also acknowledge this admission of defeat that was just made by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member knows that Standing Order 33(1) provides that only a member from each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon. However, the House can govern its own business and it can give its unanimous consent to give the floor to another member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, during the speech made by the Liberal party member, the hon. member for Beauséjour and leader of that party told the leader of the Bloc Quebecois to shut up.

An hon. member: "Shut up."

Mr. Plamondon: Should the member retract his comments? Should he have to retract or will you make your decision later on?

• (1550)

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford might be kind enough to allow me to answer one point of order at a time.

Mr. Lapierre: It is on the same point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If it is on the same point of order, I apologize. The hon. member for Shefford has the floor.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I was indeed very upset by those comments. I was hurt by the member for Beauséjour and I hope that he will retract.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the two members for having drawn my attention to that incident. We will check Hansard and make the appropriate decision.

PETITIONS

RED SUCKER LAKE SCHOOL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the Red Sucker Lake community, which had its first school built in 1957.

Whereas this school is in deplorable structural condition and, in fact, was closed by both the community and an inspector from Labour Canada on May 11, 1992 due to safety concerns, and whereas the school has been scheduled for replacement in 1992–93 but this has been postponed for a number of years, and whereas the situation is extremely urgent and of public importance, we the undersigned, which is almost the entire population of Red Sucker Lake, call upon Parliament to request the federal government to consider priorizing the replacement of the Red Sucker Lake school for immediate replacement.

May I just add a word to say that this issue is really pressing and urgent. The children are losing their school year. It is completely deplorable that in this century we have this deplorable situation at the Red Sucker Lake school.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present to the House a petition signed by a number of my constituents living in the Arden area, situated in my riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

These petitioners are supporting the government's commitment as stated in the Speech from the Throne May 13, 1991, to pass legislation which could permit a national referendum on the Constitution.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to table before the House two petitions signed by Canadians from across this country opposed to the government's decision to terminate the Court Challenges Program.

They call upon the Government of Canada to rescind this particular decision and reinstate the Court Challenges Program which has been of benefit to many Canadians across this country in challenging the various laws in this country.

FEDERAL ELECTION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I too have the honour and duty to present a petition to this House signed by a number of Hamiltonians.

The petitioners say that whereas the opinion polls continually and consistently reflect mass dissatisfaction with this current government and that the Prime Minister has not listened to the people of Canada, and that since there is no provision for an impeachment process, they are asking Parliament to hold a free vote of confidence so that individual members of Parliament can vote according to the wishes of their constituents and force an election.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too pursuant to Standing Order 36 am privileged to present a petition on behalf of some 176 constituents of Winnipeg North. They are concerned about the Government of Canada terminating the federal co-operative housing program and pray that Parliament urge the government to immediately reinstate the federal co-op housing program and commit the $6.5 million to the program which had been planned for 1992 and to permit approximately 2,000 co-op housing units to be sponsored this year.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I have four petitions with many, many names on co-op housing calling upon the federal government to reinstate that program and also to commit the $6.1 million to the program to permit approximately 2,000 co-op housing units to be sponsored this year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I have another petition calling upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Today, the hon. member for Shefford, and yesterday, the hon. member for Saint-Hubert seemed to be against allowing the questions to stand. If either one has a numbered question, and I am obviously referring to a question under their name, and wants to know at what stage the answer is, I am convinced that the hon. parliamentary secretary will be pleased to reply.

Since there does not seem to be any particular question, all will therefore be allowed to stand.

[English]

Are there any Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, yesterday I gave notice of a motion for production of certain papers. I know it would not be appropriate for the parliamentary secretary to have ready today the papers which I am requesting. I wonder if he would take it under advisement to see whether or not he could produce those papers for next week.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I have heard the hon. member's request. I have no idea if what he is asking is reasonable or not. He is a reasonable man so I will take it on the face of it and will determine whether or not it is a reasonable request and respond accordingly.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's request is on notice. It might be unreasonable to ask that it be produced today.

Before proceeding to Orders of the Day, I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b) because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 45 minutes and we will continue until 7.45 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REFERENDUM ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-81

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I move pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-81, "An Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada"; not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That, 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the allotted day to the report stage consideration and on the allotted day to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

• (1600)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Boyer: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I wanted to mention to you that I was present for the vote but abstained on the vote for time allocation.

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A number of members who were not present earlier might not realize that because of ministerial statements the bell is expected to ring at about 7.30 p.m. tonight, with the vote to commence at 7.45 p.m. I thought it might be important to put that on the record.

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 2, 1992 consideration of Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is very difficult for the Chair to hear what is going on on the floor. The hon. member for Churchill was seeking the floor on point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, to assist members of the House, especially later on tonight, I would give notice that I will not move the motions standing in my name, Motions No. 14, 15, 17, 19, 23 and 47.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. The Table has taken notice and any member who would like to have those numbers written can come to the table.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, once the motions are before the House and the member decides not to move them himself, can another member do so on his behalf? Can he withdraw them without unanimous consent? I really would like to know.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A motion is before the House as soon as the Chair presents the motion to the House. If the hon. member decides not to move his motions, obviously the Chair will not present them. This means the motions bearing the numbers mentioned by the hon. member for Churchill will not be before the House.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu, on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: These motions were presented to the House at the report stage and they therefore belong to the House. To withdraw them would require unanimous consent. We have had a similar situation already.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, these motions were not presented to the House. Notice was given that these motions would be presented, but the notice may be withdrawn, which is what happened. As a result, the motions cannot be presented in the House again.

Mr. Plamondon: On the second point raised by my leader, can someone else—

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a moment. Order, please. It is impossible for the Chair to hear a member talking from the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, my question concerns the second point raised by our leader, which was whether another member can present them, since they are already on the Order Paper.

Madam Deputy Speaker: For another member to present motions that were withdrawn would require the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Plamondon: Mindful of the great democratic virtues of the people around us, I wish to seek unanimous consent for a vote on these motions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: You would first need the consent of the hon. member for Churchill.

• (1650)

[English]

Mr. Murphy: No, Madam Speaker. I introduced 25 amendments in the time period that was allocated. After looking at the entire package of amendments, comparing them with the motions of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville and looking at what the government itself has presented, I thought that these six particular motions were not necessary. I still have a number of motions on the floor which we will be forcing votes on.

I think the hon. members of the Bloc will have all the opportunity they wish to vote later on tonight.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I was reluctant to get up to debate this particular set of motions because there was not much that I needed to say on them, but I felt in light of the proceedings in the House yesterday it was incumbent on me to get up and explain to the public what has been going on in this place in relation to the proceedings on this bill.

[Translation]

What we saw yesterday, Madam Speaker, was an attempt by members of the Bloc Quebecois to kill this bill. They brought in all their members to make ten-minute speeches on every amendment moved in the House by the other members. It's a big change to see all these members here, and I am delighted to see them I must say. But yesterday they were here for the sole purpose to kill this bill and to obstruct the proceedings of this House and I think that should be said, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have a point of order. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is interpreting the perfectly democratic approach taken by our members as an attempt to obstruct the proceedings of this House. I know you will not accept this inference when members are merely exercising their rights which it is your duty to protect.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows perfectly well this is not a point of order. However, perhaps I should remind the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—

—he may have been impugning motives. I would be grateful if he would come back to the substance of the motions in front of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I was trying to explain my reasons for taking part in this debate, and I made it clear that I would not have done so if we had not had all these speeches yesterday by members of the Bloc Quebecois. I did not make good speeches, Madam Speaker, but I spoke just the same.

It is clear that this party, the Bloc Quebecois, is out to destroy this country as it is today, to divide it. The referendum proposed under this bill runs contrary to their aims because the bill will allow all Canadians to vote on a question concerning the Constitution.

[English]

For that reason, Madam Speaker, these members have sought to deprive Canadians across this country of their right to vote and they are prepared to block this bill in order to do it.

Their votes will not block it. They know that because the government has a big majority and some support elsewhere, but they feel that they can obstruct it in this House. What we saw yesterday was a parade of speakers designed to bring this bill to a standstill in the House. It has prevented our members from getting on with debates on the motions that we would like to debate.

You only have to look at the debate that went on yesterday on the first clause because it was on the title of the bill, for heaven's sake, and everybody had something to say on the title. When does that ever happen? Never. It is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous.

What we want to do now is participate in this debate today so that we can put our views on the record with respect to these amendments and this bill and we are going to be deprived of much opportunity because the government, in order to deal with the obstruction, has had to bring in this guillotine and apply time allocation again.

I will come back to that in a moment because I would like to talk about the role of the New Democratic Party in all this. Its members were willing participants. Last night they obstructed this House in allowing us to sit late so that members could continue to speak to these amendments and allow the various amendments at report stage to be debated.

Mr. Whittaker: What are you doing now? You are obstructing the bill.

Mr. Milliken: I am explaining why I am speaking on this debate and the hon. member knows it.

What the New Democratic Party did was say it will not sit late. Its members all stood up and objected when the question was put last night to continue the hours of sitting.

Why did they do that? Because they are not democratic. Remember the Federal Democratic Republic in Germany, the FDR? Remember that? Why was it called a democratic republic when it was a communist dictatorship? Because it was trying to cover up its anti-democratic values, that is why. It was trying to pretend it was something it was not.

The New Democratic Party is involved in the same exercise. Those members do not want the people of Canada to have a vote on this issue. They do not want Canadians to express their views in a referendum. They want to tell Canadians what is good for them and jam it down their throats.

We in the Liberal Party do not take that view. I am sorry to make this partisan but we are being deprived of our rights to address this bill in this House because of the tactics, the partisan tactics, of the other parties in this House.

We have played easy and co-operative on this and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader knows that. We worked with him in the committee to get the amendments to this bill. We have agreed to some amendments. We would like more, and we have moved more here that we would like to debate today, but we are going to be deprived of that opportunity because of the government's guillotine and the Bloc's obstruction and the unwillingness of the New Democratic Party to debate late last night.

That is what is depriving us of an opportunity to carry on a reasonable debate on this bill.

We have fault down on one side. We have fault down on another side. Now let us look at the government's hand in all this.

Here we have a government saying it wants to save the country. What a sudden revelation that was to this group because if the government is intending to save the country it would have brought this bill in months and months ago when the Leader of the Opposition stood in this House and asked it to do it. He had a deal with the government House leader to bring this bill in months ago and the government House leader dilly-dallied.

The Quebec caucus on the other side went to the minister of constitutional affairs and got it stopped. That is why this bill was not dealt with months and months ago. Instead the government House leader in his usual dictatorial and bully-boy fashion came waltzing into this House one day and said: "Here is the bill. Pass it".

Here we are debating this bill today, three days of debate on second reading, jammed into committee, three sitting days in the committee with closure threatened on the Thursday night so we walked out.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader moved a closure motion in committee, for heaven's sake. We walked out but got the committee going again Wednesday because of co-operation on our part and a willingness to get on with the job and do it properly.

It was all done on Tuesday which was faster than the government expected anyway because we were so co-operative. We allowed votes. We carried on. We lost a lot of votes but we carried on and we got the job done.

Now we are back here and we are going to have two days of debate on report stage with 65 amendments and one day of debate at third reading. This on a bill to save the country.

You would think the government would allow this House to have a reasonable debate on this issue. Instead it clamps down at every turn. The Bloc in its hypocritical way is nodding "yes, yes" and its members are the ones who caused this particular move on the part of the government.

I can sympathize at least with the bully-boy tactics of the government when I look at what went on in this House yesterday. I can sympathize. I do not agree. I think it is wicked and I think the government should be ashamed of itself for putting itself in this place, but had it brought this bill in before, had it brought it in in a timely way, it would not be in this jam today.

It is its own fault. It was promised in the throne speech a year ago, April as I recall was the date of that throne speech. Here it is a year later and the government is finally bringing the thing in and in its usual bully-boy way is saying, "Pass the bill now, or else".

That is what the country is faced with. That is this government's notion of saving Canada. That is its notion of preserving national unity and doing all it can to save the country.

For the government House leader to try to bully us the way he has the last two weeks is an example the most shocking abuse.

• (1700)

He is trying to blame the Liberals, who have co-operated throughout on this bill, with everything that has gone wrong. They are trying to blame the Liberal Party of Canada for failing to co-operate when this party has, in fact, co-operated significantly on this bill. We have suggested sensible amendments and we have other sensible amendments that are being rejected. We will accept that and we are willing to have a fairly limited debate and have a vote. We indicated our willingness to do all that.

However, the government House leader is trying to suggest that it is our fault that the country is in this mess when we urged the government six, eight, ten months ago to bring this bill in and get on with it.

I cannot understand the approach of the government House leader. Unfortunately, he has been a real bully-boy throughout this exercise. It is shocking.

Mr. Gauthier: It is a disgrace.

Mr. Milliken: It is a disgrace. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is right. The government House leader should be ashamed of himself.

Another thing I would mention is his inattentiveness to this debate. He has not sat in on this debate in this House for five minutes since his own speech on the opening of the debate. He got up and left right after that speech. He did not even have the courtesy to stay and listen to the leading speeches from members of the opposition at that time. That is contempt of Parliament. The government House leader has an obligation, especially as an officer of the House, to remain in the Chamber and listen to the debate, particularly on his own bill. This was his bill. He had a duty to be here.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says order. He should go and speak to the government House leader and say, "Do your job and get into the House". That is where he should be.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Milliken: He should be in this House defending this terrible legislation and allowing votes and debate on every amendment that has been proposed by the members of this House, 65 amendments and only a handful will be debated.

I see that my time is about to expire. I am sorry that is the case. I could go on at length on this bill. I have a lot of things I would like to say about these amendments. However, I will bow to the Chair's position and I will sit down.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I want to participate although I know time is limited under the rules. I believe it is ten minutes at this stage.

I want to compliment the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on most of what he said. I was very interested in what he said and I am glad he finally said it. Madam Speaker, you have been in the chair for a good part of the day, the majority of the day. I have been sitting here in the House for the days it has gone on. I got from the table and from the committee clerk the time involved in Bill C–81 in terms of second reading 16.5 hours, about two and a half days. Second reading was two and a half days. Here we are with allocation of time so that at 7.30 p.m. tonight the bells will start to ring for 15 minutes and then we vote on a multitude of amendments. The 64 have been consolidated in either 40 or 23, depending on who you speak to.

The thing is passing strange. We are debating the referendum bill on the Constitution of Canada. We had a statement from the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs this afternoon, thank goodness, and the loyal opposition spokesperson and the NDP spokesperson. They, at least, were elevating the debate in terms of their participation.

As an independent member who used to belong in the government party, I had the fundamental problem on the Constitution with the government party. We are debating the referendum bill that is giving the government, correctly, a vehicle or a tool to put many serious questions to the Canadian people and take it out of the hands of the leaders of the land who have not been able to define the consensus and I do not think they are going to be able to define the consensus.

I watched Premier Bourassa last night on television pretending that the Senate problem was going to keep him away from the bargaining table. I have partial sympathy for that chameleon of political science, the premier of Quebec. I can sympathize that he may not want to get involved in the federal–provincial negotiations now with some of the apparent agreements in principle with no legal text. Therefore, blame it on the Senate. Who wants the Senate—an appointed body that is an anachronism of history and has no place in a democratic elected system?

This may be the hang–up people are pretending it is. Frankly, for Premier Bourassa it is one of the double ironies in the world. He stayed away from the bargaining. I can understand his post–Meech hangover, or post–Meech depression. There was a depression across the country because things had been whipped up in the country, whipped up with a lot of intellectual dishonesty that never should have happened. It was one of the problems I had to face and I finally walked.

Having had the problems, having had the initial backing off and understanding in part—I am very open on this, but I am also a very practical politician—I can see politicians in several parties and/or perhaps the premier of Quebec using the dead Senate issue. I say the Senate is dead until it gets some credibility and if you are going to have it, it has to be elected, I agree with that.

Then we get into all the processes, all the definitions of what we give it, power, and how do you have it elected, and is it equal, is it equitable, and/or regional.

Let us go back to the beginning. Let us eliminate the Senate and give the people a chance to vote as to whether they even want a Senate. The NDP used to be a party proud of at least standing for some principle in reform and it was abolition of the Senate. I do not agree with the objectives of my colleagues the Parti Quebeçois but I do give them credit. I am totally against what they want but at least they speak with some conviction on what they want.

We have been in this debate and I agree it has been shortened. I understand the government's problem, but frankly, all members, without obstruction, should have a chance to speak on this issue which is fundamental to the core of the nation. Here we are with an allocation order that is going to terminate tonight and then a third reading tomorrow and we have not had a leader of the three national parties speak in this debate.

With the greatest respect for the House of Commons, having been here longer than most members in the House, this is a terrible insult to the whole history and tradition.

John Diefenbaker would be rolling over in his grave to know we are going to discuss the potential referendum to try and resolve impasse on constitutional discussions. We have not had a national leader participate in this debate. We have had two allocation orders already, one on second reading and now one on report stage.

There are fundamental things. I have listened to the hon. minister for intergovernmental affairs this afternoon and I give him credit. He has brought civility, calm, and patience, patience that frankly is starting to be a yoke around his neck in these delicate discussions as they have had them from coast to coast for months.

We all know the reality and there is now an impasse there and some are blaming it on the Senate, some are blaming it on something else. It is easy to blame the Senate.

Even the NDP spokesman yesterday talked about the mechanics of a bill. All we are talking about is mechanics. Shall it be money here, or committees there, or registered agents there, time allocation here? There has been no discussion at all from of the three national parties as to what they want in terms of a future in this country that a referendum may help to find.

As I say, that is corroborated by the absence of the three national leaders unless they intervene in this debate sometime between now and 7.30 p.m. and I think they darn well should.

They should tell Canadians. We know what the Parti Quebeçois stands for. As I say, I am totally against what it stands for but I can understand it to a point. Frankly, unless we become more realistic, compatible, and tolerant, as the hon. minister of intergovernmental affairs said today, we are going to have problems.

It did not help things today not to give the Parti Quebecois a chance to give its view, which we know. You know what is going to happen with the Bloc Quebecois. You know what is going to happen in the Quebec papers tomorrow. Its members are going to be martyrs. They have been cut off at the pass. They could not speak.

Here you are going to have the minister of intergovernmental affairs speak. You could have the spokesperson who happens to be from Quebec, the member for Papineau speak. You had the member from the NDP speak.

They could speak on something that is fundamental and that we all call the Canada round. What do we do? We shut out those who are dedicated to a Quebec, admittedly by itself. They are in this House but we cut them off at the pass. Wait until we see in the Quebec papers how they become pseudo-martyrs.

Tonight we are going to go through the hocus-pocus and hypocrisy in many ways of voting on 30, 40 or 50 amendments when we usually have agreement. I can understand their interest from a straight political point of view. They have been very definite in their interest and we are going to be here for hours.

That will be a nice story, not you or I, not to the political elite that have been trying to get a consensus, and other political elites that have been trying to break up the country, but to the average Quebecois or the average Canadian. Speaking of the Quebecois, they are going to say: "Hey, our boys did not have a chance. Those dirty anglophones across the country cut them off at the pass". We did that today.

There are so many things to say. I do not know how many minutes I have left.

I want to come back to the minister of intergovernmental affairs because there are so many things one could say and perhaps I may have a chance later on or at third reading. I agree with the majority of what the government House leader said. I really want to put this out in the public domain and I hope that someone from the government side answers it. Yesterday, we saw a set-up question from the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury to the minister of Indian affairs about Indian self-government.

I want someone from the government side, either the Minister of Justice who certainly knows about it, the minister of Indian affairs and certainly the minister of intergovernmental affairs to try and get through. What happened to Meech? People thought we were actually dishonest. We cannot let the same intellectual dishonesty that affected Meech affect the very sensitive progress now. One of the most sensitive things is the whole question of the inherent right of the aboriginals to self-government. The minister today said this is not new. I take great exception to that. Then there is the proviso in the constitutional discussions that we are not going to talk about this or adjudicate it for three years.

What I want is for someone on the government side to answer before this debate is completed how to rationalize this potential agreement which is sensitive and which is properly receiving very considered response across the country.

There is a court of appeal decision in British Columbia between Delgamuukw, who is the plaintiff, also known as Earl Muldoe, suing on his own behalf and on behalf of all the members of the Houses of Delgamuukw and Haaxw, et al, against Her Majesty the Queen in right of the province of British Columbia and the Attorney General of Canada.

In conclusion my point is this. This case which is presently before the courts is on the very issue of the inherent right of the aboriginals to self-government. How can we have ministers of the Crown say in this House or ministers at the negotiating table pretend that there is going to be a three-year moratorium on defining this issue?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do apologize to the hon. member but I think in all fairness, I must at this time, tell him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I will start by going along with what the previous speaker said. I greatly admired his democratic approach to us and his recognition of the reaction that the French press and French-speaking Quebecers will surely have to our being gagged by this government for wanting to express a different point of view. It is using laws or regulations to limit such a serious debate to a single day. For two years, since the Meech Lake Accord failed, this government has been telling us that it wants to save this country. It wants to come up with an acceptable proposal for Quebec. Two years later, we are still going around in circles, no further ahead but pushing forward, not to save the country but to save the face of this government and its leader. They are trying to rush through a bill without examining some 60-odd amendments that have been proposed. We are now at the second set of amendments and already debate is being cut off. That is unacceptable in a democracy.

The Prime Minister, the leader of the government, has been going around the world for two years at public expense and I would have thought that he would bring back the great democratic virtues of other governments, but no, he has only brought back manners. Is he following the example of the government of South Africa or Iran or some African dictatorship? He has brought back a new way of using our parliamentary system—

An hon. member: A perversion.

Mr. Plamondon: A perversion—to boycott debates, although they are democratic. What bothers me more, as I pointed out a while ago, is that in this debate, as the independent member from Nova Scotia who preceded me said, the government members, especially those from Quebec, are not taking a position.

As a citizen of Trois-Rivières, across from my riding, said to me the other day: What are the members for Trois-Rivières, Saint-Maurice, Champlain and Lotbinière doing? We don't see them in this debate. They get up only when they have to go to the toilet or close the window. What that person said in my riding is really something. They are so absent from the debate that one would think they are asleep. If they were to wink now, they would have to open an eye. Their constituents have some hard things to say about them.

Mr. Lapierre: What are the people of Jonquière saying?

Mr. Plamondon: I went to Jonquière which my colleague just mentioned. I would not want to see people's reaction to his statement today that Canada must be saved at any cost. Implicit in that was even if it meant suppressing basic rights and not meeting Quebec's historic demands of the past thirty years.

You know other Conservative members sat in this House, and I found out what they said. You will recall that the Liberal government in 1979, before it was defeated, also proposed a Canada-wide referendum. A slew of people in Quebec and in this House rose against it. Let us remember the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Let us also remember that there were not many Conservative members from Quebec then, but there was one very well-known and highly respected member from Joliette, Mr. LaSalle, if I may name him.

An hon. member: He was the only one.

Mr. Plamondon: What did he say about the Canada-wide referendum? Madam Speaker, this is what he said on January 31, 1979:

> Members from Quebec, in particular the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), urged members of the House to support the government in its endeavour to acquire this repressive tool because she felt the danger which is upon us. I was sorry to see her lack of trust in the decision that Quebeckers will be making, and I think that she has acknowledged her party's failure to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of a province and meet the objectives of a majority of Quebeckers as well as all Canadians, who would want to see, in this constitutional reform, a chance to secure an interesting future for all concerned.

He condemned it, he got up, he spoke, he defended Quebec's higher interests. The hon. member for Joliette added:

> —the federal government [the Liberal government of that time] considers it essential to pass a law to oppose a possible decision by a majority of Quebeckers.

History is repeating itself. Why a referendum? To interfere with the democratic process embarked upon following the failure of Meech, with the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and Bill 150 which will give us a referendum on the real issue: do you want Quebec to be a sovereign state or not?

With its Canada-wide referendum, this government, a government incapable of tabling proposals, incapable of carrying out its duty, incapable of uniting its federalist forces, incapable of making offers, will interfere with that process, as democratic and fair as it is, and with the reflection undertaken by the people of Quebec which will lead to a referendum to be held in the fall.

They are afraid. And not only are they putting forward an act providing for a Canada-wide referendum, but this act is totally devoid of the democratic virtues and the respect for citizens that one would expect from any referendum act, as is the case all over the world. As the hon. House leader said, they are going to try and buy votes by spending millions on publicity. It has already started, with the Canada 125 advertisements we are seeing on the tube, often using very debatable statements such as Canada presumably being number one, very debatable statements indeed. Millions would also be spent during the limitless referendum. Can you imagine a less moral, less acceptable act of democracy than dipping into the public purse—what am I saying?—rather adding to the national debt, because the purse is empty.

An hon. member: Taking money from Quebec.

Mr. Plamondon: They are spending tons of money, including money from Quebec. All that money squandered. Such an immoral act is unheard of in the western world.

Today, instead of debating the amendments put forward to limit expenditures—and this happens to be one of them—they will not even take part in the debate. So much for democracy! How undemocratic! What sort of democracy has this country become? It had a great track record as far as following the British parliamentary system was concerned.

We are turning our backs on our entire democratic history by spending millions in an attempt to buy public support. Why not have a yes umbrella and a no umbrella like they had in England for the referendum on whether or not they should join the Common Market and in Quebec as well?

What would we have called Quebec if there had not been a yes umbrella and a no umbrella in the 1980 referendum, if it had failed to provide a start-up grant to both and had spent money through its 39 ministries to convince the public to vote "yes"? We would have called Quebec undemocratic. We would have called it fascist. We would have compared it to the government of South Africa.

But that was not the case. Quebec did respect the principles and the values of democracy. If the Canadian charter prevents you from limiting expenditures, tear it up. It is no good. A charter that does not allow you to prevent millions from being spent in a limitless referendum is no good and should be amended. In closing, Madam Speaker, I condemn both the limit put on this debate and this horrible waste of money to have a referendum which will solve nothing as the hon. member for Joliette said in 1979.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary-West): It is interesting to listen to the members of this House. The hon. member mentioned the fact that some members of the Conservative Party were not participating in this debate. but he fails to mention that over the course of the past year, he worked in this House a total of five, perhaps six days. In our party, all members get to speak, all members work seven days—

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you. I would ask the hon. member for Calgary West—

An hon. member: Shut up his mouth.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I really do not need the kind of advice that I just heard on my left when I am talking to a member in the House. I believe that I worked in a friendly, fair and honest way all week with the members and I think that they can trust me and let me finish when I am talking to another member.

[English]

I would ask the hon. member for Calgary West not to imply things that will automatically bring chaos into this place. Out of respect for the institution of Parliament, I would ask him to please come back to the subject at hand. It would be much appreciated.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have great respect for this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I now have a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I did hear the comments you just made to the member and government whip. However, given his responsibilities in this government, the member must do more than avoid creating chaos. He just insulted all members of the Bloc Quebecois to whom he refused, as Whip, the right to participate in any constitutional committee, the right to be represented at all the constitutional conferences, in spite of the official requests that we made to him. The member has consistently refused us the right to speak.

I would ask him, through the Chair, to not only comply with the resolution tabled by his government and avoid using abusive language that, as you said, leads to disorder in this House, but also to correct the facts and to retract his comments, because he is at fault.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I listened carefully to the comments made by the member for Calgary West, as well as by the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. I believe that we must not mix different things. The hon. member refers to his presence as well as that of some of his colleagues on committees, but this is a decision that was not made by anybody. It is simply based on our rules, and I believe that we all know that. Consequently, we must not mix things up.

I am convinced that the hon. member for Calgary West will, in a minute, formulate comments that will restore peace in the House for the end of this debate. Indeed, some apology might be in order.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, perhaps it was my second language. If I went over the bounds of decorum in the House, I do apologize. I have great respect for this Chamber. I heard the member opposite talking about the absence of members on this side of the House, so I assumed that somehow or other it was appropriate to talk about absence on the other side of the House as well. I know that we are never supposed to talk about absence and therefore I will talk about presence, if you do not mind.

I was present on an airplane a week ago Sunday to be available at the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I have a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, in order to help restore a better atmosphere, I want to mention that I never said that the Conservative members were not in the House. I said that they were not participating in the debate. That is the difference and perhaps my colleague has—

• (1730)

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are now on a point of debate not a point of order. Now that apologies have been received, I would like to proceed in an appropriate manner. The hon. member for Calgary West.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, we have had a caucus committee on the Constitution of Canada and a referendum meeting weekly for months now. Our members from the province of Quebec have been present.

We had committee hearings on this particular piece of legislation and the Conservative members from the province of Quebec were present at the Friday meeting. They came back to Ottawa to be present at the Monday meetings. They came back to Ottawa to be present at the Tuesday meetings. They were the only representatives from the province of Quebec, other than the member from the Liberal Party who was present at those meetings where this issue and this piece of legislation was discussed in great detail.

I thought the people of this country would like to know. If other members had been present at the committee hearings and the House allows them to be present, the whole country should understand that they could have been there and heard the testimony related to the issues that were discussed—

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford raises a point of order. I hope it is a genuine one.

Mr. Lapierre: I think the government Whip does not do justice to his job when he says he did not see any member from the Bloc Quebecois in committee. Although we did not have the right to speak—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is not a point of order as the hon. member knows. The hon. members had the opportunity to speak on numerous occasions since we started consideration of this bill at report stage. They were recognized regularly and if there is a point of debate on which they disagree, they certainly had the opportunity to refute. I think it would be wise to let someone else take the floor since other members allowed the hon. members to talk without interruption.

The hon. member for Richelieu just completed his 10 minutes of speech. I am convinced that some hon. members disagreed with what he said but they did not rise constantly with fallacious points of order. I would ask that the same courtesy be extended to other members and that an end be put to the raising of blatantly false points of order which seem to be raised only to interrupt whoever has the floor.

I am going to ask the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead to withdraw. What he said was unparliamentary.

Mr. Gérin: I will abide by the decision of the Chair because the word was unparliamentary. The Whip was saying that no member of the Bloc Quebecois was ever present in the constitutional committee. Friday, the day following the tabling of the bill, 10 days ago, I was there with him.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, in 13 years I have never heard a member denied the right to speak at any committee. Whether they are a member of the committee or not they have always had the right and that continues today. It is part of the tradition of the place. It is part of the tradition of democracy.

Those members who were present on Monday at committee hearings heard testimony from a number of people, including the royal commission report on electoral reform and a law professor that the opposition had picked. I want to say to the Liberal deputy House leader that every witness asked for by anybody was heard by that committee. No witness was refused.

The testimony was rather clear and consistent that under the Canadian Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms the democratic rights are not even subjected to the notwithstanding clause. Those democratic rights are rights which no government can override at any time in any way, whether it be provincial or federal; that is the right to vote, the right to hold office and the right to those kinds of administrative practices that enable you to activate that right. I suggest to the House that includes the notion that you must be able to associate with others to exercise those rights and influence people's votes. I suggest to the member who is moving this particular package of amendments, this is the kind of logic and the kind of practice that comes out of our history that has been around for a long time in this country, but is codified in the Constitution through the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Any attempt by the Government of Canada to restrict the rights of people to associate for the purposes of influencing the outcome of a vote would, in fact, be arguable clearly before a court of law and, based on the testimony we heard in committee, would likely lead to the striking down of those parts of a piece of legislation that attempted to do that.

I would say on that basis where we are fighting for the future of our country, one we hope will be better for our children and our children's children, that we should have as wide open a system as possible to enable people to participate. We should have a referendum wherein people are allowed to participate in unfettered ways, which respect not only the wording of our Constitution but the intent of our Constitution, to activate and maximize those democratic rights that lie at the heart of the entire system of government.

There can be a case made for recognizing associations and the bill attempts to do that. That was the purpose of some of the amendments, to say: "If you want to associate, if you want to spend beyond a certain amount and under another certain amount, associate, register, let us know who you are, where your money is coming from and how you are spending it". That is part of the bill.

However, to say to people: "There are only two groups you can belong to, that some unknown group with an unknown membership is going to be able to tell you whether or not you can participate the way you want in arguing for the future of your country" is to state the kind of principle I would hope this democratically elected institution would not uphold. If we were to make a mistake and uphold it at this point, I am sure that the courts of our land would strike it down as being an infringement that runs counter to the activation and the actualization of the democratic rights and the other rights in the Charter that deal with freedom of association and freedom of speech.

I simply wanted to make that point. I am sorry I was distracted by the rabbit tracks of how hard people were willing to work on behalf of their country. I would like to assure the nation that the members on this side of the House are always willing to be pleasant and work hard, whether they do it in their riding or in the House. They do it in some kind of balanced picture. I am in a position to know because of my position within the party. I doubt if there has ever been a harder working group of parliamentarians who participate more in the major decisions than exists in our party at this moment in history.

It has been a wide-open process from start to finish with a lot of information and a lot of chances to discuss and influence and that is the way it should be. Any attempt by the Parliament of Canada to pass a piece of legislation that denies others in this country that opportunity to do likewise is a misguided piece of legislation and I would urge members not to support amendments that take us in that direction.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to refer to a statement that was made by the premier of Alberta talking about referendums. I am going to quote him. The quote comes from a conference he attended at Alternatives '91 that was held in Banff, Alberta. I quote: "I have come to the conclusion that in the particular case of a Constitution as distinguished from a mandate for programs arising out of a specific election, I believe we have to have a referendum as ultimate ratification. What I want to impress upon you though, because I am a pragmatist and a westerner, is that it is very important when I think back to the constitutional negotiations of 1981, if you believe in the equality of provinces"—and I think this is the important thing he says—"the referendum has to be by province, not by region and not by simple national majority. We are a confederation".

This is why I believe the colleagues on my left are right. They are certainly not represented in this forum. They are not being allowed to participate in committees and they were not able to respond today to the minister of intergovernmental affairs.

As the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants said, it is important on a national referendum issue for the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the New Democratic Party and the leader of the Bloc Quebecois to be able to express their feelings on the Constitution. They have not done so.

We have a bill before us on referendums. This bill is not a binding referendum. It is simply a polling of people. As has been asked before, why spend $100 million on a referendum that is not binding? It is simply an indication of what people feel at a given moment and it is a very, very expensive poll. We should not proceed with an incomplete bill.

I introduced in the House two referendum bills that would have been binding on the federal government in its own jurisdiction. It should not go beyond the jurisdiction of the federal government because we are a federation of provinces and we have no jurisdiction to deal with provincial jurisdictions like the province of Alberta, for instance.

Therefore I think the bill before the House does not respond to the needs of the nineties. People today want to have input into what is happening in this country. They are fed up with all this constitutional talk, this poker game that the government is playing with the people of Canada.

As time progresses we have to look seriously at what options we should have. We have a country that is beautiful but we do not negotiate with the partners. If the Bloc Quebecois, for instance, is representative of the province of Quebec, it should have a say in this issue. It should be invited to committees. It should be invited to participate. Otherwise our country is going to fall apart.

The oldest democracies in the world like Switzerland have referendums. Those referendums can be initiated by the electorate and are binding on parliament and on the government. But it has to be a field in the jurisdiction of the federal, provincial or municipal government.

Somebody mentioned that Switzerland was slow in progressing in certain areas, for instance the rights of certain people, but it had the referendum and it passed.

The people have to have the last word in any government. The problem in Canada as I see it today is that we have been governed from above. We have not been governed from the people. Members come to this House and are ruled by old traditional rules of the 19th century where even a member cannot address another member across the floor. He has to address the Chair. It is not like in the Senate, in the other House where a member can talk across to another member. They were the lords. They were the upper crust. In this House we are simply the commoners and a commoner cannot talk to another commoner across the way. He has to address the Chair. This is an old rule, a rule of the 19th century. I am surprised socialist members have not asked for changes to this rule. They seem to like it.

An hon. member: Who cares?

Mr. Kindy: Some NDP member asks: "Who cares?"

An hon. member: What difference does it make?

Mr. Kindy: What difference does it make? They have difficulty understanding that if we cannot talk across to a member or we cannot address him like they can in the Congress of the United States or even in the Canadian Senate we are not full members of this House.

An hon. member: What?

Mr. Kindy: We are still in the 19th century where the Speaker represents somebody we have to bow to. If we want changes, we have to have in the first place a referendum that is binding. Second there should be initiative. It means that people can initiate a referendum on something they disagree with. We should be open, as I said, so that everybody in the House can be represented on a committee. I as an Independent and other members who are Independent are not invited to sit on committees. The Bloc Quebecois has nine members who are not allowed to sit on constitutional committees affecting the province of Quebec.

If I am right, the polls indicate that the Bloc Quebecois probably represents 60 per cent of the voters on the French speaking side of the population. Those voters do not have a voice in this House and I believe it is not just.

If we want to build a country, we have to be able to speak in the House and be able to represent. Then, naturally, there would be no conflicts and we could resolve the constitutional issues.

The province of Alberta has just introduced a bill on binding referenda. I am sure that the premier of Alberta, Mr. Getty, will represent faithfully the feelings of Albertans. One of the reasons he is going to represent them is that he is a firm believer western Canadians have been shafted by the system that exists right now.

If an election is held in Canada, before it reaches the border of Manitoba the cards have been played and we know who is going to be the government. This is why we need an equal and effective Senate. This triple-E Senate is necessary to maintain Confederation. Whether it is Atlantic Canada or whether it is western Canada, it has to have input in central government.

I want to conclude by saying that the bill before us, Bill C-81 which is called a referendum bill, is really not a referendum bill. It is a bill simply to poll people. It is not binding. It will simply indicate the feeling of the people in the country. This could be accomplished much easier by having a poll done by some company.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that there must be a large number of people watching this debate on television and wondering what on God's earth we are talking about here.

• (1750)

I heard one member just moments ago talk about the doubt and the loss of confidence in the parliamentary process. Then we had to sit through an exercise which demonstrated that a great deal of incompetence and a great deal of idiocy occur here and is portrayed on television sets across this land with parliamentarians who purport to be participating in a particular debate but utterly fail to do so, insulting one another on bases that have nothing at all to do with constructive contribution to debate.

It strikes me that we could not have had ludicrousness portrayed more starkly than to enter into debate on whether we call one another by our names or our constituencies. The real issue is whether in fact, as the hon. House leader on the other side indicated, a referendum is a noble exercise in the democratic process.

I would submit there are some instances in which a referendum can be a very appropriate means by which the electorate, the common person, can be involved in a decision-making process. As I have said in this House before, if the electorate is to engage in making decisions then the decisions better be clearly set out in terms of what the decision is all about.

What we have before us is the prospect of some fraction of 25 million people, those old enough to vote, making a decision not on whether we should have alcohol, not on whether we should have conscription or any other similarly simple question, but on the very complex package which the record will indicate not even the day-by-day participants understand very well. If they understand very well the variety of propositions which will be the constitutional package, they certainly have serious doubts about what the implications of all of those propositions might be.

If this referendum is to go forward it is going to be exceedingly important that every person who constitutes the electorate understands clearly what the proposition is, that is they understand what the constitutional proposals will be in a whole number of spheres and who is to be trusted to communicate what those issues are.

The House leader on the other side suggested that the most noble form of the democratic process, the most noble expression of freedom of speech and freedom of association, is to have every little group represented that can get up the money and is able to constitute themselves a committee for the purpose of taking one side or another in this referendum. What he suggested was that no spending limit is the most ideal expression of democratic freedom if we mean by that freedom of association and freedom of speech for the wealthy.

Have no doubt about it. This referendum, whether it is decided in terms of what is right to decide as I see it or wrong to decide as I see it, has a very large probability of being decided in direct proportion to the amount of money available to one side or the other.

An hon. member: Democracy by the highest bid.

Mr. McCurdy: Yes, it will be democracy by the weight of gold that can be delivered to one side of the issue or the other.

If you think we are talking from a vacuum of experience, witness the vast majority of referenda that have occurred in the United States where there are no such spending limits and you will learn the lesson. If that is not a sufficient demonstration of the dangers, many of us had those dangers adequately demonstrated to us in the 1988 election where gold by weight determined the outcome.

We are not talking about a defence of democracy by those spokespersons on the other side, we are talking about a defence of manipulation. We are talking about a defence of the capacity of those who have to lead those who have not down the garden path. Do not mistake the prospect. The electorate of this country will never understand clearly what they are voting for and what they are voting against if there is an election based on the premises being defended by this government.

Is there a solution to it? The hon. House leader on the government side indicated there is a preponderance of legal opinion which indicates that any limitation in the number of committees, the amount of money that might be spent, will be seen as a contravention of the charter. That is not ambiguously so. There still exists a difference of opinion.

I believe the principle is correct that there should be spending limits. I believe there is reason in a limitation of the pro and the con to two committees. I believe that strongly. If that is so, then we have included in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms a principle that all around me I have heard defended when we have pleaded that equality in the charter should be absolute.

We have heard a quick defence of the notwithstanding clause, a defence for no other reason than to ensure inequality. But we have not heard a mention of the application of the notwithstanding clause to ensure that the democratic process as expressed by a referendum would work. I find that strange.

In the absence of a Supreme Court decision that might be gotten by reference or in the absence of an appropriate decision and therefore the application of the notwithstanding clause to ensure fairness, what we will have is not an expression of democracy, but an expression of the power of some to mislead the many and lead them down a garden path. It is not exclusively with respect to the constitutional proposal but in respect to any notion this government or any other might put to a referendum as an excuse for not making the kind of decisions we are elected to make.

I want to emphasize to the people that are watching this debate, look out. Do not be fooled. When that 30-page document comes out which constitutes the constitutional proposal and you are asked to vote yes or no, you had better watch the fine print because this government is like a used car salesman, the fine print is what could kill the country and we had better watch out for that.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand and speak on Bill C-81. I was one of the members of the committee last week when the House was in recess who came back and reviewed the bill in committee. I would like to say a few words about the element of fairness in this debate that is going on here today. During my 10 minutes, I will probably comment on some of the debate that took place in committee.

I am concerned about the rights of individual Canadians. How does the individual Canadian participate in this referendum, if it ever comes to a referendum? Many will write letters to the editors and many will knock on doors. There are many ways that people can participate indirectly and not spend any money that is recorded.

However, how about an individual who feels strongly about Canada and decides that he or she would like to put a small ad in the local newspaper expressing how he or she feels about Canada. They place one, two or three ads. In many small weeklies across Canada the bill might come to $200.

What is wrong with that? What is wrong with thousands of individual Canadians wanting to participate that way? Yet we have heard through the process that somehow this is wrong, it should not be allowed to take place and that there should be rules that if you want to place an ad maybe you have to go under an umbrella committee.

It is important that individual Canadians would have an opportunity to express his or her view openly and not have to worry about regulations.

The legislation states that if over $5,000 is spent, there should be some transparency. Therefore, I am sure in communities across this nation we will see service clubs deciding they would like to do something as a group of 40 women or 70 men. Any organization can get involved in its own way during this referendum campaign which, if it is required, would be less than five weeks in duration. But if it decides it is going to spend over $5,000, it would then have to register as a referendum committee.

Once an organization registers, a tremendous amount of transparency must take place. It must then indicate if it has had people donating over $250 and then register their names. It must indicate its source of funds. It must then list down its expenses. It must appoint someone to be its financial officer or auditor and it has to have its books audited. This is all controlled by the Chief Electoral Officer. The committee must be registered. There are numerous regulations that have been put in place. There is a measure of transparency for those who want to spend over $5,000.

Some people have suggested that maybe the limit should be $20,000. I think that is too high. Some have suggested the limits be as low as $1,000. That was one of the amendments put forward in the committee but we thought that was too low because although an ad in The Cambridge Reporter is relatively cheap, for a North York service club to buy a one-page ad in The Toronto Star would cost well over $1,000 and then it would have to report. We do not want to take away from individual Canadians the opportunity to participate in their own way. If they get over $5,000, again there are very tight restrictions as far as the reporting goes. We do not think that is taking away a person's freedom to express themselves, their freedom of speech, their freedom of association. All it does is provide a measure of transparency.

In the committee some people suggested that if you are going to spend over $5,000 then you need to have 100 members in your committee. Again, you look at some service clubs that have 40 members in rural Canada operating under a charter for some 30 to 40 years suddenly having to go out and sign up extra people just so that they can be a referendum committee. The government members rightly voted that amendment down. It is common to have service clubs with under 100 members. We thought that would put undue restrictions on them.

Another concern was that some members opposite thought that we should make public funding available. I think constituents have to understand that during an election when one contributes to my campaign or if they contribute $100 to any federal member's campaign, they get a $75 tax credit on their income tax return. In the plebiscite or referendum campaign, if an individual contributes $100, there is no tax credit. There is no public funding involved that way. Because there are no taxpayers' dollars going back, then indeed there should be greater freedom for the individual as to how they want to participate in the referendum.

One of the things that we really want to try to do with this is a precautionary measure. Right now the provinces, the federal government, the territories and other groups are sitting down and are getting close to, hopefully, a successful conclusion. If they reach that successful conclusion, there will be no need for this. Even if seven provinces with greater than 50 per cent of the population or even if there was total unanimity and everybody signed, one of the amendments from the opposition party said that we will go on with this referendum in any event. It is a non-binding referendum. It is non-binding because of the way the Canadian Constitution is written. Even if everybody signed and the Parliament of Canada, the Senate of Canada and all the provincial parliaments went through their procedure, the Liberal member thought we should have this non-binding referendum in any event.

I pointed out to him that the cost of doing a referendum is serious business. The cost is well over $100 million. The government member said: "If we have an agreement and if everyone has agreed with it, why would we want to go on afterward and have a $100 million poll for no purpose at all?" That is an amendment that was defeated.

I would like to sum up by saying that there are many elements in this plebiscite legislation. I think it is important that we not take away the right of individual Canadians in their small way for small expenses to express their view on how they feel about Canada. There are people who would put a $1,000 ad into a newspaper and state their view. That would have a marginal impact. But if some like a Darryl Sittler or Jean Béliveau puts an ad in the paper that also costs $1,000, that probably carries a lot more influence.

We struggle with the people who are talking about spending controls. How do you try and put a value on two different ads, one from an ordinary Canadian and one from a Canadian who has a high profile?

I see that my time is expiring and I want to say that I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this bill.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride and humility that I come before this House to speak on this bill because Bill C-81 is a very important bill.

I am speaking on behalf of my party, but particularly as a member from Quebec who sat on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee for over seven months listening to people's views on referendums and listening to Canadians from coast to coast to coast telling us what they felt was needed to get out of this constitutional morass we find ourselves in.

In general, I think referenda are a good idea. I am in favour of referenda. I believe in the city of Montreal, for example, that people should be particularly consulted before they are forced to accept these huge tax increases or forced to accept these mega projects, whether it be an Olympic stadium or whether it be any other huge expense. People should be questioned when the situation is one of a yes or no and where there is a process which is fair.

This is not a fair process. Bill C-81 is not a fair law. This law is bad. A bad law is a bad law is a bad law. I do not know when this debate became some sort of morality play where, if you are against this bad law, you are against Canada. How ridiculous can it be?

I heard that patriotism was the last refuge of scoundrels but I never knew that it would be the refuge of Liberals and Conservatives, but it seems to be. We have transformed what I thought would be a legitimate debate on a legitimate law. It is a legitimate law. It is a law which is being passed by a legitimately formed House. All of a sudden we have drawn this line in the sand that if you are against this particular referendum, you are an enemy of Canada, you are an enemy of the Prime Minister and an enemy of the people. No, my gosh, that is not the case at all.

We believe this is bad law. We believe that people should be consulted in a fair and honest manner. When it is said that this is not fair, if I was a lawyer before any judge and I consider members here my judges collectively, you would have to make the case why it is unfair.

We had a number of committees saying there must be a double majority. There must be a protection for certain groups in Canada in order to make sure that this referendum is fair. I can talk about Beaudoin-Edwards, which is where that recommendation was. I can talk about Beaudoin-Dobbie and their recommendation or I can go back 10 years and talk about Pépin-Robarts, with the same recommendations.

I intend to vote against the referendum bill. I intend to vote against it for several reasons. First is its unfairness. Second, we are talking about $108 million—not thousands—$108 million super survey that may or may not take place, that may take place in every province but Quebec. That is interesting. That means Quebecers are second class citizens and that they may not get to vote. Or it may take place in every province but British Columbia because perhaps they are going to have their own referendum. It may not take place in Alberta because Alberta will be having its own referendum.

It is not a referendum in a traditional sense.

It is not saying: "Look, we believe in you, the people. We are going to trust you. We are going to follow you. You just simply tell us what your opinion is, and we will put it into law". No. It is a non-binding referendum. In other words, it is a referendum which is saying: "Tell us what you think. What we are going to do is make our own law anyhow. We will not guarantee to you that you going into that voting booth is what we are going to do".

What kind of signal does this send to the public, that we really care about their opinion? If this government cared about the opinion of the public, of Canadians, it would have put the GST to a referendum. I would love to have seen it do that. It would have put the free trade to a referendum. I would love to have seen it do that, but it did not.

Let us not be foolish. This government does not trust the people. It does not care about the people. This government just wants to manipulate for $108 million some sort of a rinky-dink kind of referendum that it may not or may have in certain parts of the country.

This is a recipe for disaster. This is not for friends of Canada or enemies of Canada. This is a recipe for disaster. It is surprising for a government which has, I think, made some good progress on the constitutional front with the different committees that have held hearings before. It has done fairly well.

The first ministers right now are just about getting together on some more delicate points. I am saying: Let them do their job. That is what they were elected to do.

I do not see how a referendum could possibly do anything but provoke Clyde Wells, the premier of Newfoundland. Are we going to tell Clyde Wells: "We do not trust you. We are just going to hold this over your head so if your people vote maybe 51 per cent against, you are going to follow their view". He is not going to do that. That man is not going to be moved by a non-binding poll.

This shows how bankrupt this government is for ideas. I think I have wakened a few of my colleagues on the other side. I am glad for that. The point is if you are dealing with a federal system you do not go trying to hammerlock the premiers into agreeing with you.

You do not do that. You do not threaten them when there is no reason to threaten them, when progress is being made. You surely do not come out with some half—I was going to use an unparliamentary word—donkey, there you go—half donkey kind of referendum which is only going to divide people, which is only going to be ridiculous because it will be so confusing. Finally, it will cost $108 million for very little.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that we have to trust the people. We have to believe in the people. We have to do what we were elected to do. We should be leaders. We should be leaders who say: This is what we can do for the constitutional problems that we have caused.

If we can get together here in this House and put all this stupid partisanship aside and say: "Look, this is what we need", we could do it.

There has been progress with all the three leaders here and other leaders as well who have said that we believe that Canada is much more important than these political games, this referendum here and referendum there because finally, it is not going to be a referendum which is going to solve our problems.

It is not going to be millions upon millions of dollars spent on polling which we have never seen the results of from this government. That is not going to solve our problems, and it is not going to be us constantly making on the government side these TV commercials showing what a great place Canada is.

Of course it is a great place, but we are not responding to the real problems which are constitutional in nature.

• (1820)

I just simply say, let us quit zig-zagging around here. Let us go to the heart of the problem and make sure that the elected officials do their jobs and that we do not waste any more taxpayers' money. I was not elected here to waste money, not to spend $100 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognising me and for giving me the opportunity to use the next couple of minutes to make a few comments on this issue.

I will not review in detail the amendments proposed by our colleague from Jonquière. He undoubtedly put a lot of thought into them and structured them in such a way that they are interesting and can be easily analysed. But our colleague from Edmonton South West raised the issue of the proposed amendments and I believe—as a matter of fact, I am certain of it—he studied—and analysed the consequences of those amendments. During the remarks he made yesterday, he was able to put the whole debate in context.

We are dealing with the very fibre of the Canadian nation. This debate is not solely a parliamentary debate, it is also a debate which makes the members of this House spokespersons. The members opposite should not turn this into a charade. For some time now, these people, who sense that their ship is about to sink, have been manipulating the House and manipulating the members in order to—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member would give the other hon. member an opportunity to speak. After all, he is a colleague from your province and we would all like to hear from him.

Mr. Hogue: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I really appreciate that you could put this debate well above partisan politics and, particularly, above personal issues. But, there are in this House members, particularly from the Bloc Quebecois, who make sophisms. Finally, those sophisms become dangerous. On the surface, they appear interesting, but when you dissect them, you fully realize that they are dangerous for society as a whole, not only in Quebec, but across Canada.

They talk about freedom, about gagging, about a lack of democracy, and they revel in a number of notions and concepts. They want yes-and-no committees in order to guarantee freedom. Freedom, Mr. Speaker, is not necessarily in controlling. Canadians are able to make their own opinion, their own judgment, their own evaluation, and it is not relying very much on the national conscience, on the conscience of Canadian citizens in each province to think that, if there were umbrella committees, if the data were too rigid, we could, as much as for spending limits, make sure that issues would appear.

This is a false debate. A fundamental question must be answered here. Do we belong to a country? Do we want to break that country? Canadian citizens, both from Quebec and from the other provinces, are adult enough, smart enough and confident enough of their views and of their sense of belonging to be able to answer a question if a referendum was necessary.

Too much interference seems to be the real danger here. If we start setting all kind of standards, we start interfering with people's basic human values. This debate demands a renewed awareness of where we come from, of our family values and our roots. The umbrella principle as applied to the yes and no sides is so restrictive that it would prevent individuals from making use of their individual freedoms and the freedoms of the groups to which they belong.

In Quebec, in the present as in the past, a great deal has been said about the evils of money. Parti Quebecois members repeat ad nauseam that money leads to the destruction of our moral fibre. I maintain that money is not necessarily associated with negative or evil behaviour. A person can be wealthy and at the same time be capable of doing good, while people with less money do not necessarily have a monopoly on virtue. I think this insistence upon restrictions, and at this point I want to get back to my remarks on sophisms, this sometimes cavalier tendency to associate money and evil is unacceptable. In fact, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was a case in point yesterday.

An hon. member: As usual.

Mr. Hogue: In the course of his speech, he mentioned that the money could be used in such a way that members of the Bloc Quebecois or separatists, as they are commonly referred to, would have trouble making themselves heard.

When a cause is just, people can always make themselves heard, and I repeat that anyone who thinks that Canadian citizens and Quebec francophones will let themselves be bought underestimates the intelligence, feelings and moral fibre of the people of this country. It is insulting, and that is why I am grateful for this opportunity to rise in the House and reject this connection out of hand. My family has been in Quebec, in Canada, in our country, for 12 generations. This is an insult to the integrity of a French Canadian, an insult to the integrity of a Canadian or a Quebecer, period.

I sat with our colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel on the Bélanger-Campeau commission, and we all know what happened there. While the commission was sitting, there were people who were working very hard to advance a cause. However, aside from these efforts to identify certain objectives and implement them, there were also discussions taking place behind closed doors. There was a lot going on in secret. One of the vice-presidents, who ostensibly did not take sides, had already taken a position. Another vice-president is now using all kinds of money to try and get a movement going. Apparently what is sauce for the goose is not necessarily sauce for the gander.

Before I finish, I want to thank you for this opportunity to speak in this House in my mother tongue, to do so with pride and to tell those on the other side of the House who are trying to sabotage our efforts that since I came to Ottawa, I have had both the privilege and the opportunity to speak French and to be just as good a Canadian as anyone else in this country.

You see how bad tempered and vituperative they get when we start talking about human values, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you right away that when he rose earlier, the government Whip made false statements.

First, he said that no member from the Bloc sat on the referendum bill committee. I would like to tell you—because I want to re-establish the facts—that several members of the Bloc were present. Our members went even though we are denied the right to vote. They tell members to come; they tell them that they are welcomed and have the right to come. Indeed, the members of the Bloc were told to sit there, not to vote, and remain quiet as much as possible.

I want to re-establish the facts and name my colleagues who attended. There were, among others, the member for Hull—Aylmer, the member for Shefford, the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, and myself. I believe it is really important to state the facts regarding this issue.

An hon. member: Put that in your pipe and smoke it whip.

Mrs. Venne: This afternoon we discuss the wishful thinking of the member for Jonquière. We, the members of the Bloc, asked yesterday for an extension of the sitting; the New Democrats and the Conservatives rejected that request, including the member for Jonquière.

An hon. member: He does not want us to talk.

An hon. member: This is unbelievable.

An hon. member: He does not want us to discuss his business.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising that the member for Jonquière would vote against having an extended sitting on his own motions, that is against a discussion on the substance of his amendments. This is truly unbelievable. He told us that he would like to see umbrella committees—

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not think the record should go uncorrected in that regard. There was not a vote on extension of the hours. There was a test of the House and a formal vote was not conducted. So it is incorrect to say the member for Jonquière voted against it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: In any case, the member for Jonquière rose to oppose—

An hon. member: It is not often that he stands up.

Mrs. Venne: —extending the sitting hours. I want to make that clear.

For the moment, I will keep talking about those umbrella committees for the yes and the no sides that the member claims to want to integrate to the bill by way of his motions. He now asks that these umbrella committees for the yes and the no sides now be included in the act in order to help limit expenses.

As the bill stands now, there could be any number of committees in any given riding, throughout Canada. The government says that it will put a ceiling on expenses, that a maximum of 56 cents per voter will be allowed; yet, the number of referendum committees is unlimited.

Based on my understanding of this bill, a resident of British Columbia could very well register in my constituency—why not?—since there is nothing against it in the present legislation. I do not see any logic in this. If some members find this logical, so much the better, but I personally do not see anything logical in there.

Mr. Lapierre: They can spend $8.5 million.

Mrs. Venne: As my colleague for Shefford says, the committees can spend $8.5 million; that is certainly not what I call a limit on expenses. It may be the limit for the expenses incurred by the Conservatives, but for people like us who are used to democracy, this is not what we call limiting expenses.

What I find praiseworthy are the efforts made by the member for Jonquière when he decides to propose amendments to the referendum bill, in particular his Motion No. 35, at paragraphs (d) and (e). I would like to quote these provisions because I think it is important to emphasize this point. I know you have read these motions yesterday, but I must confess it was a bit fast for me to understand. This is why I am going to read them a bit more slowly, so we can better grasp the meaning of Motion No. 35, more particularly paragraph (d).

It is to prescribe, for each province, the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee, that is the one supporting the referendum question or the one opposing it.

Paragraph (e) prescribes the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee throughout Canada or in two or more provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1).

As I said earlier, this is wishful thinking on the part of the hon. member for Jonquière, he knows that his government will never agree to put a ceiling on spending.

It is obvious when one sees the orgy of spending which is being done for Canada's 125th birthday on the back of Quebecers and with our money. Every night on television we have to endure commercials on the 125th birthday. We are certainly justified in wondering what the government will spend next on the referendum.

I do not see in the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Jonquière—as I said, I read them quite quickly, since the leader of the government introduced time allocation—anything which would force the government to register with one of the committees. This is not in and it seems rather important to me. If he had wanted amendments that mattered he would have provided for the government to be included in one of the referendum committees.

In other words, the Conservative government can waste public money any way it wishes. The bill does not set any limit on spending by the federal government so I would have expected the hon. member for Jonquière to include limits in his amendments and motions.

As we can see Quebec conservative members will not be supporting the motions of their colleague from Jonquière. Apparently he did not manage to convince them to join him, which is regrettable.

I understand his disappointment, I went through that. Personally, I followed my conscience and left that party which can only accept puppets, members who do not think and who obey without murmurs. I left the party—

An hon. member: You must be glad.

Mrs. Venne: Yes, I am glad now. I would have thought the hon. member for Jonquière would have followed.

An hon. member: He does not have the guts.

Mrs. Venne: Indeed, I do not think he has the guts but this is a matter of opinion.

Finally, I would like to mention another point where the proposals are lacking. In his motion No. 35 the hon. member for Jonquière proposes that the Governor in Council may make regulations governing referendum committees. I would have preferred that they be governed by the statute.

I have one minute left? Then, Mr. Speaker, during that minute I would like to talk about the French language that the hon. member for Outremont was mentioning a short while ago. The French language does fare too well in these motions. On page XXVI of the Order Paper for June 2 alone I could pick four mistakes. In the third paragraph at the third line you can read "—d'une provinces—", with an s at the end. At the last line of that same paragraph we read: "une amende maximale de cinquanate mille dollars". It should probably read "cinquante mille", but it is one more mistake. There is another one in the penultimate paragraph where it says: "Le comité référendaire qui contravient—", instead of "contrevient". And in the last paragraph, "sommaire" is spelt with only one m.

This is to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is obvious this was done in a hurry. Nobody had time to revise. I will admit these are minor mistakes but we would expect better from a government which has considerable means at its disposal.

I only wanted to point that out to the hon. member for Outremont who was taking pride in the fact that he could speak French in this House. I must tell him that I am very disappointed, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for giving me this opportunity.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak about the motions presented by the member for Jonquière. I think it is interesting to support this motion since the member for Jonquière showed a certain degree of courage yesterday, during four to five hours, when he rose to speak against the opportunity that was given members to debate his own motions.

The member for Jonquière is suggesting the creation of umbrella committees. He also suggests that there should be a referendum committee in each riding and in each province and that there should be a certain spending limit. I think that what he means is that each province should be allowed to spend, according to its population, amounts that would be fair for a referendum.

I understand why the member for Jonquière is presenting these motions. It is because he was sitting on several committees to prepare for what was called a renewed Canada. I understand the member for Jonquière because at least we realized that those committees were organized and planned by the government, by the Liberal Party, and that they were phoney. These committees were phoney because everything had been planned beforehand. They toured Canada and listened to Canadians from coast to coast, fully aware that their reports were already written. We realized that while the committees were touring Canada, members of the Privy Council and other government officials were in Ottawa preparing the committee's report. It was indeed a phoney committee and the member for Jonquière, when he realized what was going on—

An hon. member: Do you really think he realized what was going on?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Maybe he did not but then again maybe he did. Let us say he did and that what he wanted to do with these motions, with these amendments to the referendum bill, was to put a stop to these abuses and make the bill a little bit fairer and more equitable.

Mr. Speaker, for the past months I have been watching TV at home and usually when we celebrate our country, or the Queen, or Dollard, it only lasts a few days. But now, for the 125th anniversary of the country, in Quebec we get advertising every 15 minutes on every TV channel.

It is a case of subliminal advertising. They want Canadians, and Quebecers in particular, to believe that they are living in a great country. We are shown magnificent mountains, beautiful lakes and rivers. That is all very nice but they have magnificent mountains in Peru as well. They also have beautiful lakes and rivers in that country. More great mountains can be found in Africa, in the desert, and there are many beautiful lakes around the world. That proves nothing. It does not show that five years down the road this country will be completely bankrupt because there are too many political powers in this country.

I was listening to the hon. member for Outremont earlier. If I were him, I would not have dared rise in this House, especially after having sat on the Bélanger–Campeau and experienced first–hand this exercise in democracy the people of Quebec have carried out. That was a good idea to set up the Bélanger–Campeau commission, and it showed respect for the public to appoint representatives from management, labour, the cultural spheres, the health sector, the three main political parties—the Liberals, the PQ and even the Equality Party, which is not really a party, with only two members at the present time, but it had three then.

They listened carefully. It was not a mock committee like the one we are trying to establish with this referendum bill here. This is an absolutely appalling bill. Personally, I cannot understand this. It is beyond me. In a country that claims to be democratic, to actually see such a bill being introduced supposedly to seek the opinion of the population while trying to manipulate it, that is appalling. You cannot manipulate people like that. The people of Quebec will not tolerate being manipulated. Quebecers are no longer the water carriers they are thought to be in the rest of Canada. Quebecers are educated. They set up and operate businesses. They are self–reliant and capable of evaluating the performance of this government here in Ottawa.

Right now the House of Commons is trying to pull the wool over their eyes. You think that is what will happen. You think that Quebecers do not see what is going on. Quebecers are currently watching and soon they will take concrete action that will turn against you people, who try to fool them. Quebecers have had enough.

An hon. member: They will beat you at the election.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, you know that yesterday the Conservative parliamentary secretary said that the hon. member for Jonquière was a patriot. I recall that somebody else was called a patriot. His name was Louis Riel. It is that same party, the Conservative Party, who hanged him because he wanted to defend French Canadians in Manitoba. Quebecers remembered those same Conservatives and Prime Minister Macdonald for a 100 years. They elected Liberals in Ottawa. Once in a while they threw them out.

That is what Quebecers are going to do to the Conservatives for the next 100 years. Do not think that we are going to be fooled like that for long.

Mr. Lapierre: This time they will vote for the Bloc!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): I hope you understand full well what I mean. It is a disgrace to see things done that way, to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in order to keep Quebecers from expressing themselves.

• (1850)

I have another important point to make, Mr. Speaker. The Conservative government and the Liberals who support it—and I am not the only one to say that—just want to short-circuit the Quebec referendum. Quebecers took a serious step. They want to express themselves so the Conservative government tries to short-circuit the Quebec referendum. It wants to keep Quebecers from freely expressing themselves on their future, and that too is a disgrace. I hope that Quebecers understand—I am convinced they do—that members from the Bloc Quebecois are defending them today and are not going to be bullied.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is deficient in several respects. It does not provide for umbrella committees; it does not limit the number of committees, so an unlimited number of committees is possible. In fact this means that there is no spending limit. So much so that the hon. member for Outremont asked earlier why have spending limits, while his government referring to its bill tries to have us believe that there is a limit of 56 cents per voter.

The government was not even able to get the member for Outremont to believe this, although he usually swallows whatever he is told. He told us, "There are no spending limits; we don't need any." He is right about that, I understand perfectly; it is for show—there is no spending limit.

Also the government is not subject to these tight limits. It does not have to disclose its spending or reveal its sources. In fact it clearly wants to buy votes. We will see. We have already seen. It has started an extraordinary propaganda campaign; we saw private broadcasters who will invest up to $10 million in a campaign that will start again in September. They said so clearly in a letter to all members of this House in September, a few weeks before the Quebec referendum deadline.

It is not by chance we are told. They will put out propaganda and we are told why. In that, they are following the example of the Liberal government in 1980. The federal government in 1980 did not comply with the Quebec law. It was not subject to the Quebec law so it inundated Quebec with propaganda leaflets. In a meeting with prisoners in Bordeaux jail I saw people who had received a pamphlet in prison touting the merits of Canada. It was headed, "I'm here to stay". They appreciated that a lot I can tell you.

I think that we are overlooking important democratic gains that Canada has made. I am thinking of the Election Act. It sets spending limits and other conditions. I do not understand why this government does not follow Quebec's example with umbrella committees and spending limits; it has worked well. Everyone has boasted about how democratic the Quebec referendum was. The member for Jonquière uses it as a model but not the government.

We are told that the charter would not allow limiting spending or the number of committees, but the charter is there to support freedom of expression. We may ask who are free to express themselves. Those who have money? That is the answer the government gives us. Basically they are confusing the purposes of the charter with some of its technical aspects. The purpose of a charter of rights and freedoms is to ensure a greater measure of justice, freedom, equality, fairness; everyone should have the same right to speak. This bill totally contradicts that principle.

Nevertheless this charter has a mechanism to allow spending limits or to limit the number of committees without violating it. The notwithstanding clause could be used. The clause is part of the charter. Now, either the clause is faulty and we get rid of it, or the charter is acceptable in its present form, and we use the mechanisms provided in the charter.

I am in favour of these amendments, and I imagine the hon. member for Jonquière will vote against the bill, unless it is amended. I imagine the hon. member for Chambly will do the same since they both said they could not accept the lack of spending limits and the anti-democratic tenor of this bill was unacceptable. I imagine that all the members—the hon. members for Richmond, Louis-Hébert, Rimouski—Témiscaouata, Bellechasse and Roberval, for instance—who took part in the 1980 referendum on the yes side and who all have organizers who belonged to the Parti Quebecois and who took advantage of the PQ organization, as well as part of the Liberal Party which in some ridings supported the Conservatives, I imagine all these members will remember their roots.

I would also like to touch on some of the points the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel raised during this debate. He felt that Quebecers and the Bloc Quebecois were scared. We are not afraid of a referendum. However, we have certain principles. We maintain Quebecers should determine the future of Quebec. That is called the right to self-determination, recognized long ago by the NDP and recognized with a lot of fanfare last August by the Conservative Party at its convention in Toronto. So far it has not been recognized by the Liberal Party, but that is also a matter of principle. They never said so. I had discussions with Liberals and I asked them whether they agreed with the right to self-determination. They always answered: "We took part in the 1980 referendum." But when I suggested they say it, their jaws seemed to lock. They cannot say "Yes, we agree".

I think Quebecers should determine Quebec's future, just as Canadians in the other provinces should determine theirs. It is not up to the Americans. We will do it in Quebec, under Quebec legislation.

I repeat, we are not afraid of this referendum in Quebec. Who is? The federalist parties are afraid of a referendum on sovereignty as proposed by the Liberal government. We are not afraid to join the very broad consensus reached by Bélanger-Campeau. Three members remained outside this consensus: the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, together with Robert Libman and the ineffable member for Outremont, who did not even have the guts to say no anymore than he did to say yes.

The Bloc will support these amendments in order to show its opposition to the anti-democratic tenor of this bill. However, the fact remains that the bill lacks any legitimacy. If it were democratic, it would still lack legitimacy in Quebec, because it was rammed through at the last minute for the sole purpose of short-circuiting the serious process that has been taking place in Quebec for the past two years, starting with Bélanger-Campeau and followed by Bill 150, a carefully controlled process light-years removed from the Spicer circus, Beaudoin-Edwards, Castonguay-Dobbie and Beaudoin-Dobbie or BoDo.

Our process was not one of those expensive circuses like the constitutional caravans we have had in Canada for the past thirty years.

Mr. Speaker, we will support these amendments but we will vote against the bill.

[English]

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention earlier to participate in this debate. What sparked it for me today, I guess, was that in some ways this is a special and historic day in the development of constitutional democracy. Not only are we debating this piece of legislation, as is proper, but one of the authors of the notion of supporting referenda legislation on this side of the House published a rather interesting book today. I thought at some point someone should mention that the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore deserves a great deal of credit for his support over the years in attempting to move many of us in the direction of this form of legislation or this genre of legislation.

I read part of it this afternoon and it reminded me that he and I have debated this subject internally and privately for many years. I am sorry that members opposite who preceded me—while we are on the subject of amendments with regard to spending limits and so forth which I will come back to—think that all there is to this process or all there is to this legislation is an attempt by some to muzzle the province of Quebec. I hope they will conclude at the end of it that that is not the intention of this legislation.

Therefore, let me put it to you this way. I do not examine this legislation in the context of whether there will or will not be a referendum in the province of Quebec by Quebecers for their purposes in their absolutely legitimate right to consult themselves about what they want their future to be. Should they do that, I hope they will conclude that they want to stay in Canada.

Therefore I ask myself the question I think members of the Bloc Quebecois should be asking themselves. Should that happen, and the province of Quebec feels comfortable about being in Canada, what should the legislation be that the members of the province of Quebec will be dealing with here that would govern future constitutional amendment procedures? Because that is what I think this is about.

It took us 125 or 127 years to get to what is an historic piece of legislation. It is the kind of legislation that, as the hon. members will know, five or ten years ago I would have said I would not support for all of the old and traditional reasons of "I am a Tory". My colleague from Montreal, the dean of the House, knows full well what that means. I am not just a Conservative, I am a Tory. I have old fashioned views about representative democracy, the rights of this legislature and the importance of this place. Both the Meech process and my hon. friend for Etobicoke—Lakeshore have convinced me that if we are going to make people believe that the Constitution of this country is their own, they are going to have some part in the process of adopting it.

They have to feel it is theirs and they have to feel ownership in it. The other way to say it is that those things you can change by changing the government may not need to be put to referendum. For those things that you cannot change by simply electing a different group of people to government perhaps you need a different vehicle to decide. What lay behind those who have been promoting this kind of legislation for many years, and I salute my friend, is not that this is about the admitted difficulties we face in trying to find a resolution to an existing constitutional dilemma. It may or may not be a useful tool. One does not know entirely. In my own heart I do not know the answer.

The member for Outremont will know that there are dilemmas for many of us as to whether the use of such a tool is a useful thing in the circumstances. One has to answer that question separately from whether Parliament should have this tool. After all these years in every town hall, every public meeting that I have attended on constitution making, the people have to have some sense that it now belongs to them. In the end, all of the consultation we do will be blessed if we have faith in their capacity to say that it is theirs. I think that is what this was meant to be.

Within that context, if I may put it in the amendments from another old friend, the hon. member for Jonquière—some members opposite are attempting to play the divide and conquer game—I accept that. It is sometimes done by members opposite. We never did it when we were in opposition.

I take entirely legitimately the intentions and the bon esprit of the hon. member for Jonquière that these are motions that he thinks would be useful in amending the bill. I struggle in a different context with the notion of whether one could limit expenses in election acts and what one does with that.

I am on record elsewhere as saying that if we could avoid limiting what people spend to express themselves in election procedures, I would be for it. The only reason we have ever been forced to it in that context is the notion that we have invented a concept of limiting the rights of candidates to spend and that therefore perhaps we have to limit the rights of others to spend in order to defend the candidate's right to get through a campaign properly. Even now properly the courts struck out our attempt to say people could not spend anything. We are now dealing with election expense amendments that are trying to find some way through the need to control what can be spent in elections and at the same time to defend the essential liberty of Canadians to do what they want and to express themselves.

My dilemma with these amendments is that I think they probably come too far in the context of giving people the right to own their Constitution. These particular amendments come too far toward the notion of saying when we give you liberty, which we do not really give you if one thinks about it, we just really let you find a way to express your own liberty through referenda.

Then we should somehow say how you choose to express yourself and how you choose to group yourself needs as much control or the form of control we found necessary to put into the Elections Act. I have difficulty with that because essentially I am a libertarian. I therefore have that difficulty. That is my problem with these amendments.

I rose only to say in the context of the book that was published today that we may be down into the morass of the details, and we do that at report stage, that is sometimes necessary, but that is not really what this is about. In the end I hope it is not about the premiers. I hope it is about, I think it is about, giving back to Canadians a sense of ownership of the rules of their beloved country.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, that was a good exchange, true parliamentarians talking to each other. It is not political. It is basically important for me, absolutely important. Reflecting on his speech, I would like to ask him to comment on a question that is really troubling me as a federalist.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead as the next speaker. Does the hon. member for Saint-Denis have unanimous consent to ask the hon. member for Don Valley West a short question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Prud'homme: I graciously thank the House.

[Translation]

The hon. member knows I am a federalist. What federalism means essentially is that Canada is not a unitary country, it is a federation made up of majorities and minorities.

I do not mean to object to the right of a government to hold a referendum. What concerns me is this: In its wisdom, does the government think it would be right to hold a referendum to ask the Canadian people to decide? I acknowledge that. But what would happen if by chance an overwhelming majority, having English as its official language, decides one thing, while as we have seen before another majority, from my province of course, decides just the opposite? How do we solve this dilemma in a federal system?

Mr. Bosley: My hon. colleague knows full well that a referendum will not solve this issue. I can see he stands by his principles when he asks this question.

[English]

I do not think a referendum is going to solve the problem he raises. It becomes necessary if the result is divisive. If the result of a consultation is divisive it will be necessary for those of us in this place who must ultimately make the final vote to reflect upon what that referendum will have told us if it achieves the result he describes.

In principle if you ask me the question: Because the anglophone part of this country accepts constitutional amendments that are not accepted among the majority of francophone parts of this country in the example my hon. friend poses, is it up to me to be reflective of the duality of this nation and say we must therefore not pass those amendment? Yes it is, in my view.

That does not make it wrong to try to use the methodology of a referendum, national, local, or regional it seems to me anymore, to ask folks do you accept this notion? Eventually I say to them it seems to me it is logical that that step will become even more complete. It will no longer be in the terms of the technical language, a plebiscite. It will become eventually I suspect, in Constitution-making, true referendums. We will eventually be doing what the Danes did yesterday about the union in Europe. We will eventually be saying that in some form or other, the people of this country will have to make the final decisions about adoption of rules and that if they are rejected on a regional basis, they will have to be rejected on a national basis. It seems to me that is where this logically goes which is the only way that I can see in law to overcome the member's concern.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for this opportunity to say a word on this very important issue for the future of Quebec, the future of English Canada and the dismantling of the country.

Mr. Speaker, you are the voice of wisdom and I would like to remind you that we are now in the process of examining the second of 64 amendments to this bill, only the second one. Since there is approximately 20 minutes left in this debate, it is obvious that we will not have time to discuss the other 62 amendments.

Mr. Speaker, because the government decided to resort to a gag order we will have properly examined two amendments out of 64. Imagine that one of those—and I am going to make all Canadians laugh—

An hon. member: Or cry.

Mr. Gérin: I would like to make them laugh rather than cry.

In those two days, we spent more than half of our time discussing whether the title of the act should be a referendum or referendums. Just imagine. Do you have any idea how much one day of proceedings in the House of Commons costs? There are about 135 days in a year. Not many of those days are useful ones but there are 135 in all. The budget of the House of Commons is somewhere between $700 and $800 million. You can imagine the costs when the House wastes its time. The government did that purposely in order to avoid a debate on important amendments among the 62 that are left.

Later on the Conservative and Liberal members, among others, will vote one after the other on these amendments without having had one minute of debate in the House on those, simply because the government decided to cut off the debate.

You know that the two days of debate will end this evening, and with tomorrow, because the government will again resort will to the same procedure at third reading. Those three days represent one of the shortest periods of time to examine a piece of legislation.

If Canada decides to pass a law to protect small butterflies during the winter it may take ten days in the House. However it is not worth discussing for more than three days a Canadian referendum that everybody opposes, including Mr. Bourassa who said today that he hopes the federal government will not hold a Canadian referendum in Quebec. Moreover, more than half of those three days will have been spent discussing trivialities.

Mr. Speaker, you are a just and sensible man and I wonder if you have the authority to extend the sitting hours this evening, during the whole night if necessary, so that we can keep discussing motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8? Come on; this does not make sense. We will not have time to discuss those motions.

As one who worked really hard regarding public financing, among other issues, I would have liked to tell you about those things. I found some interesting things. The Quebec Conservative caucus got involved. The Prime Minister had promised that it would be done before election time. He reneged on that just like he reneged on everything else, and today he uses closure to keep us from talking about this issue.

Mr. Speaker, you listened to me carefully and I wonder if you think that it is fair that the studies in the hands of the government House leader on the issue, among others, of spending limits, of popular financing, and of the application of the charter of rights are not made available to members? What does the government House leader want to hide from us? Where is the public interest in hiding the findings of a study financed with taxpayer's money? What do we want to hide? Why not deposit them on the Clerk's table so that we may consult them? We are not crazy in Quebec. We know how to read. Today's issue of La Presse headlines: "A referendum calls for as rigid a framework as an election". The article is by Patrice Garant, a Laval University law professor. He quotes judicial precedents, Mr. Speaker: the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1976, Buckley vs. Valeo; and then, a Manitoba case. Unless I'm mistaken, Manitoba is still part of Canada. He mentions the Belloti decision of the Supreme Court of the United States concerning a Massachussetts statute; he then refers to Mackay, another Canadian case, and applies the test set out in the Oakes decision. Why are we being hoodwinked? Then he comes up with another extremely detailed document, the Ford decision.

Do you feel that the supposedly secret studies or documents which the government House leader is deliberately hiding from members would not provide this professor, a political science expert, with greater insight? Is this the freedom recognized by the charter of rights? Is this part of the gag decree? Is it logical for the government to act in this manner? No more so than barring Bloc Quebecois members from the Castonguay–Dobbie committee on the Constitution, the various constitutional conferences, the travelling circus which criss–crossed Canada during three months, or the legislative committee which concluded its work last week and was a monumental farce. No witnesses were called. The whole thing was over in a day and a half, not even two days, barely three to four hours. The whole process was prearranged.

The Liberals, NDPs and Conservatives had agreed beforehand that there would be no legislative committee. The Bloc Quebecois, who oppose this bill, was not given a single seat on the committee in order that they might tell Canadian men and women, and Quebec men and women, what is going on. Some think they can convince the Canadian population, English and French Canada, English Canada and Quebec, by veiling the truth, by some fancy window dressing, by gagging opponents.

Is there a private conversation going on while I am speaking, Mr. Speaker, or were you talking to me?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was telling the hon. member that you have another two or three minutes left as far as your debate is concerned. I regret if I have disturbed the hon. member's train of thought.

Mr. Gérin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You have a rich experience here, you have been a member of this House of Commons for more than 15 years. As for me, I have only been here since 1984. I don't know if you remember but when I first came to this House as a young member, I was told by my English-speaking Tory colleagues—because Quebec did not have any Tory members before—"Here, my friend——you are in the House of Commons. You will see fair play".

[English]

Where is this fair play? Is that what the House of Commons is all about? In French, the word communes or commun does not have quite the same meaning.

Were they telling me that the fair play of democracy, the fair play of the British, the fair play of English Canada, the fair play of English Canadian members, would mean gagging a group of members who had faith enough in their ideas and beliefs to the point of leaving this puppet government? Is that fair play? Is that what the House of Commons is all about? Is that democracy? Do you have the right to prevent me from speaking on 62 out of 64 amendments? Is that fair? Is that correct? I am asking you, Mr. Speaker. Answer me, is that correct?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take a few minutes only. I know other hon. members would want to speak too and I do intend to co-operate in seeing that others have also the opportunity to express their feelings.

• (1920)

I must say that I listened to what the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead had to say, but there is something I do not get. If I understand him correctly, he does not intend to vote for the bill, nor to propose any amendment. He does not want to improve the bill in any way, and he certainly does not want to do anything that would give this bill the credibility it is so lacking, according to him.

If this hon. member and others do not wish to propose amendments, do not wish to vote for the bill, when this legislation is passed later on today, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering—

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I know that you are as familiar with the rules of this House as if you had written them yourself. Tell me, Mr. Speaker: is a member of Parliament allowed to presume how another member will be voting later in the evening? That is what the member for Glengarry—Presscott—Russell just did, and I know that we are—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am not a magician and I do not think that we presume anything. Honourable members are honourable members. I would like to listen to his debate. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, of course, listened to what the speaker before me had to say, even if I was not in total agreement with him. Perhaps he and his colleagues could have reciprocated, especially on this memorable evening in the history of the House of Commons. The point I want to get across to the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, is this:

What do they care whether we are dealing with section 3, 14 or 33? How can they object since they do not want to change a thing in this bill to improve it and have a better bill? I find it extremely difficult to understand the thinking of the hon. member who spoke before me—

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have a problem. In his speech, the hon. member, referring to me, maybe not by name, but in no uncertain terms, asked me a very direct question. I will ask for the unanimous consent of this House to reply immediately to the hon. member or at least to use his speaking time to respond to the comment he just made.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am nearly done. In closing, I will ask the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead again and those like him who seem prepared to listen to their own speeches but not that of others.

If his constituents can express their views on the future of Canada, why is he denying that same right to mine, in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell? Why would the people of my riding be entitled to less than the people the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and others are representing?

I for one, believe that all Canadians have the right to express their views on the future of this country. Of course, I would like certain amendments to be made to improve the bill. But the main question remains: Do Canadians have the right, and should they have the right, to ratify the Constitution once an agreement has been reached, hopefully, between all governments in Canada? and I hope there will be such an agreement—

The hon. member for Shefford is asking: Has one not been reached?

Mr. Speaker, I think that, to most people watching this debate on TV, including members of this House, the answer to that question should be pretty obvious. In the absence of an agreement, how could we vote on a non-existent agreement? You do not need to be too clever to figure that out. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that most people understand that.

That being said, I will now let other hon. members have the floor seeing that there are a few minutes left. I want to thank the House for allowing me to make this brief comment and to conclude I would say that the voters in my riding definitely have the right to express their views on the future of this country. That is why I intend to vote for granting them that privilege which I believe they should have in that day and age, today, on this 3rd day of June, 1992.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I realize there are very few minutes left in this debate. I would like to say a few words about some of the issues that have been dealt with and some of the ones we are not going to have the chance to deal with because of the time allocation motion.

As the previous member from the Liberal caucus mentioned, some members of this House did put forward amendments. Others chose not to put forward amendments on this legislation. I would like to indicate on behalf of our caucus, the New Democratic Party caucus, that the critic, the member for Yorkton—Melville, and myself, looked through the amendments that were proposed by Conservative members, by Liberals, and by some of the independent members of this House. We found that we could support a lot of those amendments. Regardless of what part of the House those amendments came from, we considered them on their merit.

On this issue where the government has been talking about a non-partisan approach, I wish it had taken the same attitude. I talked to members of the government caucus who put forward motions. I am told that the word has gone out among the government benches not to vote for those motions. That is what I hear. We will see what happens later on.

The concern I have is that the government felt throughout this process once we, that is the three parties in this House, voted to allow this to go to second reading, we went to committee stage and entered report stage with the idea that the government would be open to amendment. We were told that by the government House leader.

We indicated at the outset that we had some concerns with the legislation, not with the principle of a referendum, and I reject some of the comments made by other members of this House, especially among the Liberals, that we are against a referendum.

Our caucus has voted—

Mr. Milliken: Yes, you are against the referendum. You are anti-democratic. They are against the people making decisions.

Mr. Murphy: The member for Kingston and the Islands is a fool sometimes. He knows darned well that at second reading our caucus voted for a referendum. He knows darned well that our representatives in the various committees of this House voted for a referendum. We have not changed our minds. We want to make sure it is a fair game.

If that party, which has a fundraising letter out at the present time on its position on referendum, a fundraising letter which it sent out prior to the government giving it the wording, feels committed to its fundraising letter and does not think it is important to look at legislation, that is its own concern.

We look at the legislation and it should not try to be devious. I left the Liberal Party 25 years ago because it lacked principles. I am not surprised it has not changed over these years.

Mr. Keyes: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the duties you perform in the chair, Mr. Speaker, I know you were taking a moment to discuss probably another very urgent matter with someone who approached the chair at the moment. During the oration of my NDP friend he accused my colleague, someone I respect very dearly in this House, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, a distinguished and learned member of not just the policies we have in our party but also of course the way in which this House operates, referring to him as a fool.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that you in your capacity would ask the NDP member who was speaking previously to go—

• (1930)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.30 p.m. pursuant to order made earlier this day, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Jonquière. It will be applied to Motions Nos. 7, 35, 50, 51, 54, 55 and 59. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would like to mention that the hon. member for Jonquière has arrived and will now move his motion.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is a little late.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The rules which were given to me for information purposes state that you have to be present at the time the motion is moved, as was the case yesterday when the said motions were being debated in the House. However, no one told us that at the time this procedure would apply we would also have to be present. In other words, you are asking us to be here almost day and night.

I insist that these motions be debated and voted on.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the motions are put the member should be in the Chamber. I regret that we have to stay here all night but that is the way the Standing Orders are.

I can ask for unanimous consent from the House if we can put Motion No. 10 in the name of the hon. member for Jonquière. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

That Bill C-81 be amended by striking out the heading immediately preceeding line 13 and lines 13 to 19 on page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

"REVIEW OF ACT

40. (1) On the expiration of three years after the coming into force of this Act, this Act shall be referred to such committee of the Senate, of the House of Commons or of both Houses of Parliament as may be designated or established for the purpose of reviewing this Act.

(2) The committee to which this Act is referred shall review the Act and submit a report thereon to the House or Houses of Parliament of which it is a committee, including a statement of any changes the committee recommends.

COMING INTO FORCE

41. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Governor in Council."

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

That Bill C-81 be amended by deleting Clause 40 and substituting the following therefor:

"40. (1) This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Governor Council and, subject to subsections (2) and (3) shall remain in force for a period of three years.

(2) At any time while this Act is in force, both Houses of Parliament may, by joint resolution, direct that it shall continue in force for a further specified period from, or indefinitely after, the day on which it would otherwise expire.

(3) Where this Act ceases to be in force after the issue of a proclamation and before all requirements of this Act have been met in respect of the referendum held as a result of that proclamation or before all proceedings arising during or out of that referendum have been completed, this Act shall be deemed to continue in force in respect of that referendum until all such requirements have been met and all such proceedings have been completed."

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 40 by striking out lines 15 to 19 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

"council, and shall remain in place until either a referendum has been held or until the end of November 1993, whichever occurs first."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate having the unanimous consent of the House so that the hon. member for Jonquière can move his Motion No. 10.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the NDP caucus, we give our consent to that.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, we just gave our unanimous consent, but I heard a Conservative say no, however.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we would be delighted to give unanimous consent to the hon. member opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 64.

That Bill C–81 be amended by adding immediately after line 40 at page 30 the following new clause:

"42. The provisions of this Act and any regulations made pursuant to this Act are not to be interpreted by the Courts in any manner that would prevent changes to the electoral laws of Canada."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I give the floor to the hon. member for Saint–Hubert, on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I see several male members wearing hats in this House. I believe that is completely contrary to the rules of decorum in this place. Of course, I find it very nice. If we want to change the rules, I want to admire them, but I believe it is not proper behaviour in the House.

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, if you check in Beauchesne's I think you will find that the member uncovering is recognized. Therefore it is appropriate that men may wear hats, but they may not be recognized until they uncover.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a question of whether they can wear hats or be called or not. We from all parties, including the Independent, have been working very hard on improving the decorum in this House. I hope the gentlemen will respect that and remove their hats.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I would also like to add that I think male members are required to wear ties in this House. Many of them are not wearing ties today.

[English]

Mr. Johnson: Madam Speaker, I am appalled by the sexist comment made by the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois.

I remember a few weeks ago on St. Patrick's Day a female member of Parliament was wearing a bright green hat and nobody said a word. I think that should be taken into consideration. These types of comments are not needed in this House.

• (2030)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Citation 329 of Beauchesne's 6th edition says:

> The Standing Orders of the House are virtually silent on the subject of Members' dress. Standing Order 17 requires that a Member who wishes to speak must rise uncovered.

So when a member rises, his head must be uncovered. That is exactly the ruling applied on another occasion, which the hon. member for Calgary North referred to recently, when a member wore a hat during a vote.

Citation 330 of Beauchesne's 6th edition also says:

> A jacket and tie are required to be worn by male Members.

To be recognized and have—May I finish my sentence? The hon. member for Longueuil will please remain seated while the Speaker is standing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost. I therefore declare rejected as well Motions Nos. 7, 35, 50, 51, 54, 55, and 59.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order. However, I would like to remind him—I will hear him now—but I would like to tell him that, according to our rules, between the time that a motion is voted on and the time that the results are announced, the Chair cannot entertain any point of order.

I will now hear the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, the reason I got up as soon as the results were announced was to make sure that you would not proceed to the reading of the next motion.

In fact, you read motion No. 2, but you omitted the other motions which were in the Order Paper and which were standing in the name of the hon. member for Jonquière. I regret, but you did not ask permission from the House to dispense from doing so, and I would like to hear those specific motions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like the hon. member to re-examine a bit the ruling of the Chair. What it says is that the motion that was voted on was Motion No. 2. So, I put Motion No. 2. The ruling of the Chair then said that the vote on Motion No. 2 also applied to the other motions that I enumerated. I did not have to read them to the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The next question is on Motion No. 4. If Motion No. 4 is negatived, we will have to vote on Motion No. 5.

An hon. member: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot accept a point of order once the question has been put. I will explain as far as Motion No. 11 is concerned after. It was not presented to the House for a very simple reason.

The House divided on Motion No. 4, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

I may want to answer the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants on his point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, actually I am glad we had the vote. I was trying to curtail the vote because of the fact that the Speaker ruled earlier that my main motion was not in order.

This motion was to help my main motion because I was trying to involve the aboriginal Canadians in the process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you. We will not get into a debate as to the reasons.

I will take 15 seconds to explain what happened earlier so that people who are watching this long vote will know.

When Motion No. 4 was put to the House earlier tonight, the hon. member was not in the House. Still that motion was brought forward even though it should not have been. When we arrived at a later motion, someone brought it up to the Speaker's attention and the motion was not put to the House because the proposer was not present at the time.

Since Motion No. 4 was lost, the next question will be on Motion No. 5.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 5.

The House divided on Motion No. 5, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Angus: I rise on as point of order, Madam Speaker. Given that Motions Nos. 6, 37, 30, 49, 38 and 46 were grouped together for the purpose of debate, I was wondering whether there might be consent to have the vote just taken apply to those.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have unanimous consent.

The next question is on Motion No. 30.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Hubert on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I just saw the hon. member for Windsor—St.-Clair vote and leave the House. I hope, to say the least, that his vote will not be counted.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point.

While the last vote was taking place, I noticed that at least 10 members came in and left the House during the vote. I am convinced that several of the votes taken today are absolutely illegal.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I would just like some clarification. Normally, when a motion comes from this side of the House it is votes for first on this side and then those who would vote against. It would start with the government benches and then come over here to the Liberals, the Official Opposition. I am wondering why on that particular vote the Liberals began on the second vote and then followed by a few Tories who needed to make up that number. Why the difference? Is that standard procedure?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There was really no particular reason for the vote to be taken one way or the other, as we do have people from both sides of the House voting yes or no on different motions.

The next question is on Motion No. 45.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This archaic and nonsensical exercise proves that this House of Commons needs an electronic voting system.

I do not know how we revise the rules and procedures, but it is a very legitimate point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The point is well taken. Tonight we will go on with the votes as ordered. We cannot change the rules at this moment.

The next question is on Motion No. 18.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

• (2240)

Mr. Saint-Julien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Abitibi, on a point of order.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some clarification regarding motion No. 24; more precisely, I would like to know why there was no vote on this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is because the mover, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, did not move his motion. Consequently it was not put to the vote.

The hon. member for Richelieu has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: A little while ago there was unanimous consent to allow a member to move a motion. Maybe we could ask if there is unanimous consent to move this one.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no consent.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR NEW WESTMINSTER—BURNABY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of privilege that emanates from a statement pursuant to Standing Order 31 that was made yesterday in the House of Commons by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

In the member's statement she imputed motives to an action that I had taken which I believe impedes me from doing my work as a member of Parliament.

In the particular statement she mentioned that I was endangering the lives of women and children by a pamphlet that I had given out wherein I had listed the names, the addresses and the phone numbers of some transition shelters that were listed not only in my riding but across metropolitan Toronto.

On March 31 in this House of Commons I participated in a debate where I read to the House a piece of material that was a gift to me from a survivor. It was entitled Women's Country and it talked about the issue of violence against women and children. At the end of that speech I received calls not only in my Ottawa office but also in Toronto for copies of this particular speech.

We went to the Department of National Health and Welfare and obtained some additional statistics on violence against women. We also gathered together a list of shelters and transition houses which we obtained from myriad places. We received them from libraries. We received them from a variety of places.

We then responded to the requests that we had received in Ottawa and in Toronto. The balance of them I sent to approximately 2,000 people in my riding.

Many of the people who called me and asked for this piece had said that they were survivors. Many of them had said that they were people who had worked in the violence against women issue for many years. I felt, based upon the reaction I had received, that I was doing the right thing.

Last Friday I started receiving phone calls. I might say that this was after about 10 days of the piece being out in the community. All of the calls that I received were positive, previous to this last Friday.

A leader in this violence against women committee said to me: "Dennis, you should not be releasing the addresses of these shelters". She did say, of course, that I was putting lives in danger.

I responded to her by saying two things. First of all I will not give out any more with the addresses on them. I will also call the chief of police, which I did, Chief William McCormack, to make sure that there would be an added security alert to the houses that were listed.

Some of the shelters that were listed in the pamphlet have their addresses listed in places that are quite public. For example, the two shelters in my riding have their addresses listed in the Toronto phone book. Not only does it have the phone number, but it actually has the address of the shelter.

I refer specifically to Nellie's Hostels for Women. The idea that these addresses are confidential is a debatable point. In other words, there are some shelters that do believe that they should be confidential and there are other shelters that publish them.

I leaned to caution and did not distribute any more with the addresses. I respected the voice of the women who called me. I must say, though, that if I am guilty of putting the lives of women and children in danger then I would ask the question: What about those professional organizations that also publish their addresses?

I would also say that we in the Parliament of Canada spend millions of dollars a year advocating that women go to these shelters. Are we suggesting that they go to places that are not secure?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate to intervene in the member's question of privilege, but I have not heard anything yet that indicates a question of privilege. It seems to be a clarification of his own role rather than anything that happened in this House.

With regard to the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, she is not able to be here today, at least at this time of the day. It was one of his own colleagues who pointed out to us late last night during the votes that she was not feeling well. She will not be here for a while this morning.

However, I did not get up on that particular point. I got up on the fact that what the member for Broadview—Greenwood was talking about had nothing to do with a question of privilege. If he is talking about his own situation, that is a different issue and perhaps he wants to get up at some other time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can try to be of assistance to members.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood raised this matter yesterday. I do not think I am trespassing by saying that he suggested to me earlier this morning he would want to raise it.

I understand that the office of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby was notified that the hon. member wished to proceed at this point. It may well be that it would be appropriate to hear the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby at some point when it is convenient.

• (1020)

The point the hon. member for Churchill makes I think is sound. There may or may not be a complaint here. I have not heard all of it, but I think the point that the hon. member for Churchill makes is reasonable. As this is a question of privilege, I know the hon. member would want to address it from the point of view of privilege and not stray into debate.

I accept the intervention of our hon. friend. I am sure that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood will wrap up his argument. At that point, depending on what I have heard, I may ask the hon. member at least to have the opportunity to address it further if that is necessary.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I will wrap up. Basically I want to make the point that at no time when I distributed this piece, Women's Country, with addresses attached was there any intent to do malicious damage.

My point of privilege is quite specific. When another member in this House accuses another member of putting the lives of women and children in danger, it makes it very difficult and impedes us in our work as members of Parliament. That is the simple point.

I have every intention of continuing to try to be constructive in advancing this issue which is of concern to each and every member of this House, but I do not think I will have any effect at all if my constituents believe that the actions I take are putting the lives of people in danger.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member has raised this matter in the House this morning as a point of privilege because it relates to the use of the office of a member of Parliament to distribute information and the impact that can have on the general public and indeed on other members of Parliament.

Because this information was received in my own constituency, which is part of the same metropolitan community shared by the member who has just spoken, there was a lot of concern raised in my constituency. I think it is helpful the member has clarified his intentions as to what he was seeking to do.

Clearly a dilemma has been raised. On one hand this member, as many of us do in the course of fulfilling our public office, would want to let women know where the shelters are and how to contact them. The dilemma comes from the fact, on the other hand, that in many instances—in fact in most instances—these are safe houses and information generally out and about as to where they are can create very serious problems for those who are seeking refuge there.

In the case of the Etobicoke—Lakeshore constituency where Women's Habitat is located and for years has been providing this needed and unfortunately necessary service to women and children, there was great consternation that an address and a location that they tried to keep not broadly known was in fact revealed in this way.

It is a matter that raises an important question of privilege. I am glad that the member has taken the opportunity to clarify that before the House and on the public record, because it does have an impact on not only those of us who are members in the community but many of the women and their families who are living there.

Mr. Speaker: What I am going to do, and I know the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood would support this and if the House would go along I would like to hear from the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby as to whether or not she would wish to make an intervention. When I have done that, probably we could arrange to bring the matter back to the House, if necessary.

I do want to say this because it is important that it is said. This may or may not be a question of privilege but the issue that has been brought to the House for all of us is a very serious one.

The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has made a positive contribution to the discussion this morning. All of us who are parents and all of us who care are deeply concerned about the matter that has been raised. In saying that, I am not saying whether or not it is a question of privilege. I will decide that in due course.

In any event, I thank the hon. member and I thank the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore and the hon. member for Churchill for their interventions.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I have had a communication from the office of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby. Apparently they understood this issue was going to be raised at three o'clock today. If the Speaker wishes, I suspect that is the time the hon. member would respond on this issue.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Churchill. I most certainly will give the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby every opportunity to address the Chair in the House later on today if that is appropriate.

WESTRAY MINE

TABLING OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to a commitment I made to this House, I am tabling today documents pertaining to the federal government's assistance to the Westray Mine project.

Additional contractual documents are also being made available through the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I would like clarification of the documents tabled. The minister indicated that other contractual documents were available through the department. Does that mean they have not been tabled but that a list is available to members to consult and to request them? If he could explain his comments please.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the situation is that the total sum of all the documents represent several feet. What has been provided is a list and an opportunity for members, or anybody else, to access the documents in the library of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and to copy them and so on. It was just simply impractical to table them all without a fork-lift.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

In accordance with its order of reference of Wednesday, May 6, 1992, your committee has considered Bill C-71, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and has agreed to report it with one amendment.

PETITIONS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from a number of people from the town of Selkirk, Ontario, which was sent in by Norma Davidson of Selkirk.

It calls upon this government to accept or reject constitutional amendments as proposed by the government in a referendum. What these citizens call upon this government to do, which is different from the government's legislation, is for it to have a double majority, a majority of votes cast in the provinces with the territories being given the status of one province, and a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together.

PORNOGRAPHY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by many of my constituents from Malpeque, Prince Edward Island. They state that whereas pornography is a serious problem in Canadian society, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take measures to address the serious social problem, pornography, and protect Canadian women and children from its harmful effects.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to introduce today a petition approved by the Clerk from 87 residents of Canada, from many places including Toronto, Elmsdale, Gravenhurst, Willowdale, Thornhill, Scarborough, Downsview, Williamsport and several locations in British Columbia and the prairies.

The petitioners are concerned about the situation of the families of people who have been accepted as refugees in Canada but have not yet been able to bring their families, their spouses and children from countries where some of them are living in extreme difficulty, if not danger.

Therefore, the petitioners urge Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present petitions from several Canadians, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and ratified thereby, who call upon the Parliament of Canada to urge the Government of Canada to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention without delay and to mobilize Canadian diplomatic resources to encourage other nations, in particular developed nations, to ratify this important treaty as well.

The petitioners do that for a number of reasons, not the least of which is that a statement from the World Commission on Environment and Development, commonly known as the Brundtland commission, states that the most significant initial action that nations can take in the interests of the oceans' threatened life support system is to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention. It points out the critical role that oceans play in the life support systems of the whole planet.

There have been some objections to the ratifying of it. The Secretary General of the United Nations has come to agreements with some nations which had reservations about ratifying it and most of those concerns have been clarified.

Sixty nations are required for ratification of this convention, 51 now have and it is extremely important that at least 9 more sign it. It is certainly incumbent upon Canada to take its part in that.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to table pursuant to Standing Order 36 calling upon the Government of Canada to rescind its decision with regard to terminating the Court Challenges Program. This petition is signed by residents of the province of New Brunswick, in particular from Campbellton, New Brunswick, as well as Mann Mountain, parts of Restigouche, Sainte-Anne, as well as other parts of that province.

The second petition deals with the same subject matter signed by numerous residents of Kingston, Ontario, who are all in agreement that the termination of the Court Challenges Program is indeed an injustice and the government ought to rescind its decision forthwith.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to revert briefly to the item Introduction of Government Bills.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Come now, I call upon the House to cooperate. I think I proceeded a little hastily earlier.

An hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This is not a matter requiring unanimous consent. The Chair made a mistake in proceeding a little too hastily and, thus, is allowed to revert to a previous item.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

REFERENDUM ACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak once again in favour of Bill C-81. This bill has been the subject of thorough consideration in committee and I am confident its provisions reflect the will of the majority of the House.

It remains very important for members to keep in mind the purpose of the legislation. It is a precautionary measure designed to give the Government of Canada the ability to hold a referendum on constitutional reform, if such a step ever were to become necessary and desirable.

The legislation does not say a referendum will be held, nor does it detract in any way from the important deliberations that have been going on with respect to finding acceptable constitutional solutions that address the concerns of all Canadians.

This legislation has been the subject of keen and useful scrutiny in committee. The government promised it would seriously consider any amendments from the opposition which would improve the legislation, and we have honoured that commitment. Of the 29 amendments proposed by the opposition parties, 13 have been accepted by the government.

I would like to discuss for a moment several changes that have been made in the bill.

As hon. members will recall, when the bill was first introduced there was significant discussion about the issue of spending limits on the part of participants in any future federal referendum. Some hon. members expressed the view the legislation should have limits on spending to prevent any unfairness in the course of a referendum campaign.

It is certainly the intention of the government to ensure any referendum is fair. Measures to ensure fairness should be workable and sensible. In committee this issue was addressed and the legislation has been improved as a result of amendments agreed to in committee. The bill now proposes the spending regime, which applies to political parties under the Canada Elections Act would apply to each registered referendum committee.

This amendment puts reasonable constraints on any single committee. As I have stated to hon. members in this House and as has been expressed in committee, limitations on the number of committees are viewed by a considerable body of legal opinion as being an infringement of the charter provisions dealing with the freedoms of association and expression.

This discussion about the use of an umbrella committee has been, in a sense, a very frustrating one. In face of overwhelming legal opinion shown to the opposition, from literally all parts of this country that such an umbrella committee would clearly be a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we nevertheless had amendments proposed last night to impose these various umbrella committees. They were defeated so in a sense it is academic, but one wonders about the wisdom of voters who in the face of this opinion say: "It doesn't matter. Politically it is a good thing to vote for so we are going to vote for it. It doesn't matter that it violates the charter".

Forgetting about the charter argument, consider for a moment the common sense practical consequences of trying to legislate an umbrella committee. Let us, for example, suppose there was a referendum on the Meech Lake accord and one would have in law that there shall be umbrella committees. Think about the practical consequences. First, how are these committees formed and who brings them together?

I suppose some official would call a first meeting of everybody who wants to participate in the committee and they would then set up an organization and run it.

Let's talk about the no committee, for example, on a Meech Lake situation. Attending this first meeting you would have, presumably, as diverse groups as the Assembly of First Nations, because they did not think there was anything in there for the natives. You would have the triple-E group because there was nothing in there on Senate reform. Presumably the National Action Committee on the Status of Women would be there because there was nothing in there for women. Maybe the CLC, the Canadian Auto Workers and who knows how many other groups would attend.

Then the question is how do they vote? Who gets what weight? Does everybody there have an equal vote? Do you give the same vote to an organization that has a million members as to an organization that has 10? Do you give the CLC a vote and also every one of its constituent political unions? In other words, the auto workers are members of the CLC. If they show up and say they want to participate do they have a vote as well as the CLC? Do they have 10 votes? How do you practically take care of that situation?

Assume somehow you can practically take care of that situation. Given what we have seen trying to reach agreements around this House when we have three or four different parties in a relatively small committee and how long it takes, imagine trying to bring together that group.

Then you tell that group to raise an allocated limited amount of money.

"You shall raise and allocate a limited amount of money." The native groups would want money to fight this Meech Lake accord because there is nothing in there for Indians and aboriginals and they think it should be defeated.

The National Action Committee would say it wants some money to spend on fighting it because there is nothing in there for women. Then you are going to have the REAL Women organization saying it wants money to fight this because it thinks it has already gone too far in terms of the feminist agenda. Then the CLC is going to have its claim. How would those things be adjudicated?

Suppose the committee decided that REAL Women has a cause and it should be allocated a certain amount of money and air time to fight its cause. Is NAC not going to say: "Okay, that is fine with us"? Of course not. It is going to object strenuously and it will certainly go to a court. What judge is going to say: "Too bad, you cannot participate"?

Common sense indicates that is the wrong thing to do. For example, suppose the question had many parts where you were asking about a package that included Senate reform, aboriginal self-government and all the other items now under discussion.

You may want to campaign against aboriginal self-government and for Senate reform, or vice versa. Does that mean you have to be simultaneously on both the yes and no committees or do we have a multiplicity of committees? If you have a multiplicity of committees, do you have one yes committee and several no committees because each group has a different reason for wanting to say no?

Just common sense dictates that would be a foolish thing to do. It is for that practical reason that out of the 600 referenda held in the western world that were looked at by the Hansard Society in the U.K. at a conference in co-operation with American Enterprise Institute, only one had succeeded in having umbrella groups with limited expenditures and everybody else excluded from campaigning, and that was in Quebec. What happened in Quebec? It was a very unique situation. The question was very simple, basically. You were for sovereignty or you were against it.

In the National Assembly there were two parties. One was for sovereignty and one was against. The legislation provided that committees be set up. The organization would be undertaken by the Parti Quebecois or the Liberal Party of Quebec and anybody who wanted to participate had to do so under one of those committees.

There were no subtleties. People were not asked whether they were for sovereignty with an upper house, sovereignty with native self-government, et cetera. It was a very simple question amenable to that kind of structure. It worked out fine. Everybody found that a reasonable way to participate, and it proceeded.

To impose that model on legislation that is enabling only, in which there could be multiple questions and which could be complex with many parts is to fly in the face of common sense. That is why we had to oppose it.

I thought common sense would dictate. It has been a considerable source of frustration that the common sense argument was either not understood or simply dismissed in the pursuit of the political objective of saying: "Ah, but for fairness you have to have umbrellas and limits", even while recognizing that kind of ideal is simply impractical, impossible, and there is no way in which it could be done.

Mr. Edmonston: Show us the legal opinion.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Chambly walks in making comments. Typical.

Common sense indicates the charter is very clear in this regard.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: I hear heckles from the New Democratic Party, and I have never attributed common sense to the New Democratic Party. Do not worry, I am not talking about you. It is important the legislation be as fair, as reasonable and as workable as possible. I believe this bill meets this test.

• (1050)

In the interests of fairness, disclosure and openness, the bill provides that all committees intending to spend over $5,000 be registered and the contributors and their contributions in amounts over $250 be made public.

The bill also ensures free broadcasting time will be allocated equally to both sides of the referendum question. I pity the broadcasting referee in the Chief Electoral Office who is going to have to make those allocations because it is going to be very difficult. But this is a relatively simple thing compared to what would be required should anybody be insane enough to agree to umbrella committees.

There is nothing in the bill to in any way limit access of all sides to the purchase of broadcast time. As a result, I believe all sides of any question will be able to be put their views fairly to the Canadian public if a referendum was ever held.

I would like to draw attention to the other issue which was discussed in committee. Opposition members expressed concern about the issue of consultation with respect to any referendum question. Opposition parties wanted to ensure there was appropriate advance knowledge about the question. The government agreed with this request and accordingly the bill was amended to ensure leaders of the two recognized opposition parties in the House are provided with the proposed wording of the question and consulted on this wording at least three days before notice of the motion in the House is given. This will ensure a minimum of four days notice before debate begins.

I want to advise the House as well the government agreed to an amendment limiting contributions to referendum committees to sources of financing within the country. This change will alleviate the concern about contributions from non-Canadians including foreign governments, companies which do not conduct business in Canada, and trade unions which have no bargaining rights in Canada.

In another area the government agreed to an amendment which clarifies what is a referendum expense. The change will ensure the normal conduct and responsibilities of members of the Senate and the House of Commons will be specifically excluded from the definition of referendum expenses.

This recognizes the role of the MP must continue during any referendum.

The bill was also amended to respond to a suggestion that provision be made for the text of the question to be made available in aboriginal languages in appropriate locations at the discretion of the Chief Electoral Officer.

The bill as amended in committee addresses the issue for which it is designed. It enables the government to deal with any eventuality, but it should be repeated that no decision to hold a referendum has been made yet. Canada must have every appropriate means at its disposal to defend itself and promote unity.

This is a straightforward matter of prudent management.

Mr. Edmonston: By leadership.

Mr. Andre: I see the member for Chambly is again shouting from his seat. Frankly I do not think you promote the unity of this country by aligning yourself with the Bloc Quebecois.

We know why they want to destroy the country. We wonder why the members of the New Democratic Party would align themselves with them.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think the government House leader knows better. We are not aligning ourselves with the Bloc Quebecois. We stated we are for a referendum. We do not agree with the legislation which is going to be in place for more than three years and can be used for any number of referendums in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I think it is not a matter of privilege or a point of order. It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Andre: We believe Canadians have learned a great deal about the constitutional challenges facing this country. The citizen's forum, the hearings of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, the conferences over the winter and the multilateral processes have yielded important and significant progress toward the resolution of the Canada round.

Perhaps most important of all Canadians are getting to know one another through this process and are coming to terms with Canada's vast and endearing diversity. We are all too familiar with those who want to destroy this country. They do not understand Canada's greatness and they do not want to understand. Even more, they do not want others to know the real Canada much less come to appreciate it.

In a way one has to feel sorry for those with such an attitude. Theirs is the politics of division, discord, and suspicion. Their aspirations are oriented toward tearing down not building up, wrecking not improving. The real Canada is far from perfect but it is the best country in the world. No Canadian should feel bashful about saying it loud and saying it often. It is the simple truth. The real Canada at its best is all about tolerance, civility, peace and prosperity. These are values that Canadians want expressed more vividly through a renewed Constitution. These are values which they want to have translated and given increased meaning in their daily lives.

This legislation, of course, does not create the perfect future for this country. It would be preferable if such a precautionary measure as this legislation was not needed at all. The commitment of my government is to Canada's renewal and every tool should be available to meet any possibility. For this reason, I urge the House to approve this legislation. I ask, in particular, the members of the New Democratic Party to put partisanship aside.

Mr. Murphy: After that stupid remark you just made.

Mr. Andre: I was in opposition a long time and I know the disputes that occur in opposition. I know that frequently in opposition the only thing you can unite on is opposition to the government.

I would ask the New Democratic Party, after their four-hour caucus where, figuratively, there was blood on the floor, to please recognize that what is at stake here is the best country in the world. I ask them not to put this best country in the world in jeopardy by their partisan concerns and their inability to come together as a party.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a very long statement. Nevertheless, I want to express my opinion on third reading of this bill, which is meant to give us a very useful tool in Canadian society, a way to consult the people on something as important as the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, you should know that in April 1991, our party was the only one that had studied the problem thoroughly and had the courage to submit a comprehensive plan to Canadians to resolve the constitutional crisis which today needs to be resolved as soon as possible because the public is sick and tired of talking about the Constitution.

[English]

We decided as a party in April of last year to make a nine-point proposal. When the minister got up in the House yesterday, I was happy to realize that the nine-point proposition that had been submitted by our party, plus the process, has been accepted by the government. In fact we are on the last item of the process, which is the referendum.

Why did we suggest the referendum? It is because the Constitution of the land belongs to the people. That is a very simple proposition. For years we have debated this problem and we see it again at this moment. People are using this occasion to try to bargain something for themselves. When you really talk to the people of the country, they ask why.

This country should have a Constitution. It is very important but it cannot be the only problem we face from now on. It is very convenient for this national government and provincial governments to talk about the Constitution but when you go to the people, they do not want to hear about the Constitution. They want to hear about jobs, economic growth and social improvements. When they open a newspaper all they see is the Constitution. As a politician, when you make a speech on the economy, the press is there talking about the Constitution.

We are all fed up with that. We know that when the Constitution is in the hands of the people, it will be very difficult for any level of government to use the Constitution as a scapegoat instead of talking about the real problems of the nation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1100)

Mr. Chrétien: We did not propose a referendum for a deadlock-breaking mechanism. That has never been our intention. Whatever the result of these negotiations, we have to go to the people. We have to give the Constitution back to the people of Canada. We need to have this great day when Canadians need to say yes to this country remaining together and to enter into the 21st century. That is exactly what we want to do.

I want to say today, because it is very important, that there is an element of using the referendum to pressure people. That has never been the intention. The intention was to consult the people of Canada and let them decide what the Constitution of our land should be and legitimize the process. I am confident that when the people of Canada realize that, they will be confident and will gain back the pride that they have lost through these terrible last seven years.

We do not want the government to use it as an instrument to push people around, but to give a voice to the people of Canada for a new Constitution.

I do not like what the government is doing in terms of what it is going to do when it has a referendum. It should be very clear that we should not proceed with any change in the Constitution if one of the four great regions of Canada says no to this package or any package. It has to be clear that the Constitution will not be changed. Nobody can force us. We can say as a matter of policy of this House that if Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario or the west says no, then we are not proceeding. It should be very clear that this is the way it should be in a country as diversified as ours. It is as simple as that.

We are disappointed with some elements of the bill. We think that the government could have accepted many of the amendments that we made, but we will vote for the bill even in its imperfection. I do not understand the position of those in the NDP. They do not want to consult the people of Canada because they do not like the car that is going there. They say they are going in Cadillacs or they are not going at all. I find that stupid because I am willing to walk for this country if need be.

I am not happy. We made some suggestions. I think we should regroup the people. I know that when we have a referendum we will have an umbrella because I am willing to fight for Canada with the Conservative Party and the NDP Party and we will be together on the same platform. It is not that bad. I have done it before. I was on the same platform as the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs in Shawinigan for the last referendum.

An hon. member: Oh my God.

Mr. Chrétien: It was not that bad. I was with the Minister of National Defence. Imagine that.

Some hon. members: Oh no.

Mr. Chrétien: In those days he was not arriving in his jet. He walked there. It is not that bad because it is a great cause.

We will do that. We will be together and we will fight for Canada because we believe in it.

We hear the noisemaker from Shefford over there. Yesterday he was so indecent. He would still be in his boat in the Magdalen Islands if the member for Papineau had not been his mentor and given him a chance to be a member of Parliament. At least he should have a bit of decency and respect. That is the reason why I was mad. He should have some respect for the member for Papineau.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I have no lesson to learn from the Leader of the Opposition on the friendship and respect I have for the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. My friendship and respect have been constant. We may have different political opinions but still respect each other.

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: I do not have time to spend with this member. I just made a point and I think that he understood that. I am glad that he says that he has respect for the member from Papineau. I do too. It would have been very nice yesterday to let him finish his speech without making the nonsensical noise that he made.

We will have this referendum and we want it. Whatever happens there will be a referendum. We want all Canadians to be consulted. I do not understand people who say that the legitimate Government of Canada and Parliament of Canada, that have been acting under one Constitution since 1867, suddenly in the words of the Bloc Quebecois—

—would not have the right to consult the citizens of Quebec. This is a referendum for all Canadians. The best proof that members of the Bloc Québécois are Canadians is that they are here in this House. Why would they not want Quebecers to be consulted in the same was as Ontarians and residents of the Northwest Territories? Why would they not want all Canadians to say yes or no? That is democracy. Democracy must not be managed piecemeal; it must apply equally to everyone. That is why we say there must be a regional majority to respect Canada as it really is. On the other hand, one part of Canada should not be excluded, because then the referendum debate and vote would be virtually meaningless.

I would have liked the bill to be more appropriate and spending to be better controlled. What will happen? The mechanism or vehicle may be defective, but the important thing in a referendum is that the ultimate verdict will be given by each citizen freely voting on this country that we believe in. That is what we have always proposed.

The bill is not perfect. Personally, I would like some parts of it to be changed. Some concerns have been expressed. But from the beginning, we wanted to co-operate with the government. In fact, as I said at the outset, if you take the plan as it was presented yesterday by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, everything that we submitted in writing and that was adopted by the Liberal Party in all regions of Canada appeared in the House of Commons report and again in the minister's announcement. What gives us great satisfaction is that the reservations we mentioned—

[English]

We had some elements we disagreed with in the Beaudoin report. We were not at the table, but the premiers and their representatives and the negotiations have retained some of our objectives. We did that because we felt it was important.

Take the matter of culture. We have to maintain the right to help all Canadians in that field. Of course, the mechanism could be different because it was not in the Constitution, but we gave a better definition.

It is the same thing with energy. We thought there should be a national say in the energy policies of the land. Why be together if we cannot take a national interest when it is needed from this Parliament?

We made a lot of progress. I am happy with that. I understand why the Bloc Quebecois does not want to vote, but I do not understand why all other members of Parliament do not want to vote together. We started to work together. We made our proposal and we fought very hard. It is unbelievable to have the New Democratic Party running away when we want to hear the voice of the people. When they cannot make the distinction between the forest and the trees, it is absolutely unbelievable.

Politically I am happy because when I travel in Canada I will say: "These are the people he does not want to be consulted in a national referendum". That is good for me, but it is bad for the country that they cannot elevate themselves high enough to have the three major parties agree on a bill. Even if it is not a perfect bill, it is the bill that will be the cause of one of the greatest days of Canada.

On that day in Canada we will all get up and we will walk to the polls. On that day Canadians will decide to be together for the next century. The people of English Canada will get up and will say: "Let us go to the polls and say yes to Quebec. Let us say yes to a new Canada". The people of Quebec will get up and say: "Yes, we want to stay in Canada because it is the best solution for us".

It will be a great night when all together the different parties of people who believe in this country will have given birth to the Canada of the 21st century.

My members will vote for this bill. We asked the government to say clearly that when the referendum is held we will not proceed if we do not have a majority from the four regions of Canada. We want the government to understand that we never propose a referendum just to push the premiers around, to have a solution, but to have ratification by every citizen. They will be able to go, as I said, and say despite of all the problems arising and all the problems we will have in the future, we are still number one. It is worth fighting for it. That is why we are all in this House.

I hope the referendum will be held in this land this year and the future will be great for what I consider to be the biggest and best country of the world, our beloved Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to point out to the House that yesterday's Votes and Proceedings contain several errors in the list of votes. Because of major computer problems that are still unexplained, the printed lists do not reflect accurately the notes given to the Clerk during last evening's votes.

The Chair has asked that a revised version of the Votes and Proceedings be reprinted later today and distributed as soon as possible. Unfortunately, the printing and the distribution of the Debates are also delayed for the same reason.

We apologize for any inconvenience resulting from that situation. We now resume debate with the leader of the New Democratic Party.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to speak on third reading of Bill C-81. Certainly the previous two non-partisan speeches have been very interesting, as has the long series of non-partisan speeches on the Constitution.

It is very important to clarify what we are speaking about today. It is not whether Canada should have a referendum. It is not whether Canadians should have a voice. We are debating Bill C-81 which would set out the technical details of how that voice would be heard and how that voice would be interpreted.

I would like to deviate from the previous two speeches and speak about some of the substance of this bill. Throughout the constitutional process the New Democratic Party has supported a referendum. We continue to do so. What we do support is a fair referendum and a referendum where Canadian voices are truly heard.

On several occasions—first the Beaudoin-Dobbie report and second in the Beaudoin-Edwards report—we supported along with the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party that a consultative referendum should be held on constitutional matters. We stand by that position.

On second reading of Bill C-81 we voted in favour because in principle we wanted to vote for a referendum. It was our understanding that the government would be open to some substantive changes. As the government House leader pointed out, some changes were made, but in our view these changes were not the fundamental ones that would have made this a fair referendum.

Throughout this constitutional debate I am proud to say that the New Democratic Party has pushed for an open process and involvement of Canadians in a way that Canadians could have a really substantive role in constitutional debate.

We have argued that for the Constitution to succeed new approaches had to be taken. I proposed two years ago that a constituent assembly should be established to discuss constitutional matters. The Liberal Party and the Conservative Party rejected that suggestion. They said no, that the old ways would have to work and they were not prepared to look at new approaches.

I believe that was an error. The six constitutional conferences which were subsequently held at the encouragement of New Democrats proved when Canadians from all parts of this country came together and listened to each other that they can come up with sensible and reasonable solutions and that in fact the citizens of this country have much to offer, as they would have to offer in a fair referendum.

Throughout this discussion of a referendum I have raised, as has other member of my party, many questions because we believe that a referendum should have careful thought and consideration. We have never put it forward as a magical solution to the country's problems. I think that would be unrealistic. But we have accepted it because we feel that we can trust Canadians and that when Canadians speak and have the chance to do so fairly they will make reasonable decisions.

Our goal in expressing concerns and in raising suggestions has been to ensure that if there is a referendum it is to be a fair one. It must represent a genuine reflection of the people's will and at the end of the day withstand scrutiny as having been the result of a just process so that one cannot discredit the outcome. It is very important that we start at the beginning to ensure success, not to build in failure.

That is why my party supported this bill at second reading and supported the reports of the Beaudoin-Edwards and Beaudoin-Dobbie committees. We voted in favour of that bill at second reading because we thought the government had given its assurance that it would accept the recommendations and amendments made in committee.

Our constitutional critic, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, proposed several reasonable amendments in committee yet, all those amendments were defeated by the government without serious consideration.

Bill C-81 was made even more unacceptable when the government deleted the clause, in fact its own clause, that would have made this bill invalid after three years. That legislation has now become permanent.

The government displayed absolutely no openmindedness. It is true, as the leader in the House mentioned, that some amendments were made, but they were not fundamental ones. The government rejected any form of non-partisan co-operation. Unfortunately, the result is that we now have an unacceptable bill. Because of this bill, the referendum campaign could be non-democratic.

What will be the value of the referendum if the campaign is dominated and manipulated by the rich and the powerful?

[English]

Yes, many Canadians want a referendum, but they want one in which their votes count for something and their voices will truly be heard.

A referendum bill to be fair should ensure four things: first, that every Canadian has a chance to take an equal part in the campaign; second, that the process be non-partisan where governments act as facilitators of the process and not as partisans putting forward their own agenda; third, that the question on the ballot be fair and understandable; and fourth, that there be some agreed upon means to interpret the results.

I have to say with regret that this bill fails on each count. It fails the test of fairness at every step, and it gives me no pleasure to say that. We wanted to see changes. We put forward reasonable amendments. We believed the government when it said it was open to real change because we wanted to support this bill.

I want to talk briefly about where we feel this bill fails the test of fairness. First there is the question of spending limits. One of the hallmarks of Canadian democracy is that elections are accessible not just to those who have the money.

Today in the United States it costs a person who wants to run for senator an average of $3.7 million. Certainly that leaves out the majority of Canadians who would ever want to participate in an election, if we do not continue to have reasonable spending limits that mean we have a democratic system.

There is no doubt there are precedents in this legislation—they are not legally binding, I understand that—which could lead to that road and that Americanization of our system where we do not have those spending limits.

The government said that we could not put in spending limits, that it was against the charter of rights. Then it brought in spending limits of $8 million per committee with a limitless number of committees. Is there really anybody in this House who does not believe that an $8 million limit is really no limit at all?

We have asked repeatedly. If the government had been prepared to do it, I would have been prepared to recommend that we vote for this bill. If the government had said that this was an important issue and it would make a reference to the Supreme Court about whether we could have reasonable spending limits, it seems to me that would have been a reasonable gesture. It would have put to rest this question, because there were differing legal opinions about whether or not there can be spending limits.

We cannot accept that a referendum in which money can be the determining factor is a fair and just referendum for Canadians. Referendums to be fair have to be accessible to all Canadians and there have to be spending limits. At the time of an $8 million study of our electoral system and the Electoral Reform Commission proposing significant changes which would allow fairer spending rules for elections, it is strange this government is setting a dangerous precedent in going in the other direction.

As I said earlier, let there be no mistake: This is clearly a move to an American style system, a system where now in the United States less than 50 per cent of the people vote. Why is that so? Almost all incumbents get re-elected. Few are challenged. It really is a system where people are influenced by lobby groups and by money. That is not the way we want to see the democratic system in Canada. Any long-term consequences this legislation would entrench are simply unacceptable.

It is interesting. A recent survey of American literature, just to illustrate this point, showed that winners in a referendum campaign spent eight times more than those who lost in a referendum campaign. It seems to me that says it all in terms of the importance of making sure we can have legislation that is fair.

The question Canadians have to ask themselves is: Do they want a referendum that can be bought or do they want a referendum that can be judged on the merits of the issues? Obviously I support the latter.

There is also the question of what is the role of government in a referendum?

[Translation]

This brings me to say a word about the role of the government. We know that this bill allows the government to get all the publicity that it wants. It enables the government to take sides, to use taxpayers money to promote one point of view at the expense of the other.

Of course, if the question only consisted of asking the population whether it likes Canada or not, it would not matter so much. Obviously, all members of the federal parties like Canada.

The question should have to do with the content of the agreement that was reached. The role of the government would then be to give people the information they need to make a decision.

A referendum is a consultation process: You ask people what they think. To be able to make a decision, these people need to hear the arguments supporting the two views.

Do not try to tell people how they should vote. Listen to them. Trust Canadians.

[English]

Then we come to the matter of the question and the fact that the framing and timing of that question at this point in this legislation is left solely in the hands of the Prime Minister and the cabi net. In that case, this will be a government referendum.

Let me be honest. I really cannot understand why the government has chosen not to involve in a meaningful way the other federal parties in this House and why the government would not accept in the legislation that a question should be formed in a non-partisan way and that any question posed and discussed in this House should be approved by a majority of 60 per cent in this House of Commons. Surely that is only reasonable. It is only common sense.

If we are going to be truly non-partisan, let us be non-partisan. Let us have meaningful consultation and co-operation and listen to the suggestions from all sides.

In previous days, I asked the Prime Minister if he would consult the provinces, territories, and aboriginal people as well about the formation of the question and he has rejected that.

Surely, all of us who want this country united, who believe that we have not been sent to this House of Commons to destroy this country, want to ensure there is a fair process to build on success. We want to make sure that we consult with all of the parties involved and make sure that we are going to the people with a question that is real, that is genuine, that is non-partisan.

Then the peopBle of Canada can say: "Yes, I want to vote for that kind of Canada because that is a Canada where politicians work together, where provinces, territories, aboriginal people work together. That is the kind of Canada I want to work for, and that is the kind I want to vote for".

That is the kind of referendum we want to see.

It seems to me the amendments we proposed were common sense. Heaven knows we are going to need all the common sense we can muster in the next few months.

Finally, I want to turn to the issue of how a referendum would be interpreted. All three federal parties in this House have signed reports on where they stand.

They stated that a consultative referendum should be interpreted by a regional or double majority so that no one part of the country could be seen to be left out. I agree with that. When we signed that, when we discussed that issue in those various committees, we were serious about that. We did not just sign that and say: "Oh, well, when it comes to a referendum we will just put that aside".

I know we said that in the report. We said there should be some interpretation. We said parts of the country should be assured they will not be left out but when it comes to it we will just go along. We will not forget we said that and that we are committed to that.

The New Democratic Party has not forgotten it was committed to saying that the west has to have a voice, Quebec has to have a voice, Ontario has to have a voice, the maritimes and Newfoundland and Labrador must have a voice, and the north must have a voice. It has not forgotten that. When our party makes those commitments in reports that it signs, it means them.

Obviously, it seems more expedient to put that aside, for the government to say no. It wants Canadians to have a voice, but it is not going to tell them how it is going to listen to that voice. Yes, Canadians can put their marks on the ballots and their views might be taken or they might not. The government will decide at the time. That is not good enough. It is not good enough for Canadians to become involved in their country, to mark their ballots for their country, and then to be ignored.

There are indeed many problems with this bill. I repeat once again that today's debate is not on the principle of a referendum but rather on the appropriate rules governing such an exercise.

I have already mentioned the two reports that we supported, just like the Conservatives and the Liberals did, and which recommended not only that all of Canada should give its approval, but also that each region should support the same constitutional objectives.

• (1130)

Those represent our major concerns about this bill. Some may suggest, indeed some have here today, that we have raised some of the worst case scenarios. Surely, it is our role as parliamentarians to analyse carefully what is being done here. I make no apology for that because legislation should foresee all possible scenarios.

We know that the result of any referendum could be called into question by those the Prime Minister has called the enemies of Canada. That is precisely why we have to build in fairness and legitimacy to the process, so that the process itself will not be called into question and so that these enemies, these people who want to destroy Canada, do not have that tool in their arsenal. It is fundamental that the process is seen as legitimate from the beginning.

A campaign bought by the rich with a meaningless question could be simply divisive. Those who want to destroy Canada would use it against Canada.

There are those in this House who say that we have to accept this inadequate bill, that we should not have a democratic debate because we should all just go along and that is the better thing to do and the nicer thing to do. I dare say there will not be one person in this House who votes yes on this bill who does not believe it is an inadequate bill. I have to say that, yes, the easy thing to do is to simply go along.

I have listened to the insults and the charges by the Leader of the Opposition and the government leader. I make no apologies that I take my responsibility as a parliamentarian seriously to raise serious questions in this House.

Yes, it is more comfortable in the short term to accept something knowing it is inadequate. Let us remember this is not as it was originally proposed, legislation that would be in place for three years, but now is permanent legislation. Therefore, those who are going to vote yes on this inadequate legislation should think they are voting now for permanent legislation.

As I said earlier, we are not debating whether there should be a referendum. If there is a referendum the New Democratic Party will participate in it. But the essence of parliamentary debate and what we are sent here to do is to raise questions when we feel they are serious, not to oppose for the sake of opposing, but to stand up for fairness and to ensure that all Canadians have a voice.

We will never back down from doing that and we will never back down from debate because of fear. We will debate on substance and merit. We will stand up in this House on every occasion, yes, even on the occasion of the Constitution and debate from the principles we believe, based on the substance and merit of whatever is being debated. We will not be intimidated by those who say: "Well, I will get you in the next election". I care more about this country than I do about the next election. It is our job as parliamentarians to raise questions and to debate.

I regret that we will not be able to support this bill at third reading. I urge the government to make sure it will reconsider and offer Canadians a fair voice.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party she has a lot of courage, and although we do not share the same vision of the future of this country, her respect for democratic values is shared by Quebec and by parliaments in other countries, including Great Britain. I know there will be a political price to pay for what she is doing, but I think that in the long run, people will realize that she was right, since this referendum will resolve absolutely nothing because of the undemocratic and unwarranted provisions this bill contains.

Let this day be remembered as one of the saddest days in the life of this Parliament and the history of this government. A government that was elected to bring Quebec back with honour and enthusiasm is now creating a machine to crush the aspirations of Quebecers.

If you were not convinced before, Mr. Speaker, you should have listened to the speech by the Leader of the Opposition, who gave this government the kiss of death by supporting a bill that, he hopes, will bring Quebecers smartly into line.

This Parliament should be ashamed of this undemocratic exercise. To members who think that in the short term they will be able to make some political gain, I say that in the long run they will realize that the seeds they sow today will lead to the break-up of this country. I want them to understand that Quebecers will never feel bound by this referendum, and that this kind of provocation merely helps the cause of the Bloc quebecois, for which we are thankful.

In any case, the government has shown a lack of integrity in the way it treats its citizens. All this is just a smoke screen to hide what is in fact a deplorable failure. A government that apparently was sincere in its commitments to Quebec is now running roughshod over every jot and tittle of those commitments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him that the purpose of the period for questions and comments is to allow comments or questions on what was said by the previous speaker.

Mr. Lapierre: I could not agree more, Mr. Speaker, and I was just getting to that.

I would like to say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that the weaknesses she found in this bill are there for all to see. There is not a person on this planet who could give the futile exercise the leader of the Opposition favours any credibility.

I may remind the Leader of the Opposition that if he had met the commitments he made in 1980, we would not have the kind of mess we have today, and since he was also among those who killed Meech Lake, he is doubly responsible for this situation.

Government members who have now become the accomplices of the leader of the Opposition should be ashamed. I see the Minister of Labour, who got the nationalist and sovereigntist vote by flirting with sovereignty. I say he has betrayed his constituents.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shefford obviously does not agree with us on what the future of our country should be. In fact, the Bloc Quebecois does not want a future for Canada. The New Democratic Party does want this country to have a future, and that is why we want a fair referendum.

[English]

In listening to the political speeches of the three speakers today from the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the Bloc Quebecois, I feel very comfortable in saying that while there seems to be a lot of fighting of the next election here today in this House, I want to fight for Canada. I think that is what we should be doing now.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to pose a couple of questions to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party. It is usually the other way, that she is firing the questions over here. This is a rare opportunity.

First of all, the leader referred to a constituent assembly and I know her party has advocated one. It did in its dissent to the committee that I had the privilege of co-chairing. How does she reconcile the idea of a constituent assembly having no accountability? Does she not feel that constitutional change should reside here, among people who are accountable in the most final way, in a general election?

Second, she referred to some United States precedents with the relationship between election spending and the successful candidates. That really has no relevancy to a referendum campaign. It does apply when there are candidates in the field.

Colleagues of the member made the point they thought the 1988 election had been bought by special interests. I would ask her whether she has seen any scholarly study or otherwise that would prove the relationship between expenditures made in the 1988 Canadian election campaign and the outcome of that election.

Finally, the member referred to the idea the Prime Minister had rejected the involvement of the provinces and territories from forming the question. Does she not believe they are intimately involved through the present process in determining what the package will be and thereby, by deduction, will be heavily involved in answering the question? I know she posed a question to the Prime Minister a couple of weeks ago on the subject, but I think the question was an all-embracing one involving various groups other than the provinces and territories. I think the Prime Minister's response was if we consulted everybody, we would not have a question.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, a constituent assembly was proposed almost two years ago now at the beginning of the constitutional process. Obviously it is not a process that would be valuable at this time. That is why we support a referendum, but a fair referendum.

In terms of the constituent assembly, as it was originally proposed, I would say the constitutional conferences the government finally did support were microcosms of what that constituent assembly could have looked like. But it was rejected at the beginning. It was rejected as being too different and new. We had to go a traditional way.

A lot of countries have used constituent assemblies and there are many models. There are many ways this country could have gone at the beginning, but we are not at the beginning of the constitutional process now. I think most Canadians hope we are definitely at the end of the constitutional process.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I would certainly agree we need to be debating much more in this House the questions of the economy and of our communities across this country that desperately need help; the services in this country that need help; and the unemployed who need the attention of this government and a change in economic policies.

Much work has been done in California and here in Canada in terms of studies about the use of money in referendums. I have not read any studies done on the spending of money during the free trade debate in 1988, which is what the member was referring to I assume. I think there is no doubt all of those people who spent millions of dollars just before the 1988 election to support the Canada-U.S. trade deal, to convince the Canadian people and put fear into their hearts, did not do it because they thought that money would not do any good. They did it because they knew it would influence Canadians and in fact spending that money does influence Canadians. I do not need a scholarly study. Those people did not spend millions of dollars because they thought it would be useless. They spent it because they thought they could put fear into the Canadian people. Now Canadians, including those who supported the Canada-U.S. trade deal, know what it meant is you will lose your job.

Finally, I specifically asked the Prime Minister whether he would involve the provinces, territories and aboriginal people. Those are the three parties, as well as the federal government, at the constitutional table. The Prime Minister clearly said no, it was the purview of the federal government.

My point in asking that question was simply to point out once again to let us try and build in some success here. Let us stop fighting the next election. Let us work for the country and let us do that together. That will be a non-partisan process.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to participate in the debate on third reading of Bill C-81.

This is legislation which will allow us, when circumstances warrant and when its effect is beneficial, to hold a referendum on constitutional changes.

Of course, this bill, and I emphasize this point, is not part of the amending formula of our Constitution. Neither does it replace the traditional means based on common sense that we used in the past to change the Constitution, that is the consultation, the discussion and the negotiation leading to a consensus, nor does it claim to impute to them other intentions.

The bill is not a substitute for the process I just described. To the contrary. It is another tool we are giving ourselves to try to find long term solutions to constitutional issues by consulting the people and putting to good use the opinions they will express on a given question.

If the situation allows it, the opinions thus expressed by the people could guide us toward a more solid consensus. A referendum would not solve the problem once and for all since it is not binding and has only a consultative value, but it could lead us further on the path toward a settlement of our constitutional differences.

This bill we are reviewing today is a good piece of legislation, which our colleagues in the legislative committee made even better. I will not deal with the policy issues concerning this bill. Rather, I will comment on changes made by the legislative committee.

All the members will remember that the government House leader announced, even before the committee hearings started, that the government was going to offer to set limits on the expenses of the referendum committees and would present an amendment to this effect. The legislative committee adopted an amendment which applies to the registered committees more or less the same rules as the ones political parties have to abide by when it comes to election expenses.

For the year starting April 1, 1992, the limit, just as in the case of a political party, is set at 56.4 cents per voter in the riding where the committee intends to campaign. A clause to this effect was added to the bill so that when a committee applies for registration, it has to state, in the application form signed by its president, in which riding it intends to campaign.

As far as the subsequent question of campaign contributions is concerned, a new disposition of the bill makes it impossible for any registered referendum committee to accept contributions from, first of all, an individual who is not a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident; second, a corporation that does not carry on business in Canada; third, a trade union that does not hold bargaining rights for employees in Canada and, fourth, a foreign government or an agent thereof.

This new clause will guarantee that any consultation of the people will be free of any outside influence. The reason for this provision is crystal clear; it will ensure an even greater fairness.

I would also like you to notice that when a government makes a contribution to a registered referendum committee, this contribution has to appear in the committee's report regarding its expenses and the contributions it received. This improvement also was made by the legislative committee.

The bill was further improved in a number of other areas. Among the very positive improvements, I note the amendment to clause 3 which was approved by all parties in the legislative committee which provides that the text of the question will be available in aboriginal languages. That is a new provision at the federal level; it says that the Chief Electoral Officer shall ensure that the text of a referendum question is available in such aboriginal languages and in such places in those languages as the Chief Electoral Officer, after consultation with representatives of aboriginal groups, may determine.

The bill was again amended in order to allow for better consultation on the question itself. The new subsection 5(2) makes it mandatory to consult about the proposed text at least three days before notice of the motion for approval of the text is given. The government is thus showing that it is open to consultation on any referendum question which could be debated in this House.

That amendment is proof of our willingness to co–operate in the improvement of the process itself and therefore, of the legitimacy of that process.

It is with that same spirit of openness and fairness that we added to the bill a clause which allows members to play a role; it lets them examine the regulations which the Chief Electoral Officer proposes to make to adapt the Canada Elections Act or respecting the conduct of a referendum in general.

• (1150)

The bill now says that each regulation that the Chief Electoral officer proposes shall be deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons at least seven days before the day on which the regulation is proposed to be made. The appropriate committee of the House of Commons may make such recommendations it considers appropriate to the Chief Electoral Officer.

The Chief Electoral Officer, as an officer of Parliament, will be grateful to us for such a useful clause as it will allow him to take advantage of the background and past experience of hon. members. This clause will help guarantee that any regulation the government may use to govern the campaign is not only fair, but perceived to be fair.

Finally, other changes accepted by the committee deal with issues like enumeration for elections and revision of lists of electors, but there is also another very important change.

Bill C-81, as originally proposed, contained a sunset clause which provided that it would remain in force for a period of three years only, unless extended by a joint resolution of both houses of Parliament.

Our colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore, proposed to change that and provide for a review after three years. This change, introduced by an ardent proponent of direct democracy, means that Canada will keep on the books, for an indeterminate period of time, a statute dealing with constitutional referendums.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill that enables us to hold referendums on constitutional matters, if this is deemed useful. It does not, and I stress this point, commit us to hold a referendum. Rather, it allows us to prepare for a referendum in a way that will eliminate any doubt about its fairness and openness, and inspire confidence in its results.

This legislation respects the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in allowing for maximum participation; freedom of speech is respected while ensuring accountability. As members of Parliament, we are creating a new right to participate in the event of a referendum; with this new right comes the responsibility to campaign according to rules that are clear and fair and enforced by someone in whom we all have the utmost confidence, the Chief Electoral Officer.

I am confident that this legislation is good for Canada. It will induce participation. If the government, at its discretion, decides that a referendum must be held, we will be ready.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I would like to express my thanks to the minister for his intervention during which he quite justly reminded us that some of the amendments proposed by the Liberal Party as well as by the NDP and the Tories have been accepted. I believe he is absolutely right in saying that with these amendments, the bill is a much better one than it was in the beginning.

There is however an amendment which was not received either by the House or by the committee because the Clerk of Committee had recommended to the chairman to rule against it because it was beyond the scope of the bill. It is a political matter and I would like to ask him a question about it. The question I wish to put to him deals with the interpretation of the results if there is a referendum.

We, of the Liberal Party of Canada, would have preferred that the bill provide for the results of a national referendum to be interpreted on a regional basis and that, God forbid, if a majority of citizens, Quebecers for example, refused to give their approval to the question, the Government of Canada commit itself not to implement the constitutional proposal.

I understand that the proposed amendment was ruled out of order, but the question remains: If the government has a referendum inviting Canadians to vote on a series of constitutional proposals, will the Conservative government give us the assurance that it will not implement these proposals if a majority of Canadians do not give their approval in all four regions of the country?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, were we to focus the debate on the political issue instead of on the legal nature of the amendment my hon. colleague presented in committee, I would agree with his position and with his amendment if the referendum bill introduced by the Government of Canada was binding. Then, I would understand why he moved this amendment which, I must say, I would tend to support.

However, Bill C–81 being read a third time today is a consultative piece of legislation. So, I do not think it is necessary, from a legal point of view, to specify in the bill how the results should be interpreted.

However, I must say to my colleague that the object of this exercise is to bring Quebec back into the Canadian Constitution. Consequently, if Quebecers say no, then I do not think it would be wise for a government, whichever it is, to force a view or a bill on the people.

I can understand the position of the Liberal Party of Canada in this debate. We appreciate their support for this bill, but I do not think the concerns of my colleague are justified, since C–81 is a consultative bill.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): I have listened with great interest to what the minister just said, Mr. Speaker. I would indeed wish to underline that the minister represents a neighbouring riding of my own. Contrary to what the Bloc Quebecois member for Shefford said earlier, I admire the excellent work he does for all his constituents, both nationalists and federalists. This, to me, is highly important and needs to be underlined.

The question I would like to address to the minister is the following: the government House leader has stated that all those who vote against this kind of referendum are somehow against Canada. I know that some of my constituents oppose this referendum and likewise in the neighbouring riding represented by the minister.

An hon. member: Most of them.

Mr. Edmonston: Please, I can speak for myself. I would ask him if he can dissociate himself from these comments about his constituents, a great number of which may be against the referendum? Can he dissociate himself from the comments made about people being against Canada simply because they are opposed to the referendum.

• (1200)

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I was not here when the government House leader made his remarks, but as I understand my colleague here, he seems to be saying that if someone is against this bill in the House, that person is against Canada. I do not think one can oppose this bill because of some technical points that are not in it; I understand that very well.

As a Quebecer, the hon. member for Chambly knows very well that we in Quebec really had a model referendum law in 1980. But my colleague also knows that in the 600 or so referendums held in the western world, about 324 in Switzerland and 300 in all the other countries, there was never legislation similar to what Quebec had in 1980. It was unusual legislation. The reason it was possible in 1980—and the Quebec legislation is undoubtedly very laudable—was that a consensus could be reached, I think. People on both sides agreed at that time that they wanted it to happen in that way. Also, they did not have what we have now: opinions on the charter.

As my colleague knows very well, we discussed the bill at length before reaching this stage. I put some direct questions—I was not on the committee, and my colleague must have done the same if he was there—to the Deputy Minister of Justice, who is in fact the government's legal adviser, and to the Minister of Justice. These people felt that we could not proceed in the same way as the Quebec Referendum Act. It would be contrary to the Charter. Governments must be responsible. A government cannot go against the advice of the Department of Justice and of those whose duty it is to advise the government. That is why we allowed some amendments in committee. We ensured that all spending in a referendum campaign, including spending by the government, would be completely open.

What my friend, the member for Shefford, just said is wrong, because he knows very well that all government spending will be public. If a referendum is held and the government decides to participate in it, the government will have to proceed as the law requires and form a committee. We are thus assured of as much openness as possible, I think, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint–Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate at third reading and support Bill C–81.

I listened very carefully to all the speakers, the members of the government as well as the members of the different opposition parties. What strikes me is the fact that during the debate at second reading as well as at the report stage several speakers made, to my way of thinking, a fundamental mistake by overlooking an important distinction. Indeed, this debate is on a bill which will provide a referendum tool for the government, but there will be another debate if the government decides to submit a referendum question to the approval of the House of Commons and to consult Canadians.

Yet, a good number of arguments made by members of the New Democratic Party as well as speakers from the Bloc Quebecois may well be pointless, depending on what wil happen when the government decides to use this tool that we are giving him with this referendum act.

We do not know if the Canadian government will hold a national referendum in only one province, or a referendum in a number of provinces. The Bloc Quebecois members are up in arms against the government because it might try to move the referendum that should normally be held in the fall in Quebec, under the provincial legislation.

This is merely speculation. The Bloc Quebecois members do not know if this fall, following an agreement between the Canadian and provincial governments, the federal government will use this legislation to hold a consultation only in all the provinces where there is not already a referendum act allowing provincial authorities to hold their own referendum.

I say this: Be patient; you can voice your fears and concerns at that time, if need be, but it is certainly premature to do so now. You are wasting your time because you have no way of knowing for sure how the consultation process will be implemented this fall.

Second, they tell me the Prime Minister has made a statement. Well, the Prime Minister makes statements every day. He once said that he was in favour of a referendum. Then, a few months later, he said that no, he was not totally sold on the idea. The Speech from the Throne included a promise to table a referendum bill. Then, the minister said that no, there would be no such legislation. In the end, we do have a referendum act. I am not about to be concerned by a statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister. The reality is in the legislation. Section 3 of Bill C-81 states clearly that the government can hold a national referendum in all the provinces or only in one province or some. We will see what happens when the government decides to hold its referendum.

Again, I tell our friends from the Bloc Quebecois: Save your breath; there is no need to worry at this point because you do not know what the referendum will be like; when concerns are expressed about the Government of Canada having a referendum and that referendum not being democratic because there will be no umbrella committees. We do not know either whether it will be on a single question or several.

Bill C-81 enables the government to ask one orA several questions. Serious legal opinions were received from the Department of Justice as well as from respectable legal firms across the country. The hon. member says they are Tory legal firms. I know for a fact that lawyers with affiliations with all political formations can be found in all major legal firms. In Montreal, they even have péquiste lawyers.

Therefore, every major legal firm has someone tuned in all major formations. Personally, I go with the legal opinions provided and they say that government must draft its legislation very carefully so as not to impede on the freedom of association of individuals.

If several questions are asked, it will obviously be extremely difficult to get people to group together under either the yes umbrella or the no umbrella since, there being several questions, some will answer yes to one and no to another. So, if there are only two umbrella committees, one yes and one no, you can be sure it will be impossible to properly categorize everyone under one or the other.

I will remind the hon. members opposed to this bill that it does not repeat word for word what the Quebec legislation passed in 1981 says, where it was perfectly clear that there were to be only two umbrellas: one for the people who wanted Quebec to remain a part of Canada and one for those who wanted Quebec to separate. In that case, there were clearly two umbrellas and only two.

Again, what we have is omnibus legislation allowing the Government of Canada to call referendums on the Constitution of Canada. To those who oppose this bill because it does not specify whether there will be a yes umbrella and a no umbrella, I say: "Hang on, when government will use this piece of legislation to submit constitutional amendments to the approval of the people of Canada, we will see if there is more than one question and if people will spontaneously break into two groups only. And, whether the law says so or not, common sense will prevail". Of course, we will be able to tell whether it is normal and natural to have only two umbrellas and whether people will spontaneously get under one or the other.

I repeat, those who oppose this legislation do so without knowing how it will be applied and it is too early to tell.

Third I say to those who think that the government will take advantage of its position that they are speculating on the circumstances surrounding a future referendum.

Evidently, we in the Liberal Party will ensure that Canadians may express their opinion on the constitutional reform, and particularly that Canadians have the opportunity to say yes to Quebec and Quebecers to say yes to Canada.

We think that when the government establishes that most democratic process to consult the people on constitutional reform, it will be possible to obtain with them a reform which will take into account the legitimate demands of Quebec, of the aboriginal peoples and of the citizens of the less populated provinces of Canada, provided that the constitutional proposal meets the objectives which were expressed so very clearly and precisely by the leader of the Liberal Party. If that constitutional proposal is submitted to the people, we have no hesitation, we are sure we will come alongside of the government.

If I understood the statements of the NPD leader properly, I think they also will join with the government and with us to fight in favour of Canada. I say to those who are here under false pretence—except for the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie—that in the province of Quebec, people will vote in favour of a renewed Canadian federalism which would satisfy Quebec's objectives.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: Finally, a lot has been said about the fact that this bill is flawed—

An hon. member: Totally.

Mr. Ouellet: —because it does not provide a clause to interpret the referendum results.

Earlier today in the debate, our leader expressed the hope that no constitutional change would be made without the approval of a majority of citizens from the four major regions of the country. Of course, we think that it would be more appropriate to insert that clause in the legislation itself.

I raised that matter earlier with the minister, who assured me that the referendum bill has no legal effect per se to amend the Constitution. So, it is obvious that, even if this consultation of the people has no legal value or is not binding, it will necessarily have a huge moral and symbolic value.

We think that when the Prime Minister decides to put to the people of Canada a constitutional proposal, since it is not in this bill, it will be extremely important that he announces, even before the referendum, that his government undertakes not to proceed with a series of constitutional amendments unless they have been approved by a majority of Canadians in each of the major regions of the country.

To us, of the Liberal Party of Canada, it is obvious that, in the future, we will let such a commitment be our guide.

One thing is certain. When we return to power, this referendum legislation will be amended. The bill provides for its revision by a parliamentary committee in four years. By that time, I hope, the Liberals will be back in power and in a position, with their majority, to amend this legislation. We shall ensure that, in future, constitutional amendments will have to be submitted to Canadians for approval and will require the approval of not only an over-all majority of Canadians but of a majority of Canadians in the Atlantic provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario and in Western provinces.

I see that my time has just about run out, but I would like to raise another point before concluding. I would like to stress that a parliamentary committee gave this bill very serious consideration.

An hon. member: Over two days.

Mr. Ouellet: Some Bloc Quebecois members made a lot of noise for the media over the manner in which this bill was considered at report stage. I would point out that few of them made an appearance while the parliamentary committee was examining this bill and they stayed only for a few minutes. They completely underestimated the very serious work that was done at that stage. I would remind them that a large number of amendments were presented.

I point this out because that is why the Liberal Party supports the bill.

• (1220)

I would like to say that I am very sorry. I accept, I understand, and I respect the position of the New Democratic Party. It will not vote for the bill, not because it is against the holding of a referendum but because it thinks the bill is no good. That is that party's decision.

We want the Canadian government to have an instrument to consult the people. If we vote against the instrument the government is giving us at last then we do not have the instrument. On one hand the NDP is saying that we should have the possibility of consulting the people through a referendum, but on the other hand it is not voting to allow it to happen. Frankly I accept and understand its position to a certain degree, but I fail to see the logic in it.

There is never perfect legislation in Parliament. Mr. Speaker, you witness day after day bills being studied in Parliament. They are passed but they are never perfect.

I want to give credit to the government. Otherwise it would not have been possible to have these amendments. The Liberal Party presented 12 amendments, 7 of which were accepted by the government. They are amendments that I consider important.

There is a few I would have liked to have seen accepted, but they were not accepted. Anyway, I believe the fundamental exercise here is to give an instrument to the Canadian government to consult the people of Canada on constitutional matters and amendments to the Constitution.

To the Liberal Party this is absolutely essential. We cannot accept that the people of Quebec could be consulted on their political future and the rest of Canada could not be consulted. Therefore, we feel this instrument, this legislation, is a tool in the hands of the government that is absolutely essential at this time. We will certainly support this legislation at third reading.

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. This member was the last one to rise. During the 10-minute question and comment period, you should not go by any list, but by the first members to rise in order to be recognized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to remind the hon. member, who has a lot of respect for the parliamentary process, that traditionally, when an hon. member has just made a speech, the Speaker looks to the other side of the House. According to this great British parliamentary tradition, I looked opposite the direction of the previous speaker and I noticed the hon. member for Edmonton South West standing up. Right after his question, I would be glad, of course, to look over your side and, if you are standing up, to recognize you. The hon. member for Edmonton South West.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out that the previous speaker was a member from the other side of the House. The present speaker is from this side, and then we will have a question from the other opposition party, the NDP. It is quite normal that we should also have an opportunity to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the hon. member is trying to do indirectly what the Standing Orders will not allow him to do directly, that is to question the Speaker's ruling. The previous speaker was to my left, so I looked right. I am glad to recognize the hon. member for Edmonton South West.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think our friends opposite, having had a little practice over the last few days, have decided they like to shout and barrack.

I have a few questions for my hon. friend for Papineau—Saint-Michel who has contributed so much to the constitutional process in our country over the last dozen years or more.

I appreciate what he said about the detailed study of this bill which took place in committee. I did a totalling of the hours in committee and it sat in excess of 18 hours over three days. It heard from the Minister and the Deputy Minister of Justice and later on from the three expert witnesses. Finally, there was the long day of 11 virtually uninterrupted hours doing the clause by clause study. He contributed an immense amount to the success of the bill in committee.

The hon. member referred to the NDP members' position on this bill and like him, I respect their position. But I am a little sorrowful about it because it gives the appearance the NDP members may be opposed to the holding of a referendum although we know that is not their intention. I wonder if he might undertake to use his good offices to persuade his neighbours to perhaps change their minds between now and 4.45 p.m. when we vote.

On the questions of substance on the Liberal position, I wonder if my hon. friend could comment a little further on the four regional majorities idea his party has advocated consistently for some time. Beaudoin–Dobbie advocated there be a consulted referendum but without regional majorities. My friend and I worked on a committee the previous year that recommended those majorities. He will recall there were provinces that immediately rejected the idea and said it violated the idea of provincial equality. They said it moved in the direction of regions on which this country was not built.

I wonder if he would comment on the positions of Alberta and Newfoundland in particular on that issue and on the more recent development that British Columbia regards itself as a fifth region. Has he consulted with his colleague and desk mate from Vancouver Quadra on that issue to learn what the British Columbia position would be?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I must interrupt the hon. speaker because many other speakers want to raise questions to the hon. member.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer the hon. member's question and to explain very briefly why we are talking about regional majority in this country.

You have to acknowledge that Canada is one of the most decentralized countries there is. Throughout the years, provincial premiers have gained in importance and influence like none of their counterparts elsewhere in the world. You just have to compare the influence of a provincial premier with that of a governor in the United States to see how our premiers have become omnipresent and important in our political process. It has reached a stage where it took us almost 50 years to patriate the Canadian Constitution. Why? Because at the federal–provincial conferences, the Prime Minister of Canada could never reach an agreement with the premiers, who were just trying to get benefits for their own province, always to the detriment of the central government.

We, in the Liberal Party think that to leave the final decision to the people is one way to put an end to this inevitable trench war between the Prime Minister and the premiers. It is only natural that a premier would defend the interests of his province and demand the best for his people at a federal–provincial conference, but what is best for his province is not necessarily what is best for the whole country.

That is why we think that if we ask the people, all Canadians as Canadians, to vote on this question and if we get a majority in each of the major regions of the country, then the will and the common sense of the people will prevail, not the provincial or regional interests of the premiers.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member told us this bill was not legally binding and that it was merely consultative. Many members on the government side have told us the same thing. It is what we were told in 1942, before the referendum on conscription. The Prime Minister at the time used a crystal ball and consulted his dog before making decisions.

Mrs. Venne: It was Mackenzie King.

Mr. Duceppe: Perhaps they were better than our Prime Minister's current advisers, who in many cases are the same people who advised the former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau.

I get the impression the purpose of this referendum is to sabotage the Quebec process. Time allocation is being used to restrict debate on this bill, but the hon. member says "I will support it, although I have a number of reservations". His party did not support Meech Lake, especially his leader with his "thank you, Clyde", as he said, although that exercise was supposed to save Canada. They had reservations, and they did not support Meech. I fail to see the logic in all this.

I wish the hon. member would answer the following question: If we recognize Quebec's right to self-determination, would it not make more sense for this Parliament and the other legislatures to put offers on the table? When a referendum is held under Bill 150, would it not make sense for federalists in Quebec to use these offers to say: "Vote no to sovereignty"? I think it would because the process would recognize the right to self-determination.

When all is said and done, I wonder whether the hon. member feels confident enough to face Quebec's federalist leadership, starting with Premier Bourassa. Is that not the real problem? Is that not why they want to sabotage the process? Do they think the federalist leadership in Quebec is incapable of defending the federalist option because it feels uncomfortable if no offers or only unacceptable offers are forthcoming?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I will say that Mackenzie King must have a very good adviser, since he was Prime Minister for 23 years.

An hon. member: Yes, his dog.

Mr. Ouellet: I would also like to say to the hon. member for Laurier-Ste. Marie that, like so many Quebecers who want to see Quebec separate from Canada, he is sadly mistaken when he deliberately perpetrates the myth that the Leader of the Liberal Party was the one who prevented Meech, because that is just not true.

An hon. member: It is.

Mr. Ouellet: If the leader of the Bloc Quebecois had been a little more frank in his disclosures, a little more "À visage découvert", he would have told us he was one of the people responsible for the demise of Meech Lake. He left the Conservative Party even before the Meech Lake Accord was rejected. He sabotaged the process that had been started to save Meech when he made his sensational exit from the Tory government.

At the very moment the parliamentary committee chaired by the Minister of the Environment was making recommendations that might have saved Meech, the leader of the Bloc, probably anxious to see the accord fail, left the Conservative Party. I imagine, and I say this with regret, that if he had not left the ranks of the Conservative Party, it probably would have been much easier to get an agreement on Meech at the time. However, by leaving the party and doing what he did, he precluded any possibility of an agreement.

Today in Parliament, with the exception of the hon. member for Laurier—Ste. Marie, whom I respect because he was properly elected, while his colleagues who crossed the floor and have no mandate from their constituents to take the kind of position they are taking, these people are trying to break up the country. I say to them that Quebecers want —

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The period for questions and comments is over.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be able to speak at third reading on the bill before us, Bill C-81, an act to provide for the possible holding of referendums in Canada.

I listened with care to the interventions that preceded this, and in particular to that of the hon. Leader of the Opposition who said a couple of things I wish to comment on. He said, first of all, a referendum is not proposed as a deadlock-breaking mechanism. I am sure he was not contemplating the government would use it as such.

I think all parties whose members have subscribed to this idea and to this legislation are holding to the recommendations of Beaudoin-Edwards and Beaudoin-Dobbie, which have identical wordings. "We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal either to confirm the existence of the national consensus, or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions." That is not a deadlock-breaking mechanism. It is a facilitative mechanism.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition went on to say, and I believe this is a direct quote: "Whatever happens, there will be a referendum". That is not the intention of the government. The government would much rather this process be seen to a successful conclusion without the holding of a referendum.

The whole purpose of having this bill proclaimed into law, as I hope it will be soon, is to be able to use the device of a referendum if absolutely necessary. Mackenzie King was quoted just a moment or so ago, and I would say a referendum if necessary, but not necessarily a referendum, to paraphrase that Canadian statesman.

As colleagues have said, there was very detailed discussion in committee. The bill does not say a referendum must be held or how it should be interpreted. There were 29 amendments proposed in committee. Thirteen of those were accepted in committee or at report stage, and as my hon. friend from Papineau—Saint-Michel has said, seven out of the twelve were Liberal amendments.

It is correct, as the hon. House leader was saying, that there are rather strict limitations on what can be done in the context of 1992 as opposed, for example, to 1980 in the sense we are operating within the atmosphere of a charter today. The freedom of association issue as well as the freedom of speech issue have to be dealt with.

If there are to be umbrella committees that happen voluntarily then that is fine. They presumably would work if they were made to work, but it is our belief to mandate them would be unconstitutional and in some ways perhaps absurd.

With reference to the consultation on the question, I would like to point out not only did we provide a public undertaking to consult the leaders of the recognized parties in the House as opposition parties had requested, but we went a step further. We made that commitment in the bill itself, so it is required now by law as well as by moral commitment, or will be when the bill is proclaimed.

On the issues of financing and the definition of expenses, we have taken the concerns of Canadians into account and have gone a step toward the aboriginal peoples of Canada to make sure the text of the question will be available where appropriate in aboriginal languages.

I would like for a moment to deal with the proposed amendment which was defeated last night and which had been offered by my hon. friend, the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. It is an issue that has puzzled a number of people. What is the appropriate word to describe what we have before us? Is it a plebiscite or a referendum?

Some study on the issue indicates that the word "referendum" and its French equivalent référendum are much more widely understood and accepted, at least in Canada, than the words "plebiscite" and plébiscite. That is particularly the case in the French language. The French word plébiscite is usually given a different meaning. The Quebec legislation which is la Loi sur la consultation populaire uses the term référendum. Using another term in the federal legislation might lead to confusion. To avoid this confusion we might have to use the word référendum in French even if we agreed to the change proposed by my friend, the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, in the English version of the bill. While that may be technically correct in French, it might lead to a different type of confusion which we would all like to avoid.

I had the opportunity to meet an international expert on referendums, Professor Francis Delpérée of the University of Louvain in Belgium. He has put together one of the most definitive works on the subject. It is titled simply Référendum and has several articles from many countries that have had referendum experience.

I will quote from the Canada section of that work. The article was written by our distinguished colleague from the other place, the hon. Senator Gérald Beaudoin:

[Translation]

> There are several types of consultative or deliberative referendums. In the first, the people are consulted; in the second, the people participate in the legislative process. Furthermore, the referendum can be optional or required. In Canada, because the Constitution is silent on this point, referendums are optional.

[English]

In other words, the word "referendum" is used in the article by Senator Beaudoin exclusively. He, I submit, is one of the resident authorities.

However, I was not content to stay with Senator Beaudoin in investigating this issue. I purchased yesterday a book called The People's Mandate: Referendums in a More Democratic Canada by Patrick Boyer who is the very member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who had proposed the amendment. I am quoting from page 23 of that book:

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the Government House Leader is talking about some very important matters and I see that there is no quorum in this House. I would ask you to take the count.

And the count having been taken

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to reassure the hon. member that there is indeed a quorum.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am quoting from this book by my friend for Etobicoke—Lakeshore at the bottom of page 23: "Legally, a referendum is binding on a government, whereas a plebiscite is not. Expressed in slightly broader terms, the distinction that ought to be drawn is that a referendum in its legal meaning is a binding verdict of the people that must be reflected in a law or action by the government, whereas a plebiscite is a formalized expression of public opinion that can serve to guide the government on a specific issue or question".

My friend for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, in proposing his amendment which was defeated last night, no doubt was using his own argument. However, he said in making his argument that those were legal definitions. I then sought to find some authority, since there is no authority cited in his book. In Petit Robert, the definition of—

Plebiscite: a direct yes or no vote by the electorate.

[English]

There is no question as to whether it is binding or not. The definition from Petit Robert:

[Translation]

Referendum: vote by all the citizens to approve or reject a measure proposed by the executive authority.

[English]

Again, there is no definition as to whether it would be binding or simply advisory.

Here is the definition of a plebiscite from The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary: "A direct vote of the whole of electors of a State to decide a question of public importance; also by extension, a public expression, with or without binding force, of the wishes or opinion of a community".

The definition of a referendum in that book is: "The act, practice, or principle... of submitting the direct decision of a question at issue to the whole body of voters. Again, there is no question as to whether it would be binding or not.

Perhaps Black's Law Dictionary is a more authoritative voice on the definition of plebiscite: "A vote of the entire people—expressing their choice for or against a proposed law or enactment, submitted to them, and which, if adopted, will work a radical change in the constitution, or which is beyond the powers of the regular legislative body.

Finally, here is the definition of a referendum from that book: "The process of referring to the electorate for approval a proposed new state constitution or amendment or of a law passed by the legislature".

I would submit that the issue was, of course, resolved for us last night by the defeat of my friend's motion. I know he had hoped to be here today to speak to the issue. I hope I have done some service by addressing the issue on his behalf. I will now deal with the broader issue of this bill and what it will put into effect. This bill will put into motion a challenge to the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada to begin preparing for the possibility of a referendum, presumably at a later date, but more likely this year if one is to be held.

The Chief Electoral Officer has informed the government and has testified in committee that it will take him a minimum of three months to set the machinery up for holding a referendum. Therefore, there is some anxiety on this side of the House and I know it is shared by members opposite. We want to see that the bill gets proper attention, but that it is also dealt with expeditiously.

I greatly appreciate the co-operation of members of the Official Opposition and the representative of the New Democratic Party on the legislative committee who worked so hard to see that the bill was improved at committee stage.

The question which will be put, as I suggested earlier, will be discussed fully with the leaders of the recognized opposition parties and will, of course, be debated in three days of debate in this House and three days of debate in the Senate. It is contemplated that the question which will be put will thus be the will, not only of the officially recognized parties, but also of this Parliament. That is a lot of time for debate.

It is, of course, a question which will have gone through the crucible with the provinces, the territories and other constituent groups. The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party referred earlier to the aboriginal peoples. There is input being received on an almost daily basis on this issue and, ultimately, the question. What will precede the framing of the question will be a resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate which will again be brought to both Houses for debate after the response to the Beaudoin-Dobbie report as tabled by the government. This is after the successful conclusion, one would hope, of the discussions or the conferences with the provinces, the territories and the aboriginal leadership. I believe this is due to resume in a matter of days.

The response to what has been going on in this House and in committee over the last few days, I think, has been quite positive. The reaction and the interest of the Canadian people has been engaged. We have received a good deal of feedback in our own offices about the referendum legislation. There are many who were asking us to please get on with it, please have it there and please have it available as an option if it is required.

They are puzzled by the voices of those who seem to oppose the idea of a referendum and they are profoundly puzzled by those who suggest that this referendum is an anti-democratic procedure. They are completely flabbergasted that—

Mr. Plamondon: This bill.

Mr. Edwards: —that suggestion would be made.

My friend says: "This bill". This bill could not be more democratic. It is framed with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in mind. It is framed to give maximum opportunity to Canadians to express their points of view.

Mr. Lapierre: The power of money.

Mr. Edwards: My friend says it is open to the use of money.

We had an interesting discussion with the Leader of the New Democratic Party earlier in the House on the question of money. I challenged her because she was quoting studies in the United States that said that candidates for Congress had been more successful when large amounts of money were spent on their campaigns. That may well be the case.

However, to transliterate that right back to the Canadian experience is very difficult to do and I challenged her to—

Mr. Lapierre: Free trade.

Mr. Edwards: The free trade debate. I challenged her on that very subject and asked if there were any studies that she could point to that would demonstrate that there was a linkage between anybody's expenditure in the free trade debate, on one side or the other, and the results of the 1988 election. She was not able to provide me with any through either the comic book of the CLC or any other campaign that was mounted.

The reaction has been generally positive. I quote from today's edition of The Gazette in Montreal: "The Mulroney government need not apologize for using its majority to pass a bill authorizing a national referendum on constitutional change. It is a crude move, but it has to be done and it has to be done quickly. Ottawa has the right to give itself the legislative tools it may need to try to break the constitutional deadlock. It has the duty to acquire the tools by urgent means because the country faces urgent deadlines".

That is a statement of reality and I think that Canadians from Quebec and from other parts of the country are very much awake to the urgent reality that is facing us.

The Gazette goes on to say: "The bill is just an enabling bill or legislation to enable the federal government to hold a national referendum on a question of its choosing and to set certain conditions for the vote".

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting quote from The Gazette that the hon. parliamentary secretary just read us. Now, if his colleague, Mr. Loiselle, could hand him this morning's edition of Le Soleil, he would see that they call it a "referendum bluff". It might help him understand how we perceive this bill in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That was not a point of order. The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has one minute left.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: My friend knew what I was coming to when he interrupted. What I was coming to was this. I am quoting The Gazette again:

> Bloc Quebecois members merely cover themselves with ridicule when they attack this inoffensive bill as "an illegitimate, anti-democratic holdup" and compare its supporters to "Cains" and "Nazi collaborators"—

In fact, the bill is just an instrument that Ottawa may need to break a deadlock, to respect Quebec's democratic agenda, and to consult all the people on matters affecting the future of the whole country. No one this side of the lunatic fringe would contest that objective.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Edmonton Southwest and he was referring to several learned texts during his speech. I would like to come back to The People's Mandate: Referendums and a More Democratic Canada written by the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I believe this book just came on the market in the last two days.

One of the criticisms we have been hearing from the Bloc Quebecois is the fact this bill has been put through here in a rather hasty fashion. Of course one of the arguments they have been advancing is the fact very few Canadians, and I am sure they do not mean just Quebecers, really understand all of the ramifications of the bill or just referendums in general.

I must say to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, there are many members in this House who do not have the understanding of all aspects of this referendum legislation and what it means. It has been studied by the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for many years. He is an expert on it and we all acknowledge that in this House.

Would it not be a good idea for the Government of Canada, in its effort to assist Canadians who it wants to participate fully in this debate, to consider maybe having this book translated and making it available not only in every region of this country, but in high schools, colleges and community centres? In this way we can educate as many Canadians as possible over the next 30 or 40 days, as it takes a 90-day period to prepare for the referendum, as to all the various aspects of what the referendum is all about.

Mr. Edwards: I appreciate the question of my hon. friend who I think was suggesting the Government of Canada perhaps expend some money for the translation and distribution of a book written by a member of Parliament. Were my friend from Etobicoke—Lakeshore not a member of Parliament, I think it might be a subject worth considering. However he is an author and does receive royalties so I am not sure it would be appropriate.

It is a very useful layman's guide to the history and use of referendums. While I took issue with his argument on definitions, I found it very useful in understanding the issue myself. He had written an earlier, perhaps more learned tome which is a scholarly work on referendums. It is heavily footnoted and perhaps not readily assimilated by the layman.

I would remind my hon. friend his suggestion has merit, but beyond the present situation there are provisions in this bill that would provide for the review of this legislation over a predetermined period. Maybe at that time, as we deal with the question of referendum legislation in a more mature way, a long-term education program could take place.

I agree with my friend there is probably little understanding of how the conventional electoral process works, but we are being thrust into a totally new situation and some kind of public education program would probably be well in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 13.01 the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTION

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate before this House how proud I am to be a Canadian. The number of noteworthy projects is growing throughout this country.

Here is one that exemplifies the level of co–operation between provincial governments and the industry, again emphasizing the efficiency of the federal system. The first maritime petroleum production system is being put into operation today. Most likely this project will be held up as an example all over the world because it is unique in that it will allow to search for small oil and gas reserves off the east coast.

For the first time in Canadian history, we are witnessing the coming into operation of a maritime oil production system with a yield of 30,000 barrels per day. Like other light substances, petroleum would evaporate quickly in the event of a spill. Besides, a review of the environmental studies reflect support for this project.

I reaffirm my pride of belonging to such a prosperous and vigourous country. This great track record only strengthened me in my resolve to never do away with my Canada–wide assets.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, a veteran and old age pensioner in my constituency of Surrey North, Arthur Cain, is typical of seniors in Canada.

They now pay the 7 per cent GST on almost everything they buy and some have had their pensions clawed back by the Mulroney government. Yet, their old age pension increase is a meagre 37 cents a month.

Mr. Cain is also typical of seniors in that he holds the Prime Minister personally responsible for the financial difficulties he is now facing.

Mr. Cain also resents that the Prime Minister will retire with a pension far greater than any public pension paid to Canadian seniors.

Mr. Cain has decided that he wants to show disgust by donating his 37 cents a month to the Prime Minister. I have in my possession a cheque made out to Brian Mulroney for no dollars and 37 cents—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment please. We have some precedents. Members' statements are not to be used to carry out a personal attack against any other members of the House. I am sure the hon. member would want to be reminded of that.

CANADIAN BOUQUET

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to inform the House about an artist in my riding who has completed a painting called Canadian Bouquet.

It depicts all the provincial and territorial floral emblems of Canada. My constituent hopes his painting will make a difference as we celebrate our nation's 125th birthday.

He wanted something symbolic that shows all provinces and territories together. It represents a unified Canada. It illustrates the natural beauty Canada offers.

Already the response has been overwhelming, with over 300 prints sold to raise money for charities across the country.

I congratulate Mr. Reynolds for his pride in Canada. He feels Canadians have to get out and take action rather than sit back and wait for events to unfold.

He related the painting to how one sends flowers when someone is sick. In this case, the flowers are going to Canada, which Reynolds sees as a little sick now, but with enough strength to recover. We do not want the Canadian bouquet with petals lying on the ground.

The award-winning artist, Michael Reynolds, urges all of us to celebrate Canada. It is a beautiful country.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. Reynolds, I would like to present you with one of the prints.

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, recently many women who have been diagnosed with breast cancer and who live in the riding I represent have asked me to speak out on their behalf. Given the facts of this terrible disease, I feel compelled to do so.

Consider the following: Treatment techniques have not changed in 30 years and the effects of the treatment make women very ill and unable to properly care for their families. Over-all mortality rates have remained unchanged in 30 years, despite improvements in early detection techniques. The incident rate of breast cancer has increased tremendously from one in twenty Canadian women in 1960 to one in nine in 1990. In 1991, there were 5,000 deaths from breast cancer compared with 161 for AIDS. Funding for breast cancer is only $750 per death, compared with $458,000 per AIDS death.

From a woman's point of view, breast cancer is exclusively suffered by women. Women feel research dollars and results are insignificant compared to what has been committed for other diseases.

I am today urging the federal government, despite all the financial pressures it faces, to increase research dollars for breast cancer and to do all it can to support those 40 Canadian women a day who are diagnosed. They deserve more.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this is National Access Awareness Week. It is dedicated to increasing awareness in the general population about issues of particular concern to people with disabilities. Many barriers prevent Canadians with disabilities from participating fully in the mainstream of Canadian life.

At present, we have Bill C-78 before the House, a piece of legislation which attempts to address a number of those concerns but which also has a number of flaws in it which I hope will be corrected at the second reading stage of debate.

There is much more to be done in the areas of employment, transportation, broadcasting and in the area of the Criminal Code and access to information, just to name a few.

Several years ago when the standing committee on human rights raised a number of concerns that we had around the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, you were fast off your feet to correct those concerns.

It seems to me that members on the government side should be as quick on their feet to correct these other outstanding problems.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the St. Andrew's Church of Ottawa, located in my riding, is in the forefront of the fight against poverty.

In 1991, the church began the Partnership Against Poverty program with a mandate to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. The program unites the efforts of politicians, both national and provincial, as well as members of the business community, various church denominations and other community organizations.

The partnership program encourages the development of co-operative food bank clubs, community garden clubs and family nutrition programs, otherwise known as collective kitchens.

St. Andrew's Church is also hosting a worship service for the Grand Orange Lodge of Canada next week. These men and women will be coming from coast to coast for a national convention.

The lodge's mandate includes a commitment to charitable endeavours, in particular, cancer research. The Ottawa region has historical significance for Orange Lodge members who count among their membership such eminent Canadians as Prime Minister John A. Macdonald.

I would like to welcome Grand Orange Lodge members to Ottawa and wish them a productive conference and enjoyable stay.

HECLA ISLAND

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, there is a special jewel located within my constituency of Portage—Interlake in Manitoba. The jewel is known as Hecla Island. In the summer, it sparkles; in the winter, it shines.

My constituents and I want Hecla Island, currently a Manitoba provincial park, to join the roster of national parks across Canada. We want this to occur sooner, not later.

I have made a request to the Minister of the Environment to visit Hecla Island this summer to view the splendour and the beauty of this unique area with his own eyes.

Canada's national parks have world-wide recognition and reputation. Hecla Island will be a valuable addition to the system of national treasures, truly a crown jewel of national parks.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): For years, the people of eastern Prince Edward Island have asked the government to make needed repairs to harbours and wharfs and for years, their calls have fallen on deaf ears.

However, the people of St. John's West seem to speak the language the minister can understand. More money was spent on one wharf in St. John's West in one year than was spent on 28 wharfs in Cardigan riding for the last five years combined.

The time has come for the minister to realize that there are more people who need small craft harbour work than his constituents.

I call upon the minister to be fair to the fishermen of Cardigan and make sure the work to small craft harbours that needs to be done gets done.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the mining industry, which used to be one of our worst polluters, is becoming a leader in respecting the environment. Mines are planning to invest nearly $500 millions in the environment.

• (1410)

Mr. Jean Roberge, the assistant director of the Quebec Metal Mining Association stated that the Quebec mining industry as a whole, and not only big companies like Noranda, went green between the spring and the fall of 1988 and that we are just starting to notice the effects of this shift.

Quebec mines also have the best track record in Canada for respecting the environment, according to directors at Environment Canada.

Back in 1988, the officials of the Quebec Metal Mining Association developed an "environment savings plan" based on the RRSP system to fight pollution during the life cycle of a mine.

The Association has now published the "environmental bill of health of the industry", the first one ever in North America, and it is arousing interest in Europe. The Quebec government is presently distributing it at the earth summit in Rio.

SENIORS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the beginning of summer is traditionally the time when Canada salutes its seniors, those older Canadians who helped shape this great country and who share our vision of a prosperous and united future for Canada.

Each province and territory has planned activities and events from late May until the end of June in order to mark the substantial and varied contributions that our older citizens make to this country.

Canadians young and old are taking the time to acknowledge the solid foundation that older people have laid for the society we enjoy today.

As I speak, a number of activities and events are taking place in my home province of Saskatchewan under the theme "Canada's Heritage: Bridging the Generations".

It is with great pride and enthusiasm that I urge all members, and indeed all Canadians, to join with their communities in celebrating the achievements of our seniors.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on March 14 this year, the ITAC committee (Industry, Tourism, Agriculture and Commerce) of the United Counties of Prescott and Russell sent a letter to the Prime Minister stating the following facts:

That eastern Ontario has suffered a substantial loss of industrial jobs and that the unemployment rate in our communities in eastern Ontario is twice the national average;

That a number of federal and provincial programs have been cancelled, "thanks" to this government;

That the federal government closed its regional development office for eastern Ontario; and

That the federal government is responsible for social and economic development assistance to disadvantaged regions like ours.

I support the demands of the United Counties of Prescott and Russell, and I want to ask the government to establish a regional development program for eastern Ontario in order to help Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Stormont—Dundas, Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke and other ridings in dire need of assistance.

ANDREW DES LAURIERS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday evening, Andrew Des Lauriers, a North York fire captain, was trapped in a tragic blaze in Don Mills. He was put on life support at Toronto General Hospital but despite the hopes and prayers of family and colleagues, Andrew died last night.

I want to convey my condolences to his family and friends. I want to pay tribute to Andrew and all fire-fighters across Canada for their bravery and dedication.

My son-in-law, Mark Zaorski, has been a fire-fighter in North York for eight years. He was one of the dozens of fire-fighters trying to contain this tragic blaze.

Fire-fighters are always ready to protect our lives and property, putting their own lives at risk time and time again. Canadians owe these men and women much gratitude and respect.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, farmers are being sent a bill for a $41 million mistake made by the federal government.

The government paid out interim cheques under the Western Grain Stabilization Program about a year ago, based on a guess on how much the farmers' crops would be worth for the last three years. It was not until last August when the program ended that it took a second look and found its mistake.

With the Saskatchewan election pending no decision was made. But now, farmers who had no say in how much they received from the program in the first place are being billed and not being told why. Even farmers who had left the land in 1989 are receiving bills of up to $750.

The grains and oilseeds minister acknowledges this is a difficult time to be asking farmers for cash. He claims, however, the government has to collect and has given farmers until July 15 in which to respond.

Last year's deficit was $2 billion more than estimated. Does this mean other Canadians will be receiving bills demanding repayment for the government's overspending too?

SUN AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the week of June 1 to 7 has been proclaimed Sun Awareness Week in Canada by the Canadian Dermatology Association.

In an effort to stem the ever-increasing number of people developing skin cancer, Health and Welfare Canada and the Canadian Dermatology Association are reminding Canadians of the need to protect against over-exposure to the sun.

Since sun damage to the skin usually begins in childhood and every sunburn and sun-tan harms the skin and the damage is cumulative, this is especially directed toward parents and young children.

Health and Welfare Canada is preparing an issues paper entitled "Preventing Skin Cancer: It's Up To You". It will be available soon and will be widely circulated so all Canadians can be better informed on this issue.

FAMILY ISSUES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, according to the Globe and Mail, 35 ridiculous Tory members of Parliament, who call themselves the Caucus Committee on Family Issues, are proud that they are responsible for killing a national day care program.

They are proud and believe that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms undermines Canada and they also hold the silly view that social policy in this country goes too far in helping people. It does not surprise me that Tory dinosaurs believe this.

What does shock me is that according to this article, they are supported in their views by the minister of energy, the communications minister, the minister for privatization, the minister of small businesses, the minister of science and the minister for external relations.

Do we really have six cabinet ministers in this country who think we would be better off if women did not work outside the home? Welcome to the world of Dan Quayle's Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses.

Documents possessed by the government and released today say this about the Westray coal mine. I quote from the documents: "The interpreted structure is recognized to contain considerable uncertainty—The mine ventilation section, which describes the results of the methane desorption test does not give one confidence—Three, based upon experience elsewhere in the world zones around faults made of elevated spontaneous combustion risks, the seam's thickness also constitute an increased spontaneous combustion risk".

Knowing of those risks, each and every one of those, did the minister responsible exercise his right under the agreement which was consummated by the Government of Canada, the Bank of Nova Scotia and Curragh Resources to do inspections of that mine? If so, will the minister explain to the House as to what those inspection reports said to him?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the first and most important statement one must make about the CANMET report from which he quotes is the study itself concluded that the proposal for a mine at Westray had no major failings. That was its conclusion.

The report was clear about some of the challenges that should be dealt with, the challenges that could be dealt with and therefore the proposal had no major failings. The report also notes that the mine would operate under a Nova Scotia Department of Mines and Energy mining lease.

What does that mean? That means the lease would not be given unless it contained clauses of what the owner can and cannot do. Finally, the federal government's contracts between the mine developer and its lenders required that the company fully comply with all Nova Scotia mining laws and regulations.

What happened was the federal government decided to guarantee the loan based upon an assessment that this was a technically feasible mine and that the challenges could be met. The mining leases to be granted by the province of Nova Scotia would make sure that all provincial regulations were complied with and, of course, we ensured on a regular basis that they were complied with.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. On a previous occasion, the minister referred to the Associated Mining Consultants as doing the independent safety reports. But they have said and I quote: "We didn't independently check any safety conditions".

The minister himself has said in this House that the firm's primary role was to monitor the levels and cost of coal production. I ask the minister responsible if he will confirm whether or not he has exercised his right under the consummated contract in order to inspect the Westray coal mine for safety reasons, where are those reports, and will he explain to the House the contents of those reports?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member persists in misunderstanding what provincial jurisdiction is and what federal jurisdiction is. He persists of course because he wants to suddenly invent a whole mining regulatory responsibility for the federal government. It was provincial.

What we had to do, and I think it very important that we did this, was on a monthly basis when there were advances of the loan and the guarantee followed with it, was to make sure that provincial regulations, all of them, were being complied with. This is what the mining engineers did.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister had in his possession an independent technical report telling them there was a high risk of an explosion.

The minister also had a binding legal document allowing the minister to inspect the mines. Knowing of the high risk of an explosion, why did the minister not exercise his right under that consummated contract? Why was the federal minister responsible so grossly negligent in exercising his responsibility?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): You know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raising his voice does not make his point any differently than he did two weeks ago. There is nothing new in his question. It is the same question; he will get the same answer.

What he is asking is essentially did the federal government do its own independent inspection of the mine. The answer is no. That is the province's responsibility.

What we did, and we did very carefully, was to make sure that compliance certificates were issued by the mining engineering consultants, and they were issued. In fact, I think that was responsible for the federal government to do it. I have tabled with the documents today what those certificates contain.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Business.

This loan insurance agreement between the Government of Canada, the Bank of Nova Scotia and Curragh Resources commits the federal government to providing up to $85 million to the banks in the event of the failure of the Westray project.

Section 7, subsection (i) of this agreement authorizes the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology to carry out inspections of this project to ensure that the project is being carried out in accordance with prudent business management and good mining practices.

My question to the minister is this: In light of his previous answers, is he satisfied that good mining practices, including adequate provisions for safety, were carried out by Curragh Resources? If so, does he accept on behalf of his government its responsibility to provide up to $85 million to the banks in the event that this mine is not reopened?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, today it is possible because we have tabled the documents to answer my hon. friend's question in some detail.

First of all let me quote from the documents. This is the loan agreement document: "Prior to each loan advance Curragh must certify"—this is the document that was tabled this morning—"that all government approvals required to be obtained under the Curragh agreement have been duly obtained and are in full force and effect".

This is further supported by an independent engineer's certificate which includes certification of government approvals and compliance with laws. I can read all of those if the hon. member would like, and I will in answering a supplementary if he likes.

What we put in place through this contract was a situation where there would be compliance with all provincial regulations and this we did and certified monthly.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The federal government had numerous reports warning of high methane levels at the foord seam. The federal government's own agreement with Curragh Resources and the Bank of Nova Scotia authorizes it to carry out inspections of these mines. The federal government is on the hook by this agreement for up to $85 million.

How can the minister justify to the taxpayers of Canada, not to mention the families of the 26 dead miners, the failure of his government to carry out inspections to ensure that this mine and the government's investment was secure?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the logic of the hon. member is that if there are some challenges that have to be inspected by the province that he does not think the province can do, the federal government should take it over. We received a report a couple of months ago from the Economic Council of Canada saying that education needs to be revamped and improved in Canada. Following the member's logic, the federal government should move in and take over all the schools. That is really the logic of what he is saying.

It may be a good idea. Essentially, he is suggesting that we not abide by provincial jurisdiction. This we did. They inspected on a very regular basis and we received monthly certifications that they were doing so.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Of the 2,000 pages of information released today on the Westray mine, there is a document apparently provided to cabinet entitled Westray Coal Inc., Pictou County Coal Project, Technical Review. This report stressed serious safety concerns about operating the mine. I will quote the section quoted formerly by a member about the mine ventilation section. In this report it says, and I quote: "does not give one confidence".

The report also mentions inadequate time and inadequate documentation. Again I quote from the report that says: "No attempts have been made to assess pillar stresses, roof response, floor response and the like in the report. The time available and limitations in the documentation preclude such attention to detail".

My question to the Prime Minister is what was the rush on this project? Why could there not be sufficient time given for the approval to provide attention to detail? That detail might have prevented a tragedy.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Leader of the New Democratic Party that all of us would have liked to have seen the tragedy prevented, but her chronology is terribly flawed.

First of all this CANMET report was done a number of years before the mine opened. In fact the mine was just beginning commercial production. Between the CANMET report and when the mine opened, there were all sorts of engineering adaptations to make sure it could be safe, to make sure that it could technically comply with all provincial regulations.

This is what the member has to understand. CANMET made some suggestions and they were dealt with in the engineers' drawings and work following the recommendations of CANMET. Also, the CANMET report does not just say, and this is very important, that there is a high danger of methane.

I would ask the House to listen carefully. What the report does is summarize all previous technical reports. Some technical reports, most of them in fact, say there are very low levels of methane. Some say it is moderate. There are a few that express concern. There is a whole spectrum of concern expressed from moderate concern, to very little to some methane. Therefore, the engineers and all of those who put the mine together tried to accommodate that in the years following the CANMET report.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary for the Prime Minister. The premier of Nova Scotia had made it quite clear in a number of interviews that he felt "federal bureaucrats were interfering with the process of approval for this mine". According to the minister, that work was done after the CANMET report which I just quoted from.

In these 2,000 pages of documents that have been filed, there is no example of correspondence between officials of government departments or, indeed, between government ministers. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if work was done after this CANMET report, if he can tell this House what information he was privy to that reassured him that these steps had been taken and is that material about to be tabled with this House as well? If not, why did the premier of Nova Scotia feel that it was "government bureaucrats" who were holding this up?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I know what the the hon. member is trying to do with her question. She is trying to give an impression that nothing was done to accommodate any of the suggestions in the CANMET report.

What she fails to understand is that to even open a mine you must get a lease. In order to get a mining lease in the province of Nova Scotia, you must comply with all safety and other regulations of the province of Nova Scotia. This they worked hard at doing and this they did or they would not have been given the lease.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

What I am trying to get at, which the Minister Responsible for Small Business does not seem to understand, is why this project was hurried up. Why was there such a timetable? There was inadequate time given to deal with the serious concerns that were raised.

In fact, in April 1991 a Calgary engineering consultant who had worked on a number of mining projects was quoted as saying that this mine was one of the most rapid he has ever seen in terms of construction.

The question we are trying to get is simply: Why was it so rapid?

[Translation]

My question to the Prime Minister is as follows: Could he indicate to the House whether he has had discussions with federal or provincial politicians, either in writing or in person, about the time frame for this project?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, only a few days ago I referred in the House to conversations I had with the present premier of Nova Scotia and other provincial premiers on regional development projects in their respective provinces.

I talked to the premier of Yukon about a mining project involving the same company, in the hon. member's riding. In supporting federal involvement in the project in her riding, I applied the same objective criteria that were used to support the project in Nova Scotia.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, we received a visit from the steel producers of Canada. They informed us that they face a very serious problem at this moment. Again, despite the free trade agreement, they are about to face some action in Washington. Already some clients are cancelling orders because they do not know if they can rely on Canadian producers.

Despite the free trade agreement, almost every month now we see a new problem developing in trade relations between Canada and the United States. It is always initiated in the United States. When will the Prime Minister do something about it? He was bragging in this House last week that he can talk to George any time. The time to call him is today.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition must know that this dispute is being brought by the American steel industry under American laws.

There has, as yet, been no definitive information as to whether Canada will be included in this dispute. It seems to me a little premature to be raising a flag of fear when we do not know the answer to that question.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadian steelworkers who saw their jobs disappear because of this government's failure to act will not look kindly on the fact that the Prime Minister does not bother to answer this kind of question.

At a time when Quebec has been hit by a very negative decision on magnesium and a 35 per cent surtax and today, Sidbec–Dosco will be faced with the same problem, will the Prime Minister, for once, start doing something about the problems of Quebec and Canadian workers?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting inasmuch as my hon. friend speaks so disparagingly and contemptuously today of the President of the United States.

Did he say that to George in the Oval Office when he was down there? When you were down there, were you acting—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: He was down there, Mr. Speaker: "Yes, Mr. President. I am so happy to see you. Thank you for having me in the Oval Office."

Then he comes back talking like a big shot. Then he comes back with his public relations exercise.

[English]

He forgets that we saw him in such a supine position in Washington.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of trade said there is "some flexibility" on the question of U.S. demands for an increase in the North American content requirements on automobiles. Yet in 1990 the minister of trade said: "Most of the cost of increasing the content rule will fall on Canada while most of the benefits will be reaped by the United States".

Why has the government changed its position? Has the government prepared a study of how this decision will deter new investment or even the expansion of existing plants in Canada?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should make it clear that there has been no agreement to date on this particular issue.

In terms of where the Government of Canada would settle on this issue, we should make it clear that the Canadian auto workers, the Canadian parts manufacturers and the three large assemblers all want a higher content ratio than the 50 per cent negotiated under the free trade agreement. We know that we want to listen to them.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of trade said: "We should maintain Canada as an attractive place for foreign car manufacturers to invest". A spokesman for Honda immediately responded by saying: "It is quickly becoming more sensible to invest in the United States rather than risk the problems associated with assembling cars in Canada".

I ask the minister: Is the government's policy to maintain the agreed level of North American content or is it to concede to the United States becoming the hub of a more protectionist North America?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what we have always been after in the North American free trade agreement is the best deal possible for Canada. There are of course two sides to this.

We know the position of the transplants and we have to take that into consideration. We also know the position of the rest of the Canadian industry and we must acknowledge that.

What we are trying to do is to find an agreement that will satisfy both sides of this. Where the United States wants to go is not the issue. It is where does the Canadian industry want to go. That is our question.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. I cite some of his recent quotes before and after a visit to Washington.

Referring to American trade harassment, the Prime Minister has said that he might accept it from some tin-pot dictator in some tiny little country somewhere. He refers also to low-level bureaucratic harassment. Upon his return to Ottawa he stated: "I am confident that frivolous and vexatious American trade actions will cease".

Strong and confident words, but now they ring hollow. Americans will place their good Canadian friends with Korea, Japan and a host of other countries and charge our suffering, fair-trading Canadian steel makers with dumping.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to implement some of his rhetoric into concrete actions and, if so, what is he proposing to do?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Ambassador Burney has registered very strongly the objections of the Government of Canada to Secretary Franklin in the United States in regard to what we believe is a side-swipe action, very counterproductive and quite unacceptable to the Government of Canada.

In the past the American industry, having taken this action, that would have been the end of it, but because we have the free trade agreement we have an independent dispute settlement mechanism which has rendered a growing number of decisions favourable to Canada.

Because of the free trade agreement and the independent dispute settlement mechanism, we are able to envisage the future with some confidence in regard to this action as, for example, most recently we did when we won a most important decision on behalf of Canadian agricultural producers on the question of pork.

We view this very seriously. We are going to take all vigorous action and we are going to join with the industry and support the industry throughout the process until Canada emerges successfully from this.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate some of the Prime Minister's comments, but I thought the free trade agreement would guarantee access to the American steel market as it had promised.

There is the so-called free trade agreement and the so-called Prime Minister's friendship with the President, but the American President pays no attention to Canadian steel workers, no attention to softwood lumber workers, no attention to Canadian auto workers and no attention to the Prime Minister.

• (1440)

Will the Prime Minister place yet another telephone call to the President and, if that fails, will he assist Canadian steel producers for the first time in preparing counterdumping actions against American steel producers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this will impress my hon. friend because he is clearly not concerned about this part of it, but it is important for the record to note that this action was not initiated by the administration. It is an action initiated by the American steel industry.

I think my hon. friend would acknowledge that it would be improper for the Government of Canada or the Government of Ontario to interfere to preclude the possibility of a Canadian company initiating a trade action against the United States. This is not one that is initiated by the political administration of the Government of the United States.

That being said, we still think it is a side-swipe action where they are looking for others, particularly for example the Koreans, and they are side-swiping Canada where we have the largest integrated steel market in the world.

The American administration will work with the administration of Canada to make sure that we are not subject to these side-swipes.

Failing that we fortunately have the dispute settlement mechanism of the free trade agreement which is providing, as my hon. friend knows, an increasing number of very substantial victories that otherwise would have been lost.

My hon friend, given his own experience in this area, has expressed his satisfaction in the past with the existence of this important provision.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Youth unemployment across Canada is at an all-time high of 16.8 per cent, compared with the rate of 11 per cent in the general population. The figures are even more tragic in my province of Nova Scotia where youth unemployment is at 22.6 per cent.

My question for the minister is simply this: What is he prepared to do to get these young people working?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, the general programs of employment and immigration obviously apply to unemployed youth.

We also have the youth initiatives under the Challenge program. As my hon. colleague knows or should know, its budgets have been increased this year for the second year in a row. According to the job prospects that we are going to have this summer, notwithstanding the fact that it is going to be difficult we need the partnership of not only the private sector but of provincial governments.

I believe we have what is needed right now to face the serious situation that exists, a situation that has been dealt with, particularly with the government's initiative with respect to stay in school, where we have to make sure that our youth get the fundamental instruments to deal with the future.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, they cannot stay in school when their rates for tuition have gone up 25 per cent and their unemployment rate is at 22 per cent.

The minister says that there have been increases in these grants over the past two years. Yes, small ones, but over the past seven years the cutbacks in these grants amount to over $70 million. On top of that is the decimation of established programs funding crippling universities in Atlantic Canada and making them raise tuitions. Send them back to school with what?

What plan does the government have to give young people in Atlantic Canada some relief and some hope?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, with respect to hope, again the hon. member has to look at government initiatives as a whole.

The prosperity initiative is specifically about hope and about future prospects. So the youth of today do not have to pay the debt of past governments.

What we are doing right now is making sure that the fundamentals are there. The stay in school initiative is about that, and the training programs my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration has put forward are at $3.4 billion.

JOB TRAINING

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my questions are for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

One and one-half million Canadians are unemployed. Part-time jobs are replacing full-time jobs. We have record levels of food banks and homeless people, and the minister makes excuses for not doing more.

Does the minister not realize that money spent on training and the unemployed is an investment in human resources which expands our skilled work force, produces wealth and helps reduce the deficit?

When will the minister take off his Tory blinkers and put more money into training and job creation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that a Liberal stands in this House today and congratulates the government for having targeted training as a priority area of activity.

He should have been there when they blocked passage of a law in this country that has allowed us in the last two years to triple the amount of money going to the training of UI recipients in this country.

I thank the hon. member for his reconnaissance de notre bon travail.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the government is spending more on training out of the unemployment insurance fund but less out of general revenues. To do that the government has cut back on unemployment insurance benefits, which has shifted the burden of the unemployed to the provinces and to the municipalities. That is what it is doing.

Our major competitors in Japan, Europe and the United States spend more on training and education. Does the minister not see that more money spent on training today will produce wealth and dividends tomorrow?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member read our learning paper. These words come from exactly what I published three months ago. I thank him again. He is right. We have to invest more in people. We have to invest more in training. That Liberal is finally seeing the light. He is right.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, if we could all get some glimpse of the light from the minister of employment it would be useful.

Yesterday the minister of employment said that he would have an announcement to make in the next day or two with respect to more support for training. Across this country there are people who are in desperate need of training and of increased support. Our concern, however, is that the minister is going to rob Peter to pay Paul.

First, is the minister prepared to make the commitment today that there will be more money for training? Second, will he make it with an added guarantee that this increased money for training will not be at the expense of other support for training in other areas?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member come clean with Canada, stand up and apologize to all those workers that need training?

Because of his actions and those of his party, we were delayed for a year and a half. Who is paying for that delay? Canadian workers who could have been trained over a period of 18 months have been deprived of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister should know that thousands of workers in Canada have decided to take the training option. For the last three weeks they have been waiting for some kind of specific answer from the Minister of Employment and Immigration to know whether the money will be there to allow them to access training programs. Some of them are unable even to sign up at community colleagues because of the no refund policy.

I want to ask minister a very specific question. Is he prepared to announce today that his government has found a way to reallocate money so that fee paper training can be accessed by thousands of workers across this country? Yes or no.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will not take the 18 months that they devoted to preventing unemployed Canadians from getting training. I should be able to have an answer within the next few days.

BANKING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the 1980s, after the big banks' loans to the Third World countries went bust, Canadian consumers ended up paying vastly higher service charges.

In the 1990s, after the big banks' loans to real estate developers like Olympia & York have gone bust, what assurance can the government give that once again the real burden will not fall on Canadian consumers who fear being handed a bill for the bankers' lack of foresight?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have noted those comments and I have been in contact with the Canadian Bankers' Association seeking assurances that that was not the case.

I can tell my hon. colleague that indeed I have been informed by the Canadian Bankers' Association that the impact of the O & Y situation will not reduce their capacity to serve their customers, and particularly their small business customers.

I have also been assured that there is no way in which they would attempt to recoup any of these losses from the small business sector. I think that is most encouraging.

I have also been advised by the Canadian Bankers' Association that it will co-operate fully with the small business financing program and other government programs to ensure the small business sector has the adequate financing it needs, and particularly those small businesses in financial difficulty.

GRAIN INDUSTRY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. It has to do with the stalled grain shipments to Russia.

The situation is very serious and cannot be allowed to continue. Yesterday industry sources told me that a solution may soon be found to get the grain moving, and today we hear that the government may ease restrictions faced by cash starved Russians.

Can the minister confirm now whether credit conditions will be changed? Will the Russians be able to use Canadian credit toward ocean freight costs?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, to bring the member up to date, that has been the case for probably two or three months with the line of credit the Canadian Wheat Board has available to deal with the Russians.

It has been the case for I guess a year on some loans that were put out by EDC. It has already been used by the Canadian Wheat Board I believe in one shipment of grain off our west coast to eastern Russia.

In point of fact the Wheat Board has had the latitude to do this for a number of months. It has been its judgment that it has not needed to extend this type of credit in order to make grain sales.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the minister speaks as if there is no problem out there at all. I want to remind him that freighters have been tied up and workers have been laid off. This tie-up, if allowed to continue, threatens directly the lives of prairie farmers.

Will the Russians get the new credit terms? When will the situation change? How much credit is going to be made available for freight costs? Above all, can the minister assure the House that this kind of backlog will not happen again?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put this into context. There is a problem in the Great Lakes, the problem being that over half the fleet is tied up.

To look at the over-all situation, we still have the chance of having a record amount of grain shipments as well as grain movement in this country for this crop year. To suggest that the whole system is grinding to a halt is simply false.

I already said that the Wheat Board has the latitude and continues to have the latitude to use part of the credit extended to the Russians to pay for freight. If the member is suggesting that the Wheat Board is not using good judgment in this, that surprises me because he has been very supportive of the Canadian Wheat Board. If he is suggesting that I go in and tell the Wheat Board how to run its day-to-day commercial activities, he would be the first one on his feet accusing me of political interference.

I wish he would get his stories straight.

BANKING

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for small business.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has expressed a concern that consumers and small businesses could bear the brunt of any fall-out from the O & Y collapse. It has also said that bankers are tightening their loan policies for small firms struggling to stay in business.

When will this government take some action to help these small businesses gain access to credit? Or, will this government continue to sit idly by and see jobs go down the tubes?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I really must thank the hon. member for her question. On June 1, the financial institutions reforms which have been finally put into effect allow trust companies over and above a certain size to do unlimited commercial lending. Life insurance companies will have a vastly increased ambit for making commercial loans to small and medium sized businesses.

This is the most fundamental reform of the financial institutions structure in the history of Canada. We are very proud we have done that.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, that answer is totally unacceptable to the small business people across this country. Even some of the minister's own backbenchers are calling for action in this area.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. When will the minister realize that more action is needed now to deal with the credit crunch on small business so that we can create much needed jobs in this country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's first question was what the government has done.

I agree with her that there is a constriction of credit in schedule A banks toward small and medium sized enterprise in Canada. I think it is a concern. The Minister of Finance and I have carried that concern to the Bankers' Association and to individual bankers.

In fact the last budget brought in some very important new provisions to help small business. The foremost of course is the Small Businesses Loans Act. We are going to lift the limit to $200,000 under the small business financing program. We continue to have the lowest rate of tax of any country in the OECD for small business.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The Beaudoin–Dobbie committee unanimously recommended a preamble as part of this Canada round of constitutional renewal. The minister knows that the government has received over 35,000 letters from business and community leaders, chambers of commerce, service clubs and thousands of individuals from coast to coast who have strongly endorsed the special joint committee's preamble as a poetic statement uniting Canadians with their history and the values we all hold dear.

Can the minister tell the House that the preamble is in fact a part of the government package it is negotiating with the provinces and that the government is actively seeking their support for that preamble?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a poetic preamble. I get it read to me at meetings across the country. There have been thousands of representations made to the government.

The question is: What legal weight would language of that kind have in a Constitution? That is the question we are looking at now. I cannot give any guarantees as to exact language, but it is agreed in the conference I am chairing that it is important the document finds some way to summons a sense of pride in the country. We are looking at both that draft preamble and some other language. We will do the best we can.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In his recent statements, I believe it is obvious that the Prime Minister is cooking up a unilateral referendum fraud in spite of the firm opposition expressed by the National Assembly in Quebec and Premier Bourassa.

My question for the right hon. Prime Minister is this: Why is the Prime Minister about to become a traitor to Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: The preamble as well as the wording of the question are absolutely unacceptable.

[English]

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows perfectly well that the question was unacceptable and is improper. I am sure as a member of long standing in this House—and I know the respect he has for this place—he would want to withdraw.

• (1500)

I am asking the hon. member to withdraw.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the truth is that the Prime Minister owes everything to Quebec. He is now denying it and I must raise this matter in the House.

Mrs. Venne: Exactly.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is an experienced member here and has been here for many years. He knows perfectly well, it seems to the Chair and it probably seems the same way to other members, that the comments that he has made and the comments that he made after I asked him to withdraw are clearly designed to be such that they are not acceptable in this place.

If the hon. member does not have enough respect for this institution, which he always has shown in the past, to withdraw his remarks then I must ask him again to do the proper thing for this place and withdraw the remarks. Of course, if the hon. member is not prepared to withdraw them then I shall have to decide how the Chair will deal with that. I do ask the hon. member again to do the proper thing with respect to this institution.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, although I am the target of the member's comment, I do not at all insist, personally, that he withdraw his remarks, but they are still disgraceful comments about another Quebecer and Canadian.

Mr. Rocheleau: Because it's true.

Mr. Mulroney: Unfortunately, that is becoming more and more his style.

Mr. Speaker, I was elected twice in Quebec, as a Quebecer and as a member of the Progressive Conservative Party and its leader. The member who just accused me of treason was elected as a Liberal. He was never elected as a separatist.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I will not say that the member for Shefford betrayed the mandate his constituents gave him, but others might say so at an appropriate time.

As far as I am concerned, I ran as a Conservative and in spite of my faults, I remain a Conservative, because I am a man of my word. I respect the commitment that I gave to Quebecers, just like those who were elected as Liberals have respected their commitment, and similarly for the New Democrats. Mr. Edmonston respected his commitment to Quebecers. Those who refused and went back on their formal commitment—

Mr. Duceppe: Call an election, then.

Mr. Mulroney: —to Quebecers are not sitting here or there, but behind.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government House leader. Would he indicate to the House the business for tomorrow as well as for Monday and Tuesday and the remaining days of next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the House will complete third reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for a referendum for the Constitution of Canada, this afternoon.

I would like to formally designate tomorrow, Friday, June 5, as an allotted day. Monday the government will call Bill C-41, the Energy Emergency Act, for completion of report and third reading; Bill C-78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities, for second reading. Hopefully we will begin report stage of Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

On Tuesday, June 9, we will hopefully complete second reading of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the children's special allowances act.

I will be in discussion with my colleague and the New Democratic Party's representative in terms of business for the rest of next week.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the business of the House. I would like to take this opportunity to ask the government House leader if he intends to revise the method for recording votes in this House, especially after the disgraceful incidents of last night, led by a small group of members who unduly held back all the support staff of the House of Commons for hours and hours.

I think it is obvious that today, in this modern era, the Parliament of Canada should have a much faster, more efficient voting system than the one we must use when some members engage in systematic obstruction as they did last night.

In closing, I will simply remind the government House leader of the McGrath committee's recommendations. All members of that committee—Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats—unanimously recommended changing the voting system in this House to make it more efficient. I trust that the parliamentary committee studying the reform of parliamentary procedure will deal urgently with this matter so that situations like yesterday's do not recur in future.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the incident last night reminded me of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's description of this institution which he sometimes described as the only insane asylum in the country in control of the inmates.

Last night it seemed that particularly dangerous inmates were in control, hence the suggestion of the hon. member that we look at some way of constraining this exuberant waste of everybody's time. The basically childish performance we saw last night of unnecessarily prolonging the endurance of this House is something we could re-examine in terms of the rules of this place and find a way—electronic voting is certainly a component of that—in which people who watch either in the galleries or on television are not brought to shame and tears as they see this place function.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to House business and perhaps with not too much commentary on the exchange between the House leader and the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

I must say before we get too far so we can get on to debate and not have a point of order all afternoon that there were members on all sides, some wearing hats that some people took exception to, that did not help the troubled waters that we all knew were here.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the government House leader for earlier today introducing Bill C-84. The Minister of Veterans Affairs, under whose name it is, is not here today. I must say it is an interesting bill. I have not fully digested it. It is a heck of a lot more complicated than I thought, but I am hoping that in the consultations the government House leader has with the other parties in this coming week that there may be an agreement. I think there is a disposition on all sides to move this along almost in a single day so that this bill could be debated, concluded, and out of the way certainly by July 1.

If we are talking about 125 years, there would not be a more fitting tribute to people who really sacrificed for this country to make sure this omission was corrected.

I say that seriously and congratulate the minister very much.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I am always a little bit reluctant to rise in this House to chastise any of the members but perhaps Mr. Speaker can give me some direction as to whether what I am bringing up is a point of order or a point of privilege.

Today, if I understood correctly, we had one hon. member in this House calling another member a traitor. I think that this kind of language is completely unacceptable to this House. Notwithstanding that we had the Prime Minister saying that he did not mind this kind of language being addressed to him and he gave the reasons for it, I personally as a member of this House take umbrage at the fact that one hon. member can call another hon. member a traitor and not have any repercussions at all.

Mr. Speaker, as the spokesperson for us in this House, I call upon you to consider a decision that at the very least the member who used this word against another member be seriously reprimanded and that we demand that those words be withdrawn from the record of this House of Commons.

We are not going to be played as the buffoons because there are a few hon. members here who can step out at any time and call other members names which have never been acceptable in this House and which I hope will never become acceptable here, Mr. Speaker.

Points of Order

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I was rising earlier in the same vein, not so much to comment on the language itself, but to say that it is not up to any individual member, even if that member is the Prime Minister, to decide what language is acceptable or unacceptable to the House. The Prime Minister, and it may have been gracious of him to do so, said that he was not bothered by the language that was used. I hate to see the precedent set by which individual members decide what is acceptable.

It is up to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, to decide what is acceptable. I would hope that you would consider some way of establishing that to be the case. I understand the difficulty that we were all in at that particular moment, but I would hope that we would not let this become a precedent.

If members use unacceptable language, that is unacceptable language whether or not a particular member is prepared to accept it. I am not even sure whether in this case the language itself or the word itself should be debated but what I am looking at here is the procedural point of who is it, where is the locus of authority with respect to what is regarded as acceptable and not acceptable. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take that under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist the House. I have listened very carefully to interventions from both colleagues who have been in this place a long time.

First of all, I have ruled that the comments that were made are unacceptable and they are unparliamentary and they are to be withdrawn.

Second, if they are not withdrawn, then I shall find my own way to discipline that particular member.

They are absolutely unacceptable. The hon. member knows they are unacceptable. If the hon. member wants to rise in his place and address this Chamber again, the hon. member is going to have to withdraw.

VOTING PROCEDURE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order, the same as the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

My understanding is that Hansard is not printed yet because there were mistakes in recording the votes. Apparently some of the members who were twinned appear as having voted. This is why I support the idea that we should have a change in voting patterns and we should go into the 21st century and have electronic voting, as was suggested by the McGrath commission.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you are going to look into it. I am sure that you will do it in your wisdom.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure I can share will all members of the House the particular recommendation of the McGrath commission to which the hon. member for Calgary Northeast refers which has been considered at length.

The hon. government House leader indicated perhaps with electronic voting things could be expeditiously carried out. As your Speaker, I am quite prepared to do that if, of course, there is sufficient disposition in that direction.

I would say to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast the proposition is not quite as simple as it may seem. He may want to discuss that with me and perhaps others in greater detail. Certainly the hon. member raises a matter of importance to the House which was dealt with in the sense that a recommendation was made by the McGrath commission.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, on the same point raised by the hon. member for Papineau-Saint-Michel, I would like to say that we were accused of using obstructive tactics last night when we asked for the votes. We did that to force people who hid behind their party to come out and show themselves. It was the purpose of the votes as it is always the case. When members ask for a roll call in the House, it is for this reason.

Last night, we unfortunately witnessed here an incredible circus. One would have really thought it was the far west with cowboys. It was awful to watch the circus which took place here. I do not know whether you watched it on television, but it was incredible. We saw people with no tie and no decorum, while, as far as we are concerned, we are repeatly told to respect this House.

Last night, I honestly admit that it was a good thing they did not give hon. members a breathalyzer test because I swear there were a few who would have registered more than .08.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members, as is their right, are expressing some dissatisfaction with the bench yesterday. I will take them into consideration and see if I can be of some assistance. I am sure the hon. member would not want to go too far in those remarks.

BILL C-78

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I believe we are still on House business. If we are, I have a question for the government House leader concerning Bill C-78. It is omnibus legislation dealing with a number of concerns to Canada's disabled population.

I understand the government wants to introduce the bill for second reading on Monday because there is some urgency to it and I accept that.

I would be willing on behalf of the New Democratic Party to assure the minister we would be prepared to pass that bill with one speaker per party and go through all stages at one time. Unfortunately, because of a prior commitment I cannot be here Monday but I and the NDP caucus would certainly be willing to do that on Tuesday.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the offer of the hon. member. I do know this particular piece of legislation emerged really from an all-party committee under the chairmanship of my friend and colleague, the member for Oxford.

I know there is wide support generally. We have not been able to get the unanimous support needed to treat the bill at all three stages. We will continue to try, but that remains an obstacle. I cannot commit to the hon. member that we will proceed in that way, but I will commit to try to seek that kind of procedure.

The hon. member has been one of the staunchest supporters and workers on this and I appreciate his desire to be here. I hope he will appreciate it is not to keep him out of the involvement that we scheduled it for Monday. The problem is the House adjourns on June 23 and there is so much legislation to go through. I need to plan around ministerial schedules and hopefully around the schedules of critics in the opposition.

I will take his representation. We will see what we can do. I know the hon. member has contributed substantially to the development of this legislation and I would like him to be here to speak on its behalf.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it absolutely clear I do not view it being necessary that I be present on Monday, if that is the timetable that is established. My caucus would still be committed to passing the bill at all three stages with one speaker per party on Monday.

WESTRAY COAL MINE DOCUMENTS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a point to the government House leader. The Minister for Small Businesses and Tourism stayed in the House for some time but had to leave because of other commitments.

This has to do with the tabling of documents regarding Westray this morning. There were a substantial number of items that we believe should have been included in those documents to be tabled this morning, particularly those arising from question No. 437 which was put on the Order Paper by my colleague, the member for Churchill, in December 1990 and answered in part on March 18, 1991.

At that time, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister said that correspondence and calls received by the office of the Prime Minister regarding the Westray coal mine project are noted and forwarded to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology for his information and consideration.

The point to the government House leader is that in correspondence, the member for Churchill, the Official Opposition and I have asked that those documents be included among those that were tabled this morning, but they were not. I would ask the government House leader to indicate whether or not we might expect to have those tabled very soon.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member has asked for is private correspondence between ministers.

He will know the longstanding constitutional tradition that cabinet confidences cannot be released for good and valid reasons he will understand. Indeed, such is the strength of that position that Beauchesne's makes it very clear it is out of order to ask for the production of such documents. I refer the hon. member to Beauchesne's 6th edition, citation 446, section 3:

> Minister's correspondence of a personal nature, or dealing with constituency of general political matters, should not be identified with government papers and therefore should not be subject to production in the House.

Beauchesne's covers it quite well. I want also to make the point that the documents that were tabled, plus those that are available at Industry, Science and Technology, will enable anybody to examine the total history of this project. There really is no relevant information missing that would prevent detailed analysis in order for the hon. member or anybody else to reach whatever conclusion they might want to.

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR NEW WESTMINSTER—BURNABY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, both you and the majority of members of this House of Commons will know that since I was first elected three and a half years ago, one of the issues I have brought to the floor of this House and I raise at every opportunity, both within this House and in the Canadian community at large, is the issue of violence against women.

Earlier today, the member for Broadview—Greenwood told this House that I made statements that imputed his motives and impeded him in his work as a member of Parliament. The record will show that is simply not the case. At no point in my statement yesterday did I impute motives to the member or say that he acted out of any malicious intent.

What he did in publishing the addresses of shelters for battered women in the Toronto area was certainly wrong, but I never said or implied that he acted out of an intent to endanger lives. I want to quote from what I said: "Shelters for battered women give out their phone numbers but not their addresses because it would endanger the lives of women and children". The member published and distributed shelter addresses without consulting them. This is true. Abusive men have followed and killed their partners and have also killed shelter workers in transition homes. This is true. The member said that millions of dollars were being spent on shelters and that we are advocating that women go to places that are not secure.

The alternative is staying in an abusive situation. Shelters are not secure when abusive men find out where they are. The member said the addresses were already public information. But there is a difference between finding the addresses at the public library after research and circulating them to thousands of people.

Most organizations on the list do not publicly give out their addresses. They are trying to erase public records of their addresses and publish only their phone numbers.

The member has actually missed the point of my statement which was, as I clearly stated, to urge all members of Parliament to consult with women's groups in their ridings before sending out information on violence against women. The member's troubles over this matter could have been avoided had he contacted the groups he listed beforehand.

I maintain my recommendation to all members of this House to consult with groups in their ridings as to what is an appropriate tool for education on this matter and what to enclose with it in terms of support systems available in their communities for survivors of violence.

Not all members have the experience of working in a shelter for battered women. I understand they are therefore unaware of the effects some of their actions may have on those women and children. But a review of my statement will show no inaccuracies whatsoever.

I had hoped that my statement would be taken in a constructive manner by all members of Parliament. Instead, I find that the member seems to not have learned from that.

Violence against women is an extremely important issue to me and to many members in this House. It is my responsibility to urge members to avoid the situation the member for Broadview—Greenwood put himself into for the sake of abused women and children in all our ridings across Canada.

What he did was wrong, publishing the addresses of shelters for battered women. It was wrong. It did put women into increased danger. It was not intentionally wrong, I understand that, but it was wrong all the same.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, the member seems to persist. In her comments, she again states that the member for Broadview—Greenwood has put women at risk by doing what he did. I find that unacceptable.

I rise to support the point of privilege raised by my colleague, the member for Broadview—Greenwood. Let us put this matter into perspective. I believe that the member for Broadview—Greenwood put it into perspective this morning when he indicated the background to the dissemination of that particular information.

He was giving a speech in the House of Commons on the issue of violence against women and children. He was commenting about a publication entitled Women's Country which was given to him by a victim, a battered woman. He was subsequently called for information about women's shelters. In his opinion and in his judgment he felt that information was needed for women who are in that situation to provide information where these women might go to seek out help.

The member, as the member who just spoke, was trying to be helpful. Yet the member who is accusing him of putting women at risk, and I would submit for political reasons given the nature of my colleague's opposition that being a former NDP, chose to rise in the House of Commons—

An hon. member: Order, order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Please. On a point of order the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I thought the debate was going on a fairly high level until the last person got up.

• (1530)

We try to not impute motives in this House. I have read the statement from the member for New Westminster—Burnaby and there is no mention of the party affiliation of the member for Broadview—Greenwood.

There is a very important discussion about a very sensitive issue. I think the member who just spoke is going beyond any reasonable remarks in what he just said. I think he owes an apology not only to the hon. member but to the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

I think the issue is an important one, but this is not the appropriate time for a debate on this question of privilege. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood stated his position this morning. and the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway gave his as well. I can recognize the hon. member for York South—Weston again, but I would ask him to be brief so that we can get back to the subject before the House today.

With this proviso, I recognize the hon. member for York South—Weston.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the NDP member stated again today, just a few moments ago, that the actions of the member for Broadview—Greenwood have put women at risk.

He is accusing the member of actually putting these women at risk. But the member for New Westminster—Burnaby ought to grant the member the common courtesy of pointing out that a number of these shelters and hostels publish their addresses in the Toronto directory.

She knows that, yet she chose in her selective submissions not to point that information out. Perhaps she can take issue with hostels like Nellie's in Toronto and other hostels that publish that information. Rather than speaking to the member privately, the NDP member chose to rise in the House to give the issue a higher profile to score some cheap political NDP points by attacking the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask members to show a little restraint. This is a very delicate subject and could easily lead to an explosive debate.

I will again recognize the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby. I would ask her to be brief, and I hope this will conclude the debate.

[English]

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, just to clarify. I want to set the record straight.

I did contact the member in his constituency office in Toronto over a week ago when I began to get a number of calls from women's organizations that work to protect women and children who are in abusive and dangerous situations, sharing their concern with me.

The reason I have raised it in the House of Commons, as I have clearly stated, is I think all members of Parliament in this House should be aware of the implications of printing the addresses of shelters for battered women and abused children. That has very severe ramifications.

I would also hope all members of Parliament in this House, who have known me over the last three and a half years as I have raised these issues consistently with concern and compassion, know I would not in any way use this as a cheap political manoeuvre, as was stated.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 5, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 4th day of June, 1992, at 5.30 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque,
Secretary to the Governor General.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There were four minutes left for questions and comments after the speech by the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the four minutes but for the 20 minutes I am allowed in this debate. I will let someone else take these four minutes and wait my turn for the 20-minute speech I am allowed.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member on the government side who spoke to Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. I have a two-part question, and I think the hon. member should be able to give a straight answer.

The hon. member said that a referendum was extremely important in order to consult the people today, that we should trust Canadians, and that we should not be afraid of what they may decide. If this government is not afraid of what Canadians decide in a referendum, will it conduct a referendum on the goods and services tax?

The second part of my question is as follows: If not, could the government explain why there was no referendum on the goods and services tax? This is a straight question, and I would appreciate a straight answer.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I guess this has some relevance to the debate and I will answer the question, since I think my friend asked it in sincerity.

The government is not prepared to put a measure which is already in place to a referendum.

Second, the act implementing the goods and services tax was not submitted to a referendum of the Canadian people because it was part of the election platform of this party in 1988. I can recall being asked numerous questions about it as we went door to door in 1988. It is my belief the Progressive Conservative Party and the government which had a mandate from 1984 to 1988 got a renewed mandate in part because of its commitment to repeal the manufacturers' sales tax and replace it with a consumer-based tax.

I will concede the precise nature of the tax was not defined at that point. An all-party committee subsequently recommended the form of tax which we now have. Representatives of the hon. member's own party participated in that. That has now been implemented and is behind us. If the people of Canada do not approve of the tax, that will be one of the issues on which they will judge the government in the next general election.

That is a matter suitable for adjudication in a general election. Constitutional matters may be open to referendum under certain circumstances, but I do not believe there is a demand, nor should there be a demand, in this country for submitting conventional pieces of legislation to the referendum process.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a singular privilege to speak on third reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, and reflect the sentiments and wishes of my constituents from the riding of Winnipeg North.

At the outset I would like to commend the government for recognizing at last the need for a national referendum, which was proposed by the Liberal Party a little over a year ago on April 21, 1991, when my leader formally announced our party's nine-point plan for Canada's new Constitution.

It is high time we referred Canada to all Canadians and not fragmented portions for their final say. A national referendum will give Canadians outside Quebec a chance to tell their fellow citizens in Quebec they are important and essential to the country we know and love. It will give Quebecers a chance to say yes to all other Canadians from sea to sea.

The Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, a former Liberal Prime Minister of our country, once said: "The foundation of a nation is will". I therefore say let the people express this foundation of Canada.

The referendum bill proposed by this government however has some remaining problems. While they call it a referendum, what the Conservatives are really proposing is more of a plebiscite.

A referendum and a plebiscite are not the same, although not infrequently mistakenly interchanged in usage. Allow me to cite a reference book entitled Lawmaking by the People: Referendums and Plebiscites in Canada, by one of our own colleagues, the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I quote from page 13 of his book:

> The main difference between the two voting devices is therefore that a plebiscite is essentially a public opinion poll, but a referendum automatically binds a government to enact a law (or to refrain from doing so) according to the voters' wishes.

Indeed, what the government is really proposing is more of a plebiscite. What the government has really proposed, if it were not to be bound by the results of the vote, is a plebiscite in the context of this definition. If it were so, it would be the most costly public opinion poll at a cost to Canadian taxpayers of some $100 million at a time of very high unemployment and intense suffering on the part of millions of Canadians without jobs.

But there will be greater suffering without a united Canada. There will be greater disappointment if every Canadian voter is not given the opportunity to express her or his will, her or his voice in a referendum.

I am therefore saddened that the Leader of the New Democratic Party said her party would not support this referendum bill. My sadness was joined by alarm and grave concern when I heard the separatists in this chamber applaud the New Democratic leader and call her courageous. It takes courage to insist that Canadians be given the opportunity to express their will on Canada's new Constitution.

As my leader has repeatedly said: "The Constitution belongs to the people and all Canadians should have the final say on any constitutional reform package". My leader had a vision and the courage to express that vision on this issue a little more than a year ago.

It is true the bill as we have it today is not a perfect one. Our caucus however was pleased when the government accepted many amendments we introduced. I still have some concerns. The government has not made a commitment to not pass the constitutional reform package without the clear majority from each of the four regions of Canada: the Atlantic, Ontario, the west and Quebec.

The government must commit itself to respect not only a national majority but a clear majority from each of the four regions of our nation. The government should not use this bill as a tool to simply manipulate the provinces into agreement. The referendum should be an essential component of the decision-making on the future of Canada.

Let the people of our great democratic country express themselves and determine their future directly on a vital issue such as the issue facing the country today.

In the spirit of our federal country and our proud tradition of protecting minorities while respecting majorities, we should ensure real agreement across the country by demanding that the referendum vote pass in each region of the nation.

If we ask Quebecers with other Canadians if they want to journey further with us but provide no guarantee that we will not swallow their answers in the majority of the rest of the country, what kind of signal are we giving them?

Quebec, like the west and the other unique regions of Canada, must know that its distinctive perspective and separate importance to the country is cherished by the promise that its will will carry weight.

Each region must be able to affirm Canada and we must affirm the importance of that in any referendum we propose. Also, it is important that its mechanism be fair, and that the people of each region of Canada who must choose whether or not to vote and how to do so know that their opinions will be treated with all due respect.

Indeed, the referendum has to be fair not only to each of the regions but also with respect to each side of the question. Once again, the government refuses to provide a framework for fairness. Do we want money to decide the question of our country's future, or will we provide the essential structure of contribution limits to allow the real will of the people to be expressed?

As in any election in Canada, fairness must be ensured by keeping the battle ground level. Spending limits and, more important, contribution limits guard the right of Canadians to make their own decisions and express them unhindered by the absence of wealth or unduly purchased by it.

There should not be an illusion of support due to wealth alone.

I am glad that the government has listened to some opposition concerns, the concerns of the Liberal caucus at amendment time, accepting a number of our amendments.

Last, the government's bill does not ensure fairness in another dimension of administration of a referendum, the development of the question to be asked. The government proposes a few days of parliamentary debate on the wording of the question which would only allow for amendment, not participation, in the wording by opposition parties.

In an issue as important as the future of our country should not we, as members of Parliament, abandon our disagreements and allow the people of Canada instead to benefit from our differences by consulting together to present them with the most clear and helpful question possible?

The Prime Minister has assured reporters that his lack of popularity would not interfere with the determining of the future of this country through a referendum. He is willing to trust the people of Canada to put aside partisan political considerations to express truly their will for Canada. The people are to transcend partisanship in this essential issue but the elected members of this government, unwilling to let their control of events slip in the slightest, even for the sake of Canada, are not.

This is not consistent nor does it give Canada and Canadians their best chance before a referendum.

The moral force of popular will is the essence of a referendum. Whether it is legally or not legally binding is merely a debate on legal technicality. Moral force goes beyond the confines of technicalities. Moral force is at a higher level, on a higher pedestal. Moral force expresses, in the context of the national unity debate before the country, the will of the people, the will of all Canadians from sea to sea. In turn moral power or strength depends on the fairness of the process, how the referendum is conducted and its results interpreted and accepted.

At this juncture I would like to mention the efforts of two Canadian scientists, Dr. Jon Gerrard, a professor of paediatrics at the University of Manitoba Faculty of Medicine, and Dr. Jean-Pierre Despres, a professor at the University of Laval in Quebec City. These two scientists, along with 2,200 others from coast to coast, have signed petitions for a unified country. These scientists come from different cultures and speak different languages and yet they see the need for Canadian unity to ensure the future of science and education in Canada and thereby ensure the future of Canada itself.

Let me quote from the resolution our Canadian scientists have asked me to table in this House:

> Be it resolved that we as Canadians rededicate ourselves to a renewed spirit of co-operation, to build a nation where tolerance, diversity and caring for others are hallmarks.

Let this spirit of co-operation to build a renewed nation begin in this House today. Let us have the courage to consult with all Canadians. Let us, the elected representatives of the people, irrespective of political stripes, listen to their will and understand their hearts and minds. It has been said salus populi suprema lex est, the will of the people is the supreme law. Indeed the foundation of a nation is will as I said in the beginning.

I believe Canadians have the will to hold their country tight, to keep it from breaking. Do we have the will in Parliament to let them show their love for this land? I pray to God we do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I know there are many members who would like to make questions and comments on that excellent speech of my hon. friend from Winnipeg who truly demonstrates a patriotism that many of us could well emulate.

I want to ask him one question and make one comment. I will do the comment first.

Mr. Prud'homme: Short.

Mr. Edwards: Very short. I know my friend from Saint-Denis is anxious and I will be quick.

The comment that I have is concerning the government's participation in the referendum campaign. I just want to put on the record that if the government chooses to contribute to a registered referendum committee, that contribution will be reported by that committee. This is something of an elaboration on the comments of the Minister of Labour earlier today.

The bill does not affect the government's ability to carry on its business during a referendum campaign. Any government spending on the referendum would of course be subject to the usual scrutiny of all government spending. Governments of course are accountable. Finally, this bill of course does not authorize any expenditures other than those necessary on the part of the Chief Electoral Officer. There are no other expenditures authorized such as advertising or promotion expenditures. Anything like that would have to be voted on of course by Parliament.

My question for the hon. member has this point. The hon. member may have heard earlier today in Question Period our colleague from Kitchener put a question to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs having to do with the proposed preamble to the Constitution which the joint committee recommended. I know that my friend has just demonstrated that he has a great love for fine language. I am wondering whether he himself is in support of the proposed preamble and whether he would do his share to see that it is incorporated in our final constitutional document.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is consent for the following motion:

> That four members and two staff of the Subcommittee on Acid Raid of the Standing Committee on Environment be permitted to travel to Washington, D.C., June 16 to 18, 1992, in relation to its study on Canada-United States acid raid reduction programs

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It is not in the rules to table motions between comments and questions. I would prefer that that period expire before putting such a motion. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to wait.

[Translation]

The hon. member asks if there is unanimous consent to allow him to present a motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, because I hope that those or two or three minutes, since time is running out, will not be substracted from the 10 minutes allowed for questions.

I know that the hon. member took the floor at 3.52 p.m., which means that he talked for three minutes. I respectfully submit that there are seven minutes left for an answer from my colleague and for a comment that I would like to make, unless you recognize someone else.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and comments. Certainly I support in essence any preamble that fully describes the spirit and the soul of the country that we together, irrespective of cultures, irrespective of differences, not only tolerate but respect each other. In that spirit I support the principle of the preamble.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I know that the debate is coming to an end. At this point, I would like, for obvious and very political motives, to be on the record today.

I want to make something clear, and I do this partly because of the speech made by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg who said "the will of the people is supreme". I, Marcel Prud'homme, member for Montreal—Saint-Denis, member representing Quebec in Ottawa, want to be clearly understood.

Regardless of the past, if there had been a referendum in years gone by, my attitude would have been the same. I do not know, at this point, if I will abstain from voting or if I will support this legislation, but one thing is certain: I want to be clearly understood. My position is unequivocal: Never, and I mean never, will I recognize a referendum through which a majority from outside Quebec would impose its views on that province. This means that I would have hoped to see in the bill this issue of regional veto.

I am speaking on behalf of my province. I know that Quebec is a region. I leave it up to Canadians to define their regions. I remember an hon. member who wished that Canada would be divided into five regions. This reminds me of our history class in school when we were taught that there were five regions in Canada. Today, others see four regions. I do not have to get involved in this debate. I will talk on behalf of my region.

I want the record to state clearly that, personally, I will never accept that the rest of Canada dictate its views to Quebec. I will go even farther by saying that I would fight anybody from any political party, including mine, who would believe or who would want people to believe that we can, through a Canadian majority, impose something on my province that it does not want.

Mr. Speaker, there is no point in making a long speech. This is a well-thought comment that I wanted to make in the House.

• (1600)

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary-North-East): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks made by the member for Saint-Denis. He knows all the admiration I have for him. I agree with what he said. I feel that, as a confederation, we should not, by a pan-Canadian vote, impose a pan-Canadian decision on any province.

I go even further than the member for Saint-Denis. I feel that Alberta surely has the right to be heard. It presently has before its legislature a referendum bill. I really feel that, while we form a confederation, an over-all view should not be imposed on any region or province.

That was by way of a comment.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I suspect there is not that much time left for questions and comments.

The member who recently got up and to whom we are supposed to be directing our questions and comments through the Chair, of course, said that he was going to support this legislation. Then he went on to list a number of the major areas that the Liberals had said must be in the bill.

They are important areas like the item that his Liberal colleague just mentioned, which is the whole idea of the double majority where each region's vote is looked at and considered by the government. That is a very important issue.

The issue of real spending limits is also very important. There is the whole issue of making sure that the question that is going to go out to the people of Canada is done in a non-partisan way. All those major areas were defeated by the government.

In addition, there were other suggestions to make sure that the poor, the native people, the ethnic communities of this country and the women who may not have funding can take part in a referendum campaign. That is if they have some means of participating. Unfortunately, under the rules that the government put forward, it is basically a big-buck campaign. If you are rich, you campaign and others are excluded.

The Liberal Party did not get any of these major amendments. One of the things I noticed as I was going through the votes last night was that there is very little time left. We want a referendum. We want a fair referendum in the New Democratic Party, but a lot of the amendments that the Liberals voted with the government on last night, time after time after time, ensure that there will not be a fair referendum.

I ask him: "Why did you vote with the government so many times last night on important amendments? Second, since you did not achieve any of your main goals, how can you support such unfair legislation?" We want the people to decide. Why support this legislation?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I had addressed all those concerns in my debate.

I would only say that there is an overriding concern which is that we should let the people decide irrespective of the imperfections in this bill. If the New Democratic Party agrees but will not give that opportunity for the people to express their will through a referendum, then it is the greatest hypocrisy that I have heard in this Chamber. The referendum will convey the message from Canadians. Let the will of Canadians prevail and not the analysis that the New Democratic Party is trying to portray.

Mr. Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Jonquière.

Mrs Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 62, I make the following motion:

That the member for Richelieu now be given the floor.

Mr. Speaker, you may have noted that more than two members rose at once. I therefore make the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 62.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the hon. members' patience.

You will understand that my reluctance to proceed too quickly is due to my concern for ensuring full compliance with the Standing Orders of this House and that certain conditions are met before this kind of motion is approved. I wanted to check with the clerks to make sure that such is the case, and indeed it is.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Therefore the motion is lost.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, in the past few days some members have not acted so eloquently and in a way that befits Quebecers.

We are at third reading of Bill C-81, the referendum bill. Why are we dealing with a referendum bill today? We must go back to Meech when a premier, by not respecting his signature, created a major constitutional deadlock and the five conditions for Quebec to return to the constitutional fold were not met. As a result, the whole country was in a major impasse.

A year later, the Prime Minister of Canada, decided to try to solve the constitutional problem again. To do so, despite the strong and bitter criticism from many opponents, he created the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee. This committee had a specific purpose: to see how the constitutional amending formula could be changed and also to look into the subject of referendums. We on this committee, chaired by two eminent colleagues, Senator Beaudoin and my fellow member, Mr. Edwards, made the following recommendation: We thought that the federal authorities—

An hon. member: They have left.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Indeed, our colleagues have left. We thought that the federal authorities should table a referendum bill in the Canadian Parliament. This referendum would be optional. It would be up to the authorities to use it as required. Given the heterogeneous nature of the country, we thought that the bill should provide for a double majority, a national majority and a majority in each of the four regions.

This referendum would not change the Constitution of Canada. Its result would have a political, not a legal value. It would not bind the two levels of government, but it would send an eloquent message.

That was one of the recommendations of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, because it was felt that in case of a deadlock, we would ultimately have to go to the people.

The Prime Minister subsequently appointed a second constitutional committee, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, to prepare an in-depth analysis of the changes that would have to be made in the Canadian Constitution to rally the provinces, the First Ministers and the people of Canada around the same set of constitutional proposals.

I had the privilege of working on this committee as well. This is what our committee had to say: "We recommend that a federal law be enacted, if deemed appropriate by the Government of Canada, to enable the federal government, at its discretion, to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal, either to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions".

Both committees recommended that there should be a mechanism, in case of a deadlock, that would allow us to go to the people.

Where are we now? The First Ministers and their representatives met over a period of several weeks and are trying, on the basis of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report's recommendations, to formulate constitutional proposals that will respond to the expectations of all Canadians, not only Quebecers, and of all the provinces.

However, we must still deal with the, perhaps not very palatable but still very real, possibility that we may be faced with a deadlock. If that happens, what is our responsibility as parliamentarians? At the very least, we must ensure legislation is in place that would enable Canadians across the country to say how they see their country and what they want from their country. Under our democratic system, the right of First Ministers to let this country break up because there is a deadlock is superseded by the fundamental right of Canadians to say what they want from their country and whether they agree with the proposed changes.

The government has tabled legislation, Bill C-81, which provides for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. I have examined the bill, and there are many aspects I do not like. For instance, I felt it was very important, in a Canadian referendum, to be able to respect the differences that exist across the country, especially in Quebec, which since 1982 has not been a party to this constitutional agreement and which as a distinct society asked for certain specific powers and got no for an answer as a result of the demise of Meech.

I would have liked to see a double majority, in other words provision in the legislation that requires a majority both across Canada and in each of Canada's four major regions. The west must say yes, Ontario must say yes, the maritimes must say yes and Quebec as well. This is not only a matter of vision but also a way to avoid the kind of situation that caused the demise of Meech Lake, when a single First Minister, because he refused to sign his name, prevented the Constitution from being amended and Quebec from turning to the constitutional fold.

We could have the same situation if a First Minister were to say: "I am committed to respecting the decision of my province in a referendum". In that case, we might get the same result as we did after Meech, which means Quebec would not be able to go after its veto, with all the consequences that would entail.

I had a second amendment I wanted the House of Commons to approve. It was about spending ceilings which would ensure that yes committees or no committees would never have an undue advantage over each other, based on the funds available to each side.

I would refer to it as an inequity situation in a referendum. That is the context in which I first tabled amendments for consideration before the legislative committee, amendments not unlike many that were considered at the time of the 1980 referendum in Quebec. Then I tabled the same amendments before this House so that they could be disposed of. Our Speaker ruled that the amendments—not just mine, but those of opposition members as well; there were five in all along that line—were out of order in that they went beyond the scope of the bill. And there is no going back on this ruling of the Speaker.

There is nothing stopping our Prime Minister or opposition leaders from giving the people of Canada the assurance that the Canadian majority will not decide for Quebec. Nothing is stopping our Prime Minister and opposition leaders from making such commitments.

On the other hand, votes were taken in this House yesterday on the amendments relating to the ceiling on expenditures as well as and the yes and no umbrellas and these were defeated. One hundred and eleven members voted against and 68 for the amendment I had tabled to ensure that, if a referendum were to be held in Canada, it would be the fairest possible. That being said, I suggest that democracy means allowing a member to put forward proposals to amend a bill and letting his colleagues decide, based on their own knowledge and conscience.

In that context, what is in the best interest of Canada? Indeed, we may decide we would rather have no bill than to have one that is flawed. In that case, what would happen? The result would be that, in the event of a constitutional impasse, we would be stuck. I maintain that we are better off with a flawed piece of legislation than to have no way of consulting the people of Canada in the event of an impasse.

Mr. Plamondon: That is no piece of legislation. It is a hold-up on democracy.

An hon. member: There are two peoples in Canada.

An hon. member: It is not worth it. It is a waste of money.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Moreover, if we do not have a referendum act, the people of Canada could well be the first to criticize us the most sharply for having failed, as members of Parliament, to afford them protection in the event of an impasse. And that is our duty as parliamentarians.

I could rise in this House tonight—as a matter of fact it would look good if Jean-Pierre Blackburn rose and voted no—and vote against this bill because it does not provide for a ceiling on expenditures as I hoped it would. It would look good—

Our hon. friend will get a chance to speak in a moment, if he would just wait his turn. It would look good indeed. But would it be the responsible thing to do?

I sat on the Beaudoin-Edwards committee where members of this House did recommend that there be a referendum act. Later, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee recommended the same thing. In that context, we do need a referendum act. We do because of the threat of an impasse. That is also why I intend to support the principle of this referendum bill, as imperfect as it may be, as I did by the way in second reading. Unlike the members from the Bloc Quebecois, however, I suited my action to my words. I tabled amendments and attended the legislative committee for that purpose. Yesterday evening, my hon. colleagues had the opportunity—

Mr. Plamondon: Not one single of them was passed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Out of respect for the people watching us, I would call upon all hon. members to make an effort in terms of self-restraint so that democracy can prevail in this House, in the greatest freedom and respect for individuals.

• (1620)

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, it is in this context that—

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The member for Rosemont has the floor.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that you want to maintain some order. Could you ask our colleague opposite to be a little more professional when he speaks?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This was not a point of order. The member for Jonquière has the floor.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Well, Mr. Speaker, as opposed to these members who would not stop talking but who did not put their words into actions and did not present any amendments to try to improve this bill, to try to really protect the interests of Quebec, they really could care less.

This being said, I would point out again that section 3 of the bill as it now stands could imply that there will be a referendum either in some provinces or across Canada. I also want to tell this House that, a few days ago, I had the privilege of talking to the Quebec Premier, Mr. Bourassa. For the time being, nothing can let us presume that, during the referendum, Quebec will or will not follow the rules it has set out and that we are all aware of concerning an umbrella committee for the yes vote and another one for the nos. That will be up to the Quebec government to decide when the time comes.

This being said, I would like to get back to the remarks made by the member for Saint-Denis who said earlier that he did not know if he would abstain tonight when the bill is put to the vote. I too could abstain. I could do the same.

An hon. member: How brave of him.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): I could take the same action.

An hon. member: What a brave man.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): What do Canadians need—

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened to the hon. member's speech with a great deal of interest. I hope he makes his speech.

Then he should wait for the vote to see what I will do. I do not want him to get all worked up about what he could do. He should stick to his speech and not get me involved in his comments. He will see what I will do when we vote.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, my comments deal with abstaining from voting. We need a referendum law.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): This piece of legislation is not perfect but there could be a deadlock and we do not have the right, as parliamentarians, not to provide Canadians with the tool that they would need in such a case. It is in that context that we must make a decision and take our responsibilities.

We have the right and the privilege to make amendments. Members of Parliament have the right and the privilege to vote on these amendments.

I will end my speech with a last comment. During this debate over the last few days, I have seen the members of the Bloc Quebecois rise in this House on numerous occasions. There was little substance in their comments, very little substance.

These people want to be recognized and then they abuse the system because they do not have anything of substance to say. Then again, they criticize us because we use a gag order. Instead, they should show us that they deserve getting additional time. Then we will be pleased to consider their request.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I will not have the opportunity to participate in this debate because there is not enough time. I would have liked to express my views on this bill, but since there is not enough time, I will ask a question of the member for Jonquière.

If there is a referendum, does the hon. member think that the Prime Minister, or the federal or provincial authorities, must first give Canadians a clear and precise idea of how the result of that exercise will be interpreted? Let me explain.

I want the member to tell me what he thinks of the double majority. I want him to tell me what he thinks of the proposal made by the Liberal Party, which was rejected by the parliamentary committee—he was there—because I know that he was an active member of that committee. He made a great contribution to the work of the committee. The resolution calling for a double majority was rejected because it was beyond the legislative framework proposed by the government. But I am still of the opinion that the Prime Minister of the country must make a statement before the referendum to the effect that if a region of the country, whether it is the Atlantic region, Quebec, Ontario, or the west, has a majority opposing this project, the Prime Minister will not in any way implement it.

Does he agree that the importance of the regions in this country is fundamentally what makes Canada? In my opinion, there are two elements that shape this country and that are fundamental: First and foremost, the linguistic duality, because it is there and it must be recognized and, second, regionalism because it is a fact and a Canadian reality.

Does the member agree that regionalism must in this referendum process be the paramount consideration for the Prime Minister of the country when he will interpret the result of the referendum?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleague that what he says was part of the amendments I tabled both before the legislative committee and in this House. Here is what I proposed:

> If a referendum is held in all the provinces of Canada, the Senate or the House of Commons shall not adopt any resolution authorizing the Governor General to issue a proclamation in order to amend the Constitution of Canada where the amendment would directly or indirectly be contrary to the opinion expressed, in a referendum, by a majority of voters in Canada and in each of the four main regions.

Then they are described in detail.

This was part of the amendments other opposition members proposed in various terms at different moments. I dearly wish, you can understand, that party leaders in this House would commit themselves to this. It is presently their prerogative to decide. That is why I wanted the bill amended.

Moreover, and I felt this was important, an amendment of this kind would prevent any premier from declaring: "The decision taken by the people of my province will be binding upon me". Let us take Newfoundland as an example. If this commitment was made in a referendum where there is no regional majority, and the people of Newfoundland said no, our goose would be cooked There can no longer be a veto for Quebec because unanimity is required.

This is why I was referring to a regional majority in order to protect not only the province of Quebec but the three other regions also, and avoid situations of the kind I just described.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I would like to make a comment directed at the hon. member for Jonquière. I would like to draw his attention to what was said on January 31, 1979, by one of his former colleagues, the hon. Roch La Salle. The subject was the referendum proposed by the Liberal Party, which was in power at the time.

> Never has such a large Quebec group been so weak in the Liberal caucus. Never has a 60-member group from Quebec betrayed so often the vital interests of the province of Quebec. This needs to be said, Mr. Speaker, and a bill is not going to solve those problems.

He was talking about a possible referendum bill. Ironic, is it not? Mr. Roch La Salle, that same January 31, 1979, said also:

> The Prime Minister, in the wake of his fiasco and monumental failure on the political and economic fronts, has designed this tool to enhance his image as the great savior of confederation. Actually he is responsible for and the originator of our present problems with his team riding his coattails and not daring to speak up.

• (1630)

It seems to me this is almost prophetic as far as you are concerned, the hon. member for Jonquière. Note that, as a Conservative member of Parliament, Mr. La Salle had guts when he was on the opposition side. That time is over. He was not ashamed of standing up and talking.

"Never, he said, would I accept to be afraid of the good judgement of Quebecers in their own referendum." Let us trust the people of Quebec, he said in that speech. Here is the truth. This is my first question and I would appreciate your comments.

The second one concerns the fact that you said that an unworthy law was better that no law at all. This is terrible. Here is a repugnant, immoral bill, without spending limits, something intolerable in a western democratic society. Something never seen before. You do not want a referendum, you want to be able to buy the conscience of citizens and block Quebec's aspirations.

This is why I am asking you and all Conservative members from Quebec—on behalf of our growing children, on behalf of senior citizens who fought for years to get what we have in Quebec, on behalf of unemployed workers who dream of sovereignty to find a job at last, on behalf of all those who long for leading this Quebec we have been seeking for generations—I beseech you, please, show courage rather than cowardice and vote against this bill.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): I did not talk about an unworthy bill, but about a flawed bill, which is quite different.

Second, once again I will show the hon. member that when you talk and work hard for changes, changes do sometimes happen.

At first, there was absolutely no spending limit in the bill. With our interventions, it was established at 56.4 cents. That is a step forward. I would have liked to get more. That is only one umbrella committee for the yes side and only one for the side no, because there are two opposing sides. But pursuant to clause 1 of the Constitution: "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

It is on the basis of that clause of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and of the Constitution of 1982 that I argued that we could have one yes committee and one no committee and that we could set a spending limit. But other people told us that pursuant to clause 2, the Supreme Court of Canada could say that that is unacceptable and contrary to constitutional rules. The future will tell us.

I repeat, I did what I had to do, I moved amendments so that we could have a good bill and my colleagues voted in keeping with democracy. I will not sulk because I did not get what I specifically wanted. We need a referendum bill because, if we face a deadlock without having such a bill at our disposal, the consequences would be serious. So, we have to take our responsibilities.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): In the little bit of time we have left, I would like to just mention one figure, and I hope people are listening and watching us on television from coast to coast, from west to east and north to south. The figure I want to mention is 37 cents. It is less than 50 cents. This 37 cents I am talking about is what pensioners received this year from the Canada Pension Plan for an increase in the cost of living; 37 cents. I do not know if you can buy anything at McDonald's for 37 cents. People in the gallery are saying no. I know very few things you can buy for 37 cents.

Mr. Belsher: It is for a quarter of the year.

Mr. Edmonston: That is correct. The member from the government side said the figure is right but it is only for the quarter. That means maybe if our pensioners in this country, French, English and other languages are lucky, they will get more than 37 cents in other quarters of this year. Well that is fine. Perhaps that is the way the government reasons.

An hon. member: How does this get into the referendum?

Mr. Edmonston: It is easy. It is 37 cents to all of our millions of pensioners versus $108 million for a referendum which is not binding.

An hon. member: Before government advertising.

Mr. Edmonston: It is a referendum where there is no control on the expenses. We do not know what the question will be, but generally this referendum is nothing more than some kind of super survey. That is it.

We know referendum is not even a proper term. People have said referendum means it is binding and when the people vote the government has to respect their wishes.

This government is not saying that. You know the government is not saying that. This government says it wants to hear from the people, but we have no guarantee whatsoever this government will actually listen and act as the people want.

This government is scornful of popular will. This government did not want a referendum, it wanted a plebiscite. You know the difference between plebiscite and referendum; it is not binding. This is not binding.

My party wants a referendum. We want a fair referendum. I was on the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee. The government members know I was and I tried to participate in a positive way. I was fully aware of the fact that even a Liberal member said there had to be a control on the expenses and a double majority.

Then we had Beaudoin–Edwards which said the same thing. Then we had Beaudoin–Dobbie. I served proudly on that committee and tried to be positive. It said we should have control of these expenses and we should have a referendum which is binding, but it is not.

I am disappointed in this bill but I am really disappointed in this debate. This is not a debate at a level ordinary Canadians are going to find relevant. This is a debate we have heard for the past several days where each side of the House is calling the other side traitors, prostitutes, and selling out the country. I do not believe that.

I do not agree with the government but I do not believe this bill is illegitimate. I do not agree with the government but I do not believe certain members did not work as hard as they could, particularly members from Quebec. I know my friend, the hon. member from Jonquière, has done a commendable job trying to change this bill. He has my admiration and he is a member of the government side.

Some people say if you are against the referendum you are against Canada and you do not want to put any faith in the people. I issue a challenge today to the government members. If you really believe in going to the people, I challenge you. Take the GST to a referendum. Let us hear the people speak about the GST and bind yourselves to the GST, number one. Let me give you another example.

Mr. McDermid: What about capital punishment?

Mr. Edmonston: We will get to capital punishment but let me get to my speech because I asked the question and I am sure you will respond.

Second, if you believe in the will of the people, the people are up there in the gallery, the people who are listening to us, and those watching on television, if you believe in referendums, if you believe in liberty and democracy, take the free trade deal and put it into a referendum.

Mr. McDermid: We did. It was called the 1988 election.

Mr. Edmonston: A referendum. Listen to the people.

If you believe the people are equal and everyone has the same voice, why not control expenses?

• (1640)

Everyone has the same voice. Why not control expenses? What is this deal about 56 cents per person, $5 million or $8 million limit on as many committees as you want? Is that really the way to go? Even people in your own party say: "Come on, get smart, this is not want we need".

I can have admiration for members from any political party because I listen to what they say and I listen to the logic of what they say. I have listened to the Liberals and I have listened to the Conservatives. I disagree with the Conservatives. I disagree with the Liberals. I think the lack of this protection of a double majority and a lack of protection for the expenses are imperfect and are flaws that go to the heart of this bill.

That is really a difference between us and other members of the government and the Liberal Party. I know many Liberal Party members are very unhappy because they want it. I remember my good friend, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel saying: "We have to have this. This double majority is very important". That is one of the reasons we signed on Beaudoin–Dobbie, but you did not get it.

Is it enough not to have this particular tool? Is there an urgency right now for this referendum which is not binding? I do not think there is any urgency at all.

While we are talking about the people I do admire on this debate, I must tell you some of the interventions I have not admired because I do not think they were very appropriate.

My friends from the Bloc Quebecois are hon. colleagues. One has been elected here as a member of the Bloc, but I consider them to be more or less the Hari Krishnas of the independent movement. They come out and give very fatuous and not very intellectual arguments. It is almost like what we hear in Quebec. There is a fellow by the name of Charbonneau who sells Vitagro. He used to say: "Parole de Charbonneau, c'est Vitagro qu'il vous faut", or by the word of Charbonneau Vitagro, it is what you need for your plants.

It is like the independence movement in Quebec. If the Independantistes want to convince us, they have to give us more arguments than telling us: "Well, listen this referendum is no good. It is terrible. It is treasonous. It is against the rest of the country", because that is not true. There is nothing treasonous about this. A bad law is a bad law is a bad law. It is as simple as that and $108 million is something the Liberals understand because they are used to spending big bucks.

I have a letter here, dated May 26, 1992, issued by the Liberal Party and it is a fund-raising letter. It is about the referendum. You know what the Liberal Party says? It is signed by the Leader of the Opposition who says: "For many months, I have maintained that the so-called constitutional crisis was caused and fuelled by politicians". He is right. He is one of them. Do you know what he says at the end? "If you agree with me, please help us fight for your democratic rights. Please send us $100, $500, $200, $50—there is nothing less than $50 here—or a special gift". I guess this is the referendum lotto. I do not know but this is a special gift. He is saying: "Help us fight the referendum".

Members on the other side got these fund- raising letters. The point I am trying to make here is when the Liberals were sending off this fund-raising letter asking for $50 or more that would make Tammy Baker proud, they were at the same time getting tossed out by the government on every one of the amendments my good friend the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and others considered crucial to this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 4.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, June 3, 1992 in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of third reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[Translation]

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: May I have the attention of the House, please?

There was a problem during Question Period concerning a statement made by the hon. member for Shefford. The hon. member has a long experience in the House of Commons. I have asked him to withdraw his remarks. I think I must ask the hon. member again to withdraw his remarks.

[English]

I would like to ask the hon. member, who, as I mentioned earlier, has seen many years of service in this place, if after some reflection he would be prepared to withdraw the remarks that were made. I would hope that the hon. member could find his way clear to do that. I will hear the hon. member.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): You know, Mr. Speaker, in the heat of debate, one can say things that one should not. As I certainly would not want to displease you, I am happy to withdraw what I said.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member very much.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona) moved that Bill C-311, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to speak on my private member's bill, Bill C-311, which is an act to amend the Criminal Code and Parole Act.

This bill came about as a result of a meeting the Edmonton caucus of Progressive Conservative members of Parliament had with six victims of Larry Takahashi last June. On Friday, June 14, 1991, our Edmonton caucus met with these six victims. We met in Edmonton and we listened to their concerns.

From that meeting we took their concerns here to Ottawa. We discussed them through our caucus system. From that process our Alberta caucus decided to ask the hon. member for St. Albert and me to present a private member's bill on the subject of parole. We did this. We worked diligently over the summer and introduced Bill C-311 on October 8, 1991.

This bill has been co-sponsored by 15 other members of Parliament, which is quite significant. I think this has been the greatest number of co-sponsors of any private member's bill introduced in the House of Commons. It signifies a great deal of support for this initiative.

I want to say at the outset the bill deals with a number of provisions and I will go through those. The bill could not deal with counselling and treatment for victims of crime because of course a private member's bill cannot add an additional expense to the government.

This bill increases the amount of time that convicted inmates are required to serve before they are eligible for parole. I will not go into the technicalities of the schedules for that, but for violent and dangerous offenders generally, they would have to serve three-quarters of their sentence before being eligible for full parole or mandatory parole and one-half their sentence before they are allowed day parole.

Pursuant to Standing Order 86(3), I would like to inform the House of the names of the members who co-sponsored this bill. First I would like to read the Standing Order:

> 86(3) Notwithstanding the usual practices of the House, not more than twenty Members may jointly second an item under Private Members' Business and may indicate their desire to second any motion in conjunction with the Member in whose name it first appeared on the Notice Paper, by so indicating, in writing to the Clerk of the House, at any time prior to the item being proposed.

All names received pursuant to Standing Order 86(3) shall be appended to the Notice Paper, and that they have. The Notice Paper reads:

> Seconders pursuant to Standing Order 86(3):
> October 8, 1991—Messrs. Porter, Hughes, Thacker, Dorin, Richardson, Shields, and Fee; Mrs. Sparrow and Feltham; Messrs. Johnson, Van De Walle, O'Kurley, Littlechild, Malone and Edwards

I want to thank my colleagues who co-sponsored this bill with me. It has been very, very important.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, as you and members of the House will recall, Larry Takahashi was convicted in 1985 of several sexual assaults and he was required to serve in the Mountain Institution in Agassiz, B.C. where he is today.

He was let out on escorted temporary passes to go golfing with unarmed guards. The Vancouver Sun found out about this because a guard in that institution notified the paper that this was happening. The paper ran a story on it. The citizens of Edmonton and across the country were outraged because this person, who was initially charged with sexually assaulting 138 people and sentenced to three life terms and well over 75 years in prison, after a few short years was let out to go golfing with unarmed guards.

The area where he assaulted most of the victims was in south Edmonton in 1985. My riding covers roughly one-third of south Edmonton. This is the middle portion of Edmonton. In addition to the six victims we met with, others contacted me and asked that something be done about it.

The response was Bill C-311 which was introduced on October 8. This bill, as I said, increases the portion of the term of imprisonment that inmates are required to serve. The bill also requires that the National Parole Board be required to consider, at the parole hearing of an inmate, any statement of a victim or witness of an offence committed by that inmate. This is very, very important because up to now, victims have generally been left out of the process.

At the end of the trial the focus of society's attention shifts to the accused. We try to rehabilitate the inmate. We offer counselling and a host of things. We try to give them job skills in prison. We could do much more there.

What I am saying in this bill is that we should pay particular attention to the needs of victims. A lot of them have psychological needs, material needs and needs in the process of administration of justice. They should be given an option of knowing when a prisoner is out on day parole and when they are released and whether that person has made any progress as of that date.

Also at the parole hearing, this bill is saying that the Parole Board should consider the trauma the victims have gone through and their needs because justice is a balancing act.

The bill also requires the notification, which I just mentioned, of when a prisoner is let out on day parole and full parole. These were covered generally in the government Bill C-36 which was passed by the House and is now in the Senate.

There is one thing that has not been covered. This bill has put forward an item for public debate and discussion. That is that a violent and dangerous offender who has been accused more than once, a serial offender, would have sentences which would have to be served consecutively, rather than concurrently. This would reflect society's outrage. We are not saying this should be for all sentences, but for a particular segment, the sentences should be served consecutively.

I am hoping to hear what my opposition colleagues and the government have to say about that aspect of the bill.

I would like to read a couple of letters which I received last June from constituents who are very, very concerned about this just to give an indication to the House of why we brought this bill forward in urging the government to move on the area of parole reform. It did eventually move on parole reform. After I introduced my bill the hon. Solicitor General introduced a bill. The justice committee has held hearings all year and has gone through clause-by-clause study. It is now in the Senate. I would like to quote from a constituent who says: "Balancing the victim's rights with those of the offender are important in considering reforms to the Parole Act. Day passes and other privileges provide opportunities to rehabilitate offenders under controlled situations. Let's not over-react and stop providing these privileges". He then goes on to say: "But let's also keep in mind the anguish of the victims. Our greatest concern should probably be for them". I would agree wholeheartedly with that.

Another constituent wrote me. He said: "I have been viewing with alarm the actions of federal officials administering Parole Board regulations. I would look to our lawmakers in the House of Commons to enact or amend legislation to protect my family and society at large from lax treatments of criminals after they have been convicted and sentenced by the courts." I agree with that, as I am sure most members in the House would also agree.

This constituent went on to say: "I would appreciate it if you would advise me if you are willing and able to indicate some action and when appropriate changes might take place. In this matter, it appears to me that the bureaucrats should not be given discretionary authority which can in effect defeat the punitive and corrective power of the courts and also obviously make possible further criminal acts during the time of a criminal's escorted temporary absence".

We did follow through. We did listen to our constituents and the people of Edmonton and brought forward this bill. I am pleased to say that I believe it had an impact on the government because the government then brought forward its own bill.

At the meeting with the victims of Larry Takahashi they presented us with a list of nine demands which I would like to go over. I want to read into the record their letter that they gave to us that day. It is addressed to the Solicitor General of Canada, and to the Prime Minister of Canada. It reads as follows:

> We as victims feel we have the right and privilege to contest the day passes awarded to Larry Takahashi.
> Our first-hand experience is that he is dangerous and psychotic. We further believe that the judicial system is failing in its mandate to protect the public. We are also of the opinion that Larry Takahashi has a dual, or split, personality. He fooled the public and his family before in believing him to be a "nice" guy and active in the community. He is now doing the same in the prison and they are "falling for it".
> This is making a complete mockery of our judicial system. How can we put any kind of trust in a system where three life sentences plus 73 years mean absolutely nothing? There is no credibility; no effectuality deemed by this sentence. What are the repercussions in a society where punishment is not matched to the crime?

This is a letter from six victims of Larry Takahashi who are very, very concerned and in fact scared that he might come back to get them and revisit the crimes.

The demands or requests are as follows:

> 1. Three life sentences plus 73 years should indicate the amount of time an offender should serve.

I tried to indicate this in our bill. I am willing to accept other arguments about consecutive sentences, but I think we should go in the direction of saying that a sentence should be a sentence in indicating what three life sentences and 73 years really mean.

> 2. There should be a stronger line of communication between the court system and the Parole Board.

We agree with that and I believe Bill C-36 has enacted, in regulation form, some stronger lines of communication.

> 3. Dangerous serial rapists should not be awarded the same rights as other offenders. Their time served for eligibility for parole should not be on the same status as someone who commits a lesser offence.
> 4. Due to financial considerations, 122 women were denied their rights to appear in court to tell their story about the violence committed against them.

One of the reasons for this is the cost of the time in the court system, but many of these victims, I believe, should have had a right to put their views forward. That is why we included the victim impact statement. For those victims where the charges are dropped, they still can have their say in court through the victim impact statement.

• (1730)

They said to me that, as a result, the Solicitor General and the public at large is led to believe that only seven women were raped. That is not true. Many, many more were raped, but due to time and the processes of court, this was not explored.

> 5. The court should not have the right to dismiss a victim's charges without prior approval from the victim.

They wanted to give some control to those victims.

> In Takahashi's case, 122 voices were not heard. The decision was made on behalf of these women solely on the basis of cost and the trauma that would be incurred. These actions make us feel invisible and discounted.

It is a travesty, I believe, not to listen to the voices of these women.

> 6. The victims should have the right to be informed of any changes in status of the prison term of the offender, i.e., day passes or parole.
> 7. Victims should have the resources and opportunity to be rehabilitated back into society, just as the offender is.
> 8. We believe there should be a recognition of the violence committed against women. Value is attached to the destruction of material objects (such as a broken window) but no value is attached to the destruction of an emotionally sound and well being.
> 9. It should be mandatory that the victim impact statement be read by the Parole Board prior to review of the offender's application for parole.

I believe I responded to the concerns of these victims. I believe the government has responded. We are well on our way to dealing with the problem of violence against women. The government has a number of initiatives in that respect and we are working on those. We could do much, much more.

On their point number one, they indicated that a concurrent sentence means nothing. I would like to quote from our meeting. They said that it was sickening that information about Larry Takahashi's recreational passes had to be leaked by a prison guard. They thought that the privacy rules were too strong in this case and that the weight given to the protection of the public should be paramount.

Their fourth point was about the more than 130 women who had been attacked. They indicated to us that plea bargaining reduced this to seven charges. This discounted the trauma of 122 women. Many of these women had psychological problems. They are still having psychological problems today.

Some of the marriages of these women broke up. Some of them had family problems. Some of them were not able to work very well and I believe that is a travesty.

They also indicated that our judicial system is eager to rehabilitate the offender but does nothing to offer psychological counselling for victims or to provide any of the material needs of the victims. The victims gave me an example where Larry Takahashi broke into a house and then there was compensation for the window that was broken. However, with this one particular woman, her marriage broke apart. She needed counselling and the government would only cover six sessions of this.

This is seven years after it happened and she is still experiencing that emotional trauma which is terrible.

The police treated her quite badly. I know the police are trying. They are trying their best to implement new rules. As an example, the police took sheets so they could take them to the lab and examine them for evidence. They cut big holes in these sheets.

Two years after they had taken them, the doorbell rang at one of the victim's homes. A delivery person said: "Here are your sheets back". I think that was appalling that they would bring these sheets back with large holes cut out of them without any forewarning or anything. We certainly can do an awful lot more for victims.

The parole legislation, Bill C-36, was introduced by the government. The justice committee, acting as a legislative committee, toured the country. It went to Vancouver where it heard a number of witnesses and then it came to Edmonton. The justice committee, of which I am a member, heard again the victims of Larry Takahashi. At that time we stated we would listen to them—in Bill C-36—and take some of their concerns forward. We did that.

I am very very pleased with the progress. It shows that private members can have an impact. We had 16 members from the Alberta Progressive Conservative caucus act on behalf of people in Edmonton, in Alberta, across Canada, and I am pleased the government has responded.

The official government response, Bill C-36, is not perfect but it goes a long long way in addressing some of these needs. I hope to hear from the government and other members of Parliament on this issue. This is such an important issue for Canadians.

People are losing faith in their justice system and we have to restore that faith. We have to balance the different interests of people acting within the judicial system. We have got to tip the balance back a little bit toward the victim which I believe we have done and that is very important.

I will close with those remarks. I want to thank my colleagues in the Alberta caucus and others who have supported this bill so much. I am looking forward to hearing the views of my colleagues.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I find it most interesting that we are now dealing with this particular matter of Bill C-311.

We have just gone through the process of considering Bill C-36 which went through a large number of the issues that are raised in this bill. I want to say from the outset that we on this side are supportive of some of the recommendations that were in Bill C-36. In fact, we went a long way to try improve Bill C-36 and we did not meet with the success we had hoped for because of the member opposite and by the party opposite.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-31, An Act to amend the Extradition Act—Chapter 13.

Bill C-68, An Act to amend the Competition Act (multi-level marketing plans and pyramid selling)—Chapter 14.

Bill C-328, An Act respecting National Public Service Week: Serving Canadians Better—Chapter 15.

Bill C-77, An Act to amend the National Defence Act—Chapter 16.

Bill C-53, An Act to provide for the imposition of special economic measures—Chapter 17.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Thorkelson that Bill C-311, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committed in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Thorkelson: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the House to extend Private Members' Hour by the time it has taken to do the Royal Assent and the vote. If we could extend it by that amount of time or until the debate collapses, I would appreciate it.

May I ask for unanimous consent for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to extend the period of Private Members' Hour for five to 10 minutes, the time it took to go to the Senate? I suggest that the hour be extended to 6.10 p.m.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I will continue on with what I was saying before we had a message from the other place.

My colleague opposite has introduced a measure which in some respects is redundant now with what has transpired by the government by a very hard-working and dedicated committee of this House dealing with Bill C-36.

That piece of legislation to my mind was an attempt to correct some of the problems. We on this side were supportive in the sense of trying to make the bill better. I believe that in some areas we did make it better and we did have some improvements. I am thinking particularly in the area of victims and their involvement in the parole process, the ability to be there and to have some input, and also to be notified should an inmate in the institution be out on a day parole or on a pass of any sort. You can think of the obvious upset that would occur if you were walking down the street and saw the perpetrator of an offence on you personally walking down the same side of the street.

We tried to get this government to strengthen those areas that would help victims. I have to say, in all candour, the member opposite being part of the government team, that as you peruse the committee records you will see that he and others in his party voted against strengthening the legislation which would help victims. We were really surprised because we thought, given this bill being introduced and the legion of co-sponsors of the bill, and the high regard that those co-sponsors have within his party, that he would have seen to it that his party was supportive of the amendments which were brought forward by this party in order to make the laws that relate to victims and as it relates to those inmates who are out on temporary absences of either escorted or unescorted nature. Instead, he and his colleagues voted nay to those positive amendments. Now he stands in his place and says to all: "Here is a bill that is going to remedy all of the problems" and of which we in this House should be supportive.

I say sure, we should be supportive of some of the recommendations that are here. But where was that support when it counted? Where was that support when it would have made a difference? We all know the process here. We know what is going to happen with this particular bill. When it could have had an effect, when it could have made an impact for victims across this country, his party was not there. In fact, not only was it not there, but it voted against those positive recommendations that came from this party.

The member tells me that it is not true. We will let the Minutes and Proceedings of the committee verify what the situation is. All that I want to say from this side is that we are very, very supportive of legislation which keeps the victims as part of the process in a sense that they can feel the necessary protections of the law and that they have some input into the process. As my colleague opposite has said, the victim becomes a victim of the system as the process unfolds. We did not want to see that happen.

We heard very emotional testimony from the victims of Larry Takahashi. My colleague is more than correct when he says that the system failed those victims and failed them badly. We proposed a strengthening of the law so that the system would be more responsive.

We looked at temporary absences, and the government was very quick to point out to us that temporary absences have a very high success ratio. We drove home the point during the debates in committee on Legere and Gingras that when there is a failure, in most cases it is a tragic failure.

The government prepared a report, the Pepino report, and we on this side co-operated in seeing that those changes and amendments which would strengthen and protect society in the temporary absence situation were, in fact, adopted.

I would say that, as I think back over all of the evidence that we heard and the ways that we approached the problems of parole and temporary absences and all of those problems, we have been most supportive in many of the areas that the government has embarked upon. But I think that as you go through Bill C-311 that it does not really deal with some of the real root problems. Mr. Speaker, I know that you would be concerned about this. We were advised by the Canadian Bar Association that Bill C-36, and therefore this bill, is putting the cart before the horse. It is dealing with parole and with temporary absences before we have dealt with sentencing.

An hon. member: There are some sentencing provisions within the legislation.

Mr. Rideout: My colleague tells me that there are some sentencing provisions within this legislation. I say to him that the Canadian Bar Association asked the Minister of Justice to bring forward legislation on sentencing and not to proceed with all these other aspects of parole such as temporary absences.

Logic dictates. It does not take a whole lot of logic to realize the first thing that happens is not that the system deals with how we are going to let the person out of prison. It deals first with how long the person is going to be in prison.

Therefore, we should be dealing with sentencing so that we will know what is going to transpire, the length of sentence and then the type of system we have to put in to allow people to be re-established and reintroduced into society.

Instead it is the cart before the horse and that is wrong. When the Minister of Justice appeared before the committee, I asked her the following question: "When will we have sentencing legislation?" Her response to me was: "Soon". Soon is in the eyes of the beholder.

We were told months ago that the sentencing legislation would brought in. We know we have a summer break and some time in the fall and all other things that are ongoing. Therefore, the chances of sentencing legislation coming before this House and ultimately being dealt with and enacted are very remote. We probably will not see sentencing legislation until after the next election. That is wrong.

We on this side are saying: "Let us not play politics with victims. Let us not play politics with inmates. Let us not play politics with this attitude of law and order that the government has come forward with over the last number of months".

We hear all the business of law and order. They are going to keep society safe. They indicate how things are going to happen and tell the citizens of the country not to worry. Then, when we look at the legislation, at what it says and at what members do when they deal with that legislation, we find they were idle words and nothing really happens.

We on this side of the House say: "Look at the record of the positive things we have tried to put in as far as victims are concerned, the rights of inmates, the corrections to the sentencing system, and weigh them against what has been done by the party opposite and see that the government is very wanting".

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to join in this discussion of Bill C-311, which was proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona and supported by about 15 of his colleagues, which is rather unusual.

This private member's bill concerns sentencing, corrections and conditional release. I interpret the focus of these proposals as being the "early" release of offenders.

The bill raises the questions of when release should occur and indeed if release should ever be granted to some types of offenders.

I would like to take the opportunity to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona, and all members of the committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, who for over six months have been studying Bill C-36, which covered many points found in Bill C-311. Sometimes a complementary bill can lead to broader, more wide-ranging reforms. I must commend all members who took part in this work. As you no doubt know, this bill is now before the Senate.

Therefore, I would like to devote my allotted time to sharing with this House and Canadians some thoughts about public safety, the criminal justice system and conditional release as it now exists, before we proceed to consider other matters.

Nobody should think that the decision to release an offender to the community is made lightly. The decision-making process is careful and extensive. It is quite obvious that any release decisions are bound by court-imposed sentences. I see no merit in discussing the Criminal Code and sentencing processes at this juncture, because the undertaking has been given that the Minister of Justice will be announcing a major initiative in this regard.

I will reserve comment until the sentencing package has been tabled. However, I believe it may be helpful for members to know something of the conditional-release process and the roles and responsibilities of the principal agencies of the Ministry of the Solicitor General: the Correctional Service of Canada and the National Parole Board.

Through these agencies, the Ministry of the Solicitor General as part of our criminal justice system deals with two fundamental issues which lie at the very heart of what defines the quality and the nature of the culture of this country.

The first of these is public safety, an issue which is of paramount importance in terms of the quality of life. The proposals recently considered by the House in Bill C-36 will enshrine in law the principle that the protection of society should be foremost in the minds of those entrusted with the administration of court-imposed sentences in the federal correctional system.

The second issue is human freedom in all its dimensions: the deprivation of human freedom, the respect for human freedom, and the quality and dignity of human freedom. This is an important consideration, given that the most extreme sanction the state is able to impose on its citizens is carried out by the Ministry of the Solicitor General.

The ministry, through the Parole Board and Correctional Service, is responsible for ensuring the safety of the public, its employees both in federal institutions and in the community, and more than 20,000 offenders under its charge each day of the year; it must carry out this responsibility in a society which places very great importance on the rights and freedoms of all its citizens. How the Correctional Service and Parole Board go about their business is a matter of concern not to just a small minority but to all Canadians.

As I said, on any given day the Correctional Service is responsible for close to 13,000 offenders in federal institutions and over 7,000 on parole or mandatory supervision, and it is recognized by correctional practitioners that the primary objective is to contribute to the protection of society. Through the recent legislation, this perception of their role has been formalized.

The common view might be that police protect the community through the enforcement of laws, while jails, prisons and penitentiaries protect society by keeping criminals locked up so that they cannot commit new crimes. Some might also argue that penitentiaries protect society by serving as a deterrent against crime.

These opinions are based on a number of myths about crime, corrections and parole.

It is a myth that all offenders incarcerated in federal prisons are serving sentences for violent crimes—in fact, violent crime constitutes about a tenth of all criminal offences known to police. Furthermore, only a portion of violent offenders receive sentences that entail incarceration in federal institutions.

Another negative perception is the myth that almost all offenders in our federal institutions are repeaters when, in fact, over 60 per cent of federal inmates are serving their first federal term.

There is the myth that most offences are committed by parolees or inmates on mandatory supervision. In fact, less than one per cent of crimes in Canada can be blamed on these individuals. About 12 per cent of those released on full parole are revoked for committing new offences; about 19 per cent of those released on mandatory supervision commit new offences while still under supervision and, of course, not all these offences are serious or violent.

The myth that most conditional releases end in failure continues. In fact, over 99 per cent of temporary absences are completed successfully; roughly 70 per cent of all full paroles are completed successfully and more than one-half of all releases under mandatory supervision are completed successfully.

A further note on this is that about one half of the cases statistically denoted as "failures" are instances where supervisors have returned offenders to penitentiary for non-criminal, technical violations of their release conditions.

Finally, most notably when the matter of capital punishment is the topic, there is the myth that the murder rate in Canada is on the increase. In fact, a number of recent years have seen the number of homicides at its lowest since 1973, before capital punishment was abolished.

These figures suggest that, in all but the most extreme cases, a "lock'em up and throw away the key" approach to corrections is unwarranted. A more constructive correctional philosophy—as is currently held by most correctional professionals—is that society is best protected in the long run through an approach based on the following reality: The vast majority of federal inmates are serving definite sentences and they must, by law, be released at the end of their term.

The remainder, including those serving life sentences, will all, again by law, become eligible for release at some point in their sentence. This means that most offenders will eventually return to the same communities in which they committed the offences.

Within the context of this reality, the best way to contribute to the protection of society over the long term is to motivate all offenders as fully as possible to become law-abiding citizens upon their release. However, a released offender cannot be expected to become a law-abiding citizen if throughout the sentence period he or she has been denied the opportunity of acquiring basic social skills, deprived of any autonomy and stripped of self-respect and human dignity.

To be sure, I recognize that not all offenders will respond to this approach. There will likely always be a need for maximum security institutions which rely primarily on external controls to protect society. I also recognize that under the existing system—even without the punitive measures proposed in Bill C-311—there are individuals whose crimes are so numerous or horrendous that release at any point in their sentences is unthinkable.

However, even in our highest security institution, the Correctional Service believes there should be a strong emphasis on motivating offenders to accept increased responsibility. I might say that the imposition of interminable sentences without the slightest hope of eventual relief could be seen as the surest way to deprive correctional authorities of the most important mechanism for motivating offenders.

In conclusion, our prisons are just as much a part of our community as our hospitals, our schools, our geriatric centres and our psychiatric institutions. The men and women held in our prisons and penitentiaries are all members of our society. Apart from a handful of the incarcerated, all will return to and again become part of the community. The process to facilitate and to safely maintain this reintegration is comprehensive and taken very seriously by those administering it.

It has been my intention to demonstrate that the system now in place is capable of adequate responses to today's correctional problems. The will and the expertise are at hand to administer correctional legislation for the public good.

I supported the measures put forward in Bill C-36 and have confidence in the Corrections and Conditional Release Act that confirms current practice and imparts a firm sense of direction for correctional practitioners in the coming years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): As no other hon. members wish to participate in the debate, the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

JOB CREATION

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on the unemployment situation in Winnipeg in hope of getting an answer to the questions I asked in this House over the past few months.

[English]

The issue of job creation has been raised with this government several times.

• (1810)

In Winnipeg, we now face a situation of at least 43,000 people actively looking for work and about an equal number of people who are on social assistance, either from the provincial or municipal governments. This is a tremendous economic burden being carried by the city.

In the past, governments have sought strategies to include these people and to work through training programs and through economic development projects to increase the opportunities for their own job.

When asked in the House directly, the minister has consistently refused to change the strategy of the government. When asked in committee, his colleague responsible for western diversification could not think of ways to help out Winnipeg beyond the present plans. It is an intolerable situation to have so many people unemployed in Winnipeg and so few opportunities for training available. In fact, it is becoming a crisis.

I would like to expand on one or two particular problems. First of all, within the aboriginal community in the inner city there are a large number of projects actively involved in training. They have particular needs to act as independent service organizations to reach out and to help these people they are training. In the last several months they have been caught in a battle, both a political battle in Ottawa and a political battle in Manitoba, as to who should control these programs.

I call upon the government to come out with a solution that protects the rights and responsibilities of inner-city training groups to operate independently from government, but at the same time, independent from anyone else's political agenda.

I have met several times with these groups. My colleague from St. Boniface who is here on this debate has also met with them. The member for Winnipeg South Centre has met with them. Several MPs from the Winnipeg area have met to discuss this issue and to insist that the government work together with the groups from the inner city to produce an effective pathfinder strategy.

We have recently come across an even more difficult situation where the department of employment is actually running out of money for dealing with trainees. One of the reasons is the high tuition fees being paid, without question, to some of these schools. The second reason is the improper allocation of moneys in the Manitoba region. The third reason is the cutback in the job creation funds in the last two years which has taken at least $8 million out of the system.

At the very time when the unemployment numbers are higher than ever, at the very time when our needs are tremendous, we find that the government has withdrawn services. I call upon the government today to explain exactly why it cannot help the people of Winnipeg to find training and to find jobs.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to remind the hon. member of this government's commitment to all Canadians, including native people.

In April 1989, this government announced the Labour Force Development Strategy.

An essential element of this strategy is the Pathways to Success program and the establishment of native management boards.

The native boards will approve projects for native employment and training, set local, regional and national priorities and ensure that native people's associations are aware of the policy and development of training programs.

The native boards are defining how to develop a greater ability to deliver employment and training services directly. This reflects the principles of the Pathways to Success program and the government's belief that developing the native people's human resources is a priority and is part of this department's commitment to self-sufficiency for aboriginal people.

Some $200 million a year is available for the next four years to help the Pathways to Sucess process.

In cooperation with the native boards, we are looking into the employment and training programs and services available to native poeple.

This is an ideal opportunity for the native community and the government to change its basic working relationship with the native people and adapt to changes in the native communities.

Employment and Immigration Canada and native organizations must co-operate to create a new climate of understanding needed to bring about significant changes in human resource development for all of Canada's aboriginal people, regardless of their background or the region where they live. In this spirit of partnership, many native boards have already been established.

In closing, we are working hard to help all the native groups in Manitoba develop and implement a regional structure for Pathways to Success in that province.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it was on March 16 that I raised a couple of questions in the House and pointed out that we were experiencing the worst recession in the history of Canada. I asked what the response of this government was to this recession. I was focusing on youth on that particular day.

If we talk to young people today, they tell us there is so much uncertainty that the future is really very bleak.

[Translation]

There is no certainty at all.

[English]

We have an unemployment rate among youth that is almost 17 per cent across Canada. In some cases, it is hovering around the 25 per cent mark. There are over 400,000 young people out of work today as we speak.

Daily, in my constituency young men and women highly motivated and willing to undertake any kind of work activity see me for advice. But there are no jobs. This is a shameful situation.

In February of this year, Canada lost 32,000 full-time jobs and 22,000 of those affected young people. There are roughly 100,000 fewer young people working today than there were a year ago. This is totally unacceptable.

Where are those jobs, jobs, jobs that have been promised by the Prime Minister for this group and for any other age group? The response of the government is cutbacks, cutbacks, cutbacks and inaction or a duplication of what was before. This is simply unacceptable.

Since 1985, 41,000 student jobs have disappeared as a result of this government's budget slashing.

It is important to point out that there is both truth and some exaggeration of truth in what the government has said. I use this analogy: I hire someone for $10 an hour; I cut their salary by $2; I am now paying them $8. If I give them an increase of $1 an hour, I can then claim that I have given them a 12 per cent increase. That happens time and time again with these particular cuts.

[Translation]

On four occasions the government decided to cut increases in federal transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education. I think that is the wrong approach, because if we consider the period between 1986 and 1995, there will be from $9 million to $10 million less to spend on our colleges and universities. And the result? Tuition fees have skyrocketed and student debt has increased by leaps and bounds. Today there are even waiting lists for young people, and where I am, in Winnipeg, it can be up to two years. I think that is entirely unacceptable.

The government may have overlooked the fact that by the year 2000, two-thirds of the new jobs that will be available will require 12 years of schooling, while the remaining one-third will require 16. This means we must invest in our colleges and universities as well as in jobs.

The government is destroying the prospects of our young people. As far as productivity is concerned, the future of our country is at risk. We have to look at education as an investment. It is an investment, and if we do not make that investment today, we will pay the price tomorrow.

I would like to repeat what I said not long ago, and if the hon. member wants to challenge that, I will listen to what he has to say. Young people need jobs, education and training. They must take an active part in preparing for their future, and they must believe in what they are doing. They have asked the government for help, but it seems to me the government has chosen to ignore them and refuses to recognize the fact that there is a tremendous need for this kind of help today because of the recession.

Our young people want to believe in their future and they want to make a major contribution to the prosperity of this country. That is what our young people want. If the situation does not change very drastically, these young people will be in a position to effect the changes required following the next federal election.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my hon. colleague from St. Boniface. Following his question in the House last March 16, insofar as employment and immigration is concerned, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that this government is fully aware of its continued responsibility to assist canadian students again this year in their search for summer employment.

The Minister of State for Youth, Fitness and Amateur Sport announced the funding for the Challenge '92 Program on March 18, 1992. The Challenge program, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is designed to help students find summer employment and to give them practical work experience that will ease their transition from school to work.

Challenge is focused on assisting those who are facing difficulties in the labour market. Therefore, emphasis is placed on helping high school students, who traditionally have the most difficulty in finding summer employment, and potential and recent high school dropouts who risk continued employment problems.

The Summer Employment/Experience Development (SEED) component of Challenge '92, which pays wage subsidies to employers for hiring students, will be strenghtened by $3 million. The SEED component will be increased from $80 million to $83 million.

It is hoped that SEED will encourage employers from all sectors to participate in the program and to create as many job opportunities as possible this summer for Canadian students.

Last year the SEED component subsidized over 29,000 employers who created over 54,000 new jobs with a budget of $80 million.

In addition, the funding for the four remaining challenge components will be kept at last year's levels. They will receive the following allocations: student business loans $900,000, business drive for jobs $800,000, native internship program and the Canada Employment Centres for students $12 million.

The Challenge program promotes and encourages employers to create jobs and sponsor on-the-job learning experiences for young people. This program has been very successful since its inception in 1985. It is hoped that it will be even more successful this year in stimulating employers to create jobs for students and to actively participate in providing valuable summer work experience to Canada's future labour force.

Challenge '92 will continue to encourage the hiring of designated group members and the creation of activities designed for these groups.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I asked a question to the Prime Minister and the minister of science answered the question.

The question was very specific: What did the government anticipate Mexican workers would be able to purchase on $4.50 per day? The promise of the North American free trade agreement is that we will not only help ourselves, but we will also help the average Mexican worker who will be able to purchase goods from Canada.

I want to cite the minister's answer because it is a dandy. Excuse the poor vocabulary. He said: "At the moment, we have certainly in the automotive industry one-way trade with Mexico. For every car we can bring up here from Mexico, we have to send two and a half to offset this." What the Mexicans will be able to buy from us is two and a half cars. That was the answer. I am seeking perhaps a better response this afternoon.

I was in Mexico the week before last and found out that $4.50 a day is what hundreds of thousands of Mexicans earn. Just that week, they had signed an accord with labour, business and government. In Mexico, they tend to be one and the same. They signed a prosperity agenda to increase productivity in the industry in Mexico. Sound familiar?

The union had decided not to sign that agreement. It held out for two years.

It said it wanted a 25 per cent increase in wages for Mexican labour before it was going to sign. It relented and the accord is signed. Right now Mexicans earn $4.50 a day. Next year they will earn $4.50 a day and the year after they will earn $4.50 a day. So the question remains: What do you anticipate an average Mexican worker will buy from Canada?

My Mexican interpreter suggested to me many many of these people smoke. If they smoke, it costs them $3 a day for a package of cigarettes. There is not a lot left over. I hope they are spending it on better things than cigarettes, nevertheless, it points out a real problem.

I was with a business group in Mexico and I guess I was working incognito. I asked the owner of a massive Maquiladora operation: "Do you have any labour problems down here?" He said: "Absolutely not. We know how to handle these people". They certainly do. They know how to handle them because they give them $4.50 a day and they are going to continue to give them $4.50 a day.

Some of my worst fears were realized. I have to admit one of the operations I went to was immaculate. The working environment was beautiful. The workers seemed quite content. The discussion between the manager and myself went very well until I asked who owned the company and if it was doing very well in profits. As soon as I said that he said: "It is time to move on".

When I got back I looked into the profile of this industry. This industry made 30 per cent more profit in 1990 than it did in 1989. It is doing exceedingly well. I would say it was making obscene profits. Yet it chooses to pay its workers $4.50 a day.

I will end by asking the question yet again. What does this government expect the average Mexican worker to buy from Canadian manufacturers on $4.50 a day?

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, considering the situation of the Mexican work force, the North American free trade agreement will reinforce economic growth throughout North America, including in Mexico.

The hon. member refers to Mexican wage levels and speaks of $4 to $5 per day. Mexican wages are lower than in Canada, although rates of $2 to $3 hourly are the norm in the manufacturing sector. Moreover, wage rates tend to be lower in those industries already more fully integrated into the North American economy. Trade brings growth and growth leads to higher wages for workers.

The North American free trade agreement will eliminate most Mexican barriers to exports from Canada. It will also create export-led growth and jobs in Mexico. Mexican consumers, including workers, will also have greater access to and greater capacity to buy competitive canadian goods such as grains, red meats, fishery products, wood and paper manufactures, and automotive products, including mass transit equipment. This will be good for Mexico and good for Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to review a question I asked during the Question Period of April 20 of this year.

It had to do with the whole economic climate of metropolitan Toronto, a city that used to be an important piston in the economic engine of our country. It would seem to me, as a member of Parliament for York West as part of metropolitan Toronto, the government has either completely ignored the economic fabric of the city or it assumes that somehow metropolitan Toronto is the perceptional fat cat city of Confederation. I am not saying metro Toronto is completely down and out because it is not. At the same time, the government needs to recognize there is also a chronic under-belly to metropolitan Toronto on an economic basis that is in need of some kind of stimulus in order to get that piston operating again, so the engine can function in a much better capacity and put Canadians and their families back to work.

That is essentially the question I asked. The week before I asked that question, the metropolitan Toronto government put out a report suggesting last year alone almost 9,000 Toronto firms either moved out of the city or went bankrupt. As a result of the loss of 9,000 firms in Toronto alone, there was a direct net loss of 65,000 jobs. On top of that another 30,000 jobs were lost as a result of Toronto companies trying to survive by downsizing.

In my own vicinity, the government recently announced it was going to close the Downsview Military Depot and transfer it to Montreal. An independent study concluded that on an economic basis Montreal was the worst location and the best was Kingston. That meant an automatic loss of 330 direct jobs and also a loss of $106 million in annual contracts that went largely to the metropolitan Toronto area. The number of indirect jobs are probably incalculable but very significant.

When you put the entire package together, it is not one that encourages confidence in the marketplace. It is not one that puts a vibrant Toronto city back to work, but allows it to fester. Confidence is not there and therefore consumer spending is not there.

My question on April 20 is the same one I have this evening. What measures does the government intend to implement immediately so metro Toronto, as an important facet of the economic situation in this country, can return to some degree of normalcy, and the spin-offs we have in metro Toronto as a direct benefit to citizens in Toronto can also be felt in other sectors across the country, and try to begin to put a recovery package in place? It needs some government stimulus or initiatives, rather than a laissez faire attitude, which means the recession will drag on much longer than need be.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to respond in greater detail to the questions of April 29 by the member from York West.

The government shares the concerns of all Canadians with the effects the economic slowdown has had on jobs and unemployment, and is working to strengthen the economy and accelerate the recovery.

While the labour market situation deteriorated in Toronto during the downturn, between 1984 and 1990, a total of 296,000 jobs were created in Toronto and many new businesses were started.

The government's efforts are directed to improving the climate for investment through lower interest rates, lower inflation, lower deficits and greater economic confidence in order that more new businesses start and that existing businesses begin hiring more workers.

Successes in bringing down the inflation rate and interest rates to the lowest levels seen in almost 20 years are benefiting canadians now.

The government's current strategy in the area of training will ensure better employment opportunities for Canadians. Under the labour force development strategy, actual spending for labour market programming is expected to increase 62 per cent over a four year period, from $2.1 billion in 1989–90 to $3.4 billion in 1992–93. This will assist more than 650,000 unemployed Canadians to acquire new skills. Furthermore, the Department of Employment and Immigration Canada will spend an estimated $741 million in 1992–93 in Ontario.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in the member's riding, York West, the government spent $3.1 million on the Canadian Jobs Strategy and other programs in 1990–91.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to follow up on a trade related question that I asked on March 27 of the Minister of Forestry. It is a question on a very important trade matter and that of course has to do with the softwood lumber tariff dispute that we currently have with the United States.

It was on a specific matter. It related to the then actions of the U.S. commerce department, where at the time of its early rulings on our softwood exports to the United States, the commerce department had ruled. It had applied the tariff to not just the actual wood that we exported to the U.S., but in essence the way the tariff was developed. It applied also to the packaging, the labour, and the transportation.

I led, as you know, a delegation of New Democrat MPs to Washington, D.C., where we raised this matter directly with the commerce department. I think our intervention at that time was timely because in fact the commerce department's verification teams as they called them had looked at the situation, determined in most cases they had erred on this point, and in fact they were going to change the policy in that regard.

That was a minor victory for Canada, but of course we are on the verge now of perhaps the biggest trading war we have had yet with our trading partners in the United States. By the end of this month the commerce department will rule next as to whether in fact we have injured the lumber market in the United States by our exports to the U.S.

My question that I hope the parliamentary secretary can respond to tonight is this. When the Prime Minister visited the President he certainly appeared to have come back empty-handed, given the most recent announcement, particularly raised today by my colleague for Sault Ste. Marie about steel, and the whole countervail actions that are starting to take place there.

I am most interested to hear from the parliamentary secretary as to the success so far of the government in terms of getting the U.S. commerce department to accept or agree to the use of—even weak as it is—the dispute settlement mechanism of the free trade agreement. We have yet to hear whether that is in fact the case.

Can he confirm that even if that is the case, under the free trade agreement really all the dispute settlement mechanism does is determine whether U.S. law was applied correctly.

Certainly an indication of the difficulty we are going to have there is that the U.S. lumber lobby when we met with them basically said well if that is the case, if our law is not tough enough to deal with you up there in Canada, we will just get the law changed.

I hope the parliamentary secretary can bring the House up to date on this. I hope he has some better news for us tonight than what the Prime Minister had to report after his meeting with President Bush because this issue is a critical one for all of Canada and in particular British Columbia and my part of B.C., where a great deal of our lumber exports go into the U.S. market.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to respond to a question raised by my hon. friend concerning the government's actions in response to the U.S. decision to impose a 14.48 per cent tariff on the entry value of lumber shipments to the United States and the effect this is having on reloaders and wholesalers.

First, let me state that when the U.S. department of commerce made its preliminary determination of subsidy on March 6, instructions were issued to apply the bonding rate on the price at the border, rather than the price at the mill. The result was that in-Canada transportation costs were incorporated into the calculations and lumber remanufacturers had to post bond on the total value-added price of the lumber.

This problem has been resolved. After representations from the Canadian government, the department of commerce has issued new instructions to U.S. customs to assess the bonds against the value of the lumber at the mill rather than at the border. This change is retroactive to March 12.

Transportation costs will be excluded from the calculations and the remanufacturers will have to post bond only on the value of the timber, rather than the total value-added price. This will provide considerable relief to the reloader yards, the remanufacturers, and the lumber wholesalers.

Discussions are continuing with the Department of Commerce regarding the U.S.-origin logs issue which is of particular concern to Quebec. As well, the department of commerce agreed to our request for a special blanket bonding. Canadian exporters will not have to post bond on each shipment to the United States, as is normally the case in this process. This will alleviate the administrative burden on Canadian exporters.

In conclusion, our position in this case is unchanged—that is to remain united and fight the case through to the end and win.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed adopted. The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—ONTARIO ECONOMY

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its negligence toward the worst social and economic difficulties faced by residents of Ontario in modern times.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity in this House to debate an issue that is of great concern to all residents of the great province of Ontario.

The issues touch on national interests, of course, but the residents of Ontario have particular reasons now to fear for their futures and to question the attempt of the government to manage their economy and their social planning, the infrastructure of the economy. They have very real fears.

In an effort to ensure as full a debate from the Liberal opposition side today in this relatively short day, we will be asking that we split our times.

• (1010)

I want to make reference to the motion itself. It says:

That this House condemns the government for its negligence toward the worst social and economic difficulties faced by residents of Ontario in modern times.

Anyone who doubts the seriousness of the economic crisis has only to visit the streets of Toronto, of Sudbury, of Thunder Bay and look at those who are unemployed, who are losing all they have built around them over the last many years of prosperity and to see the fear in their eyes.

As we speak today, we are reviewing the new monthly unemployment statistics. These days, this is a bad news item every month. But Statistics Canada tells us that the unemployment rate in Ontario is 10.9 per cent. It is a double digit figure for the first time in a long, long time.

We are not the only province with double digit unemployment. Ontario has been the engine of the national economy, assisted by all the other regions. The engine of the national economy has now struck double digit unemployment with apparently no end in sight. There is no light at the end of the tunnel because this government is not doing anything. This government is taking the hands-off approach of letting the private sector solve our problems and it is not working.

The unemployment rate in Toronto is 11.2 per cent. Promises over the last few years of jobs, jobs, jobs and sacred trusts are simply not believable any more. There has been a reneging by the Prime Minister on those promises. Ontario, Toronto, and our national economy are paying a very high price.

There are two specific issues I want to address relative to metropolitan Toronto. They relate to the economic and social planning envelopes. One of them is urban crime and the other has to do with federal non-funding of immigration and refugee settlement.

On the urban crime issue, in our metropolitan area in Toronto we are seeing a decaying of neighbourhoods. For the first time, we are seeing what I would call a criminal block-busting of neighbourhoods. The criminal block-busting relates to the crack house phenomenon. That is the situation where there is no landlord and the criminals and drug pushers move in and take over a house. That brings prostitution, more drug pushers, drug purchasers and petty thieves who want to finance their drug habit to the neighbourhood.

That is decaying and destroying neighbourhoods in which people just like all the members in this House of Commons live in. Ordinary neighbourhoods are falling victims to this criminal block-busting.

Prostitution in Scarborough is up 95 per cent over the last year. That is a doubling of prostitution crimes. Drug offences are up 22 per cent.

These are figures that residents and many neighbourhoods in metropolitan Toronto are struggling to cope with. They look to their elected representatives. They look to government and they see nothing happening. The cancer of the crack house continues to grow. They ask for the government to react, to do something about it.

In the meantime, the government watches while the powers of police to investigate and prosecute are restrained. They look at a Criminal Code that is 100 years old and does not address the phenomenon of the modern crack house. The government is simply not addressing the phenomenon of the urban crack house with either legislation or policies. It has not provided any alternatives.

To put the icing on the cake, there is legislation that permits the seizure of proceeds of crime. Usually those proceeds are seized as a result of drug criminal activity. Even when the municipality bears the cost of the drug investigation, which in many cases in a metropolitan area like Toronto amounts to many millions of dollars, the federal government is not giving back to the metropolitan police the money that was spent to investigate the crime in the first place. That is negligence. That is an abandonment of the federal government's very important role in this area. The government is deaf to the issue of urban crime.

The second area I want to bring to the attention of the House has to do with federal non-funding of refugee and immigrant settlement.

In the one area of refugee settlement, the region of metropolitan Toronto and Peel will spend approximately $430 million in the settlement of refugees. That includes welfare costs. That money comes from the pockets of municipal taxpayers. The federal government has capped its funding of all of this and has not responded to this funding imperative.

If the federal government and federal legislation is going to accommodate the refugees, then it damn well better start funding the settlement initiative. Municipal taxpayers are becoming fed up with having to carry more than their share of the burden when they do not manage the laws and the borders.

An hon. member: That does not happen in New Brunswick.

Mr. Lee: Well it happens in southern Ontario.

The other area has to do with the field of education. We have a lot of great new immigrants in this country. They are populating principally our larger cities and we are glad and proud to have them.

A difficulty arises when they come in large numbers to particular municipalities. The school boards are forced to absorb the second language training for these new Canadians. When they come in large numbers it creates significant distortions for school boards.

I have a list of schools here that have anywhere from 43 per cent to 27 per cent of students who must be educated in a second language. English is the second language.

The cost of integrating and adjusting goes on for several years, the school-boards estimate about four years, and the federal government is not assisting. The federal government is happy to have the new immigrants, happy to have the family-class immigrants and the business-investor immigrants and Canadians are too. But the federal government has abandoned to the municipal taxpayers the cost of funding the education integration.

There is a cost because if the costs are not paid, the school itself and the quality of education in the school suffers. The full student body is not able to absorb all of their education training in the English language or in the French language in Quebec or other parts of the country.

This is an abandonment in these areas: urban crime, they are asleep at the switch; and in federal funding of immigrant and refugee settlement, they have abandoned it to municipal taxpayers.

These taxpayers and their elected representatives on a municipal and regional level are very angry. They are waiting, I am waiting, and my constituents are waiting to see what this government is going to put forward as a solution to that ridiculous abandonment in that field.

I will close now and invite this government to address its negligence before it is too late.

• (1020)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the lead-off speaker today from the Liberal Party, a member from the Scarborough area of metropolitan Toronto. He stood here and talked about a litany of problems we are facing in the province of Ontario, but once again the Liberals have no solutions.

They stand and its more money: maybe we should throw more money at this problem and more money at that problem. They do not say where the money comes from. They do not say we will raise the deficit. They do not say we will borrow more money, we will raise taxes or whatever it may be. They do not say any of those things.

The hon. member talks about the job creation. I can tell him that we have come through a very difficult recession. Of course our unemployment rate is unacceptably high right now. I can tell him that we saw the fastest job creation in the industrialized world between 1984 and 1990 when 1.6 million new jobs were created, of which 1.4 million still exist. We must understand that. It must be understood by the Canadian people that 1.4 million of those jobs still exist. Entrance into the labour market and the unemployment rate because of the recession we have gone through have increased.

He talks about the decaying of neighbourhoods and the drug problem. I remember very well—and I am going to remind him of this because I think it is very important—a speech that the Prime Minister of this country gave. I believe it was in 1987. I could be wrong. I sat here in the House and listened to the hon. member for Hamilton East. She stood and ridiculed the Prime Minister on his speech. The Prime Minister said that we had a drug problem in this country. He put more money and more effort with the RCMP to fight drugs. The RCMP has been somewhat successful but not successful enough because we have not seen the elimination of the drug problem.

The Liberal Party, led by the hon. member for Hamilton East, tore the Prime Minister apart saying that he was exaggerating, that he was saying things were way out of control, that he should not be talking that way, and that that was not accurate.

Today we see Liberal members stand and all of a sudden express concern about crack houses and about drug problems in this country. The Prime Minister warned about this problem and the government did something. The hon. member says it did not. It has done something about it and it is continuing to work on it, in co-operation, I might say, with local police forces and police forces around the world. It is very important.

He talks about immigration and immigration levels. The hon. member should know the system. The system was in place long before we became the government. The government through the Minister of Employment and Immigration would contact the provinces in a consultative mode and ask: "What can you absorb in immigrants each year?" Those recommendations come in and that is how the levels are determined.

The hon. member is saying that it is all the federal government's fault for bringing too many immigrants to this country and not funding them. For heaven's sake, education has always been a responsibility of the provinces. If he is saying that we should start funding elementary and secondary education from the federal government then he should stand and say it.

Is that Liberal policy? Is it Liberal policy to fund elementary and secondary education? If it is then let us have it as a policy and let us see them fight that one out in a constitutional way. I mean the provinces will take the money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that was a comment but the member has a minute to answer.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, that was a long comment with a question wedged in at the end.

I did not say it was the federal government's fault there is immigration to this country. I said it was the federal government's responsibility to ensure that immigrant settlement took place properly.

I am not saying the government should throw money at this. I am saying the government should use its brains, its leadership and its jurisdiction.

The member opposite complains because a member on this side critically challenged an initiative of the government at one point in time. It is our job to challenge critically from time to time, but it is the government's job to exercise leadership. It is the federal government's responsibility to address these things.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River on his excellent presentation this morning. He outlined some of the key concerns we as Canadians face in metro Toronto and in the province of Ontario. I would also like to take this opportunity to speak to the issue in a more global sense.

In the past two decades major economic changes have forced Canada to confront rapidly shifting international, political and economic relationships. The pressures of the GATT, the free trade agreement, and the structural deterioration of our economy demand that Canadians find innovative solutions to international competition.

Unfortunately Canada stands extraordinarily exposed to the challenges of an increasingly global economy. This federal government has adopted a hands-off approach to economic management, leaving Canada open to the free play of international forces.

The situation is now so serious that commentators are beginning to speak of a window of opportunity within which Canada might still be able to recover control over its economy.

The legacy of this government's mismanagement of the economy is staggering. One and a half million Canadians unemployed, of which 400,000 are young people.

Since 1989 more than 300,000 manufacturing jobs have vanished, many never to return. We have seen record personal and corporate bankruptcies. Taxation levels are higher than ever even as the federal government plans are drawn up to abdicate its responsibilities further. We are paying more for less.

I have spoken in this Chamber before on the need for a new contract, a new set of arrangements among Canadians. The federal government should play a key role in defining the economic and social relationships within our society.

Historically relationships among Canadians have been marked by confrontation instead of co-operation. The consequences of this history is lack of focus on goals and a total absence of a national vision on the part of this government.

The reasons for this are not difficult to uncover. Although this government speaks of creating an innovative economy, its own policies are more appropriate to bygone days. Its thinking is obsolete.

As many studies have shown the federal government does not understand the dimensions of global change. The evidence for this is everywhere. The federal government, committed to cost cutting, is unwavering even as the entire economy crashes to the ground.

To this government numbers matter more than people. They matter more than jobs. They matter more than the future of our youth. They matter more than the sacred trust of health care of our seniors and of those who have fallen out of the work force. In the messages Canadians have sent to this government there is a palpable sense of betrayal and breach of trust.

The implications of this public distress of the federal government are extensive. As elected representatives we need to communicate with the people as opposed to talking at them.

But prospects for success in this regard are grounded in the perceptions Canadians have of governments. This government has confused the reluctance of Canadians to subscribe to Tory policies with an unwillingness of Canadians to act.

Canadians are ready to act. Canadians continue to believe that they are the makers of their own future. This is a powerful asset. This asset provides a solid foundation for presenting Canadians with choices about how to upgrade their schools and how to ensure Canadians have world-class skills and motivation.

Canadians can understand and want to understand what needs to be done. However Canadians have become lost in the maze of conflicting messages sent by this government. What people hear are statements of concern from this government, but these statements are coming precisely at the same time that this government is ignoring those concerns. It is yet another example of this government pulling back from its responsibility.

There is a widely shared consensus among business leaders that action to upgrade the skills of the work force is needed now. It is vital that the knowledge and skills of those already in the work force be kept current and competitive. The rapid pace of scientific and technological advance is shortening the useful life of knowledge gained through formal education or training.

• (1030)

The requirement for continued learning throughout an individual's working life must be recognized as a binding priority. In this important area this government has reduced its commitment and has clearly been left behind by its competitors.

Priority attention is being paid to developing human resources in Japan, Germany, Mexico, United States, and virtually all our major competitors. In this highly competitive age the economic performance of firms depends more than ever on a well trained work force.

The Liberal Party believes that training is not a cost but an investment. Education is an economic development. If we are to compete successfully with Japan, Germany, Mexico and the United States, federal government policies must encourage appropriate levels and types of vocational development within industry. Government support for training must be more actively focused. However, national industrial training programs are not making a significant contribution toward encouraging the employer sponsored training new technologies demand.

Employees in the most competitive firms increasingly require high flexibility skills which are essentially strong learning abilities, a willingness to change and an ability to work in teams.

But these flexibility skills are meaningless if young people do not stay in school. Over 30 per cent of students drop out before completing high school. Since unemployment affects the youth population in particular, this indicates an urgent need to deal with school drop–out.

I am not advocating that the federal government assume jurisdiction over the provincial responsibility of education, but what I am advocating is that the federal government must assume its own responsibility of its role to foster a Canadian controlled economic base. The role must be strong enough to secure Canada's place on the global stage. This requires the government's full participation.

There is little evidence of government commitment to Canadians today. The gulf between the rich and the poor is steadily widening. Record numbers are on welfare and unemployment insurance. Over 700,000 children need food banks. The future for young people in this country is bleak. As tuition fees increase and debt loads mount, many despair at finding work at all.

In my riding of York North the effects of less than full participation by government are pervasive and insidious. Government should be a vehicle of opportunity. Instead the citizens of the greater Toronto area feel victimized by this government's policies. Whole communities are at risk.

According to a study by the York Region Service Needs Committee, youth services have been placed on hold as provincial and municipal governments in turn feel the effects of the government's insensitive fiscal stringency.

Funding for counselling young people has evaporated. Unemployment among youth is increasing steadily as retraining courses and job placement programs are unable to achieve results. And this government believes it is doing enough.

The legacy of this belief is the failure of government incentives to improve sustainably the competitiveness of firms anywhere and everywhere in Canada. The focus should not be whether enough is being spent on training. The focus should be on whether Canadians are getting an efficient and innovative training system that spells results.

Clearly the more high wage good jobs Canada has, the better. Accordingly the most important set of policies this government could bring forward would be those that increase the capacity of innovative firms to expand. This expansion would be assisted most effectively through partnerships among all participants.

People are the key to making our economy work. To compete we must have a pool of Canadians skilled in the emerging technologies. We must have communities that attract and can retain these people. We need people committed to pulling together.

Canadians need to believe that they can make a difference. It remains to this government to show Canadians that it is willing to make a difference.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate today.

I listened very carefully to my hon. friend's comments. His number one concern seemed to be competition, as well as a well-trained work force and education. I do not believe anybody in this Chamber would argue with that, but I do have a couple of questions.

Over the past few months I have received over 6,000 responses to a survey from the people who live in my riding. Their number one concern is deficit reduction and they want the government to start working on the debt.

With regard to competition, this involves all of us. The hon. member said that people are the key to the issue. It involves not only all levels of government but the agencies, the work force, educational institutions, research and development, and science and technology.

We should be talking to each other with the keen interest of coming out with some resolutions and ideas so that we can move forward together. As we go through the peaks and valleys there is no doubt that Ontario is suffering, but there are other places in Canada that are suffering too.

Competition is the number one priority. We do need a well-educated and well-trained population, but how are we going to go about that?

I chaired the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology and we came forward with a report, I believe in 1988. The government in 1988 was spending just over $5 billion on research and development and science and technology in all federal departments. We also introduced scholarships for science and technology in centres of excellence. That is addressing the problem in one area.

We also made amendments to the UI bill to put money into training for people who were unemployed. I believe the figure is $3 billion or $3.8 billion this year. I think the member is saying that is not enough.

There is only one taxpayer, whether he is paying federal, provincial or municipal taxes. We must deal with raising the funds so that we are able to follow up the resolutions that the hon. member is putting out today. No one is going to disagree that we need a well-educated population. We spend more per capita than other countries with the exception of Sweden. We have to spend more efficiently and effectively.

I would like the member to tell the House exactly who is going to pay, or indeed how we can redirect funding to obtain the goals that he has outlined.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her question. However, it is quite evident that this government speaks a different language than the rest of Canadians.

Canadians need jobs. This government has been abdicating its responsibility towards that duty. If we examine the master plan that the government has presented it does not speak at all to the future. As a matter of fact, a close analysis of the budget would probably show that a very small percentage of the budget is dedicated to areas that speak to the future: namely research and development, education and training for young Canadians.

I personally do not understand how this government plans to lead Canada into the future when Canadians are telling it that we need more commitment to education. They are telling it that if we want to build a high-wage, highly skilled society we need commitments. It cannot simply be words.

The time has come for Canadians to realize, and particularly this government, that we need a new contract, a new set of arrangements between the individual, the community and the government. To that end, I can tell the member opposite that the government's plan is simply not working. Its message is not getting through.

We on this side of the House clearly understand that research and development and education and training are part of our economic development plan. We certainly do not think that we can compete when 30 per cent of our high school students drop out. We know that.

What one must do, as I am sure the member does as a responsible member of Parliament, is do some inner analysis and look within for answers.

This government's policy has failed. The member must admit that. We still have over 400,000 young people who are unemployed. This summer there will be young people who will not be able to continue their education. At the end of the day we must make sure that we give the necessary prerequisites to Canadians.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and participate in this debate, particularly as the member for the riding of Ontario. The debate is about the province of Ontario and the economic policies of the federal government as they impact on Ontario.

I have listened to two previous speakers from Ontario, one from a riding immediately adjacent to mine and one not too far removed from mine. We are operating in very similar economic environments, and there are some problems.

The member for Scarborough—Rouge River talked about some problems as though they were the problems of the federal government, such as municipal taxes. He said that the tax rates are going up because of the policies of the federal government. I would suggest that municipal taxes go up because provincial or municipal governments increase their spending. That is the reason they go up. When large salary increases are extended to teachers in the school board system, which has nothing to do with the federal government, the money must be found somewhere.

When we have an inflation rate of 1.7 per cent and they hand out salary increases of 6 or 7 per cent they must raise municipal taxes to find the money to do so. We at the federal level have recognized the problem of dealing with salaries. Although it was a very unpopular and very difficult thing to do we were able to accomplish some goals so that in the last budget it was possible not only to avoid tax increases but to have some tax decreases.

When the members opposite from Toronto area ridings complain about municipal taxes I would encourage them to talk to their municipal colleagues, and to put the blame where it belongs.

It is the same for provincial responsibility. Two members from the Liberal Party got up and spoke about the problems of southern Ontario as if those problems had absolutely nothing to do with the fact that Ontario has the highest spending government in Canada. Year over year it increases spending far more than anywhere else in Canada, including places like Alberta.

All I can say is that when we are talking about problems in Ontario in many instances they are directly related to the provincial government.

The members talk about welfare costs. Yes, there are more people on welfare and I am sorry to hear that. We did not force the provincial government to increase the payout to those receiving welfare over the last two years by 28 per cent. It chose to increase that amount and simply assumed we would write a blank cheque for whatever money it wanted. We did not force it to add all these day care centres on to the schools being built in my riding. It did that and presumed we would write a blank cheque to pay for them.

Those costs are strictly provincial, municipal, and school board responsibilities. To blame them on the federal government, as the two members opposite have done, does a total disservice.

On the other hand, as we in Toronto are impacted by high real estate costs, I did not hear these members say that because of the policies of the federal government we can now get mortgage rates substantially below anything they could ever get in their entire house-buying days, not just in their house-buying days but in mine as well. Mortgage rates are lower.

I come from a constituency that has a lot of new housing under construction. People are either getting their first mortgage or a renewed mortgage and they are all able to get one at a much lower rate than they have ever been able to in the past, unless they happen to be over 50 or 55 years of age and can remember those days when mortgage rates were low and very attractive. We are back down to those levels and there are projections that they may drop even further.

The members talk about the problems young people are facing.

It is funny that the member did not talk at all about the fact that the federal government introduced this 5 per cent down payment policy for Canada Mortgage and Housing. Young people are able to buy housing and take advantage of the very attractive house prices in the Toronto area right now. They can take advantage of very attractive mortgage rates and get into their homes, which is something that I thought the members opposite would say was a good policy.

However, I do not recall hearing them mention that at all. The impact of that housing policy allows for house construction and it creates construction jobs. When people build houses they put things inside those houses which are manufactured, such as carpeting, appliances, furniture, lighting, electrical equipment and so on.

They have to buy lawn mowers to cut the grass and other products to maintain the place, and certainly most, if not all, of those products are manufactured in Canada. Guess what? That creates manufacturing jobs. Is it working? I would say that it is.

Not only I say that it is. A recent article in The Financial Post says: "Longer work week may signal an upturn. Manufacturing employees spent more hours on the job in March than they did in the same month last year". That is a good sign.

Are we out of the woods? No, but it is a good sign. It is a sign that things are happening the way that they should happen.

Another member spoke about training funds. One of our members from Calgary got up and made some very legitimate points in response to that request for more training funds. However, what was not mentioned in the debate by the member from the Liberal Party is that since 1990 we have tripled the amount of money going into training funds.

Over $3 billion a year is now spent on training. Much of that is for those who are on the unemployment rolls. Much of that is for those who are unable to find jobs because the skills they have do not match the required skill for the jobs that exist. That is a positive step.

Is it enough? We can always say it is not enough, but can the taxpayers afford it? We must understand that in many instances in order to fund unemployment insurance training programs we must increase the deduction for unemployment insurance. Those who are working will therefore have less to spend because of that problem.

It is a fine balance, but I would say that in the last three budgets we have moved the numbers in the right direction, I think very successfully. Is that all we have done? No, not at all.

In this budget we have recognized the problems that Ontario is facing. We have recognized that there is a need to assist the manufacturing sector to make it more competitive. Therefore we introduced a reduction in the tax that must be paid by manufacturing because we have increased the capital cost allowance.

That is a very direct benefit to the manufacturing industry of Canada, particularly the manufacturing industry of Ontario. If the provincial government has done nothing else right in Ontario over the last year and a half it has been in office, it did follow the lead that we provided on that capital cost allowance. It has also made a similar move in its budget.

About the only good thing in its budget was that move. The net result was that Ontario based manufacturing is better able to invest in new technology and new ideas. Therefore Ontario based industry can be more competitive. That is positive.

Not only did we do that, but we have made it possible for consumers across Canada to have a little bit more money to spend. I do not want anyone to believe that they are going to be able to buy a Rolls Royce with the tax cut that we put in place, but we did put in place a tax cut for all personal taxpayers in Canada. It helps them pay less tax and therefore they have more to spend.

It comes into effect on July 1 and there will be more to follow early next year. Those were very positive steps. We have recognized the need that exists in Ontario and we have very clearly tried to do something about it.

More than that, we have made some very major steps for small business. We have increased small business loans, which means that small businesses can borrow up to $200,000 guaranteed by the federal government to invest in new technology and new capital equipment. We have also put in place additional small business loan programs. All of those programs have been to provide help in a very difficult time in southern Ontario.

This difficult time we are talking about is not all doom and gloom, as the members opposite are saying. We have done a number of other things to assist not just Ontario business but all of Canada. For example, we spent extensive time in a committee chaired by the member for Mississauga South dealing with financial reforms.

We have now changed the method in which financial institutions operate in this country so that all Canadians, particularly business, can access the trust companies, insurance companies, and credit unions. They have a whole new pool of revenue and funds that they can access. That is a very positive move for Canada and Ontario, particularly southern Ontario.

We have seen improvements in house sales this year. We have seen a tremendous improvement in the bank rate. I have talked about the bank rate as it applies to mortgages for individual consumers in this country, but it is not just those people who benefit by this improvement. A low bank rate helps businesses in this country borrow money, and borrow it on a much better basis.

I should add that there are some very good things going on in Canada. One of the problems we have in this country is that we do not have the courage of our convictions, and that is certainly evidenced by all those on the other side of the House. I would like to give a few examples.

Free trade was supposed to be a terrible thing, at least according to some of the comments made by those in opposition. Yet we are into the third year of the agreement and in March a headline in one of the local papers stated: "Trade figures surge in March as exports hit a record high". A record high is positive.

If we examine those numbers we find that the percentage of manufacturing exports as a part of that total was larger than ever before. In fact, we had a record trade surplus with the United States and record exports to the United States in March.

I do not know where all the doom and gloom that the members opposite are talking about is. Those numbers are very positive and they are very positive for Ontario. Manufacturing was part of that.

It goes even further. Another headline states: "Economy shows modest growth for third month". Another states: "We are moving in the right direction as hard hit manufacturing perks up". Manufacturing in Ontario is starting to see real benefits from what has been done.

They say there are no good signs, but there are many of them. In the Algoma region an article about a company called Great Lakes said: "Great Lakes enjoys a healthy year". The article says that the company is doing all right.

There is a company in Cambridge that found that Canadians were not prepared to accept its products. Jane Martin went into the manufacturing business and found she had to export up to two-thirds of her products to the United States in order to make the business grow. She was able to do it. She was able to do it very successfully because she stood by her convictions and said: "There is a way to do it and the way to do it is to get on with the job. If Canadians do not want to get on with the job, I will sell my products somewhere else". She did and it worked and the company is very successful. That is one example.

We heard how the textile industry in Canada would be devastated by the free trade agreement, at least that is what those opposite said. A textile manufacturer in Cambridge, a city in Ontario, said: "I agree with the free trade agreement. I think it will be good for my business". Canadians said: "You're wrong, the textile industry will be decimated". What did he do? The chap's name is George Hancock and he put in place new technology and new manufacturing ideas. Lo and behold 1991 was his best year ever. He has increased his exports. He is now selling in the United States, which he did not do before. Twenty-five per cent of the company's $7 million revenue in 1991 was generated out of exports to the United States.

There are people who are prepared to be very positive, who know how to do it and who are prepared to get off their duff and get it done. That is what we need in this country.

Members may argue that is not constructive. At least that is what the members opposite try to argue. What are the general benefits of this? I happen to have an article from The International Herald Tribune on Monday, May 25. It is a U.S. publication distributed world-wide. Its headline is: "Canada sets an example". It is the editorial. I would like to read one paragraph of the editorial because it says exactly what we in this party and government have been saying.

> Both Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bush are conservatives and both resist raising taxes. Mr. Mulroney has attacked his deficit mostly by curbing spending. Canadians have complained loudly and bitterly but they re-elected him in 1988. He has kept the squeeze on, although he will have to run again next year.
> There have been real costs—

—and we have all identified them.

S. O. 31

Unemployment is much higher than in the United States but inflation is only half as high. With the end of the recession the chances for a strong recovery are better in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. Mulroney makes jokes about his low popularity ratings. According to opinion polls only 20 per cent of Canadians like him. A politician's popularity is capital and he has spent his capital well on economic benefits that will come to Canada for many years, regardless of who is Prime Minister.

A foreign magazine, a foreign publication is talking about the strength of the Canadian economy and about how we in this country are going to reap benefits for many years to come. I have no doubt about that in the least.

In conclusion, I would like to point out to the members opposite that there are some problems in Ontario. However, I am convinced that the problems have been addressed and the initiatives we have taken will lead us to future economic prosperity. We are starting to see some of that already.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Ontario. I share the community that he represents.

First, I want to say that he said many things in his speech that I agree with. I do not want Canadians to think that we are all doom and gloomers over here because that is not the case. He spoke of low interest rates and we recognize that fact. He also spoke of low inflation rates and we recognize that fact as well.

We are not elected to this House of Commons just to talk for those who are advantaged or doing well. We are also elected to this Chamber to speak for those in our community who are going through difficult times. In your community, my community—and let us forget the number 11.2 per cent because it is a misleading number—right now we have over a half million people not working in the greater Toronto region and area.

In this House it is our responsibility to try to find work for them. The comment saying: "Let us not give a blank cheque to those who are on welfare" might have been a bit cruel. I do not think anyone was suggesting that we give a blank cheque to anyone.

There are a lot of Canadians who understand and realize that there are abuses in the welfare system and abuses in the unemployment insurance system. None of us would support ignoring those abuses. What people are crying for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being eleven o'clock I must go to statements. The hon. member will have an opportunity after Question Period.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in October 1990, roughly 20 months ago, the Prime Minister and then Minister of Finance promised at that particular time a review of the goods and services tax on books and reading materials.

It is now time for that particular review to take place.

Most Canadians would realize and acknowledge that the goods and services tax on books has reduced reading in Canada and has driven Canadians to shop for books and magazines outside Canada. It has also harmed our writers, our publishers, our book stores and our libraries. It has also affected students in a very negative kind of way.

Continuing this tax will reduce our literacy, our competitiveness, our productivity and our prosperity. It has also contributed to a loss of jobs. This has been documented.

The GST is a tax on literacy. It is a tax on knowledge. It is a tax on learning.

The Economic Council of Canada has pointed out that there will be another one million illiterate Canadians, functionally illiterate Canadians, out there in the work force by the year 2000.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

BUY CANADIAN PROGRAM

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, when the announcement was made earlier this year that the General Motors foundry in St. Catharines would close in 1995, the city council reacted by calling on the federal and provincial governments to establish a program to encourage our citizens to buy products domestically.

I am glad to say that the federal government has responded to this resolution and has listened to similar suggestions made during the Community Talks meetings across the country.

Last month the government launched the "Canada—Buy Into It" program. It is a campaign designed to ask Canadians to take a fresh look at the quality and range of products we produce in Canada.

This is an important initiative. Our manufacturers are responding to competitive pressures to improve the quality of their products, and this program highlights that fact.

I am confident that this initiative will be very helpful in promoting the idea of supporting wherever possible the businesses of neighbours and friends.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, on April 3 a prominent human rights activist, Ajit Singh Bains, was arrested in India.

This retired judge and current chairperson of the Punjab Human Rights Organization has been thrown in prison and denied the right to a full and legitimate trial under the rule of law.

Further, the police confiscated valuable documents relating to his human rights work.

This incident has summoned condemnation from the international community. Prior to his arrest three Canadian members of Parliament from all three parties met with Mr. Bains in January in India. It is an insult to this Canadian Parliament that this man was then arrested.

The World Sikh Organization's genuine concern for the human rights of all peoples cannot be ignored. The carnage continues in the Punjab, in China and in many other areas of the world.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to voice Canada's disapproval in the strongest possible terms to the Indian government about the continuing violations of human rights and to call for the immediate release—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Don Valley East.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, most jobs are created by small business but most small businesses cannot get bank loans.

If we really want the banks, the trust companies or the life insurance companies for that matter, to provide small businesses with lines of credit and loans for inventory rather than just fully secured asset loans then the government must be prepared to lead by example.

Unfortunately the lending policies of the Federal Business Development Bank are exactly the same as those presently employed by the chartered banks.

We cannot expect the banks, the trust companies or the life insurance companies to lend to small business if the government's own lender of last resort, the Federal Business Development Bank, will not.

At present the FBDB's aid to small business seems to be based on the theory that if we hold their head under water long enough they will develop better lung control.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 50th anniversary of the Dieppe raid on August 19, 1942. In April I was honoured to be among those who visited the Canadian cemetery at Dieppe while in France for the 75th anniversary of Vimy Ridge.

Today I would encourage the government to consider the following request made by the Dieppe veterans.

First, the commemorative stamp for the 50th anniversary should be issued prior to August 19 rather than in November as now planned.

Second, POW veterans from Dieppe should be made eligible for the veterans independence program.

Third, post-traumatic stress disorder should be recognized as a pensionable disability.

And last but not least, Dieppe veterans should finally receive an appropriate medal for their part in the raid.

Meeting these requests would be a fine way to mark the 50th anniversary of this tragic chapter in Canadian history.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, world leaders are meeting in Rio de Janeiro to discuss our global environment. The nations of the world must work together to preserve and protect our global heritage: the environment.

[English]

The government should do everything in its power to lead by example on issues such as biodiversity and global warming. We must help companies develop new technologies that will take pollution out of the production process.

Canada must take this opportunity at the world summit to be a global leader. The government must urge all nations to fight stratospheric ozone depletion, pollution of our oceans and global deforestation. It is our common heritage and we must protect it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, World Environment Day is an opportunity for us to demonstrate our determination to preserve our environment. We expressed that determination in Canada's green plan, to which all Canadians contributed. Published in December 1990, the green plan is our action plan for meeting the challenges of sustainable development.

More than ever before in our history, we are focusing our attention and efforts on the environment. We know that our economic prosperity depends on a healthy environment. We know too that our success depends on working together, here in Canada and with the other nations of this world.

While our country is celebrating Canadian Environment Week, more than 150 heads of state are meeting in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, also known as the earth summit. This conference will be a major step toward achieving our common objective to make sustainable development a reality for this generation and generations to come.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want the House to hear about a young constituent of mine, 17-year old Nick Iozzo, who has just learned a lesson about the Mulroney government.

Last winter Nick saw an ad for a summer job with the Department of National Defence to get musical and military training in the reserves. He is a musician and he wants a career in music so this was right up his alley.

He applied for the job. Lengthy auditions were held, and he and 34 other youngsters were hired for this job. He and his family were very happy and he assumed he would be doing it for the summer.

However, a few days before he was supposed to report for work he was telephoned and told the job was cancelled because of Department of National Defence budget cuts.

Nick wrote to me and asked me to help him now that it is too late to get another job. He wonders how anyone can trust this government, and frankly so do I.

CALGARY SOUTHWEST

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, in April I sent a survey to the constituents of Calgary Southwest asking them for their views and their concerns, and to rate in order of priority the most important issues.

I want to thank the 6,000 plus people who took the time to return the survey. Eliminating the deficit is the number one issue. Close behind the people of Calgary Southwest believe both health and education must be a majority for all levels of government.

Property rights should be entrenched in the Constitution. The Senate must be reformed. Elected, yes, many want an equal number of senators from each province but abolition has strong support.

One constituent said:

> I fully support free trade, GST, deficit reduction, and economic restructuring but you had better frame this card because I doubt you will get many like it.

THE FAMILY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, this week Canadians learned about the existence of a Tory family caucus which has taken credit for the influencing of the many negative cabinet decisions on policies affecting families.

The reality for families today is that in the 1950s it took an average of 45 hours a week of paid work to support a family. Now it takes an average of 65 to 80 hours. Today two-parent families make up the largest group of families living in poverty. Poverty rates among two-parent families would more than double without the incomes of wives.

New Democrats know that Canadians want a government not rooted in the past but one which will recognize and accept the transition families are going through and seek to provide policies which address the new roles of families; a government which is committed to full employment and which provides training and other necessary support programs; a government committed to improving access to non-profit, universal, quality, affordable child care.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Index Linked Mortgage Program to assist the development of co-operative housing projects has been abolished, and that as a result, the number of co-operative housing units will be reduced by 80 per cent. The program, which the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation qualified as low cost and high-performance, should not be cut.

Mr. André Gariépy, president of the Coopérative Loge-Uni, Mrs. Mariette Dunn, secretary, Mr. Guy Simard and Ms. Youance, Desin, Thiboutot, Bédard, Gagné and Simard, all members of the same housing co-op in my riding, have made it clear that they totally disapprove of these regressive measures by the Conservative government, and that is why I ask the government to reverse its decision.

HARBOURS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, for six years the barge named The Prince Edward Island has been tied up at the pier in Whitby harbour. This derelict vessel has been an eyesore, a possible safety hazard and a possible environmental hazard.

It has taken a concerted effort, particularly by the town of Whitby and its municipal council but also by the province and the federal government, to get rid of this thing finally. Just the other day it was towed out of Whitby harbour. The unfortunate part of it all is that it is going some place else.

I call on the federal government to bring forward regulations to prevent this kind of thing from happening at any harbour anywhere in Canada again.

MANITOBA UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, today's unemployment statistics indicate that northern Manitoba has 24.8 per cent official unemployment. This is the highest of any region within any province of Canada. Yet this federal government has refused to renegotiate the northern development agreement, has refused to provide funding for the port of Churchill, has refused to do anything with regard to the hydro development, and has refused to provide adequate training for native Canadians.

My statement in this House is to the effect that the government is ignoring a very important part of this country. It has no concern for the youth. It has no concern for native Canadians. It has no concern for women.

Why does it continue to be the government when it will not do anything to help the people?

S. O. 31

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment rate in May 1992 was 11.2 per cent, up 2 per cent from last month. This is the highest unemployment rate since November 1984.

In my own region in eastern Ontario the rate has gone up by three-tenths of one per cent over one month and 2,000 more people are unemployed this month than last month.

Here is what the government had to say about unemployment on October 25, 1991 when the Minister of Finance said—and I know it is unfair to quote him, using his own words—as follows:

> I ask the hon. member to consider the fact that the merchandise trade balance is up, housing starts are up—on an annualized basis and unemployment rates are coming down. The indicators to which the hon. member refers, such as bankruptcies, have a certain amount of lag time. I would ask him to take that into consideration.

Things are going better.

CATHOLIC TEACHERS' FEDERATION

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, at this time in our unity debate and at a time when Canadians who are modest and self-effacing run themselves down quite a bit, I thought I would read a message from my riding office about something that is happening in Canada.

My assistant just talked to a teacher from St. Patrick's school in Sebringville, Ontario. He tells me that the Catholic Teachers' Federation is celebrating Canada Day by having all school children in Catholic schools across Canada, hundreds and thousands of schools and thousands of students, sing O Canada at twelve noon. This was on Tuesday, June 2. Then they are going to shake hands, hug, and generally celebrate the joy of living in this great nation.

My staff member ends by saying: "I don't know if anybody in Ottawa knows this, but I think it is great". Until now I don't know if anybody in Ottawa did know of it, but I too think it is great.

WORLD ENVIRONMENT DAY

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate World Environment Day, a day for all Canadians to demonstrate their commitment to a healthy environment.

More than at any previous time in our history we are focusing our attention and efforts on the environment. Most of us know that our future, both our physical well-being and our economic prosperity, depends on a healthy environment. We know too that our success depends on working together to achieve a common goal.

That is what we are hoping for at the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro this week and next. Heads of government and over 30,000 people in total are attending this important conference at which the Canadian delegation will be playing a leading role.

The green plan, Canada's national agenda for protecting and restoring the environment, has been suggested by the United Nations as a model for other countries to follow in designing their own strategies. The partnership principle which is achieving positive results in Canada can be made to work on a global level as well.

If we work together we can make a difference.

CHILD EXPLOITATION

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the worst crimes that faces our country is that of child exploitation.

Next week Mrs. Monica Rainey, the head of a group called CACE, Citizens Against Child Exploitation, will be in Ottawa to present over 10,000 signatures of support from my constituency of Okanagan Centre.

People in a position of trust who exploit children should never be allowed to return to those positions again. Our laws need to be changed to make that happen.

Mrs. Rainey will be meeting with various ministers and MPs from all sides of the House. I would urge all members of Parliament to offer their support to her in her efforts to put an end to this terrible abuse of children.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The unemployment statistics released today are staggering: 11.2 per cent, the highest rate since this government took office in November 1984. There are 1,536,000 officially unemployed with hundreds of thousands more who have given up hope and given up looking for a job. Seven provinces now have double digit rates of unemployment.

This government must take responsibility for the devastating situation we are in today. When will the minister finally admit on behalf of his government that the government does not have the slightest idea how to put Canadians back to work? When will he finally admit that the unemployment rate is a direct result of the policies of his government?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year members opposite were calling for lower interest rates. They were calling for a lower dollar. They were calling for a 5 per cent down payment for mortgages. Two weeks ago they called for more section 26 training in Canada.

Today we have a lower dollar, lower interest rates and $150 million more for training and work sharing, but we still have problems and we acknowledge that.

What is important is for the hon. member to pay attention to the real facts that happened this month.

Mr. Nunziata: People have lost hope.

Mr. Valcourt: The member says: "People have lost hope". How does he explain that over 50,000 people returned to the labour force this month? That is an encouraging and positive sign for our economy.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, there are faces behind the massive numbers of unemployed in Canada. The hardest hit are women and youth.

The unemployment rate among women rose to 10.3 per cent; 20,000 women lost their jobs last month. Youth unemployment is at 17.8 per cent. There are 114,000 fewer young people employed this year than in May of last year. Among young men the rate is 20.3 per cent. Students looking for work this summer have little or no hope of finding summer jobs.

What positive news does the minister have today for the youth and women of Canada who are desperately searching for employment?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member talks about women—and in his earlier question he referred to 1984—he should also add that since 1984 it is close to one million; 890,000 more women are working today than in September 1984 and 71.5 per cent of the jobs created for women since September 1984 are full-time jobs. That is an improvement over the era when his party governed Canada.

• (1120)

He is asking: "What are we doing for those people today?" He seems to imply that we take solace in the fact that people are unemployed. Not at all.

We are working on the fundamentals of the economy being right, not on having a quick-fix solution, throwing money at the problem, giving them make-work projects and then having them on welfare again. We are working to create solid, sustainable, long-term jobs and this is what the budget of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will achieve for Canada.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, this minister is not hoodwinking Canadians into believing that this government is providing the necessary leadership in order to put people back to work.

It is clear that this government does not know what it is doing on the unemployment front. It is paralysed. It is ad libbing its way through the worst economic crisis since the Depression.

He referred to the budget. Let us look at the budget the Minister of Finance handed down just a few short months ago, in February.

In that budget, the Minister of Finance said that the unemployment rate this year would average 10.3 per cent. In January, it was 10.4 per cent; in February, 10.6 per cent; in March, 11.1 per cent; in April, 11 per cent; and in May, 11.2 per cent. It is obvious that the minister is out of touch with reality.

Given the fact that the minister based his budget to a large extent on assumptions that the unemployment rate would average 10.3 per cent this year, does he still stick to his target? Does he realize in order to meet his target, the unemployment rate will have to average 9.7 per cent for the balance of the year?

Is the minister prepared now to stand up and to admit that he was wrong in his budget of February 25? Will he tell Canadians what his government expects the unemployment rate to be for the balance of this year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that we have acknowledged the unemployment figures are higher than we would like, obviously because of the weakness in the economy and because of the fundamental restructuring that is taking place.

The hon. member should be encouraged by the fact that the labour force grew this past month by some 56,000. There were 31,000 new jobs created.

What is more encouraging and is really a reflection of the policies of the budget, some 41,000 new jobs have been created in the manufacturing sector. That is precisely what we attempted to do in the budget. We tried to address that particular sectoral weakness, namely the manufacturing and processing sector.

Obviously, with the economy being weaker than we had projected in the budget, the hon. member is aware of the fact that Statistics Canada adjusted the figures for 1991 downward by almost one half of one per cent. This has a reflection upon the growth prospects for 1992.

I ask the hon. member to give the budgetary policies a chance to work. The clear example that 41,000 new jobs have been created in the manufacturing sector is proof positive that the policies of the budget are in fact taking hold.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

He says he wants Canadians to give more time for his policies to work. The minister has been saying for months now that his policies are going to turn the economy around. If he is right, why has the unemployment rate gone up and not down? Why has the number of people working fallen by 25,000 in one month alone? Why has the number of full-time jobs dropped by 221,000 since last May?

I ask the minister: In the face of these terrible numbers, where are the jobs? Where are the jobs? Why does he not do more right now to get people back to work?

[Translation]

Where are the jobs? Why doesn't he do everything that has to be done to put Canadians back to work immediately?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are 12.207 million Canadians who are currently working. The hon. member compares the statistics with 1984. In 1984, there were 10.849 million Canadians working out of a work force of 12.331 million. Today we have a work force of 13.7 million. The hon. member is wrong in one of his submissions. The fact of the matter is the labour force has grown this past month by some 56,000. There have been 31,000 new jobs created. There have been 41,000 new jobs created over the last two months in the manufacturing and processing sector. That is a specific area we addressed in the budget.

Today's Ottawa Citizen quotes one-year mortgage rates have now reached a 25-year low. Canada is not alone in having difficulty with the unemployment situation. The United States of America has just recorded its highest unemployment levels since October 1983. It is a world-wide problem we are trying to address in the most effective way possible.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in talking only about the number of people working, the minister and his government are in effect writing off the 1.5 million people who are out of work. Surely, they deserve more from this minister.

There is no doubt that the unemployment rate is up, not down. The number of full-time jobs has fallen, not increased. I cannot believe that after these tragic numbers announced today the minister is essentially giving us the same answer he has been giving us for months. Why can he not say something new to at least give some hope to these 1.5 million people in this country who want to work?

Why can the minister not figure out that his policies are not working? Why can he not commit today to making job creation his first priority and not his last?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is one of our major priorities. The fact that 41,000 more people are working in the manufacturing sector today than there were in the last two months is proof positive that it is working. The fact that there were 31,000 new jobs created in the month of May is proof positive that our policies are working.

The fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration just announced an additional $150 million for job training and skills upgrading is again proof positive that this is a priority for us. Why does the hon. member not listen to the answers, rather than reading his rhetoric from questions he prepared in advance.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He will remember well that back in 1984 when his party took office, it decried the tragic situation in terms of the unacceptably high levels of unemployment, the crisis in unemployment created by the Liberal administration before that was up in the 11 per cent range. Well, we are now back to 1984 levels of unemployment.

May I suggest rather than this exchange which may be seen as some sort of statistical mud wrestling in terms of figures, that we admit there is a crisis facing our country in terms of the high levels of unemployment.

Will the Minister of Finance say he takes this seriously and that he plans to call an economic summit of finance ministers across the country to deal exclusively with finding ways and means of reducing the high levels of unemployment in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, ministers of finance meet on a regular basis. We have had first ministers' meetings to deal with the economic issues.

Perhaps the most appropriate way to help resolve the problem is for the hon. member to talk to his socialist friends in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan. They moved in to take up the slack that we provided in terms of reductions both for the corporate and private sector and for individual Canadians. We lowered taxes, we did not raise them.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, back in the 1930s, R.B. Bennett admitted that his Conservative policies of the day were wrong and he changed course half-way through the 1930s. Unfortunately, it was too late.

Before it is too late now in the 1990s, my question for the Minister of Finance is this. He knows that there is a willingness across the country to introduce a municipal infrastructure program that will create thousands and thousands of jobs. That can be done. He has the support of governments across the country.

Will he now invest in the future of those people who are unemployed and give them a chance to work and get them off unemployment insurance and welfare?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat for the hon. member's benefit, we addressed in the budget a specific area that needed to be addressed. That was essentially the manufacturing and processing sector and improving the business climate, the small business climate and adding some stimulus to the economy by bringing down the burden of taxation. These are all positive things.

• (1130)

A positive indicator is clearly the fact that there have been 41,000 new jobs created in the manufacturing sector. There have been 31,000 new jobs created in the month of May. The labour force has grown by 56,000.

The hon. member wants to go on a spending binge. He wants a huge infrastructure program. I know the position of the hon. member's party is that we should print money to do that job. That is not an option as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, R.B. Bennett had the courage to admit his government had made an error in judgment, that it had brought in policies that were not working. Unfortunately, it turned course too late in the day.

The Minister of Finance knows by the figures this morning that we have literally hundreds of thousands of highly educated Canadians with post-secondary degrees who are unemployed. There are people with Ph.D.s driving cabs.

The Minister of Finance knows that one of the engines of job creation in this country is small business and tourism. Would he call together the ministers from across the country and territories responsible for small business and tourism to find ways and means of creating jobs in those two critical sectors so people can get to work?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that my hon. friend and his party have discovered tourism and small business. I have to say that this is a very important part of the Canadian economy.

As a result of this, we have through the WD, which would interest him, increased the amount of money that the federal government is going to put into stimulating both small business and tourism.

I have to say though that the NDP government in British Columbia has refused to co-operate with us on the WD money for tourism. We have put forward a tranche of funds and we have asked British Columbia to join us. To date, it is the last province to join us in having a tourism program which would also help small business.

I urge him to take his message to the provincial government in Victoria.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The unacceptable national unemployment rate of 11.2 per cent pales in comparison to the rate in Atlantic Canada.

In eastern Canada alone there are now 10,000 more people looking for work than there were in April. In my province of Prince Edward Island the unemployment rate is over 19 per cent; in Newfoundland it is over 20 per cent.

Why does the minister refuse to understand that his government's lack of leadership in generating jobs is causing many easterners to lose hope?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It seems to me that the hon. member is interested only in scoring political points. Why does she not look at the programs in place in Atlantic Canada?

I was in New Brunswick and announced with Premier McKenna a $282 million program to help welfare recipients and unemployed Canadians in New Brunswick get off welfare and into productive jobs. We are working with Newfoundland and Labrador, with P.E.I. and Nova Scotia under ACOA and under unemployment insurance programs to try to help those people acquire skills to occupy the new jobs.

We can be concerned about the fact that yes, in a recession the last thing to turn around is unemployment. Looking at the figures for this month, this is happening. It is not a negative sign that over 50,000 people have entered the labour market this month. It is a positive sign. With the proper policies and the fundamentals in place, we can look to much better days.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. This government is not only willing to leave easterners out to dry, it is also willing to accept the fact that the unemployment rate among women has risen sharply.

In fact, since January, 82,000 women lost their full-time jobs. Canadian women deserve better, Canadian youth deserve better and Canadians in general deserve better from this government.

Why will this government not come forward today with an infrastructure program that could provide hope for Canadians across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated in the budget, we are undertaking a number of initiatives via the private sector that will help stimulate the economy in certain key areas, for example, in the transportation sector and airport development. The hon. member is aware that we are actively pursuing the Prince Edward Island fixed-link which would be a very important transportation connection and would also create jobs.

We also indicated we would be exploring with the provinces the possibility of upgrading our national highways system which is part and parcel of a four-year study undertaken by the federal and provincial ministers of transport. These are all issues that are undergoing active consideration.

I repeat to the hon. member that it is important to get to the fundamentals. A long-term low interest rate is the basis for long-term sustainable growth in bringing inflation down and keeping it down. That has had a very positive effect in terms of increasing our productivity and of increasing our profit margins. That is the key to reinvestment and the creation of jobs in the future.

Those are the fundamentals that have to be in place. We are going through that painful restructuring and adjustment process. Clearly, there are positive signs that are occurring, for example, the merchandise trade and the improvement in the job picture. As the budget policies take hold, further evidence of that will be seen.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

Statistics Canada just confirmed 91 per cent of Canadians in a recent poll think the recession is not over. Unemployment in the Montreal area rose to 13 per cent in May. The rate also went up in Chicoutimi, Jonquière, Quebec City, Trois-Rivières and Sherbrooke.

Why does the government continue to pursue economic policies that have quite simply failed to create jobs for the residents of major cities in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member should say clearly and precisely what he means.

The government has implemented economic policies to create a climate that would lead to the creation of permanent jobs. If the hon. member argues that we should use the approach his party cherished for decades of throwing money at problems by creating fictitious jobs with taxpayers' money, that is not the solution we are considering.

If the hon. member would look at the real situation resulting from the economic policy, the lowest interest rates in 20 years, the lowest inflation of all industrialized countries, all these factors will lead to private sector investment that will result in permanent employment in the long term. That is what Quebecers want.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, this government was elected in 1984 with promises of immediate job creation. After all this time we are in an unacceptable situation.

In May, a thousand jobs were lost in Sherbrooke and another thousand in Trois-Rivières. In the Montreal area alone, 12,000 jobs were lost in May, Mr. Speaker.

Will the government finally accept the program put forward by the Liberal leader of working with the municipalities to give employment to all these 14,000 families that lost their jobs in May alone?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to pay attention. When he tells us about the Liberal Party's famous plan, I remember that in January, he submitted this Liberal proposal to us. Under it, $125 million more would have been spent to train Canadians and give them the skills they need to hold new jobs.

We rejected it because we invested $450 million more in this key sector of the economy, namely our workers' skills. We rejected the Liberal proposal out of hand in favour of something much better, to the benefit of Quebecers and all Canadians.

PRIVATE FAMILY TRUSTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, in 1972, the Liberals eliminated the federal inheritance tax and brought in a 21-year tax exemption for private family trusts. That 21 years is almost up, with these trusts to be finally taxed on January 2, 1993. Estimates of how much money exists in these trusts run as high as $70 billion.

• (1140)

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he would show he is serious about reducing the deficit and the equitable sharing of reducing that deficit and commit now not to extend this exemption so that the tax is collectable on January 2, 1993, from these trusts and goes either toward eliminating the deficit or toward the kind of job creation programs that have been suggested in the House today.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the position of the New Democratic Party has always been to tax Canadians into submission. What is important—

Some hon. members: Fair taxes.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, that has been their policy and we have seen evidence of that in the last three budgets that have been brought down by the socialist governments. They believe in tax, tax, tax and to heck with the economic impact.

The hon. member has to be aware that any tax regime has to be competitive with the global situation. We have been trying to bring about through tax reform a tax regime that would allow us to compete more effectively and to provide incentives for the private sector to invest and to spend, and to create new jobs and new job activity.

It is within that context that we have approached the whole issue of tax reform.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance why it is okay to tax the middle class to death, as this government has done through its changes in tax reform, the icing on the cake being the GST. Yet the minister gets up and weeps these big crocodile tears. He does not want to tax the Bronfmans to death. He does not want to tax all these other large wealthy families in Canada that benefit from these trust laws.

I say to the minister he cannot have it both ways. He cannot ask Canadians to take him seriously about the deficit and refuse to do something about this kind of wealth.

Will the minister commit today to not extend this Liberal tax exemption for the wealthy and make that money available either for deficit reduction or for the renewal of Canada's municipal infrastructure rather than just giving this billion dollar gift to some of Canada's wealthiest families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the position of the New Democratic Party would be to do away with the capital gains exemption. That would be a further burden on small business, a further burden on farmers, kill all incentives to generate wealth, kill all incentives to generate new jobs.

I can give the hon. member this assurance. As long as I am finance minister, I will attempt to put in place a tax regime that will be competitive and reflective of the reality of the global marketplace.

YOUTH

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

Over a year ago the government received a report on the shortcomings of the Canada student loans programs which it had commissioned. The report stated that cost allowances for students have not been updated since 1984 and that the allowances fall significantly short in most categories.

Given the fact that so few students will find work this summer, what is the government prepared to do in advance of the next school year to address the double crisis of student unemployment and inadequate student funding.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that a number of deficiencies in that particular program have been raised. I believe the hon. member opposite has raised some of them.

We have been moving very aggressively to come to grips with the issue. The program is a shared program between the provinces and the federal government. It is also under the administration of the banks.

We have reached agreement with the provinces with a view to first of all increase the weekly loan limit to reflect the increases in costs since 1984. We have also talked about the possibility of removing the 3 per cent administration fee to give the students a greater opportunity.

We started negotiations with the banks about two weeks ago to see how we could put in place a new regime that would make the system more efficient.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the minister's response is unacceptable. I think it is an insult to the over 300,000 students who would like to return to school but cannot find work this summer.

My question is for the minister of employment. The minister of employment must understand by now, given the figures released today, that we are dealing with a national crisis in relation to young people in this country. What is this government going to do before this House rises to help young people find work so they can return to school in the fall?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think everybody here will agree with the fact that the situation is difficult, particularly for the young people.

That is why this government is striving through its prosperity initiative, its budget, et cetera, to make sure the fundamentals are there so the youth of our country have the hope to find the necessary instruments to guarantee their future.

That being said, my colleague the minister of employment has put into place the appropriate programs to deal with those youth who are out of school. Through the Challenges program we have put in place the necessary programs and moneys to deal with those students at risk to make sure they do return to school. We believe the most fundamental of the instruments they need for the future is an education.

I am also encouraged by a recent report from Statistics Canada that says this summer more students will be able to find employment than last year. We have put more money into the program in order to facilitate that.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

On Tuesday he said Canada's small and medium-sized businesses are "doing nothing to help train workers".

The minister knows that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business study shows that last year these businesses spent $9.6 billion for on-the-job training. When is this minister, who has cut government funding for training, going to stop blaming business for his own failures?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I do not know what they take Canadians for, standing up in the House and telling people we have cut money for training when in fact the funds earmarked for training have gone up by $450 million. This is chest le comble.

As for his small business reference, I have not said that small business is doing nothing. I am comparing what Canadian corporations are doing in terms of training in Canada. If we have to compete in this world, we have to compare ourselves to our competing partners. American corporations spend twice as much as Canadian corporations to train people. The Japanese spend five times as much as Canadian corporations to train people and the Germans spend eight times as much. That is what I am referring to.

If he cares to go and talk to the small business people in Canada, he will find they agree they have to invest more in the people.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, let me clear this up. This minister has not increased government funding for training.

Mr. Valcourt: That is a lie.

Mr. Peterson: He said it is a lie.

Mr. Speaker: It is one thing to have disagreements but if somebody shouted out "It is a lie", I wish the member would just get up and withdraw it and let us get on with Question Period.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw.

Mr. Peterson: This minister has simply diverted unemployment insurance funds which are contributed entirely by workers and employers to training. It is not government funding. It is out of their pockets.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is putting a question. I am sure the House will give him the courtesy to be heard.

Mr. Peterson: The Canadian Federation of Independent Business wrote in a letter to the minister and I quote:

> The ignorance displayed by the minister is unbelievable, and his attempts to blame someone else for training difficulties is unconscionable.

I ask the minister, who said business does nothing to help train workers, if he will apologize for this gross misrepresentation.

• (1150)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not apologize for Canadian workers who are seeing private sector companies not investing enough in their skills in Canada because skills are the success of a competitive economy.

No, I will not apologize because German corporations spend eight times more than Canadian corporations, the Americans spend twice as much and the Japanese spend five times as much. What they agree on is that they have to spend more to help people acquire the skills needed in a competitive world.

I hear the rhetoric of the member. I think we should find another club. It will be the same—

Mr. Speaker: I think we have to proceed.

WHITBY HARBOUR

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, for six years a boat was anchored in Whitby harbour, a boat that was derelict, unsightly, unsafe, a possible environmental hazard, among other things. As of this week it has finally been towed out of Whitby harbour to some other unknown destination.

Will the Minister of Transport come forward with regulations that will prevent a vessel of this type being tied up along any pier regulated by the Department of Transport in Canada ever again?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The department is very aware of this issue. I think his constituents have been well represented on this issue. The member has expressed the concern a number of times.

The concern here is that in cases like this the government is constrained to ensuring the vessel in question is safe or does not present on environmental danger. There are very real constraints to our ability to order a private owner to move a vessel.

I can only say that the government has looked into the matter. The vessel has now been removed through the impetus and efforts of the hon. member. We are reviewing the regulations with a view to resolving these matters more quickly in the future.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Question Period my leader read from the CANMET study with regard to Westray and pointed out that with regard to the ventilation section and methane that the test does not give one confidence.

The minister in response said that the studies were outdated. Yet in 1990 in the professional magazine Northern Miner it referred to the inspection of Westray and said: "The potential for spontaneous combustion underground has not been clearly assessed".

The minister in the House has said that the government was not necessarily concerned with safety. It perceived that to be a provincial responsibility. I would ask the minister this: If you are making an economic investment, why would you not look at this information about the danger signals and realize that there is a real potential that your investment is in danger?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that with every investment and every underground coal mine that has ever been done, there has always been the danger of methane. That exists for all coal-mining investments.

What is different here is that there were a host of studies to try to assess whether the whole project would be economically and technically feasible.

The CANMET review is a review of all of those studies: the Dames and Moore study, the AMCL report in March, 1988, the Placer reports, the Hacquebard review, the Kilborn review and all other technical studies that led up to the decision by the company to go ahead with the mine. All of those reviews looked at the questions to which my hon. friend refers. The reviews all made it clear that the methane problem was either a small problem or a moderate problem or it might be more than that. All of them were looked at. They had to be included as part of the technical review. The fact is that they were and the decision was made by the mine to go ahead because the technical studies summarized by the CANMET review made it clear that the mine was technically feasible.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I come from a mining area. The minister was in that area very recently. Yes, all coal mines are dangerous. However, a mining area that has cost over 240 deaths in the previous period is obviously much more dangerous.

Therefore, the government knew it was not just an ordinary coal mining area.

My supplementary question is this. In December 1990, I tried to get the correspondence between ministers and between officials on this very aspect by tabling a question on the Order Paper.

That correspondence was not tabled in the House yesterday. The government has the ability to table that information. If it will not table it in this House, will it guarantee that all of that correspondence—absolutely all of that correspondence—will be made available to the various inquiries?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, there are three separate points to the hon. member's question.

The first point essentially is why, given the tragedy that occurred, did the government guarantee a loan to have the mine start in the first place. Those reasons are clear to the House just from the questions today about unemployment. That part of Nova Scotia had very high unemployment, and there was a provincial economic development priority. I know his party believes in economic development in the regions where there is high unemployment. That is one reason why this particular mine was looked at.

We studied very carefully the possibilities of doing it as long as it was viewed as being technically feasible. In fact, that is what all the documents made clear yesterday. The CANMET review of all the technical studies says this mine is technically feasible, and then it made some other recommendations as well.

In terms of communications beyond what I have tabled in the House yesterday, our role as a financial guarantor of the loan puts us into a position of being concerned with it from a technical point of view and from a financial point of view. There will be some more documents tabled along that line as well.

BANKING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister is aware of the fact that in an effort to provide the necessary financing for Canadian exporters to help create jobs in Canada, the Royal Bank has applied for a banking charter in China. He also knows that approval of that banking charter is contingent upon the minister signing the application for the Bank of China to have a Canadian banking charter.

Does the minister intend to sign the application of the Bank of China? If so, when?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The Minister of Finance has forwarded a letter to the Bank of China, giving it approval in principle for establishing a bank here in Canada. Our banking regulations require that the Bank of China now must advertise over a 30-day period establishing a Schedule II bank here in Canada.

There is a 30-day waiting period following that for comments on its application. Following that, it would apply for certification to the Minister of Finance.

The letter was forwarded, as I said, April 30 by the Minister of Finance. The procedure is well under way.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the failure of the Government of Canada to exercise prudent and due diligence in the Westray coal mining project has unfortunately resulted in a national disaster.

The government's own documents as tabled yesterday recommended: "The Department of Industry, Science and Technology consider more in-depth geological mining process, economic evaluation of the type undertaken by commercial lending institutions on projects of this magnitude".

Did the minister follow the advice of his own agencies? If not, could the minister explain to the House what possible reasons he could give for not following that advice?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. There were three recommendations from the CANMET review.

First, that the Department of Industry, Science and Technology confirm that the contractual arrangements with the Nova Scotia Power Corporation were in place and assess the significance of failure there. That of course we did because without that contract, there would not have been any cash flow to speak of.

The second recommendation was that Westray had to demonstrate and disclose its efforts to secure commercial lending.

The third one is the one he is quoting, that the Department of Industry, Science and Technology consider a more in-depth geological mining processing economic evaluation of the type undertaken by commercial lending institutions on projects of this magnitude.

Remember that our role in this was purely financial. We were guaranteeing a loan. We did further studies of a technical and financial type in order to make sure that our guarantee would be reasonable.

• (1200)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for indicating to the House that further studies and the advice of the department were followed. We look forward to getting that information in the weeks ahead.

My specific question to the minister is this: On page 5 of the agreement consummated by the Government of Canada, Curragh Resources Inc. and the Bank of Nova Scotia, it says the lender—> —made specific disclosure to the minister of the risks associated with the project in a letter dated September 14, 1990.

I ask the minister responsible if he would explain to the House the nature of those risks, both commercial and otherwise, and if he would be so kind as to table the contents of that letter in the House of Commons so that all members will have an opportunity to review its contents.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member, with 2,000 pages of evidence and documentation, will not have found all of it. But, in fact, the analysis of those questions is in the documents that I tabled yesterday.

WESTRAY MINE DOCUMENTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism in response to my question said that he was going to be tabling more documents with regard to the Westray situation. Yesterday in Hansard the government House leader indicated that there really is no relevant information missing.

Mr. Speaker, we were given 2,000 pages yesterday and we were told by the government House leader that there was no relevant information missing. We got an answer today from another minister during Question Period that there were more documents to come.

I would simply ask this: Does the government have another package of information that is coming on Westray? If so, when are we going to get it?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we are getting into debate here. The hon. member should have completed my comments from yesterday where I said that "the total documentation would be several feet high and require a forklift". In fact, there is no attempt to keep anything inaccessible to him or anybody else. They will be made available in the library room at Industry, Science and Technology.

The minister of state for small businesses said today that if there is a line up for certain pieces of documentation in the library, we will certainly table those so that they will be accessible rather than forcing everybody to go over there. But the object is to have—

Mr. Murphy: You didn't mention the library.

Mr. Andre: I wish the hon. member would do me the courtesy of accepting what I am saying and not interrupting me and not questioning my motives, which is so much his habit. The reality is that all of the relevant information will be made available.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to impugn the motives of the government House leader, but I do want to inform him of the procedure which was set up by the minister of state for small businesses for obtaining the documents, particularly the ones he refers to as being seven-feet high.

Yesterday members of my caucus who went to try and get those documents found that copies were made available to media representatives when, in fact, our colleagues and our research people had to read the documents and thereafter request a Xeroxed copy of the information that they were looking for.

I am not suggesting that there is a double standard here. But I am wondering if the minister could take under advisement my suggestion that this matter be looked at and perhaps a way found in which to expedite the relinquishing of that information so that it is made available, not just to representatives of the media. Because this is a major issue affecting the country, we think that it ought to be made available quickly and promptly to all members of Parliament.

I mention that in the spirit of trying to get all of the information.

Mr. Andre: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, that is the intent. What might have happened is that a number of members of the media had put in access to information requests. As you know, in that regard there is a cost associated. The applicant pays for the duplicating costs and so on. There is no intent to try and put obstacles. On the other hand, there is a very real concern that we may be saddled with several hundred thousand dollars worth of bills for duplication and so on if it is thrown wide open. I can assure the hon. member that I will communicate the facts he just informed me of and see what we can do to make sure that the information is accessible.

Mr. Kindy: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would hear the Chair first.

The exchange that has taken place is, I hope, helpful. I have to remind the House that is getting well beyond a point of order.

Is the hon. member for Calgary Northeast on the same point?

Mr. Kindy: No.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member.

RECORDED DIVISIONS

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I wanted a clarification from you concerning the votes of June 3, in particular vote 150. The question is of pairing. I see that some members were paired with people who have died. This may be an error. It happens that Mr. Malepart is appearing as being paired with somebody.

The question of pairing as such concerns me because Erskine May, 21st edition, defines pairing as a "system that enables a member to absent himself or herself , and to agree with another member that he or she will be absent at the time of the vote. By this mutual agreement, a vote is neutralized on each side of a question, and the actual size of the majority is not affected".

I see that members on vote 150 are paired and have voted and are on the same side. I would like you to clarify for me and maybe for other members and for the public generally just how it works.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Deputy Speaker has addressed the House on this point. I will consider very carefully the intervention of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and report back to the House if that is appropriate. In any event I will be in touch with him.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-348, an act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill would be to establish a system that would enable the authorities to know the number and kinds of unrestricted firearms that are being acquired by Canadians after the coming into force of this act and to trace those firearms when they are subsequently disposed of, lost or stolen.

• (1210)

The police forces throughout this country and many, many groups in the community are asking for this kind of firearms registration system.

Mr. Speaker: Ms. Greene moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

GREEN SHIELD PREPAID SERVICES INC.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I call for unanimous consent of the House to move a motion:

> That notwithstanding Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill from Green Shield Prepaid Services Inc. presented on Monday, June 1, 1992, and reported by the Clerk of Petitions Tuesday, June 2, 1992, be deemed to have been filed within the required time limit and received by the House.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 50 people from right across this country.

The government is proposing to add to its GST by taxing the printed word. These citizens protest this move as much as they protest the GST. This is even worse. It strikes a blow at learning and the transfer of information.

I commend my colleague from St. Boniface for the efforts he has made in this area.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind hon. members that remarks at the presentation of a petition should be brief and should not get into the realm of debate.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 50 Canadian citizens asking Parliament to rescind the goods and services tax on books, magazines and newspapers.

In their petition they point out that the dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy. They also point out that prior to the goods and services tax, going right back to 1867, there has never been a tax on books in Canada. They ask that this tax be rescinded.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition today signed by many Canadians. It is a petition concerning the tax on reading. They indicate that since Confederation there had not been a tax on books, magazines and newspapers until as we know, this government brought in the GST on reading. They call upon Parliament to have this tax cancelled.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions that I wish to present this afternoon.

First is a petition from constituents from Ottawa South asking the Government of Canada to consult with the people of Canada by way of a national referendum on matters of constitutional amendment.

Presumably legislation adopted in this House yesterday will contribute to safisfying the request of these petitions.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition, signed by residents of the riding of Ottawa South, who call upon Parliament to consider the possibility of reinstating the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Your petitioners deplore the fact that the government has abolished the Court Challenges Program.

CANADIAN OLYMPIC TEAM COLOURS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition signed by a great number of people from Mississauga objecting to the purple and white trim on the Canadian colours worn in the Olympics last winter in France and praying that the government makes sure that Canada's team be represented in the Canadian colours of red and white in Spain this summer.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from many people from the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta reminding this government that since Confederation we have never taxed books. They are begging and humbly asking to reaffirm this historic principle embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by returning the zero rate in GST legislation.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from many Canadians submitted to me. It states: "Don't tax books, don't tax reading. It is a bad policy, bad for business and it is bad government. It is contradictory, completely so, to our fundamental democratic principles. Books and reading materials have never been taxed in this country." The petitioners ask that it be abolished and be abolished now.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I continue to receive petitions from Canadians who are asking the government to reconsider its position on the Court Challenges Program and pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the opportunity to present these petitions to the House.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by residents of St. Catharines asking for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by over 700 Canadians from British Columbia, Alberta, and various municipalities in Ontario including Oshawa, Mississauga, Orillia, Pickering and Barrie.

The petition articulates the sorrow, pain and loss on the death of Helen Groat, a victim of violence. They note the increase in murder and manslaughter by individuals on early release.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to restrict the leniency and the issue of day passes and early release so that all of us may be better protected.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present two identical petitions with a total of 729 names, signed by constituents from my riding of Okanagan Centre, requesting the Government of Canada conduct a binding referendum on all constitutional amendments.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. One is that the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and now proposes to include them in the GST, in fact it has imposed it.

The undersigned 100 petitioners from across Canada humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by returning the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

LIFETIME CAPITAL GAINS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): The second petition is from 41 Nepean petitioners with regard to the recent budget, where the government eliminated the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption on real estate purchased after February 1992. These people again call upon Parliament to reinstate the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption as it certainly affects people of the middle class and their savings.

CROATIA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of the Croatian community of Thunder Bay whereby they implore the government to keep using whatever means are possible in order to bring some peace and harmony to their troubled homelands.

• (1220)

TAXATION

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present to the House today, the first being from Canadians from the province of Manitoba.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Income Tax Act such that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need, irrespective of child care choice.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by residents of Cornwall and other eastern Ontario communities in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers and I am sure I could add, regrettably, of others since.

Therefore, the petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and that it amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker the third petition again is signed by residents of Cornwall.

The petitioners call upon government to recognize that a referendum of the people be binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker finally, I have a petition signed by Canadians from the province of Nova Scotia.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have eight petitions with the names of 326 people from communities throughout Okanagan—Shuswap. The petitioners are from Armstrong, Vernon, Falkland, Kamloops even, Enderby, Lumby and Salmon Arm.

They are concerned about the plans to divert a portion of the North Thompson and to sell that water to the California market. They are asking the government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh waters to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A and to state that Canadian waters are not for sale.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): On another issue, I have a petition signed by a number of residents from the Vernon area in the Okanagan—Shuswap asking the government to hold a referendum upon the constitutional amendments as proposed by the government.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 293 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 293—Mr. Milliken:

What were the production and publication costs of the government's report entitled "The State of Canada's Environment"?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Production and publication costs for The State of Canada's Environment and accompanying highlights document and brochure amount to $1.5 million over a four-year period. This amount includes design, editing, typesetting, printing in both official languages, contracts for non-goverment authors, as well as nearly 100 external peer reviewers.

The report is being sold and distributed by the Canada Communication Group, which comes under the Department of Supply and Services Canada. The sale price is $29.95 plus shipping and taxes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 228 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 228 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 228—Mr. Boudria:

Which government department and agencies are currently developing computerized information systems and for each project not yet operating as intended, what was the original completion date, the revised completion date, the original cost estimate, the actual expenditures so far, and the revised cost estimate?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lee (p. 11449).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are seven minutes remaining in questions and comments to the hon. member for Ontario. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood had the floor.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, just a short preamble of my comments before we went into Question Period.

I indicated parts of the member's speech where I quite frankly agreed with some of the statements he had made.

As I pointed out, we are not here just to assist those who are advantaged. We are also challenged and it is our primary responsibility on this side of the House to speak for those people who are going through difficult times in all communities across Canada where there are people unemployed.

There is room for the Government of Canada to do more work with the 1.7 million entrepreneurs in this country. The greatest hope for job creation lies within that sector of the economy. I believe that with low interest rates and low inflation, it improves their position to participate in bringing people off the welfare and unemployment insurance rolls.

This is what I would like to ask the member. Does he not share the view of many that there is a real problem with confidence in that particular sector of our economy, namely the small and medium-sized entrepreneur? We are always being challenged here to present ideas. Does he not think that it would be a good idea to review the standing committee that put forward employment opportunities for the 1980s? This report was produced in 1982, I believe. The Minister of State for Finance and Privatization was part of that committee. There are 186 ideas within this report that the government could review or pick and choose. They are all ideas on how to put Canadians back to work.

What is wrong with reviewing that? What is wrong with taking some of these ideas and using them to lever the entrepreneurship of this country so that they can be motivated to take a chance on the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work? If each company hired one person in the next 60 days we would have a much better economy on our hands and we would reduce that $35 billion to $40 billion draw which is all taxpayers' money. It would even give us some opportunity or option to reduce taxes.

Why does the government not see if it can use that force to put Canadians back to work?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the questions from the member for Broadview—Greenwood.

The member is certainly correct in talking about low inflation and low interest rates being of benefit to the small business community and the entrepreneur. He should also of course agree that low inflation and low interest rates are also significant benefits to the unemployed and those on fixed incomes, whether they are senior citizens or others. Inflation is the worse curse that they face. There are some real positive things and I think the member has acknowledged some of that in his comments.

I am sorry I am not personally familiar with this 1982 report. I guess the report that the member refers to talks about many opportunities. From 1982 to 1992, if I heard the minister correctly today, there are over 2 million more people employed in the work force. That is not to say that we should be satisfied at that level. I am sure that specific ideas could come out of that. This could be combined with some of the ideas that are in the budget this year such as improvements to accessing funds for small businesses and the re-regulation of the financial industry to allow entrepreneurs access to funds. There are many things that can be done.

In conjunction with the member, I look forward to the government coming forward and saying: "Look at item number 10 in that proposal and let's do it". It could also be number 11 or number 12. I suspect that many of them have already been implemented.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ontario in his speech this morning criticized the remarks of my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River who pointed out that the policies of this Conservative government had forced tax increases on the municipalities and the provinces. The hon. member for Ontario said that if municipalities had increased taxes then that was their doing and we should condemn them and not the federal government.

I want to ask the hon. member this. Does he not realize that when his government, the Conservative government, cut unemployment insurance benefits, as it did a few years ago in Bill C-21, and when it made it more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance and when it shortened the benefit period and made other cuts, that it was in fact shifting the burden of the unemployed to a great extent to the municipalities in Ontario and to the province? If you have a large number of people who are unemployed, and they do not have unemployment insurance, there is no place else they can go to keep them alive but to the welfare system. The welfare system is financed in Ontario by the municipalities with the help of the province. Either the member did not know what he was voting for when he voted for Bill C-21 a few years ago or he did it and is now concealing the fact. The fact of the matters is that thousands of people who would have been eligible for unemployment insurance and covered by the federal program are not now covered by that federal program. Since we do not believe in letting people starve to death the only recourse for those people is to go to the municipalities.

I was on the committee that studied that bill. We went to Sudbury, Ottawa, and Toronto. Every municipality said: "Do not do that because you are going to increase our tax burden. You are going to put a big burden on us to take care of the unemployed".

I ask the hon. member how he can say that the policies of his government were not responsible for that enormous shift to those municipalities in Ontario for the unemployed? Nobody else can take care of them if they do not have unemployment insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has one minute to answer that question.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I could use the whole day.

The fact of the matter is that in the unemployment insurance scheme the higher the unemployment insurance rate in a particular region, the higher the benefit time available to individuals. Throughout Ontario there are tremendous programs through unemployment insurance. These include many training funds which help keep people off the welfare rolls.

It was not the federal government that increased the rate of payment to welfare recipients by 28 per cent. I should point out, contrary to what the member says, that it is the federal government that helps fund the program with 50 per cent of the dollars. It is the provincial government that spends it willy-nilly as though there are no controls required.

There is a substantial difference in outlook between me and the member. I guess I would take our approach as being a far more constructive approach to the issue of taxation in Ontario.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I commend him and his caucus for putting forward this motion.

The motion is:

> That this House condemns the government for its negligence toward the worst social and economic difficulties faced by residents of Ontario in modern times.

We all know the signs of trouble in Ontario, as well as in other parts of this country. Some previous speakers have given some of the statistics on the matter. Some speakers following me from all sides will quote statistics. Therefore, I do not wish to go heavily into the statistics of the trouble signs. The main one is the increase in unemployed as a percentage to 11.2 per cent. This is one of the very highest rates that we have had in my lifetime since I was a boy during the Depression.

Worse than that, factories have been closed and even dismantled at twice the rate they were during the last recession in 1981-82. Those jobs are not going to return if good times—as they are called—return. They are gone. The factories are gone. They have been dismantled. There is a little bit of employment among some of my friends in the millwright union for dismantling factories, but it is not what they would rather do. They would rather be building factories.

In Toronto, on College Street where I live, there are homeless and there are beggars. People come to my office who have been quite demoralized by experiencing the downturn in the economy as it has affected them, their families and their friends.

We have seen a youth riot in Toronto. We have seen gang fights and general signs of considerably demoralized youth. This includes the drop-out rate in the high schools.

There are some things that can be done, even by the provincial government, which the Ontario government is trying to do. It has borrowed money to restart some jobs. For example, there is highway construction and the building of 20,000 units of non-profit housing. The president of local 183 told me a couple of weeks ago how pleased he is that at least 5,000 of the 12,000 members of his union are working.

He is very pleased to see 50 construction cranes around the city. He says that if it were not for the non-profit housing program of the Ontario government hardly any of that would be happening.

There are 20,000 day care spaces to be opened under the government's program. The government has also taken a risk, a well considered one and I hope it will be a successful one, to prevent the Algoma Steel mill in Sault Ste. Marie from closing. When the crisis broke the provincial government moved in quickly and organized a task force including all stakeholders: the community, the union, the company, the banks, the provincial government and the federal government.

I must commend the federal government because, although it delayed long enough to cause considerable worry, it nevertheless joined with the Ontario government in a program to subsidize older workers' early retirement so that the people of Sault Ste. Marie do not lose all their young men and women by forcing them to leave Sault Ste. Marie to find work.

However, I do not want to dwell on the remedial programs that may be used, that may not be used, that should be used and so on. I want to deal with a large fundamental problem that needs federal action, which is the impact of the free trade agreement and of the proposed North American free trade agreement in terms of destroying jobs.

The federal government must cancel the existing agreement and cease negotiations on the present North American agreement until it can be fundamentally reorganized along different lines so that it does not put all the burden of change on working people.

I want to quote from a recent report of the city of Toronto's economic development committee to the city council on the—

An hon. member: Communist.

Mr. Heap: The hon. gentleman across calls Mayor Rowlands and various other people communists. I will leave it to him to sort it out with them.

This is a report of the city of Toronto. It will be considered in a couple of weeks at a meeting of the city's committee on this issue. It concerns the impact of trade liberalization on the city of Toronto.

There is not enough time to go through the whole report because it is a very detailed report based on many other documentary surveys. For example, it points out that there has been a great shift of head offices from Ontario to the United States. Pillsbury has moved and Avis has terminated 16 of its head office positions. Head offices in the city of Toronto experienced a 16.2 per cent drop in employment from 1989, following the free trade agreement, to 1991, a loss of 7,254 jobs. This is happening in the head offices of our country.

Another segment of industry that has been very hard hit is the food processing industry. There is a great deal of food processing in and close to the city of Toronto and metro Toronto, though not as much as there was. In the period from 1989 to 1991 the food processing industry lost 21.4 per cent of its jobs in the city of Toronto and 8.6 per cent in metropolitan Toronto as a whole.

Many of those industries moved to the United States, partly as a consequence of a wave of mergers and American takeovers of industries like UNICO which then either shut them down or seriously reduced them.

The Ontario Food Processors' Association which hopefully supported the free trade agreement in 1988 is now pointing out that although the federal government promised transitional assistance—it was recognized there would have to be transitions in the industry and the federal government promised transitional assistance to those industries negatively affected— this assistance has not been forthcoming, at least not so far as the association is concerned.

The United Food and Commercial Workers Union is of the opinion that the free trade agreement has not presented the industry with the open markets of the United States that were promised. This is widely understood. It has even been acknowledged by some of the people who helped to negotiate the agreement, such as Mr. Ritchie, that the Americans have not kept their side of the bargain and it looks as if they are going to be less willing to keep their side of the bargain. This has had a very serious effect on this industry.

The union also wants to know what has happened to the promised restructuring and retraining assistance that was promised by the Prime Minister during the last election.

One of the sections of the city planning department, the Workers' Information and Action Centre, has pointed out that Kellogg shut down its Etobicoke plant in June 1991 laying off 380 workers. VS Services of Toronto announced in its annual meeting in February that 1991 was the worst year for the food processing industry in its history. It cited the effect of the free trade agreement on closings as one of the causes.

Nobody pretends there has not been a recession around the world. However, the rate of job loss in manufacturing in Canada has been 23 per cent over the last three years and the rate of job loss in the United States for the same period has been only 6 per cent. We have lost jobs at four times the rate of the United States.

Mr. McDermid: If you want to know why read the Conference Board report.

Mr. Heap: That is largely because of American take-overs and American ownership, and their preference for shutting down plants, such as Inglis in my riding.

An hon. member: Read the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be an opportunity to ask the hon. member questions after his speech. I would like to hear it and I hope other members will give him the opportunity.

Mr. Heap: In the film, video, and audio industry from 1989 to 1991 there was a 7.7 per cent drop in employment in the city of Toronto and a 3.6 per cent drop in metro as a whole.

In the radio and TV stations there was an 18.4 per cent drop from 1989 to 1991 in Toronto, and a 9.8 per cent drop in metro as a whole. There are many industries that are not listed here. Only a few of the key ones were picked for emphasis.

In the publishing industry other than newspaper publishing, newspapers seem to have done well, there was an 11 per cent drop in employment from 1989 to 1991 in the city of Toronto and 5.5 per cent in metro as a whole. Obviously the city of Toronto, being the centre of many of these industries, has felt a greater impact than metro as a whole.

The Canadian Printing Industry Association has estimated that 3,000 jobs were lost across Canada which were directly attributable to the free trade agreement. It maintains that the industry's current unemployment rate in metro is 14 per cent following a loss of 3,700 jobs. It also points out that the annual trade deficit in printed products has jumped by 214 per cent since 1989. That is a very big jump in the trade deficit in print between Canada and the United States over two years, to the disadvantage of Canada.

It went from $106 million to $331 million and it expects that with an annual growth rate this deficit will reach $485 million by the end of this year. This is the industry association speaking.

It also points out that another way in which government policies have hit this industry is the unexpected end of postal subsidies and the imposition of the goods and services tax on magazine publishers. These actions together increased the publishers' mailing costs by 40 per cent.

Magazine revenue dropped in 1991, and of course the result of that is staff reductions.

There was a study by Price Waterhouse & Company in 1991 that showed that Canadian book publishers have dropped an average of 6 per cent each year since the free trade agreement and that four publishers have gone bankrupt.

There was also a study by Employment and Immigration Canada that suggests that the economic picture of this sector would be further eroded under the proposed North American free trade agreement. It says that Canadian printing plants are expected to lose further market share to American competition, and says that investment may even be diverted to Mexico.

The industry which has lost the most has been the fashion, or garment, industry. It is called both. It dropped from 1989 to 1991 by 45.8 per cent. It lost almost half its employees in the city of Toronto. In metropolitan Toronto it lost 27 per cent. That is a very serious drop.

Many of these workers who live in Spadina are recent immigrants with origins in China, Portugal, or the West Indies who have not been able to find other work. When their place of employment closes they go to other places and they are not open, not hiring, or they are closing.

When I talked with some of the industrialists last year they blamed it on the goods and services tax, the high dollar that was hindering Canadian producers from getting the benefit of the tariff reductions, and on the high interest rate and the unwillingness of banks to lend to their industry at all.

One of them has moved his operation from Toronto, Ontario to Buffalo because he is getting a subsidy of $10,000 per job, as well as other subsidies from the state of New York, to move there to produce his jackets and sell them in Canada and in the United States.

Another one has taken to sourcing many of his dresses that he manufactures in Mexico or in Taiwan through the United States. He has cut his work force from about 100 to about 35, just to take account of small shifts in the demand.

These are people who need retraining, and as far as I can find out from them, the unions and the employers concerned, almost none of them have been able to get effective retraining.

The Canadian Apparel Manufacturing Association called 1991 one of the worst years on record for the Canadian apparel industry. This is its generalization. It applies much more widely than to just Toronto. According to the Apparel Manufacturers and Marketing Association of Ontario, the Consumer and Corporate Affairs figures show that the goods and services tax is having a disproportionately large impact on clothing prices in Canada.

The figures show that the GST added 1.1 per cent to the over all consumer price index. However, for clothing, footwear, and accessories the GST boosted the price by 4 per cent for men's clothing, 5.5 per cent for women, 5.1 per cent for girls, and 6 per cent for boys. It has hit this industry quite hard.

This is not directly a result of the free trade agreement, but it is related to the associated policies of this government.

It also points out that in 1991 the value of imports from the United States grew by 18 per cent while retail sales of Canadian-made apparel shrank by 13.4 per cent. This relates to the introduction of American-owned chain stores and supplies from American sources, or from overseas sources through the United States, in good part.

• (1250)

Part of the effect of the destruction of almost half of the jobs in Toronto in the garment industry, which we have had for over a century is a great increase of home work. People, nearly all of them women, are pressured by poverty to take work home rather than working in a factory, which they would prefer. The wages are often around $2 an hour for piece work. This is even with their children sometimes helping and even with providing their own sewing machine, light and power and so on. What they can earn often does not go much above $2 an hour. This is vastly below anybody's concept of a minimum wage.

There are an estimated 2,000 of these home workers in the city of Toronto and they are definitely among the extreme working poor.

What we need is a basic re-examination of what has been done to the Canadian economy by the free trade agreement, by the goods and services tax and by the high interest rates. These rates have now come down, but during the two years following the free trade agreement, they added to the problems. There is also the high Canadian dollar which lost markets in the United States that might have been gained by the tariff reduction.

We believe the government should reconsider this and seriously consider giving notice to cancel the free trade agreement. It should break off negotiations for the North American free trade agreement and introduce policies that would help to revive the Canadian manufacturing industry under independent Canadian ownership.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member had taken a look at the March trade figures where we had the largest trade surplus ever in our history. It was $12.8 billion. Of that $12.8 billion, $9.8 billion went to the United States—those terrible Americans—with the free trade agreement. Again, this was a record export to the United States. Where does he get the idea that the trade agreement is somehow destroying us?

He mentions the fact that the duties are less for goods and garments going to the United States. They are less. He mentions the fact that there are competitive problems. That is true. However, manufacturing in Canada increased in productivity by 1 per cent last year and 4 per cent so far this year. The Wood Gundy report says it will increase by at least 8 per cent this year and 12 per cent next year. We only increased the number of manufacturing jobs in the months of April and May by 40,000. This is the largest increase of any element in unemployment. Manufacturing is all of a sudden disappearing, but jobs are increasing.

I am wondering whether the member for Trinity—Spadina has been there too long and has not been out looking at what is really happening in the world and Canada. We are in a restructuring. We are in a global recession, yes, but we are in an industrial restructuring where we have improved the efficiency of the economy with the goods and services tax. We have improved the efficiency of the economy with our free trade agreement and with our trade agreements generally. We have improved efficiency and business confidence. The Conference Board of Canada suggests that business confidence is up 16.1 per cent.

Where has he been? There may be problems, but part of those problems are NDP problems in the province of Ontario where legislation introduced yesterday would make it the roughest, toughest labour legislation in all of North America.

Mr. Mills: The world.

Mr. Blenkarn: The world. Here is the member for Trinity—Spadina, a member of the New Democratic Party, who ought to turn his heat on Queen's Park. He should make sure that Queen's Park withdraws that stupid legislation and lets Canada build, grow and trade again.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, there have been quite a few statements and very few questions, but I can take some of the statements as implied questions.

As for the last one about the Labour Relations Act, it is not true that it is harsher than in other jurisdictions. In fact, in many ways, it is less harsh, even as proposed, than certain parts of legislation in other parts of Canada such as Quebec and, in general, in the countries of Europe which are doing better economically, or at least as well as North America. They have a much stronger labour movement and they have a much stronger recognition of the obligations of employers to their workers.

It has been recognized, even by Bill L'Heureux who is the president of Hees Inc. that there has to be a balance of co-operation. He has commended the Premier of Ontario and his government for their conduct toward industry. He is not a nobody. He represents a great deal of investment. The way he spoke publicly on this matter indicates that he sees good prospects of co-operation between Ontario investors and the Ontario government in the creation of jobs.

The hon. member may want to disagree with Mr. L'Heureux. He is free to get in touch with Mr. L'Heureux and give him his views. Perhaps he will learn something from Mr. L'Heureux.

On the matter of the recent trade surge, it remains to be seen how that translates into the employment and well-being of people in Canada. Unemployment in Ontario increased by 17,000 in the month of May. It has often happened that the over-all wealth of a country, in the usual way of measuring it, increases, but it does not get distributed where it is needed which is to the majority of the people. If the majority of the people do not have the means to feed their children well, if they have to go to food banks—as many have to in Toronto—and if they do not have the means to get their children educated, then the economy will suffer. I think these are things that are being overlooked by the government of this country.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to the speech and the comments by the hon. member for Mississauga. I have a small comment to make.

I have a friend who is a big developer in Mississauga. I had occasion to talk to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope the hon. member would direct his questions to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina as he was the one who was speaking.

Mr. Kindy: I had a discussion with this friend and he told me that even though he was strong financially and he built 180 houses, he could not sell 20 because there is a depression in Toronto. Here is a person who has been involved in development for a long time and he feels that Canada is moving toward a depression.

Would you like to comment about it?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, it is a very general question, but I am not sure I would say we are moving toward a depression.

A couple of weeks ago I heard somebody suggest on the radio that Canada had slipped back into the recession. I was startled because I never noticed that we left the recession. It must have happened at three o'clock in the morning when I was asleep.

I would say that we are in a depression. I hear these rosy predictions by the members opposite and the Minister of Finance, but they are being proven false by experience. I think we are in something like the 1930s again. It is something we have not had for 50 years.

• (1300)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today about the economic crisis facing Ontario and facing my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk. Unfortunately we have an NDP government that has been running this province. As some hon. members across the way said, it has brought in some drastic legislation which I think is ill-timed and will ill-equip Ontario to compete globally and internationally in the years to come.

Ontario is at an economic crossroads. As a province and a country we face many challenges ahead. We all know that our economy is undergoing extensive restructuring as world economies become increasingly integrated. We see the effects around us every day and the reality is that we cannot compete.

As the same time, we are told by this government that we must become more competitive. However, this is without any real suggestions as to how we can go about doing this. Traditionally, we have placed heavy emphasis on our natural resources. In fact, our resource industries have been the cornerstone of our economy. We remain the leader of all industrialized countries in exporting unprocessed natural resources.

However, in recent years there has been a downturn in resource-based industries and Canada faces increasing competition from less-developed countries. We have yet, as a country or a province, to seriously deal with this situation.

The manufacturing sector, which is also an integral part of Ontario's economy, is in decline as well. This has led many people to argue that Canada, specifically Ontario, is in the process of deindustrializing. Hundreds of thousands of manufacturing jobs, mostly in Ontario, have been lost since 1988 as a result of companies closing down or moving south of the border.

Most Canadians, I would suggest, blame free trade. Most would also blame the economic policies of this government for the downturn in our economy. Although I cannot disagree with them, I would also suggest that it is not only the fiscal and economic policies of the government, but it has been a lack of leadership, not only at the federal level but at the provincial levels, that prevents provinces across this country from really addressing the serious problem of not having enough well-trained people able to compete in this ever-changing global climate.

Whatever the case, there was a promise made by this government during the free trade agreement debate when it said it would bring in adjustment programs. It would bring in the best adjustment programs in the world. We have yet to see this happen. There are increasingly long line-ups of people who want and desperately need training. It is in my area and I am sure it is the same in the areas of all hon. members.

The people of this country, in my province and riding I would suggest, are far ahead of members in this House in knowing specifically that they are going to need training and better and more skills in order to compete. What they need from us is the dedication and the drive from members of Parliament within this Chamber in order to provide the programs whereby they can be trained.

Like many of my colleagues on both sides of the House, I understand the importance of becoming more competitive. I know that our economy is changing and that Canadian industry as a result has to adapt. I realize that we cannot turn back the clock, but we must move forward. The protectionist mindset of many Canadians, indeed of people on all sides of this House, must change. I understand these things are a fact. I understand that the government does have to play a role in restructuring our economy and I would suggest that it has been lacking in that role.

We have been told by the government that we need to become a more diversified economy and that we must become more competitive in the areas of manufacturing, science and technology, research and development and education. The studies are many as to how we can do this. There has just been a lack of any commitment by governments over the last few years on directions in which we can take these studies and put them into action.

I am not talking about writing a blank cheque to welfare recipients. I am talking about investing in our future, investing in Canadians and investing in our country.

We need to invest in machinery, equipment and new technologies. We need to invest in infrastructure. We just cannot sit back and expect to survive. We need to control this globalization that seems to be affecting all parts of the world. As a country we need to take hold of that and make sure globalization does not control us but that in fact we control globalization.

I would suggest to hon. members sitting across that individual Canadians cannot do that themselves. It is going to take a role of government in helping individual Canadians to grab control of this globalization and to work it on behalf of Canada. We need to get Canada and we need to get Canadians working again.

Unemployment is too high. I do not care what figures are thrown out. I know Statistics Canada threw out some in the last few days. They are just simply too high. We have to address that problem first and foremost.

I would suggest that my leader has developed and put forward reasonable ways in which we can help deal with that problem. Let us get these people working first. Let us get them paying taxes, and then let us get them into the proper skills training they need.

Along with the resource based industries and manufacturing, Ontario also has an agricultural industry which is facing crisis. It really threatens the whole infrastructure of Ontario's small rural communities. Our agricultural industry remains one of the most important resource based industries we have.

As I have said before and I will continue to say—I know other hon. members on both sides of the House have said it too—in order for a country to be secure and to be proud, as you have said many times, Mr. Speaker, we must make sure our agricultural industry is the cornerstone of our economy.

I believe the sovereignty of our country is inextricably linked to us sustaining a food industry within Canada. I hate to say this—and I know you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, because in your area it is the same—small town Ontario is closing down. A lot of these places are closing down as a direct result of the decline in our agricultural industries.

Our farmers are the most productive farmers in the world, and nobody can argue that. Farmers provide Canadian consumers with the highest quality of food in the world. We have higher qualities of food than anywhere else and they do it at reasonable prices too.

I suggest to those Canadians who go across the border thinking they are getting a great deal on food that they are not. In fact they are bringing back food that is not as high quality or as high standards as we have in Canada.

No other country in the world can make this claim. The future of the family farm or a rural life is not threatened because Canadian farmers are inefficient or because of competitiveness and globalization. Instead agriculture is in jeopardy because of international trading problems, international trading agreements. Although they are very important to Canada and to certain sectors of agriculture, they have no business interfering in our internal market programs.

The government must become more sensitive to the difficulties facing our farmers instead of constantly blaming other countries for our problems. We must beat them at their own game and we must be able to compete with them internationally. We must invest in our farmers.

As a result of the situation facing our farming communities and as a result of globalization, my community of Haldimand—Norfolk is at an economic crossroads. We are really facing an economic crisis in this country which I believe threatens our prosperity for both today and tomorrow.

As a province and as a country we can move ahead, but I would suggest very seriously that the government has to take some responsibility and to invest in Canadians.

• (1310)

I know they will say over there that they are spending billions of dollars, but I believe we have to be more focused in where we spend that money. I would suggest the first place to start is by putting our unemployed people back to work in some sort of program and to help with training and retraining them.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his speech. It was a positive speech. It was well focused. It hit exactly on the problems and some of the solutions that have to take place. In all fairness I think he would admit, if he had stopped to think about it, that the budget of the Minister of Finance that came down in February emphasized helping businesses streamline and modernize.

He talked about new equipment and streamlining. One of the interesting or encouraging things about the increase in imports into Canada that we have seen—and we have seen an increase in exports as well and we still have a trade surplus there—is that the increase has been in new and modern equipment coming into Canada to streamline. We are seeing it everywhere.

I will be talking in my remarks this afternoon about the riding of my friend. One of the companies I had the pleasure of touring with him in his riding, in Stratford, was the FAG Bearing Company. It is not only bringing in modern equipment. It is designing it and building it for its own use. It is very exciting and it is happening here in Canada.

I agree with him. We increased the capital cost allowance in the budget to allow companies to write off that equipment quicker. We cut their taxes to encourage them to establish now, to create jobs and to streamline.

In all fairness, the government is doing that and I think that is fine.

I heard the member say that we should get people jobs first and then train them. That is a problem, because the jobs that are available need specially trained persons to fill them. It is kind of what comes first, the chicken or the egg? I listened to him and I heard what he was saying. I do not disagree. I would much rather have people working now, but the jobs that are available require the special training and therefore we have to concentrate on training.

I am, very pleased the hon. member would commend the Minister of Employment and Immigration for adjusting and coming up with another $150 million for training because of the high unemployment in the country today and the need for that retraining.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I agree with a number of the directions in which the minister went in that budget. Unfortunately what I do not agree with in what he did was where he was getting the money.

I understand his problems with the debt and I understand the importance of bringing the debt down, but unfortunately he took money from one important area and put into another important area without really reinvesting new moneys in these areas. I believe very strongly that we need to invest new moneys. We could get these new moneys by investing in Canadians, putting them back to work and thereby, once they are back to work, collecting taxes.

I would start that by following the suggestion of our leader for an infrastructure program. We need to invest the billions of dollars it will take, quite frankly, because we will get a double investment back from the provinces. Who is going to win? It will not be the provinces. The federal government will win on this because we are the ones who are going to get back all the taxes. It would not take a lot of money out of our operating budgets now to do that.

Another area on which I disagree with the government is the whole sense of co-operation between Ottawa and especially my province of Ontario. I see this government going in one direction and saying that we have to cut the debt and we want to put emphasis on this area and the provincial government going in a completely different direction. It does not work for Canadians.

We have to put our political differences aside and co-operate both federally and provincially in sending a strong signal to Canadians that we will help them in these areas and in training.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to add my words in my support of the motion presently before this House.

I have been asked by my colleagues to represent the interests of northern Ontario in this debate. I thank them very much for giving me the opportunity to do so.

The economy of northern Ontario is a microcosm of the economy of Canada. We in the north depend economically on our resource based industries: mining, softwood lumber, newsprint, container board and fine paper. We manufacture in the north among other products the finest commuter rail cars in the world.

Interwoven throughout this entire process is a need for a well maintained transportation facility, especially a viable seaport. We have the largest grain storage and cleaning facilities in the world and the most qualified work force in Canada. We are capable, if called upon, to handle over 20 million tonnes of wheat a year.

In my judgment I feel it is an honour that we in the north are referred to as the hewers of wood, the drawers of water and the miners of metal. We take great pride in those things we produce from our forestry and our mining based sectors when we look at how much they add to the total economy of not only the province of Ontario but also the Government of Canada.

The economic history I have just outlined is what I consider to be the wealth of Canada. The resource based industries in Ontario and in all of Canada when we include the energy from the west are what has propelled Canada to its present economic status and are the envy of every country in the world.

Let me caution that although we talk about northern Ontario because of our resource based industries are located there does not mean that the rest of this great province of ours, nor the rest of this great country of ours, does not benefit from what we do directly in northern Ontario.

Over 17,000 jobs in the city of Toronto are created as a result of the forest industry alone. Many thousands of jobs in the city of Toronto are created as a direct result of the mining industry.

Thousands and thousands of jobs are created throughout southwestern Ontario because of the container board we produce, container board that is used in the manufacturing process from everything from the cartoning of beer, to furniture, to the harvesting of tomatoes.

Eventually these resource based wages find their way into every grocery store, every clothing store, every drug store, every automobile dealership, and particularly into areas of our province where automobiles are manufactured. I am thinking of Brampton, Windsor, St. Catharines and Oakville.

With the wealth we have in this country where have we gone wrong? Where have we gone astray? Why do we have over 11 per cent unemployment in this wonderful prosperous country of ours? Why do we lack the spirit of enterprise that I sense we once had in our country?

I get the feeling that there is a sense of fear within our country. I suspect there are three fundamental reasons we are experiencing this feeling of fear or apprehension in Canada today. Fundamentally it is the direction we are trying to go from the federal perspective, from the provincial perspective, and indeed because of banking policies.

The federal government has attempted in the years it has been in office to try to change the base of the Canadian economy. It abandoned resource based industries in Canada, the very foundation of our economic strengths. It tried, with all good intentions, to convert our economy which is based on our resources to more sophisticated endeavours.

As a result we look, for example, at the job training program. What we are trying to do now is take the employees who have lost their jobs, both men and women, and retrain them to change the skills they have been able to develop over the years.

• (1320)

I think I have full agreement from all sides of the House that we have a work force in this country second to none when it comes to its skills that have been developed in mining, forestry, the growing of grain and in transportation routes.

We on this side of the House, and I am sure they do too, feel that we should be improving those skills so that we can be more competitive. In that way, we can keep our edge in the economic climate internationally rather than changing and trying to develop new skills.

In Ontario, which is the subject matter of what we have today, we have a provincial government that was not prepared to govern. It now faces the hard realities, as our friends have, of governing and can never in its wildest dreams deliver on the many promises that it made prior to that election in Ontario.

What it has done is what many governments do. We see what these people are doing on that side of the House. They are raising the expectations of the people of this country and of this province beyond what anybody can reasonably deliver.

Let me mention something else with respect to Ontario, that is the changes in the Labour Relations Act that were introduced just yesterday. Everyone seems to think that there is resentment toward these changes in the Labour Relations Act, and that resentment comes from the business community.

On the contrary. I take the position that those changes that are proposed in the Labour Relations Act affect very directly every working man and every working woman in the province of Ontario. What the government is doing through these changes is upsetting the very delicate balance that we have earned over the years in the very fragile institution of employer-employee relations.

In our labour and our management negotiations, it is attempting to upset this balance. By this very legislation, it has placed itself at every bargaining table in Ontario, a place absolutely no government should venture into. It cannot be the arbitrator of a decision-making process and also be a negotiator at the same time.

You will find that this legislation is non-operable. I am prepared to say at this time that it is ill timed. It is ill conceived. It will do more damage to the working men and the working women of this province than any other legislation that has been passed by every previous government. It upsets the very delicate balance of our labour relations enterprise which has been up to this time working the best it can.

Unfortunately, the banking policies in this country do nothing to help the revival of our economy. From where we sit in this House, Canadian banks have committed themselves to ventures on a transnational stage or in assisting non-Canadian companies in buying out Canadian enterprises, rather than emphasizing the need in every small community in this country where we have small banks to providing the wherewithal, the necessary capital to assist small business and small entrepreneurs to provide that necessary capital that they need.

There is no question that employment will only increase in Ontario from the initiative and from the efforts that small business people throughout this country place into that sector of our economy. Our Canadian banks just seem not to be interested in a policy of providing this service to the small entrepreneurs in this country.

There should be no mistake about the banking services in Canada. There is no mistake that it is simply a store. People go to get a service at a bank like they do at a drugstore. They rent money from the bank and they pay something back in the way of interest. There is nothing secretive about that business.

What is important is that if they are committed to providing a service for the small business entrepreneurs in this country, they should continue to do so rather than committing all of their resources to international corporations which really do not provide any jobs in this sector of our economy.

The policies to which I refer are just the initial. My time does not allow me to go into any greater depth. Let me say that what we plan to do on this side of the House will not affect our deficit and will not affect our debt inasmuch as that is a threshold in anything that we provide or propose. It must always be considered.

Our plan, the plan that I have emphasized here today, only requires the imagination of the people in this House. It requires the imagination of our citizens. It requires initiative that we all have. It requires that Canadians face the future with confidence. We cannot face a future in this country in fear. If we make those fundamental changes, our future, especially the future that we derive from northern Ontario and the rest of the resource-based industry in this country, will make us prosperous once more and make us understand that Canada is a country that anyone and everyone in the world wants to be.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I want to thank the hon. member for his speech. I think it was a very good speech and touched all the buttons.

In listening to him, my feeling is that he wants to be positive about things. He wants to talk positively about the country, positively about the situation and I could not agree with him more.

In my remarks to him a little later on I am going to touch on that. I am wondering if we do ourselves a disservice in this House of Commons when our entire Question Period is made up of the negatives, of the hammering away and trying to do one up on each other as to solutions, et cetera. I am wondering if that does not present to the Canadian public a very negative scenario which offers the media of course the opportunity to put the negative clips on television. When we see this type of thing, it does nothing but discourage Canadians about spending money or going out and searching for employment or whatever it may be.

I am wondering if there is not some way that we co-operatively could present a better picture to the Canadian people, not diminishing the problems we have. We do have problems. We have got serious problems, but I think we are all working on those. I think we have to present a far more positive picture to Canadians, by us, by Canadians.

We take a look at the United Nations saying we are the best country in the world in which to live, yet when we listen to what goes on here sometimes, we wonder if that is in fact the truth.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague very much for those remarks. I say that sincerely.

I am, as he is, troubled by the impression that the Canadian people may perceive as happening on the floor of the House because of the non-ability of some of us, perhaps being too partisan at times when the economy and the future of the country are at stake.

I will give the minister a small example of the parliamentary process that I think truly worked in the last two and a half weeks. It was with the Minister of Employment and Immigration. We were suffering some fairly severe consequences in Thunder Bay because of lay-offs and lack of retraining funds. I want to compliment the Minister of Employment and Immigration for the great assistance that he gave me in going through this process up to the announcement last night that $150 million was being allocated to the retraining and section 24 benefits in Canada, of which Thunder Bay will be a participant in honouring those commitments that had been made.

I do think the parliamentary process can always be improved if we approach the problems that are common to all Canadians, if we approach them with the assistance, the help and the desire to really make a difference.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have a quick question. I was wondering if the member felt that the changes in the financial administration type arrangements in Canada with the Bank Act, the Insurance Act and the Trust Companies Act allowing those companies all to do commercial lending would improve the access to money sufficiently to make money more available to small entrepreneurs and whether he really felt that there was a tightness of money or whether there was a situation where institutions were being rather credit careful.

It seems to me that there is a fairly loose money supply right now, interest rates as low as they are, but the problem may be the credit worthiness.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what was just said. I cannot comment on banking in other centres. I can only comment on what I see happening in the community of Thunder Bay—Nipigon that I represent. I notice there is a tendency for small entrepreneurs, tree farmers who employ 20 people, who come in visit and ask me questions. There is a designer by the name of John Mackett whose concept has met with tremendous success. I do not want to use any numbers, but you will know what kind of numbers we are talking about when banks will not afford the venture capital for this young person with ideas to expand. His working capital is being generated out of the use of his credit card. That is how little he needs.

• (1330)

When we have industrious young people in this country who want to get ahead and dedicate themselves to doing this type of thing, employing people and not being given the opportunity to do so, says to me that there is something lacking in our banking system in this country when we will not take a chance on people rather than looking at just a balance sheet.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, just a short question.

I agree with the member's assessment of the banking industry. Maybe this issue of trust companies we can return to a little later because I think there is some room to market that new act.

I want to ask the member a very specific question related to transportation and tourism. It seems to me that there is tremendous potential to reverse the flow of dollars that are going out of this country on tourism in other parts of the world. It seems to me in the north, not only northern Ontario but all across Canada, there is great potential to put people back to work and learn a skill that is not only short-term but long-term.

I wonder if the hon. member could say whether or not in his region that the transportation and tourism support allows that possibility for job growth to sort of take root or take place.

Mr. Comuzzi: I would just say that there are some developments going on in the north, but we need some additional developments.

Let me just say that we have the most magnificent shoreline along the north shore of Lake Superior right from Duluth, Minnesota in the United States through to Rossport. It goes by Red Rock and the port of Nipigon. That should be developed. It is the handsomest area on the whole of the Great Lakes and we should do something with it.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to respond to the motion before us today that was put forward by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

First of all I should start by pointing out some facts that are obvious to us sitting here in the Chamber today and debating this. I want to point out some facts about Ontario that not all people might realize. The population of Ontario is really approaching two-fifths of Canada's population. I guess 40 per cent of Canadians live in the province of Ontario.

In the way that we measure prosperity, Ontario has long been a have province. Ontario is considered not eligible to receive equalization payments because of its average per capita. It is based upon a formula that was agreed upon in 1977 for equalization payments. It is a measure that set out 32 ways a province can raise revenues or sources of raising revenues. When this was taken into consideration, Ontario, B.C. and Alberta were considered have provinces.

Most of the industry and most of the business centre of Canada is probably situated in Ontario. Ontario has long been "an engine of growth". We should not get into debate about that because when Ontario is successful, when Ontario is working and when Ontario is generating revenues and doing very well, it sure helps the rest of Canada. We have to see it in the context as a proportion.

At the same time, while I know the province is suffering, I also want to say that the problems that it is facing are also evident in other areas of Canada. Indeed, from coast to coast, we do have provinces and communities with similar situations of high unemployment.

One thing I have to say is that this particular issue we are discussing today is felt right across the country. It is more prevalent in Ontario because there are more people there.

Second, we Canadians have to pay our way. We really are not exempt from any world trends, I think the House realizes that. Some people see the economic conditions that have developed here as being in isolation to anything else around the world. We tend to stick our head in the sand. We feel that we are an isolated island, and that does not really help the situation.

What we must do in Canada is compete and thrive and go out there with the rest of the world. It is very important that we all look not just south of the border but at France, England, Europe, Germany, and Japan, right around the world, and see that a lot of people around the world are suffering from unemployment and a whole change in trade, because of globalization.

I would just like to make a remark on globalization. One of my colleagues across the way made a statement that we in Canada must control globalization. We do not control globalization at all. We are part of it. We work with GATT. We have the free trade agreement with our colleagues in the United States, who happen to be our biggest trading partners. We should be pleased that we have a free trade agreement so that we can work with them, and not be at loggerheads, to resolve difficult situations. We work with the 120 countries in GATT and all our trading partners to resolve difficult situations. We are not in isolation. We have to work in the broader world community.

Ontario is the business and industrial centre of our country. Some people think its happy state, its improved economy and growth during the 1980s should continue on and on. I really wish it would, and I am sure we all do. However, there comes a time when we do have peaks and valleys or ups and downs within the business sectors and the economy of the whole country. We have to stop and we have to restructure. That means governments must rethink positions. That means governments of the provinces as well as businesses and educational institutions.

The need to modernize or upgrade the infrastructure may apply to some sectors more than others. I think that is why Ontario at this time may need or may be asking for help and we may have to concentrate more of our efforts on upgrading this particular area. However, it must happen across all regions. We saw this in the 1980s with the recession, and we are seeing it again in the early 1990s. We must keep up with international competition.

Let us not be surprised in any way, shape or form that Ontario appears to be hurting more than any other province. I argue that is relative to the context of Canada as a whole. In the province I come from, Alberta, over the last three or four years we have lost thousands and thousands of jobs in the oil and gas industry. The whole of the petroleum industry is restructuring around the world. We have obviously moved away from that National Energy Program that the Liberals brought in. We have deregulated and we have gone to market prices. A lot depends on the world.

When oil and gas companies lay off thousands of employees the rigs do not work. As a matter of fact, in talking to CAODC, the Canadian Association for Oil Well Drilling Contractors, about 10 per cent of the drilling rigs are working. If the drilling rigs do not work the service companies do not work. That means the men and women who provide the infrastructure and the services to the rigs, such as the mud people—we utilize mud to keep pressure under control in the hole—and those who do fracking and testing are put out of work, as are the water-haulers, the welders, the corner store people, the man or woman who runs the motel. It causes a ripple effect right across the country. All areas of Canada have problems.

Let us return to the Macdonald commission of the mid-1980s. It foresaw a lot of this period of adaptation and adjustment that is needed. It was the royal commission that said we should set about making the changes needed in anticipation of increasing competitive pressures at the international level.

• (1340)

Part of that anticipation was the free trade deal and the current negotiations with the United States and Mexico. They are following along the same logic.

Such adjustments are not easy and they do not come without pain, but we need to adapt. We cannot choose any other route. To use a colloquial or trite phrase, the world does not owe us a living. We have to make our own way, and most Canadians indeed know that we have to earn our own way.

They want governments to create a fiscal environment in which there are fewer regulations and fewer bureaucratic nightmares and let the private industry get on with its job. Private industry is the area in this country that promotes the jobs and develops the wealth. Governments do not develop wealth. I have to agree with a lot of the comments made by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Let us turn now from the economic realities to matters that are more social and domestic in nature. It is sometimes very tempting for all of us here in the House to concentrate on economic issues at the expense of social issues. In fact, our government does have a really substantial record of achievement on the social side.

I was watching the news last night about the tragic developments reported in Martensville, Saskatchewan, which none of us accept. It was totally devastating to hear that. It was the present minister of energy, when he was Minister of National Health and Welfare, who appointed Mr. Rix Rogers to advise him on the problem of child sexual abuse.

I do not think there is one person in this House who did not see what I saw on television last night. It is totally unacceptable. Mr. Rogers presented a report some years ago called Reaching for Solutions. Not one person can do this alone. It is only by working together that we can resolve these issues.

Mr. Rogers' report was instrumental in leading to the 1991 renewal of the family violence initiative with its special focus on child abuse. In fact, the whole area of family abuse—abuse of women, abuse of children, and abuse of seniors—has become an area of major concern for us.

The Minister Responsible for the Status of Women appointed a special blue ribbon task force some months ago specifically to look into the area of violence against women, but also taking into consideration all violence. I look forward to that report which will be presented later this year.

I also want to draw members' attention to the 1987 drug strategy program. It had a similar impact. In 1987 we put forward a specific partnership with the provinces and the territorial governments, as well as non-government agencies, to review and come to grips with the fact that drug, alcohol and substance abuse is really at an epidemic level in this country. It concerns all of us in terms of the social problems.

To deal with substance abuse in these areas we need long-term commitments. It takes time to develop relevant and appropriate programs, not only for the urban areas but for rural areas. Our aboriginal peoples are in great need of help too.

Ontario is a full partner in that. There was success. If any members would care to read the proceedings from the standing committee on health and welfare the Minister of National Health and Welfare appeared before it about five weeks ago. He presented statistics and measurements on the success rate of the drug strategy program, and it was renewed.

I believe the figure is $270 million over four years. We will be working again with our provinces and with the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General and the minister of financial institutions to help us get to the bottom of the laundering of large sums of moneys from the sale of illegal drugs.

I also want to remark upon the needs of disabled people. This country has over three million disabled people. They are an important resource to this country.

Over the past four to six years we have worked our way toward more tax credits, more exemptions, and more ways to not only accept but also to make all Canadians realize they are a very important part. The International Year of the Disabled was a great starting point.

The federal government has assisted provincial governments and will continue to do so through de-institutionalization and also with independent living centres. In March 1992 there was a major conference that really focused on specific areas.

Let us take a look at senior citizens and what we have done to help them. Not long ago it was recognized not only here in the House but also across Canada that we have a very large aging population. Drastic measures are not the answer. We all have to work together and come forward with some measures that we all can live by.

We need senior independence programs and we introduced that in 1988. We are demonstrating ways we can get seniors to become and maintain their independence. The new Horizons Program that my colleague's party introduced in 1972 has proven to be extremely successful.

So all these examples I have cited are national issues with regard to social programs. They all require long-term commitments and it is something I know each and everyone of us wants to work toward.

I would also like to say we need flexibility. Obviously, if programs are extremely structured and they do not work there is very little area for manoeuvering and we have to be able to be flexible.

We are a diverse nation and with our aging population we have to look at it and come to some solutions. We cannot sit back and lament. Those challenges out there on the social side also have to be met with fiscal accountability. So while we must be fiscally accountable, and I think this is a major concern of all our constituents, we also have to be socially responsible.

The interesting area has to do with transfer payments. I will look mainly at the estimated program funding for health, education, as well as the Canada Assistance Plan.

In 1984 the federal government transferred $6.13 billion to the province of Ontario which was about $689 per capita. In 1992 we are transferring $9.924 billion and that is about $972 per capita. That is an increase of $3.7 billion or 6.2 per cent. Maybe it is not enough but working with regard to fiscal constraint is most important.

How do we get into this? I think it is most interesting. In fact, let us all come back to reality. In 1969 the government had a surplus of about $332 million. There was no deficit. There was a debt of about $18 billion. You can just watch or chart the economic development, and indeed, the spending of the government through the 1970s and early 1980s where it took us from a surplus of $332 million to a deficit of $38.5 billion. The debt went from $18 billion up to $206 billion.

Over the past eight years, we had to be fiscally responsible. We have been cutting back slowly and now this government today operates on program spending with a surplus. We have done a $29 billion turnaround and we operate with a surplus.

We have to service the debt. Out of every dollar of revenue 27 cents goes to service the debt. That is passive spending; it does no one any good.

We are paying for yesterday's programs and we are not investing in the future. Program spending is limited to 3 per cent this year. All net GST revenues and revenues from privatization are going to debt servicing and reduction. We will see by the year 1995 that the government no longer has to borrow from outside. We will not be putting pressure on financial markets and our deficit will be $5.5 billion. That is something we all have to work toward.

I just want to refer to a statement one of my constituents wrote to me. It has to do not only with his personal income tax level and what he is paying, but he also talks about the social benefits that are out there for families. He also talks about the Canada Pension Plan that he and his employer contribute to and unemployment insurance that employees and employers contribute to. His bottom line was that he cannot afford the tax that is already out there and we simply have to get it down.

I think today in discussing what the hon. member put forward, we all have to live within financial accountability. There is only one taxpayer. Canadians cannot afford any more taxes. Canadians right across this country do not want an increase in deficits. Therefore, we have to spend the money more wisely.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the comments made by my hon. colleague, the member for Calgary Southwest, on this very important issue to Canadians.

However, the opposition motion being debated today seeks to condemn the government for its negligence toward the worst social and economic difficulties faced by residents of Ontario in modern times.

The latest unemployment figures prove this. According to Statistics Canada's figures for May, unemployment in Canada has hit 11.2 per cent. This represents an increase of 0.2 per cent over last month and is the highest national unemployment rate since November 1984.

There are over 1.5 million Canadians looking for work. The figures announced today clearly indicate that the government's economic program and economic policies have failed. The government has certainly failed to come through on its now stale promise of creating jobs, jobs, jobs. In fact, I want to point out to my hon. colleague that her government is actually preventing many unemployed Canadians from becoming employable.

I am referring here to the lack of funds for the section 26 fee payer option. This option provides funding for UI recipients to upgrade their skills and employment marketability by attending educational institutions and taking courses.

I recently met with 400 of my constituents who were assembled by Employment Canada officials to be told that their participation in the fee payer option would be terminated.

Yet the government is currently running some nicely worded ads on national television, boasting about how competitive Canada is. The ads contain statements like: "Upgrading your skills is the key to succeeding in today's economic market". Such a statement is contemptible in view of the fact that the government has torpedoed the fee payer option under section 26. This type of propaganda is shameful.

I would like to ask the hon. member how can her government run such ads when we have 1.5 million Canadians looking for work and when there are 400 individuals in my constituency alone being told that there is no funding left in the fee payer option for them to complete their studies or upgrade their skills in order to have a better chance of finding work?

On May 12 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration if he would provide the necessary funding to ensure that the fee payer program would continue. The minister declined to make any such commitment.

He did, however, boast about how much money the federal government has put into training programs in Ontario this year as opposed to last year. The minister must think that we are a little naive on this side of the House. By looking at the increasing numbers of unemployed in this country, anyone would realize that there would be a greater demand for additional funds to assist the unemployed in finding work. Thus, the increase in the funding of the fee payer option in Ontario should not be a surprise.

We have a serious unemployment problem in Ontario and throughout Canada. It is one which is even greater than last year with no relief in sight, especially given the lack of positive action taken by the government.

I would like to ask my colleague to address my question on the fee payer option. Can she tell us today what unemployed Canadians can expect to hear from her government on how they can find work?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like to respond to the specific question on the fee payer option.

I am not too sure whether the member is aware of the Minister of Employment and Immigration's announcement yesterday with regard to the additional funding into that particular area. I would certainly be glad to provide him with a copy of what the hon. minister was putting forward.

The fee payer option which allows for training is extremely important and we do recognize, and some of your colleagues do recognize, especially the members for Thunder Bay—Nipigon and Broadview—Greenwood, that unemployment is too high and we all should be working together.

It is nice to debate with people who have specific and positive responses and I want to say I hope the member will address his little eyes to what exactly the minister said yesterday.

The member got on to the ads that are on TV and in the papers. What is interesting is that there have been over 200,000 responses to those and it proves that all Canadians are most interested and indeed want to compete.

I really have to ask a question with regard to Bill C-21 when we amended the unemployment act. One specific area was moving funding over to training and job retraining. It was actually even allowing funding for what I would call moving people from one area of the country to another where the jobs were. The unfortunate part was it was well over nine or twelve months that the bill was held up in the Senate and I do not think the hon. member has to look too far to see exactly who held that up.

Yes, we need more training. Nobody is going to deny that. Yes, we need better education. Yes, we have to become more competitive, but for Heaven's sake why is the member always so negative?

There are positive stories out there. Training has improved. He has just heard the hon. member from Etobicoke make his statement and there are better ways. We will all work together to see that this country prospers.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member talking about how well the Tory government has done on the social program side.

She talked about child abuse. She raised the issue of sexual child abuse and the whole initiative on family violence. The government put $137 million into the family violence program spread over five years and there will be a total expenditure by the end of 1992–1993 of $34 million. That is for all of Canada to deal with family violence.

At the same time, the government cut back on the Canada Assistance Plan payments to the province of Ontario alone in those three years $3.5 billion by the end of the year 1992–1993.

What was that $3.5 billion to do? It was to protect women in abusive situations. It was to provide transition houses for women. It was to investigate child abuse and child sexual abuse. So what did the government do? It dumped the responsibility solely on the province of Ontario.

The government cuts $3.5 billion and then tries to say it put back in $34 million.

Mr. Richardson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, after the diatribe from the NDP the hon. member should be given the courtesy of a response.

• (1400)

I am sure we could get unanimous consent of the House to allow her to reply.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the member for Calgary Southwest made a very sound, constructive speech. I wonder if we could ask for unanimous consent of the House to extend for a few more minutes the time to finish off proper questions to the member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I could ask for unanimous consent. If there is unanimous consent, I will allow the hon. member to answer the question.

There is still a number of speakers. I would hope that there would be no complaints come four o'clock. The hon. member for Calgary Southwest could answer, please.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues in the House. With regard to the question put forward by the NDP member regarding cutting back over $3 billion to Ontario, that is absolutely not true.

I would like to say that yes, there was a cap put on the Canada Assistance Plan but there was about a 6 per cent increase to the province of Ontario. The cap is a cap of 5 per cent over the year before every year and each and every year, so while we are watching our expenditures very carefully, maybe the province of Ontario with regard to its social services needs to take a look at itself.

On family violence and child abuse, there is nobody in this House who will stand for any sexual abuse of children. We have put funding into it and we are working with the blue ribbon special task force.

In conclusion, I want to say we have put out a lot of funding. We are working with all agencies. We are working with all governments at all levels and we look forward to any assistance that we can get. Some people may say that it is a provincial responsibility. It is everybody's responsibility.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the member in her capacity as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare talked in a portion of her speech of the violence against women and children and the fact that the government has recently appointed Rix Rogers.

I wonder if I could ask the hon. member to arrange for a briefing from that section of the department of health and welfare or make it available. I personally would like to see if she could use her good offices to arrange that for me.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to arrange a briefing for any colleague in this House or indeed the other House who would specifically want more information or wish to participate in putting forward ideas with regard to child abuse and sexual abuse. I will get back to you within the next few days.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is a danger in this debate that those of us who are members from Ontario may be sending out a signal that we are only concerned about the problems in the economy in our own province or in our own city.

All Canadians should know that even though there is more of a primary focus on Ontario and Toronto today, and being a member from Toronto, all of us in this House really do have the same concerns for every region of this country. Traditionally in Toronto, as the member for Calgary Southwest so aptly described in the opening remarks of her speech, Ontario has been a province that has always enjoyed a very aggressive economic state of health.

For the first time, certainly in my lifetime, those of us who are from Toronto are feeling deep economic pain. I think if we can regain the confidence, that sense of "let's take a chance", that entrepreneurial spirit that is basically there—it is latent in our community, but it just needs to be reignited—then that will be of benefit not only to people who are living in Ontario, but in every region of this country.

Make no mistake about it, the people of Ontario always have shared the wealth and resources of our province with every region of this country. We do it happily and generously, and we will continue to do so but we need at this moment in time to figure out a way to get that economy going again.

This morning I had a group of students who were visiting me from my riding, Earl Grey Senior School. I had breakfast with them at the Holiday Inn on Dalhousie Street. The minister from Brampton smiles, but there is an old expression: "Out of the mouths of babes".

Mr. McDermid: I've been there.

Mr. Mills: I would like to say to the minister that this was eight o'clock in the morning. It was not eight o'clock at night, and there is quite a difference.

Rather than me speak to them, I went around to each one of the students and mentioned that I was gong to have this opportunity to debate in the House today. I asked each and every one of them what were the issues that concerned them, and what were the issues that concerned their mothers or their fathers when they sat around the breakfast table, had dinner or just chatted with them during the evening.

I must start off by saying that many of the students said that they felt things were okay. I do not want to say it was an experience where everybody was negative. There were a lot of those young people whose mothers and fathers were both gainfully employed. They felt good about things, so it was not all negative chat.

We went around to each and every person. I am not going to read off the names of everyone who was there, but I am going to put it to the table of the House and to Hansard because I hope there is some way that I can give them credit for their remarks. My ideas are basically their ideas.

They were telling me things that they had heard from their parents. Interestingly enough, it seems to be the same things that most people in this House are talking about. The number one concern for the parents of these children were taxes. They really felt that with regard to the tax designs in this country, the tax systems—they did not use the words "tax design" but the word "taxes"—I know all members are hearing this—we have to meet the challenge of making our tax designs in this country more simple and more fair.

It is important to do that because if students in grade eight are beginning to hear that taxes, taxes, taxes are a negative thing, that they are a disincentive to productivity, it is going to be a part of their language, a part of their thought process. By the time they are 18, 19, 20 and get into the work force, they are going to have a negative attitude toward the system.

Before we get to a point where there will almost be a revolt in this country, we should meet the challenge of reforming our tax system.

• (1410)

The second thing that concerned the students of Earl Grey was the issue of job creation; finding jobs for the people in their community who were out of work. I could not help but remember a young student named Paul Stuart Vanderburg who was living with his grandmother. He was telling us that yesterday or the day before his grandmother, who looks after him, was about to lose her job. They had no other source of income except her job. The two of them lived alone in an apartment. I personally cannot imagine what that would be like, to be living alone with my grandmother and all of a sudden she was going to lose her job and there I was in grade eight about to go into high school. That must be a real frightening experience for a young person.

Young people are concerned about the fact that somehow we get the job creation programs that do exist.

I said earlier in this House that it is incumbent upon us to put ideas forward, but there are ideas that exist in this House of Commons. The Government of Canada has to go back to some of these ideas. We do not need to re-invent the wheel. Where is this Work for Tomorrow—Employment Opportunities for the '80s? There are 185 job opportunities there, many of them linked to entrepreneurship, giving incentives to the enterprises of this country. Rather than sending people to school to be trained, and I am not opposed to that, let the entrepreneurs of this country take people on to their payrolls and train them on the job rather than just leaving people at home on welfare or UI and becoming frustrated because they do not have anything to do, not to mention the loss of dignity. That was the second issue that concerned the students of Earl Grey Senior Public School. There is another challenge for us.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me that my time is running out. Another issue that concerned the students was to put more support to tourism in this country. We know that it is the No. 1 job creator. The other thing they said is that government should eliminate waste and abuse of the system. Remember, these words are coming from 12 and 13 year olds. One teacher said to shift some of the defence budget to youth programs.

There was one teacher there who was an American and she said: "You know, Canadians have to be more patriotic." We need to be more patriotic. This American teacher, Mrs. Quinn, was so right when she said that we do not appreciate enough what we have in this country in terms of standard of living. Fear of job loss was another problem.

I realize I only have a short time today, but these thoughts represented here today are those of Earl Grey Public School. I support each and every one of them, but I do want to add two of my own. I think the banking institutions of this country have to re-examine the way that they handle credit with small and medium sized business. I know that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism admitted yesterday in this House that the financial institutions need to be checked on that issue. I salute him for admitting that.

I appreciate you giving me that extra minute, Mr. Speaker, but I wish I had half the afternoon.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech and especially the portion on taxes. I know he has done a fair bit of work in regard to simplifying the taxation system. I think that is something we all want to see. In reading his book, it seemed that as he got into the system he found that he had to make exemptions that were similar to the ones that already exist in the tax system to take into account various matters that we need to do in terms of our social structure. I also noticed that a lot of the calculations take place off the particular paper itself. As I said, I welcome the attempt to simplify the tax system.

I have a couple of questions about the tax system. I know he is interested in the environment. Should there be incentives or should we be using the tax system with regard to environmental matters? What does he feel in that particular regard? I would certainly like to know his feelings on that.

There is also the whole idea of the third party who seemed to feel that all we have to do is to put more tax on what they call the rich and all our problems will be solved and the middle class will not have to pay its share. We have to raise a certain amount of revenue and we are all going to have to pay, no matter what percentages we put on it.

The third party in Ontario has apparently defined a rich person as earning $53,000. I would like the member's comments on those particular items.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of addressing those issues.

First, I want to deal with the issue of the single tax. I have been working on this for the past three and half years with many other tax experts who are much brighter than I will ever be on tax issues. We have made sure that there are some progressive features in this tax design. Yes, we did put in a tax credit for seniors, families with children and charities. We left the RRSP in place. Beyond that, there are no other special categories.

On the corporate side we made sure there was a $100,000 tax credit to make sure that entrepreneurship, or small and medium sized business, has that very progressive break on the first $100,000. In other words, under the single tax, there would be no tax on the first $100,000, but after that it would be 20 per cent. There is a lot of room for simplifying the tax system.

I want to address the point specifically on the environmental issue he asked about. No, there should not be any special tax breaks for the environment. I am as much committed to the environment as any other member in this House. That is the problem with the current tax system. We have been trying to run every sector of the economy through the tax system. That has created so many rules and regulations and exceptions and exceptions to exceptions in every sector of the economy that it is no longer an intelligible system.

We, as the Government of Canada, may decide that the environment is a priority issue. I believe we all agree that it should be and it is a priority issue. In that case, any money it requires can be handled through direct funding. This would be either interest free loans, low interest loans, grants or whatever, but let us not bury these grants or incentives in the tax system. Ten years from now we will be back where we are today with a system that is unintelligible.

What was your last point? I am sorry.

An hon. member: Taxing the wealthy.

Mr. Mills: Oh, taxing the wealthy. I used to believe that those in the NDP were into causes, but I learned my lesson this week. This is a group that is only driven by tactics. What they did to me this week I will remember for a long, long time.

What do you mean: "Tax the rich?" I have absolutely no problem with people paying their fair share. The harder people work, the more incentive they should have.

Mr. Speaker, just give me one second on this. Under the current system there are many people who pay no taxes and obviously that is wrong. However, the harder you work the more you want to punish people. That is what the NDP wants to do. I think that is bogus. Remember, those people with entrepreneurial skills who build wealth also create jobs and that is what the NDP fails to understand.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate this afternoon.

I would like to start by congratulating my hon. colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River on his excellent initiative to draw the attention of this House to the Tory government's negligence with respect to the economy of our province, Ontario.

[English]

Little did we know yesterday when we asked for this debate that we would hear statistics this morning in the House telling us that the economy had gone from bad to worse because more people are unemployed.

I see the Minister of State for Finance saying no while 4,000 full-time jobs have been lost in one month in this country. That is not good news no matter how you cut it.

The minister said awhile ago, in response to another hon. member, that the problem with all of us is that we did not congratulate the Tories enough. The problem with all of us is that we were negative. It is coming from the disciples of Eric Nielsen that we Liberals, according to the disciples of Eric and the disciples of Harvie the chair stormer, that we are negative. Is it not something to hear that from a member across the way?

That statement is a little less than accurate. Of course, I have to use those kinds of words because the rules of this House oblige me and properly so.

I want to say something about my own region of eastern Ontario. Unemployment has gone up to the tune of three-tenths of 1 per cent. That includes the city of Ottawa. If you remove the city of Ottawa for statistical purposes from rural Ontario, imagine how much unemployment has gone up in rural areas.

The number of unemployed has increased from 48,000 in eastern Ontario to 50,000. It is certainly quite appropriate and it is our duty to raise these things in the House of Commons today.

That is why the member for Scarborough—Rouge River should be congratulated, not just by Liberals, but by all members of this House for bringing this issue to public attention because it has to be brought to public attention.

[Translation]

There are those who, like the minister, will say that the opposition criticizes the government but fails to offer alternatives. That is hardly fair, since the Leader of the Opposition and next prime minister raised this matter and brought it to the attention of the media some time ago.

I refer you to a press release dated January 21, 1992, in which the hon. member for Beauséjour, Leader of the Opposition and soon to be prime minister, suggested and even begged the government to set up five-point programs for economic recovery. In each case, the Leader of the Opposition explained how program expenditures would be covered. More specifically, the Leader of the Opposition asked, on behalf of all members on this side of the House and for the sake of all Canadians who are unemployed, that the government set up a program for renewal and upgrading of municipal infrastructures, including bridges, for instance.

If you ever used Perley Bridge in Hawkesbury in my riding, Mr. Speaker, you would find it in disgraceful condition for this day and age. It must be replaced.

The same goes for the sewers in some municipalities and for other services. We are not asking the government to build pyramids, as John Maynard Keynes emphasized long ago. We are asking it to participate in necessary projects that must be done, instead of paying people to stay home and do nothing on unemployment insurance, people who would ask for nothing better than to go back to work. We are asking the government to establish programs to give these Canadians in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere some dignity, but it seems that the government does not want to understand.

[English]

My very distinguished colleagues, the members for Stormont—Dundas and Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, and I have been asking the government to establish a program to assist the economy of eastern Ontario. We have had meetings with municipal officials. Twenty-eight municipalities in eastern Ontario have signed a joint declaration asking for this government to establish a program to attract new industries to this area to get people back to work.

We have been writing to the ministers across the way for three years and nothing has happened. There is nothing for the people of Cornwall, Hawkesbury, Pembroke or anywhere else. We have even outlined a program that the government should undertake, such as the FEDNOR program which already exists for northern Ontario. We suggested that it should not spend oodles of money establishing something new such as a new bureaucracy, just extend the territory of what is there and put people back to work. Those few things do exist right now.

I was having a conversation with my colleague from Stormont—Dundas earlier today. We were talking about the economy of eastern Ontario. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the Stormont Dundas Glengarry Small Business Development Centre which is located in Cornwall has no investment money as we speak. That is funded by the federal government. It is a form of mini-bank. It put out advertisements funded by the federal government which told people: "Come in, we will help you start your own business".

Do you know what they are told when they get there? "We do not have any money". The bank has no money in the bank. It is a Tory bank. The bank that the government has established has no money in it. It advertises its program.

Last year it established the Self-Employment Incentive Program. The minister responsible for eastern Ontario, the Minister of Supply and Services, announced a whole series of these programs for all of eastern Ontario. It was, again, for Stormont—Dundas, for the Hawkesbury area, for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and for Renfrew and so on. He announced the people who could apply. They were people on unemployment who could apply under this program and could get assistance.

The local small business development centres put out ads in newspapers after the minister announced that he was giving the money. In one case, I believe, it was the Stormont Dundas Glengarry centre that was supposed to get about 30 placements. They put out ads inviting people to apply. After they adopted about six of them, they got notices from the department: "We haven't got any more money, stop sending them to us". They said: "This doesn't make sense. How can we not have any more money. We applied for 30". It was whatever the number was. The reply was: "Sorry, but that is the way it is. We've got no money".

The government had announced a program and then cut the funds after it announced it. What kind of sense does that make? Meanwhile we have ads right now on television, as the member for Stormont—Dundas very appropriately and eloquently pointed out earlier today. He said that those ads talk about all this great training.

I was addressing people in my riding at T. R. Leger Alternative School in Alexandria last Friday. They said to me: "Why is the government sending us here and then in the middle of the program it is telling us to go home? We cannot finish our training because they have cancelled the money" Did they think of congratulating the government for that stupid ad on television telling them how great they are at training? Why don't they take the money from the ad and give it to the alternative school to train people to go back to work instead of giving it to their friends in the advertising agencies? Wouldn't that make a lot of sense, instead of wasting it on stupid Tory propaganda advertising? That is all we see because it is the run up to the election.

• (1430)

It is time the Tories smartened up if they want anyone to believe in them by the time the next election rolls around.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): That certainly brought down the level of debate in the House somewhat, Mr. Speaker. We have had a very good and wholesome debate until now.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has been listening to the problems that my hon. friend enunciated where programs had run out of money because of the pressures of the numbers of people using it with the high unemployment we have. Yesterday morning cabinet approved and the minister announced yesterday afternoon another $150 million to try to alleviate the problem.

Rather than stand here and scream like a wild banshee, which makes us all look like jerks, it would be more proper for him to make representation to the government to ensure that some of that $150 million in fact went to help those people he was talking to last weekend, instead of stirring up emotions like that which are totally uncalled for.

Mr. Boudria: I thank the minister for bringing up that particular topic, the one on the government's so-called announcements of yesterday.

First of all, the minister should have at least set the record straight. What the government announced yesterday was not $150 million. It was $95 million. The other was already there. That is just nonsense.

It is just like saying I have money, I count it, I put it in my wallet and I count it again. That does not mean that I have twice as much of money. Counting it twice or three times means the same thing. Even this minister should understand that.

Let us talk about how much money has been going to my riding for training. Last year the amount given for all UI programs combined—I could enumerate every single one of them here; I have two pages of them—for Prescott county, in my riding, when the unemployment rate was not nearly as bad as it is now totalled $4,732,000.

This year—and I invite the member to pay attention—$1.3 million instead of $4.7 million. Two-thirds of the money has been cut off, I say to the minister across the way who was just bragging about how much more has been given to my constituents and others. Two-thirds of the money has been taken away.

I invite the minister to go behind the curtains, pick up the phone and phone the Hawkesbury Canada Employment Centre at area code 613-632-2759. The centre will set him straight. It will tell him. He just has to ask the people who work there. They have made a list for me of everything that has been received in 1991-92 and 1992-93. If we compare the $4,732,697 of last year and $1,310,479 of this year, it is less than a third. As a matter of fact it is just a little over a quarter of what we got last year.

How can anyone call that an increase? I invite the minister to dig out his calculator, figure out his new math, and answer that one.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I wish there was more time for us all to speak on our colleague's motion in the House today but unfortunately there is not. The motion, as we know, reads:

> That this House condemns the government for its negligence toward the worst social and economic difficulties faced by residents of Ontario in modern times.

I have listened very closely to my colleague from the Glengarry—Prescott—Russell part of eastern Ontario. I understand what he is saying. Different areas of Ontario are hurt in different manners.

The Economic Council of Canada has warned that Canada must make some fundamental changes in the structure of our economy or risk losing many qualities of Canadian life we all enjoy and take for granted.

I have a letter here from a constituent. I think this is what my colleague is saying but somebody across the floor is not hearing. I would like to hear my colleague's comment. This person writes to me and says: "I am 42, unskilled, untrained and can't get a decent job. In fact I can't get anything. UIC won't put me on an on the job training program because I am not on UIC. I can't collect UIC because I was on WC for an injured elbow. My employer says he doesn't have to take me back and put me on a lighter job load"—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to finish?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being given the opportunity to comment on the motion of my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River today regarding the condemning of the government for the economic situation that we find in the province of Ontario, and indeed across Canada as my friend from Calgary South pointed out very clearly today.

It is not just Ontario that is hurting. It is the entire country. Coming from Ontario, the centre of Ontario, I am very concerned about the economic situation and have been for a considerable amount of time. I want to put this in its proper perspective however.

We have gone through some very difficult times. We have all experienced employment problems within our ridings. There are many reasons for it. There are reasons of restructuring that is going on not only here but around the world. Of course employment is affected rather dramatically by restructuring.

We have seen our productivity in this country drop rather dramatically over the last three or four years, something that I am pleased to see has improved over the last year and will lead us out of the economic problem we have been experiencing.

There are other key reasons. We hear the free trade agreement caused unemployment. There is no question that the free trade agreement caused a rationalization of industries both here and in the United States. But that is a positive thing because that had to happen; it was coming anyway. We had to get through that period of time.

Some friends, some parliamentarians were visiting from Australia just yesterday. I spent a considerable amount of time with them in the afternoon. They are considering introducing a GST in Australia at the present time and were interested in our experience. I had some very good tips for them in those discussions.

They were talking about the economic situation in Australia today. Australia just had 22 per cent interest rates. Does that sound familiar? Its unemployment rate is now almost at 11 per cent and growing.

I was in eastern Europe and Europe recently. The same types of problems are being experienced everywhere because the rationalization is going on. The modernization or the changing global economy, has caused this country to reform, pardon the terminology, our economic bases and get on with the restructuring. That is what is going on.

My hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell stood and talked about the unemployment statistics that came out today. One of the things he failed to mention was that there was an increase in the number of people able to work. Some 50,000 new people came on to the work force this past month.

What he also failed to mention was that 31,000 new jobs were created. Unemployment did not fall by 20,000. More people came on to the labour market. There were not enough jobs for those people, but 31,000 new jobs were created. I might say 20,000 of them were in the province of Ontario, and that is what we are talking about today.

Over the last two months we have seen the manufacturing sector increase its employment by 40,000 jobs. There are not nearly enough jobs yet to make up the rate of unemployment that we have seen in the last two years and want to get down. Unfortunately when we go through restructuring and bring in new equipment, new machinery and so on and so forth, employment does not follow immediately. It always lags in recovery. I am afraid we are still going to see that here.

• (1440)

I heard my friends from Stormont—Dundas and from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell suggest that we throw money at it and create employment. Let us be frank about that. There is not enough money anywhere to make work projects for 1.5 million people. It is just not there. The answer to the problem is not make work projects for one or two months so that people can qualify for unemployment insurance.

The answer is to get the economy going again and to create full-time meaningful jobs. That is what it is all about. That is what the free trade agreement was about. The free trade agreement was in fact to improve our economy and to have companies restructure and in fact improve their situation.

Let me just give a couple of examples if I might. Right in the riding or very close to the riding of the hon. member who proposed the motion today from Scarborough—Rouge River there is a company called Canadian Thermos Products. I want to read this into the record because it is extremely important. Its product is insulated containers; its market is the United States. In response to free trade the United States parent upgraded Canadian operations at a cost of $25 million, creating 120 new jobs; closed its older facility in Connecticut; and began producing the entire North American market in Scarborough.

That is what the free trade agreement is all about. That is what is happening for Canada.

My friend from Stratford who is sitting behind me and I spent a very enjoyable day in the wonderful riding of Perth—Wellington—Waterloo in the community of Stratford. In the morning we had the privilege of participating in the opening of a $50 million addition which will create 200 new jobs.

One of the interesting things about this production was the new, wonderful equipment to produce precision bearings that are used in the auto industry, in the water pump industry and so on. It was fascinating to see the modern technology they brought in.

To be honest, the principals who were there from the parent company in Germany said to me that this plant in Stratford would soon be out-performing the home plant in Germany. That was good news to hear and it made me feel very proud as a Canadian, extremely proud as a Canadian.

It says an awful lot about the 900 and some workers in Stratford. As a matter of fact one of the workers received his 50-year pin with the same company when we were there. It was absolutely amazing and he is only 64 years of age. He joined as an apprentice at 14.

That is type of thing that is going on. We do not hear about these things from the headlines in the papers unfortunately. We always hear about the tragedies. We always hear about the closings. I cannot remember the last time I saw a plant opening announced on the front page of a paper or on any of our national telecasts in the news.

They might be on some of the local newscasts. I have to give them full marks, but when it comes to our national communications organizations we do not see them. If a plant closed, however, it is a front-page story. It is Chicken Little and the sky is falling in and so on and so forth.

There are a lot of very good things happening: 3M Canada in London with $30 million in a new tape manufacturing plant and Bertrand Faure Ltd. in Mississauga has just improved its production process, which is now allowing it to win new business with Japanese manufacturers locating in Canada. It is forecasting sales in the $60 million range and is investing in equipment. This is exactly what was talked about today in the debate. It is investing in equipment to improve productivity at its plant.

Basic International Network Ltd. in Woodbridge, involved women's fashion sportswear, is exporting about 15 per cent of its production to the United States and is thanking the free trade agreement for allowing it to expand into the United States.

These things are happening. I do not want to go on and on about it, but the point is that the restructuring is going on and the government is trying, to the best of its capabilities, to facilitate that change. The problem is that there is not enough money around to do what we would like to do.

I think that is fair to say.

The poor old taxpayer pays at the municipal level, in some areas at the regional level, at the provincial level, and then at the federal level. We politicians sometimes tend to forget that it is one taxpayer. There is not a group that pays the federal tax and a group that pays the provincial tax. There is one taxpayer.

We must do with the limited resources what we can do within the realm of possibility, without bankrupting the country, without borrowing more and more money or raising taxes more and more. We must do that.

We must be able to work with the resources that we have and work within a reasonable period of economic expansion. That is exactly what is happening.

I do not want to minimize the problem that we have at all, and if I left the House with that impression I did not intend to. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell got up, but he did not hear the quality of debate that was going on today and the discussion between our parties. In general, it has been pretty good.

I was not minimizing our problems at all. We have got them. We have problems. We all have them. We all experience them in our ridings all the time. We know what is going on out there and we are trying to help in the best way.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood always has some positive thoughts. He is causing us fits in our ridings right now because he has some recording going around saying: "Call your local MP", and of course people are calling us and asking: "What's going on?" However, he is an original thinker. I do not always agree with him but I know people in his own caucus who do not agree with him, and that is all right. At least he is thinking and trying to do some positive things to get the economy going. That is what this is all about.

We appreciate that type of thinking.

There was an article in The Toronto Star. We are always knocking The Toronto Star in this place because—

Mr. Mills: Don't talk about The Toronto Star.

Mr. McDermid: The publisher is very up front, he is a Liberal.

Mr. Mills: He's not a Liberal.

Mr. McDermid: He professes to be a Liberal, and its editorial content is Liberal. That is fair ball. He has always been up front. He has never hidden that. However I have to give him credit for permitting an article in The Toronto Star on April 4 or April 5.

The article was written by Tom McCormack, who is an economist. He has his own company and a masters in economics from the University of Western Ontario. He has wide experience. He was one of the directors for the Anti-Inflation Board—

Mr. Mills: Good man.

Mr. McDermid: —between 1976 and 1982. Strategic Projections is the name of his company and it specializes in demographics and economic modelling.

The headline of his article says: "Get Ready Canada for the Next Boom", and the introduction says:

> This country, which already enjoys the second highest standard of living in the world, is on the threshold of an unprecedented expansion, writes economist Tom McCormack. But this golden age of prosperity could be jeopardized by Canadians' pessimistic national mood.

He goes on in this very well written article, backed with statistics, figures and so on, to talk about the positive things in this country. He talks about what is coming down the road. He says that the difficult times we are going through now are necessary so that when we come out the other end we come out running, that we are in great shape to meet the challenges.

That is exactly what is going on in this country today. Although it is not obvious yet we are starting to see very positive signs. Never in the history of Canada did we have record exports like we did in March, and record exports to the United States of America. There was $9.8 billion worth of goods exported to the United States in March 1992.

In the first quarter we had wonderful export figures. We export 25 per cent of what we produce. We depend on exports in this country far more than the United States. It only exports 12 per cent of what it produces, Japan's figure is 14 percent. It is so very important.

These signs of improvement in our exports are a sign that the economy is improving. If the economy in the United States starts to pick up we are going to see phenomenal progress because that is where we export most of our goods. We exported $3 billion to other countries of the world and $9.8 billion to the United States in the month of March. That is a good sign and it is starting to happen. We are very pleased about what is going on.

Everybody takes these statistics and figures and uses them. They can use them in many ways. Politicians have a great knack of doing so.

Mr. Mills: As you do.

Mr. McDermid: I do it too, sure. Of course I do.

There were 31,000 new jobs created, over and above last month. That is a fact. It is right there. I am not juggling the figures.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Part-time.

Mr. McDermid: I said that 57,000 or 58,000 came into the labour force this month, so there were 20,000 that did not get jobs out of that group. I am admitting that.

Mr. Mills: Let us talk about the unemployed.

Mr. McDermid: We want to get the economy improving and continue to increase these exports and manufacturing jobs that will create spin-offs, such as people buying homes and all the other things that go on. That is exactly what we are doing.

I just want to give one quick example, in terms of interest rates alone so people understand what is going on out there. If we took the interest rate of a five year mortgage, in August 1981—this may not be fair—if I had a five-year mortgage it was at 21.75 per cent.

Today that same mortgage is at 9.75 per cent. The difference to a family's pocket is $7,812 per year. That is money in its pocket. That is what it means. These falling interest rates mean that the mortgage rates on a five-year mortgage come down.

On a one-year mortgage it is saving $8,652 per year. That is just in mortgages. Those are types of savings to the people who finance their mortgages.

Let us talk about a small business loan. Let us say a person got a piece of equipment for $100,000 in 1981. He was paying $1,979 per month on that loan. Today he is paying $688 per month. That is a saving of $1,291 per month or $15,492 per year.

That is what is helping the economy. The interest rates are helping the economy. There is no question that with lower interest rates we are going to encourage small business and we are going to encourage young people to buy new homes. Today I just found out that the three-year rate is at 9 per cent. I cannot remember when the mortgage rates were that low. I am pleased that they are so low.

I am convinced that because of this increased activity in manufacturing and in exports and the increased economic activity we are seeing in our country that we are going to see things improve, not only in Ontario but right across this country.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, maybe I could finish the question I started a while ago.

The member was in the House when I was reading a letter from a constituent of mine. I felt this person's letter quite clearly described the plight Canadians are in today across this country. I will not repeat what I said but he is asking for my help. He has no income whatsoever.

He says that social services told him: "Because my wife works I am not entitled to any help from the UIC", even when he offered to pay it back. His wife earns only $13,476 after taxes, Canada pension, and UI. Therefore, he is not entitled to any social benefits. He is not entitled to UIC. He is an unemployed man and is not entitled to anything.

He has been using his Visa to buy the gas for his car so he can go looking for work. He is not complaining. All he wants is the opportunity to go out and work. He is driving a 1980 car. He is in a position in which he needs to be retrained. He is not educated and needs retraining. We now know there is no money in the budget for retraining. He is asking me, as his member of Parliament, to help him out. What is there for me to offer this person? He is only one of thousands in this country who are in this position.

I ask the member opposite, what can I tell this gentleman to do? Where can he go so that he can be offered some hope in this wonderful country of Canada?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to demean the individual at all. We all have examples in our ridings of people who are desperately searching for work and looking for jobs.

I will reiterate what I said. There is unfortunately not enough money in this country alone to help everybody at this particular time. That is unfortunate, but there is not.

Yesterday the minister added another $150 million for training. Hopefully the individual the member refers to will be able to get into a program, but maybe not. Maybe it will be over-subscribed, maybe it is now. Maybe he is further down the waiting list. I do not know.

The hope I can give him is that the country is coming out of a recession and employment opportunities are slowly getting better. There were 31,000 more people employed in the month of May than there were in April. It is improving, though not fast enough for our liking. We would like to see it happen much faster. However it is improving and we have to hold hope out for those people.

If we are reading letters I can read out a letter that my colleague the Minister of Finance received yesterday. It is from an individual who is unemployed and who has been out looking for work for months. He apologized for his contribution to the party. It could only be $150 because he is unemployed. Yet, he said: "You are on the right track. Keep doing what you are doing because we can see signs that the economy is getting better and I am hopeful I will be able to get a job in the not too distant future with an improved economy". He understands the problem all levels of government in Canada are having. Here is a person who is unemployed and still believes in the democratic—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: Members can make fun of him. They can sit there and laugh at him. They can make fun of the individual if they want to, but it is not funny being unemployed. Here is someone who believes in the democratic process and is prepared to participate. Do not sit there and laugh at an individual who writes a letter like that. I did not laugh at your constituent. You should not laugh at this one.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the minister's remarks. He talked about the economist Tom McCormack, and I too read the article in The Toronto Star. I subsequently had some discussions with Tom McCormack and he sent me his latest papers on projections. They were good. I actually believe that the 1990s are going to be better than the 1980s.

However, what we are talking about here today is trying to do something, and not in 1994, 1995 or 1996. Today we are trying to address the problems of the 1.5 million people in Canada who are unemployed. Specifically, we are trying to put a tighter focus on the .5 million in Ontario who are trying to get back into the work force.

The minister was part of a parliamentary task force on employment opportunities for the 1980s. I have referred to this task force at least a dozen times in this House in the last 60 to 90 days. It is a good report.

The report recommends one thing over and over again. The report talks about apprenticeship training, but it talks specifically about linking training to on-the-job experiences. In other words, use the 1.7 million enterprises in this country as partners in taking people off unemployment and putting them into a factory or an office and training them on the job.

Would it not be a much more dignified productive experience if instead of giving out welfare or UI cheques to figure out a mechanism whereby the employer would take people off UI and put them into the factory? Would it not be a much better experience to have a joint venture using those funds and that business? Besides giving people back their dignity, they also become taxpayers and we would be developing skilled workers for the small enterprise which will provide that badly needed support to go into the nineties.

The minister was a part of that task force. Why does he not figure out a way to motivate his cabinet colleagues to make that happen tomorrow?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I am glad he asked that because I can say the minister did that a few weeks ago. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has a project now in New Brunswick. One of the problems, both technically and philosophically, is that it is a wonderful theory until we come to the employers because there is a union in there. The union says: "Look. Last guy on, first guy off."

If that report is thoroughly read, it will be seen that although we made those types of recommendations we listed all the problems. Canada for so many years has always had the luxury of importing its skilled labour. Because of that, we never really established good apprenticeship programs because when industry needed people, boom, off to England, off to Germany, off to Italy, off to France, off to Portugal, bring them in, set them up.

Today that same luxury is not there. We are behind in our training. Canadian businesses spend one-half of 1 per cent of their income on training. The United States of America spends twice that, about 1 per cent. Japan spends 2 per cent. That is four times what our businesses spend on training and retraining.

It has to change. I agree with the hon. member. We said that in our report but there are so many problems in getting employers to do that. Right now, when you say that you want to train somebody on the job, they say that right now, they have no work for them to train them on, or they say that they need somebody who is really specialized.

I might add one of the other problems in that report that has to do specifically with the hon. member's question is that industry does not plan for the future. This is one of the things my friend from Calgary West would tell you. I am sure the chairman from Montreal would tell you the same thing.

When the industries were asked: "What kind of a person are you going to need three or four years from now," they could not tell us what they needed. They could tell us what they needed next week, but they did not know what they would need four years from now. A person cannot be trained in a week to take a job.

There has to be attitudinal changes. I say to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, I believe that report is as fresh today as it was back in 1981-82. I have no disagreement with that.

That is why the emphasis on training is coming from this government and the money is being put forward for training. But we need more in the workplace as well.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise and speak on this motion this afternoon.

The debate has been quite interesting. It certainly has highlighted some of the problems that the largest province in Canada is now facing, problems that have been created in large part by the fiscal and economic policies of this government.

I just want to go back to a few comments other people have made and then come to the things I want to say myself.

One of the interesting things a previous speaker from Calgary was talking about is that this is a world-wide recession and that many countries are having downturns in their economies. The United States is suffering, Japan is suffering and other countries are suffering. There is some truth in that.

But there are also many areas where that is not true. Canada has lost 23 per cent of its industrial and manufacturing jobs. In that same period of time, the United States has lost 6 per cent. So in the Canadian economy Canadian manufacturing is shrinking by 23 per cent. The bulk of those jobs or a great number of them would be in the industrial heartland of Ontario.

The United States has suffered 6 per cent. Now that is quite a dramatic difference. It is said that in the free trade agreement the United States has lost jobs. Yes, it probably has in the same period of time. But it has lost 6 per cent and we have lost 23 per cent.

The member for Calgary Southwest also talked about Japan's economic downturn. Well, I happen to have been there a few months ago and I hate to inform the hon. member but there is a shortage of workers in Japan. There is a shortage of skilled, unskilled, any variety of workers. Japan, for the first time in its history, has to deal with the problem of foreign or itinerant workers. There are now somewhere in excess of 300,000 people from Baluchistan, Pakistan working in Japan. Many of them are there illegally but industries are dependent upon them.

So, when this government gets up and says that it is a world-wide problem and we have nothing to do with it, it really should examine this recession and its impact.

We went into the recession earlier, we went into it deeper, and we are going to stay in it longer. That is because of the government policies of introducing the GST, which has crippled our retail industry, because of the free trade deal, which has devastated our total balance of payments, and because of our high interest rate, which is still higher than in the United States. It has kept our dollar artificially high, thus making exports much more difficult and imports cheaper. This has been kept up over all the years that the Tories have been in power.

It has created difficulties, particularly in the province of Ontario, in the industrial heartland of Canada. So while the province is having economic difficulties because of the economic conditions created by this government, what has the government done to assist the province and the people?

I want to talk about just a couple of things that the government has done. The federal government of course has cut back on the Established Programs Financing which should be there for the provinces to assist in health care and post-secondary education, that great thing the government talks about, education.

There was a formula in place. The formula was based on so much going to the provinces increased by the increase in gross national productivity. It was not by expenditures, not by anything else, but as the country got more wealthy the money was to be transferred to the provinces based on the creation of additional wealth.

• (1510)

What happened? It started back under the Liberals. The Liberals decided that they had the formula but they did not like it and so they started cutting back. Even before the Tories came to power the cutbacks for Ontario amounted to nearly $300 million lost in 1982-1983 and another $360 million lost in 1983-1984. Today the losses are up to $2.6 billion a year. That should have been coming to that province based on the increase in the wealth of this country. A total of $11 billion was cut from the province, not only from health care but also from post-secondary education.

This is at a time when government member after government member stands up and says: "One of the things that is going to save Canada and guarantee the future of young Canadians is for them to get an education". So the government cut back the money going to the provinces for post-secondary education. It was cut back dramatically in the case of Ontario.

Look at what has happened in Ontario as the impact of this recession hits it in terms of the number of people on unemployment insurance or relying on income assistance.

The government anticipated this recession quite nicely because three years ago, it bailed out of any responsibility for directly financing or even partially financing the unemployment insurance system. It dumped that responsibility on employees and employers. That includes small business, municipal infrastructures, hospitals, schools which had to come up with the additional money.

Even with that the government then reduced the number of weeks a person could qualify for UI, it increased the number of weeks they had to work to get UI, and even with that in Ontario the number of people collecting UI went up dramatically to over 23 per cent from November 1990 to November 1991. The number of people who exhausted their UI in November last year was 32,000 which is up 111 per cent over the previous year.

What happens to the exhaustees? They have to go on income assistance. The income assistance case-loads have gone up dramatically. The case-loads are up to a point where there are now nearly 600,000 people receiving income assistance in the province, an increase of 32 per cent from January 1991. That is the number of cases. The number of individuals involved is 1.131 million. That is 1.131 million people receiving welfare.

Of course the federal government realized that it had sloughed off its responsibility under unemployment insurance. It had dumped it down to the provinces, to welfare costs. But lo and behold, it was responsible for 50 per cent of the cost of welfare and thought: "Aha, we cannot have that. We cannot be held responsible for the unemployed. We cannot be responsible for mothers looking after children. We cannot be held responsible for the damage we have caused. We will have to limit the amount the provinces can claim so it is no longer 50/50. We will limit the increase to 5 per cent." It knew full well that the increase in demand was around 32 per cent to 35 per cent but it would limit its liability to 5 per cent.

What does that cost the province of Ontario? The costs to the province of Ontario amount to an accumulated total of something in excess of $3.5 billion. In 1990-91 it was $400 million and in 1991-92 it is $1.3 billion. In 1992-93 it will be $1.8 billion.

The federal government said that it was not only washing its hands of the responsibility for creating this recession, it was not only washing its hands of trying to create employment and get people back to work, but it was going to systematically slough off to the provinces the financial responsibility for the people who have been so adversely affected. It sloughed off in terms of post-secondary education, health care, the number of people on income assistance and those receiving other types of support.

The government did not stop there. There are now other areas where it is sloughing off on the provinces. It has totally cancelled the co-op housing program and its responsibility to provide social housing. It is now cutting back on other social housing programs. We now have cutbacks in social housing right across this country.

It affects Ontario specifically by reducing the number of units being built by 1,957. That is nearly 2,000 units. This has an impact on people's lives. It comes at a time when CMHC has estimated that 560,000 Canadians need social housing to obtain adequate, affordable housing. With 560,000 people needing housing, what has this government done but cut back. It also cuts back on jobs because housing is one of the fastest generators of jobs in this country. It is labour-intensive construction. It employs people directly in the trades, in home building, in the supply industry supplying materials, in the manufacturing industry manufacturing materials, light fixtures, air conditioning systems, furnaces, everything.

It also has a multiplier effect very quickly because if those people are working they buy from the retail stores, they eat out in restaurants and there is a very quick acceleration of employment. Housing is probably one of the best investments a government can make to stimulate the economy.

There are other things that the federal government has done. I want to just briefly compare some of the things that the federal government has done and what the Ontario government has done in spite of the fact that the offloading has been on it.

Ontario started a job training fund in which it put in $1.1 billion over three years. It expects to create 100,000 jobs and provide training for another 800,000 people. An additional $930 million for worker retraining and adjustment is being scheduled for 1992–93. The federal government cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program. It has no momentum to try to deal with the high unemployment. The Ontario government immediately committed to building 20,000 new non-profit housing units. The figure in the street is 2.12 person years of labour, work, for every housing unit, plus the spin–off, which is probably three or four times that.

What did the federal government do? It cancelled the co–op program and it cut 2,000 housing units from the social housing program.

Infrastructure programs: The Ontario government immediately put in $34 billion in capital funding for schools, roads, homes for the aged, and other public facilities. This will support 67,000 jobs in 1992–93 alone.

What has the federal government done? It has ignored calls by all of the municipalities, all the mayors across this country, to fund a municipal infrastructure program on a shared cost basis with the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government.

This is municipal infrastructure that must be done. These are not luxuries. These are things that if we do not do it now they are going to cost us more in three or four or five years to do. These are basic sewers, roads, sewage treatment plants, hospitals, schools, all of the things that form the heritage that our kids need to make the community strong, to provide the economic base and the economic infrastructure for our small businesses and our industries.

This motion in one sense is very timely today. It focuses on the real difficulties being experienced by people right across Canada, and certainly by people in the province of Ontario. It shows that this government is either lacking in the will to solve the economic problem or the knowledge of how to solve it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I cannot help it, but when I get an opportunity to ask a question of the New Democratic Party, I cannot resist the temptation.

The member talks about many of the problems that we are having in the economy today. One of the problems that we are having is the fact that there has been almost a 50 per cent reduction in the amount of foreign investment that has come into the province of Ontario. One of the reasons why there is a hesitancy to invest in Ontario right now is because of the uncertainty created by the labour legislation that is being put forward by the NDP government.

I want to be perfectly clear to this House and to the member that we are not anti–labour here. We are not talking about that. The member is a fair member and I know that he understands that. But 85 per cent of the jobs that are created in the province of Ontario are created by small and medium–sized businesses. There is a skittishness out there in the market right now because of this labour legislation which, rather than advancing the cause of labour, seems to be frightening off entrepreneurs and investors. Does the member not think that part of the problem we are having in the province of Ontario is as a result of what appears to be an almost indifferent attitude toward small and medium–size business and some of the difficulties they are having? I am talking about a kind of indifferent attitude from the NDP Government of Ontario toward that sector of our economy?

Could the member try to explain it to this House and to the people of Canada and specifically to Ontarians? I cannot understand the proposed advantages of this labour legislation that the province is putting forward at this time.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have that question. One of the things that I want to make sure the member understands is that the New Democratic Party is probably the greatest supporter of small business in Canada and has been over the last number of years.

We realize that the generation of jobs in this country has been by small business. If we take a look at the jobs that were created up until the point of this recession, most of those jobs were created by companies employing less than 100 people.

One of the things that we are also aware of is that many of the difficulties that small businesses have experienced in this country is because of the legacy that they have inherited from the Liberals and the Tories, particularly the tax unfairness of the tax system created by the Liberals. They at the national level particularly created tremendous tax loopholes for the very wealthy and the big multinational corporations. Who had to pick up the slack of those big tax loopholes? The average Canadian.

Small businessmen and small businesswomen are average Canadians. I know. I ran companies prior to being elected.

We have in Ontario a legacy left by the provincial Liberal government of not only a whole backlog of economic problems in terms of unfair taxation, but also a whole backlog of things that it never got around to doing that it should have done. One of them was to update and modernize labour legislation.

Even the Liberal leader in the Ontario legislature yesterday admitted the only thing that she could think of to say that was wrong with the bill that was being proposed was the fact that it was poor timing. It was good legislation, but poor timing. The Liberals and the Conservatives had 20 years to bring it in. That was poor timing and it will always be poor timing.

The New Democrats are certainly willing to bring forward and modernize labour legislation to bring back economic stability and a fair labour climate within the province of Ontario, as they will do in Saskatchewan, as they will do in British Columbia and as they will do in Canada when they form the next government.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, now that we have established some of the weaknesses of the Government of Ontario, we perhaps could give a further analysis of what they are doing or should I say not doing on behalf of young people.

The member spoke at length about the importance of youth in Canada and indeed in the province of Ontario. I have a couple of questions. We have two examples of NDP governments, one in British Columbia and one in Ontario. On the one hand the same member that speaks to the issue of student support and support for young people must realize by now that the latest budget by the Ontario New Democratic Party basically stated that there was going to be a $10 million cut in Ontario's student assistance plan at a time when young people are desperately looking for work.

On the other side, in British Columbia we have another premier who has cancelled a very successful environmental youth corps for young people.

• (1530)

The NDP must come to grips with reality. We cannot be speaking and saying on the one hand. When we analyse exactly what is done I will tell you that we are suffering on both ends of the country.

We have a federal government that is Conservative, and we have a provincial government that is NDP. I will tell you that times are tough in the province of Ontario. We would like to soon have an election to re-establish things and have some order in this country.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I was just looking at the figures that I have here in terms of the loss of federal revenue for post-secondary education.

Health and post-secondary education amounts to $2.6 billion in Ontario this year. One-third of that is for post-secondary education. That is around $800 million. It is not surprising that if they have $800 million less coming from the federal government that they have to curtail this by $10 million.

The bulk of those cuts in transfer payments started under the Liberal administration in 1977. It did it again in 1982 when it cut back on the revenue guarantee. It did it in 1983.

In British Columbia, one-third of all of the cuts to post-secondary education and health care that are now in existence came because of the Liberal administration in the early 1980s and not because of the Tories.

It was well documented. It is there. The Liberal government in the early 1980s started the erosion of health care and post-secondary education in its cutbacks to the provinces and all that happened is that the Tories learned from the Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): One more short question.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague talk about Ontario and how short we are of money and at the same time about more government spending. He had a litany that took him 20 minutes to illustrate government spending. I would just like to give him a few statistics and ask him to respond.

About 10 years ago the budget in Ontario was $18 billion. Let us inflate that budget and go back 10 years in Ontario. We did not have a crowded health care system. We did not have an under-funded school system. We did not have an infrastructure that was collapsing. In fact things in Ontario were generally not bad relative to all those things that the member was talking about.

It spent $18 billion. Inflate that. That takes it to $28 billion in today's dollars. Add $5 billion because the population of Ontario has grown. That takes it up to $33 billion.

Would the member mind explaining to me why this year in Ontario they have to spend $52 billion to give in Ontario what 10 years ago $33 billion would have bought?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I think we should take a look at the history of increased spending and look at it particularly when Bob Rae inherited the terrible mess that was left over by the Liberal administration about 18 months ago.

The increase in the spending in those years was dramatic. That is where the difficulty is. During the boom years when Ontario should have been budgeting and planning for the economic downturn, it should have been building up reserves and doing all of the positive things. It should have made sure that its infrastructure was in place and that there were proper roads and schools and all of those things. It blew it. It frittered it away.

The Liberals just did not know how to spend. I want to contrast that to exactly what happens in Sweden under a democratic socialist government. It built into the economy mechanisms that during the boom times when things were good companies were forced to put aside so much money that they could then, when things were down, bring out for economic expansion.

They were forced to put aside money so that when things went down, job training and job creation could be brought out. You cannot expect to deal with the crisis and the mess left by this Tory and Liberal government after 25 years in Ontario and expect Bob Rae to solve it in 18 months. Give him five years and he will solve it and he will also be re-elected to serve as an NDP premier with Audrey McLaughlin as the NDP Prime Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a very short supplementary here from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, it will be a short supplementary. The New Democratic Party member made this reference that Liberals were not sensitive to small business. I just want to remind him and this House and the people of Canada that under Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau, there were more small business start-ups in this country than in all the years of government put together. We should never forget the fact that it was under the Liberal Prime Minister that the Small Business Loans Act came into play. The expansion of the Federal Business Development Bank, not to mention numerous other incentives, used the power of entrepreneurship to put people back into the work force.

I remember when the member for Winnipeg South Centre was the minister of employment, he came out with that very successful NEED program. It put close to 330,000 Canadians back to work in a 90-day period during the last recession. We used small business. The NDP should just read the facts.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, just before I answer that question, the Liberals and Tories seem to be enjoying this questions and comments period. I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to extend this period for another ten minutes so that I can continue.

It is probably true that under Mr. Trudeau there were probably more small businesses created than at any other time. They were probably all advertising firms or consulting firms that worked for the Liberal party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak today on the subject of the difficulties faced by the residents of Ontario. After that last exchange it is somewhat difficult to even respond.

If I may just digress for a moment, I might say that the labour legislation proposed by the NDP government of Ontario is causing some concern. As was mentioned by the member for Broadview—Greenwood, it certainly is in the area of investment in the province of Ontario.

There is one particular company in St. Catharines which is a multinational corporation which has kept it quiet, but made it clear, that there is no further investment to be made in their particular organization in Ontario at the present time. In fact, after reviewing the legislation, that may continue as well. That is the type of thing that is occurring in the province of Ontario now.

In addition, the member spoke about the tax system. It is very interesting that promises were made such that the tax system would be reformed. They had a commission on fair taxation. They were going to have a minimum tax on corporations. Lo and behold, when they looked at it they found out that maybe corporations were not going to have a minimum tax. Maybe they were paying their just due and perhaps putting an extra burden on them would affect their competitiveness.

It is surprising how the strictures of government seem to change the viewpoints and promises that are made during an election campaign. I am sure people will keep that in mind as they review these various matters.

Obviously, it has been a difficult time over the last few years. There have been difficult social and economic circumstances and, of course, this is extended to the province of Ontario as well. As my riding is in the province of Ontario, we have had some difficulties also. However, to say that it results from the negligence of the government and to lay it entirely at the feet of the government is not being completely above board.

Mr. Karpoff: I am sure it is.

Mr. Milliken: Which government?

Mr. Atkinson: Let us look at some specific circumstances. My community has been hurt by the recession and by what has gone on.

• (1540)

The announcement a few months ago that 2,300 jobs were going to be lost because of the closing of a General Motors foundry in St. Catharines was obviously devastating to the community. The immediate knee-jerk reaction was to blame the free trade agreement. That is interesting.

The auto pact has been in effect since 1962. It has done wonders for the North American automobile industry and the automobile industry in Canada has benefited greatly. It integrated the entire North American automobile market with certain safeguards, as they are called. One of those safeguards is that we will continue to produce as many cars as we consume here in Canada. The interesting fact is that we produce almost double the amount of cars we consume in Canada at the present time. We have benefited greatly from the auto pact.

The other safeguard is that the big three automakers are able to import parts from offshore duty free if they maintain a 60 per cent Canadian content level on the cars produced here above that which existed in 1962. They have always done that and they have continued to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I know you realize that you do not mix that with the 50 per cent content rule that exists in the free trade agreement. That does not apply to the big three although the big three have always maintained much more than that 50 per cent North American content.

On the day the announcement was made about those lost jobs in St. Catharines it is interesting that approximately 15,000 jobs were lost in the United States on the same day. The simple fact is that there is an overcapacity in the automobile market. This overcapacity has come about as a result of the imports. They are making greater and greater inroads into the North American market over what the North American automobile manufacturers are producing.

Unfortunately, a lot of that was the result of people thinking the quality of North American cars was not as good as the imports for quite a period of time. The big three have made certainly a great effort in order to improve their quality and the quality has improved. They are trying to win back their market but they have not been able to win back that market share. General Motors was set up throughout North America for a certain market share. That market share has been lost. Whether it will be regained or not is something we will have to wait and see.

Pessimists would say they are not going to regain that market and as a result the industry has to rationalize down to the capacity they need in order to meet the market demands. They have done that and as a result St. Catharines is going to be affected by that.

It would nice if people would purchase North American cars and get back to the capacity that previously existed. Then there would not be any pressure on them to close the foundry in St. Catharines. The foundry in St. Catharines cannot be expanded and as a result there are larger foundries n the United States that can take on the capacity that is necessary to meet the demands of the marketplace. The foundry in St. Catharines was modern and efficient, yet because of its mere size, this is causing the difficulties.

I also might mention that the foundry represents a portion of the entire factory in St. Catharines. It is not the closing of the entire factory. There are still approximately 6,000 jobs there, but of course they have to justify their existence just as the company in Oshawa has to justify remaining intact within the General Motors system.

The auto pact has worked well for us. It is intact. To say in a knee-jerk way that the loss of those jobs is a result of the free trade agreement is not being intellectually honest and cannot be allowed to continue in that manner.

Obviously we would like to save those jobs and see other jobs created. That is going to take an effort on the part of all of us in working together. To lump those 2,300 jobs together and say that that is a result of the free trade agreement is just not correct. These are the kinds of figures that the opponents to the free trade agreement come up with.

In the North American free trade negotiations—and this is where we may have an internal debate within Ontario—it would be nice to see the North American content be increased for the cars that are able to be exported duty free to the United States. I certainly would like to see a figure of 60 or 65 per cent come out of the North American free trade agreement. That will be beneficial to a community such as St. Catharines. There will be an internal debate within Ontario with the import manufacturers as to whether that is going to be beneficial in their particular case. Something such as that would certainly help the North American automobile industry and I will be watching very closely for that.

That was one example of what has happened. The knee-jerk reactions of some people indicates that happened as a result of the free trade agreement when it is not a function of the free trade agreement. The auto pact is intact. There is an over-capacity in the North American market. To say that those jobs were lost, to lump them in with all the other jobs that were lost, and say it is because of the free trade agreement is not correct. In a lot of instances that is what is occurring in other areas as well.

There have been losses as a result of the free trade agreement, as the Minister of State indicated. There were losses as a result of the implementation of the auto pact as well.

It was interesting that a union leader came before the St. Catharines city council when I was there and said: "You cannot allow the free trade agreement to go ahead". We debated and asked: "What was your initial reaction to the auto pact?" He said: "We were opposed to it. We did not like it. We thought it was going to be bad for us". We asked: "What is your reaction now?" His answer was: "Under no circumstances can you allow the auto pact to be affected by the free trade agreement". It was not. I asked: "What happened to you when the auto pact came into effect?" His answer was: "I was driving cab for a while". He was driving cab for a while because the plant in St. Catharines, which had made all the components for cars produced in Canada at that particular time, switched over to simply producing engines. It had longer production runs and better quality. After that initial restructuring it resulted in more jobs being created.

More cars are produced in Canada than we consume. We have been a net beneficiary of the auto pact. Similar benefits will flow from the free trade agreement but there is going to be a period of restructuring. A recession and an over-capacity in the automobile market in North America cannot be used as excuses to say that the free trade agreement is not working. To say that is to be intellectually dishonest.

I am glad to see that the Liberals have changed their position. Now they are saying that the free trade agreement should be renegotiated. It will be interesting to see what points they say they are going to renegotiate. However, accepting the free trade agreement and accepting the globalization that has occurred it is gratifying to see they have realized that is going to be their position. That was the position enunciated by their government House leader in this House during previous debates.

Free trade has benefited the Niagara peninsula. One industry that has really benefited is the grape and wine industry. During the negotiation of the free trade agreement it was widely assumed that the grape and wine industry would be a big loser as a result of the free trade agreement. There was no protection for the grape and wine industry and it had to rationalize very quickly.

It is interesting that it has produced high quality products and this year it has seen its market share jump drastically. It used to be that all surplus grape products were purchased by the federal government. Unfortunately, the grape and wine industry went through a period where it produced what might be called "pop wines" and so on, and again it developed a reputation in terms of the quality of its products that was not the best.

As a result of the free trade agreement and the Ontario legislation preventing Lambrusca grapes from being put into the wines it has now developed quality wines that are winning awards around the world. Entrepreneurs have realized that and moved in and used the grapes produced in the Niagara peninsula to secure these awards around the world.

An example is Don Ziraldo at Inniskillin Wines. His ice wines have won many awards.

This year there was not any surplus, the industry sold its entire grape product. Ontario wines are being sold in the United States and they are being sold in England. Unfortunately interprovincial trade barriers in this country prevent Ontario wine from being sold to Quebec and other provinces. It is easier for Ontario wine to get into the United States and even England than it is to get into the provinces of this country.

The result of the free trade agreement is that the industry has become more competitive, has produced better wines, and has succeeded. The fact that it cannot even sell in various provinces makes no sense. In that regard I certainly hope the constitutional negotiations succeed and we do create a true common market among Canadian provinces.

We spoke about training earlier today, and I think we all agree that training is most important. We will see what occurs from that particular aspect. The constitutional proposals indicate that the provinces will take over all training. That is something that causes me some concern because the federal government has done a commendable job in the training area.

It was interesting that in the testimony before the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee when the individuals who head the training assistance boards came before the committee they indicated that there certainly was enough money in all the provinces and the federal government for training. It was a matter of directing it. The provincial government itself has its skills training within 10 different departments. It is in the process of bringing those under one umbrella. However, the turf wars that will go on are going to hurt the individuals who need training. That is something we have to deal with.

The motion also refers to the social situation here in Ontario. I would like to touch on that briefly. My community has been hurt very badly recently by the deaths of two young girls and by what appears to be the accidental death of a third young lady. It has created a great deal of fear and anxiety about our system of law and order and the safety of our streets. This random violence has to be something that we all condemn, especially violence against women.

I am glad to see that the federal government is putting money into such things as transition houses and other things that will fight violence against women. However, there is also a role to be played through our justice system. I am glad that the federal government has taken some steps in that regard. They include the Extradition Act amendments which prevent individuals such as Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler from getting the benefit of being in our country and having the protection of our system here.

There is much discussion about the Young Offenders Act as well. It is interesting that the penalty for murder in the Young Offenders Act has been increased. Some people do not feel that is quite enough. There are jury considerations as to why the penalty of five years less a day was taken. Of course we should continue to review the young offenders' system. Perhaps through a system of education people will see that this system is not as lax as some seem to feel at the present time.

There is no provision for parole under the Young Offenders Act. Every sentence that is handed out under the Young Offenders Act is expected to be served for that entire term. Compared to an adult sentence, in a lot of instances the young offender is serving more time than the adult offender for a similar offence.

With regard to corrections, the corrections bill has been passed. I would like to read an editorial from the St. Catharines Standard, which says:

> Judges should get a little more power and police should get a little relief as a result of a long overdue bill passed last week in the Commons.
>
> Only criminals will regret the proposed law which will make it more difficult for violent criminals to get parole from prison. Victims and their families will welcome the fact that they will be provided with more information about offenders and their movements on parole or day passes, in addition to being allowed to attend parole hearings and give their views, regardless of a prisoner's wishes.
> Defence lawyers and prisoners' rights advocates have criticized the bill, claiming it is a political over-reaction to a mistaken public belief that crime is increasing and the justice system is too lenient.
> Fortunately, those who dispense justice and advocates of the rights of victims and society have finally had their voices heard, and Parliament has finally acted accordingly. It only remains for the Senate to do the same.

Improvements have been made and will continue to be made in the justice system. They include stronger firearms control, as well as the proposed rape shield law which is to be brought before this House. Also there is the drug strategy which is ongoing. I understand my friend from Scarborough—Rouge River discussed crack-houses. That certainly is something that must be considered in the justice area.

We have difficulties but we cannot allow them to darken our viewpoint and think that we are not going to be successful in this province and in this country. We are going to be successful. There are many things that we can look forward to.

For my particular community the free trade agreement will provide opportunities that will be available in that community. We cannot turn our back on it and say that we do not want to have free trade in this globalized economy.

It is interesting that the NDP say that it wants to have none of it, that it wants to abrogate the free trade agreement. The opposite of the free trade agreement is tariff barriers around this country, tariff barriers around a country of 27 million people. That is not a sufficient market. It was at one time. It was during Macdonald's era and so on. It is not sufficient.

If we want to build tariff barriers around the country and throw a dispute resolution mechanism aside we do it at our peril. It has been negotiated so that we have access to the U.S. market and we have a dispute resolution mechanism. We do not want to return to tariff barriers. We do not want to return to a trade war.

An hon. member: Go to GATT.

Mr. Atkinson: The member says go to GATT. That was the argument that was used during the election campaign. What has happened? We have not been able to reach a resolution at GATT.

What were we going to do? Were we going to just sit there and not do anything? Were we going to allow ourselves to just be dependent on GATT with our largest trading partner? Could the House imagine what would happen to this country? Could the House imagine how bad this recession would be now if we did not have the free trade agreement?

I am glad that the Liberals have finally seen the light, reversed their 1988 position and said that they are going to support the free trade agreement with negotiations. We are waiting to see what they want to change. However, do not throw away the one opportunity that we have to make this country better. Do not depend on GATT. We have seen that. We are going to try to negotiate it but do not depend on it, because it is not coming about. We certainly hope it will but it has not at this point in time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River who advanced this motion on the economy today on behalf of all members in the Liberal Party. I thought it was actually quite a constructive day. I think that Canadians will have a lot to digest when they review the tapes this evening.

I want to address the member for St. Catharines who always adds to the level of debate in this House. I say that, however I could not let the people of Canada think that we are in support of the government's position on free trade. While the government's position is a deal at any price our position is quite different. If we cannot correct the flaws in the free trade agreement—and our member for Winnipeg—St. James has said this repeatedly, and I know the NDP are playing this cute little game saying that we are in bed with the government—then we would call for the six month abrogation.

• (1600)

I know there is only a second left, but I would like to salute the member on his comments about law and order. I know it must be a very difficult time for his community because of the tragedies that have happened there. I would urge him to urge his colleagues to bring some amendments to the Young Offenders Act forward to this House at the earliest possible moment. All of us on all sides of the House would be behind him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe those were all comments, but if the hon. member has a little rebut he can go ahead. I will listen to him for 30 seconds.

Mr. Atkinson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments, but I am going from what his House leader indicated here. They said they are going to abrogate it if it cannot be renegotiated.

My hon. friend is a business person. He knows what it is like to negotiate a commercial agreement. He also knows about the give and take that has to go on in that regard.

We would certainly welcome their indication, probably before the North American free trade agreement, as to what they would like to see changed. That would be helpful.

Mr. Mills: Chapter 14.

Mr. Atkinson: One of the things I would like to see changed is the content on automobiles. I would love to see it go to 60 per cent or 65 per cent as I indicated in my speech. If that occurred, that would be fine. Let us not have these amendments that appear to me are going to be made in the NAFTA and would go back into the free trade agreement, and then have the Official Opposition come forward and say: "Those are not the ones that we want. We want something else".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being four o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved that Bill C-331, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (books), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to ask the Chair if there is unanimous consent to have this bill made a votable item so that Canadians will know where their member of Parliament stands with respect to the taxing of books and reading materials in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Duhamel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall try again later.

I am pleased that at long last I am being given the opportunity to correct what I believe is a gross injustice in law. That gross injustice is the application of the goods and services tax on books and reading materials. It is an absolutely insensitive measure on the part of government. I would hope that we could set partisan politics aside and look at this in an objective and open way.

It is a bad policy. It is contrary to fundamental, basic, democratic principles. This country has never had such a tax and most western countries do not have one. In fact Ireland tried it and the sales dropped so dramatically that it had the good common sense to remove it immediately. It is not only a bad policy, it is also extremely bad for business. There have been loss of jobs and loss of sales. We have demoralized our creative Canadians, those who write and create for a living, and we have picked on students who are very often those who need the most help. Some students in fact would not mind paying a tax I suppose if that money were returned to the coffers, but if you add that to the reductions in transfer payments, they are really very unhappy about what is happening.

It is a bad policy, it is bad for business, and I shall explore those areas with my colleagues, but it is also bad government.

It is bad government because I have received, and so have my colleagues, thousands of petitions asking the government to remove this undemocratic tax on books and reading materials. I went to an internal committee to see whether or not this could be made a votable item. I respected every single criteria which was before me. Yet the committee did not have the courage to make it a votable item.

I have requested a second time just now and I have been refused. How in the world could one consider that good government?

I am sure that Canadians will be extremely interested in what is going to happen here today. I want to remind my colleagues that it was in October 1990 that the Prime Minister indicated there might be some flexibility in this measure. It was in that same month that the then Minister of Finance indicated subsequent to implementation of the tax that there would be an opportunity to review it and to see whether or not it should be eliminated. The time is now. That was 20 months ago. Surely it is now time to look at this.

What has been the impact of that tax? What has been the impact? We can document every single point made here. It has reduced reading in Canada. It has driven Canadians to shop elsewhere. You have heard about cross-border shopping. It has harmed our writers, our publishers, our bookstores, our libraries and our students.

No doubt it has contributed in its own way to reducing literacy in a country that already has too many functionally illiterate Canadians. That costs the nation over $10 billion per year. It has also contributed to a loss of jobs, many, many jobs. Some publishers are no longer around and some writers can no longer continue.

Let us not kid ourselves. This goods and services tax is a tax on literacy. It is a tax on education, training, retraining, on research and development. It is a tax on learning, knowledge, culture and it is indeed a tax on democracy itself. The goods and services tax is taxing books, magazines and newspapers out of the hands of Canadians.

Let me quote some facts. Book sales dropped 10 per cent the first year of the GST. Subscription response dropped by 50 per cent immediately after the GST. News-stand sales of magazines dropped 10 to 15 per cent last year. The tax on reading has caused the largest drop in Canadian newspaper circulation in 50 years. Circulation dropped 5 per cent last year. Interestingly enough, during the 1981-82 recession, sales dropped by less than 1 per cent in this particular area.

The goods and services tax is driving Canadians out of the country to buy books and magazines. Bookstore sales in some provinces have dropped 20 per cent since the GST was introduced.

U.S. bookstores report that sales to Canadians in certain sectors increased astronomically after January 1, 1991. One store in Vermont now calls itself "Montreal's best English language bookstore", the best English language bookstore, one store in Vermont. You can be proud of that if you want to, but I am not.

The GST is taking books, magazines and newspapers out of Canadian libraries. The rebates to those institutions have taken up to six months. When the rebates come back, do they go back to the libraries? Of course not. They go back to the general revenues. Why do they go back to the general revenues? Because of the reductions in transfer payments, the offloading. Of course they feel that they need those revenues. So the libraries are losing those particular rebates in almost all instances.

What is extremely sad as well, quite apart from the astronomical increases in virtually every sector, the GST is silencing Canadian voices. It is a tax on creativity. It is a tax on culture. It is a tax on a fragile industry that is in peril. That is what the government has not understood. The GST gives a 7 per cent advantage to American magazines. A 7 per cent advantage. Tell any business person that they can have a 7 per cent advantage on a competitor and see what they do. They will take advantage of it.

I am told that there are more than 3,000 U.S. magazines that do not charge the GST on subscriptions.

• (1610)

The government cannot even try to collect it. At least 50 million magazines crossed into Canada tax free last year to compete directly with Canadian magazines on which the GST is paid.

The GST also gives a 7 per cent advantage to American books. Books imported by mail are tax free if they cost less than $20.

Mr. Boudria: Forty dollars.

Mr. Duhamel: Forty dollars? Thank you. My colleague has corrected me. There has been a change now. It is even better for the Americans and harder for Canadians.

The only major Canadian book club has closed since the GST was introduced. Surely no one is proud of that. The GST stops Canadians from getting the books and magazines they want. Some companies refuse to send books to Canada because of the additional burden.

Others have jacked up the prices so high that we can no longer afford them. These are the results of the goods and services tax on books. The tax on reading is an expensive nightmare to administer. Very often it cannot be collected and when it is collected, it can cost up to $100 per collection, probably not worth the time or the effort.

The GST is isolating Canada from the world. Let me give an example. Book collectors are buying outside the country to avoid the tax. Some foreign dealers refuse to trade with Canada. One Canadian rare book dealer reports that sales have dropped 35 per cent since 1990.

During the last recession, sales in this sector grew. As I indicated initially, many countries have refused to tax reading. I want to repeat again. Most western countries do not tax reading. It is seen as a regressive measure, as an insensitive measure, as a measure that goes contrary to basic fundamental human rights and principles.

In our country where we supposedly place a priority on competitiveness, on productivity, on creating a learning culture, clearly this goods and services tax on books and reading materials is inappropriate.

I had indicated that Ireland had tried the tax, and it was smart enough to remove it.

[Translation]

I wish this government could muster the same flexibility and political will, instead of just letting things happen and providing all kinds of arguments I certainly have no intention of supporting.

[English]

The GST may only be the beginning. You have heard about the harmonization of the tax with provincial sales taxes. If there is a GST tax on books and reading materials—there is because that is what we are discussing today—and if it is harmonized with the provincial system, then why in the world would there not be an additional tax imposed by the provinces?

I challenge my colleagues to get up and make a guarantee to Canadians that that will not happen.

My colleagues will know as well that we have received thousands of petitions from all over the country, from all socio-economic groups, from all backgrounds who have asked that this undemocratic, insensitive tax that has never been imposed in Canada before be removed immediately because it is contrary to the supposed goals of government: increased and enhanced productivity, more competitiveness and creation of the learning culture.

What does it do? It ignores these petitions. I assure my colleagues, and I would be delighted to table them if they want, that this is but a small sample. Talon Books from Vancouver, B.C. has written a long letter, but I shall quote but one phrase:

> I cannot express to you how important this issue remains to book publishers, book readers and students in Canada.

That is what Talon Books has had to say.

Oolichan Books from British Columbia also wrote in support of the removal of this tax which it sees as regressive.

I have another communique here from over 300 people from Simon Fraser University who say:

> We deeply believe, as do the majority of Canadians, that written or educational materials should not be taxed.

We cannot afford to penalize reading and learning in Canada.

> Taxing written materials not only discourages reading, it also discourages foreign publishers from exporting to Canadian distributors, penalizes Canadian publishers and distributors through increased operating costs and import prices, and restricts Canadians' access to and selection of books for their use—

It goes on. Let me just accentuate the next statement: "The costs of ignorance are immeasurable". That is what these people from Simon Fraser University are saying.

I have another communiqué from the Graduate Students Association of the University of Alberta which supports this bill to remove the goods and services tax on books. It says: "As Canada increasingly will be relying on jobs which demand post-secondary education, and as we move more and more toward a knowledge based economy, a tax on the vehicles of knowledge is doubly regressive".

I have a communiqué from a constituent, a professor, who shared with me a letter that he had received from an American publisher. The publisher says: "Canadian owners will be priced under other countries from now on rather than the former pricing under the U.S. and Canada label". The publisher explains that this is the result of high administrative costs connected to compliance with the Canadian GST that became effective January 1. Canadian members must also pay the 7 per cent tax on all orders shipped to Canada.

The publisher also says: "We will add the 7 per cent to the invoice we send to the society and the society should instruct members to include the 7 per cent GST in their payment to the society".

The publisher points to high administrative costs in connection with the goods and services tax and as a consequence is raising the prices to Canadian customers. These price increases range from 14 per cent to 19 per cent.

A French-speaking constituent wrote as follows:

[Translation]

"A dark day for Canada! You can count on our support. The GST is inhuman! How could anyone even think of making a case for a tax on reading, as if the revenue it produces could make up for the harm done to freedom of access to the written word!"

An author wrote not long ago: "Books are a gift from the dead to the living to help them live their lives." Need I say more?

[English]

I have two others. One is from my constituent, Mrs. Hart, who said: "I sure hope that you have success in getting the GST off books. It is disgusting to have this tax on reading materials". The second is from the Blais in my constituency. These are just excerpts: "We see the tax as a tax on reading. We want to see this particular tax removed from all books and magazines".

A final example is an article in The Globe and Mail that pointed out that the book Clinical Safety and Efficacy from the U.S., a technical publication, cost $110. After having gone through all of the hoops and hurdles that are there today it costs $224.28 Canadian.

[Translation]

Ladies and gentlemen, I think I have made a very clear case for the immediate removal of the GST on books and other learning materials. It is brutal, and it puts a tremendous burden on the industry and on all levels of society in this country. It also contradicts the basic principles of our society, as well as the government's so-called priorities, which are to increase productivity, make us more competitive and create a learning culture. Well, you do not create a learning culture, and you certainly are not going to motivate people with taxes like these.

[English]

I would like to complete my remarks with the following statement. I want my colleagues to listen very carefully. I seek unanimous consent of the House to adopt the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any standing orders and usual practices of the House, Bill C-331, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (books), be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Do I have that unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

• (1620)

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on this debate as someone who as a member of the finance committee participated rather extensively in the hearings across Canada when the GST legislation was introduced in this House.

I note the explanatory note in the particular bill introduced by the member for St. Boniface says:

The purpose of this bill is to exempt books from the application of the goods and services tax.

That is fine for the explanation, but if we look at the actual clause to be inserted in the bill it says:

The supply of any book, paper, record, tape or other document published by a publisher.

I presume that not only includes written books but all tapes, records and videos: everything that has anything to do with the recording industry and movie industry. The list would be rather extensive. It is with that in mind I want to make my particular comments.

During the member's presentation he talked about what other countries have done. He referenced Ireland, and I will presume the information he provided on that country is correct. It is interesting in his presentation he would lead us to believe that literacy has in fact been reduced because of the implementation of the GST.

Most countries involved in the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development have this kind of tax and in fact tax books. Two countries, Sweden and Denmark, have a value added tax of 20 per cent on books and reading materials. I might point out that neither one of those two countries is known for its high illiteracy rates. In fact probably the opposite is true.

He also suggested several other things relating to the impact of the tax on the cost of books, on students and so on. The member should be aware there are no GST charges applicable on such things as tuition fees or entrance fees to universities or educational institutions. Libraries, schools and universities—I did not hear him mention any one of those three—qualify for a rebate of the GST. The GST has no impact on their cost greater than the existing cost that occurred when the old federal sales tax was in place. This argument that those institutions have somehow seen an added cost is erroneous, to say the least.

I want to comment further. In his presentation he used the word exempt. If one is at all familiar with the legislation, one has to understand that to make a category or a product exempt increases the cost of the product. I realize that is a difficult term, but let us put it this way. All the inputs related to the production of a book, a tape, a magazine or whatever, are produced by business. Businesses qualify for a rebate of all GST they pay on their inputs. The cost of paper they buy and the cost of services they buy, such as telephone, transportation, printing and typesetting, qualify for GST at the present time but at the end of the day they get the GST back.

Under this proposed bill the businesses would not qualify for a rebate of the GST. They would have to absorb that into their costs of operation effectively raising the price, raising the cost of production of all these things to which the member referred. Putting somebody in an exempt category is probably the worst place.

All we need to do is ask the insurance industry, the doctors and other members of the medical profession whether they like being considered exempt. We will not find one that likes being there because effectively it has increased their costs. This bill is proposing to increase the cost to the very industry this member is complaining is under special pressure.

I am not going to debate whether it is under special pressure, but part of the argument the member uses is that people are not prepared to ship books into Canada because of the added burden of the paperwork. That seems to be a real plus for the Canadian book industry. If the industry in the United States is not prepared to send books into Canada because of the paper burden—and I will accept the argument as it was put—the Canadian industry is at an advantage. The U.S. industry is not prepared to participate in shipping products into Canada. Conversely the GST has been good for the Canadian industry, using the very argument the member makes.

He says that competition does not want to come to Canada.

Let us go back to the exempt status for which he asked. One of the things we faced in our deliberations across Canada was the idea of compliance, the rules on how businesses would implement the GST, how they would sell their products, and how the government would refund the GST to them.

We can just imagine that across the country there are all kinds of small variety stores. Literally everything they sell is taxable under the GST proposal. There are many small gift shops, books stores and department stores. Let us just think where we can buy a magazine, a book, a tape or a film. What they would have to do is segregate their sales. They would have to list all sales that are taxable and keep separate records of all sales that are now exempt under this member's system.

Mr. Mills: They have to do that now.

Mr. Soetens: I would argue with the member for Broadview—Greenwood. The store that sells 100 per cent taxable items needs to keep no records. At the end of the month it is simply that everything sold is taxable.

Mr. Mills: What store is that?

Mr. Soetens: I can mention all kinds of stores. The member should go over to Eaton's and ask what it sells or go into K–Mart and ask what it sells. He has just to travel this country to see that there are thousands and thousands of gift shops where everything they sell is taxable. He asked: "What store?" There is no shortage of them anywhere in this country.

Everything in the particular store he walks by at the airport as he goes to fly home is taxable. He is now proposing that what it sells in the way of magazines will not be taxable. He is putting a burden on small business to keep a separate record of what is taxable and what is not taxable.

The donut shops of this country are already complaining because if they sell five donuts they have to charge tax and on six donuts they do not.

Mr. Mills: That is my point.

Mr. Soetens: Now they have to keep tax records because of that and he is going to say to those donut shops that also sell magazines: "Not only are you going to have to keep tabs when you sell more than six donuts; you are going to have to keep tabs on all the magazines you sell". The donut shops have a problem. With what the member for St. Boniface is proposing, not only would we be placing this problem on the donut shops. We would be placing it on every shop across the country that sells books, magazines, tapes, records, movies and what not.

If I need say nothing else that alone is good enough reason to oppose what the member is recommending in this particular private member's bill. It goes a little further than that.

During the debate that took place on the GST a lot of people came forward and complained about complexity. The simple solution to the complexity problem is to tax everything. There is a substantial group—and I am one of them—that shares the opinion that complexity was required because it was awfully difficult to tax every product that exists in this country. There was a trade–off and in making trade–offs we have to make some decisions. The decision was that books, magazines, tapes and all such other things would be taxable.

The alternative exists. If one wants to describe a particular text book, a book that someone may want to buy because it is a valuable education instrument, one gets into the same problem. One does not want those taxed and somebody can legitimately argue the reason for that. However, I suspect there are certain magazines that people think should be taxed much more heavily.

Although the member's bill does not particularly draw a line as to what is taxable and what is not, obviously it would put in place a supposed benefit by eliminating the tax on literally every product that has anything to do with recording information.

I would say that the tax was fundamentally correct. There are mechanisms to make sure that those who have difficulties at the low end of the scale, low income Canadians, get back enough through the sales tax credit to be able to afford the magazines and books they want. All in all this private member's bill is one that I simply cannot support.

• (1630)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to get an opportunity to stand and debate Bill C-331. I want to congratulate my hon. colleague, the member for St. Boniface, because I think this is a piece of legislation that is long overdue.

The fact is that the government's imposition of the GST which has been in place for some time now has amounted to an unfair tax on literacy.

In Canada, approximately 30 per cent of our adult population is functionally illiterate. The worst thing that this government could have done is to bring in a tax on reading which amounts to a tax on literacy in this country.

As a result of the imposition of this tax, the publishing industry has been hit extremely hard. Revenues in the industry have plummeted, partly because of the GST as I mentioned and also partly because of this government's made-in-Canada recession that we have been battling for some time now.

Across this country we have seen publishers reporting revenues down some 20 per cent this year as compared to previous years. That is a significant drop in revenues, much of that because of the imposition of the 7 per cent tax on literacy.

The chair of the Don't Tax Reading Coalition indicated that economists in the tax analysis branch of the Ministry of Finance told her: "They put books and magazines in terms of an increase in price resistance on the part of consumers somewhere around one and a half to two times the tax".

What we really are trying to say here if we put it in other words is that a drop in sales will be seen of some one and a half to two times the rate of the tax increase. By the look of the 20 per cent decrease in revenues compared to the 7 per cent increase in tax, we are seeing it is even greater than has been predicted by these economic forecasts.

The government did know at the time it imposed the GST that it would in effect be taxing literacy in this country.

I want to add that youth employment, particularly in lower job categories, but for that matter employment in all age categories has not been assisted by this tax on literacy. When we look at youth employment, university students in Canada who are already facing poor employment opportunities and increasing tuition are now faced with the purchase of books costing upward of $100.

It is very seldom in a university course one buys a single book. Often numerous books have to be purchased for a single course. Anyone who has gone to university knows that courses only requiring one textbook are few and far between.

This tax makes it hard on our university students, particularly those having to finance their own education. It is an unfair tax. It is a tax on literacy. It is a tax on opportunity for higher education. It is a tax that should be rescinded.

Countries in all corners of the earth are focusing on the development, the nurturing, and the educational opportunities for their young people. More money is put into schools and education and it forms the basis for a growing fertile mind. That is not the case in Canada. Not only does this country not put more money into education—in fact we see evidence of the federal government withdrawing funds from post-secondary education—but now it also taxes these growing young minds by taxing that which those minds need to grow in the first place and that is the tax on literature and books.

Over a year ago, the Prime Minister mused publicly that this government would reconsider the wisdom of the imposition of the GST on books. In the throne speech last year, I might remind everyone, he gave his commitment to developing a learning culture to enhance Canadian literacy. Yet this same government has refused to entertain the rescinding of this punitive tax on literature and literacy.

The government instead gave the publishing industry a $140 million boost. At the same time it has overtaxed the consumers of the products these industries produce. I would say in terms of this question the government has been anything but consistent.

The book industry is still appealing to this government to repeal the tax. Canadians who buy books just to enjoy them are leaving those books on the shelves because they are getting more and more expensive. The imposition of this 7 per cent increase in price has had a substantial effect on the purchase of those materials.

Canadians are cross-border shopping more and more. They are buying books and magazines south of the border because in the United States the cost is lower.

This government has placed Canada in the unenviable position of being one of the very few English-speaking countries in the world to impose a sales tax on reading materials and books for education. Some countries like Ireland tried it, but it quickly realized its mistake and at least had the courage to admit the mistake and rescind the tax. This government has not recognized the mistake. I suspect even if it has, it does not have the courage to do something about it.

The $140 million subsidy to the publishing industry was needed. It is recognized that it was needed, but it is not nearly enough for an industry that has been virtually sold out by this government with the imposition of this punitive tax on literacy.

The Baie Comeau policy which would have strengthened the Canadian publishing industry was simply ignored by this government. This new program, the $140 million fund for book publishing, will not be effective unless it is enforced with vigour.

I would submit that much can be done to assist the book publishing industry in this country. Much can be done to assist the learning culture in this country, and much can be done to assist the opportunity for education for our young people in this country by rescinding this tax.

The government should recognize it made a serious error in taxing literacy. It should have the courage to admit it made a mistake and it should have the courage to rescind its legislation. Yes, it should have the courage to accept the current bill that is before this House and to proceed with that bill.

It is time that this government withdrew the 7 per cent goods and services tax from books and literature and gave the booksellers and publishers in Canada a break. The industry needs more than the token relief that has been proposed.

This is a good piece of legislation. I congratulate my Liberal colleague for introducing it. I would ask that this House consider granting unanimous consent that the bill be now read a second time and moved immediately to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the opportunity this afternoon to speak on this very important issue. First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface for his foresight in bringing this matter to our attention. Need I remind the House that the member for St. Boniface is an educator. He obviously knows quite a bit about this subject, far more than many of us in this House. He is also a former deputy minister of education. He is a tenure professor at a university as well. He probably has a number of other credentials that this House should know about as well but I will not be describing them this afternoon because I want to get on with describing the bill that our colleague proposes.

• (1640)

The member for St. Boniface very astutely pointed out earlier to us today that the bill in question seeks to correct an injustice, one that other governments elsewhere in the world have corrected.

The hon. member from Winnipeg across the way will no doubt be aware that it was none other than the Prime Minister who promised in a speech that this whole business of taxing books would be examined again.

I would certainly not want to contradict the Prime Minister. I would never want to contradict the Prime Minister, but what I want to do now, and what my colleague wants to do, is take the Prime Minister up on his offer. We want to remove the tax on books, as the Prime Minister wants it.

Perhaps some members across the way will contradict the Prime Minister, but certainly not I or the member for St. Boniface because of our tremendous respect for the Prime Minister. We want to remove the GST on books, as the Prime Minister promised that he would.

My colleague from St. Boniface has talked about the loss of jobs in the Canadian book publishing industry, the Canadian magazine and periodical industry and so on. He is obviously quite right. I want to touch on an issue that has been raised in a peripheral way earlier today, but one which I had been involved in. That is the whole issue of cross-border shopping, because many books are purchased that way.

There were not that many a number of years ago. I suppose we could argue that there were always too many because books are unfortunately shipped in great portions into this country compared to what we can export elsewhere. It is an unfortunate thing but it is going from bad to worse.

Many Canadians are members of book clubs, and some of these book clubs are based outside the country. There used to be a situation in which whatever you bought outside the country you had to pay customs on whenever it entered Canada. However, some four or five years ago the government exempted every purchase coming from outside the country so long as it was coming by mail and it was under $40 from all duties and taxes. That meant that someone could take a large padded shipping envelope and fill it up with books, or whatever number of books you could put in it as long as it totalled less than $40, and send it to a client in Canada.

If the client in Canada purchased $75 worth of books you just divided the books as evenly as you could between two bags and shipped two bags into Canada.

Mr. Duhamel: Or three or four.

Mr. Boudria: Or whatever the number is, as my colleague from St. Boniface says. Three or four or whatever the number.

That loophole was in itself a disincentive for Canadians to buy books at home and an incentive to buy them elsewhere.

When the GST was added on top of that, there were two reasons to buy books outside of Canada. There was an exemption from whatever duties there might have been and also an exemption from GST. As you do not pay the GST there is no mechanism for the province to collect the provincial sales tax. However, in any case, I do not know of a province that has a provincial sales tax on books. Nevertheless, there was no way to collect that tax if a province were to have so chosen.

In any case, the GST does apply on books, and it and any duty is not collected.

The government now says: "We will fix that because we will now charge the GST and anything else that is applicable on purchases of $20". It has proposed a bill that is at report stage. It should be debated within the next week or so.

Nevertheless someone can still buy a book, or several books, for $19.90 and ship the order into Canada in various packages of $19.90. The government has now applied a $5 surcharge on every purchase coming into Canada by mail. It is an administration fee by the post office and that is not bad in itself, except that the U.S. post office charges roughly $10 in a similar situation.

It charges $8.40 U.S. which is roughly $10 Canadian. Actually, it is about $10.50 with the present value of our currency. If the Canadian government wanted to apply reciprocal rules why did it charge $5 instead of $10? If it really was serious about curtailing cross-border shopping of many goods, including books, it could at the very least have imposed similar fees.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining to me, I would like to emphasize that this initiative is a bad policy and undemocratic. Of course it is bad for the book publishing industry, for editors and those who publish Canadian books. It creates more unemployment, as if we did not have enough already.

The government does not listen to Canadians, especially since, need I remind hon. members opposite, as I said somewhat jokingly a little earlier, the Prime Minister himself promised a group of Canadians a while ago to review this whole policy of collecting the GST on books. If the Prime Minister was serious then, I think he should take the opportunity in the next few minutes to telephone the members opposite in the lobby and remind them that he made the promise. The hon. member for St. Boniface did not promise Canadians that the GST would not apply to books, neither did the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell; the Prime Minister himself did. The member for Winnipeg sitting opposite should remember. I am sorry if I interrupt her to remind her of this fact, but she should know that.

[English]

The member for Ontario should know that as well, because I am sure the member for Ontario was aware that the Prime Minister made that promise. Both he and his colleague from Winnipeg sitting across the way, who are preparing right now presumably to destroy this good piece of legislation, should know that what my colleague has proposed is a mechanism to achieve that which the Prime Minister himself promised to Canadians.

If promises of the Prime Minister mean anything—

Some hon. members: Be more accurate.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, could you imagine Tories asking others to be more accurate? The Prime Minister told Canadians that he would look at this issue. If the member across is convinced of what he is saying then let this bill proceed to committee. Let him and any others who still want that tax speak before the parliamentary committee that will deal with it.

If his argument has any sense at all he can make it before all the parliamentarians on the committee. I will make a prediction that the hon. member and others would not risk that. Instead, it is gong to be easier to kill the bill on the floor of the House of Commons than to muster up the intestinal fortitude necessary to defend the policy before one's colleagues in a parliamentary committee. That is the sad reality that we are faced with this afternoon. It is easier to kill the promise of the Prime Minister on the floor of the House than trying instead to defend what it is that the Conservative members are saying they will defend before a parliamentary committee.

• (1650)

We will see in a few minutes just where the strength is of those members. They could right now agree to the motion that my colleague moved earlier today to refer this issue to a parliamentary committee and to study it. They will hear the witnesses from the book publishing industry. They have that opportunity. They have that power this afternoon. They have the full authority to do that. Let us see.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of respect for my hon. colleague across the way whose bill we are debating this afternoon. I know that he is an educator and a person with a great deal of concern for people in general and particularly for students.

I want to ask him something before I launch into the rest of my remarks. Perhaps he could cogitate over this. How would he differentiate between what is educational and what is entertainment? Would he exempt from tax such publications as Penthouse or perhaps commercial catalogues. Those are all books and things that people read. Would he exempt from taxation music or adult videos which are educational tools? Videos are educational tools, but some of them perhaps are not educating people in the way that the hon. member has intended in his bill.

There are complications that I would like him to think about. I do not think that he wants us to exempt Sports Illustrated for example from the GST. I think he should think about those things.

We all know that the GST replaced a very destructive tax. It was 13.5 per cent and we all remember those days. When I was the president of the chamber of commerce and in business, business people came before us all of the time saying: "Get rid of this pernicious, underground, hidden tax on manufacturers". At the time that the tax was rescinded and the GST was put in place, it was 13.5 per cent. It was called the silent killer of jobs and there was good reason for that because indeed that is precisely what it did.

The GST actually replaced something that Canadians had been asking for a long time to be replaced with a 7 per cent tax. It is a point of sales tax on a broad base and it is a much fairer way of providing much needed revenues for all of the programs and services that we want in this country. One of these things in particular is education. My hon. colleague across the way would agree that this is a very worth-while activity for governments to engage in funding.

There are exemptions of course to this value-added tax that we put in place to replace the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and they are important exemptions. These are exemptions that occur for residential rents for example, and prescription drugs and day care services. None of these things have the GST applied to them.

In addition to that we have done more. There is a refundable GST credit for families that are earning under $30,000 a year. These are low and modest income families. This credit makes many of those families better off now than they were before the GST was imposed. All of these measures are very helpful to making sure that Canadians on low and modest incomes can access all of the books that they need in order to improve their education.

I think that even the members on the other side of the House will recognize that the GST is a modern and efficient way of raising funds that are needed by governments in order to carry on the business of government and to provide the kind of services that my hon. friend across the way—and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who has just spoken—will recognize as being things that they themselves taught Canadians to expect.

Certainly we have to find the funds now to pay for these things. The GST is a fair way of doing this.

Of the world's most highly industrialized economies, members of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, 19 out of 24 countries rely on a value-added tax system in order to do the same things we want to do. That is to have a fair system, one that is modern and meets the needs of a modern world.

Hon. members know that Canada is just one of 48 countries, among them Sweden, Germany, even Japan, which have a value-added tax system. They have come to realize that this is a reasonable way of raising the revenues required to carry on business.

We have to recognize that this is a new world. This is a global community that we live in now, a borderless world. It is no longer possible to live in economic isolation. We can no longer have internal policies and programs that separate us from the the world economy. Therefore, we would not want Canada to fall out of step with those major competitors we have in the rest of the world.

This tax is part of that. This is part of a comprehensive measure that the government has in place to modernize Canada's economy, to make us more competitive so that in the long run, Canadians will be more prosperous.

Canadians will be more highly educated because they will have access to more educational materials, including books. This is just one of the measures which will make it possible for Canadians to realize the full potential of the wealth that exists in this country in a more fair and even-handed way.

The GST is undoubtedly the key to strengthening Canada's economy and to working out the fiscal problems which have occurred and grown over the past two or three decades as we taught Canadians to expect more and more from their government.

It is just one of the programs that we have created to try and produce a better standard of living for all of us. Since 1984, we have introduced many measures that would really enhance our economic viability in this country. Even my hon. colleagues would acknowledge that the GST is a more fair and sensible tax. I saw them vote in favour the other day of keeping this intact.

The GST has removed a tax burden from Canadian businesses that is enabling them to become more efficient. I might say that because the federal sales tax was levied at the manufacturers' level, even books suffered to some degree from the underground effects of that tax. If manufacturing equipment was bought on which to print books, federal sales tax and provincial sales tax were paid on that equipment. Or it was paid on inks or on hand cleaners, depending on what was being done. So there was a component of the tax in publications.

In addition to that, it is true that there may be an emotional appeal to removing the GST from books. But as I began by saying, it is an administrative nightmare to try and make a subjective judgment on what is educational and what is not, what should be taxed and what should not.

I believe that most Canadians would not want to see publications like Penthouse magazine or Sports Illustrated exempt from the GST or commercial catalogues exempt from the GST.

The government has put a system in place that gives lower income and modest income Canadians some additional funds to cover the cost added to the price of a book because of the GST. It has done something, and $140 million is quite something, to support the publishing industry in order to keep the cost of books down.

In order to make sure that people who are in the business of producing books are competitive and that we produce the kinds of books Canadians want to read, we want to reduce the burden of the administration of the tax such as the GST.

My colleagues across the way would agree with us when we say that we support literacy. The GST is not a literacy issue. We have done everything that we can to alleviate any of the possibility of adverse effects of the GST. We all support literacy and the GST is a fair way to raise funds for the future prosperity of our nation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business—

An hon. member: Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that it is five o'clock. On a point of order, the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I have been denied making this a votable item twice, once by the internal committee and once again today. I have been denied having this bill sent to second reading. I think that we can address the concerns that my colleagues on the government side have voiced and explore others, such as how this might contribute to a united Canada, how much we spend in this area and how much we collect, so that we can in fact—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. Does the hon. member—

Mr. Duhamel: The Prime Minister has said that he may exempt books from the GST—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is still debate. If the hon. member—

Mr. Duhamel: I just want to make this request. I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the order, withdraw the bill and have the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not agreed.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being five o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR ENSHRINEMENT OF HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Constitution should enshrine the obligation for the government to provide universal, publicly funded hospital and medical care to all citizens.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in a matter of days, the first ministers of this country will meet in the hope of drafting a constitutional accord that will be acceptable not only to themselves but to Canadians.

These ministers will collectively be the target of public wrath if they fail to reach an agreement that justifies so many years of constitutional wrangling at taxpayers' expense.

The Prime Minister will have to reconcile the crippling price that the nation paid for his pursuit of a footnote in history. The Canadian Confederation was put at risk to extinguish the regional discontent that his government resurrected and inflamed. This government opened a Pandora's box and the entire nation has been engulfed in the fall-out. Millions of dollars of taxpayers' money have already been lost while the nation's economic crisis has been sorely neglected and mismanaged by this government.

After investing so much in a flawed and misdirected process, Canadians are now demanding a return. They will not settle for a raw deal that merely shifts powers among the politicians. Most citizens see no benefit in the transfer of authority from one bureaucracy to another. In the end they will be asking whether all they got from the last several years of constitutional noise was the bill. Voters in any national referendum will be expecting an accord that is intimately relevant to their lives and their needs.

That is the reason I am proposing here today:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Constitution should enshrine the obligation for the government to provide universal, publicly funded hospital and medical care to all citizens.

There is nothing more relevant to Canadians than their health. From St. John's to Victoria, Canadians regard our system of universal health care as the most identifiable privilege of being on Canadian soil.

The right of Canadians to health care is not protected by our Constitution and consequently it must endure the deliberate efforts of the current government to pillage our health care resources to finance their experiment in neo-Conservative dogma, the abandonment of the just society.

Since 1984 this government has made seven unilateral reductions in transfer payments to the provinces for health and post-secondary education. This will represent a $97.6 billion loss to these services by the year 2000. This government's commitment to health care is clearly focused on ways to dismantle it.

On March 21 the Minister of National Health and Welfare terrified many Canadians by labelling medicare as sacred. We all know that sacred in Tory double-speak means next in line for the axe. Within 10 years the federal government will no longer be making any significant cash contributions to health care in this country. It will no longer be able to enforce the provisions of the Canada Health Act by threatening to withhold payments. This will open the door to the imposition of user fees by provincial governments.

User fees will be a decisive first step toward an American-style system of commercial health care. It is a system where those with the means to pay are served, but those unable to pay must go without or lose their homes or life savings to pay for treatment. American health care is nothing more than a half trillion dollars a year extortion racket. Americans must pay up or risk bodily harm by being denied treatment.

In pre-Tory Canada our focus was the quality of medical care as opposed to the size of medical profits, a matter which dominates attention south of the border. Canadians are too civilized to accept the barbarism of cash and carry medicine which this government is ready to import from the United States. This is one product that all Canadians want stopped at the border.

Already under-funding of Canadian health care has caused many patients to escape lengthening waiting lists for elective surgery or specialized tests by travelling to the United States where timely treatment is available although only at a premium. Effectively Canadian governments have contracted out certain services to American facilities by not making the same services sufficiently available in Canada. Such measures threaten the comprehensiveness of health care services in Canada and make them a more appealing target for privatization.

• (1120)

Canadians need their Constitution to insulate medicare from the chills of ever-changing political agendas. Even the loud advocate of the social charter, the NDP premier of Ontario, backed away from full protection of medicare when he chose to cut health services in his own province rather than curtail his socialist agenda.

The temptation to shirk the largest and most important responsibility of his government was too great for Premier Rae to resist. The social charter now declawed and renamed the social covenant is little more than social fantasy.

If a government were to renege on its so-called commitment to medicare utterly there would be no recourse at all through the courts on constitutional grounds. However, the social covenant may lull many Canadians into being complacent about the continuing threats to their health care system. Some will believe the social covenant will morally bind all governments to preserve and promote universal health care, but most Canadians know only too well that commitments do not bind political leadership. Only the courts can do that.

Canadians do understand the difference between a legal right and a rhetorical blight. A right not protected by the courts is no right at all. A social covenant will not deter the current federal and provincial governments from discrediting our medicare system through a policy of decay that will ultimately render medicare unable to meet the needs of Canadians.

A social covenant will fail to raise the status of medicare on either the big business or the big labour agenda. Canadians are justifiably suspicious of political commitments and the politicians who glibly make them.

They understand the fate of Canadian medicare is in the hands of individuals who would never feel personally threatened by American style cash before cure health care. They know that members of this House and other legislatures across the country are in general people who have a hard time relating to the working poor in this country because they have only experienced poverty as spectators.

Many politicians cannot believe that a family would find U.S. medical insurance deductibles of $250 to be cause to postpone or forgo treatment even for their children. The struggle to make ends meet is foreign to the opponents of medicare. We in this place must understand that we are each creations of our own experiences. We must defiantly reject the message that is promoted by the right wing groups who tell us that we have shared too much and those who cannot afford are not deserving.

That is the philosophy that has created so much suffering and disharmony in the United States, but medicare is not merely a social program for the less fortunate. It is a security blanket for every member of our society, rich or poor.

Canadians do not have to negotiate with insurance brokers to be sure their children will get the care they need if they fall ill. No Canadian will have to cancel an operation because his employer laid him off and cancelled his health insurance. We as Canadians have a security, a peace of mind that cannot be found among American workers.

Unfortunately what Canadians have taken for granted their government has taken to the pawnbrokers. The enemies of medicare will not only deny the benefits that universal health care services offer to the majority of Canadians, but will also ignore the undeniable economic benefits to our nation as a whole. We have been able to insure all Canadians using less than 9 per cent of our gross national product when it costs the United States 11 per cent to operate a private system that leaves 40 million people bereft of any medical protection at all.

Canadians understand what the demise of universal health care will mean to them and to their families. Many have already experienced the culture shock that comes with U.S. medical practices.

While sensational stories of people being denied life-saving treatment and the potential for medical refugees coming to Canada from the United States may impress television viewers, Canadians travelling to the United States experience firsthand the inhumanity of the U.S. system. Patients are treated as customers while health care workers are more bill collectors than they are caregivers.

One of my own constituents recounted an occasion while vacationing in Florida when his five-year old daughter fell in a bathtub and required stitches to close the cuts to her face. Her father was shocked and enraged when the hospital workers refused to treat his bleeding five-year old child unless he paid in advance or produced insurance documents.

Fortunately he had the necessary insurance but, nevertheless, the experience left him and his family eager to return to medical civilization north of the border.

This was not a dramatic case of life and death but demonstrated the humiliation and despair that is felt by Americans who do not have full medical coverage. Forty million people in the United States who are not covered by any insurance plan live in fear of the day that they will need medical treatment and be denied.

We in Canada like to believe that we live in a more caring and less predatory society than the United States.

It is experiences like the one I just described that have caused Canadian universal medicare to be so prized and the American alternative so despised. So cherished is medicare in Canada that there are many groups that would claim to have fathered the Canadian philosophy of universal medicare.

We on this side of the House know that medicare was conceived at the national Liberal convention in 1919 in a speech by William Lyon Mackenzie King. He envisioned more than seven decades ago that Canada should have a system of insurance against sickness. He called for effective legislation for the conservation of human health.

It was not acceptable for a worker when sick to be helpless in the matter of meeting the great problems of invalidity, said King. He and his successors as Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada fought against great adversity to implement the universal health care we enjoy today.

Opposition came from short-sighted organizations whose own economic position, they thought, was enhanced by the suffering and insecurity endured by those who could not afford the medical treatment available to those with the means to pay.

While Liberal governments braved the scorn of the intolerant, the greedy and the indifferent, the voices of those who would have us reverse our progress toward a more civilized society have not yet been silenced.

If universal publicly funded health care is not enshrined in the Constitution as a justiciable right, the implications will not be lost on the Canadian public.

The NDP Government of British Columbia has already brought in health care premiums that have caused a small but significant portion of its population to be uninsured and financially vulnerable to sickness. Effectively universal health care has already been compromised by the NDP government in British Columbia.

• (1130)

It is not surprising to find that this particular government will not sign an agreement that will make its own policies unconstitutional.

This is the dilemma that gave birth to the toothless social covenant. Canadians have learned to anticipate the worst from their governments. They know that a government unprepared to protect universal medicare is a government preparing to dismember it. That is the basis for our Liberal dissent position in the report of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee where we advocated precisely the terms of the motion before the House today.

Unlike the other national parties we Liberals are not willing to compromise on our obligation and responsibility to uphold the principles of universality and fairness in health care.

Canadians should scrutinize the events of the next few days very closely indeed. Front page promises and back page retractions have formed the strategy of governments of the day for too long. The entrenchment of medicare will distinguish this round of constitutional bickering by yielding a tangible and recognizable benefit to Canadians from every part of this country.

If this constitutional round were able to arrest the decay of Canadian medicare then Canadians would truly be better off through the efforts of politicians, and that would be historic.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR ENSHRINEMENT OF HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Guarnieri (p. 11527).

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak this morning on the federal government's commitment to vital social programs, notably health care.

I would like to assure the House that the government's commitment to universal health care services is not in question. The Canada Health Act ensures that all Canadians, wherever they reside, are entitled to equal access to hospital and medical care. The government has reaffirmed this commitment time and time again.

Our commitment to health care is only one example of the government's efforts to improve the well-being of Canadians. I would like to take a few moments to describe some of the other recent social initiatives of this government.

The health and well-being of our children are a primary concern of this government. In the throne speech, we said our objective is to see our children "better educated, better protected and better nurtured so that they can make their own contributions to our future".

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the government has recently announced major initiatives to assist children and their families. In the February budget, the government proposed a new child benefit which is fairer and simpler than the patchwork of previous income support measures for families with children.

The proposed child benefit will consolidate the existing family allowances, child tax credit and dependent child credit into a single monthly tax-free benefit. It is simpler, fairer, more responsive and more generous than the current measures in place.

I would like to comment on each of these points in turn.

It is simpler. It will replace today's patchwork of measures with one monthly payment. Unlike family allowances, these payments will be tax free. Parents will know what benefits they receive and can apply their full value to meeting their children's needs.

It is also fairer. It will go to families who need it. As family income increases, the benefit received will decrease. It is also fairer because families in similar income brackets will be treated in a similar way. Unlike the present system, it does not matter whether one or both parents work. The level of benefits is based on the income of the family.

It is more responsive. Tax free payments will be received by parents every month to help them meet their children's needs.

This system is also more generous. Until now, some $4.5 billion per year has been provided by the federal government for income transfers for children. Over the next five years, the proposed child benefit will put an additional $2.1 billion in the hands of Canadian families with children. Over-all, this initiative will result in a more targeted and effective system of benefits.

The government has also been keenly aware that a child's future health and well-being can be jeopardized by risks such as low birth weight, injuries, malnutrition and neglect.

We have responded with the recent announcement of Brighter Futures, and with the child development initiative aimed at preventing and reducing conditions of risk among children. The government intends to devote $500 million over the next five years to this program directed at intervention in the early stages of the lives of children at risk. By children at risk, I mean children who face greater than normal risks of poor health and nutrition, mental health problems, disability or injury, or abuse and neglect.

The child development initiative will help ensure that children get a good start. A good start increases the likelihood that a child will achieve his or her full potential later in life. At the same time, our early investment in a child's development can lower costs for social assistance, health care and law enforcement in the years to come.

The initiatives I have described testify to our strong commitment to improve the health and well-being of needy children. I should add that the federal government is not alone in this commitment. We rely on strong partnerships with all Canadians to secure a better future for our children. We recognize that healthy and well-adjusted children represent an essential investment in the future for all of us.

In the context of the motion before us this morning, we should perhaps remind ourselves of the partnership which currently exists between the federal government and provincial governments for the delivery of these vital programs and services.

For example, the delivery of health services is a constitutional responsibility of the provinces. It is their responsibility to determine needs, to make services available and to manage health costs. The primary role of the Government of Canada is to make a financial contribution in support of provincial health programs. Under Established Programs Financing, transfers to provinces for insured hospital and medical services and extended health care will be $14.8 billion in the current fiscal year.

In addition, the less wealthy provinces of Canada will receive equalization transfers totalling more than $8 billion this year. Equalization is provided to provinces on an unconditional basis. Each province is free to allocate these funds according to its own needs and priorities, including medical and hospital care.

The motion before us asks this House to enshrine in the Constitution the obligation of the federal government to provide universal, publicly funded hospital and medical care to all citizens.

We have seen that this government has not needed a constitutional directive in order to demonstrate its commitment to medicare. Our commitment to providing quality health care for all Canadians is not in question.

• (1140)

Nevertheless the motion before us raises an interesting issue, one of many on which this government has consulted Canadians in the current round of constitutional negotiations.

In March the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada released a unanimous report. This report made a variety of recommendations to assist the government in renewing the Canadian federation. The committee discussed the issue that is before us today. It looked at the government's commitment to vital social programs, including health care. The committee recommended a social covenant as a means of expressing governmental commitments to social programs which Canadians see as part of their national identity.

This covenant would be achieved by adding a new section to section 36 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Among other things, the new section would reaffirm the commitment of all governments in Canada to fostering comprehensive, universal, portable, publicly administered and accessible health care. These are the commitments that are now contained in the Canada Health Act.

The joint parliamentary committee also recommended that the compliance of governments with the social covenant must be subject to public review, including public hearings and periodic reports by a specialized commission.

Therefore, the motion before us today is, in fact, part of the much broader package of issues under consideration as the government works to renew the Canadian federation. Representatives of the provinces have shown considerable interest in the idea of a social covenant. The federal government's position on this constitutional issue will always be consistent with our long-standing commitment to health care.

In closing, I would acknowledge that all members share the high priority this government attaches to the health and well-being of Canadians. The strength of that commitment is not in question.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to join the debate on the motion presented by the member for Mississauga East.

I have known the member for Mississauga East for many years. We have been on several delegations together. I know she is a very bright, intelligent and well-meaning person. That is why I was so surprised at some of the comments she made in her speech. I am particularly surprised at her lack of historic knowledge.

The member tried to lay claim to medicare as a Liberal invention by stating that in 1919 at the Liberal convention William Lyon Mackenzie King enunciated the notion of a universal medical care system. While the Tories and the Liberals in the past have fought over who was responsible in terms of who is the father of medicare, it is true that the Diefenbaker government of the day appointed the Hall commission and it is true that the Liberal government of Mr. Pearson introduced the legislation, but let me tell you that the mother of medicare was the province of Saskatchewan and Woodrow S. Lloyd as its premier. They suffered the birth pains of medicare.

I was there when we had our "Keep Our Doctors" committee, when the doctors in Saskatchewan went out on strike, funded at the time by the American Medical Association. I was there when the then premier Ross Thatcher went to the legislature and kicked on the doors of the legislature. That was the Liberal history on medicare in Saskatchewan. The major source of opposition to medicare came from the Liberals in the province of Saskatchewan.

The hon. member is particularly attacking the NDP provinces. She incorrectly states that the province of British Columbia under Premier Harcourt introduced health premiums. The fact is that B.C. under the Socreds have had health premiums for years. She also attacked the Government of Ontario, Mr. Bob Rae's government, claiming that because of the Rae government going on its socialist agenda, it could not find enough money to properly fund medicare.

I know we are living in an age that George Orwell described as 1984. I have generally attributed that double-think to the Tories, but I am afraid it has also infected the Liberals. Had Premier Rae put more money into hospitalization, the hon. member would have said: "Ah, ha, that is another indication of the socialist agenda". I ask, what socialist agenda? The Ontario government inherited a deficit situation from the Liberals, accelerated by the economic policies of this Tory government. It is trying to do its best to maintain social and health programs and making certain that the amount of interest it pays on the deficit is reduced as much as possible.

It is not an easy task, but it is not their fault. It is something they inherited from the Liberals and from the federal Tory policy.

I heard the hon. member talk a little bit about the cutbacks to the EPF, the program that transfers federal funds and tax points to the provinces. The Tory action has accelerated the decrease in what the provinces are getting. Let us not forget that this was started by the Liberals when they were in government under Pierre Trudeau. Half of the cutbacks and the costs to the provinces for medicare is because of the cutbacks introduced by the Liberals and because of the ceiling on revenue sharing, the six and five. It used to be that federal contributions to health care in this country amounted to roughly 50 per cent. The reality today is that the federal contribution comes to about 30 per cent of the total costs of medicare.

Do not be impressed when you see the Liberals crying crocodile tears over medicare. That is a farce. They were responsible. Let us have a look at some of the figures. For example, in the province of Ontario the provincial government is supposed to be carrying on the socialist agenda.

Since the cutbacks in the EPF, there has been a total loss of revenue to the province of Ontario of some $12.295 billion. Almost $6.3 billion can be attributed to the elimination of revenue guarantees and the six and five. In other words, half the money Ontario has lost because of the cutbacks in EPF is the result of Liberal cutbacks.

Let us look at B.C. where it is exactly the same. There is a total loss of some $6.8 billion of which almost $3 billion was a result of the Liberal cutbacks.

In my province of Saskatchewan we see as well the cutbacks that have occurred. We are dealing with a terrible deficit situation created by the cohorts of the Conservative Party, Premier Grant Devine and his Tories. There is a terrible deficit situation. We are paying hundreds of millions of dollars every year just on the interest on the debt that Mr. Devine and the Tories out there have left us. The federal cutbacks to the EPF have resulted in the loss to the province of Saskatchewan of $1.19 billion since the 1982–83 cutbacks introduced by the Liberals.

We see and hear both government and Liberal members shed crocodile tears about medicare, yet they are responsible for the cutbacks in EPF and medicare is under threat because of these cutbacks.

Since the days of Pierre Trudeau the federal government has consistently off–loaded to the provinces. I am all in favour of entrenching the rights to basic health services as well as education, housing, food, et cetera, to all Canadians and having that in the Constitution.

In fact, during the Constitution debates in the early 1980s I proposed that my party should have stood up and insisted on a social charter. What we had from Mr. Trudeau at the time was a 19th century Liberal constitutional document. I felt we should have moved forward and insisted on a 20th century document that had as well some collective rights.

There is no sense in entrenching a social charter in the Constitution unless there is a guarantee in the Constitution that no future federal governments can unilaterally change programs like the EPF program. I fail to hear the Liberals talk about that.

We can entrench anything in the Constitution but if there is no financial means to enforce it, we will see as we have seen the slow erosion of medicare. If we are going to entrench a social charter and things like medicare in the Constitution, we must insist and the provinces will insist that programs like the EPF are guaranteed, that no future Liberal or Tory government can unilaterally change those legal agreements. Then we might have a chance of preserving medicare.

Canadian people watching the proceedings today should not be fooled by the Liberals' crocodile tears over medicare. They are as much responsible as this present Tory administration for the erosion of medicare in this country.

I am sure the Canadian people will recognize that what Pierre Trudeau did in the early eighties set in motion the slow erosion of medical services right across this country. I am sure the Canadian public has not forgotten.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating my friend, the member for Mississauga East, for presenting this extremely important motion to the House of Commons.

I could not help but notice that the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle was made extremely nervous by her presentation. Perhaps it comes as a result of the fact that the three provincial NDP governments that are participating in the present constitutional talks have really not been very active in this particular area.

Once again, I would like to thank the member for Mississauga East for realizing that this is truly a Canadian issue.

This debate is very timely since the preliminary constitutional talks are approaching their conclusion and the issue of what is to be included in the final text is the subject of serious discussion at the moment. I support my friend's demand that the protection of our health care system should be included in the Constitution.

Canadians are rightly supportive of medicare. Given recent calls for the introduction of user fees and other measures, the need to maintain the integrity of our social programs is urgent.

I know that as a member of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee my colleague heard from numerous witnesses about the need to maintain all aspects of our medicare system. The commitment of all Liberals to a strong health care system was evident in the dissenting opinions expressed on this issue by the Liberal members in the committee's final report. I quote: "The Liberal members believe that the protection of health care is so fundamental to Canadians that they recommend that the Constitution enshrine not only a commitment but an obligation of governments to provide universal publicly–funded hospital and medical care to all citizens".

That is the difference between members of the Liberal Party and members of the Progressive Conservative government and the New Democratic Party. That strong recommendation is a clear example of my party's dedication to safeguarding Canada's health care system.

The most recent demonstration of this commitment came two weeks ago in Regina when our leader spoke out strongly on the issue.

During his speech he pledged that under a Liberal government Canadians would be guaranteed the health care they need when they need it. In a very clear manner he reaffirmed the principles that have made our health care system the envy of the world.

A Liberal government would protect the universality, the portability, the comprehensiveness, the accessibility and the public administration of medicare.

Those five principles are the foundation upon which the whole system stands. Compromise one, and the whole structure is weakened.

That is the message that the Liberal Party is sending to the advocates of user fees and other quick–fix solutions. User fees are not the answer. The system cannot be repaired by attacking those least able to pay. Users fees contradict a basic philosophical principle of our health care system which is the care for everyone, especially those who cannot afford treatment.

Instead of instant non–solutions the Liberal Party is calling for solutions that respond to the concerns of Canadians. It is necessary to examine the system to find innovative ways to provide the same quality of care that Canadians are used to without sacrificing those five principles.

There are many ways in which the medicare system could be reformed to make it more efficient and more responsive to the needs of the community.

We should look into whether or not medicare pays for unnecessary tests or medication. One medical expert estimated that hundreds of millions of dollars are wasted every year on unnecessary drugs for senior citizens.

We could also examine how we use our hospitals. Could some basic fundamental problems be handled by community health clinics instead of hospital emergency rooms? Would the elderly and the disabled be better served if they could live at home instead of in a hospital?

What Canada needs is not user fees for medical care but a greater emphasis placed on home–care programs and local clinics. They could lighten the loads with which our hospitals are presently struggling.

Community based services such as those are the way of the future. A greater degree of community involvement is called for. In recent years, governments have demonstrated they no longer have the ability to provide for the needs of citizens. By using a more co–operative approach, governments would be able to use their considerable power to help redistribute and co-ordinate services and improve on how they are delivered.

Obviously, there is some resistance to the idea of decentralizing the provision of services. The resistance must be overcome because the time for radical reform of Canada's health care system is fast approaching.

Canada's population is aging and it is aging rapidly. In 1986 young people made up 26 per cent of Canada's population and the elderly only 11 per cent. By the year 2020, it is expected that the relative share of these two groups will be identical at 19 per cent. This is of particular concern to young Canadians who have the responsibility to care for the elderly. It should also be of great concern to everyone in this Chamber. We all require care and the existing system, unless it is changed, may not be able to provide this care 20 years from now.

Now is the time to make the necessary changes. We must do so in order to maintain the high level of service that Canadians now enjoy as well as to prepare for the needs of the future.

We in the Liberal Party realize that the system must be reformed but we also know that the reform must not come at the expense of the five principles our leader outlined in Regina.

Our health care system is the cornerstone of the ideals of the compassionate society Canadians have built for themselves. It is one of those principal elements that makes Canada a great nation in which to live. At the foundation of that system is its generous spirit. It takes care of all Canadians regardless of where they live, how they live or how much they earn.

Some people are now threatening to undermine this system. They are camouflaging their attempts with claims that they can no longer afford to be generous. I say to them that when we can no longer afford to care for the sick, Canada will cease to be the Canada of which I have spoken. To strike a blow against medicare is to strike at the very heart of this great nation.

Before tearing down a structure that so many other people look upon with envy, I would suggest that the apostles of privatization should look at the United States of America, a nation often used as a model. In the United States, the only industrialized country without a comprehensive government health care program, there is increasing pressure to introduce the kind of system that we have in Canada.

• (1200)

I am sure that eventually the supporters of user fees will realize how misguided they are. I am confident they will understand that our health care system requires a general overhaul, not a fine tuning.

In conclusion, we must protect medicare. That is why we should enshrine that protection in the Constitution. That is why this House should act on the motion presented by the member for Mississauga East.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are five amending motions on the Notice Paper concerning the report stage of Bill C-41, an act respecting the energy efficiency of energy-using products and the use of alternative energy sources, all standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5.

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 to the House.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with the kind indulgence of the House, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House at this time to place before it two amendments that I believe have been circulated to the Table, or at least the Liberal Whip and House leader and the government House leader or Whip. That was my understanding at least.

The fact of these motions not being before the House in the proper fashion at this point is entirely my fault for which I do apologize and take full responsibility. If, however, having understood that, the House could find it in its heart to be indulgent in this instance, I would be most grateful.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have any problem with doing that at all but some of us who are interested in energy matters would like to see them. I have not seen them and I do not think anyone has.

Do you have to have consent now, or could we wait for a moment or two and carry on with something else in the meantime?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Meanwhile, until the House has been able to read the text of the motions, we will first proceed to consideration of the five motions standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-41 be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 11 and 12 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

(b) importing or exporting energy-using products into or from Canada, or

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-41 be amended in clause 4 by striking out lines 16 and 17 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

tured to another province, or import or export an energy-using product into or from Canada, unless

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-41 be amended in the English version of clause 5 by striking out line 1 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

5.(1) Every dealer who ships, imports, or exports

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-41 be amended in the English version of clause 6 by striking out line 22 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

dealer who ships, imports or exports energy-using

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-41 be amended in clause 10 by striking out lines 7 to 9 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

owned by or is on the premises of a dealer of imported or exported energy-using products or a consignee of imported energy-using products or of energy-using products that are to be exported or there is any document or record.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Could I have the consent of the House when our colleague's motions come forward to debate them all at the same time?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the hon. member's attention may have strayed when the Chair handed down its ruling. I repeat that all motions standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso have been grouped for debate, and that the vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to the four other motions. The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

[English]

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity that is occasioned by your ruling to speak to my amendments as they have been grouped for debate and to the thrust and the substance of those amendments.

I would like to remind the House that Bill C-41, the energy efficiency act, is a bill to primarily set minimum energy efficiency standards for a variety of residential energy using products such as fridges, stoves, washers and driers, and household appliances of that nature.

This bill was discussed in committee. I might add that the discussion in committee was very favourable. There was a wide degree of consensus among all parties in committee as to the thrust and the importance of this legislation. In fact, members of the committee generally supported extending the scope and the meaning of the legislation into other areas. There was general support for that even from the minister of energy when he appeared before the committee as a witness.

We support the thrust of this legislation on this side of the House although we have problems with some of the particular aspects of it. My amendment addresses a very specific deficiency in that legislation, something which was omitted. I believe my amendment is timely, given the discussions which are currently taking place on the environment in Rio de Janiero this week.

Bill C–41 restricts the interprovincial trade and movement across provinces of products that do not meet the energy efficiency standards provided as regulations to this bill. It also prevents the importation of products which do not meet those standards.

What the bill does not do is this. It does not address the issue of the export by Canada of products which do not meet the minimum energy standards which we will require in Canada should this legislation become law. In fact, if we look at clause 4 of this bill, it says:

> 4.(1) No dealer shall, for the purpose of sale or lease, ship an energy–using product from the province in which it was manufactured to another province, or import an energy–using product into Canada, unless
> (a) the product complies with the energy efficiency standard; and
> (b) the product or its package is labelled in a prescribed form or manner, if any.

The other clauses that my amendment addresses would simply add export to the other provisions in clause 4 and the other related clause.

• (1210)

What my amendment does is require Canada to extend to other countries the same rigorous standards which we would want to apply to ourselves concerning the use of energy efficiency standards, and by extension the emission of greenhouse gases that are produced in the process of producing that energy.

My amendment would extend this discipline to other countries; the discipline we are requiring ourselves to abide by using these amendments.

We can ask the first question as to who would be affected by this amendment. If we look at the exports of these types of appliances by Canada, we would see using the 1990 trade statistics for major appliances of this kind that there were $153.5 million worth. Of that, the bulk or 82 per cent of those exports were to the United States, which already has higher energy efficiency standards than we have in Canada.

The remainder of those exports would currently be 4 per cent to Europe, 7 per cent to Asia, and another 7 per cent to other countries. There is a small portion of our exports that would potentially be affected by this legislation according to these statistics.

The amendment I propose, if it is restrictive in any way to those manufacturers of these products outside of the United States, would be to a very limited degree at the present time. However, that does not deny the importance of the amendment because essentially what this amendment would do would be to require Canada to set its standards in its exports to other countries, standards that it is maintaining for itself.

For that reason it would create a signal to the international community in a very small but important sense that we are prepared to practice what we preach internally in respect of our trade to other countries.

We would be saying with these amendments that we will not export inferior products from an energy standpoint to, for example, a country that could potentially be in the future a very large consumer of these products. We would provide products in those countries that meet an energy efficiency standard. That is what this amendment would do.

I realize we are dealing with, in a sense, a policy dilemma here. The dilemma we face is whether or not we should apply our standards to other countries concerning the environment or energy efficiency in this case.

The debate being brought forward at this time is that we in Canada proclaim our adherence and this government proclaims its adherence to the importance of concern for the environment and the desire to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. The desire is to set an example in terms of energy efficiency, an example that it is willing to impose not only on itself but also in its relationship with other countries.

There is an additional reason for the time limits of an amendment of this kind and for having this subject brought forward for debate. We are currently in the midst of the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations. Although the environment has not been a factor in world trade discussions, clearly the environment is going to be a factor in future trade discussions on an international basis and the way in which trade law develops. It is through the application of smaller agreements and legislation which sets that pattern in various countries.

Clearly this type of amendment sets the tone for the future conduct in Canada of its trade relations with other countries. it says in effect that we will apply to our trade law or to the aspects of our legislation that affect our trade the kind of concern for the environment that we want to impose upon ourselves. That is the point behind that particular amendment to this piece of legislation and why I am bringing it forward today.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a few concerns with regard to the amendments that have been brought forward by my colleague.

I would like to first of all say that the work done by the committee certainly indicates that members who have concerns can sit down and readdress the bill on the legislative side and come up with proposals and changes to this piece of legislation.

Very briefly on the amendment put in by my colleague, Bill C–41 was generally a Canadian market and Canadian consumer piece of legislation. It addressed the appropriate energy efficiency purposes within this country. We believe that the compliance and monitoring activities of this bill as included over the next two years in this piece of legislation when it becomes law and that the international trade policies and practices can certainly be looked at at that time.

At this point the government is not prepared to support these amendments. We certainly understand that the member has done some good work in this, but we believe that the actions of the next two years and the direction of the government and of the energy policies and practices will be that which will allow for monitoring over the next two years on the activities of the piece of legislation.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly, the reason that the bill was brought forward, the reason we are discussing this today, is that it is widely and generally recognized that conservation and increased energy efficiencies are absolutely crucial to the reduction of energy use generally upon which the fate of the planet may hang.

In applauding the government for bringing the bill forward, for making this small but nonetheless important first step, I would like as well to applaud the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso for bringing forward his amendments today. I think James Shaver Woodsworth said it as well as anyone could in his Grace Before Meat "What we desire for ourselves, we wish for all".

What that means, very simply, in terms of this bill is that which we wish to achieve in our domestic market in terms of the increased energy efficiencies that we hope the bill will foster, and in fact we know the bill will at some point require, those efficiencies should not be restrained to our domestic market, but rather where we have international customers we should as well grace them with those efficiencies.

There is no reason of which I can think to vote against these amendments on their principle. On the face of it there is no cause that I can see for continuing to allow the export of domestically produced, or imported and reproduced, goods to other countries, presumably in the Third World, of an efficiency lower than those which we would tolerate in our own country. In a sense, Mr. Speaker, that is a sort of conceptual insult to those countries.

I would strongly support these motions and would urge the government to reconsider, if not today then as the parliamentary secretary held out the hope, perhaps in the near future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all members that a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5.

• (1220)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): On that previous point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the House is now ready to determine whether or not there is unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the members of the Bloc Quebecois are also willing to let the hon. member for Edmonton East table his amendments at this time, simply to prove their good will, as always.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask the hon. member for Edmonton East to stand and read the two motions, please.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East) moved:

Motion No. 6

That clause 20 of Bill C-41 be amended by striking out line 8 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"respect to the products' energy efficiency and prescribing the form and manner of any information required to be included in advertising promoting energy using products.

Motion No. 7

That clause 20 of Bill C-41 be amended immediately after line 8 by adding the following:

"and potential for cost savings"

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): These two motions are in order. For all members who want the text of them, it is available from the clerks at the Table.

[Translation]

The two motions proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton East will be grouped for debate. The first motion will be voted on first. The second motion will be voted on only if the first motion is rejected.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the goal of both amendments—I will speak of both of them together—is to lend further market effect to the bill. In the first instance the amendment would have the effect of requiring that advertising of energy products include the information that the bill now requires be included in the labelling of the products. All this means is that the information, on the basis of which we hope consumers will make informed choices in favour of greater energy efficiency, will be available to consumers before they go to the shop floor. In other words, in reading the flyers that come in the mailbox or the advertisements in the Friday newspaper consumers will at that point be informed as to the relative energy efficiency merits of the product under consideration.

The reason for this was pointed out in testimony before the committee: most consumers, by the time they hit the shop floor, have narrowed down at the very least their range of potential products and often that range will be further narrowed by what is available in the store. If they have available to them ahead of time those crucial pieces of energy efficiency information, they will be able to make not only better informed but more effective choices before they ever leave their homes. That is the point of the first amendment.

The second amendment would be to require that the information presented both in the labelling of the device and in the advertising, if the first amendment carries, would be put at least in part in terms of anticipated cost savings. In other words dollars expressed on whatever basis and in whatever form the government chooses but nonetheless a presentation in terms of dollars. Brian Kelly, president of Marbek Resources, in his testimony before the legislative committee noted that dollars were the official language of Canadian consumers. We are not suggesting in this amendment that information like kilowatt hours per year be excluded from the label. Certainly that information is valuable and can be included. We are saying, as is the case in Jamaica, for example, that dollars be included on whatever base the minister or the Governor in Council may choose.

Both these amendments, therefore, are an attempt through the closer informing of consumers to give greater impact and greater effect to the principles of the bill. As such I would hope they would enjoy the support of the House.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few brief comments on both motions put forward by my colleague.

With the first motion in particular, there will be jurisdictional difficulties with regard to the federal, provincial, retail and wholesale sides. That makes it next to impossible for us to consider this motion at this time.

On the second motion put forward by my colleague, cost saving is already in the bill. The cost difference across the country makes it difficult to be able to go further than we have at this time.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the two amendments which my NDP colleague has put forward. They reflect faithfully the tenor of the discussion which took place in committee and the purpose which all members of the committee wanted to see reflected in the legislation. There is the increase of information available to consumers to be able to make informed choices on the energy efficiency of the products they buy and the information which is provided is relevant and useful for that purpose.

In that respect I believe the House would do well to support these amendments.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point. It occurs to me that when I was asked to move the amendments I was not asked for a seconder. I believe the record should show that there was a seconder. Let it show that the seconder is the member for Trinity—Spadina.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The first motion will be voted on first. The second motion will be voted on only if the first motion is rejected.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 7. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 negatived.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

• (1230)

Mr. Kilgour: On behalf of the Official Opposition, I believe there is no objection to proceeding with third reading of the bill now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to proceed to the third reading of the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John McDermid (for the Secretary of State of Canada) moved that Bill C–78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–78, an omnibus bill to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities.

The changes contained in this omnibus bill have been welcomed by persons with disabilities. They are certainly long overdue. However, the bad news is that there are so many important things not included in the bill, so many things that persons with disabilities have been expecting for a very long time.

I have seen first hand how much these legislative improvements are needed. I have travelled from coast to coast to meet with groups and individuals in their communities. I have heard and seen some appalling situations. I have come to realize how much it really matters that we get serious about these problems.

It seems to me that what we are currently saying to many persons with disabilities is that we do not want them to play a full and active role in society. I think, for example, of the disabled person who has significant disability related expenses. If that person somehow against all odds manages to get some training and to find a job, he may find that the government immediately cuts off the financial support it previously offered. He may find that he cannot really afford to work.

In effect we are saying to that person: "We don't want you to be a proud, independent, productive Canadian citizen". Unfortunately we have a system that is full of disincentives.

I want to relate a few examples of some of the cases I have seen or heard about across Canada. I can remember when the Liberal task force on disabled persons was in New Brunswick. I met an elderly woman who lived some distance outside Fredericton. She had serious eye problems and needed to see an eye specialist regularly. She could not drive and because the government had cut VIA Rail services to Fredericton there was simply no way for her to visit her eye doctor.

I have heard cases of persons in wheelchairs who made plane reservations weeks in advance, told the airline about the wheelchair, showed up in advance at the airport, and then were told by the pilot at the very last minute that they could not board the plane. Our laws currently give pilots the authority to do that.

Some of the most disturbing stories I heard came from isolated aboriginal communities. For example, persons with disabilities often need to see medical specialists who are located only in major urban centres many thousands of miles away. They told me horrendous stories of regularly having to travel vast distances to receive care.

These are the people who are looking forward to major improvements in long awaited omnibus legislation. I do not think there is any doubt they are deeply disappointed by this legislation.

I would like to quote Mr. Jim Dirksen, president of the Canadian Disability Rights Council, who said: "If this bill were all we were going to get, we would have to register tremendous disappointment". Mr. Dirksen compared the bill to a sod-turning ceremony which is more a commitment to build something rather than substantive changes on the ground.

I would also like to quote from an article on disability issues that appeared in The Toronto Star on May 21. The article is entitled "Government turns its back on disabled". It examines in considerable detail how this government has neglected Canadians with disabilities. This is how this omnibus bill is described in the article: "Sweeping changes were called for by the disabled community. Elaborate promises were made by the government but the law itself is a joke. The government failed to deliver. Nobody takes it seriously".

Finally I want to quote from an editorial that appeared in The Ottawa Citizen on May 23. Again, this editorial outlines how the government has disappointed disabled persons in Canada. It described the omnibus bill as pathetic and as a pale and sickly shadow of the draft bill produced by the Canadian Disability Rights Council. It says the bill is a far cry from the American's disability act that went into effect in the United States in January.

These are not exactly glowing endorsements of this bill. They are fair reflections of what disabled persons feel about it. It is simply lacking in substance.

The government made a number of related announcements at the time this bill was first tabled. These announcements were promises of further action on disability issues to be taken at some unspecified time in the future after further review and consultation.

All of us in this House realize that the words further review and consultation are code words for delay or inaction.

Last fall the Canadian Disability Rights Council presented to the government a 107-page brief outlining in very specific terms the legislative reforms it hoped to see in an omnibus bill. The brief even included draft legislation for such a bill. I will be quoting from this bill today in my remarks because it illustrates so well the huge gap between what disabled persons were expecting in this bill and what they actually got.

This brief represents a lot of work on the part of this group and I want to congratulate the council on the good job it has done. Many other groups have made similar briefs and presentations to the government in recent years. This is one reason why persons with disabilities are so disappointed with this bill. It was the government that funded the Canadian Disability Rights Council to prepare this brief. This was seen as an act of good faith in the community. Naturally there was an expectation that the government would follow through with substantive changes.

Perhaps the process resulted in unrealistic expectations. I am not sure if there is a better way of doing it. All I know is that a lot of people are very, very disappointed and I do not blame them.

Before I move on a specific discussion of the act, I want to make a few comments about persons with disabilities in Canada. We know now that there are between three and four million Canadians living with some kind of disability. That is well over 10 per cent of our total population. This is not a small group of people we are talking about. Many of these disabled persons are seniors. If we think about it we can all think of a senior we know who has difficulty seeing, hearing or walking. It may be a parent, a grandparent, a friend or a neighbour.

I would ask hon. members to remember that many of us will have to deal with these disabilities ourselves someday.

Many of these people with disabilities live in poverty in a country that prides itself on its standard of living and its commitments to human rights. Women with disabilities are particularly disadvantaged, earning on average less than half of what disabled men earn. They are even more likely than non-disabled women to suffer sexual and physical abuse.

As well, aboriginals with disabilities are much more likely to live in poverty than other Canadians with disabilities.

I hope that all members would agree that it is the responsibility of the government that all Canadians have equal rights regardless of abilities.

• (1240)

The most substantive amendments in this act are changes to the Canada Elections Act. I suspect that the government is more aware of these issues because of the $18 million royal commission on electoral reform which made a number of recommendations in this area. Presumably the all-party committee looking at the royal commission may have been planning similar amendments. Anyway, it is good to see this increased awareness.

Bill C-78 contains a number of amendments to ensure that persons with disabilities are able to exercise their rights to participate in elections. I am sure all members of the House would agree that the right to vote is one of the most fundamental and important rights that we enjoy in a democracy. It is a right that most of us take for granted but we would not take it for granted if we were blind or in a wheelchair. For many disabled persons in the past, voting has been so difficult that they have been unable to exercise their democratic rights.

Among other amendments, this bill contains changes to ensure that polling stations will have level access, that disabled persons may receive assistance in the voting booth and that special measures will be taken to assist disabled voters living in institutions. These are all welcomed changes.

I would also like to point out that we have a responsibility to assist not only the disabled voters but also disabled candidates because the right to run for public office is an important democratic right.

Bill C-78 takes into account the special financial expenses of disabled candidates that relate to their disabilities. These expenses will no longer need to be claimed as election expenses. The effect of this change is to remove an obviously discriminatory requirement from the election financing laws.

We only need to look at legislatures across the country to see that we have had a relatively low number of disabled candidates in Canada in spite of the fact that more than 10 per cent of Canadians are disabled persons.

The Canadian Disability Rights Council has recommended that the government should reimburse disabled candidates for any special personal expenses related to their disabilities and in this way encourage disabled candidates to run for office.

I would also point out that it is not only the government that has responsibility in this area. All political parties also have a responsibility to ensure that disabled persons are encouraged to run as candidates.

There are a number of other issues related to disabled persons in the Canadian Elections Act which were not addressed by this bill. Our party is hoping that some of these issues will be addressed by the parliamentary committee examining the recommendations of the royal commission on electoral reform.

I am pleased to see that the government has introduced amendments to the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act so that people with disabilities are able to request information in alternate formats. This applies to people with sensory disabilities, that is, disabilities of sight and hearing. The alternate formats could be large print, Braille or audio cassette.

I am concerned about some aspects of these amendments. For example, the amendment allows the head of government departments to determine whether a request for alternative formats is both necessary and reasonable. I am concerned about the extent to which this may limit the rights of access for disabled persons.

Improvement to these acts are necessary because Treasury Board guidelines on alternate formats have been virtually ignored by many departments. Treasury Board has previously directed all departments to set aside a fixed percentage of their publicity and information budgets for producing materials in alternate formats.

However, according to the Canadian Disability Rights Council: "The reality is that few departments have adhered to this guideline. Recent surveys conducted by the National Library of Canada and the Canadian Human Rights Commission show that little action to encourage or require compliance has been taken by the Treasury Board and that very few departments have produced or are about to produce documents in alternate format".

This shows a rather callous disregard for the rights of disabled persons. I would certainly hope that this legislative change will help produce a change in attitudes in government departments.

I was also pleased to see that the bill contains an important change to the Criminal Code related to the rights of disabled persons in court. Changes to the code will allow a complainant with a disability to give evidence regarding certain sexual offences from behind a screen or outside the courtroom.

This will only occur in cases in which seeing the accused would prevent the complainant from testifying freely.

This measure is extremely important for disabled persons but it falls far short of what they were looking for. When we think about the circumstances in which many disabled persons live, we can clearly see that they are among the most vulnerable people in our society. There is great potential for abuse, for assault and sexual assault. The government has indicated that the Minister of Justice will review other sections of the Criminal Code and the Canadian Evidence Act which have been identified by the disabled community as requiring attention.

Again, we have to wonder why the need for further review. The disability community has outlined the problems very clearly and has made some very specific recommendations to address the problems.

According to the Canadian Disability Rights Council, disabled persons are up to 10 times more likely to be assaulted and sexually assaulted than people without disabilities. Often the abuser is not charged because of the difficulties associated with the disabled person's testifying in court. The result is that people who assault or sexually assault these vulnerable people in our society are getting away with their despicable crimes. It is no wonder that disabled persons have been so anxious for the legislative amendments required to change the status quo.

Unfortunately, this bill omits a number of important recommendations made by the Canadian Disability Rights Council in this area. For example, the council has recommended an exception to the hearsay rule that would allow a third party, such as an attendant, to give evidence instead of the victim where no other way exists to get the evidence in court. As well, we need to be taking advantage of the technology that allows a blind and visually impaired person to identify the accused through the use of voice line-ups. Disabled persons want the current provisions in the Criminal Code that deal with abuse by those in positions of trust and authority to be extended to include protection for persons with disabilities.

When you think about these problems you realize that some of them have been with us for a very, very long time. It is sad indeed that we have not yet been able to devise innovative ways of overcoming these problems in order to ensure greater fairness to people with disabilities. They are entitled to the same legal rights and the same protection under the law as everyone else.

One of the most important areas for persons with disabilities in Canada today is that of access to transportation. That is no surprise when we think about it. Access to transportation is a vitally important element of life in the modern world. It is something that most of us take for granted, something that enables us to accomplish the things we do every day. Without it we simply could not participate fully in the work world and in community life. I can assure members of the House that over the past year or so I have heard some real horror stories about the difficulties people with disabilities often encounter when they want to travel by plane or bus, for example.

For those of us who travel routinely without these kinds of problems it is hard to imagine what it must be like to put up with such frustrating experiences. Bill C–78 makes only one change to the National Transportation Act. It is a change adding the words "access to persons with disabilities" to the preamble of the act as part of the preamble's over–all description of Canada's transportation system. Again, there is no time frame, no deadlines, no specific details.

The government also indicated that the specific recommendations of the Canadian Disability Rights Council will be considered as a part of a review of the National Transportation Act to be completed next year. Next year; again there will be more delay. This change to the preamble is of course welcome but again it falls far short of expectations. There seems to be little doubt that the transportation companies will continue to delay efforts to ensure access for as long as they can get away with it.

I recognize that removing barriers to access does cost money, but at some point the government has to bite the bullet, show that it is serious about access and impose some comprehensive deadlines and mechanisms to ensure the enforcement of access regulations and requirements. That is what is noticeably absent from this legislation. It is not more fancy words that disabled persons are looking for. It is action and results.

I have mentioned some of the problems that disabled persons encounter when travelling by plane.

• (1250)

I also want to mention the particular problems associated with bus travel. According to the Canadian Disability Rights Council, the bus industry has taken advantage of the confusion about which level of government has jurisdiction over it to escape regulating access altogether. Yet the bus is a key connector between towns and the rural communities. Buses provide services to places that trains and planes do not.

It seems to me that in the face of jurisdictional confusion, it is up to the federal government to show leadership and to ensure that the rights of disabled travellers are not overlooked.

The technology to make buses wheelchair accessible has been available for a long time.

I also want to point out that in the areas of accessible bus travel Canada lags far behind other countries. For example, the United States department of transportation recently announced that all new intercity buses purchased after 1993 must be fully accessible. Many of these buses are made in Winnipeg. The accessible buses are sold to the United States. The non–accessible buses are sold in Canada.

I have heard that because the United States is so far ahead of Canada when it comes to accessible buses, there is a real fear that the Americans will dump their old inaccessible buses in Canada after 1993. I find that a real embarrassment for our country.

These measures being enacted in the United States are the kinds of measures that disabled persons in Canada have been demanding for years. These are the kinds of measures they expected to see in the omnibus bill or in an announcement that accompanied the bill. They were not expecting to hear they will have to wait until next year, the year after, or the year after that.

Finally, I want to comment about some of the important issues that should have been addressed in this legislation but have been left out entirely for reasons that are far from clear to me.

One of these is broadcasting and particularly access to television. This bill contains no amendments to the Broadcasting Act despite the recommendations of the disability rights advocates.

Statistics Canada tells us that there are 260,000 deaf people in Canada and more than 1.5 million who are hard of hearing. For quite some time we have had the technology to make television accessible to persons with hearing difficulties.

There are several different options but the preferred method is called closed captioning. Closed captioning means that subtitles appear on television screens equipped with special decoder boxes.

I want to mention that it is possible to have a decoder chip built into the television and this costs the manufacturer about five cents. This would save the consumer from having to spend anywhere from $80 to $200 for a decoder box.

In the United States, legislation requires manufacturers to include these chips in televisions. Without legislation businesses will be reluctant to include the chip because often, the same companies that sell televisions also sell decoder boxes. Naturally, they would prefer to make extra money on the sale of decoder boxes. Sadly, we have seen no move toward this kind of legislation in Canada.

I also want to point out that captioning is not only essential for deaf people, but it is also useful for people who are learning how to read, or people who are learning a second language.

Unfortunately, broadcasters in Canada have been very slow to provide captioned programs. Last year it is estimated that only 10 per cent to 15 per cent of programs in both public and private stations were captioned. Recent licence renewals for both the CBC and CTV networks provided for only 15 hours of captioned programs per week.

The CRTC has refused to require complete access for the hard-of-hearing as a condition of licence. What the disabled community expects is nothing less than 100 per cent captioning for all programs.

Again, I want to stress that this is not a small audience we are talking about. It is 1.5 million Canadians. These are Canadians who pay taxes just like the rest of us including taxes for the CBC. They expect to be able to watch television just like the rest of us. Will they get a tax rebate if they cannot understand the programming?

It has become very clear that it is not good enough to encourage broadcasters to provide closed captioning. This voluntary approach has brought very disappointing results. The time has obviously come for the government to impose requirements and deadlines.

The government has announced that the Minister of Communications will be directing the CRTC in the areas of captioning and employment equity after further consultation with the disabled community and broadcasters.

Again, we have no specifics, no timetables and still more consultation. I am all for consultation but in this case it is quite obvious what the disabled community wants. It is equally obvious that broadcasters will attempt to do as little as possible because of the expense involved. We can only hope that the minister and the CRTC will regard this matter with the same urgency as the disabled community.

I could go on and on about all the issues that have not been addressed in this bill and all the amendments that have not been included.

As I have mentioned, disabled persons are disappointed that the bill contains no amendments to the Broadcasting Act, the Immigration Act or the Canada Evidence Act. Persons with disabilities also consider improvements to the Employment Equity Act a high priority. They are also looking for improvements to the Canadian Human Rights Act, the National Training Act, the Income Tax Act, the National Housing Act, Canada Assistance Plan Act, Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act, the Canada Pension Plan Act and the Canada Labour Code, among others.

The questions that disabled persons are asking now are: why the delay? Why is there a need for still more review and consultation? These are definitely not new issues.

There has in fact been extensive consultation with the disabled community. The community's recommendations have been quite specific and thoroughly researched. The government has had years and years to prepare this legislation. Why is it so skimpy? Why are there so many important issues not addressed in this bill?

Many of these issues were raised long ago. In 1981, the Obstacles report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, chaired by the Hon. David Smith, made 130 recommendations that touched on every aspect of the social, economic and legal situation of disabled persons. More than 10 years later, many of these recommendations remain unfulfilled.

The feeling of disappointment is one that is all too familiar to disabled Canadians. They have been told time and time again that they will have to wait. They have waited and waited. They are tired of waiting. They are tired of being treated like second-class citizens. They are tired of having to wait for their rights.

We will be supporting Bill C-78. I suppose when you want to walk a mile and you can only go an inch, you have to accept that inch. The disabled community, all those who are friends of the disabled community and those who work with them and those of us in the Liberal Party are hoping that this really is just the sod turning, that within the next few months there will be some positive action.

We ask that the Prime Minister affirm to the disabled community that he will be taking some very positive action further than this omnibus bill in the next few months.

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as Secretary of State and minister responsible for the status of disabled persons, I was honoured recently to introduce Bill C-78 in the House. It is indeed a pleasure to rise today to participate in this historic debate. It is historic because in debating Bill C-78, Parliament is for the first time ever considering a bill that focuses exclusively on the concerns of the 3.3 million Canadians with disabilities.

The importance of this is worth noting, not only because it is a first, but because prescribing the requirements of equal access in law will have an impact beyond the specific acts being amended.

The provisions of Bill C-78, and the other measures that we have announced, represent a further step forward to the full social and economic integration of persons with disabilities. It is an important step toward ensuring that all of our laws reflect the needs, interests, aspirations and rights of all Canadians, including those with disabilities.

An important feature of the bill and related policy and regulatory actions is the process through which they have become a reality.

• (1300)

My department played a co-ordinating role with the Department of Justice and the other concerned departments in facilitating a close and effective partnership with the disability community. Over the past eight months, the government has worked with the Canadian Disability Rights Council in the development of this bill, and I want to thank them for their leadership, determination and insight.

Another important partner in the development of Bill C-78 was the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. It was the Standing Committee, in its 1990 report, A Consensus for Action, that first recommended a review of federal legislation to ensure that Canadians with disabilities are full participants in the social and economic mainstream. The standing committee provides an important forum for the disability community and other stakeholders to clarify outstanding issues and encourage government attention. I thank the members of the standing committee for their continued collaboration.

Bill C-78 is a good example of what can be accomplished when people with a shared vision can work together for a common purpose. In considering the provisions of this unique bill, our common purpose is the full and equal participation of persons with disabilities. We are single-minded in our determination that all citizens, regardless of physical or mental disability, have a right to be full participants in their communities. Surely we can afford nothing less than to benefit from the full contribution of every Canadian.

It was with this vision in mind that in September of 1991, the Prime Minister announced the National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities. Under the strategy, the federal government made a commitment to provide access for persons with disabilities, to ensure their integration in the economic life of the country, and to promote their full participation in Canadian society. A comprehensive review of federal legislation was identified as an important element of the National strategy.

[English]

The measures set out in Bill C–78 are a central part of the government's national strategy and will significantly improve the opportunities for Canadians with disabilities to participate fully in the community.

Bill C–78 and the changes it proposes build on the past legislative achievement in support of equality and full participation of people with disabilities. For example, in 1985 section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into effect. Canada is the only country in the world whose Constitution includes a provision designed to protect persons with disabilities against discrimination.

Other significant legislative measures include first, the passage in 1986 of the Employment Equity Act; second, a series of changes to the Income Tax Act to better address the needs of persons with disabilities; and third, amendments made to the National Transportation Act in 1988 to empower the National Transportation Agency to set, administer and enforce accessibility standards for all modes of transportation within the federal jurisdiction.

All of those legislative changes have been made in close consultation with those most concerned, Canadians with disabilities. We have been listening to them and taking concrete action to address their needs and rights.

That is why Bill C–78, in which we are proposing to amend six federal statutes to remove barriers to the full and equal participation of persons with disabilities, is so important.

Citizenship is the key to participation. Bill C–78 proposes to amend the Citizenship Act to ensure that people who have disabilities have equal access to Canadian citizenship. The amendments would remove the word disability from the interpretation section of the act and more descriptive and appropriate wording would be inserted where the term now appears.

It is also proposed that the current ministerial provision to wave the residence requirement for persons with a mental disability be deleted from the act.

The most fundamental of all democratic rights is the right to vote. However, this right is sometimes restricted by factors such as accessibility of polling stations or problems in receiving the kind of assistance required to mark a ballot. Moreover, the freedom to run for public office is sometimes limited for persons with disabilities. Candidates with disabilities who might require the services of a full–time attendant or sign language interpreters ought not to be disadvantaged as a result of additional costs. The suggested changes to the Canada Elections Act would ensure that people with disabilities can participate fully in the electoral process.

For example, proposed amendments include a requirement that all polling stations and returning offices provide level access. It would also provide the use of mobile polling stations to bring the vote to individuals residing in institutions and clarification of the definition of personal expenses to include additional costs incurred by candidates with disabilities.

Travelling without barriers is one of the most central concerns of people with disabilities. Without accessible transportation, full participation in Canadian life is not possible. For this reason, Bill C–78 proposes to amend the National Transportation Act to directly acknowledge for the first time the importance of accessible transportation. The proposed amendment to the declaratory clause of the act would ensure that our national transportation system meets the needs of travellers with disabilities.

I must add that as part of the statutory review of the National Transportation Act, a review commission was set up to study all aspects of the act and to make recommendations for further changes as required.

Like all citizens, persons with disabilities need to have full access to the justice system. Through proposed amendments to the Criminal Code, Bill C–78 would allow a complainant with a disability to give testimony from behind a screen or outside the courtroom if seeing the accused would prevent the complainant from testifying freely. At the same time, my hon. colleague, the Minister of Justice, is committed to a review of all other proposals put forward by the Canadian Disability Rights Council as part of a larger review of Bill C–15.

The availability of information contributes to an individual's ability to participate. For persons with disabilities, having access to information in an alternative format is critical. The purpose of the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act is to ensure Canadians, permanent residents and persons present in Canada the right to access personal information and records held by government institutions.

Accordingly, Bill C–78 proposes to amend the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act to establish the circumstances under which access to information covered by the acts will be provided in formats such as Braille, large print and audio cassette.

• (1310)

The proposed amendments would also give persons with disabilities a right to complain to the appropriate commissioner if they have not been given access to a record of information or an alternative format.

Taken together, these proposed statutory changes contained in Bill C–78 will significantly improve the lives of Canadians with disabilities. On a related legislative matter, my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will soon introduce amendments to the Immigration Act related to the medical criteria used to screen applicants seeking admission to Canada.

These would address, among other things, the concern of the disabled community that the act currently discriminates on the basis of disability. These changes will be developed through continued consultation with the disabled community.

Our work is not finished. Bill C–78 is a step forward. In fact, the bill underscores the government's commitment to continued collaboration with the disabled community toward further legislative reform.

[Translation]

Our work has not finished with Bill C–78. It is a beginning, a step forward, an important step, but it underscores the government's commitment to continued collaboration with the disabled toward further legislative reform.

In speaking about Bill C–78, Jim Derksen, chairperson of the Canadian Disability Rights Council, used the analogy of a sod turning. Someone has to turn the ground in order to build. Removing the legislative barriers facing persons with disabilities cannot be done overnight. It is a building process. All of us must be involved. Only by working together, as we have in the development of Bill C–78, can meaningful change take place.

We may not change the world by taking these measures. We will, however, create a world that is open to future commitments, future changes, and will have one more reason to say that Canada is the world leader in ensuring equality and quality of life for its people.

Since tabling Bill C–78 in the House, I have closely followed the discussions of the disabled and have listened to their proposals for amendments to the bill. As well, I received suggestions from the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons when I appeared before it on June 2.

The recommendations put forward by the disabled and the parliamentary committee, and in particular the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine, will strengthen those clauses in Bill C–78 dealing with the assistance provided to enable persons with disabilities to exercise the most fundamental of democratic rights, the right to vote.

The proposed amendments will ensure that any elector with a disability will receive the assistance required to mark his or her ballot. The changes will streamline the language in the bill, making it as inclusive as possible.

I am therefore pleased to support a proposal to amend clauses 25, 26, 29, 30 and 31 of Bill C–78 with regard to the Canada Elections Act.

[English]

In closing, I think the Chair will find that there is unanimous consent to complete second reading, Committee of the Whole and third reading of Bill C–78 today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Carried.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–78. I must say that in many ways I feel like speaking about what is not in the bill as opposed to what is in the bill.

As I look through this piece of legislation I recognize that almost all of it deals with changes to the Canada Elections Act. In other words, out of about a 15–page act, less than five of those pages deal with any legislation other than the Canada Elections Act. Unfortunately that symbolizes the problems that exist with the bill. The government, in its desire to be seen as doing something for the disabled community of Canada, decided to do a lot with regard to the Canada Elections Act but did very little in other areas of concern.

It is ironic that this piece of legislation spends so much of its time dealing with the Canada Elections Act and the amendments that the minister is about to make when we go to Committee of the Whole. They are strictly on the Canada Elections Act and are being done at the same time that we have a committee which I also serve on, a special committee which is dealing with the Canada Elections Act.

In one room later today we have a committee that will be discussing the Canada Elections Act. At the same time we have this bill, which is supposed to be concerned with a whole number of concerns that the disabled community has, being dealt with in the House. Those two items are being dealt with in isolation to each other.

We have one bill which deals with the Canada Elections Act, we have a committee which deals with the Canada Elections Act, and unfortunately the two have not been married and there has not been very much consultation between the committee and those clauses that are in the bill and those amendments that the minister just spoke of which he will be making later on this day.

It is unfortunate that this bill is so restricted. As I have checked the history of this legislation, it is not what the disabled community has asked for. Over two years ago the idea of omnibus legislation was presented to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. A coalition of disabled groups, including the Canadian Association for Community Living, the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped and the Canadian Disabilities Rights Council, made that presentation.

The earliest version of the proposal included a real effort to make the laws of Canada reflect the spirit of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This first version of omnibus legislation that was produced by the disabled community proposed changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Broadcasting Act, the Copyright Act, the Access to Information Act, the National Transportation Act, the Immigration Act, the Canada Elections Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Employment Equity Act, the Canada Evidence Act, the Criminal Code of Canada and the Income Tax Act.

In terms of action to complement legislative change, the disability coalition pointed out that the administration of such programs as the Canada Assistance Plan, the Vocational Rehabilitation for Disabled Persons program and the Established Program Financing, which authorizes federal–provincial activities, results in administrative measures that create impediments to the equality of persons with disabilities.

In addition, the federal government has delegated its authority in certain instances, such as interprovincial bus transportation, in which administrative bodies are not required to ensure the accessibility for disabled persons.

As I mentioned, two years ago this initiative for legislation had finally come from the community itself. This was late in the game, many, many years after the charter had come into effect. Why did it take so long for the government to begin to address the issue of inclusion of people with disabilities?

The New Democratic Party has long supported the inclusion of people with disabilities in all aspects of Canadian society, especially in our laws.

• (1320)

For too long the concerns of people with disabilities have been treated as add–ons to government programs and to laws. This means that their concerns have been treated as special rather than as a fundamental part of the legal and governmental system.

Whenever people are given this type of special treatment it can be seen as a favour and once granted it can also be taken away. That is not the approach that we would advocate.

For over 10 years my colleague, the member for Beaches—Woodbine, has worked on this very issue. When the Liberals were in government and when the Conservatives were in government he was our representative on the various committees that we had, including the special committee on the disabled and the handicapped which in its obstacles report made over 130 recommendations to include the concerns of people with disabilities in the fabric of government policies, programs and laws.

The member for Beaches—Woodbine participated actively in the parliamentary discussions around the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to make certain that people with disabilities were guaranteed equality in section 15 of the charter. Currently, as a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, he works constructively with the government and with the Official Opposition to promote this progress.

For those people like the member for Beaches—Woodbine who are concerned with this legislation and for the disabled community there is a great sense of disappointment. Instead of the comprehensive list of legislation that was asked for in front of the committee and that the committee proposed to this House two years ago, the government has presented a very modest list of amendments to a very few acts of Parliament.

As I said earlier, if you take away changes to the Canada Elections Act there is not much left in this legislation.

Our party cannot understand why the minister was unable to include changes to the Immigration Act that the community wanted. Why is section 19(1) of the act not included in this bill? It would send a signal to all Canadians if this section of the Immigration Act were repealed because it prevents most persons with disabilities from getting landed immigrant status and from entering Canada.

According to the Disabled Rights Organization, this provision alone serves to perpetuate the misconceptions and misunderstandings about the abilities of disabled persons.

If I can add a personal note to this intervention, I know, as a former classroom teacher and a member of Parliament for 13 years, it has been that constant communication from the disabled groups within our country that has certainly educated me in terms of their ability to serve and participate in our nation. All too often there is a perception in the public arena that these people must be excluded for their own protection, that these people are not able to participate and that they would be taken advantage of.

Unfortunately, clauses like the one in the Immigration Act which I referred to help perpetuate that myth.

We would like to see this act amended. We would like to see the government commit itself to some long-term, major changes to federal government laws and regulations as they affect the disabled.

We have been asked by the disabled groups to help the passage of this legislation through the House to ensure that it is passed today, but these same groups have also said that this is basically the first step, the first move in dealing with legislation that is required. In other words, they have been promised that a second piece of legislation would be coming down later that would deal with the more substantive concerns.

I always get nervous when I hear that because I have often heard governments make that type of promise, especially when their mandate is about to expire. It is very easy to move on a piece of legislation now which is very limited in scope and say we will deal with the major items one, two, three years down the road. Unfortunately history will tell us that in this House of Commons those second pieces of legislation often never appear on our Order Paper, or if they appear on the Order Paper at all it is just prior to an election and they are not passed.

I share the concern of the disabled communities when they say that they need some guarantee from the minister as to when that legislation will be tabled and when the government expects to proceed with it to ensure that it is passed before the next federal election.

Again, the minister referred to regulations when we all know that when there are changes to legislation, it is the regulations that follow and that quite often are the mechanism which make the legislation work.

When will those regulations be brought into place? When will they actually exist? Is it going to be one year, two years or three years from now? Again, why can the government not make a commitment to ensure that those regulations will be put in place and give the people, especially the disabled communities, a firm deadline as to when that would happen?

We have a lot of concerns with regard to the legislation. We are concerned especially with regard to the fact that so many areas were not dealt with. Earlier I read from a list of legislation that the disabled communities wanted amended. It is not dealt with in this legislation.

There are a number of other concerns as well that I would like to put into the record at this time. They include the fact that changes to the Access to Information and to the Privacy Act would mean that fees for people with disabilities which other Canadians do not have to pay would be required in order for disabled people to use that legislation effectively.

We are concerned with the exclusion of senior citizens from the changes to the Criminal Code. We are concerned with the fact that the closed captioning which we are used to seeing with our television sets will be dealt with by cabinet order to the CRTC rather than being brought forward as part of changes to the Broadcasting Act. Government will do this in isolation with no public input and with no discussion through the House of Commons as legislation is being passed.

On the government's failure to follow through on previous commitments, the Minister of Transport promised that if the provinces did not make intercity buses accessible, the federal government would intervene. It has not done so. The government failed in the proposed amendments to the National Transportation Act to include a timetable for regulations that would ensure accessible facilities within the shortest possible time.

We have a lot of these concerns. We know that there are very few sitting days left before the House of Commons breaks for recess and perhaps for a referendum followed by an election. We believe that in the 10 years since we passed our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, there was more than ample time to deal with the major legislative barriers to the disabled people of Canada from participating fully. We believe that the government could have done a much better job had it wanted to. We believe that this legislation, although we will support it in order that it pass the House very quickly, has so many shortcomings that it is not an adequate answer to the concerns of the disabled people of Canada.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, all of us in this House know that there are groups in society that suffer, unfortunately, from discrimination and inequality.

The federal government has been given the task of combating and defeating discrimination, intentional or not, wherever it might exist in our country. Until people are judged throughout Canada by personal characteristics that are within their control, there will be a role for this House and for the national government to seek out and destroy discriminatory behaviour.

The approximately 3.2 million fellow citizens who are disabled are without a doubt targets of intentional and unintentional discrimination. We have all seen that happen.

• (1330)

Over the past two or three decades Canadians have gradually become more receptive to the needs of mentally and physically disabled people. Canadians have not even begun to imagine the more subtle yet equally challenging obstacles which disabled people face in 1992.

As many as 40 per cent of the physically and mentally disabled Canadian women, according to one disability awareness group, will be sexually or physically assaulted. It is a staggering figure but when one thinks about it in more detail it is perhaps not surprising. After all, women are often seen as vulnerable members of society by those who subject them to actual abuse or threaten sexual and physical abuse.

Disabled women are even more vulnerable for obvious reasons. It is a proven fact that those people who feel it is their right to abuse women are always looking for the most vulnerable targets.

This brings me to Bill C–78, which is this government's sorry attempt to introduce omnibus legislation to deal with discrimination against disabled people. We on this side of the House will support Bill C–78 only because it is better than no legislation at all on a very important subject.

If the government really believes that it will adequately deal with the problem of discrimination against disabled Canadians, it is even more out of touch than most of us thought possible. What is worse is that the bill was introduced in this House last May, less than three months after the government had axed the Court Challenges Program in its most recent budget.

If there was ever a tool for disabled people to exercise their rights under the charter—I sat on the human rights committee last year when we strongly and unanimously endorsed the Court Challenges Program and asked that it should be continued—it was that program because the courts will have to do what those opposite in this government will not do.

As we also all know, very few disabled citizens have the financial clout to sue for their right to have the charter apply to them.

A program that cost this government $2 million a year but was essential for less privileged Canadians to achieve equality in the eyes of the law has been thrown out the window. I wonder which member opposite will get up and defend that policy. It only cost $2 million, which is about the same amount of money spent yearly by the Prime Minister's Office to monitor the media.

The right hon. gentleman might think it is all right to put the livelihood of his spin doctors ahead of the principle of legal equality for all citizens of Canada, but most of us in this land do not share his priorities.

When we look specifically at the plight of disabled Canadians we see a large group of people that has been effectively disenfranchised from society's main stream for far too long.

Bill C-78 addresses a select few of the problems faced by disabled persons. I would like to focus specifically on what it does not do. Like so many other pieces of legislation introduced by this government, Bill C-78 is merely a smoke-screen, a temporary diversion from the real issues that affect disabled Canadians.

Like so many other pieces of legislation introduced by the government, Bill C-78 will likely stand out as a feel-good bill and nothing more. Those opposite may want to refer back to this bill when they visit their constituents this summer and say they know all about the obstacles faced by the disabled and are doing something about it.

The truth is that it has taken the government almost seven years to act on many recommendations forwarded by various disabled rights groups. The foot-dragging was taken to a point last year at which the Canadian Disability Rights Council was obliged to draft its own omnibus legislation. How can those on the other side of the House take any pride in a bill when they forced a non-profit extra-parliamentary group to go out and produce the framework for this legislation in the first place?

Going back to the contents of Bill C-78, or lack thereof, I would like to point specifically to the amendments made to the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. These amendments state that a person who cannot see or hear will be able to request government information in an alternative format such as Braille, large print or radio cassette. It sounds good, does it not? When we look at it further we find that the head of the government agency from which the alternative format information is requested can determine whether the request is necessary and reasonable.

To further complicate things, we find that there are no timetables or deadlines for the federal government to follow relating to implementation. I have seen a good deal of legislation go through this House since 1979 and I can say with some confidence that if targets, timetables, deadlines and other coercive forces are left out of some legislation then such legislation is destined to fail.

Recent surveys conducted by the National Library of Canada and the Canadian Human Rights Commission have shown that Treasury Board, under its present management, has not gone out of its way to encourage compliance or even simple preparation for this alternative format amendment. It looks as though this promise for alternative formats is likely destined for the trash heap of platitudes this government has built up over the past eight years and if there is one thing we do not need, it is new platitudes and new clichés from those opposite.

As I mentioned earlier, disabled Canadians, especially women, are doubly vulnerable to abuse in Canada; consequently it has become important for the federal government to give such people the tools to fight back against abuse.

Bill C-78 amends the Criminal Code to give judges and justices the power to allow mentally or physically disabled complainants to testify away from the courtroom or in isolation from the accused. I salute that part of the bill.

Bill C-15 which makes revisions to the Canada Evidence Act, addresses the problem of testimony from the disabled to a certain extent as well. However, neither piece of legislation addresses the broader recommendations made by the disabled community. Neither bill provides for alternative evidence such as voice line-ups to prosecute assault cases more effectively.

More important, certain sections of the Criminal Code which provide for punishment of those guilty of abuse who occupy positions of power and authority are not extended to those in charge of caring for disabled people.

One could go on and on and on, poking holes in this bill.

Bill C-78 also amends the National Transportation Act to include transportation accessibility for disabled persons in the preamble of the bill, but we have no timetable or deadlines by which to do this. Does the government expect our transportation industry, in serious economic problems at the moment, to simply act on this half-hearted commitment based on a one-line amendment to the transportation act?

There does not seem to be any substantive commitment to making inter-city bus transportation accessible to disabled people. The member from Oxford knows, as the chairman of the human rights committee and the committee dealing with the problems of the disabled, that has been on the top of the litany of complaints by disabled Canadians for several years now, but Bill C-78 does not even mention it.

I mentioned at the outset that the Official Opposition is willing to support this bill only because it is a little bit better than doing nothing.

I would conclude my remarks by saying that if those opposite in the government think that this is the last word on equality legislation for disabled Canadians, it is deeply mistaken. Legislation like this would be almost laughable if it were not for the fact that so many other people out there want and deserve more from this particular House of Commons and this government.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to be able to participate in this debate on Bill C-78.

I would like to begin by expressing my extreme pleasure at the process we are going through here today. I think this represents parliamentary tradition at its best; namely, where the government brings in legislation and the opposition parties take their time to express the shortcomings of the bill without obstructing it. I want to congratulate all of my colleagues on the opposition benches who were willing to see this bill go through the three stages later day in a fairly rapid process.

It is an indication that the needs of the disabled community in Canada are appreciated by people from all sides of the House, regardless of which party one happens to belong to. That kind of feeling is well received by the disabled community which likes to think that all of us here in the House of Commons have some concern for their needs.

• (1340)

Having said that, I do not want to repeat what the minister said or what my colleagues on the committee, the members for Hamilton, Edmonton Southeast and Beaches—Woodbine in Toronto, have pointed out.

All have indicated the shortcomings in the legislation. All of us on the committee are aware of that, accept that, and indeed, the minister would be the first to indicate more has to be done. I think more will be done.

I want to speak a bit this afternoon about the history of the committee, what has been achieved in the recent past, and put the present bill into that context, indicating the course we will be moving on in further aspects of this in the years ahead.

Members will recall that in the short life of the Clark government in 1979, a decision was made to institute a special committee on disabled and handicapped persons. The decision was taken but the committee never got off the ground before the election was called.

Subsequent to the election in 1980 the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau established the special committee on the disabled and handicapped which, under the very capable chairmanship of Mr. David Smith from Toronto, gave us excellent leadership in coming up the following year, in 1981, with a report called Obstacles.

That report, with 130 recommendations, set the base line and the standard for what was needed by the disabled community. The acceptance of that report by people in Canada who knew the field and by people outside of Canada was such that the report went through three printings. There was a great demand for that report.

I have to add that the member for Beaches—Woodbine and myself are the two remaining members in the House who were on that special committee so we do have a special interest. I am sorry he is not with us today. He has other commitments in the riding and his presentation was ably taken care of by his colleague from Churchill.

In the same year that we reported, the UN denoted it as the International Year of Disabled Persons. In response to that, Canada established a special committee, as I have indicated, on the disabled and the handicapped which identified the key obstacles faced by people with disabilities in Canada and outlined practical actions to overcome these obstacles. These were identified in the committee's report entitled Obstacles which as I say had about 130 recommendations in it.

The year 1982 began the UN Decade of Disabled Persons which by the way we just celebrated the close of a month ago in Vancouver. At the same time the Government of Canada included persons with a physical or mental disability in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That was a major step forward in the movement toward full equality for all Canadians.

Among industrialized nations, Canada alone has included in its Constitution a clause which states:

> Equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination based on mental or physical disability.

As the decade moved on Canada progressed along with the thinking and the changes that took place. In 1983 we note one of the key recommendations from the Obstacles report, was that the Secretary of State be designated minister responsible for the status of disabled persons.

This was a significant shift because it moved disability from being a health issue to being one with a citizenship perspective and that was very significant for the concerns disabled persons from Canada had.

In 1984 the Canada Labour Code was amended to ensure that people with disabilities were paid no less than the minimum wage.

In 1985 there was also a movement to protect the rights of people with disabilities. The Canadian Human Rights Act was changed to remove discrimination on the basis of disability whether mental or physical.

The Prime Minister's declaration on the Decade of Disabled Persons was also made in 1985. It was based on the work of federal and provincial representatives setting out a number of principles to guide government activities. This declaration is viewed as a bill of rights by disabled persons.

I draw special attention to principles 5 and 6 which declare: "Individuals with disabilities shall be assured access to fundamental elements of daily life that are generally available to the community" and goes on: "Persons with disabilities shall be encouraged to engage in all aspects of society and to participate in social change to fulfil themselves and to meet their obligations as citizens".

In 1986 the Employment Equity Act came into effect making the economic integration of disabled persons with disabilities a priority for Crown corporations and approximately 375 federally regulated employers. Also in 1986 the government established the Federal Contractors Program, the Transportation for Disabled Persons Program and the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. Each of these programs were designed in consultation with disabled Canadians to deal with disability questions.

In 1987, following Rick Hansen's Man in Motion world tour, the government declared National Access Awareness Week an opportunity for communities to assess the level of accessibility and plan for and make changes in the five key areas of transportation, housing, recreation, education and employment.

Over 850 communities now participate in this National Access Awareness Week which, by the way, was just completed for this year at the end of this past week.

A standing committee of the House of Commons was established by all-party agreement in that same year with a unique mandate to examine and encourage greater efforts by all Canadians in advancing an agenda that addresses all aspects of disability.

I should say that the terms of reference as laid out in the House of Commons rules are very interesting because they give the mandate to the committee in four areas, namely, to propose, to promote, to evaluate and to monitor. These are four areas of work that other standing committees do not have. It is interesting that we have this for this particular standing committee.

Now we have the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons as a permanent committee that consults persons with disabilities on an ongoing basis and makes recommendations to Parliament.

In 1988 the National Transportation Act was altered to give the National Transportation Agency the authority to issue regulations improving accessibility to federally regulated airlines, railways, bus systems and ferry services.

In June 1989 the standing committee released its report entitled A Consensus for Action, which called upon the government to work together with all sections of society to ensure the integration of people with disabilities.

In 1990 Environment Canada through the Canadian Parks Service began a comprehensive program to make national parks and historic sites accessible for persons with disabilities. Statistics Canada announced that it would carry out a post-sensal survey on disability in 1991 in order to establish a national database on disability related issues. Public Works Canada further announced a program to upgrade and improve accessibility to Crown owned and leased property.

In 1991, recognizing that people with disabilities have expenses related to disability, the federal government introduced new tax measures. These include modifying the disability tax credit and the medical expense credit.

Bringing us up-to-date, in the federal 1992 budget, eligible expenses were expanded once more and new deductions were added to the list of deductible expenses for disability related modifications to businesses.

Much progress has been made in removing the barriers to enable persons with disabilities to participate more fully in the community, but a great deal has been indicated here this afternoon and more remains to be accomplished. That is why in September 1991 the Prime Minister announced the launching of the National Strategy for the Integration of Disabled Persons here in Canada.

This five-year strategy involves financial commitment of over $158 million and addresses such issues as access to employment, training, housing, transportation, communications, public sensitivity and community integration.

This strategy is a unique partnership of federal departments and agencies working with the disabled community to achieve the goals of equal access, economic integration and effective participation. The five-year national strategy will enable Canadians with disabilities to participate more fully and more fairly in the work force in their communities and at home.

This omnibus bill, as it is called, Bill C-78, is a legislative proposal and is just one more step in our efforts to make equality a reality for Canadians with disabilities. It is part of our agenda for progress, bringing Canadians together to remove the barriers to full integration. It will create a greater awareness of disability-related matters and provide opportunities for new partnerships that will permit Canadians with disabilities to take their rightful places in the mainstream of the life of the nation.

In conclusion, as we reflect on the progress made during the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, we look forward to the next decade of new ideas which will make full participation in Canadian society a reality for everyone. I do want to finally say that I think members of the House are right in supporting Bill C-78. The members of the disabled community in Canada want us to support that bill but, at the same time, they want the standing committee, this House and the government to move ahead in coming years to make even more effective changes that will enable disabled people to be more fully integrated into society in Canada.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-78. I would like to begin by speaking to the House about a personal experience that I had two weeks ago in my riding.

I was approached by one of my constituents, a Mrs. Katerina Vlahof. She was telling me about an experience her daughter had just gone through with a company in the city. Her daughter, Zoe, I should mention, had only 20 per cent of her vision. She was saying that Zoe was totally frustrated and crushed because she had been working for a company in Toronto for about nine or ten months and according to all of the reports that were handed into the supervisors, Zoe was doing a terrific job. One day the principal of the organization came into this particular section where Zoe was working on computers, answering phones, taking messages and distributing orders. He noticed that this young woman had her eyes right up close to the screen. He asked what was going on. The supervisor said Zoe, who does a terrific job, only has 20 per cent of her vision. The principal of the organization could not handle it. He turned to the supervisor, and I do not know exactly what was said, but it led to a situation in which Zoe lost her job.

One of the reasons why Zoe lost her job was the concern that the principal of this organization had regarding Zoe's looking right up close to the screen, would possibly cause further damage to her eyesight, and he did not want to take the responsibility of being sued or being liable, even though there were doctors' certificates on file that would certainly have exonerated the corporation from being responsible if something like that had happened.

Naturally you can imagine a mother, who is so attached to her daughter, feeling the emotional disappointment when she loses her job for a reason like that.

She asked me if I could have a chat with her to see if there was some other place where we could get Zoe working. We walked over to their apartment where I sat and had a chat with this young woman.

First, I want to say that I could see that Zoe did have difficulty, with only 20 per cent of her vision. I must say that in terms of her intellect, her communications skills and her energy and enthusiasm, there was nothing wrong with Zoe Vlahof. She related the story of her employment with this company. I could see that really what we had here was a situation in which a lack of knowledge, a lack of sensitivity and a lack of real caring by this particular organization led to an insensitive action which was so unnecessary.

When I think that there are 3.2 million disabled Canadians in this country, probably many of whom are in the same condition and the same position as Zoe Vlahof, and when I think about why this is happening, it seems to me that one of the reasons is that it is easy to look the other way in many of the cases in which people are disabled. However, with the proper assistance, instruments and tools they can do a job every bit as well as anyone else.

I listened to the member for Oxford earlier giving his speech and he referred back to the special committee on the disabled and handicapped in 1980–81, chaired by my good friend, the Hon. David Smith. The member for Oxford sat on that committee. He is absolute right. He is actually being very humble about his assessment of this committee. This is finest piece of work that has ever been done anywhere in the world on problems, solutions, recommendations for people who are disabled. I know a better piece of work cannot be found anywhere in the world on this issue. I salute the member for Oxford because I know he was an active member on that committee.

I urge all members to get a copy of this book. There is no need to reinvent the wheel. It is all here. What is the problem? The problem is political will. This is a perfect example of where there is no political will to address this problem in a substantive way. Every now and again we tinker. I do not want to suggest to this House or to the people of Canada that nothing has happened since this report was tabled. I know there have been many recommendations, some of which have been implemented and some have been partially implemented. However, many of these recommendations have not been implemented.

What is lacking here is political will. I would suggest to all in this House, if each one of us had a son, a daughter, a nephew, or someone close to us who was disabled, we would be on this report constantly.

It is very tough competing today with an economy that is going through a lot of pain. It is very tough competing for time on the national stage with a constitutional and national unity crisis. It is very tough, but this is an issue we cannot ignore.

MICHÈLE OUIMET, JOURNALIST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have something to say today to Michèle Ouimet, a journalist from La Presse, who had the nerve to write last Saturday a piece of garbage in which she said that "Abitibi is not beautiful, it is even ugly", that "Amos is definitely an ugly town with its cathedral" and that in Abitibi "people are slightly hypocondriac".

Mrs. Ouimet, the judgment you made shows that you are abysmally ignorant and that you suffer from a total lack of culture. Let me help you in that regard by telling you that the cathedral Sainte-Thérèse d'Avila in Amos, which is Roman-Byzantine, is unique in all of North America. Let me also tell you that we are all very proud of its spherical dome, with its round and full lines that make it a gem of Greco-Roman art in Abitibi.

I also hope that Michèle Ouimet did catch in Abitibi the hypochondria that she says everybody suffers from. This will enable her to be more concerned about her intellectual and cultural state, which should be good for her as well as for her future articles.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Monastery, Orangedale, Mabou, Petit de Grat, and now Judique. These communities read like a Canada Post hit list.

Last week I was informed by Canada Post officials that the post office in Judique was falling under review. In other words, it has been targeted for closure. The postmistress, Kay MacDonald, retired recently and the postal assassins in Ottawa have wasted no time moving in for the kill.

The residents of this proud Scottish community on the west coast of Cape Breton are happy with their post office the way it is. They receive good service and they do not want it to change or disappear.

Judique is miles from the next post office, and indeed from many other services which many Canadians take for granted. As in several other rural villages across Nova Scotia, the post office is the heart of the community and represents the only federal presence.

I am preparing a private member's bill which, if passed, would make Canada Post consider these very important factors when it decides which post offices will live and which will die.

To the residents of Judique I say this: I will support—

MICHÈLE OUIMET, JOURNALIST

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I would like to rise against an article published in La Presse, on Saturday June 6. In spite of its misleading title, the article written by Michèle Ouimet says that the Abitibi—Témiscamingue area is not only not beautiful but even ugly.

To present our region as a haven for motels, bars, beer, and to talk about an ugly main street, a village in the middle of nowhere, a hick town, dilapidated houses, the end of the world, and a small world where culture is not obvious, is to revel in a mythical vision of our region and insult a population that has worked very hard in recent decades to establish a comfortable, pleasant and friendly environment that is a measure of the pride of our people.

I urge Mrs. Michèle Ouimet to watch a movie made by André Melançon and entitled "Le soleil se lève au Nord". This documentary will provide her with a balanced, credible and contemporary description of our region.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, as a member of Parliament representing a province which has one of the highest unemployment rates in the country I wonder, as do thousands of my constituents and thousands of unemployed persons across the country, where the relief is for the problems facing this country.

What is the government going to do for the people who cannot afford to buy food for their children?

The government concedes that employment will not appreciably increase this year, but again it holds forth promises of jobs, jobs, jobs, a cry we have heard time and time again from this government. I would like to point out that saying it and doing it are two entirely different things.

The people of Canada want action now. We now have more soup kitchens and more food banks than we have ever had in Canada under any government. Yet the Minister of Finance proudly tells us that the government intends to continue on the same path that brought us where we are today.

I tell you one thing, I am very glad the Minister of Finance is not my doctor.

ORGANIZING FOR SOCIAL CHANGE CONFERENCE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, no one can deny that Canada has its problems. However it is interesting to note the reaction and comments of delegates to the Organizing for Social Change conference sponsored by the International Federation of Settlements and Neighbourhood Centres as they toured downtown Toronto last week.

"If that is inner city it is nothing like we know inner city," said one American. "I am seeing blacks and whites and orientals all together. You do not see that in Cleveland." Another delegate said: "I feel pretty safe and secure anywhere I walk. I have yet to see any slums in Toronto".

Those comments underline the fact that the United Nations says that Canada is the best country in the world. However we must not be complacent. If we are going to keep it that way, each of us in our daily lives must practice, not just pay lip service to the principle of equal treatment for everyone. We must continually strive to narrow the gap between the more and the less advantaged in Canadian society.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the House yet another shameful example of this government saying one thing on women's equality and doing another.

At preliminary meetings at the United Nation's earth summit in Rio de Janeiro, the government agreed to a target that all delegations should consist of at least 40 per cent women.

Sadly, the government missed the target and missed it badly. Only 5 out of 27 people in Canada's official delegation are women which is less that 20 per cent.

What is worse is the government's scandalous decision to leave at home Canada's international development minister. To top it all off, two other female cabinet ministers were not invited to the earth summit, the Minister of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What else can other countries conclude but that the Canadian government is run by the good old boys who think that the environment, development and external affairs issues are unrelated?

In closing, let me point out that while the Liberal Party's delegation is only 25 per cent female, the New Democratic Party has once again lead the way in gender parity by sending a delegation that is 50 per cent women.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, the Alberta caucus is concerned about the Young Offenders Act. It has recently established a committee to pursue this issue with a view to making some necessary changes.

We have serious reservations about the act as it is constituted today. Society is changing rapidly. While the recent amendments improved the Young Offenders Act somewhat, the amendments did not go far enough.

I recently met with concerned family members of victims of young offenders who are circulating a petition in Edmonton. I pledged to do what I could to meet their concerns.

FIRE–FIGHTERS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of Canada's fire–fighters. These brave men and women often risk their lives for the benefit of society.

A few weeks ago, they were here and brought to the attention of parliamentarians a number of issues of great importance to them.

First, they would like to have a computerized national emergency response information system so that they can know what hazardous substances they are handling before they needlessly risk their health and welfare.

Second, they also would like to be notified by any emergency response personnel of possible exposure to infectious diseases when they deal with the casualties of those particular accidents.

Finally, they reminded us that they live dangerous and stressful lives. They would like to have parliamentarians look at the public safety officers' benefit plan and at possible early retirement. They point out that others who lead less dangerous lives than they do have these benefits.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, there are encouraging and accumulative signs that our economy is slowly but surely picking up speed.

Last week, Statistics Canada released figures that indicate the recession is coming to an end with a net increase of 31,000 new jobs in May creating a combined increase of 41,000 jobs in the past two months.

Further adding to economic recovery is the fact that prime interest rates are at the 20–year low of 7.25 per cent. The gross domestic product went up 0.3 per cent in March.

Bankruptcies are declining and manufacturing shipments are increasing. According to Royal Bank economist, Gerald MacDonnell, these numbers indicate a mending economy. Recessions end, and ours is ending.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, Canadians are in shock and mourning following the recent revelations of repeated child sexual abuse at an unlicensed, unregulated child care facility in Martensville, Saskatchewan.

While the children and families affected by this horror must deal with the tragedy, the Government of Canada has a responsibility to protect the children of Canada.

While studies and reports to the government offer ways to prevent child abuse, at minimum there is a need for safe, regulated child care available for every child who needs it.

At present, only about 10 per cent of children who need licensed child care have access to it. In other words, over one million children of working parents are in potential situations of risk at unregulated facilities. Yet the government has shelved its child care program.

I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare considers stemming child abuse a priority. The events in Martensville clearly show the role of safe, licensed, accessible child care in the prevention of abuse.

I call on the federal government to take the lead in caring for Canada's children by making a commitment today to a national child care strategy.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like to share with the House some more of the valuable comments and advice that my constituents are offering me.

G. Rayner of Burlington writes: "Four thoughts of many I have about how we can make the future brighter are: one, reducing debt; two, accountability for welfare assistance, in other words work for welfare; three, giving parents back responsibility for their children, day care should only be for single parents in other words; and four, accountability for medical visits".

Clarence Gilkes of Bolton writes me: "I believe that a Constitution should enshrine as many individual freedoms as possible. The right to quiet possession of my real property through protection from unwarranted or excess use of any government's right of expropriation is something I feel should be constitutionally protected."

Finally, D. A. Cutten of Burlington has some comments on the GST. "The timing was horrendous, but it is here and to a degree working. The rate of 7 per cent should be lowered but made to apply to everything. There are too many refunds and the GST particularly must be integrated with the provincial sales tax."

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for allowing my constituents' voices to be heard in Parliament.

CANADA GEESE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, on March 19, 1992 I wrote to the Minister of the Environment concerning a very serious problem for farmers in eastern Ontario, namely the damage caused to agricultural lands by Canada geese.

The agronomist for Prescott county has estimated damages to fields to be in the order of $240 per acre. Unfortunately, the Minister of the Environment refused categorically to help farmers of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell with this problem.

First, we need a crop insurance system that will cover those kinds of damages. Second, we need to reserve lands for the spring migration of the birds, and third, we need to permit as in the past a limited kill of the birds, one or two per farm, in order to scare off other animals.

We must protect the Canada geese, but we must also protect another endangered species, the eastern Ontario farmer.

GASOLINE TAXES

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rose quite recently in the House to report that in March of this year there was a month after month decrease in cross-border shopping. This is definitely a good sign, but the sheer numbers show that we have a long way to go in addressing this problem.

Sunday shopping was pointed to as an impetus for cross-border shopping in Ontario. Now we have Sunday shopping so it will help.

I still believe, however, that a crucial element in the same-day shopping problem is gasoline. Our high federal and provincial gas taxes are consistently giving Canadians a good reason to cross the border. Sure, we have taken important steps on other fronts, but Canadians have said more than once that they cross the border for gasoline.

I encourage some action on the issue of gasoline taxes. Perhaps the federal government could revisit a gasoline tax benefit for communities near the border, like mine, where our retailers are getting hit the hardest.

Gasoline taxes are an issue we have to deal with. Lower gasoline prices would give our residents another reason to shop at home.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, when the government came to power in 1984, it promised jobs, jobs, jobs. In 1984, on Cape Breton Island the unemployment rate was 14 per cent. Now the latest statistical information places the rate at 22 per cent.

The government is now openly considering the possibility of closing the cod fishery. Although fishermen in Cape Breton are dependent on the cod fishery, they have not been mentioned in any of the aid packages that have been proposed by the government.

The government proposes business aid for new industry and then cuts the amount available. They propose unemployment and job creation programs and then cut the amount available. When is this government going to realize that the people of Cape Breton Island are having an extremely difficult time. The present economic situation is inexcusable. Now is the time to do something, not cut existing programs. The people of Cape Breton are waiting for the government to do something on their behalf.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, article II of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of the Child says the following: "A child shall enjoy special protection and shall be given opportunities and facilities by law and other means to enable him to develop physically, mentally, morally, spiritually and socially in a healthy and normal manner and in conditions of freedom and dignity. In the enactment of laws for this purpose, the best interests of the child shall be the paramount consideration".

The Canadian government taxes child support payments, unlike what we find in the U.S., Australia, Britain, Sweden and in many other countries. While the average child support order covers less than half the minimum cost of raising a child, the government deems it fair to take perhaps up to one third or more of support payments that are meant to help feed and clothe children. It is time that this stopped and that justice and fairness be brought into our tax system, particularly in the area that influences the future of children.

WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

A full 40 per cent of federally appointed judges have not availed themselves of gender sensitivity courses. As former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson agrees, until the judiciary, nation-wide, truly understands the experience of women there can be no assurance of true justice for women.

Will the minister finally make mandatory such courses for federally appointed judges?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will know, because she is a lawyer, that there is a constitutional relationship between Parliament, the executive and the judiciary and that is a relationship on the part of the judiciary of independence that has to be respected.

This government has sought all of the ways that are consistent with respect for that independence to provide support and encouragement for judicial education, first by creating the Canadian Judicial Centre which is the vehicle for creating judicial education programs for the federally appointed judiciary.

In addition to that we have funded and supported the creation of course materials for gender sensitivity training and those course modules are now mandatory for judges who take those courses. They are mandatory, not at the requirement of the Government of Canada which I think would be inappropriate, but mandatory as a result of the decisions made by the judiciary itself.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for her answer. I think the women of Canada find it hard to believe that the Minister of Justice and her department cannot exercise a little more influence than that over 40 per cent of the sitting federal judges.

Escalation in the murder rate of women by their partners in Canada is truly frightening. Canadian women wait, on average, three weeks for peace bond hearings or restraining order hearings. Sixty per cent of men who murdered their partners over a period in the province of Ontario are already in the police records for violence against their wives.

What emergency action is the Minister of Justice prepared to bring in immediately to assist women in imminent danger of death?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, regrettably I do not have the jurisdiction over the administration of justice throughout Canada. This is emergency action. If she wants such action it would be required to be done by the provincial Attorneys General. With respect to that one area where I do have responsibility for the prosecution of the criminal law, and that is in the territories, we have taken action precisely to bring in the polices with our prosecutors as she is suggesting.

One of the things we did that was within our legislative jurisdiction was to ensure that in Bill C-17, the amendment to the Criminal Code relating to firearms, we have required the courts in all applications for bail hearings and for restraining order hearings to consider the presence of a firearm in that situation. It is to ensure that in cases of domestic violence, which are very often the cases that generate the restraining order applications, the court will address itself to the presence of the firearms and get firearms out of those very dangerous situations.

[Translation]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, 60 per cent of the women who are murdered in Ontario are killed by their partners. These murders represent 60 per cent of the cases where the murderer had a police record. Obviously, the system does not protect women.

What does the government intend to do?

• (1420)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, we intend to continue our activities to deal with violence against women and families. Responsibility in this area is shared by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, the Solicitor General and myself. We have set up programs to deal with family violence, but we will also keep working with our provincial counterparts to ensure that Canadian women do not become the victims of violent acts by their partners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

It has been almost seven years since an all-party committee of this House unanimously endorsed a recommendation calling for the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited grounds of discrimination in the Canadian Human Rights Act.

The minister has consistently evaded the issue and has not given any consistent answers on this topic.

I would like to ask the minister when she plans on bringing forth these amendments.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the government's response to the "Equality for All" report in 1986, in making its various commitments, it also pointed out the difficulty of some of the issues.

We have been working very hard on those issues and I am expecting to bring forward amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. It is my hope to be able to table the amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act before we rise for the summer.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to hear the minister's comments on this because we have consistently heard that she is fleshing out or she is seeking more input or doing this or doing that.

I would like a firm commitment from the minister that these proposed amendments will be before this House before it rises on June 23.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, that is not a commitment I can make because it depends to some extent on the co-operation of opposition parties in terms of the other business of the House.

All I can say is that I am working very hard. I am sorry that the hon. member finds such things as meetings with equality-seeking groups across the country as fleshing out, consulting and things that she does not consider worth while. I think they are very worth while because they have enabled us to do better work with respect to this very important file.

CHILD CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Earlier this year this government broke its promise on establishing a national child care program in Canada and accepted the continuation of unlicensed and unregulated child care across this country.

The tragic child sex abuse charges that we have seen at the unlicensed day care in Martensville, Saskatchewan, serves as a striking example of the kind of results of an unregulated system.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: will his government consider again introducing a national child care program with a national child care act, establishing minimum standards so that never again will any of Canada's children be placed at risk?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am very surprised by the question of the leader of the New Democratic Party, trying to tie the problem of sexual abuse of children with the question of child care and day care systems.

I would even say that from the NDP it is totally irresponsible. I have to tell her something that she should know. Day care and child care are provincial matters. Normally we do not know where the NDP are at that level. What fits the federal level, it takes over and what does not fit goes to the provinces. This is a provincial matter first.

Second, the leader of the NDP should know something. The violence issue is not related to the child care problem. We face violence against children everywhere. With the unfortunate example mentioned, we see that it can happen anywhere. We will not close schools because we have problems with violence and so on.

I just want to ask the leader of the NDP to recognize that the problem of violence against children is a society problem. As said by the representative of the Liberal Party, we cannot afford what you can afford.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, that is a shocking statement and an abandonment of Canadian children and Canadian families who need a child care program.

The federal government certainly does have a responsibility. It has a responsibility to bring in a national child care program with minimum standards. This government made that promise in the last election. It broke that promise.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister again: will he and this government listen to the mayor of Martensville, Saskatchewan, and the National Action Committee on the Status of Women? Will this government listen to the Canadian Child Care Federation and the New Democratic Party, bring in a national child care program and show that all Canadians care about Canada's children? We are prepared to make an investment in the future.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the NDP is in power in three provinces. Why, except in Ontario, has it not put more money into its budget for child care and day care? Why did it not do it?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The problem once again is that the NDP spends money it does not have. It makes promises when it is in opposition. When it is in power, it does as other governments do. It cuts the budget to face reality.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I remind the minister that it was this government that made a promise in the last election to have a national child care program. It is this government that should be implementing a child care program, stop ducking its responsibilities and off-loading them as it has on everything else.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

As the minister is aware, women's groups which are fighting for equality want to take part in the constitutional debate. One of their demands concerns participation in the First Ministers' Conference.

Is the minister prepared to consider these demands and as a start allow these groups to make a presentation at the constitutional meeting which starts tomorrow?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, the question was answered earlier this morning.

The Minister responsible for the Status of Women here in the House and I had a chance to meet these groups. The question was raised, and I indicated that the First Ministers' Conference is a conference for governments, and that no groups can be added to the conference.

However, I promised to ask my colleagues to meet privately for about 30 minutes with a group representing the National Action Committee, and to have an exchange of views, since the group is here in Ottawa. The various government ministers will be here as well. However, I made it clear this would not be a precedent.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, this government has axed the Court Challenges Program and the Race Relations Foundation.

It has cut Canada's tools of equity. When will the government address the real issues facing the cultural communities: justice, access and full participation in Canadian society?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, since 1988 we have had a program to bring forward integration and equality, and to fight racism and racial discrimination, a very high priority.

In fact, it was a first initiative by any government when we brought forward that program in 1988. I am surprised the member is even asking such a question because it is one area where there is a genuine consensus across the country in support of the direction the government has taken in this particular program.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Visible minorities and cultural communities are suffering greatly under the Conservative government. The unemployment rate is twice as high among young people in those groups. The government should do something about equity and social justice and not just talk about it.

Could the minister tell us what he intends to do to help these young people find work?

• (1430)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will admit that after major changes in this country's employment programs in 1986, when we set up the Canadian Jobs Strategy, we made a point of channeling all funds under this program to the groups that needed it most. All these groups, these minority groups, have a priority under all these programs, as part of the Job Labour Force Development Program, so that there is no need to change the thrust of the programs at this stage.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Canadian consumers are shocked and somewhat angry to learn that in its haste to fast-track the approval of new drugs for the marketplace, health and welfare is effectively using Canadian consumers as human guinea pigs.

Experts at the minister's own department have warned that since 1987 the government has been dismantling the checks and balances that help keep unsafe prescription drugs out of the marketplace.

Why has the minister decided it is more important to keep happy the large multinational drug companies than to protect the health and welfare of Canadian consumers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the Canadian drug approval process is safe and recognized around the world as one of the best.

Recently we had two comments, one from the Winnipeg Free Press which said we were not moving fast enough in the approval of drugs, and today The Gazette which said we were approving drugs too quickly.

We are trying to keep the system as safe as possible. That is why I asked Dr. Gagnon from Laval University to review the process of drug approval and to make recommendations. We will see what we can do in light of those recommendations.

Once again I want to reassure Canadians the system is one of the best in the world and we want to keep it working.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, that is not terribly reassuring. It may be one of the best in the world but it is simply not good enough.

An internal memo from 21 doctors at the Human Drug Prescription Bureau warned the government that this fast-track approach, coupled with medically inexperienced managers at the department would "interfere with the health department's mandate to ensure the safety of drugs prescribed by Canadian physicians".

My supplementary question for the minister is this. How can the minister possibly stand by and do nothing when his own experts have warned that to allow this flawed system to continue one more day would put at risk the health and safety of Canadian consumers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I repeat what I said before. The system is working. It is a very complex operation within the department. The Health Protection Branch deals with a great many requests concerning compliance with regulations.

Now we are requested to move more quickly or less quickly. It is why I asked for an analysis from experts. They will report to me and in light of their recommendations we will attempt to do the best to maintain the system. It is normal that sometimes we face questions about the operation. As I said before we will answer the questions.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

This government talks about eliminating racism while it continues to practice systemic discrimination with its own employees. According to the Canadian Ethnocultural Council only 3.6 per cent of government employees are persons of colour compared to about 7 per cent in the general work force.

When will this government amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to give a stronger mandate to the commissioner to enforce employment equity in the Public Service as well as in the private agencies so that racial minorities and other target groups will have fair and just employment opportunities?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I believe every employer can make progress. I would not disagree that the federal government can make more progress as we go along.

I would like to state that the figures that have been used by the organization she refers to are based on targets that are very mobile. We do not agree with the numbers that have been used.

I would suggest that the hon. member look very carefully at the numbers we have for each of our four designated groups to see that over the last four years, for example, we have made more progress than ever before in the history of the Public Service in Canada.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I am not interested in statistical games. The fact is there is systemic discrimination by this government against its own employees.

I want to go back to the Minister of Justice. It is her responsibility to bring in new legislation in this field. Commissioner Yalden has called for a strong mandate in this regard.

My supplementary question has to do with the review of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Victims of racism now have to wait between two and three years to have their complaints considered and dealt with by the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Since 1987 complaints rose by 100 per cent while the resources of the commission were only increased by 25 per cent. How can they do their job?

In view of this, will the minister undertake a review of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and provide adequate resources to deal with both systemic discrimination and individual complaints of discrimination?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, with respect to the operation of the commission, I am not aware of the kind of backlog that the member discusses but I am very interested to hear about it.

We are addressing some questions in the operation of the panels in upcoming amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. In fact, there is a review of the Employment Equity Act going on that will provide a better context for understanding what should be done when it is completed next fall.

I am also hoping to bring forward in the fall provisions relating to the operation of federally appointed administrative tribunals in general to try to make them work better and to clarify some of the terms of reference with respect to their appointment.

With respect to the comments that the hon. member has made, I would be very interested to hear the kinds of concerns she has about backlogs and unacceptable delays in terms of people getting their disputes resolved because of course the whole purpose of administrative tribunals is to try to speed up the resolution of these kinds of disputes.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Canadian steelworkers in Hamilton and in Nanticoke in my riding are watching their jobs disappear day by day while this government fails to get the Americans to act responsibly. The minister will be in Washington to deliver a message, but Canadian steelworkers want less talk and more action.

What specific action will the minister institute to protect Canadian workers and their jobs the very minute the Americans institute any action against our steel exports?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware that the Prime Minister addressed that in the House last week. If there is an action it is likely to be initiated by the U.S. steel industry.

We have made it very clear to the U.S. administration that we think such an action would be quite unfounded because of the very integrated nature of the steel markets of the United States and Canada. We do not believe there has been dumping by our industry into the U.S. market. Indeed the share that Canada has of the U.S. market is some 3 per cent, whereas the U.S. has a 14 per cent share of the Canadian market.

Tomorrow when I meet with Mrs. Hills I will be expressing these concerns to her. I will be advising her that we will be fighting this issue with our industry as hard as we can to provide the support it needs, but we believe that this is an action which is unfounded and that our industry would be able to win.

• (1440)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, the problem with the minister's response is that the steel workers have heard it all before and they are still losing their jobs.

The government keeps saying that it is going to get tough. The question is, when is it going to get tough? When is it going to tell the Americans that any trade action against our Canadian steel industry will lead to an immediate response by this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I indicated that the actions likely to be taken will be actions taken by the United States industry.

It is quite likely that our industry would respond in kind because of the figures I set out just a minute ago.

If that is the case, certainly there would be the utmost of support for the industry in fighting this battle. We think there has not been dumping and we believe that the best thing we can do as an industry is fight the action as hard as we can in consultation with the provinces and the industry involved.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the Minister for International Trade said last month: "A North American free trade pact could exclude sensitive Canadian industries such as textiles and agriculture", predicting that a final draft agreement could be signed by the end of June.

Is Canada pursuing a bilateral agreement with Mexico in these or in any other sensitive Canadian industries? If so, when will the text and the impact studies be made available?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I do not believe I said it would exclude. I said it might be done on a different track and I did use the examples of agriculture and textiles.

As my hon. friend knows, there has been an arrangement agreed upon in principle between the Mexicans and the Americans on the question of textiles. We have some very fundamental disagreements with it and have so advised them.

It is on that basis that we are seeking some greater access to the market through a quota system, a tariff rate quota, but there have been other proposals that have been put forward by the apparel industry in particular. We are following both of these as options. At this point our options are open until we complete the consultations and also pursue the negotiations further.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, with the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement well into its fourth year a major gap remains. There is no definition of a subsidy.

Is this crucial element now being defined in the North American free trade negotiations or is a definition simply going to be lifted from the Uruguay round and placed in the NAFTA?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is correct when he points to the fact that there have been some very good negotiations undertaken through the Uruguay round.

The Americans and ourselves have agreed that we would get the broadest possible package of rules on subsidy and countervail and apply those to the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

By taking the broadest possible package, as has been developed through the Uruguay round negotiations, we have seen a package that probably is broader than my hon. friend or many others, would have anticipated when the Uruguay round commenced some five or six years ago.

We are hopeful that we will see a successful Uruguay round and be able to apply those directly to the FTA.

MINERAL EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Recently, the Quebec finance minister changed the flow-through shares plan in order to stimulate mineral exploration in Quebec. Last month, the unemployment rate in Abitibi-Témiscamingue was 17.6 per cent.

Will the Canadian government wait until the known reserves in Abitibi-Témiscamingue are exhausted to find new deposits that can be mined? Will the Deputy Minister and officials in the Department of Finance in Ottawa realize the gravity of the situation for the mining industry, which is going badly?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the mining industry is experiencing some difficulties and the impact it is having on the region of Abitibi.

However I want to advise the hon. member that a number of initiatives were taken in the budget.

Canada does have a very favourable tax regime for the mining sector. There has been a major decline in interest rates which has a direct impact upon mining enterprises. We have the lowest interest rates now in almost 20 years. There has been some strenghthening in commodity prices. The moderation in the value of the Canadian dollar has had a positive impact for the mining sector as well.

I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to explore with the provinces ways and means to improve the climate for the mining industry.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, black women and other women of colour are among the groups that are most vulnerable to violent sexual assault. Racial minority women feel marginalized by the government's panel on violence against women.

Will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women accept three new appointments to the panel from the National Organization of Immigrant and Visible Minority Women and the Congress of Black Women to ensure that the panel is truly representative of all women, including women who are most affected by violence?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I know my hon. colleague is aware that the panel was established last year to give us a real sense of the nature of this issue on a national basis and to assist us in developing a national action plan. We indeed consulted with women's organizations for representatives on that panel and most of the members have come from the grassroots, including visible minorities, aboriginal women and francophone women.

In addition, the advisory committee to the panel includes an even broader representation from national women's organizations, including the Black Women's Congress, including NOIVM and including the disabled women's network.

The mechanism is there. The panel is going to be looking at how it can best utilize that mechanism and deal with any gaps in terms of its input.

If there are ways I can be helpful I have asked them to let me know and I would be very pleased to respond.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, there has been a precedent set with the royal commission on reproductive technologies. When the government was not happy with the make-up of that royal commission it sent in new appointees. There is a precedent to do this.

These women have said they have been humiliated by a panel they do not feel is representative of them. Will the minister remedy this situation by ensuring that the panel itself is representative of all women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I have full confidence in the members of the panel. My hon. colleague knows many of them. They are Canadians of incredible expertise and I am sure they are going to undertake an excellent job.

The panel is going to be meeting with women's organizations to listen to those concerns. If they feel there are ways in which they need to expand the representative nature of the panel, I am sure they will let me know.

For example, the aboriginal circle which was my idea was something that we needed to focus on the needs of aboriginal women. I understand it has worked extremely well and has had a tremendous response from aboriginal communities.

I am always open and I am hoping the panel will discuss this with me very shortly.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

From information obtained in Washington from the Securities and Exchange Commission we have learned that the federal government loan guarantee agreement for the Westray project provided what is known as a sweetheart deal for one Mr. Clifford Frame.

The agreement states very clearly that millions of dollars were transferred to C. H. Frame Consulting Services, a company owned by Mr. Frame, even before one ounce of coal was mined from the Westray coal mine.

Can the minister explain to the House the reasons why the Government of Canada would enter into such an agreement that was so beneficial to one individual?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, we should remind ourselves of the facts. In this particular instance, the Government of Canada extended a loan guarantee for 85 per cent of the term loan of $100 million. The federal government also participated in a buy down of interest to the limit of $3.75 million.

The Government of Canada did all this in accordance with the Atlantic Canada Enterprise Program, which required 20 per cent equity to be put in place by the participating companies.

• (1450)

This we did, and we did it because of a tremendous number of representations to us on behalf of Pictou county: mayors, reeves and others. In fact the member of Parliament for Cape Breton—The Sydneys under Standing Order 31 earlier brought our attention to the high level of unemployment in Cape Breton. We were concerned about the high level of unemployment in Pictou county. That is why we participated through the loan guarantee.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the record should show that the minister did not respond specifically to the question. Either the minister was aware of the contents of that agreement or the minister was not aware, and he should come clean with the House.

The agreement entered into by the Government of Canada and the Bank of Nova Scotia and Curragh Resources honoured a commitment whereby Westray would transfer millions of dollars in management fees to C. H. Frame Consulting Services.

Will the minister inform the House of the exact amount of money that was transferred? Will the minister now table all the documents pertaining to this sweetheart deal?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, what the hon. member is trying to do is to make sure the government somehow in every internal financial transaction within a company in which it gives a loan guarantee must in fact say yes or no to the individual financial transactions.

What happened in this case was very, very clear. There was a public offering of stock. The proceeds from that were received, and with those proceeds various debts and other things were paid off. The public offering was before the opening of the mine, yes, but that gave an injection of new equity to the company to give it a more solid balance sheet. Based upon the contract with the Nova Scotia Power Corporation that public offering was a success.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the same minister. I must say this is an incredible performance today.

For weeks the minister has been arguing that the primary concern and responsibility of the Government of Canada is not in the area of safety—and we would contest that—but rather has been in the economic nature of this agreement and this project.

I want to ask the minister whether he would describe as normal the nature of the agreement that allowed the Westray mine to be used to create instant millionaires even before one tonne of coal was mined.

I also want to ask the minister why the Government of Canada entered into such an agreement, why the Government of Canada exposed the taxpayers for $80 million in an agreement that created a millionaire, transferred millions to one individual before even one tonne of coal was ever mined. Why that agreement?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, let us take an example from the hon. member's own part of Canada, Hibernia.

Is he saying that if the federal government gave a loan guarantee or an interest buy down in the case of Hibernia and somebody made some money, this would be wrong?

In fact this company had a public offering and raised millions of dollars on the stock exchange. It improved its balance sheet. It put this new equity on its balance sheet to be a stronger entity, and with that it also paid off a number of debts. That is what happened. That had nothing to do with the federal government.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, so the record is straight, this party does not envy success. It celebrates it.

What we are talking about here is a deal in which $80 million of taxpayers' money was made available by way of a loan guarantee, the result of which was a mine that made no sense economically, that was highly questionable from the safety point of view, and whose only result was to create a millionaire before a tonne of coal was ever mined.

Is the minister advertising now all across Canada that this kind of proposal is normal, that the Government of Canada is prepared to provide $80 million—in this case it will lose $80 million—of taxpayers' money in a venture that transferred millions to one individual before one tonne of coal was ever mined?

Is this normal? Is this proper? Is this the kind of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question has been put.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to see that the old rat pack is back. Those kinds of questions are totally uncalled for, especially by him and his colleagues from Cape Breton. The federal government, for example, has put over $1 billion over the years into Cape Breton to help Devco. Perhaps millionaires were made through those particular subsidies, most of them under the Liberal government.

Our job was to guarantee the loan, to make sure that they were in full compliance with safety as carried out by the provincial government. This we did and further injections of equity in the company came through a public offering.

That is something that we in the Government of Canada not only do not interfere with but believe that it strengthened its balance sheet.

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Every day 40 more women are diagnosed as having breast cancer and sadly the rate is increasing. In 1991 Canada spent $750 per death from breast cancer, compared to $450,000 per death by AIDS.

Will the government consider changing its spending priorities and shifting funds from say government advertising to breast cancer research?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I believe breast cancer is an important matter. In Canada we put about $10 million a year into cancer research and for breast cancer research it is about $1 million.

I know we put a lot of money into AIDS research, but I believe the House will concur that it was a matter where a lot of energy and resources had to be put.

I have to remind my colleague too that a subcommittee of the status of women committee is working on recommendations, which I should receive soon, in terms of the way we should deal with the problem of cancer research. Depending on those recommendations, we hope to take the direction that will respect those recommendations.

RACISM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice.

There has been a general resistance on the part of the judiciary, even when criminal acts or violent attacks against individuals were racially motivated, to take racism into account in sentencing.

Is the government prepared to introduce amendments to the Criminal Code that would make the implication of racism in the commission of a crime an aggravating factor in sentencing?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, what is very important now in the criminal law is that the state of mind of the accused is in fact a very important factor, not just in terms of the conviction that may or may not be obtained but in terms of the approach that the court takes to sentencing. All of those circumstances are quite bona fide.

We are bringing forward amendments to the Criminal Code relating to sentencing. We will be for the first time putting into the Criminal Code a statement of principles of sentencing. I would invite the hon. member at the time when we table that legislation, which should be early in the fall, to address the question again.

That may in fact be the appropriate context—it will be part of the Criminal Code—to address the question of how those factors should be considered in sentencing. What we want to clarify for the courts is the social purpose to be served in sentencing. That includes not only providing a mechanism for the convicted person to pay his or her debt to society but also to satisfy society's needs to feel that the appropriate messages are being communicated by the use of that sentencing discretion.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I hope the minister appreciates that the judiciary has the same difficulty with the concept of racism as it has had with sexism. I would hope that the government itself would take the initiative.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question departs from that subject only slightly. I was surprised when I heard the minister indicate in response to one of my colleagues that she was unaware of the huge lag time being experienced by those who enter complaints with the Human Rights Commission. It seems to me that there is a good deal that we need to know about the implementation of employment equity in the federal Public Service.

For example, we have a federal court challenge because of frustration with the Human Rights Commission. We have several complaints in CIDA, health and welfare and NRC.

• (1500)

Would this government be prepared, with respect to the question of employment equity for minorities, to commission a task force such as that which prepared the document beneath the veneer with respect to employment equity for women, with respect to the question of employment equity for minorities?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I believe in fact that the operation of the Employment Equity Act is under review and we are waiting the results of that review which I think is expected in the fall of this year.

When we receive that review, I will be open to any constructive suggestions to ensure that difficulties that are identified in that review are addressed expeditiously by this House.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. It concerns his answer to a previous question on the Westray mine.

In the minister's answer I believe I heard him say that the loan guarantee that the government made with Curragh Resources provided Curragh Resources 20 per cent equity on that loan. Will the minister share with this House what the composition of the equity for that loan was in precise terms?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, does the hon. member want us to do all his homework for him? It is all in the 2,000 pages that were tabled last week. If he cannot find that material in the 2,000 pages, I would be glad to find it for him.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism).

We have seen C. H. Frame Consultants Ltd. make millions of dollars through the arrangement. There was also a payment for hundreds of thousands of tonnes of coal whether they were produced or not. What I want to know from all this and what we have not seen so far in all of this arrangement is where do we see that the government had any reason to believe this company knew anything about coal mining or would follow appropriate safety procedures?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I am amazed, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member, who is from a coal mining area, would not know that this company of course has been in major mining developments in the Yukon and also has major interests in other parts of the world in mining. It was very, very well versed in the whole field and my hon. friend knows that.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and is in relation to our position at the GATT.

As we know the minister in the past four weeks has met with the Director General of GATT, Arthur Dunkel, and he has also met with European Commission President Jacques Delors.

Based on those meetings, I want to ask the minister what message he has taken to those members. What stage are we at in the GATT round? What progress is being made in relation to the Canadian position in the GATT round?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is accurate. I, other ministers and the Prime Minister have met with officials, including Jacques Delors and Mr. Dunkel.

I believe right now he has asked the position of GATT. It is at a critical stage. The reform of the common agricultural program in the European Community has, I think, gone a step in the right direction in taking some of the pressures off the subsidies. There is still that area to explore.

The message that continually is passed to all those who we negotiate with is Canada's balance position, that trade distorting subsidies must be removed and that Canada's position of strengthening and clarifying article XI must be respected.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–349, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (confidence votes).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, briefly, it is a pleasure to introduce this bill, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act in relation to confidence votes. I do not think there is a member in the House who has not been confronted in recent years by constituents who are very upset with the way Parliament now operates.

One such matter which shrieks for reform in my view is the confidence vote. This bill would clearly indicate which matters should in future be considered to be votes of confidence, such as the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, a motion to the effect of expressing non–confidence or specifically, if this bill is adopted, it would I believe allow all members of the House in all corners of the House to better serve their constituents rather than serving party Whips. To designate, as we do now, nearly every single vote that comes up in this House as potentially a matter of confidence seems to be truly Draconian at the end of the 20th century.

I hope my colleagues will agree when we debate this matter at a later date.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Kilgour moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek leave of the House to present the following motion, which I think you may get approval for:

That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill from the Royal Society of Canada, presented on Tuesday, March 31, 1992, and reported upon by the Clerk of Petitions on Wednesday, April 1, 1992, be deemed to have been filed within the required time limit and received by this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege and honour to present a petition signed by many constituents who I represent in the federal riding of Brant. They call on the House to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government. They want the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have four petitions today dealing with the Court Challenges Program, a program which we all know made it possible for individuals and minority groups to have their constitutional rights as they relate to language and equality rights clarified by the courts.

These petitioners maintain the Court Challenges Program was and should still be an essential instrument in the evolution of our constitutional rights and that all Canadians must be given equal access, whatever their income, to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The petitioners want Parliament to consider reinstating the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I too like the member for Brant would like to present a petition on behalf of 56 constituents who call upon the government to hold a national referendum on any constitutional change.

RELIGIOUS BROADCASTING

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct as to form and content.

These many petitioners come from Red Deer, Black Falls, and Penhold. They are concerned about religious broadcasting and the CRTC and point out that the CRTC's legislative mandate includes providing programming that reflects Canadian attitudes and values and that Christianity has played a fundamental role in the building of Canada.

I therefore ask that this House direct the CRTC to re-examine its religious broadcasting policy with reference to its legislative mandate and actual Canadian values.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my first petition deals with the goods and services tax on books and reading materials.

These petitioners from Manitoba ask that there be no tax. They point out that there has not been a tax since the beginning of our country. They also underline that reading is a cornerstone of our society, of a democratic vibrant country such as ours, and they ask that the tax be removed.

RADIO AND TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my other petition deals with petitioners' requests from Manitoba that Parliament ensure that the CRTC regulate the use of foul and inappropriate language on radio and television. They feel it is not necessary in order to inform or entertain and they believe that it counters the efforts of the family.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I present my final petition with respect to education.

These petitioners from Manitoba point out that when one attempts to respond to issues such as globalization, increased productivity, enhanced competitiveness, that any reductions in transfer payments are inappropriate.

They deplore the 3 per cent tax that has been added to student loans and the six months' additional interest. They point out that the transfer payments were cut last year by almost half a billion dollars and $250 million this year. They want education to be for everyone.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have several thousand signatures on petitions. The petitioners feel there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system and that there are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children, and disabled persons are at particular risk.

They call upon the government to further reform the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents from the city of Kamloops and the surrounding communities in central British Columbia.

They point out that under the Unemployment Insurance Act biological mothers are eligible for 15 weeks of maternity leave and that adoptive parents are eligible for 15 weeks of adoptive benefits.

However they say that any amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act under Bill C-21 will alter the current 15 weeks of adoptive benefits. The amendments propose to reduce the benefits available to adoptive parents to 10 weeks and offer an additional 50 weeks of maternity benefits to the biological mother only.

This bill has now proceeded. I simply want to announce on behalf of the petitioners that they consider this initiative to be discriminatory, regressive and inequitable as it is proposed. They urge the government to reconsider this initiative which they believe is a slight against adoptive parents.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS WITH RESPECT TO PERSONS WITH DISABILITIES

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood had the floor. He has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before Question Period I was talking about the fact that if more of us in this House had friends or family with a disability there might be a lot more political will being exercised on this particular bill. Also before Question Period I was referring to the 1980-81 Obstacles report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped chaired by David Smith.

During Question Period I happened to notice in the recommendation section some remarks that were made by the minister responsible at that time for disabled persons, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. When he appeared before that committee in 1981 he made the following statement:

> Unless you are connected with a big line department with a lot of a clout and a lot of ability, you are limited strictly to a role of persuasion.

Referring to being responsible for disabled persons, he continued:

> The portfolio should not be isolated because it would weaken the position of the minister.

I think that is what is happening in this House. We just do not have enough political will being exercised.

The recommendations in this report were made almost 10 years ago. Earlier I referred to the member for Oxford. I recognize that some of the recommendations in the Obstacles report have been implemented. There are others in process. However it is not a front-burner issue.

We are talking about a large number, about 3.2 million disabled people, most of whom very rarely complain about their disability. My experience with disabled people is that they are sort of resigned to their disability. They are not as forceful as some of the other disadvantaged groups in our society.

As we have said in this House many times before, we are not here to speak for those who are advantaged in our society. We do not ignore anyone, but are here to speak for those who are disadvantaged. When we have a bill such as Bill C-78, an omnibus bill on persons with disabilities, it is very important to reassure disabled persons, their families and their friends that this government, this House of Commons, is committed to reviewing the Obstacles report and its recommendations.

I was moved when I met Zoe last week. As I mentioned before Question Period, there are employers out there who are almost nervous or afraid to hire disabled people. They are afraid of accidents. In the case of Zoe, when the employer saw that her eyes were so close to the computer screen he was afraid it might cause even more damage to her eyes. As a result he quietly let this young women go, a women who has so much talent and energy.

These are the kinds of things we cannot just let happen in our society and forget about. We cannot only talk about the Government of Canada addressing this issue in terms of our employment standards and practices. We have to urge the 1.7 million enterprises out there to take a chance, to get involved and get to know a bit more about disabled people in our community who have ways of counterbalancing their disabilities with other skills.

I know, from a personal experience I had in the last two weeks, of a young woman who had only 20 per cent of her vision. She has intellect, passion and knowledge. Some day she wants to be a lawyer and I am absolutely confident she will be. It is important that all of us be receptive to people when they are trying to become part of the mainstream.

I did notice in the amendments to this act that the bill establishes a complaints procedure for persons with disabilities who are dissatisfied with the handling of their requests for information. The government, after this bill has passed through the House, should somehow organize a way of communicating that fact to the families and friends of those people. If they do run into frustration with not just the government but even with the community, they should know there is a complaints procedure.

It does not say here exactly what that complaints procedure will be. Maybe through proper communication we could explain what it is going to be. Perhaps all members of Parliament should have that complaints procedure listed in our constituency offices and in our Hill offices so that when we are asked about this we have information readily available.

If not only government departments but businesses in general knew there was a system of accountability for those organizations that abused disabled people, I think they would think twice. I would not name the organization on the floor of this House which in my opinion was terribly insensitive to this young woman, but I can say that it is a corporation which has 99.9 per cent of its work with consumers. If its buying public knew that its principal had an attitude toward disabled people that was a little less than charitable, it would really surprise its market and have a profound effect on business. This amendment in the bill is a good one.

Another thing that is good about the bill is that people with sensory disabilities, that is, a sight or hearing disability, can request government information in an alternative format. The alternative format can be Braille, large print, diskettes or audio cassettes. These things are good and are heading in the right direction.

As the member for Oxford said earlier today, we are all working together on this issue. Naturally we would like to see much more attention, much more front-burner action on this tough issue to capture imagination with. It is important because it involves many talented people in the country. If we took this issue and made ourselves a model for the rest of the world, it would say a lot about the character of our country not only to our community but to the world community.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise in the House to participate in this historic debate on Bill C–78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities. It is a central element to the government's national strategy for integration of persons with disabilities.

[Translation]

Many efforts have been made to eliminate obstacles and to allow the disabled to participate more in the life of society, but much still remains to be done. For this reason, the Prime Minister in September 1991 officially launched the National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities. Under this five-year $158 million strategy, we are acting on issues related to social integration, public awareness, employment, training, housing, transportation and communications.

The purpose of this quite unique partnership between federal departments and agencies and the disabled is to ensure equal access, economic integration and participation by the disabled.

[English]

The key element of the national strategy includes a comprehensive review of federal legislation. As recently stated by the Secretary of State and the minister responsible for the status of disabled persons, the barriers preventing people with disabilities from becoming full participants in society are coming down.

The tabling of Bill C–78 is a major step toward removing many of the barriers that still exist. Taken together, the proposed statutory changes in Bill C–78 will significantly improve the lives of Canadians with disabilities and provide us with a springboard for future actions.

However, the legislation alone is not sufficient to remove the barriers. That is why the impact of Bill C–78 is being reinforced by a series of regulatory and policy actions to promote equality and full participation in the key priority areas.

• (1530)

Two sets of regulations under the National Transportation Act relating to the air transportation and personal training were published in the Canada Gazette earlier this spring.

These regulations require air carriers with aircraft with 30 seats or more to provide standardized services to persons with disabilities travelling in Canada.

In addition, owners and operators of terminals in federal jurisdictions will be required to provide a level of training to their employees who offer physical assistance to persons with disabilities such as guiding a person who is blind, handling a wheelchair and transferring persons from their own wheelchair to that of the carrier.

That is why the government will give careful consideration to amending a section of the Criminal Code to extend the practice of videotaping evidence given by people with disabilities in cases in which this would assist in their testimony. Moreover, the Minister of Justice is committed to review all other proposed amendments to the Criminal Code proposed by the Canadian Disability Rights Council.

This review is part of a larger parliamentary review of Bill C–15, which has already begun and is expected to report back to the House by the end of 1992.

In addition, coupled with an omnibus bill are related irregularity and policy actions on provisions of government publications in alternate formats and in the area of access to television programming. With regard to the former, adequate information is essential in order that the public may understand and respond to government policies and programs.

The Broadcasting Act gives the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, the CRTC, the authority to licence all broadcasters and to make rules and regulations regarding the services they provide to these people.

As a parallel action that relates to Bill C–78, we are currently examining a way in which policy direction to the CRTC on closed captioning and employment equity can be used.

[Translation]

In another area related to the status of the disabled many tax measures were introduced.

In 1986 the eligibility criteria for income tax credits were expanded to include all Canadians who must overcome obstacles in their daily activities.

In 1988, the deductions were changed into income tax credits and increased. The total amount of income tax credits rose from $125 to $700 in 1991 and in 1990, about 410,000 taxpayers took advantage of these disability tax credits.

Since 1984 more than 20 items have been added to the list of tax credits allowed for medical expenses.

The Income Tax Act was amended in 1991 to allow companies to deduct expenses in the year they were incurred for certain renovations to make their premises more accessible to the disabled.

More recently, the federal budget of February 1992 proposed broadening the definition of "income" for RRSP purposes to include disability benefits from the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans.

[English]

The introduction of Bill C–78 is a result of a close and effective partnership with the disabled community. Throughout the review the Secretary of State and the other departments consulted regularly in order to identify issues of priority to disabled communities. These measures are included in the bill, combined with the related regularity and policy actions and the commitment from the Secretary of State that we will not rest on our success to date and will respond to priority issues identified by the Canadian Disability Rights Council.

To the disabled community Bill C–78 is recognized as the first federal legislative initiative that especially deals with disability issues and is seen as a sod-turning on which to build for the future.

The bill underscores the government's commitment to continued collaboration with the disabled community toward further legislative reform.

[Translation]

In concluding I would like to add that this morning, I visited an association for the mentally handicapped in my riding and I even gave them a hand. That is why I am particularly pleased today to be able to take part in the debate on this bill. It is indeed a memorable occasion.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my comment is that the government comes out with an omnibus bill to give the public the perception that it really is doing something for the disabled and the handicapped. A lot of the things that are there are already being put into practice thanks to a special task force that was struck here by the Liberal government back in 1981, I believe it was. It was a task force of seven members of Parliament from all three parties who travelled across the country and came up with the report Obstacles. I refer the government members to that report. It was an attempt to remove the obstacles for the handicapped in every field, everywhere in this country, be it in transportation, communication and so on.

A lot of the things that are being put into this omnibus bill are already practised out there.

What I would like to ask the hon. member, since the government is so considerate in helping the handicapped, is has it put anything into this legislation or is it coming up with any legislation to address the issues of people with head injuries? I have a constituent who was in a car accident. He has a bit of brain damage but there are no physical signs that he is handicapped. I have another one who was beat up on the subway coming home late at night. Some people jumped him, beat him up on the subway and he has brain injury. Again, there are no visible marks that this person is handicapped.

No legislation that I know of, be it federal or provincial, looks after these people.

Why is it so important? Because of the invisible head injury some of these people have slurred speech, they think slower, they act slower, and sometimes they are mistaken for being drunk on the streets. The police pick them up, they get harassed and so on.

Surely in 1992 the government has thought of addressing the handicapped, the people with head injuries. If it has not, then the government has not done its work.

Mr. Della Noce: As I said at the end of my speech in French, and maybe my hon. friend did not get the translation immediately, I was very proud to be here to present this bill as the parliamentary secretary because this morning I was with a group that had these kinds of problems. I was very proud to be there and I know how much we should do for these people.

I must tell the hon. member that it is in the bill and we are doing many, many things in the bill and I hope we will continue to sit on this bill, as I said before. I must tell my friend that there are all kinds of victims in this world. I have preached for the last six or seven years in my area where I have five jails, in case my hon. colleagues do not know. We have a lot of protection for all these victims—handicapped or not handicapped, I call them all victims. They have nothing, they have absolutely no protection. For the handicapped, it does not matter how handicapped they are, visually or otherwise.

What the minister announced, and I was with him in Montreal, was $158 million. This is a continuation. This does not mean that this was started by the Liberal Party. We are here to continue. It is never enough, if my hon. colleague wants to know. I have some of these groups in my area. I did not believe there were so many. I had to be in the field to see that. At 10 o'clock this morning I realized how many there were. Usually the people who get involved unfortunately have a disabled person in the family. I am lucky to have two children without handicaps and I hope those who are as lucky as I am will get more involved with people who have handicapped children. This is why we are bringing forward these kinds of changes.

I think my hon. colleague will understand that we do have a lot of changes. Bill C-15 is coming back before the end of 1992 I hope. I think the handicapped are waiting in the field to have this bill passed today. They are really waiting for it. I wish I could bring that kind of gift to all the handicapped people in my area and in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, what is crucially lacking in this omnibus bill are specific timetables for the achievement of desired goals. Without those specific timetables for the variety of aspirations that the disabled have told us about, I think this bill suffers greatly.

In fact, the term omnibus, if I recall my Latin, means the total. If the government is saying that this is the total bill for disabled Canadians, this is really a serious hypocrisy. For example, it has failed to adopt a specific timetable and enforcement mechanisms to guarantee access to Canada's transportation systems. It has failed to amend the Evidence Act. Instead, it will review it only. It has failed to amend discriminatory sections of the Immigration Act because apparently the act is now under review.

I would like to use The Toronto Star's issue of May 21, some two weeks after the bill was tabled, which stated that this bill is a joke. Would the member reply to that and admit the serious omissions in this bill and that the time has passed from fine words to really fine action, particularly in the areas I have alluded to?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, out of the respect I have for this House and my hon. colleague, I do not think this bill is a joke at all. It is not a joke because a lot of people are waiting for this bill. These people make up the community that really needs it, and if they like it, why not give it to them?

Of course it is not a total bill, I agree with my hon. colleague. In eight years in my area some wonderful progress has been made. Everything is accessible in my city now which was not eight years ago. I am not playing politics here. I am not trying to be partisan. My city did a lot and we have to begin somewhere. I can tell you that in 1984 you could not even have a wheelchair going down a sidewalk. Today I can guarantee to my hon. colleague that all sidewalks in the city of Laval are accessible to all disabled people.

Who started this and who did the continuation? This is not important because it is a success for the disabled. What is most important is that if it is not a total bill, let us pass this one through and bring in some recommendations. We do have some amendments that we will be proposing which are very interesting. Let these people have access to vote, to make an X if they can and how to do it. This bill will provide that to them.

My hon. friend says that this bill is a joke. I do not think it is a joke at all. It is a very serious bill for many people. They are waiting in the field and I must tell the hon. member that I try to get involved as much as I can, even if my children are not handicapped by any means. I do have a lot of respect for these people. I know they need our help and our help would be to pass this bill today.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C–78 today. I want to make a number of points. It would seem to me that the more important fundamental issue whenever we present legislation, particularly legislation of this type, is to attempt to improve the human condition. What is that condition today among disadvantaged and disabled people? We know that we are talking about three million to four million Canadians. The numbers are very difficult to specify with any great deal of accuracy, but it is in that ballpark. We also note that they are among the poorest of the poor.

When we look at the situation in Canada today, for example if we were to look at unemployed Canadians, we would determine rather quickly that they have a disproportionately high number, not because they are unable, very often not because of their lack of skills or educational standards, but because of the attitude that we have toward the disabled and because of the systemic barriers that are there.

If we look for example at post–secondary education, colleges and universities, we recognize there again that we have an under representation of disabled Canadians and again, it is attitudinal and it is a series of systemic barriers. If we look at elementary and secondary education throughout Canada, even though there have been great strides made with respect to the integration of handicapped Canadians, there is still a long way to go. In fact, there is much more road to cover than that which has been covered, even though we have gone a long way.

If we look at those disadvantaged Canadians or disabled Canadians to whom I have already referred, and if we look at certain segments within that population, for example women, aboriginal peoples, and visible minorities, we recognize as well that the situation is even more serious than the one that I have just mentioned.

We have to remember a couple of things. First of all, progress has been made here and I applaud that. At the same time we have to look at it within the total context, the total context of what is happening in government.

[Translation]

If we consider the budget cuts that were made in a number of areas, it is clear that although the government gives a little here, and has taken away a little more in many areas, if we add it all up, it is a lot.

Consider transfer payments for education, for instance, which affect not just Canadians in general but also this particular group. Clearly the enormous cuts between 1986 and 1995, which will total from $9 billion to $10 billion will have a negative impact on this group, which is unfortunate.

[English]

When we look at the Court Challenges Program, my colleagues know that this was of great potential benefit to disadvantaged Canadians.

[Translation]

What happened? It was cut and then eliminated altogether. This is a shame, because many Canadians took advantage of this program to ensure that their rights under the charter were not mere words but rights to which they had access.

[English]

Therefore, I want to point out that the government has given a little here, but it has taken a lot in a number of other areas that I have mentioned. I make just a couple of examples, the transfer payments for education and that affects also training and retraining in a number of other areas such as of course the Court Challenges Program which I find unfortunate.

If the government had wanted to be as progressive as it has suggested it wanted to be, I would invite it to look at what is happening in the U.S. where there has been recent legislation that has covered a number of sectors of society with very specific timetables and with teeth in the legislation that will ensure that that which is in legislation with respect to transportation, communications, education, services of various kinds, will in fact occur.

[Translation]

Perhaps the approach taken by the United States—I do not often take the United States as an example—deserves to be looked into and perhaps adopted as well.

[English]

As I have indicated, there are some positive changes here. There are some problems. I think it has been acknowledged by all sides of the House. This particular community of Canadians has waited for a long time for something to happen and there has been a great deal of impatience. They would also say I believe that there is some progress but not nearly enough in terms of their needs, not nearly enough either in terms of what not only that which they need, but not nearly enough in terms of the times for which they have had to wait for what is happening. We recognize there have been no changes in housing. In fact that is another area that has been cut by government and goes back to the point that I made before. You make progress on one front but if you remove it from several other fronts, what is the total? The total is not great if you look at it in an integrated, comprehensive kind of way.

• (1550)

I am disappointed that with respect to immigration there have been no changes. I recognize that it is not always easy to look as openly as one might at immigrants who might have certain handicaps and bring them into Canada.

We have to recognize that not all people with handicaps are a burden to the state. Quite to the contrary, they can and often do make major contributions.

I have a friend who has been admitted to Canada, at least temporarily and I hope it is permanently, who is an artist of some note and of great talent. He has a full-time job in a hospital and is in fact doing some meaningful work for himself, for his family, and for Canada. That is but one example out of a number of examples. If you were to meet my deaf mute friend, at first glance you might wonder whether or not he would become a burden to Canadian society. I have no doubt that he will not become a burden to Canadian society, that he will be a major contributor to Canadian society, not only because of his artistic talents but because of his commitment to hard work, his desire to earn his own way, and his eagerness to excel at whatever he undertakes.

I do want to share with my colleagues as well a fear and it is always a concern that when one is critical one does it for partisan reasons. I do not. I want to stress that. I want to try to be constructive. I want to be sensitive to what the government has done. I have acknowledged some of the progress, but I have also pointed out that in this bill there has been just a little progress. When you take a look at everything the government has done, I am not sure there has been any progress.

I want to refer to my colleague from Hamilton Mountain who indicated that it was a timid and toothless piece of legislation that has taken seven years to prepare. Some people might say that is a partisan comment. I am not sure that it is because if you look at The Toronto Star, the edition of May 21, 1992, you note a headline that says: "Government turns its back on the disabled". I do not think that it would be accused of being partisan.

If you look for example at The Ottawa Citizen of May 23: "Disabled, Rights but no Laws". I think it is often forgotten——that people with certain disabilities still have the same rights under the charter. Those rights are there, not just for us but for them as well. They have rights, and those rights are guaranteed.

[Translation]

The purpose of this bill and I hope that will be the case in other sectors as well, is to ensure that all rights under the charter are respected, and not only respected but implemented, so that people can enjoy the benefits of rights which are theirs.

[English]

I want to point out as well that when you wait for so long for so little that there is a frustration that is built up and that is a malaise that has crept up in government. We often do not react until we have to and then we do so in order to try to counteract that which is happening.

I would like to caution us all to try to act before it is necessary to do so because it is only when we do that, it is only that we are indeed proactive, that we can in fact defuse the kinds of problems that we could create otherwise.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, I welcome the progress that has been made, but I do not want people to think this is enough. In fact, we have a long way to go. We have made some progress, but we have a long road ahead of us.

I think it should be said that, although we have made some progress at this point, the fact that a number of programs have been cut, as I mentioned earlier, means that there have been some setbacks for the disabled, in spite of the progress that has been made.

[English]

I would like to terminate my remarks by simply saying that while it is welcome, it is long overdue. Unfortunately, there ought to be more meat to this bill, more precision in terms of time lines, and more teeth to the legislation.

You are not without knowing as I do that the progress has been extremely slow, and that builds up frustration. People feel powerless, they get angry. They feel as if they are not being accepted fully as they should be. That is really unfortunate because our country cannot afford to have any Canadian, man or woman, whether he or she has a handicap or not, whether it is a visible handicap because most Canadians do have handicaps, not be a full contributing member of Canadian society.

I would hope in the very near future the government would move forward in ensuring other pieces of legislation that need to be changed in order to meet the needs of our handicapped Canadians, those who are among the poorest of the poor, those who talk and complain very very little about their plight, can in fact be met.

I would applaud such a bill and I would support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague from St. Boniface. As usual, he presented his debate with great care and eloquence. I recall that he once served in the provincial government advising ministers on issues. He mentioned the absence of time lines for the implementation of our goals to which I alluded earlier as well.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he is seeing a pattern. We heard in the past about the absence of time lines for employment equity, absence of enforcement mechanisms, as well as for the accreditation of foreign obtained credentials, for example, that truly is a big issue among the new citizens in this country. Could the hon. member please comment on that?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Winnipeg North for his comments and his questions. He actually raises a number of important points.

One that I want to stress is related to an issue I had raised. We must not as parliamentarians wait until there is so much pressure that we cannot resist. Whether we talk about women's issues, ethnocultural challenges, problems that are directly related to handicapped Canadians, it does not matter what the issue is, we need to be much more proactive than we are.

Unfortunately what happens is there is a mental set where very often parliamentarians sit back and wait until there is nothing else to do but react. In the meantime they have created a very mauvaise ambiance, people are angry, and dialogue is not easy and neither is compromise.

What happens is just before elections, and I suspect we are going to be seeing a series of these, and it is not just this government, it is a pattern that happens in many many governments, they become extremely generous. They will bring forward legislation, make promises, new programs, augment the funding even though they have some serious funding difficulties. I think that is wrong. If I as a Canadian have a need today, surely that need must be addressed as quickly as possible. We must not wait and we must not just do it when it is most profitable politically.

I recognize this is politics but I also recognize that good politics is when you have the power to do something, and it is right to do that, then you do it. You do not wait until you are pushed over the edge.

I recall when I was the deputy minister and needed to deal with a number of issues, such as the ones that have been discussed today, I was forever battling those who wanted to wait. They were forever, forever, trying to say, "Let us do it because it is the right thing to do," as opposed to waiting until we have to do it at which point you sometimes lose control of the agenda. You sometimes can no longer control the cost.

In fact, you pay a very dear price, not only in terms of what you have done because you should have done it some time ago, but in terms of soured relations, in terms of your inability to dialogue and to come up with some meaningful creative solutions for the group that you are dealing with.

• (1600)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in the House today on second reading of Bill C–78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities.

This bill was introduced on May 5, 1992 and it proposes to amend six laws at one time in an effort to improve the lives of persons with disabilities in a number of priority areas by attempting to give them better access to Canada's national transportation system, acquiring citizenship, testifying in criminal courts and access in alternate formats to records and personal information under the control of government.

This attempt at bringing about meaningful change for persons with disabilities is a noble gesture, but this particular legislation falls a little bit short both in expectation and in meeting the very real needs of disabled people in Canada.

I want to make it quite clear that the amendments are welcome. It is about time. However, the people affected by this legislation, our disabled Canadians, are very disappointed that many important changes required to overcome discrimination have not been included in this bill.

The government consulted with the Canadian Disability Rights Council, CDRC, which is a national advocacy organization working in the area of disability rights and the law. In 1991 this organization put forward a document entitled Legislative Reform for People with Disabilities: Proposals for Change.

This report contains specific proposals for an omnibus bill. The government is trying to hide behind its own rhetoric when it claims that it consulted widely with disability groups. Yet its long awaited bill, Bill C–78, does not contain many of the recommendations made by the CDRC and other disability groups.

I would like to point out some of this bill's more serious deficiencies. Bill C–78 amends the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act so that a person with sensory disability, that is a sight or hearing disability, can request government information in an alternative format which would mean Braille, large print, diskettes or audio cassettes.

The bill also allows the head of the government institution from which the information is being requested to determine whether the request is necessary and reasonable. As well, the bill establishes a complaints procedure for persons with disabilities who are unsatisfied with the handling of their requests for information.

There is a danger in leaving open the possibility for abuse by both government and persons with disabilities. There can be requests for excessive amounts of material by persons with disabilities. As well, heads of government and institutions can unreasonably deny access to information.

In a related announcement, the government stated that Treasury Board will strengthen and promote its policy on the availability of alternate formats of government information already available to the public. No timetables were announced.

Treasury Board has previously directed all departments to set aside a fixed percentage of their publicity and information budgets for producing materials in alternate formats. Yet according to the CDRC the reality is that few government departments adhere to this guideline.

Recent surveys conducted by the National Library of Canada and the Canadian Human Rights Commission show little action to encourage or require compliance had been taken by Treasury Board and that very few departments produce or are about to produce documents in alternate format.

The amendment to the Citizenship Act that the requirement to take an oath in order to obtain Canadian citizenship may be waived for "any person who is prevented from understanding the significance of taking the oath of citizenship by reason of a mental disability" is no doubt welcome. However, it was certainly not considered a priority by disability groups.

Higher on the list of disabled groups would have been movement on the need for amendments to the Immigration Act which discriminates against disabled persons seeking to immigrate to Canada.

Bill C-78 amends the Criminal Code to allow a person with a mental or physical disability to "testify outside the courtroom or behind a screen or other device that would allow the complainant not to see the accused, if the judge or justice is of the view that the exclusion is necessary to obtain a full and candid account of the acts complained of from the complainant".

Bravo, that is a very important amendment but it is but one of many amendments to the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act which have been recommended by disability groups.

The government has indicated that the Minister of Justice will review other sections of the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act which have been identified by the disability community as requiring attention. This has begun as part of the parliamentary review of Bill C-15.

According to the Canadian Disability Rights Council, people with disabilities are up to 10 times more likely to be physically or sexually assaulted than people without disabilities. Often the abuser is never charged because of the difficulties associated with a disabled person testifying in court.

Bill C-15 made significant changes to the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act to facilitate the testimony of child witnesses and people with mental disabilities. However, disability groups believe that these changes did not go far enough in protecting the rights of people with disabilities in court.

The Canadian Disability Rights Council made a number of recommendations in this area which Bill C-78 omits. I quote:

> An exception to the hearsay rule that would allow a third party, such as an attendant, to give evidence instead of the victim should be provided where no other way exists to get the evidence in court. New ways of identifying the accused through the use of voice line-ups for people who are blind must be allowed. Finally, the current provisions that deal with abuse by those in positions of trust and authority must be extended to include protection for people with disabilities.

Bill C-78 contains a number of amendments to ensure that many persons with disabilities will be able to exercise their right to participate in elections by ensuring that polling stations have level access; providing mobile polling stations for persons residing in institutions; implementing public education programs to make the electoral process better known to persons with disabilities. They would allow election officials, friends or relatives of disabled persons to accompany them into the voting compartment to assist them in marking the ballot; providing blind or visually impaired voters with a special template to assist them in marking the ballot and amending the definition of personal expense for candidates with disabilities so that expenses related to the candidates' disabilities are not required to be included as election expenses.

A number of issues have not been addressed in these amendments. For example, the residence requirement in the bill discriminates against homeless people, many of whom are people with mental disabilities who have been deinstitutionalized.

The government has indicated that some of these outstanding issues may be addressed by the parliamentary committee examining the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing.

In its amendments to the National Transportation Act which will add the words "accessible to persons with disabilities" to the act's preamble as part of the over-all description of Canada's transportation system, the government is not truly dealing with the problem. For example, there is no mention of a timetable for making transportation systems to provide more accessible services within a reasonable period of time.

This is a major shortcoming of this bill. Many types of transportation are still not accessible to people with disabilities. We are far behind many other countries. For example, in the U.S. there is now a specific and ambitious plan to provide accessible bus service for persons in wheelchairs. The government has again deferred any real action by saying that specific CDRC proposals for improving transportation accessibility will be considered as part of a review of the National Transportation Act which will be completed next year.

It has deferred also amendments to the Immigration Act. At some unspecified future date, says the government, the Minister of Employment and Immigration will be introducing amendments to the act related to the medical criteria used to screen persons seeking admission to Canada.

Section 19(1)(a) of the Immigration Act excludes most persons with disabilities from being granted landed immigrant status or Canadian citizenship because they put excessive demands on Canada's health and social service systems.

This applies to potential immigrants applying from other countries as well as persons applying within Canada for refugee status. The act presently fails to recognize that many persons with disabilities are able to be productive members of society and that they are eager to make a meaningful contribution to the Canadian economy.

The disability community has indicated that it considers amendment of this act to be a high priority. The government has indicated for seven years that it would introduce a definition of medical criteria for immigrants.

There are many other federal acts which require amendments to ensure equality for persons with disabilities which are not addressed in Bill C-78.

For example, there is the National Housing Act. The CDRC points out there are too few accessible rental units for disabled persons in Canada. Waiting lists in some cities are extremely long, in some cases three years or more.

The National Housing Act must be amended so that a greater percentage of all rental units built with funds from CMHC are accessible to disabled persons.

The Canadian Human Rights Act must be amended to enable, among other things, the Canadian Human Rights Commission to deal with complaints alleging discrimination in the provision of goods, services, facilities or accommodation in the absence of an identified victim.

The Income Tax Act must be amended to ensure the fair treatment of persons with disabilities by taking into account their medical expenses and disability related expenses.

The National Training Act must be amended to ensure that persons with disabilities are adequately represented in federal training programs.

Why are these issues so important? It is because there are 3.3 million Canadians with disabilities. That is 13 per cent of Canadians. All face obstacles in their daily lives in areas that most Canadians take for granted such as employment, training, transportation, communications and housing. All want to contribute in a meaningful way to Canadian society. All we need do is remove the barriers. This legislation clearly does not go far enough.

In closing I would like to urge the government to review this legislation to ensure that priority needs are met and to place timetables on further initiatives. Otherwise this is "feel good" legislation which actually does very little to help those who need help the most.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Unemployment Insurance; the hon. member for Moncton—National Defence; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Small Businesses; the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau—Perley Bridge; the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—Child Poverty.

[English]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because I know time is very important.

I would like to congratulate all the speakers, particularly the hon. member for St. Boniface who made a very good speech and comments. He agrees that we are making some progress.

I say to my hon. colleague who just spoke that she must understand that the government acknowledges that section 19(1)(a) of the Immigration Act requires revision.

My colleague must also know that the proposal falls into two categories. The good news is—there is some good news—if we pass this bill as soon as possible, because these people are waiting for it, my colleague, the Minister of Justice, has already indicated that she will fully consider the CDRC for the proposal which is Bill C-15. Also, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has agreed to collaborate and to amend section 1901. We know that and this is good news, as my hon. colleague from St. Boniface said. We have a lot of kilometres to go and we are proud to sit with you in the same car to do this for the people we love and we would like to have this because it is their proposal that we are listening to. Of course there are some changes and we are going to keep listening to them, because for the government and for you on the other side these people are very important.

I want to thank my hon. colleague for what he did for them and for what he is saying, that it is very important that you know there are two categories and we will do the next part. Our two ministers have already expressed their views that they will do something, which is the article 1901.

Mrs. Gaffney: I appreciate the point of the member opposite. I did say several times in my comments that this bill was a very, very important bill and it was carrying it up to a certain level of importance but there were still a few more things to be done. I did recognize that.

I felt good about his complimenting my colleague from St. Boniface. I thought he gave an excellent and very positive speech.

I did not mean to give the impression that the bill should not go through. I want this bill to go through and go through swiftly. We will move on to the next step and hopefully we will achieve that in a short period of time.

Mr. Ronald Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure here that I was not misunderstood. I said un petit peu de progrès, a little progress. I said let us look at l'ensemble and I did say that there were cutbacks, for example in transfer payments, that had an impact and the Court Challenges Program had a negative impact as well.

When you look at the whole it was un petit peu de progrès. I recognize the advances made in the area of elections and I think that is good, but we cannot deny that housing, transportation and the whole area of communications have been cut back. We still need to go much, much further. The whole notion of closed captions is not well addressed with a great deal of precision.

[Translation]

There has been some progress indeed, but let us not go too far with this, because on the whole, very little progress was made.

[English]

I wonder if my colleague heard that message. Perhaps my other colleague did not hear it quite that way. Is that the way you heard it?

Mrs. Gaffney: Yes, I absolutely did hear that message, although my colleague from St. Boniface certainly said it in a much more demonstrative way. He is much more demonstrative and much more eloquent than I am. I really think that we were saying the same thing, that a lot more needs to be done. The message was just put in a different manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 100, I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and by unanimous consent the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C–78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities.

• (1620)

[English]

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 6—

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, the old definition in clause 6 reads: "Disability means the incapacity of a minor or a person who is mentally incompetent". The new bill would repeal that definition totally. What definition are we giving people for a disability? I think now of people with a learning disability, an emotional problem, et cetera.

Mr. Della Noce: The answer is yes.

Mr. Flis Mr. Chairman, my question was what is the definition? You say it has been replaced but what is the definition? Does the new definition cover people who are not necessarily blind or deaf but do have a learning disability? There are thousands of individuals with these disabilities in our school system now. There are people with emotional problems whose communications can be affected.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman I apologize to the member. We do not have to define it any more because it is now included in the act. We defined it completely in the act. It is in clause 7.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could read the definition as it is in the act.

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, I was going to do that. The purpose of this clause is not to permit the repeal of the disability definition in the interpretation section of the Citizenship Act and enable its replacement with more appropriate wording where the term appears.

Ms. Mitchell: It is my understanding that my colleague was asking the parliamentary secretary to actually quote the definition. I would certainly be very interested in hearing that; the definition he referred to which is now in the act.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, there is no definition per se any more. The circumstances are described in clause 7.

[English]

We have the definition. We do not define any more. The definitions have changed. We give all the definitions here in clause 7, which I can read for the hon. member if she wishes.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up any more time of the House but I want it to be known on record that we now do not have a definition for disability.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, that is correct. There is no definition. We describe in clause 7 the circumstances.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On Clause 8—

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I am out of order on this but just listening to the exchange in terms of definition, can the parliamentary secretary give us a reason why there is no definition?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, the definition was outdated and offensive. That is why it has been removed, for a better definition.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

On Clause 10—

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Chairman, I just want to express some reservations about this.

There is a special committee of this House appointed to deal with electoral reform and the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. That commission made numerous recommendations with respect to persons with disabilities as part of its report and appropriate changes to the Canada Elections Act.

The Special Committee on Electoral Reform is charged with this responsibility and was mindful of the fact that this bill had been introduced in the House. I may say that 10 pages out of 15 in this bill deal with changes to the Canada Elections Act.

Some of the changes that are in this bill, it is expected, might be superseded by amendments that are made by this House after the committees had an opportunity to go through the report of the royal commission. We have been actively working on that report for some time and I was very surprised to learn today that an arrangement had been worked out to adopt this bill in all stages today.

I have been through the bill with some care and I do not object to any of the changes that are proposed in the bill—far be it from me to do so. I do indicate to the Committee of the Whole that I think this is an inappropriate procedure for such an important piece of legislation. I think it would have been better to refer the bill to a legislative committee so that the Special Committee on Electoral Reform might have had an opportunity to review these amendments with some care and make suggestions as to possible improvements in what is proposed in this bill.

Some of the improvements would have made some changes in the electoral law to make it easier for persons to vote than is contemplated in this bill. We are studying those and we will continue to study them. It may be that additional amendments are brought forward in due course.

• (1630)

I have no objection to any of the amendments that are proposed to the Canada Elections Act. I understand that the government is going to correct the language in several of those amendments. I have reviewed the proposed changes as well and, as I say, I have no objection to them.

I want to express my unhappiness at the fact this procedure has been adopted on this bill, to rush it through without appropriate study in a legislative committee, particularly when it is on a subject that is so important.

While there may be some urgency, as there always is, in passing any bill in this House, the provisions respecting the Canada Elections Act are no more urgent than many of the other changes we are studying, many of which are encompassed in this bill, and it would have been better to do them as part of an over-all change to the act, which I am optimistic will be forthcoming, in a timely way before the next election campaign whenever that may be.

I want to say that these changes are all worth while. I reiterate that and I thank the committee for the opportunity to make these brief comments with respect to those portions of the bill.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer my hon. colleague.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Finance included that proposal as part of its report in February. I am amending the act now to address the needs of Canadians with disabilities to ensure greater access, and at the same time send a clear signal that persons with disabilities will be full participants in the electoral process.

The proposed amendments to the act have been developed in close collaboration with Elections Canada, which has indicated it would be in a position to implement them for the next election and they can be easily implemented that way.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 25—Prohibition

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 25 of Bill C-78 be amended by striking out lines 41 to 43 on page 9 and substituting the following:

"vote in the manner prescribed by this act because the elector is unable to read or is disabled".

Mr. Flis: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could get clarification. I have just been notified of this amendment now in Committee of the Whole. Does being unable to read mean a new Canadian or does it mean because of a physical disability or a mental disability, since we now do not have a definition for disability. Could we get clarification? A person who is unable to read, what does that mean?

Mr. Della Noce: That is a good question. It is already in the act, and it is for alphabet-illiterate persons.

Mr. Flis: I know of many new Canadians who have their Ph.D.s and are very literate, but not in English. Would that person be defined by this amendment?

Mr. Della Noce: If I may describe it in a better way, it is for somebody who needs help to read during an election that can get that kind of help.

Mr. Flis: If I could just toss out a positive suggestion then. If the amendment would have read "is not able to read in one of the official languages", then we would know what we are talking about. This way we do not know what we are talking about.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, it already exists in the act. The people at Elections Canada would like to keep it that way because otherwise other changes would have to be made. The Official Languages Act provides for people who need help in either language and they are already protected in the act. They are very comfortable with that.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Chairman, let us get this clear. What the change as proposed does is remove the words "blindness or visual impairment" and I believe the word "physical" from the act with respect to disability. In other words, it says that any person who is unable to read who suffers from a disability is not to be helped in voting by the Deputy Returning Officer unless that is the problem.

I can understand why the minister has decided to take out the words "blindness and visual impairment" because there is an effort to try to treat this as a bill that deals only with disabilities and those are considered disabilities. There is no definition of disability in the elections act to my knowledge.

As I say I agree with this amendment. I am not disagreeing with it, but one of the principal proposals put forward by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing was to make the elections act more intelligible to people who had to read it. It was a people's act. It is one that thousands of Canadians have to work with in the course of an election campaign and they do not want to have to hire a lawyer every time they read a section.

I suspect the parliamentary secretary could give us his rationale, but the problem with taking them out is that the word disability will have to include this problem of visual impairment, which is fine, but it would be better frankly if there was some definition of it or if there was some explanation of what was intended. The past history of this act is that persons who suffer from visual impairment or blindness have received special arrangements at the voting booths. These arrangements will now have to be covered by the words persons who are disabled. That is fine but there will be a lot of Deputy Returning Officers who do not understand that and that is my fear. We are fiddling with the words of this act in a way that may lead to confusion and trouble at polling stations across Canada and there are thousands of them in every election as you know.

I just want the minister to make sure that this is clear and in taking these words out he notes there is no definition of disability in the Canada Elections Act. There could be some confusion on election day which I think would be unfortunate.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is right. There is no definition in the Canada Elections Act but this was changed to help anyone who really needs help that day, especially because elections only happen once in a while. These people can get help immediately. This was included in the Canada Elections Act. They tried to cover all issues and they are very comfortable with it.

Mrs. Phinney: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment that the original version is unnecessarily restrictive. In some of its definitions the new version allows all persons with disabilities to benefit from changes in the electoral act.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Chairman, there is not much I can say except that the hon. member is correct.

Bill reported and concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (for the Secretary of State) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few minutes to congratulate the parliamentary secretary and all members who were on the committee putting this bill through.

I would just like to leave a little suggestion with all members and a reminder for myself. If we are serious about helping the disabled in this country we have to set an example. One way is to begin with our communications. Most of us send four parliamentary reports or householders, as we call them, to our constituents every year. How do we send them out? Are they in French or English? Some go out in Italian or Portuguese. This is great, but how many of our reports go to blind people? Not many. I would not expect anyone to print or duplicate in another format 40,000 copies of a householder.

On some of my householders—I toss this out as a suggestion—I included a little phrase to the constituents indicating that if they knew of a friend, relative or a neighbour who could not read the report because of a visual disability to send in his or her name and address and we would send a cassette.

• (1700)

You may get one request and you may get no requests, but at least we are making our parliamentary reports accessible and available to all our constituents, including the people who for some reason or another cannot see.

Another suggestion is that we are lucky in Ottawa to have our business cards printed in Braille. How many members sitting right here have their cards printed in Braille? There are quite a few. I am impressed, but that is another way that we can set an example.

As members of the federal government, we should be setting an example and maybe with the beginning of Bill C-78 we can start doing this.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking all our colleagues on both sides of the House for their co-operation.

This is something very nice that has been brought to visible persons. It is not only a start but a continuation of what has been done in the past. This is an excellent bill and we have a lot of support from these people. It deserves to be passed without delay. I must say that with the kind of co-operation that we have here today, it is a beautiful gift that we bring to these people.

My friend was talking about business cards in Braille. Last week I was fortunate to do the opening of one of the biggest schools in Canada which is called Institut Nazareth et Louis-Braille in the city of Longueuil, which is south of Montreal in my hon. colleague's riding of Longueuil.

I was very impressed to see this beautiful family of blind people. These disabled people tried to help each other. When the international president from Paris started to read 15 pages of speech, the way he read it was impressive. He did not look one minute at his speech.

I said to my friend and colleague from Longueuil: "He could be a very good politician because every time he reads a 10-page speech, nobody knows it". He was looking at us in our eyes and it was just great. I am doing this for them, and I appreciate what my hon. colleagues did for us in giving us their co-operation. I thank them very much.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 31 and 32 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

[English]

Motion No. 33, standing in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 34, standing in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Motions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38, standing in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth, will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 34 will obviate the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38. A negative vote on Motion No. 34 will require a vote on Motion No. 35 which will apply to Motions Nos. 36, 37 and 38.

Motion No. 27.

That Bill C-22 be amended by deleting Clause 27.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have moved that the first 27 clauses of Bill C-22 be deleted. Briefly, hon. members are aware that these are the clauses that pertain to provisions for the Wage Claim Payment Act.

No one disputes the importance of the principle of wage earner protection. We all agree on the need to enable employees to obtain wages and expenses after a company has gone bankrupt. There has been considerable debate, as my hon. friend from Nickel Belt knows, about what would be the best method of funding such wage claim payments.

[Translation]

I am not giving up and do not intend to give up the objective of protecting wage earners. This is a priority of mine as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but this bill cannot be held up indefinitely while we look for ways to finance the program to protect workers, not when one Canadian in ten is looking for work. We must therefore act immediately to pass Bill C-22 to encourage companies in difficulty and help them survive.

[English]

I will have more to say about how Bill C-22 will help save companies and preserve jobs when it comes up for third reading.

The provisions for commercial reorganization, consumer proposals, consumer bankruptcies, secured creditors and receivers, Crown claims and priorities and the protection of unpaid suppliers will all help. These provisions are not affected by the deletions I have proposed.

The only clauses to be removed are those relating to wage claim payments. I would like to reiterate what I told the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations last month when I notified it of the government's intention to split Bill C-22.

[Translation]

The protection of wage earners will be a priority for discussion when the Bankruptcy Act is reviewed in three years.

I hope that consensus will be reached during that review and that we can start working on it immediately, since unfortunately we do not have consensus now. I therefore encourage all members of this House to continue their efforts so that we on both sides of the Chamber can find a way to improve worker protection in future amendments to the Bankruptcy Act.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, amendments 1 to 27 in particular on this bill are indeed unfortunate amendments for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to have moved.

We all know in this House the Bankruptcy Act is an outdated piece of legislation going back to 1949. There have been many attempts previously to try to amend this particular act so that it offered a better balance between the various interests in a bankruptcy situation.

Each attempt in the past has failed and it has failed for a whole number of reasons but particularly because there are so many different interests involved it seemed that any change, no matter how positive, would always affect somebody in a negative way. As a result, each attempt at bankruptcy reform has failed.

This minister in particular has come forward and he had a novel approach to the bill. He brought in a bankruptcy bill, Bill C-22, which sought not just to reform and rebalance the Bankruptcy Act, but the bill recognized there was a particular interest in the assets of a bankrupt company. There was a particular debt owing in the form of unpaid labour.

It is not just called the Bankruptcy Act, it is called the Wage Claim Payment Act. It covers two quite different things. The minister did not seek to rebalance within the Bankruptcy Act, recognizing the legitimate interest of the workers here who many times find themselves the last in the line to get paid when a company goes bankrupt, well behind the banks, the other creditors and the last in line to get paid when a company goes bankrupt and the assets are divvied up.

Instead of rebalancing the Bankruptcy Act and coming forward and saying you are right, the workers have an interest here and we are going to put the workers interests ahead of everybody else's interest here, the minister said that would be too complex, too difficult, maybe the big banks would not like it, maybe the big financial institutions would not like to have their security interests lessened in any respect.

Rather than rebalancing the bill, he had a novel approach to creating the wage claim payment fund. Out of that wage claim payment fund the minister recognized up front right in the title of the bill that the workers have an interest in the assets of the bankruptcy.

Further, he recognized that they should get paid their wages, up to $2,000 in back wages that are owed. He did it by way of a new program, not by saying we will recognize in the Bankruptcy Act, by way of something like super priority, that the workers wages must be paid. He wanted to come in with a new social program, basically. It is called the Wage Claim Payment Act.

We did not think on our side of the House this was the way to go about it. We figured it should have been done right in the bill. We said the minister and the government should stand up to those banks, tell those big banks they would have to lessen their interests just a little bit so the workers who might have been owed $500, $700, or $800 would get paid and get paid up front.

The minister said he was not prepared to stand up to those big financial institutions and what he was going to do was set up a separate fund. That in and of itself may not seem like a bad thing to do but then we get into how this government was going to fund it. If there is any government anywhere in the western that should be afraid of the words new tax, it should be members opposite.

They saw their popularity, which was not that great in the first place, plummet over the last few years because they taxed Canadians out. They taxed medium and small businesses to the nth degree and put many of them into bankruptcy.

The government came in with the GST, a God-awful tax that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business called a nightmare on main street. The government came in, did not learn its lesson and it would not rebalance the bill. It wanted to set up a separate fund and it was going to fund it by a new tax on every payroll in Canada.

The government said at that time do not worry about it because it is only a small tax. It is only a few cents or a few dollars here and there. It does not really make much difference.

• (1720)

There were fundamental flaws in the application of the tax. First of all, it was a tax that should not have been implemented at a time when we were in deep recession. Second, there was no level of confidence in the business community that this government would hold its word not to increase that tax.

The universities, the school boards, the hospital associations, every public corporation in this country which cannot go bankrupt was going to be charged a tax, a tax for a program that none of their employees would ever be able to access as long as they worked for a public corporation. The all-party committee pre-studied this bill.

I want to make sure that everyone knows that this was a unique effort to try to bring some harmony to this place and to try to put some respect back into the way we do our business. We had a pre-study well before second reading. The bill had not even been approved in principle. We sat down collectively and we looked at this thing. Even the Tories, even the Conservative members on the committee said: "You are right. This is the wrong way to do it. We should not have a separate fund in recognition of the legitimate interest of workers who have not been paid wages. What we should have is super priority".

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I, along with some government members opposite, discussed it in a non-partisan way. We looked at it and said that makes a lot of sense. In the interest of fairness, super priority is the way to go. We reported the bill back to the government prior to second reading and said it is almost unique. We have unanimous consent of the committee to tell the government that we think super priority is the way to go because we cannot impose a new tax on those groups that I just mentioned, particularly small and medium sized businesses in Canada.

The government did not listen. It said: "No, you cannot do that. We cannot deal with the big banks. They are too powerful. They scare us too much. We are more concerned with our coffers at the Tory party headquarters than with rebalancing legitimately this bill". That is what it did. We all know that. We sat through those committee hearings.

Then the government put the muscle on its committee members who had agreed to the report and sent them scurrying like scared children because the big muscle came on at that point in time and party discipline was the way to go. Forget about this novel, noble adventure of non-partisan discussion and debate on trying to better a major piece of legislation.

The government came back in October or November and particularly the businesses, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, and all these people said: "We know it is small tax, but we do not count. We cannot trust this government not to raise this tax unilaterally without coming back to Parliament". Each and every time, and the record shows it clearly, that somebody said that at committee, one of the minister's mandarins jumped up in his place and said: "Look at it. Look at the way it is worded in clause 29 of the bill. We cannot unilaterally raise this tax. We have to go back to Parliament for approval".

At the eleventh hour, at the end of November, the government came in in its usually under handed, dark and devious way and proposed an amendment that was going to ostensibly have the Treasury Board, through the Consolidated Revenue Fund, fund the program. There would be no tax, it said, for the first year or two of the operations. We smelled a rat and asked a lot of questions.

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asked the key question: "Are you going to fund this out of general revenues or are you giving a loan?" Then all the truth came forward. We found out that all the government was doing was giving a loan. In addition to that one little clause in the amendment, it was also going to give the Governor in Council the ability, without ever coming back to Parliament, to raise the tax, to raise the premium, which was exactly what every business said. They said they cannot trust this bunch at its word and it will raise the tax.

We fought it at committee. We argued procedural points. The chair of the committee, a Tory, ruled in our favour and said that the amendments were out of order. The government was stuck. We did not sit back and say that is it, I guess the bill is going to die. We came up with other options which my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is going to talk about. We came up with a number of options to try to get the government back on track.

We recognized that if the government did not know what to do, we in the opposition had a responsibility to try to put this bill back on track to help those individuals and companies out there that were going belly up because of this government's economic policy.

We put four proposals forward to this minister on how he could have a program that could be funded without a tax. We even talked about using the UI system. We talked about a number of different processes such as a new tax on the assets that were being disbursed in a bankruptcy to the big financial institutions because they do not pay any fee now to the superintendent of bankruptcy. This government said no.

We have a situation here in which the government has decided that its much heralded interests in the workers of Canada and its interests in bankruptcy legislation have rung hollow. It has come through with 27 amendments that show that it was not prepared to put its money where its mouth is, and this party will not vote for these amendments that effectively strip the rights of workers out of this bill.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a sad performance by a minister of the Crown, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

There were two major principles in any amendment to the Bankruptcy Act; on the one hand there was the principle that workers who have lost their wages because of a bankruptcy or an insolvency are entitled to be compensated for their wages. They ought to get those wages.

If the workers had been paid on the Friday and the company went bankrupt on the Monday, the major creditors do not come back and say to the company, "go and get those cheques back that you paid the workers".

There is a principle that a worker is entitled to be compensated for the effort and the commitment that he has put into the job, for his labour.

That is one principle. The other principle in the Bankruptcy Act was to allow for reorganizations which may result in saving some companies from going down the tubes because we have a financial institution in this country that acts more like a coyote when it smells blood. It moves in and takes the security.

Those are the two major principles, and we have been operating with a Bankruptcy Act which was passed in 1949. For 43 years we have made no major changes even though the whole marketplace, the society, has changed.

This government recognized those two major principles. It is bad enough that the Liberals were unable to do anything at all when they were in power. They did not have the courage to do anything. At least this gang brought in Bill C-22.

The major stakeholders—the minister keeps talking about the major stakeholders—in the bill are the creditors. The major stakeholders are the suppliers, the farmers, the fishermen. The major stakeholders in the bill are the workers.

In this bill I looked for the balance. Do we provide a balance for the stakeholders in the bill? The bill was balanced when it had a wage protection plan. I did not like the idea that it would put another payroll tax on the economy at this time. I did not like that.

Since this government came to power in 1984 it has taxed Canadians 34 times. Canadians, particularly workers, are well aware of the unemployment insurance premiums, which in January went to 24 per cent. They know while it starts with the price of a cup of coffee it ends up that you are buying the whole urn of coffee. In my view nobody would support the small business community and the public sector as well. School boards, hospitals, universities and municipalities will not countenance another payroll tax.

We said to the government that we recognized that we have to maintain the balance in the bill.

• (1730)

One of the ways to maintain the balance of the bill was to ensure that workers go to the front of the bus, the same as the banks go to the front of the bus.

What is the difference between any of the big financial institutions in this country having a secure credit on some assets of a company that has gone bankrupt and a worker who has given his time and labour? That is just as secure as a bank, any other financial institution or any other creditor.

So we wanted a super priority, so to speak, for the workers. The committee at pre-study stage agreed and recommended that to the government. The government said: "No, we cannot do that. It means we would have to be challenging the powers of the large financial institutions." It backed away from that. The minister is shaking his head. The fact of the matter is that he got eyeball to eyeball with them and he backed away.

When we got into committee study of the bill, we then proposed that we should pay it out of general revenues. We said: "Look, it is $61 million." In a total government budget, Canada's budget of $145 billion, it is $61 million. We said: "Take it out of general revenues."

The Government of Ontario responded to the same problem with having a wage protection plan that is paid out of general revenues. The government said no to that.

We then came back and suggested to the government that it tax the assets the creditors are realizing when they enforce their security in a bankruptcy. After all, we are going to pay all of the major banks employing 500,000 people in the country and would be putting $3 million into the government's wage protection plan. Surely if they wanted to maintain their super priority at the head of the bus, why would they deny workers $61 million? Last year, the total amount of assets in bankruptcy situations was $4.3 billion. The financial institutions got $3 billion of that. We are talking about $61 million for workers. Again the government said no.

The committee turned that proposal down, lead by the Conservative majority on the committee. Now this minister said to workers in his opening remarks: "We have no intention of abandoning workers". Well, it took us 43 years to get to this position.

I want to tell you now that you do not have the element, the other voices in this whole business of bankruptcy are arguing for changes. Workers who have lost their jobs as a result of bankruptcy and are not getting paid, can you see the impression they are going to make on this government to correct that anomaly, to correct that injustice?

In this bill, we have looked after all those other stakeholders, to use the minister's term. Look at what we are doing in the bill. We are allowing the farmers to come and get their carrots, chickens and whatever else. We are allowing the fishermen to come and get their cod, whatever other fish or turtles they have sold. If it is there, they can come and take it. It is called revindication of goods. They have a super priority.

We heard the bankers who came before the committee when it was proposed in the bill. They all said: "Well, you cannot do that. We are going to have a credit crunch." It is done in Quebec and it did not create any credit crunch.

Now suppliers can revindicate their goods. Look at who gets in the line-up and who gets their cut. First we have the secure creditors, banks and financial institutions. They get their cut. Then we have the government getting its cut. Government has to get its cut with all those UI premiums, CPP premiums and income tax owing. The lawyers get theirs. All those who are trustees get their cut off the top. They are super priorized. The superintendent, whatever charges he has, he takes his off the top, but you cannot put the workers in.

I say to the minister, to this government and to all those who are watching that the minute the workers were separated from the rest of all those who have vested interests in this bill, the minute the workers were taken out, then there was no reason for anybody to change things to put workers back into the picture. That is it. All of the powerful stakeholders have been taken out. They are satisfied. Who is going to be the voice crying out in the wilderness to put workers back on the list?

The minister is telling the workers he will not forget them. As soon as the ink is dry on this bill they are forgotten. This minister will stand condemned by history as having turned his back on one of the major stakeholders in bankruptcy, the workers.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the daily hour of adjournment for the continuation of report stage of Bill C-22, an Act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A technicality in the Standing Orders requires this kind of motion to be presented as part of an intervention or debate. I therefore ask the hon. parliamentary secretary to ensure that his motion is presented in accordance with the rules.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I listened attentively to what you previously stated. In fact, the hon. member across was to have had the floor during debate. No debate took place, nothing happened.

Subsequent to your ruling you then asked for the vote on that which you had indicated some uncertainty, at the very least, as to whether or not it was in order to start with.

Could the House get a clarification from the Chair as to whether or not the motion is admissible? We could then vote on it at that point. Could the Chair enlighten us in that regard?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): To make it quite clear, I gave the floor to the hon. parliamentary secretary because he rose on a point of order, but his point could only arise as part of an intervention or debate. I see that the hon. opposition whip can perhaps enlighten the Chair further.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the parliamentary secretary because I was under the impression that the three main parties in this House had had talks to reach an agreement for allowing about an hour of debate at report stage. So we would not have seen the clock, so to speak, and I thought that was what the parliamentary secretary was about to propose. However, I see that he has just moved a motion to extend the hours. I do not understand at all. Sometimes we waste a lot of time that way. Therefore, to avoid a needless waste of time, I would like the parliamentary secretary to tell me if he intends to abide by the talks held this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, in the interests of permitting other members to contribute to this debate, I did shorten my contribution to the debate. I could overcome that now by saying what it was that I left out of my speech. There is a good deal I could say about this bill, as my hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell knows. I thought that I would just refrain from saying those things and put the motion.

• (1740)

My hon. friend, the opposition Whip, is quite correct in the sense that there is an understanding from his quarter at least that we would not go much beyond an hour. That is the intention. We are hoping that we will be able to complete report stage this evening, and that was the purpose of the motion. I trust you will find it in order.

If it would help and if I were to contribute to the debate, I would be prepared to do that in order to restore it to an orderly state.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is anything symbolic that a form of closure or another was in fact invoked twice within 30 seconds in this House of Commons today.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have some difficulty with this motion.

There was a telephone call placed to me by the parliamentary secretary asking whether or not we would agree to sit an extended period of time. The extended period of time in the subsequent conversations that I have had with members opposite, with my Whip and with the member for Nickel Belt was that we would sit for one hour. If it is my understanding that that is not the intent of the motion, then I would have to say that that is not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I have no option than to call the members to decide on the motion.

Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their place.

Fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-80

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I would have liked to take care of this before he got started on his remarks.

An agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) or 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time for second reading of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specific number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that said stage.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-22, an Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations; and the motions of Mr. Blais.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is anything symbolic that a form of closure or another was in fact invoked twice within 30 seconds in the House of Commons today. I must say that the parliamentary secretary just a few moments extended the sitting of the House for this evening. That in itself is not objectionable. What is objectionable is the fact that an agreement previously arranged to have the House sit an extra hour has in fact been breached or superseded by what was moved earlier today. In any case, I hope that it is a technical breach only, that we will complete our discussions within that hour and that the whole discussion will be academic.

When this bill was debated in committee, it was initially debated or discussed in what is referred to as a pre-study. That was a brand new instrument. I do believe our Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations was the first to use it to deal with Bill C-22, the Bankruptcy Act and the Wage Earner Protection Act. My colleague, the member for Dartmouth and I and other colleagues handled the bill very well.

Initially the government told us that it wanted to apply a payroll tax in order to fund the wage earner protection program. I must say that in the beginning I did not find that particularly objectionable myself, but many Canadians said: "Wait a minute, this is not right. We have already had taxes increased almost three dozen times since the Conservatives have been in power. Notwithstanding the fact that that payroll tax is going to be very small, we do not like it because we cannot trust these people". You know, Mr. Speaker, they were right. Canadians who contributed toward the process had it dead on. No sooner had we turned around than the government started to introduce amendments of its own. In those amendments one of the things that the government was trying to do was to remove the provision whereby Parliament had to decide if there was to be a change in the premiums of this wage earner protection program. In other words the government wanted to amend its own bill in order to give itself the power to increase the premium that it had just levied without asking Parliament.

Canadians who had contributed at the committee had it right. We were faced with the situation that Canadians did not want a new tax. I can appreciate that. I think they were quite right in saying that no new tax should be invoked.

That does not mean that we should not have a wage earner protection program.

[Translation]

My colleague from Dartmouth and I sincerely believe that there is a real need to implement a wage claim recovery mechanism for workers who lose their jobs.

[English]

In my own constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell I will never forget the 1984 election campaign. I was the incumbent provincial member, the MPP for the area. In the middle of the election I got a phone call at my campaign office. This phone call was from a group of women working at an assembly plant in Hawkesbury where garments were put together. The workers were saying: "Mr. Boudria, the owner is trying to remove the sewing machines from the building. He has not paid us our holiday pay. He still owes many of us wages and he is trying to take off with the machines".

I immediately phoned the police and told them what was going on. I instructed people at my office to get in touch with someone at the legal clinic to seek to get an injunction preventing the man from doing this. I went and joined the workers personally in order to stop the people who were trying to take the machines away. That would have been the last that those people would have heard of their money. They would never have it. The guy would have just taken off with his equipment, packed up and started some place else at some point down the road. That makes the point as to why we need wage earner protection programs like this.

• (1750)

My colleague from Dartmouth together with myself proposed a number of alternatives to the levy the government was proposing, the payroll tax. He proposed the wage earner protection fund be funded by a levy on the dividends paid to secured creditors.

There were amendments brought by the government but the amendments were such as to exempt the bank from virtually anything in so far as levies are concerned for the services given to them.

We also proposed as an alternative to financing the wage earner protection fund, the unemployment insurance fund for a period of time. My colleague and I, when the government did not want to understand any of this said, let us make a deal, we are reasonable people in this committee. Let us have the government fund this program for 18 months out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and after 18 months we will devise something better to fund this. This was certainly one way in which it could have been done. The government would not listen to it.

All proposals made by the Liberal opposition were defeated by the government. The government did not want to see a wage order protection fund of any kind seemingly, other than the kind the government could fund directly by one of those premiums, those same premiums that they did not even want to consult Parliament about before establishing the rates.

That is why my colleague and I support the principle of having a wage earner protection fund. We did not support the payroll tax proposed by the government in Bill C–22. We do not support Motions Nos. 1 to 27 because they would remove everything from the bill that gave the workers their protection.

What the government should have done instead is introduce amendments. There would have been Motions Nos. 1 to 27 or something like that, but those motions would have proposed an alternative to the wage earner protection fund instead of simply deleting the clauses and saying they will be back at some point in the future in order to offer protection to workers.

We could discuss a number of other issues as they involve this wage earner protection fund but the point remains the same. The minister should address both of these issues. I do not want this bill delayed because there are many businesses that could be rehabilitated with a new bankruptcy law. In so rehabilitating those businesses, we will not have any new ones shut down or at least not as many of them. We will not have as many people losing their jobs and as many people without a wage earner protection fund. The right way of doing it is to have both a wage earner protection program and a new bankruptcy law in this country.

I am with the minister when he says we need a new law and we need it soon. That is quite true. Where he and I part company is when he removes all the clauses to the wage earner protection program and replaces them with nothing at all, only with blank spaces. Blank spaces do not provide much of a pay cheque for the people who have lost their wages.

We are not asking for charity here. Those people have earned that money, their salary, they have earned their vacation pay and they have earned their pay cheque that has not been paid to them in four or five weeks because the boss comes in and says "Gee folks, can you wait a little while for your pay cheque because we are having a rough time in this enterprise", and the workers buy it. Many times they should. When it is all over though, the money that is owed to the workers should be paid.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on these motions, but first I want to point out that once again the Bloc Quebecois was ignored and not consulted regarding the extension of sitting hours. I point this out, because today I had decided to be a good girl, to co–operate and to give consent regarding Bill C–78.

So when unanimous consent was required, I gave that consent out of the goodness of my heart. Then, afterwards, the other parties are asked about extending sitting hours, but not the Bloc Quebecois. Therefore, they should not bother asking for my consent anymore, because this is it. I will not give that consent anymore. I hope that the government will not need my consent, because I have had enough for the time being.

Regarding the bill itself, I find it regrettable that the government did not have the courage of its convictions. After having promised since June 1991 that workers would have an act on wage claim recovery, this government has unfortunately decided not to go ahead with its project. Rather, it has listened to its conservative members and I mean conservative in the literal sense of the word.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs says that he will keep trying to ensure wage claims protection. Again, this is only wishful thinking. This reminds me of the wishful thinking expressed last week by the member for Jonquière regarding the Referendum Act. This seems to be essentially a similar situation, since the minister does not have the support of his party to go ahead with this wage claim act.

We know very well that the existing Bankruptcy Act goes back to 1949. I doubt very much that this legislation will soon be reviewed.

Once again, the Conservative government backed off under pressure. I would like to talk more specifically about clauses 7, 8 and 11, which the minister wants to delete with the motions that he tabled. I will discuss those clauses from a very specific angle, and I mean the quality of the French version as well as its wording. Regarding this issue, I will refer to the report submitted in September 1991 to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations by the committee of the Barreau du Quebec on bankruptcy, insolvency and wage claim recovery.

In its report, the Barreau tells us about all the problems in understanding the French version of the sections of that act. I will simply quote section 7 of the act at page 6 which says: "Les prestations ne peuvent être cédées, grevées de privilèges, saisies, assorties d'un exercice anticipé, ni données en garantie, et toute opération en ce sens est nulle."

I believe that the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs has a degree in law and perhaps he could explain to me the meaning of "assorties d'un exercice anticipé" as the French version says. Even the Barreau du Québec does not understand that expression. I really wonder where it comes from, unless it is a very bad translation as we suspect it is.

• (1800)

Section 8 is just as bad. It says:

> Lorsqu'un versement est fait à un particulier au titre de la présente section, Sa Majesté du chef du Canada est subrogée dans les droits de ce particulier sur le failli, la personne insolvable ou tout administrateur d'une personne morale et sur tous biens.

Of course they mean "sur les biens du failli", but you have to read the section several times, and this is true, as I said, even for people who have a law degree and who are used to reviewing bills rather frequently. I will end by reading paragraph 2 of section 11, on page 7, line 24:

> La demande est à présenter, selon les modalités réglementaires—

Of course, we know that it should be "la demande est présentée".

Once again, and I have done it several times over a period of a few days, I point out that the French language is really not treated properly in this House. It is very easy to see that we only get translated documents and in fact, they are very badly translated most of the time.

I will carry on the same vein regarding the clauses left since there are now 27 fewer than originally in this famous bill. I will keep criticizing the substance as well as the quality of the French version regarding those other provisions.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a few remarks on the record with respect to this legislation. I consider it a black eye for this institution to not have a wage earners' protection fund included in this bill.

At this time when the economy is in trouble and we have witnessed a lot of bankruptcies, a lot of closures of plants and offices of one kind or another, we should take the opportunity to support workers, to show we are really behind them and we are committed to them. Yet we see that we have failed in that commitment, if we ever had it at all, particularly from the government's perspective.

Workers will have reason to be deeply disappointed with us not coming up with a mechanism to give them more protection.

I want to say that all workers very often, certainly in the employment context, have to offer is their labour. That is their means of livelihood. That is how they make a living. That is what they give to their employers. They give their employers their hands, their minds and in return, their employers pay them a wage, a salary.

Surely at a time of financial difficulty for firms, workers should be given top priority. For workers most often, just about always, that is the only source of income they have. That is the only financial leg on which they stand, the income from their labour. We should do everything possible to protect that, to give them the dignity to be paid their wages.

That is not the case with the banks and other lending institutions. They have many sources of income. Sure, they deserve protection as well. They cannot just lend money in a crazy fashion without any regard for security, any regard for collateral or they too will go broke.

However, if a plant closes, if a plant goes bankrupt, for the worker that is his only source of income. It is not for lending institutions. They lend to many, hundreds or thousands of borrowers. So very often when a plant closes it is not a catastrophe for the lending institution. However, if the worker does not get his wages, be it for two or three weeks or perhaps even more, that is calamitous. That can be a catastrophe.

As parliamentarians, on behalf of the broad society, we should reflect a strong commitment to workers to give them that protection.

The legislation that is being amended goes back a long time, to 1949, as I understand it, and the economy has changed tremendously in more than 40 years. Conditions for employees have changed tremendously in more than 40 years.

The time has come to show a greater priority and a greater commitment to workers so they are not left in an unprotected position and not left in a way whereby they cannot even provide for their families. Surely we have to show more dignity for them. It is lamentable, it is terrible that we do not have this wage protection fund that was proposed.

Our party made several proposals, none has been accepted. It is a black eye for this institution. We have let Canadian workers down. We are going to have to change the situation as soon as possible because we cannot leave workers in this tenuous situation. We have let them down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will remind all members that a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to the remaining motions in this group, Motions Nos. 2 to 27 inclusive.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

• (1810)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

Motion No. 29.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 46 by striking out line 33 at page 38 and substituting the following therefor:

"persons and, where applicable, may be accompanied by a report in respect of the insolvent person provided by a review panel appointed by the Farm Debt Review Board under the Farm Debt Review Act;".

Motion No. 30.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 46 by adding immediately after line 33 at page 41 the following:

"(12) For purposes of subsection (5), the trustee shall, where applicable, consult the Farm Debt Review Board in respect of the debtor and where, in the preceding twelve months, a report in respect of the debtor has been made by a review panel appointed by the Board under the Farm Debt Review Act, the trustee shall consider the findings of the Report and where the findings are helpful to assist the debtor in the presentation of a proposal, the trustee shall make the findings known to the creditors at the meeting of the creditors."

He said: Mr. Speaker, these two motions really come from a recommendation of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. It filed a report in July of 1988 called The $22 Billion Problem. In that report it was recommended that where the Farm Debt Review Board is unable to reach an agreement to maintain a farmer on his farm, that a report be filed for the use of the farmer.

This recommendation is a very good one because often where the Farm Debt Review Board, which really has very little power itself to reach an agreement because it has only consultative powers or mediation powers.

Often when a farmer is going through extreme financial distress or approaching bankruptcy, it is only one of the creditors which is holding up an agreement. Under this bankruptcy legislation, it is provided that where 66 per cent of the value in each class can reach an agreement on a proposition, then the bankruptcy commissioner can order that agreement. It is somewhat like the chapter 11 in the United States.

What my amendment really provides for is where the Farm Debt Review Board fails to reach an agreement for reducing the debts or extending the credit arrangements for a farmer. A report is made by the Farm Debt Review Board that the trustee acting on behalf of the farmer facing financial difficulty would be able to put that report, if it was favourable to the farmer, before the creditors for his benefit.

It not only strengthens the position of the farmer facing bankruptcy or using the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, but it adds tremendous strength to the Farm Debt Review Board. Where a creditor is being unreasonable, he faces the prospect of the Farm Debt Review Board issuing a report after the negotiations which would suggest that some individual creditor in those negotiations is being totally unreasonable and so there is increased pressure there.

In 1988 the Standing Committee on Agriculture of the House of Commons did a report which suggested that there is a $22 billion problem for Canadian farmers. In fact, today the problem is not $22 billion; it is $24 billion. The agriculture committee did a further study in 1990 which said that there was something like $6 billion worth of debt which is not serviceable.

We have to take into account the extremely low prices for grain. Last year we had grain selling for $2 a bushel which cost $4 to produce. The debt problem overhangs the entire grain and oilseed industry, especially in western Canada and especially in Saskatchewan. Yet often the Farm Debt Review Board has very little power to deal with that situation. My amendment this evening would increase the negotiating position of the farm review board. In fact if a farmer is applying under this bankruptcy legislation for a reorganization then it gives him the power to do so.

Back in the 1930s we had two important pieces of legislation to cope with the desperate and terrible situation in the country at that time. One was the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to assist farmers in reorganizing their debts. For the business community we had the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

It is a sad piece of information for Canadians that we still have the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. In my own constituency Algoma Steel just used the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act to write down hundreds of millions of dollars worth of debt to reorganize or restructure that whole company so that workers could keep their jobs.

However the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been discontinued and is not available. We do not have the same tools.

The United States recognizes the serious problem facing the agriculture industry back in 1986 or 1987. It brought in special legislation and reduced the debt of farmers from something like $205 billion to $140 billion. That debt is not overhanging that industry.

This legislation has not made much provision for that kind of restructuring of debt. We do know there is some $6 billion of debt out there overhanging the entire industry. It cannot be serviced with the current level of support and profitability of the agricultural industry.

My amendment does not change the over-all structure of the bankruptcy legislation before us. It makes provision for the recommendation of the Farm Debt Review Board to be taken into account where it would be beneficial by the trustee in his negotiation with the creditors.

I believe it would strengthen both this legislation and and the Farm Debt Review Board legislation. I would hope members of the House, and especially those of the government, would support the amendment before the House tonight.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to carry on in the same vein and talk about the quality of the French version of this bill.

Once again, I would like to refer to the report of the committee of the Barreau du Québec, which was submitted to the Standing Committee in September 1991. You will notice, upon reading the bill, that the Standing Committee really did not take into account the recommendations made by the Barreau in its report.

Here, we refer to motions Nos. 29 and 30 regarding section 46, which would be added to section 50 of the present Act. Therefore, there would be a section 50.1, 50.2, et cetera. I am now at clause 50.9, on page 40 of the act, where line 50 of the English version and line 46 of the French version do not correspond. What happens is that in English they say "if satisfied" and in French "soit convaincu". We know very well that this is not the same thing in law; it is not the same terminology and it does not have the same meaning. Therefore, the Barreau made a recommendation which the Standing Committee ignored, and the result is that the same mistake is still in the bill that is before us.

Now, if you go to the following page, that is page 41, it is even worse. Indeed, part of the English text has not been translated into French. I am talking lines 15 and 16, which I will read to you in English:

• (1820)

[English]

"or any extension thereof granted under subsection 9".

[Translation]

In paragraph 11 of the French text, there is no reference to what I just read; it is simply not translated.

Once again, the committee ignored the recommendations of the Barreau. It is as though there were no French-speaking people on this committee, or nobody that could at least read French, since the wording of the bill is still exactly the same as it was when the Barreau appeared before the committee.

I think it was important for me to emphasize this situation. In fact, I can tell you why the Barreau insists and says that in the English version of section 50.4 (9), which I just referred to, it is said that the court may grant an extension of time for filing a proposal if it is satisfied. Obviously, it is not the same thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must remind the hon. member that we are debating Motions Nos. 29 and 30 which, I believe, are not related to the motions referred to by the hon. member.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, Motions Nos. 29 and 30 relate to clause 46 of the bill which relates to section 50 of the former act. These are additions being made. I would point out that Motion No. 29 specifically relates to section 50.4(2) while Motion No. 30 relates to section 50.4(12).

What I am talking about here, is subsection (9) which is part of the same section. If you tell me that I cannot speak on a given subsection because it is not subsection such and such, I think this raises some questions. Right now, I am referring specifically to the clause being debated.

Are you sure, Mr. Speaker? I believe I am referring to section 50.4. Of course, I am somewhere between subsections (2) and (12), but if you insist that we do not deal with other subsections in that section, I will have to wonder why, because it seems both important and relevant to me that we pick out the flaws in this bill.

There are even parts of the bill that are not translated, where there is no French translation provided. I think it is important to mention this to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so that he can take note. This is not meant as a criticism against him, but rather as a constructive comment to help him and this House.

If I may, I would like to add one thing and I will end on that. I mentioned that, in section 50.4(9), there was a difference between being "satisfied" and "convaincu", "convinced", on the French side. I wanted to end on that, but I will keep reminding the minister, when the opportunity arises, of the correct usage of French. I will be delighted to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair is going by the wording of the motions put forward by the hon. member for Algoma, which call for amendments to clause 46 both in Motion No. 29 and in Motion No. 30. Perhaps the hon. member has another version of the motion that I am not aware of, but I am going by the very wording of the two motions being debated and both refer to amendments to clause 46.

At any rate, I do not want to get into a fruitless discussion on this. I just wanted to point out that the very wording of both motions that I have just read deal with clause 46. As a matter of fact, I will have to read them again, and I would invite her to pay attention, because that is indeed the clause we are talking about.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 29. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 31.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 60 by adding immediately after line 25 at page 67 the following:

"(4) Subsection (2) does not apply in respect of a claim under paragraph 136(1)(d) and moneys owed to a claimant under that paragraph shall be deemed to be held in trust by the bankrupt from the date when the amount claimed became due."

Motion No. 32.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 63 by adding immediately after line 8 at page 76 the following:

"69.5 A creditor who has a claim provable in bankruptcy under paragraph 136(1)(d) is not subject to a stay under sections 69 to 69.3 in respect of the amount owed to the creditor.
69.6 Except for paragraphs 69(1)(c) and".

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these two motions is to make sure, even within a bill that has turned its back on the major principle of wage protection for workers who have lost their wages in a bankruptcy, that justice for these workers is put back into the bill.

How do these two motions intend to do that? They intend to protect the wages of workers in the same way and in the same manner as Revenue Canada funds from a bankrupt company, unemployment insurance premiums and Canada pension premiums are protected. In other words those contributions are set aside by the trustee. They are deemed trusts. They are not part of the assets of the bankrupt company.

Therefore we are suggesting that the wages of workers up to $2,000 be treated in exactly the same manner. They would be set aside in a deemed trust. They cannot be touched by any financial institution or creditor that seeks to come in and grab it.

It seems to me that this is fair. If the workers had been paid on the Friday and the following Wednesday the company went down the tubes, the creditors could not come to the workers and say: "Give back the cheque". In the same way we have to recognize that every worker is worthy of his hire and his labour must be respected.

That is why these two amendments seek to put that back in. After all, the Crown has protected whatever that company has deducted from the employees in terms of UI premiums, Canada pension premiums and Revenue Canada deductions. Those moneys do not get grabbed by the creditor. They are protected. All it is is extending to a logical conclusion that what is good for the government surely ought to be good enough to protect the workers as well.

It seems rather strange that the government will have collected its taxes from wages that were never paid to the workers because the money deducted goes into the trust. Yet they never get the net wages.

I find it passing strange that this government later on in the bill, apart from this particular priority for the Crown, gives away some $25 million of federal Crown priority money. It gives it away. And there is $15 million for the provinces, so $40 million altogether is given away of the Crown's priorities apart from those that I have just mentioned. They are considered in trust and cannot be touched by the creditor.

My amendments are very logical. I see the minister here tonight. He looks like a reasonable person. This is a reasonable proposal. Why would he object to that? After all, he said: "Look, we have to go ahead with the restructuring part because we can save some businesses. If we save some businesses, we have saved some jobs."

If that is the case, then it will cost a lot less than $61 million. We are not even talking about $61 million because if a company can be restructured and jobs saved, then it will not even cost $60 million. It will cost less than $60 million.

Now in all fairness, who of all creditors, who of all the major stakeholders would stand up and say: "The worker is not entitled to get his pay"? Who, I ask? Who is the government listening to? All reasonable people in this country would recognize that the workers ought to be treated in the same manner as the government to whom they pay their taxes is treated, in the same way as the financial institutions whom our major creditors do business with are treated.

This government can underwrite a loan to the Westray mine for $80 million and we cannot find less than $60 million. The Bank of Nova Scotia is going to foreclose and it will collect its $85 million from the guarantors. It will not be out. The government will find the money. It will find the $85 million.

Mr. Harvard: From the workers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, yes, from the workers, but it will not put any money into the workers' pockets. It is a shame.

In fact these two amendments are very logical. They are fair. They put back a sense of fairness into the bill. One of the things I have always seen in drafting a bill such as this which affects so many stakeholders is you look for balance. Any government that has its head screwed on properly looks for balance.

This government throws out the principle of balance. How can it just sit there and so blithely ignore the workers? We know it is unbalanced. We know that the present act has a limit of $500 which was put into the bill in 1949. We know that only 30 per cent of workers in bankruptcies who are owed wages ever collect. Seventy per cent never get one plug nickel, not one dime. How could any government sit there and bring in a bill when it said it recognized these two major principles, one was fairness to workers and the other was restructuring and totally ignore the balancing element that should be in the bill?

Once this government gets the bill it will forget the workers. I say to this government that the workers will not forget this government. Not only has it brought them a series of taxes, 34 times, it is also making them pay for their unemployment insurance program. The premiums keep going up and up and the government lets the unemployment rate go up and up and up.

I remember Bryce Mackasey. He was the minister responsible for the unemployment insurance fund. He brought in the new act in 1971. He always went on the principle that as long as the government had a financial responsibility to the unemployment insurance program, then the onus was on it to make sure that the unemployment rate stayed down, because every time the rate went up the government also paid.

The government since 1984 has removed itself from any responsibility whatsoever for unemployment in this country. In this bill it has removed itself from any responsibility for making sure that workers, when a company goes down the tube, get some justice.

We did not even touch the thorny question of the walk-aways. We could not even look at the problem of a company that just closes the door and walks away. We just looked at this narrow principle of paying those workers in a bankrupt situation.

We did not even ask for a full coverage of benefits. It was just wages and vacation pay. Over there, government members have cold hearts. They are cruel and cold in their approach to workers in the Bankruptcy Act. They had a responsibility and they ducked their responsibility. The people will not forget them whenever that next election is called.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, there have been some consultations, and I think you will find there is unanimous consent in the Chamber for the following motion.

I move:

That when no further members rise tonight for debate at report stage of Bill C-22, then the recorded divisions on Motions Nos. 29, 31, 32, 34, 39 and 42 and on the motion for concurrence at report stage be deferred until tomorrow, June 9, at five o'clock p.m., and all other remaining motions be deemed to have been negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I will be very quick. I want to say to my hon. colleague for Nickel Belt that once again, he shows good sense in putting forward these two amendments. What he said is exactly correct.

I want to underline for those watching that Bill C-22 was originally called an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

It was the original intent of this bill to ensure that workers had their wages protected. It was a major cornerstone, a major centrepiece of this bill.

• (1840)

This government, by negativing all of the clauses that deal with that effectively is saying that it really did not mean what it said when the bill was originally put in place. That was that the workers in Canada must be protected in cases of bankruptcy and that their wages be paid.

The member has also made a great deal of sense when he talks about how governments look after themselves. Governments certainly feather their own nests, both provincially and federally. With dollars owed to them they establish what is known as deemed trusts. When they establish these deemed trusts, they make sure they are the first ones to move in and take the money out when there is a bankruptcy.

These two amendments put forward by my colleague from Nickel Belt would ensure that those workers' wages not get treated any differently from how government treats money that is owed to it, but that it simply gets treated the same. The moneys owed to workers in a bankruptcy situation are deemed to be in a trust situation. They are no different from moneys owed to the Crown; no more, no less.

In these amendments the hon. member has certainly underlined how the government treats workers a lot different from how it treats debts owed to the Crown and, indeed, a great deal different from how it treats debts owed to its friends in big business.

I am pleased to get up and say we will be supporting the motions that have been put forward. They truly do reflect what I thought during pre-study was the absolute unanimous consensus of the consumer and corporate affairs committee when we dealt with the rights of workers.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support the amendments introduced by my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt. In so doing, I want to mention a quote from the father of the emancipation proclamation in the United States that I think applies to this bill. That was almost 130 years ago. The quote is: "Labour is independent of and prior to capital and, therefore, deserves much the higher consideration".

I do not think any piece of legislation cries out for the application of that principle more than does Bill C-22 now before us. Surely a principle that was so clearly stated by, perhaps, the greatest president in the history of the United States having to do with the priority of labour in relationship to capital has never been as clear as it is in the principle of the amendment my colleague from Nickel Belt has placed before the House today.

Since 1949, workers in Canada have been told to get to the back of the bus. There have been about six attempts over the last number of years to try to bring in legislation regarding bankruptcies and the priority that working people ought to have in the situation of bankruptcies into this last decade of the 20th century. How we can continue to see argued what the government appears to be arguing by its neglect of the status of employees in this day and age is beyond me.

I had thought that even Conservatives of any stripe, not to mention Conservatives who have the audacity to call themselves Progressive Conservatives cannot move beyond this stage and take us back 130 years to before Confederation in their values. It just blows by mind.

I am sure it must do much more to those thousands of workers across Canada, especially during this recession or depression, or whatever you want to call it, who have found themselves left at the back of the bus watching government collect its due and watching the financial institutions collect their due when their employers go bankrupt.

Many of my constituents, particularly in the Selma and Wilmer areas faced exactly that situation in smaller forest products companies during the last few months. How they can look with any degree of charity or understanding at the inaction of this government on this matter is a great tribute to their patience, if they have that patience.

I am not choked up because of the subject matter of the bill, although that would be enough to choke anybody. I am afraid I am coming down with a bit of a cold.

I would hope that members opposite will listen to the very cogent remarks that have been made by my colleague from Nickel Belt in committee over the past number of months. They should search their own hearts and their own consciences.

I do not know what their reason was for pulling back—simply because there was a disagreement as to the type of funding mechanism that was to be used in order to give Canadian employees the rights to which they are entitled? Did they think they were going to embarrass somebody by pulling back simply because we would not agree with their rationale at this time of deep economic recession of imposing another special tax, a head tax, in a sense, on employees across Canada?

Surely they could see the nonsense in the kind of financial proposal they had, but even if they did not the least they can do for the very small sum of up to $2,000 in super priority that my colleague's amendment suggests is to go so far as to record that very modicum, that very minimum protection to those employees whose families are already suffering enough.

If the government went without getting its money out of a bankruptcy or if a bank did not get its money out of a small business bankruptcy, no child would go hungry and no child would not be able to afford decent clothes to go to school. We would find other ways of adapting.

What the government will do if it denies these amendments is to continue to force, for the next 43 years, the same kind of situation that has affected thousands and thousands and thousands of working families, poorer families across Canada, that have seen their companies go under in hard economic times.

The action of the government is unjust. I ask it to take a second look and give a modicum of justice to Canadian employees and their families from coast to coast across this country. It is time that there was an emancipation proclamation for the working people of Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to join with the other members in the House who were supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, Motion No. 31.

We are talking about a relatively small amount of money here. It is my understanding that the Wage Earner's Protection Act was going to provide something like $62 million a year across the whole nation for those employees who lose their wages because of a bankruptcy.

What do we spend on unemployment insurance? Is it $14 billion or $15 billion a year? What do the banks lose with companies like the Reichmanns or Dome Petroleum or the Third World debt? They lose hundreds of millions, maybe $2 billion of $3 billion on Canary wharf and the Reichmanns alone.

Why should the banks or the Government of Canada have super priority over the little wage earner who is maybe owed $4,000 or $5,000 and he or she does not have a priority? I just want to support the motion for the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Clearly the wage earner's funds should be protected. They should have a super priority or should at least be on the same basis. Those funds are everything that individual is earning. If the banks lose a little bit, the total amount that was provided for before the government did its flip-flop on the Wage Earner's Protection Act was something like $62 million.

Surely this is a reasonable amendment that the government should accept.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since no more members wish to speak, pursuant to order adopted by the House earlier today, the recorded vote on Motions Nos. 31 and 32 is deferred.

• (1850)

We will now proceed to consideration of Motions Nos. 33 and 34. Since the mover of the motions is not in the House, we will proceed to consideration of Motions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38, which have been grouped for debate.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth) moved:

Motion No. 35.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 65 by striking out line 31 at page 79 and substituting the following therefor:

"inventory, accounts receivable and any amount paid in respect thereof, of or held by the purchaser as of".

Motion No. 36.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 65 by striking out line 34 at page 79 and substituting the following therefor:

"claim, right or charge against that inventory, accounts receivable and any amount paid in respect thereof,".

Motion No. 37.

That Bill C-22 be amended in Clause 65 by striking out line 41 at page 79 and substituting the following therefor:

"way disposes of inventory, accounts receivable and any amount paid in respect thereof, covered by".

Motion No. 38.

That Bill C-22 be amended in the English version in Clause 65 by striking out line 45 at page 79 and substituting the following therefor:

"realized on the disposition of that inventory, those accounts receivable or any amount paid in respect thereof,".

He said: Mr. Speaker, the intent of the motions we have before us grouped together is to offer a greater degree of protection to farmers and fishermen for the value of goods they have sold to a company that subsequently finds itself in a state of bankruptcy.

Under Bill C-22, as we studied it in committee, there was no provision to recognize the special circumstances that farmers and fishermen find themselves in. The bill sought to give some redress to those companies or individuals who have sold goods to a company just prior to that company declaring a bankruptcy.

What had happened over and over again, and we heard this from the Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Association and from all kinds of groups both during our pre-study and study after second reading, was that companies many times when they find they are just about to go belly up go and extend the credit they have from their suppliers. They would stock up on inventory, hoping they will be able to discharge that inventory through fire sale prices or whatever they do.

They hope they will be able to liquidate, get a lot of money in and pay the bank, because it is usually the bank that is just ready to force them into bankruptcy. They can keep the bank happy and hopefully by giving it enough dollars they will be able to forestall the bankruptcy. Normally that is what happens in a lot of cases.

When individuals or companies find themselves that close to the edge sometimes they do things they would not normally do. Normally what happens here is if the company is petitioned into bankruptcy by a creditor, usually a secured creditor, again a bank or financial institution, the bank would swoop in and basically seize the assets for which it had a charge on, and there is usually a floating charge on inventory the banks have.

What the banks would do is to say you need working capital so what we will do here is give you $30,000 worth of working capital. We will take a floating charge on what we believe is the average value of your inventory during a particular period of time.

What Bill C-22 sought to do was to put some rights in there to those suppliers of goods so that they could not find themselves basically at the bottom of the line when maybe only two days before they sold maybe $50,000 or $100,000 worth of goods on tick, on credit, to a company that subsequently went bankrupt.

They could look through the window when the sheriff put the lock on the door and say they own all of those coats or they own those washers or they own those chairs in there, but they could not get those chairs back out once the proceedings on bankruptcy started.

Mostly what would happen was that when the trustee would be appointed he would go in and liquidate the assets. The bank would get the value of the goods of that company or individual. It may be even the same day. They could not get them out of there. It was inherently unfair that the banks would be allowed to do that. There was nothing that could be done.

In many cases when this would happen it would force a subsequent bankruptcy on to the company that provided the goods in the first place.

Bill C-22 came forward which said it would provide for revindication which means take-back rights. It said that if a company had sold goods to a company within the 30 days of the assignment into bankruptcy, it could go and take the goods or a portion of those goods back if that is all that was left, provided that the goods were identifiable, that there was no value added to them and that they were not altered.

It was not a perfect amendment but it did offer some protection to those companies and individuals who provided goods and found that their interest even in the few hours later was taken over by the banks' interest. It is something that everybody on the committee supported.

There was a particular difficulty with the bill. Farmers and fishermen are in an unique situation. I was told by some of my colleagues, like my colleague from Algoma, if somebody is a beef farmer and has some cattle and sells the cattle to a slaughter house that subsequently goes bankrupt the next day, it is pretty darn hard once livestock is slaughtered to identify the cattle. It is difficult when it is still on the hoof even if it is not slaughtered. Once it is altered in any way, shape or form, it did not meet the qualifications to be revindicated or to be able to be taken back.

Again, it is the same for fishermen. In the case of fishermen, if I am down in Eastern Passage or if I am down in Ship Harbour, Spry Bay or any of those places, and I sell my catch to a fish plant, as soon as I sell it, unless you do something with it, it is going to go awful bad. There will be an awful stink around there. The first thing they do is put it on ice. If that company went bankrupt that day, even if I could identify my fish—I do not think you could because I have seen a lot of fish and it is pretty hard to distinguish one codfish from another unless you are pretty good at identifying codfish—there has been value added.

Under the proposed regulations for revindication in Bill C-22, you would not be able to go in and get your fish back at all.

I spoke to the minister about this and I said this is inherently unfair. There is a special case to be made for farmers and fishermen. Why do we not give them some type of super priority, recognizing, for instance in the case of the cattle rancher, that they may sell 50 per cent or maybe all of their year's product, all of the herd, to one slaughter house at one time? They could lose their entire inventory on the farm by one sale and never get anything back. Fishermen, who do not make a lot of money anyway, could sell some of their day's catch, their lobster, and if the company went bankrupt that they sold it to, they would never be able to get it back out.

We looked at it and I talked to the minister and talked to his officials and said: "Why do we not be innovative here? Let us see what we can do as far as super priority, at least for the value of some of the goods". When the bill came back to us we went through committee. The government had proposed an amendment that would allow for a degree of super priority for farmers and fishermen that if their goods were sold within 15 days it would allow them to have super priority on the value of any inventory that remained with the bankrupt company.

I thought that was a good move. However, I do not think that it went far enough. The intention of these amendments that we have before us is to provide a little more. The intention of the amendments before us is also to provide a first charge on accounts receivable as well. Basically it says that is fine. You have gone 50 per cent of the way, government, in providing for the first time—I am certainly not criticizing the government for this—some special protection for farmers and fishermen so that they can revindicate and so that they are not forced to the bottom of the heap when we all know that by the time they get to them there is no money left. To make this a little more palatable, I put these motions forward that basically say that they should have first charge on the value of any inventory or accounts receivable as well.

• (1900)

I would urge those in the House, and the minister in particular, to look at this particular amendment. We have gone about 50 per cent of the way. I think everybody on the committee is proud, including members on my side of the House and the government side of the House, that we were able to come to an accommodation for those farmers and fishermen. We recognize the special circumstances they are in. This motion just goes a little farther to ensure that they get a greater degree of protection than what is currently offered in the bill.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, just briefly I want to rise in support of the motion by my hon. colleague and friend from Dartmouth.

Not only do I support it in solidarity and in principle, but I would argue for super priority for workers' wages. We did not get it. I would support also the super priority for those fishermen and farmers as they are the least able to defend themselves when the banks sit down with all the other creditors, with their fancy Dan, fast-talking lawyers. Lost in the shuffle are the interests of the smaller stakeholders, the smaller players.

In solidarity I would say not only do we want it for the workers who have lost wages, but we want it for suppliers. They are the workers too. They have worked to bring in that catch or to raise that product. Then they hand it in and watch through the grate as their produce is taken and sold off. Who is the big winner in all of this, Mr. Speaker? The big-shot creditors.

I have no hesitation in supporting my colleague in this amendment. It is a common sense proposal. I would hope that the government would listen to the entreaties of members on this side of the House and acquiesce to this request to put this kind of justice back into the system.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my words of support to the hon. member for Dartmouth and the motions which he has put forward. There has been unanimous support among the agriculture producers that the government's action, although commendable for what it has done by recognizing that there needs to be a super priority, is simply inadequate. There are many producers in this country, especially beef producers, who may perhaps have a pay day once a year. Their entire production, if it is a cow calf operation, may be sold in one operation. If the stockyard or the company purchasing them goes broke, they lose their entire year's production. I think that we have to look at this amendment.

I look at the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and recognize that he is the Minister of State for Agriculture as well, representing those producers in Quebec. I think back to the time when the free trade deal was going through. Producers right across this country, especially those in the supply management sector, said to him: "No, this is wrong. You are doing the wrong thing in this free trade deal. You are removing tariffs on processed food. You are going to destroy our supply management system". They even presented to him the American benefits from this deal which they knew would eventually come—God help us, I hope they never do—as a beautiful white horse. The benefits to the Canadian producers was a rabbit.

I do not want to see the Minister of State for Agriculture doing something to farmers again which is going to produce that kind of image, with the big banks and the big creditors getting everything, and the farmers ending up with nothing. The various farm groups, the Ontario Pork Producers, the Ontario Wheat Producers, the Federation of Agriculture, have all called for the amendment which the hon. member for Dartmouth has put forward.

In a letter from the Ontario Pork Producers, they specifically say that the proposed changes only allow—these are the ones that the government has so far put forward—livestock producers to be repaid from inventory on hand, which is totally inadequate, as with cattle and hogs that are slaughtered and become meat which will remain in inventory for only a very short time. Hence for this section to provide much needed help to the hog industry, it should be changed to allow claims to be secured from inventory plus accounts receivable and cash resulting from livestock originally purchased.

The member for Dartmouth as our critic for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has drafted the exact amendment which farm groups right across the country are asking for.

I would hope that the minister would have a change of heart, that he would consult with his caucus colleagues and his cabinet colleagues tomorrow before this vote comes forward. Maybe he will change his mind and think about his responsibility as the Minister of State for Agriculture, and stop pandering to the big banks, to the big interests in this country. They lose hundreds of millions of dollars with big companies but are putting the screws right down on small producers of livestock, cattle, and fishermen in the areas of our country where fishing is the prime industry.

I would hope that the minister will look at it very closely. He will be covered tonight because we have already put down a motion, but if he changes his mind overnight, I know it would be very much appreciated by the livestock producers and other farm groups who have said that the amendments which are brought forward so far are totally inadequate and that the amendments put forward by the member for Dartmouth are exactly what is needed.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, for the last couple of hours I was sorely tempted to comment, especially while listening to the last speaker.

[English]

The hon. member for Algoma picked on me a little bit on the amendment as I am looking after my two portfolios in this particular sector.

Sure I listened, Mr. Speaker. If you look at the report of the standing committee and you look at what we brought to the House, we brought more. Even those members on the committee brought this to the attention of the government. I thought it was possible for us to do more after looking at the whole thing.

I think if we go for what the hon. member has mentioned, we will give more now to farmers and fishermen than we are giving to the unpaid suppliers. What we have tried to do is bring a balance between their rights.

What we are really doing is—

[Translation]

As we gave certain rights to unpaid suppliers, we realized that fishermen and farm producers, for instance, would be unable to recover the goods they had delivered, because farm produce and fish catches are often processed in a matter of minutes upon arrival at the plant. What we wanted to do is at least give them a chance to recoup their losses from inventory, like the unpaid supplier who tries to recover from inventory what he delivered within a certain period. That is what we wanted to do with this legislation.

I think this is fair and reasonable, as reflected in the proposed amendment. That is as far as we can go. Otherwise, we would have to start consultations all over again and give more to one sector or the other. In this respect, I agree with some of my colleagues who spoke today. I listened carefully to practically everything that was said since this afternoon, and I think we have a bill that contains most of the recommendations that were made and that we could accept. That is the purpose of this amendment. However, the government can go no further than I indicated earlier.

• (1910)

In fact, I think I am doing more than what my colleagues suggested in committee. That is the truth, and I think they would be prepared to admit as much. I had meetings with farmers' associations and associations of western growers. I met these people several weeks ago, and my own people at the department also met them on several occasions. I think they will be reasonably satisfied with what we have here.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to make a few comments here tonight, I do so being fully cognizant of the hardships that are inflicted upon farmers across this nation on a good many occasions and hardships that are inflicted upon the fishermen of this country.

When I look at the amendments put forward by my colleague from Dartmouth, I have to concur with this, especially giving some security to those primary suppliers in terms of the accounts receivable. I am very cognizant of the fact that with some of the buyers of these products, particularly with some of the very large chains and horticultural products, it is usually 90 days payment on those products. Consider the fact that the average turnover of the products on the shelves of those large chains is 27 times a year. With horticulture products it is probably twice a week. They have that money for a long, long period of time for their own use and investments and the producers are deprived of that money. If they have to wait 90 days, one of the weaknesses is the fact that they only have 30 days security on products delivered.

While I support the motion I want to point out that perhaps 30 days is not enough in a lot of cases. I would point that out to the minister. I also recognize the fact that the Ontario hog producers as well as the white bean producers and wheat producers have had first hand experience with what happens when a company goes bankrupt. As a producer, I know that as well. The inventory had been taken by the securitor, be it the bank or whoever had the loan secured, and applied it against their own debt owing. As a consequence, the farmers were left holding the bag.

I remember one case in particular where it was over several million dollars. That court case went on for a lot of years. It is with these thoughts in mind that I believe the primary producer, whether he is a farmer or a fisherman, should have priority rights in cases like this. When their product is delivered to the processor or the end user, regardless of what the case may be, they should have rights on both the inventory and the accounts receivable for their efforts on the products they produced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since Motion No. 34 was not put before the House, and in the spirit of the order adopted earlier today, the vote on Motion No. 35, which will eventually be applied to Motions Nos. 36, 37 and 38, is deferred.

We will now proceed to consideration of Motion No. 39.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 39.

(a) by striking out line 32 at page 81 and substituting the following therefor:

"86. In relation to a bankruptcy or"; and (b) by striking out lines 36 to 42 at page 81, lines 1 to 47 at page 82, lines 1 to 45 at page 82, line 1 to 45 at page 83, lines 1 to 47 at page 84 and lines 1 to 6 at page 85 and substituting the following therefor:

He said: Mr. Speaker, the original bill the government brought forward, Bill C-22, included two principles. One was wage protection and the other was the restructuring of businesses on the verge of bankruptcy or insolvency.

One of the things the government was prepared to give up was some of its Crown priority. It was going to drop down in terms of being a preferred creditor to an ordinary creditor. You have the Crown as a secured creditor and then you have it as preferred creditor. The government argued that being a preferred creditor often prevented the restructuring of a business to save it from bankruptcy and insolvency because the Crown had to be paid first.

All of that of course was hinged on the fact that we had a wage protection plan and this was the balance, the government was giving up its preferred creditor status. It was giving up a value of $25 million in federal taxpayers' money and $15 million in provincial government taxpayers' money. A total of $40 million was being given up.

The argument was that there was a quid pro quo here that on the one hand there would be this wage protection fund and that businesses would be contributing to it and the government, on the other hand, would give up this $40 million from both levels of government.

The government has abandoned the wage protection plan. The workers are no longer protected. Workers will no longer get their wages. On the other hand, the government is giving up its Crown priority as a preferred creditor status. It is giving that up, giving up $40 million, and what is it getting in return? The government is getting zippo, zilch, nada, niente, zero, nothing. It has given up $40 million just like that. Yet the workers cannot get $61 million.

Since the government has wiped out and thrown the workers out the back door, my motion seeks to put them into the back of the bus again. Then the taxpayers ought to collect their $40 million. Why should we give up the $40 million that is entitled to the Crown? What a mediaeval view of government, that the government can give up moneys owing to it. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? The government is giving up $40 million, not only for themselves but for the provinces as well.

I say that the government should not give up the $40 million. This motion seeks to restore the preferred creditor status to the government so that it can collect the $40 million. Maybe that is a good place to start in the future with respect to developing a wage protection fund.

Why does the government not recognize that even at this late stage there is a chance to restore the Crown priority to a preferred creditor status? Why is it dropping down? The argument is that it facilitates the restructuring of businesses, but in fact if you have to restructure a business, the Crown has a preferred status and it has to be paid before you can restructure anything.

The government has high hopes for the restructuring of businesses in the face of potential bankruptcy or insolvency. The fact of the matter is that in the United States chapter 11 has been in effect. We know from looking at the history and the results of that chapter 11 legislation in the United States that approximately 20 per cent of all potentially bankrupt or insolvent companies ever get saved. All it does is put off the day of reckoning. The fact of the matter is that only 20 per cent that claim protection under chapter 11 in the United States get saved.

I do not want to put cold water on the government's hopes for C–22 in terms of restructuring potential bankruptcies and insolvencies, but the story is that it does not save very many.

What has the government given up? It has given up $40 million. I want the taxpayers to know that. Who are the greatest beneficiaries from having given up that $40 million? It just means that there are more assets for the secured creditors to grab. All it is going to do is make the financial institutions that may be the secured creditor even flusher. These institutions will get even more benefits from this.

We now see a flow from the taxpayers' pockets to the big deep pockets of the financial institutions.

I say to the government: repent now. It is not too late. The moment of truth has come. I say to my Tory friends: repent now. Judgment is at hand. It is not too late to do the right thing by the taxpayers of this country. Replace the Crown priority. Put the Crown back in its preferred status and let us put that $40 million toward a wage protection fund.

• (1920)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted earlier today by the House, the vote on Motion No. 39, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, is deferred.

We will now proceed to consideration of Motion No. 40.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C–22 be amended in clause 81 by striking out line 44 at page 90 and substituting the following therefor:

"the extent of five thousand dollars in each"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this particular motion deals with the wage refund ceiling. At the present time workers, if they can get anything at all, get $500. This was the amount set in 1949.

The minister, having totally thrown workers out of any opportunities to get justice in this bill, having given up one of the major stakeholders, having abandoned one of the major principles of the bill, having destroyed the balance which should exist in a bill of this type, tries to make it up to the workers by saying: "We have to adjust the $500 of 1949. What we are going to do is change it in the bill so that it will be up to $2,000".

It only covers wages and vacation pay, nothing else. I want to suggest to the House that if members go back to 1949 and take that $500 and adjust it for inflation over these 43 years, the amount should not be $2,000, it should be $5,000.

That is what this motion is attempting to do. It is to even up the status that the workers will now hold with the minister who has totally ignored the rights of workers in this bankruptcy bill. It at least tries to put in place a fair amount of money if they are going to collect anything that they ought to collect, up to $5,000.

It is not the solution that I would want, but the government has abandoned super priority. It rejected it, even though the committee that did the pre-study on this bill recommended to the government a super priority for worker's wages. It chose to reject that suggestion, that proposal and that recommendation of the committee. Instead, it just wiped them out completely.

This motion is seeking to adjust the 1949 dollars to 1992 dollars. It should be $5,000. I want to tell the House that I recognize it is just nothing but Canadian Tire money. Try to collect anything as I said before. Only 30 per cent of workers who did not receive their wages as a result of an insolvency or a bankruptcy have collected. I call it Canadian Tire money because their chances of getting it are practically zilcho.

Three out of 10 would be able to collect. Roughly about 29.9 per cent would be able to collect, so I would say that $5,000 at least recognizes the justice of raising the amount from $2,000 to $5,000. That is why I put this motion forward.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to support Motion No. 40 by my friend and colleague from Nickel Belt.

This has been a gruelling process. We started off almost one year ago with the introduction of the bill. The minister had a press conference on June 11. I was not here for the press conference because my wife was delivering her third child that day.

On that day, we had a new child and the House got Bill C-22. My child and the bill will be one year old by the time the bill is passed. It has been a gruelling process. I hope it has been a productive one.

However, one of the things that we did—

Mr. Brightwell: They've both done a lot of changing.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): One of the things we initially looked at under the original bill was whether or not the old act of 1949 clearly set out the principle that workers wages had some type of ranking in priority, in the disposition of assets from a bankruptcy. Unfortunately what it said was that they were an ordinary creditor. They are not exactly at the bottom but they are close enough to the bottom that by the time they come up and get their chance to try to get a few of the dollars they are owed, in nearly every case there is no money left because the secured creditors and the preferred creditors have gone in and have taken all of the worth out of the assets. That is pretty much what has happened.

We did an interesting thing at the time. We were still dealing at that point in time with the concept of a wage earner protection fund that would give up to $2,000 to workers to which wages had been unpaid with a valid claim.

At that point we argued that even with the wage earner protection fund, the $2,000 was not enough. What we did was a simple calculation. We called up Statistics Canada and asked them what would be the inflation factor between 1949 and 1991. They gave us a mathematical formula to figure it out. What it came out to was that $500 in 1949 would have been worth about $3,300 in 1991. Probably now it would be worth closer to $3,400 or $3,500.

We said to the government when it was still proposing a wage earner protection fund that if $500 was agreed way back in 1949 as a ceiling for wage claims, then certainly in 1991, $2,000 was not enough. Subsequent to that, we have seen and we have debated it here today, we have debated in committee and in public, that the government has reneged on his promise to protect workers wages, to give them the proper priority in the disposition of assets of a bankrupt. The government has reneged on that promise. It has walked away from it.

It has come forward and said that it recognizes that now that it has reneged on it, because it did not listen to the opposition in their wisdom on how this thing could be funded, it abandoned the concept of protecting workers wages in the assets of a bankrupt. It came forward and said: "What we will do with the existing act, they are still ordinary creditors, but instead of being able to access up to $500 we will allow them up to access up to $2,000". That is a bit of smoke and mirrors because if you look at the statistics, there are very few claims by workers that ever get fulfilled because there is very little money left and in most cases there is none.

In actual fact, the average wage claim is about $325 because that is all that is left after the banks pick the bankruptcy assets clean and the other preferred creditors get in there.

My hon. colleague has put a motion which I fully support. It says that if the government is not prepared to change the act, to do the right thing, to give super priority to workers for the wages they are owed, to say yes in the guts and the body of the Bankruptcy Act, that we recognize that a worker's input into the product or service is the labour that he gives to the company that employs him and therefore he should be right at the top and get paid for his labour. The government said no to that, but my hon. colleague has said that is fine. Even though they are still going to be ordinary creditors, most of them will get nothing because it will be picked clean. We should be realistic. As I said, five hundred in 1949 dollars is worth about $3,400 today and is still not enough.

• (1930)

My hon. colleague would say: "Let's put it at $5,000". On the outside chance that a couple of those companies will not be picked clean by the big banks and financial institutions, maybe there would be a little bit of light at the end of the tunnel for those workers who are losing the value of their labour.

The problem we have with all this really irks me. Those usually least able to afford the loss are the workers. People working at a fast food place or at a convenience store at $4.50 an hour might be owed $400 in wages.

Some $400 less is not going to make one iota of difference to the big bank. It will not make any difference at all. The banks will still make record profits next year just like they did last year in the middle of the recession. However $400 to single parents who work in an awful job for $4.50 an hour means the difference between whether or not they can put food on the table for their children or whether or not they go to the food bank or to the church to get food to feed their children in week three of the month instead of week four of the month.

If it could not find the money, surely to goodness the government could have found some other way to address that real concern. Instead of looking after the interests of the big banks and instead of telling us all the time that they are concerned about the urban poor, the rural poor, the single parents and all such stuff, it had an opportunity to put its money where its mouth is and to look after the ones at the bottom of the scale, the ones at the bottom of the ladder, and it did not do it.

The amendment of my hon. colleague will be a little bit of light but for all too few of them, but I am very proud to stand and say that the Liberal Party supports this motion. We would have liked to have seen super priority. We would have liked to have seen those individuals looked after properly. However, in the absence of that, this is a step in the right direction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the order agreed to earlier by the House, the vote on Motion No. 40 is negatived on division.

Motion No. 40 negatived.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 41

That Bill C-22 be amended in clause 81 by striking out lines 30 to 32 at page 91 and substituting the following therefor:

"(j) claims of the Crown not mentioned in".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is really consequent on Motion No. 39 which dealt with the Crown priority. Simply it was adjusting the wording in clause 81 so that it would be subsequent and consequent to what was done in clause 66.

I know colleagues on the other side would like to hear my speech again on the importance of the Crown's priority.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: I hear a voice crying in the wilderness, or is it a telephone call I am getting from Halifax telling me to vote? I hear a message coming over the telephones. Who is in the lead now?

I know that colleagues would love to hear my remarks on Crown priorities. I say to the government once again that the Crown priority should not be given up for all the reasons that I stated previously. This is a consequent amendment to the previous amendment to clause 66.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted by the House earlier today, Motion No. 41 is negatived, on division.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 42

That Bill C-22 be amended in clause 81 by adding immediately after line 35 at page 91 the following:

"(1.1) Where, in the opinion of the trustee, payment of the whole or part of a claim under paragraph (1)(d) cannot be made within fifteen days of receipt of the claim, the trustee may borrow such sum as is necessary for payment of the claim or part of the claim provided that the proceeds to be likely realized from the property of the bankrupt will be, in the opinion of the trustee, sufficient to repay the loan with interests.

(1.2) In respect of a loan made under subsection (1.1), the lender has, for purposes of repayment of the loan with interests, all the rights and entitlement of the claimant under paragraph (1)(d)".

He said: Mr. Speaker, on this one I have to appeal to common sense on the other side. I now recognize that I have wound down my clock on trying to persuade the government that something has to be done with respect to workers in an insolvent situation or in a bankrupt situation where their wages have not been paid.

We know that under the current practice only 30 per cent of those workers ever collect anything. I want to make it crystal clear that I do not consider the workers' wages being paid either through a super priority or a wage fund as some sort of social program. It is not a social program.

I remember the member for Mississauga South kept repeating in committee that somehow or other by paying workers what they had worked for, earned and were entitled to but were never paid was somehow or other a social program.

If that is a social program then I would suggest it is social welfare to pay the banks what is owed them when a company goes bankrupt.

An hon. member: There is no difference here.

Mr. Rodriguez: As my colleague says, there is no difference, absolutely no difference. It is money that is owed to workers.

Having fought this battle all along in committee and having arrived at this point workers under the present regime, even the 30 per cent who are collecting, ought to be able to collect it with dispatch, with expediency.

This particular amendment would allow for that expediency so that there are no delays for the 30 per cent to go and collect from Mr. Bumble the shekels that are owed to them.

I can just see it. They would have to go to the trustee and apply and the trustee would establish whether they were entitled to get something. They are in the 30 per cent. Lo and behold after long periods of time, months, they would then get whatever they are entitled to.

This amendment proposes to allow for some flexibility in the system. It would allow the trustee to borrow the money that is owed to the workers because he may not have liquidated the assets and within 15 days to pay the workers.

That is not a difficult concept. That could very well bridge the period between when the company was closed and their eligibility for unemployment insurance.

What are workers supposed to do while they are waiting for the trustee to dispense these few shekels Mr. Bumble is offering them? They are supposed to go on welfare, I presume. I presume that the state now has to support them with welfare when they have wages they are entitled to and did not get. Unemployment insurance does not activate the claim under the present rules.

On this side of the House we were so forthcoming with positive proposals. It is not as if we just hung on to the super priority and that was the only solution. In fact one of the solutions we put forward to this problem of workers' wages was an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act that would allow workers to activate their claims.

This government wanted solutions. Our committee and individual members—I know my colleague from Dartmouth and I did so—approached the minister with solutions. It is not as if we were just opposing for opposition sake. We were positively critical. We met with the minister. On every one of the proposals we put forward it was nyet, nyet. I almost thought he was playing on a Soviet hockey team. He had learned his lessons well. Nothing, nothing, nothing was acceptable.

We had the best talents this House could assemble on the committee. We had proposed several possible solutions. Every single one was turned down. We started to ask ourselves the question: Was this minister really interested in a solution, or was he simply just marching to the drums of the people in the ivory towers on Bay Street? Was he listening to Main Street or was he listening to Bay Street?

• (1940)

I kind of like the minister. He is a likeable fellow. He has a lot of good qualities that need to be developed, but came to the sad conclusion—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Ayn Rand of the Tory caucus sat in our committee when we first studied this bill. She went from one success to another. She left us to go on to the Constitution committee, now known as the Dobbie—Beaudoin committee. I heard she was equally successful on that committee as she had been in the initial stages of our committee. After she left we did it all.

An hon. member: Ayn Rand?

Mr. Rodriguez: Ayn Rand of the Tory caucus. It is sad to say that I have to come to the conclusion that the minister was not really interested in a solution for workers. It is a sad commentary that in fact he has taken one aspect of his portfolio much more seriously than the other. He is known as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but I have to say that he has taken the corporate part of his portfolio much more seriously than he has taken the consumer side of his portfolio.

There should be no joy in the minister's heart. He has totally left out one of the major stakeholders. If we do not do it now, another 43 years will go by and we will never ever correct this injustice for workers who have lost their wages as a result of a bankruptcy.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Nickel Belt has said that he is sad. I am sad too, listening to what he says.

I think my hon. friend is fair. We have worked together a long time to try to bring this bill before the House. We tried to respond to and to address concerns of Canadians on this legislation.

I do not want to be too specific on this particular element. I spoke to my hon. friend privately and I will repeat it. On the 15-day proposal, we all know that trustees have the right to borrow money and they do so often. There is a technical problem, and my hon. friend understands it. It is not that easy to force trustees to do anything when they enter a bankruptcy or a business that is going bankrupt.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to repeat what I just said, it is somewhat unrealistic to allow a period of two weeks and oblige people to stick to that timeframe. It is practically impossible to meet this kind of deadline. Let me explain.

The right to borrow money is there. It was in the act and still is, and I am sure that right will be respected. We have made a number of improvements that will speed up the process, as the hon. member is aware, and the timeframe will probably be tightened.

In most cases, bankruptcies are settled in a matter of days. Some are settled in a matter of months or years, but these are not the majority.

I expect that most cases will take less time to settle, thanks to new procedures and changes in the legislation. I will not repeat all the amendments that were proposed, but I just want to mention that particular one, like the previous one, on which I did not comment specifically. The hon. member wants the ceiling set at $5,000, while the average claim is now around $1,000. That would be useless, considering the average is $1,000. With a ceiling of $2,000 we would be able to cover most claims.

Basically this is a very good bill. It was improved with the help of the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, who worked very hard. I realize they made some nasty remarks about me today, but that is all part of the game. I appreciated their comments throughout this process, a long and sometime arduous one, but as I have said before, I can take criticism, depending on the situation.

When we made some major changes in the bill, I said I accepted their criticism. Hon. members are aware there is a provision in this bill which stipulates that the legislation is to be reviewed within three years, a relatively short period of time for a bill. However, the government is committed, and we will review the bill, and I hope that once the bill comes into force, we will be able to work together to finally find a way to deal with the remaining issue of workers unpaid wages.

Together we will consider how this should be done, and I am sure we will succeed.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the words of the minister. I thought he certainly had a much thicker skin than what he just gave us a glimpse of. He said that his colleagues are being very unkind to him.

I want to tell the hon. minister that if his colleagues on this side of the House are being unkind to him, he would have drowned in this bill a number of months ago. When his bill floundered because of some of the nonsense that was being played back in November by sneaking in amendments at the last minute and holding little press conferences, my hon. colleague from Nickel Belt and I could have left him to flounder on the rocks.

We got into a committee and when we got into that committee there was an amendment put forward and we argued, my colleague from Nickel Belt and my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I, that the motion was out of order and the motion was deemed out of order by the chair after he consulted with the clerk. At that point in time they were prepared to move a motion to effectively overrule the chair.

The hon. parliamentary secretary over there knows it was the opposition members who said before if you do anything on this, you had better recess the committee and consult with your people because you may kill the bill. If it were not for the comments made by the members of the opposition, this bill could have come back here and been ruled out of order.

When the minister talks about whether we have been kind or unkind to him today, when he could not find any money through the Minister of Finance to fund the wage earner protection fund, which we are talking about here, so that workers' wages could be paid, it was my colleague and I who went forward and met with him on a number of occasions and tried to help him out of his bind with his colleagues. His colleagues would not listen to him when he tried to get some money.

We sat down and said: "You told us early in the bill that you wanted a wage claim payment act because you felt that the interest of workers were not being looked after in the old bill. You said that you need a mechanism so there was certainty of payment and immediacy of payment". Those were the two criteria: certainty and immediacy of payment. My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I went forward and gave them a number of solutions.

They did not want to listen to super priority so we were innovative. We were very kind to the minister. We did not abandon the minister. We were not partisan. We sat down and tried to get him out of the shemozzle that he got himself in.

One of the things we said was take it out of general revenues so there was certainty and immediacy of payment and a balancing of the bill vis-à-vis the workers rights. We said: "Take it out of it for 18 months, Mr. Minister. Go to your Minister of Finance and say you will pay for it out of general revenues for 18 months and during that period of time put a body or a board in place to come up with a permanent funding mechanism". Maybe at that point in time it would be a tax and maybe the Tory's economic policies would have changed, or the government would have changed I hope, and we would be back into good times. We would not be in a recession any more.

• (1950)

The minister said that would not do. In order to make sure there was immediacy and certainty of payment which this amendment of my colleague seeks to do right now, we said to the minister what he should do.

Last year, 1991, a record year for bankruptcies because of this government's policies, there was $4.3 billion worth of assets from those bankrupt companies and bankrupt individuals.

I went to the Superintendent of Bankruptcies and I asked: "Is there not a fee charged on the assets as they get paid out?" They call them dividends. As the dividends get paid out to the creditors you charge a fee on them. The Superintendent of Bankruptcies said: "Yes, we do". I asked: "How much money do you get in?" The superintendent said $6 million.

I am not very good at math but it would appear there is a problem here because there was a 1 per cent or 2 per cent floating charge depending on how much; if it was $1 million, or under, or over. It did not make any sense to me so I asked if that got charged on all assets? He said: "No, Mr. MacDonald, it does not. The assets or dividends paid to secured creditors", which means the banks, "we do not charge them a fee". The only fee that gets charged is a fee charged on dividends paid to ordinary and preferred creditors. That is the only one.

We said to the minister that in order to get certainty and immediacy of payment, we will support a tax on the dividends that are paid out to financial institutions like the big banks.

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): If you would put a 1 per cent charge on it, you would raise more money than this program would cost the government in five years. We told him that and he said: "That is innovative but I do not think we can do it". He did not have the political will to do it.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): If you want certainty and immediacy of payment for those poor workers at $4.50 an hour, as my colleague said, that are going to be forced out on welfare when they do not get their last two weeks' wages, we said go to the UI fund and all you have to do in the UI fund is look. We thought the act was broad enough that the minister could have given authority to individuals with UI. It could have back dated the claim to the last pay period they actually got paid for. It is not going to take any money.

"No," he said "we cannot do that because it is on the UI system". We both said: "Well if you want us to pass this bill you are telling us it is going to save all of these jobs of these workers and, if that is the case, the UI system has saved a lot of money".

What is so wrong with trying to get some immediacy and certainty of payment for those people, the poorest of the poor, the dispossessed, those workers on the plant floor getting $4.50 per hour who cannot even pay their rent, who live below the poverty line? The minister never listened to any of it. I do not know if he did not have the political clout or what.

I want to tell the minister we did try to help him out. We are not being unkind to him. He listened. His colleagues did not listen to him. That was the problem. I want to support Motion No. 40 and the last motion we are dealing with, Motion No. 42.

The minister could not get his colleagues to agree on all of those good proposals we put forward in the spirit of non-partisanship in private meetings over and over again to get this thing done. All this motion does is basically say for those very few cases under the existing law, those 30 per cent of cases that might get something out of the assets of a bankruptcy, do not let them wait six months. By that point in time they are going to be pretty hungry.

All he said is that the effect of this motion would be to allow the trustee in bankruptcy, when he or she believed there was sufficient assets for fuller partial payment of wages—when they get down to ordinary creditor status—where there was full or partial payment available, to borrow the money and to pay those poor workers. That is all it does. There would be promptness of payment; maybe not the certainty we sought, but promptness.

I would like to support this. The minister may think he is having a bad day. I think he is actually having quite a good day. We have been extremely helpful on this side of the House in allowing this debate to go on a little longer.

We do want to see these positive changes to the bill, but we have to in this final hour once more show the government that there were other ways to proceed with the wage earner protection fund. We hope that over the next 24 hours, it reviews the positions that we put forward.

Routine Proceedings

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDRESS OF BORIS YELTSIN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

• (1010)

That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 24(1) and 30, on Friday, June 19, 1992, the House shall meet at 2 p.m. and proceed to Statements by Members, Oral Questions, Routine Proceedings, followed by its usual business pursuant to the Standing Orders;

That the address of His Excellency Boris Yeltsin, President of Russia, to be delivered in the House Chamber on Friday, June 19, at 11 a.m. before the members of the Senate and the House of Commons, together with all introductory and related speeches, be printed as an appendix to House of Commons Debates of that day and form part of the records of this House;

And that the address of the President of Russia, together with all introductory and related speeches be made available to the media for transmission in the usual way by the House of Commons broadcasting service.

Mr. Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO EXTEND HOURS OF SITTING

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 27(1), I move:

That the hours of sitting and business of the House commencing on June 10 to June 23, 1992 shall be as follows:

(1) Wednesday, June 10 and 17, 1992, 2 p.m. to 10 p.m. Private Members' Business from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m.

(2) Thursday, June 11 and 18, 1992, 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. Private Members' Business from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m. Standing Order 38 proceedings from 10 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

(3) Friday, June 12, 1992, 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. Private Members' Business from 3 p.m. to 4 p.m.

(4) Monday, June 15 and 22, 1992, 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. Private Members' Business from 11 a.m. to 12 p.m. Standing Order 38 proceedings from 10 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

(5) Tuesday, June 23, 1992, 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. Private Members' Business from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m. Standing Order 38 proceedings from 10 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

(6) Friday, June 19, 1992, 2 p.m. to 10 p.m., Private Members' Business will be cancelled.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, for the record, could the minister tell us what legislation the government aims to bring forward and what it will be calling during these extended hours of debate in the House of Commons?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the legislation is on the Order Paper. We have been having discussions with the offices of the House leaders of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party concerning the scheduling of business.

The desire is, as is customary this time of the year, to look at that legislation which it is expeditious to have passed and put in place. Some is time sensitive in that there are implications in terms of taxing policy, benefits coming at an appropriate time and so on.

It is certainly my intention to discuss this with the opposition parties and other members in the House to facilitate the treatment of this legislation and also to make it possible for the appropriate critics to schedule their time so they can be here to participate in the debate on the bills that are of interest to them.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, can I have it confirmed there will be no motions, other than those presently on the Order Paper, discussed.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give the hon. member an absolute assurance. There is the possibility of bills being introduced that may require some treatment before we adjourn, but that is not the intent of extended hours. The intent is primarily to deal with the current Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

REFERENDUM

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present to the House this morning concerning the holding of a referendum.

The Government of Canada put forth proposals for amending the Constitution earlier on. It established a citizens forum to ascertain the views of Canadians on numerous matters. Committees were set up to consult with the people of Canada concerning the proposals.

It should be noted that the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution of Canada belongs to the people. My constituents believe that consultations should extend to and include approving or disapproving constitutional amendments.

I would hope that the government would take this into consideration when it is bringing forth these proposals in the days ahead.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition concerning gasoline prices.

Gasoline prices are significantly higher in the Ottawa region than in other parts of the province. To that extent my constituents are calling on the government to take whatever action possible to correct this injustice to Ottawa motorists.

ABORTION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition that was circulated by Give Life Canada on the issue of abortion.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the lives of both mother and child.

This petition is signed by several hundred petitioners.

REFERENDUM

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 36 of my constituents calling for the presentation of a referendum on the Constitution and requiring a majority of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority of the provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by several hundred of my constituents criticizing the government for promising to freeze unemployment insurance premiums for three years and then reneging on that promise.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to request that the government immediately act to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for both employers and employees for no less than one year.

They also request that the government forgo any further cuts to unemployment insurance benefits.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present three petitions from British Columbia stating that the Canadian race relations foundation is a federal government initiative passed by the House of Commons as Bill C-63 almost two years ago and demonstrates its commitment to eradicating racism.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to consider the advisability of establishing the Canadian race relations foundation this fiscal year.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition which requests that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. It asks that the Parliament of Canada amend the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by a number of people from my riding asking that Parliament enact legislation that would protect the rights and the dignity of victims of sexual assault and counteract the prejudice and sexism surrounding the crime of sexual assault.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition to the House today under Standing Order 36.

It is a long-standing opposition by residents of northern British Columbia to the goods and services tax. This petition is signed by residents of northern B.C. in a number of communities, in particular Fort St. James, Prince George, McBride, Mackenzie and other communities.

• (1020)

They continue to call upon Parliament to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from constituents living on the coast of British Columbia.

They ask that the federal government not proceed any further with the de-staffing of west coast lighthouses, that it implement the terms and conditions of the FURL report, The Future Role of Lightstations report, that it restore the person-years that have been removed from this program, and that it restore the budget cuts that have been put in place in anticipation of the de-staffing.

TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition, again from residents of northern Vancouver Island who are extremely concerned about the cuts for rural and remote communities removing the isolated tax benefits.

They would ask that the government restore those tax benefits to people living in rural and remote areas as soon as possible.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-80

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allocated to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the allotted day of the second reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, June 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Southwest has one minute remaining in the debate.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will just conclude my speech with regard to Bill C-80 and the new child benefit package which puts $2.1 billion into the benefit package for families right across the country.

Not only is it going to be fair and more efficient, it is going to target funding at those who really need it. We will merge the family allowance program, the refundable child tax credit and the non-refundable dependent child tax credit into this new package.

I certainly look forward to the debate for the rest of the day. This is a move forward to streamline the government package and indeed put the moneys where they are most needed.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member a question. The new bill deals with some sort of increase when it comes to the working poor as well as when it comes to middle income families. However, there are certain aspects of the bill when it comes to families on welfare.

According to a study which was done by Ken Battle, president of Caledon Institute of Social Policy, it was indicated that the current legislation in terms of indexation would cost welfare families up to about 17 per cent of their—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is just a point of clarification. Are you in the period for questions and comments?

[English]

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, it is a question I would like to pose to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You have the floor.

Mr. Harb: Could we get some answers to the statement made by Mr. Ken Battle when he referred to the fact that the new legislation would kick in when it came to increases in allowances only if the inflation rate was over 3 per cent a year? In other words, families on welfare would not receive an increase at all unless the inflation rate was over 3 per cent.

If that were the case and if the inflation rate were below 3 per cent we would see a decrease in benefits when it came to welfare families rather than an increase.

I would like to hear the hon. member's comments on this particular statement. In fact it is a valid analysis.

• (1110)

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, there were a couple of good points that my colleague from Ottawa Centre put forward.

One thing I want to make perfectly clear with regard to families on welfare is that they will not have any of their benefits cut under this new program in Bill C–80.

As I mentioned in my closing remarks, it will be $2.1 billion of new funding that will go into this particular program. Actually, there will be 2.4 million families that are going to have their annual child benefits increased.

With regard to Mr. Ron Bell, I do believe he did come out initially with some negative comments, but it will be noticed that there has not been anything later with regard to comments. Once he has reviewed the program and taken a specific look at those families on welfare, he will be assured that there will be no cutback.

On CPI, the indexation for most government grants, contributions and the benefit packages are over the 3 per cent. This is not knew. Even the family allowance was cut back on the indexation back in the years of, I believe, 1974 to 1976. That is not to say that the government is not aware of the escalation of inflation, if there is one. It would be taking a yearly look at the benefits going to all Canadian families, not just specifically those on welfare.

In conclusion, I have to say that over the last couple of years, fighting inflation and getting it down to the lowest rate that it has been in 20 years—I believe last month it was 1.7 percent—is something that all people should be working toward. It means that a dollar today is worth a dollar tomorrow.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, in many of the town hall meetings and other public meetings I have had in my riding my constituents consistently over the last couple of years have been asking me: "Can the government please take an initial step to end universality of social programs?" People have said that it makes little sense to them that the government provides social programs or provides cheques to families only to turn around and tax it back.

It seems in a common sense mode for a lot of people in my riding that the government should change this. Yet the Government of Canada has been on record as saying that social programs or universality has been a sacred trust.

I am wondering if the member can address that. Does she see this move in this new program to a more common sense attitude toward social programs, in other words a targeting of precious government resources to those who need them and perhaps an end to this concept that we must be all things to all people?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for actually putting a very straightforward question: Can the government be all things to all people.

With regard to the precious revenues that we do have, there is only one taxpayer in Canada. Whether he or she is paying the municipal tax, the provincial tax or the federal tax, that taxpayer is the one who appears to get nailed.

What we are doing in this particular child benefit package is combining many family benefits into one monthly cheque that is non-taxable. It will be based solely on last year's tax return.

The hon. member is quite right that those in need, those who do need assistance from the government will receive it. It is actually over $76,000 a year on total income that it will be completely phased out. Those under $50,000 will lose nothing. Those over $50,000 will be slowly phased out, directly proportional to the income for that year.

I want to thank the hon. member for his assistance in working with the family caucus and the finance committee to see how we can become more streamlined in making sure that the funds we have go where they are needed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the member about this $500 added credit that a single parent would receive.

The purpose of this particular $500 credit described in the bill is to encourage mothers to move off welfare and back into the work force. They have actually been given another $500 credit. Is this what the legislation reads?

Mrs. Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Mills: Yes. Do you really think $500 is a sufficient enough incentive to encourage people to stay in the work force, especially those at the lower income end of the spectrum, when they receive all of those medical expenses and all other expenses are basically covered while on welfare?

In other words, I am hearing from many single mothers in my community who would like to get back into the work force that it does not pay them to go back to work and that $500 over a year works out to less than $10 a week. That is hardly enough incentive to really put them back into the work force.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, if I can interpret the question put forward, my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood feels the incentive should be larger.

There is no doubt about it that what we are trying to do here is to assist those people who are in the work force. Indeed, people on welfare are very needy people. Of course they will lose nothing under the child benefit package. Those people who have jobs will receive a tax incentive.

This should be combined with the program the Minister of Employment and Immigration put forward a few weeks ago. It is a pilot program dealing with single mothers in New Brunswick and British Columbia to top up their salaries. That is, for single parents on welfare who go out and find a job, we will top up their salaries so they can come closer to living within the community and be able to sustain not only their home and children, but also lift themselves out of the welfare system.

With these two programs in place, we will see a far greater incentive to get people off welfare. Obviously, it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on Bill C-80 and to start, I would like to make a simple comment.

When it comes to the impact of Bill C-80 on the poorest family, there would be no increase. A family on welfare under the old system used to receive approximately $120 per month per child. Under the new benefit program, that family will receive the same thing.

When we are talking about those who are hit the hardest, there will be no extra money coming in from the proposed government bill. When we talk about those poor families, for example, when we look at single mothers on social assistance, they also will receive absolutely no additional funds as a result of the proposed legislation.

I had the pleasure of attending an annual meeting in the Ottawa area of the Our Kids organization. This organization has a mandate to build a better future for the children of the Ottawa-Carleton region.

It has a few purposes. One is to raise the priority for children in the eyes of the community. Another is to fund projects which meet children's basic needs of food, shelter, clothing, and education. As well, it encourages like-minded groups to work together on behalf of the children of the Ottawa-Carleton region.

• (1120)

I would like to commend this organization. It is two years old. It just elected a new board of directors. For the record, I would like to commend Janis Machin, who was elected as the president, Denise Mattok who was elected as the vice president, Diane Blenkiron as the secretary, Uttra Bhargava who was a member of the board and decided not to run again this year, Louise Allard, Stephan Klovan and Bernard Muzeen.

Last year these very capable people in consultation with the corporation and about 35 national and regional children's organizations managed to raise the profile of children in the Ottawa-Carleton region. Over 20,000 people visited the displays and facilities in an effort to create awareness in the community.

This is not the only thing that has taken place in my community. There is also St. Andrew's Church which in consultation with other community groups, business organizations, and church groups has embarked on an excellent partnership against poverty. As well, they are working collectively in order to promote awareness and do what they can as members of the community to deal with the subject of poverty in our society.

Recently, Our Kids sent a letter to the Prime Minister inviting him to attend one of its events some time in October 1992. In its letter it asked that Canada, or this House, designate a special day for children in Canada. We have Father's Day; we have Mother's Day; we have Canada Day. We have all sorts of days designated for special purposes. I want to echo those sentiments and add my voice to this organization in calling for the establishment of a national day to acknowledge our children, a child's day in Canada.

It would be appropriate to have that day on the anniversary of the meeting of the international community in New York on the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

I would like to congratulate Our Kids and all the different organizations in my community that are working tirelessly in order to do what they can to help solve the question of poverty.

We hear a lot in the media about the city of Ottawa being a fat city. In fact, that is absolutely untrue. Simply put, just a few blocks away, child poverty is no different from any other part of Canada.

In fact, in excess of 24 per cent of the children living in this city are poor. In excess of 55 per cent of all families under the age of 25 with children are poor. One out of every three single mothers in this community is considered to be poor. In excess of 78 per cent of all poor in this region have children.

It will be seen that while many people call our city a fat city, there is another side which is the poor side.

Why do we talk about child poverty? Why are we interested in child poverty? It is part and parcel of a bigger problem and that is the health of the nation as a whole.

When a child is poor, more than likely the health of that child is affected. In fact the impact of poverty on child health is that there is two times the normal risk of dying before the age of 20. Simply put, based on mortality, a poor child has twice the normal infant mortality rate. These deaths are from injury, fires, drowning, pedestrian traffic accidents and so on, as well as an increased rate of chronic illness, particularly between the ages of four and 16 years.

There are other problems associated with child poverty, such as increased psychiatric disorders and physical and mental disabilities. These are all problems associated with and resulting from child poverty.

While we are dealing with poverty, the health of those children is also affected. Children have poor health simply because they have a poor start in life. For instance, women in low income groups have twice the risk of having a baby born too soon or underweight. Therefore, the baby is doomed even before he or she is born.

The cause of this is maternal stress, substance abuse, poor nutrition, and lack of social support. The result is children with physical and learning disabilities, as well as developmental delay.

As well, the child's housing situation may not be adequate or safe. Child care arrangements may not be as appropriate as they should be. In our national capital region there is approximately a two-year waiting list for subsidized day care. In Toronto, there are in excess of 7,500 people on the waiting list for child care. Obviously that is part and parcel of the over-all problem that must be addressed.

When discussing child poverty and what the government is trying to do to deal with it the first thing to do is take the legislation to those who are experts, those who deal with child poverty, to get their reaction to the government's proposal. The child benefit program proposed by the government has not been given much encouragement by the different groups involved with child poverty.

For example, Sue Wolstenholme of the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association said: "This and other examples from the budget indicate once again that either the federal government still does not grasp the problem of child poverty and child care which Canadian families face or they really do believe they can trick the public with yet another illusionary tactic".

Mr. Gerard Kennedy from the Canadian Association of Food Banks had this to say about the bill: "It is the most deceptive and cruel thing coming from government that we have seen in a long time, and a tremendous blow to the hope of low-income people".

Patrick Johnston from the Canadian Council on Social Development had this to say on the bill:

> There's no question that the potential benefits will be completely offset by the lack of indexation. And it's done invisibly—that's the worst part of it.

Ms. Lise Corbeil from the National Anti-Poverty Organization criticized the proposed child benefit because it is inadequate as an anti-poverty measure and it favours the working poor at the expense of the non-working poor. She called the proposal a discriminatory package.

There are at least another seven or eight different organizations that deal with child poverty and every one of them has opposed the proposal and said it is inadequate in dealing with child poverty.

The media has also not reacted very favourably to the government proposals. A report in The Globe and Mail on March 10, 1992 said: "Report blasts child benefits. Says new system lowers incomes". It goes on to say:

> Single parents and other low income families will eventually lose as much as 27 per cent of their income as a result of the new program, the analysis shows.

• (1130)

The key element, which referred to the fact that there will be a loss in revenues, was indicated in the question that I proposed to the hon. member. Mr. Battle, who analyzed the proposals, indicated that if the inflation rate is at 3 per cent, for instance, there will be no revenues coming to welfare recipients and poor families.

In fact they will see a decline in their revenues. He indicated that if the inflation rate is 5 per cent the child benefit would only increase by 2 per cent. By the year 2000 many of the families who are now right at the poverty line will fall way below the poverty line.

Mr. Pierre Fortier, who is a senior official in National Health and Welfare, acknowledged that there will be slippage in the value of the child benefit. He said: "There is a loss in each year where the inflation rate is greater than zero. I do not dispute that".

I could not understand why the assistant to the minister would refute these comments in stating that the working poor in this country would see a decrease in their benefits from this bill rather than an increase. There is a correlation here. I am trying to build a case to demonstrate that we must do more if we are to deal with the poverty of our children.

This is true particularly in one area, which is education. Simply put, if we examine parents and their children who live in poverty it is more likely that the parents will not have a high educational level and that the children will have difficulty with school teachers and those who are assisting them in the community.

Let us examine the Ottawa-Carleton region and its people who are under the poverty line or may not be in a position to help themselves. Based on the 1986 census 25 per cent of poor families with children had less than grade 9 education.

That means that one out of every four people who are poor are poor because they have a lower level of education. Twenty-two percent of poor finished between grade nine to 13, 11 per cent have a diploma or certificate, and 9 per cent have a trade certificate or diploma.

Approximately 67 per cent of the people who live on or under the poverty line do not have a high school diploma or degree. There is a direct correlation between the level of poverty and the level of education.

These figures are for the national capital region and are no different from the statistics provided to us by metro Toronto, for instance. In metro Toronto 75 per cent of those who are going to food banks do not have a high school diploma.

The problem clearly is quite alarming. In order to deal with child poverty we have to attack it on not one but a number of fronts. I would like to move on to make some of the recommendations that my party has been putting forward.

First, we must deal with the heart of the problem. In many of our inner cities in Canada children are going to school hungry. Those children are not in a position to learn. Empty stomachs have no ears.

Therefore, our party has recommended that the federal government immediately participate with provincial and territorial governments, through their boards of education, in conjunction with community volunteers, in the provision of nutritionally balanced breakfast, lunch and snack programs in schools throughout Canada. That must become part and parcel of our educational system and it must take the form of a partnership with the community, both the business and the voluntary sectors.

We have also made a proposal that the federal government re-design the tax system to make it more equitable to help families cope with the added expense of raising children, and that it simplify the federal child benefit system as soon as possible. We are obviously not talking about the kind of simplification or complication that the government has done in Bill C-80.

We have called on the government to immediately announce its intention to create an accelerated job creation program for students and youth so that it can be put in place for those who finish their school term and are looking for some sort of job for the summer period.

We have also called on the federal government to increase the federal minimum wage from $5 to $6 an hour by January 1, 1993.

These are some of the many recommendations that my caucus has put forward. I want to echo those sentiments in saying that we cannot really afford to ignore this problem because children are our future. Only through a proper strategy to deal with the educational system, to deal with a proper child care program, that goes right to the heart of the problem and that is a system of taxation, that addresses the question of housing for many families in inner cities across Canada and in some cases in rural Canada, can we say that we are dealing with the problem and that we are finding solutions to it.

It is really a shame that we live in one of the richest countries in the world and yet we still have child poverty at the rate that we are seeing. There is no reason that this government, along with provincial governments and municipal governments, cannot put together some sort of national conference at which all the different partners could sit together and try to set up a strategy to eradicate child poverty by the year 2000. After all, it was a decision of this House to eradicate child poverty by the year 2000.

On a final note, Mr. Speaker, despite the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child which was ratified by this government, we have yet to see tangible proposals and strategies to attack child poverty right at its roots.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre made a great point about expecting people to absorb the first 3 per cent of indexation, as set out in the Income Tax Act.

I want to put on the record of the House, before I ask him a question, the information that when this government took over, the child tax credit was $384 a year. In 1985-86 it was increased to $454 a year, to $489 a year in 1987, to $524 a year in 1988, to $559 a year in 1989, and it is presently $601 a year. The turning point, or the point, when the threshold would change, was changed back in 1985.

What has happened is that notwithstanding the provisions of the act, the government has successively changed the child tax credit proposals by changing the amount of benefit to more than compensate for inflation.

So much for all of the criticism this government has received from the hon. Ken Battle.

• (1140)

If he would pay attention to what has happened since 1985, he would find that the government has always honoured the requirement to look after children.

What has he got against an increase of $500 over the $1,020 presently available to those earning over $10,000 a year? Has he got something that he finds distasteful that a monthly payment should be made to parents? Does he think that is wrong or does he think that parents ought to get the benefit to support their children out of filing income tax deductions so that they will have to discount those tax deductions to a tax discounter? Does he think a tax discounter is the way people ought to get their money or does he think that a cheque coming monthly is more appropriate than the present system of redistribution?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, for the record, if you look at the family income since this government took office in 1984 up until now, and if you draw a curve, you will see how simple it is to realize that the incomes of both middle-income as well as lower-income families have dropped substantially.

While the Minister of Finance has claimed that the new system will increase the total federal child benefit by $400 million per year, a Senate committee report has indicated that since this government has taken office, there has been in excess of $3.5 billion taken out of the child benefit system between 1986 and 1991.

If the hon. member is telling me that with Bill C-80 a mother who is on welfare is getting more than she was getting before Bill C-80 was introduced, I think he is mistaken. Simply put, she is not receiving any extra benefits. A mother on welfare still receives the same type of benefits.

When we talk about the other increases of $500 or so for those who meet a certain threshold or are below a certain threshold, that is something different. That is when you divide it by the number of months or by the number of days. I can assure hon. members there is nothing one can say. It is enough to solve the ongoing problem. What needs to be done is that the over-all system of taxation has to be reformed in order to help both those who do not have enough and those who do not have at all.

If the hon. member is telling me what is the best way of doing this, I would say that we have to go right to the heart of the problem, and that is our system of taxation.

Just recently, it was clearly indicated that in this country, the middle-income and the lower-income earners are perhaps paying more taxes than in any other industrialized country anywhere in the world. If we are to deal with the heart of the problem, that is an area that we can tackle.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-80 will implement the new child benefit announced by the government in the throne speech. It is part of a program of improved benefits for children and one of the results of a considerable amount of work by the Senate, the House of Commons subcommittee on poverty which I chair, our caucus committee on family issues, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance.

It is not a new idea to roll all child benefits into one benefit in order to rationalize and simplify child benefits. But the method by which this one has been accomplished is quite creative and will make the system more fair, particularly in the long run.

The subcommittee on poverty recommended the roll-up of child benefits with the transfer from other personal tax credits. The subcommittee also recommended a guaranteed earned income supplement which would ensure that income received from employment would be greater than that received by social assistance recipients.

The department has been able to introduce a benefit which establishes structure which will achieve this objective for some families now, but also sets a framework to achieve this objective for more families in the future.

The majority of our subcommittee agreed that it was important to have a social assistance framework that helps people to work. That is the best way to escape poverty and that is the way most social assistance recipients also think. I think it is fundamental, and I am certain most Canadians agree to that.

I once participated in a survey of social assistance recipients with the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and found that almost 100 per cent of social assistance recipients have the same values that all Canadians have. They too want to work and really appreciate help in achieving that objective.

I am very disappointed that there is not some more money in this program for welfare recipients who are unable to work. However, there are benefits for welfare recipients. They will receive their benefit monthly and will not be resorting to tax discounters.

It should also be noted that the child benefit is discretionary income and should not be used as a substitute for an adequate social assistance income.

Our committee also recommended that there be standards for basic social assistance and supplementary benefits that would ensure that the basic needs of children and adults are met. Only Ontario and Prince Edward Island currently have systems that provide such standards. However, under the current structure of social assistance in Canada, this is provincially initiated.

I understand that the minister is having discussions with his provincial counterparts. It seems to me that issue has to be pursued. I think that if in fact we cannot get provincial agreement that we should seriously look at some kind of guaranteed annual income across the country similar to the system in place for senior citizens that would ensure that there is a national standard for social assistance. I think it is a shame to this country that in fact we do not have that now and that in some provinces the gap between basic needs level assistance and what they are getting is enormous. It is quite unacceptable.

This particular benefit should cover discretionary needs. The earned income supplement should recognize the additional costs of working and compensate for the fact that earned income does not consider the number of children in the family, unlike welfare income. There needs to be that kind of support in order to, at least in the long term, ensure that the people are better off financially working.

I am, therefore, pleased to support this bill as major progress on two of the recommendations of the subcommittee on poverty. I have already mentioned the social assistance standards. I think that is the key in order that children in Canada have an adequate opportunity to develop and participate in the many benefits of this society. Improved minimum wages, education, retraining programs, job opportunities and programs specifically targeted at high-risk children as well as more subsidized day care are other things that must be pursued in order to improve the situation of poorer children.

The opposition has raised a number of arguments against this particular benefit, some of which other members have already answered. I would just like to make a comment on the arguments about universality. I would rather have universal opportunity for children in Canada. My riding, which is a fairly high income one and will have a substantial number of families that will lose benefits, I believe supports this benefit. I have circulated a lot of information on it. We have had a lot inquiries and I have only had positive response.

I think the vast majority of Canadians who are well off want to see a dramatic improvement in the lot of the poorest children.

In addition, the opposition has slammed many of the recommendations of the subcommittee on poverty. I noticed the NDP opposition critic on television Sunday night after Venture again slamming us on these particular issues. I find that rather extraordinary because the response to the subcommittee's report from the social community, the social issues community, the many agencies that have appeared, has been overwhelmingly positive. I have had letters from various agencies that appeared before the committee. They support the recommendations.

I often think surely if these agencies supported these recommendations, and if in fact the opposition really cared about children, they could have been far more supportive on that particular report. What in fact has the opposition offered? First of all, it wants all transfer payments to the provinces restored as if it were feasible to continue on the spiralling expenditure increases that have been occurring, principally in Ontario. That is nonsense. We have to live within our budget and spend our money better on those who need our help and in such a way that we do not encourage long-term dependency.

Recommendations of the opposition include a national school lunch program in schools throughout Canada, a huge expensive program that gives to everyone whether they need it or not. I will tell you in my community we do not want it. It has been discussed thoroughly at metro council and so on. Local communities do have programs and I think that is fine. I think where the community wants to put in a program in a particular school, that is great, but a massive nationally run program I do not agree with at all.

I know for example in the schools in North York we have a great number of people from different ethnic communities who do not eat the same and do not want their children to be provided with food at the school. However, we strongly encourage things like nutrition programs where the children learn about proper nutrition. That is basically what the poverty report encouraged.

I think helping people who need help rather than helping everyone is the much more effective and much more sensible way to proceed, rather than creating dependency.

On the issue of the food banks, if you speak privately to some of the NDP members of the provincial government in Ontario, they are not too crazy about food banks at all. They create further dependency and that does not help people in the long run. The whole prospect of people lining up for food is in fact something that is very shameful in our society. Eliminating food banks is the way to proceed.

Winter works programs, public sector youth employment programs, universal broadly targeted programs that dramatically increase taxes result in little improvement for the neediest members of our society. Having been in municipal politics previously, I am very much aware of these winter works programs and who goes out to get those particular jobs. They tend to be men. If we look at poverty, it is predominantly women who are affected. They are also short-term jobs. They tend to increase municipal costs because of the supervision and they are not long term. They stop people from working because in fact they are not available to go out and get real jobs.

Then there are the pie in the sky policies, like the critic for the NDP who spouts his full employment policy and who cannot tell us how he would accomplish this. Every government has a full employment policy. Unfortunately, the NDP one in Ontario is not working any better than ours at the moment.

One thing is for certain, our government will not follow the model of the Liberal Party, which in 1981 to 1982 tried to spend us out of a recession, which resulted in the enormous deficit and debt treadmill that we are currently battling with some success. There are no magic answers and very few people are fooled by such propaganda.

Long-term, sensible economic policies, controlling debt, spending within our means and targeting our social spending to really help those in need is the way to proceed.

This child benefit and the child development initiative which will allow many of the community-based prevention programs targeted at high-risk children between the ages of zero and seven will make major progress on this most important issue of child poverty.

As a member of Parliament, I will continue to pursue other measures such as improved access to day care, particularly for high-risk children, standards for social assistance, improvements in the minimum wage and indeed, improvements in this program over the long run. We have to recognize there are no magic solutions to these problems. There is a need for hard work to endeavour to try and solve, to work at some of these areas, to make progress.

I have been associated with these issues in Toronto since 1972. I do see a lot of progress in Toronto and I hope to see a lot more progress at the national level.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Don Valley North. I agreed with a lot of what she said in her speech and I support the attempt to try and simplify the system.

I am having great difficulty with this $500 a year added credit for those people who are in the work force. I will tell the member for Mississauga South why I am having this difficulty.

I have in my riding 25 per cent who are single parents and most of those people are women. A lot of them are working and a lot of them are not. Last week I had a number of them say to me that $500 or $10 a week is not really that great an incentive to move them off the welfare rolls and into the work force.

The problem is there is no incentive to stay in the work force because $10 a week does not really cover their drug problem if they have a child or two. In other words, when you are on welfare all of those costs are covered.

My question to the member is whether she really believes that $500 is a sufficient enough credit. Does she not think maybe we should do something that is a little bit more dramatic in terms of providing incentive to move people from the welfare rolls into the work force where they can not only regain their dignity and become retrained? Under the current system they are almost entrapped in poverty and I am not sure this is enough.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, first of all this is not a panacea. This is a start. It is $500 worth of help for the working poor. It is not intended to cancel out any of the existing programs, such as the Step program in Ontario that does provide supplementary benefits until the income of the family is above a certain level associated with the poverty line. Those programs will still be in place but this provides additional help. The combination of this program plus the Step program is very positive. We have improved things a bit.

In the long run I would like to see a more careful analysis of this because I think it will lower the number of people in poverty. If you look at the statistics, they are income related and it will take a few more people off the poverty rolls who are working.

Mr. Mills: How does it?

Ms. Greene: It does because if you look at the poverty line in the poverty report, it explains how it works. It is basically the amount of money required depending upon the area, whether it is a large city or a small city, to cover basic needs, plus about an additional 40 per cent to cover discretionary needs.

This $500 per family will remove some people. I am not sure how many. You would have to get Statistics Canada to actually work it out, but it will drop a number. They will be people who are working that are poor and under that line. It seems to me that it is an achievable objective to at least get people who are working full time in this country above the poverty line. The amount of dollars necessary varies by province. It varies by the minimum wage in a particular province. In Ontario they are at the poverty line for an individual right now. They are not at the poverty line for an individual with children. The single parent, of course, is confronting the issue that there is only one income. If you had two incomes you would probably, at the minimum wage, be at the poverty line for a family with one child.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to comment on one of the points the hon. member raised in her remarks having to do with school lunches. I gather that she is not that close to some of the school lunch programs because she certainly characterized them very differently from my experience.

In Vancouver East, a multicultural community with a very, very high percentage of poor children, our schools in co–operation with the community have developed excellent school lunch programs. We work very hard to try and get federal interest in them which, unfortunately, has not happened. We do now have some provincial subsidies.

The results of this are quite astounding. I would ask her when she is in Vancouver to come and visit these programs. In a relatively inexpensive program there have been remarkable changes in the way that children can remain in school. Their interest span has increased and their achievement in school programs has also improved. Many of them, of course, were kids who came to school with no breakfast and perhaps went home at night to maybe just a bit of junk food if they were lucky, and were simply not getting the kind of nutrition they needed. By supplying a simple and not terribly expensive but very nutritious hot meal at noon, these children have shown remarkable improvement in health and in their school participation.

The point I want to raise is that the member gave the impression that these were very expensive programs. The families who can pay the full amount. Those who cannot, pay when they can or do not pay at all. It is all done in a way so there is no stigma attached because nobody knows what any other child is paying. It is an excellent program.

When you add to that the kind of ethnic outreach that is done from the school, the kind of public health programs that are added to it and the head start programs that should be there at the pre-school level, it is a tremendous investment in anti-poverty measures as well as measures that are healthy for all children. It does not cost very much per child.

I would like to commend all the teachers and people who work on these programs, the many volunteers and many parents in Vancouver East.

My question, however, is related to child care. I know the member has done a lot of research on the needs of children and she cares about this very much. But I wonder if she shares my concern, having been on the child care task force which documented over and over again in communities across Canada and with extensive research the need for child care across this country, the urgent need. This was a number of years ago and it has increased since that time, I am sure she would agree. The Prime Minister twice promised Canadians there would be a national child care program in 1984 and 1989. Now the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance say we will not have this program. Therefore, it is a complete denial, both of need and of the Prime Minister's promises.

I would ask her to honestly say that in caring for Canada's children, does she not feel this is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Your time has expired. You have one minute left on the question.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, first of all on the question of the school lunch program, while I think a community based program with people participating is terrific and I think if it is something that community decides to do it is great, I do not think it should be done at the national level. There are many, many families that want to send their children to schools with lunches they have prepared.

On the question of day care, I am very disappointed in the decision of government, which quite surprised me. I think the program as recommended in this report, which was endorsed by the national day care lobby group, is one that is affordable. In the long run, it will develop the kind of system that we need.

I still intend to pursue the matter, particularly the refundable child care tax credit because that is a benefit which could go directly to families to enable them to access some of the licensed day care. Only 8 per cent of children in Canada have access to licensed day care.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-80, whose purpose is to merge family allowance, the child credit and the refundable child tax credit into one monthly benefit, will also end the universality of family allowance.

According to the government, its motives are entirely honourable. And on the face of it, the proposed legislation seems quite acceptable. We are talking about simplifying income tax returns, maintaining more generous benefits for children under 7 and for large families, increasing the incomes of families with an income of less than $50,000 and increasing federal benefits by $2.1 billion over the next five years.

[English]

It does seem that the government is trying to do something decent, but when one looks closer, something is wrong. Under this great plan of the government lies quite another reality. Nearly one million Canadian families work very hard to make ends meet on incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 each year. If the amount seems reasonable, let us keep in mind that this revenue is much smaller, net, thus giving minimum leeway to face the everyday needs and demands of a growing family.

The government will offer these families a fantastic amount of $4 a month more under the proposed child tax benefit. Is that not great?

[Translation]

The Conservative government, the same government that keeps repeating that children are the future of this country, forgot to tell us that between 1986 and 1991, it withdrew more than $3.5 billion from child benefit programs. And today? It is still taking money out of the pockets of Canadians who have trouble making ends meet.

This is a government that ignores 2.5 million Canadians who are on welfare. This is a government that watches as plants close, stores go bankrupt and people are laid off. Then, like in the Christie commercial, says: "Whoops", hoping a miracle will happen to save the day.

Let us face the facts. The government must take the bull by the horns and do something to save the human potential our children represent before it is too late.

[English]

Where is the so desperately needed national day care program? Once again, this government has found an answer: Place it on the back burner. The reason given this time: The government wants to help abused and hungry children.

I must admit I do not understand its way of functioning. For the past seven years, this government has cut back on every support for these same abandoned children, and it wants us to believe today that it is working toward making their future more secure and bright. What a joke.

[Translation]

The fact that in 1992 we are still talking about national day care proves the Conservative government cannot be trusted. It proves the government cares very little about the real needs of Canadians. And it proves above all the government certainly does not want to get involved in a program that will not reap political benefits in the short term. This government is afraid of investing in the long term. It does not understand that child tax benefits do not deal with the problem of poverty, drop-outs and illiteracy. How can we expect children to pay attention in class if they come to school with empty stomachs? How can we expect children to go to school without shoes? How can we expect young people to have a trade if we do not remove these barriers?

• (1210)

[English]

I would like to quote the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration who said on March 10 of this year: "Must I repeat for this House that we believe our children represent the future of our country and that through this budget we are helping families who need social and economic assistance, particularly one-parent families who need additional help. Too often we forget to mention that this budget contains benefits for families and children and that day care services will be maintained through other programs and other measures".

Is that not interesting? What the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration forgot to say was that the net child benefits for a family with an average income are worth barely half of what they were worth seven years ago.

[Translation]

If the government thinks it can fool Canadians with a bill like C-80, it is mistaken. It may make a few people happy and give the impression it is being fair by taking money from higher income groups and giving some crumbs to the less fortunate in this country, but this is just a drop in the bucket.

The need for national day care, a program promised so long ago we have almost given up hope, is becoming increasingly critical. We must face the fact that for so many of our young people the future looks very grim indeed.

Not long ago, for many people it marked the beginning of their education. Our society felt it was essential to develop a healthy mind in a healthy body. Today, for many children a healthy body is something they cannot afford.

National day care is not a frill but a necessity. The money this government makes available to families in need is no guarantee that children will find space in a day care centre. In some cities there is a three-year waiting list.

Children need to be loved, nurtured and fed properly and to grow up in a healthy environment. Parents—often there is only one—know that today, those who have trouble making both ends meet need help. Promises for a better tomorrow are useless because it will be too late.

[English]

This government, by offering so little, is trying to clear its conscience. This way it can try to sell the notion that it has done all it could to help families in need by giving a few bucks more.

What people need is dignity. That comes through work not hand-outs. What children need is an introduction to society through security. That comes from day care centres, not because the home cannot provide it, but because the fact is that in 1992 most parents must work to make ends meet. What teenagers need is a future. That comes through an education adapted to the 21st century and an economy on the rise.

Those are the priorities this country should have. Those are the priorities that must be addressed soon. Time is against us, and if we do not act now, tomorrow will be very grim.

[Translation]

Although it may look good to give families a few dollars more, let us not forget what this government spends on public relations and advertising. I realize the two are necessary, but perhaps some spending restraint would be in order.

A truly responsible government that tries to deal with the fundamental problems and save our young people would be willing to tighten its belt, review its priorities and act accordingly.

I think it is high time for us to take a close look at the system of pension benefits available to members of Parliament and paid for by Canadians, because there is a double standard here. I agree everyone is entitled to a pension, but always payable upon reaching retirement age. This is really the icing on the cake. Other Canadians have to work long and hard to earn a minimum of pension benefits, and they have to wait until they reach a certain age to receive those benefits.

This is just one example of the government's lack of conviction in looking for other ways to get this country out of its financial mess, to create national day care centres, stress retraining and get the economy back on track. A responsible government is not afraid to cut certain non-essential benefits enjoyed by a chosen few.

[English]

I am convinced this country can be pulled together again and that we can get the economy up, but it is essential that our 292 food banks disappear. The government must start making that a priority today. It is unacceptable that in 1992 in Canada so many people must rely on food banks to survive.

This government keeps telling Canadians that it has great training programs. It keeps announcing how many jobs have been created. It keeps forgetting to say how many jobs have disappeared for good.

[Translation]

If the present government is at all serious about economic recovery, it should act. It should start at the bottom with day care, to ensure that all children have a fair chance. It should invest in education so that all Canadians have the tools they need to make a living and can do without the financial crutches offered by the government. It should establish a short-term and effective action plan to wipe out poverty.

Is this not the same government which announced that by the year 2000, in less than 8 years, child poverty would be a thing of the past? Today, at this very moment, nearly one million children go to food banks. Is that normal? If the children have reached that stage, it means the parents have as well. What is being done in concrete terms to deal with the problem? How can these people believe things will get better? Is Bill C-80, which will give them a few dollars more, going to make a difference? I doubt it.

A country is not built on poverty and desperation but on faith in the future and hard work. Canadians are not afraid of hard work, but first they must find work. This country was built, and it is still growing, thanks to the labour and sacrifices of people who thought it was worth while to invest in Canada. Today, now that times are particularly hard for people at the bottom of the ladder, it is up to the government to do its share. It has received a lot from its citizens. Now it is up to the government to cut its profits and tighten its belt. It must act now to put back some of what it has received.

[English]

There are at least 2.5 million Canadians who depend on social welfare. This is not a choice but a necessity. The number of homeless who do not collect any other revenue than what they get from begging is growing day by day. Violence is on the rise. Drugs are the escape. Suicides occur daily among people of all ages. The picture is grim.

The government does not want to see it. The government does not want to address it. The media barely mentions it but it is a fact. Canada does have problems. Canada has a major problem if it has so many of its citizens in need.

• (1220)

A bandage answer like Bill C-80 will not help solve anything. It might add a few dollars, but with inflation and taxes you cannot go very far on that.

In a country as rich as ours how can we accept the fact that so many children live in poverty? Where are the grassroot programs to give people the tools to make it? Of course there are some training programs, but how do you get there when you cannot find a babysitter or, even worse, you cannot afford one?

This government has to get its priorities in the right order or this country will simply not make it. People need a sense of value. They need to know that they are doing something worth while. They need to earn a living. No one wants a handout. It is when no one believes in you that you fall apart and cannot contribute to society. Too many have already fallen into this trap.

This government must get the country working again. It must make the citizens of Canada proud of themselves again.

[Translation]

The Conservative government must understand what is happening in this country. There are some very real problems and the government must act now. If it has not yet understood what Canada's priorities are, the people of this country will be glad to remind the government of those priorities in the next election.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): The member in her remarks, Mr. Speaker, made a comment about the fact that the benefits to children in the Income Tax Act had been reduced by this government. I was wondering if she could spell out what the benefits were in 1984 and what they are today, bearing in mind that under this bill a family earning $25,000 will receive $211.66 a month tax free? That buys a lot of babysitters, a lot of lunches and other assistance as well.

I was wondering what tax-free allowances she could tell us about that were paid in 1984 because I do not believe there were any. But maybe she has some and she can tell us how much better the former Liberal government was with respect to children.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the member for Mississauga South has not had to require the services of a babysitter lately.

Is the member aware that it costs $800 a month for a babysitter in the metro Toronto area? Mississauga is part of that. Most of the families earning $25,000 could not afford $800 a month for a babysitter. Let us hit them on the head. Let us give them $4 and make them feel that this government is doing something. It is a farce and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville for her remarks.

I want to continue to pursue this feature of the legislation that the government seems to be so proud of, this $500 credit that it talks about for people at the lower end of the spectrum. In the papers the government released, it is suggesting that this $500 will be an incentive for those people in the work force to stay in the work force. I am talking about people making $14,000 to $16,000 a year. The government thinks that this $500 credit is sufficient to maintain their interest.

There are many single parents in my community who are out of work right now because of the economy. If they were on welfare they might receive around $10,000 to $12,000. If they went into the work force and made $16,000 or $17,000 by the time the taxes were taken off they would probably receive the same amount as they would on welfare.

Yet the government thinks that this $500 tax credit is really sufficient to keep them motivated to stay in the work force. Five hundred dollars in a nice glossy brochure looks like something. We do not emphasize the fact that it is not going to kick in until 1993. We are talking about legislation today but it is not going to kick in until 1993.

That is $10 per week or to be more specific, about $1.50 per day. What happens if all of a sudden there is a medical bill and a person needs prescription drugs? I just cannot understand why the government thinks that this $500 credit is a meaningful sum of money to those who are at the lower end of the income spectrum. I was wondering if the member could take a little time to elaborate on that particular issue.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood.

I was present when the civil servants presented this child benefits program to us. I looked around the table and tried to figure out roughly how much money these fellows were making. I thought that they might have salaries of $80,000 per year. They were saying that they had income tax problems as well, while discussing the pros and cons of this bill with us. I wonder how many of them had got to the point at which $1.50 a day became important in their lives. It was as though by giving this $500 they were doing a wonderful thing for the single parents of Canada.

I agree with the member. When a child is sick one week's medicine is not covered by the $10 parents are getting for a week. Actually it is not $10 per week but about $9.50.

There is no incentive for them to get back in the work force. The $500 is not going to mean a thing. Most of them are better off on welfare. Five hundred dollars is not enough to pull them off the welfare rolls or to keep them off the welfare rolls. It is all very well to say that a lot of women are making $14,000 to $16,000 a year but the jobs they are in are jobs that will very soon be affected by a new free trade deal. It is going to hurt them even worse and then the government will just sit back and say: "Well, we gave you $500". I hope that answers your question.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise to speak in support of this landmark legislation to strengthen Canada's income assistance measures for children and families. Bill C-80 recognizes our commitment to financially assist with children's needs through a child benefits system that is fundamentally fair, simple and generous.

It contains the most sweeping improvements in federal benefits for children since the child tax credit was created in the 1970s, and arguably is the most important change since the first family allowance was paid in 1945.

Bill C-80 has three major elements. It amends the Income Tax Act to create the new child tax benefit, it introduces the Children's Special Allowances Act and it repeals the Family Allowances Act.

This initiative is part of the federal government's over-all strategy called "Brighter Futures", a preventive and multi-faceted program directed primarily at intervention in the early stages of the lives of children who are faced with greater than normal risks of poor health and nutrition, mental problems, mental health problems, disability or injury, abuse and neglect.

"Brighter Futures" is composed of four main program areas: prevention, promotion, protection and partnerships. Through this strategy the federal government will spend another $500 million over five years in the fight to protect Canada's children from poverty, neglect, abuse, ill health and unsafe living conditions.

The bill before us today is a very important component of this call to action on behalf of Canada's children.

To discuss and examine the new child tax benefit it is necessary to understand our present child benefits system. Currently, the federal government spends $4.5 billion each year on three major programs for children: family allowances; the refundable child tax credit; and the non-refundable dependent child credit.

• (1230)

Family allowances are delivered in monthly payments of $35 per child to all eligible Canadian families. They are taxable and must be declared by the spouse with the higher income. Payments are then partly or completely recovered if one parent has a net 1992 income above $53,215.

Under the family allowance program a special allowance is also payable on behalf of a child under 18 years who is institutionalized or in foster care.

The second component of our present child benefits system is the refundable child tax credit. This consists of an income tested benefit claimed through the tax system. The maximum payment of $601 per child is reduced for families with incomes above $26,000. Two-thirds of the credit may now be prepaid in November, depending upon the family income.

The third component of our present child benefits system is the non-refundable dependent child credit, also administered by Revenue Canada. This non-refundable credit is a reduction of taxes for the parent who is the higher income spouse. Its annual 1992 value is $71 for each of the first two children and $142 for each additional child. The dependent child credit applies only to families with sufficient income to pay income taxes.

One may ask as to what is wrong with the current child benefit system. Let me explain what I consider to be the key problems. The most important is that the system provides inadequate support for low income working families. These are the families who are most often faced with employment related expenses and the possible loss of provincial social assistance benefits by choosing to work.

The present child benefits system does nothing to reinforce their incentive to work. Families with children receiving social assistance and services may actually be getting thousands of dollars more than families with children who are surviving and yet working at low wage jobs.

It is true that the current system directs more benefits to low income families than to high income families but it still does not do enough to target child benefits where they are really needed the most.

There are two problems here. The first is that wealthy families continue to receive child benefits even though they have relatively little need for such benefits. If we are to provide increased assistance for children in low and modest income families then we can no longer afford to pay benefits for those in high income brackets.

The second problem is that family allowances are directed on the basis of individual income instead of family income. This is true both in their taxability as income and in the repayment required for higher income individuals. This means families with similar total incomes may receive different levels of child benefits. As a result, children with similar needs may be treated differently. Family income is a much more equitable basis for directing assistance to children, and the new program is aimed exactly in that direction.

The delay in delivery of the benefit under the current system is another key problem. For many families the refundable child tax credit represents more than half of their federal child benefit, but being an annual payment it often fails to meet their immediate needs when those cash requirements occur.

The full amount of the credit is paid only after tax returns are assessed. This delay in payment is difficult for families with modest incomes. They must pay for their children's needs every month but they frequently have to wait more than one year to receive the full credit.

This was partially addressed in 1986 by introducing a prepayment of a portion of the credit in November each year. This advance payment provision was brought about to assist families in need, especially those who required the money so much that sometimes they even sacrificed their pending credits to tax discounters.

Even with this small improvement the system is still too slow to address the changing dynamics of family structure. For example, a child born in January or February does not receive a child tax credit until more than one year later.

The current system is a patchwork system. Benefits are delivered in various ways. There are different eligibility requirements for each program.

For example, family allowances are based on individual income while the refundable child tax credit is based on family income. It is confusing to have a different income system for each benefit. As well, having to fill out all of the calculations on the child tax credit form, which is effectively a new application each year, adds complexity to the system.

Furthermore, the government continues to pay family allowances to all high income families although they are subject to repayment of those benefits through the tax system. Many are asking what the purpose of paying these benefits is if they are only taxed back.

This policy was designed to ensure that the benefits of the family allowances program would be better targeted to lower income groups and it did achieve that end. However, of course we continued to consider whether a better way could be found, one that would not require any repayment and one that would avoid the additional administrative costs generated by first making payments and by then recovering them.

I point out these weaknesses not to undermine the value of the programs that have existed up to now. They have done a valuable job in helping Canada's children over many decades, at a cost of billions of dollars that were largely spent. Now we must recognize the need for fundamental improvements to that system.

There is no question that the new child tax benefit put forth in this bill before us today is a significant advance over our current system. In light of today's complex society this bill proposes an enriched benefit which is streamlined, responsive and better targeted. It is one that incorporates suggestions from two recent parliamentary committees, one here and one in the other place, from many non-governmental social policy groups and many individual Canadians.

For the benefit of my colleagues I would like to repeat the key features of this child tax benefit. The proposed benefit will be a single monthly payment for children under 18. It will generally be made to the mother. This new benefit will be based on family income rather than on individual income. These single monthly payments will neither be taxed nor recovered at tax time so that what families receive they will get to keep in full.

There are two major components of the proposed child tax benefit. The first is a basic monthly benefit that replaces the present family allowance. It also replaces the dependant child tax credit and refundable child tax credit, and includes extra benefits for children under the age of seven and children in larger families.

The second is a new federal earned income supplement that will increase the basic benefit by up to $500 per year for low income working families with children. The actual benefit payable will depend on family earnings and income, as well as the number and ages of children in the family. Entitlement will be calculated automatically based on the previous year's income tax returns, eliminating the need to fill in a special form every year as is now required by the child tax credit.

It will be composed of a base amount of up to $1,020 per year for each child, with a $75 supplement for the third and subsequent children. The base amount is increased by a further $213 per year for each child under seven if child care expenses are not claimed at tax time. The basic child tax benefit amount will be paid in full to all families with incomes up to $25,921. The benefit will gradually reduce for those with incomes above that amount.

In addition, there will be an earned income supplement of up to $500 a year for working families. The earned income supplement will be phased in for families earning above $3,750. This supplement will reach its full amount of $500 when family earnings are $10,000 or more and will only begin to reduce over an upper threshold of $20,921. For families making a total of $25,921, the upper threshold, or more the earned income supplement will be eliminated.

What does this mean to a Canadian family? A single mother with two children over the age of seven with a family income of $30,000 would receive $153.25 a month beginning in 1993. She would be better off, compared to present circumstances, by approximately $300 per year.

Another mother with three children over the age of seven with a total family income of $22,000 in 1991 will be eligible for a basic amount of $261.25 plus an earned income supplement of $32.68 per month. This means that she will receive beginning in January 1993, a total of $293.93 in benefits each month. She will be better off, compared to her current circumstances, by about $400 per year.

This new system is intrinsically more fair. It is based on family income and not individual income. It is targeted at those who most need it so that assistance is focused on low and middle income families. The child tax benefit will be gradually reduced for families with incomes above the designated thresholds. The entire benefit will be paid monthly, making it vastly easier for families to budget properly. It will also be much less likely that when there is a change in custody the benefit will be paid to the wrong parent.

It is not only the fundamental design of the new system that demonstrates the government's commitment to the social well-being of families with children. This new system will be more generous than the current one. Over the next five years the government has committed an additional $2.1 billion to assist families with children through this program. Over 2.4 million families will have increased child benefits. Over two-thirds of them will be families with incomes of less than $50,000. No family with an income below $50,000 will lose any benefits.

The new income supplement will provide special protection for some of the most vulnerable members of our society, families with low earnings. The new earned income supplement will help these families stay in the work force and meet the needs of their children. This new supplement will also help families on social assistance to deal with the loss of those social assistance benefits as they move into the work force. It is one step toward, maybe not as generous as we would all like to see, dismantling the welfare trap.

Single parents have the greatest need for child assistance because they bear the combined responsibility of earning a living and caring for their children. In addition to the new child tax benefit single parents will retain the present equivalent to married credit for their first child. For many this is worth an average of $1,445 in reduced federal and provincial taxes each year.

Overall, this new child tax benefit will be much simpler and more efficient to administer. It consolidates three current programs into one. The child tax benefit will be jointly administered by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Revenue Canada taxation. National Health and Welfare will be responsible for receiving initial applications and providing general information about the program. Revenue Canada will determine entitlement based on family income to calculate the amount of the tax credit each month and will authorize the payments.

I would like to turn for a few minutes to another aspect of Bill C-80, the introduction of the Children's Special Allowances Act. Currently, the Family Allowances Act has a provision to assist with the care of children in foster homes and other institutions. It is most important to this government that we continue to provide for these children, many of whom are being cared for in this way, because they are children at risk. Any department, agency or institution that is entitled to apply for a special allowance under the existing Family Allowances Act will continue to receive that benefit under the new Children's Special Allowances Act.

However, we have gone further. From a point of view of equity the government feels that it is important that payments on behalf of these children in care are equivalent to those for all other children. Therefore, the monthly special allowance payment will increase from the current $52.03 to $85.00 per month. It is not a great increase in dollars but nonetheless it is an increase of 60 per cent in the support we are providing for these 30,000 children.

The bill before us today underscores this government's commitment to social and fiscal responsibility. The child tax benefit is the end result of an extensive review which stressed the need for considerable change. Consolidation of three programs into one represents a sound and socially responsible solution. The improvements will be greatly appreciated by most Canadians.

With this new child tax benefit families with low and middle incomes will gain. The earned income supplement will provide extra support for those with low wages and will reinforce incentives to participate in the work force. Virtually all single parent families will enjoy increased benefits.

The dedicated staff of both of these government departments charged with the implementation of the new program are already deeply involved in their work, switching some 3.7 million files into the new program structure. Of course their work can only progress to a certain point, pending the decisions of this Parliament.

I am sure that hon. members in their deliberations on this bill will bear in mind how important it is for Canadians to receive their first monthly payments on time in January 1993, especially since most of these monthly payments will be significantly larger than they would be under the current legislation.

In closing, I am pleased with the new directions we are taking to assist families with children in low income circumstances. In total there are approximately 6.6 million children in Canada and it is a staggering fact that over one million of them, 17.5 per cent, are presently at some form of risk because of poverty, ill health, poor living conditions, abuse or neglect.

With this bill we are taking an important step forward in maintaining and improving the well-being of many of those children. The child tax benefit is one measure among a wide range of initiatives being developed for the children of Canada.

The future of this world belongs to our children. Let us work together in this House to ensure that the future for Canadian children remains the brightest in all the world.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit concerned about the timing of this initiative. Perhaps the hon. member who has just spoken can assist me.

His government has been in office for some eight years. I am wondering if he can explain whether it is pure coincidence that this initiative is taking place now on the eve of a general election campaign. Can he indicate why it took this government eight years to realize that Canadian families and Canadian children were in desperate need of assistance from the national government?

Can he explain the coincidental timing of this particular initiative? Would he not agree that Canadians could be justified in concluding that this government is more motivated by its desperate desire to be re-elected than by a sincere concern for the children of Canada?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer, which every Canadian knows, is that when this government took office in 1984 it was saddled with a quarter of a trillion dollars in debt that the former Liberal government had left behind.

It left deficits ranging close to $40 billion a year and a recession brought about by those circumstances. That made it absolutely impossible to find any flexibility for the kinds of initiatives that are being introduced at this time.

It has only been through the fiscal management of this government, through the reduction of government program spending from 13.5 per cent for 15 years of Liberal rule to 3.9 per cent over the last eight years, through the realization of a program surplus in our operating account that we are able to contemplate the kind of expenditures over the next five years that are set out in this bill.

If the hon. member had stopped to think about the real cause that has inhibited our government and our country in serving its citizens as they deserve he would be embarrassed to have asked that question.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke referred in his remarks to the needs of children. He particularly mentioned the high priority needs of single parents raising children on their own, most of them single mothers.

When he talked about those needs did he not mention the need for child care? Does he not realize that this is a burning need for most parents, that when both parents are forced to be in the work force they need reliable licensed child care? Even greater is the need of single mothers for child care.

The child benefits program that he is talking about gives a special incentive, a special bonus, which is really a two-tiered philosophy that is rather regressive. The good working poor will get an extra bonus if they go to work but those who are forced to stay on welfare will not.

In particular the single mother will have very little opportunity to get off welfare and seek employment, even in the minimum wage jobs that are probably the only ones available. A mother cannot go to work if she does not have reliable child care for her children. Why did he not take this into account and what does he feel about this?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the issue of child care is a complex one and certainly one of the great social questions that we face. This bill, in the structure of the child tax benefit, in the structure of the earned income supplement and in the structure of the tax credits available to single parents, does attempt to take cognizance of the fact that the single parent is charged with the responsibility of both caring for the child and of earning the family income.

It is always desirable that we should want to do more. However, in addressing the issue of the child through this child tax benefit and in increasing the benefits to low and middle income families, and particularly to single parent families, we are inherently addressing the subject of child care. We have maybe not done so to the extent that we all would wish but within the circumstances and resources available to us. I think it points in the direction that will serve Canadians, particularly those who have child care expenses to bear.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I was wondering if the member could explain the supplement on top of the very generous payment that will be paid to people with children under seven. It is my understanding that for a family earning $20,000 a year with one child under seven the payment would be $1,733 a year. That is quite a bit more than the basic. For two children it would be another $426 a year, or nearly $3,000 a year in total.

Would the member confirm that those arrangements are the way they are? This payment on a basic basis for a family with two children earning $20,000 a year is $211.66 a month tax free. If the children happen to be under seven the total amount spread out over the year is increased by $213 per child for each child under seven.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the precise calculations that the hon. member has corrected. However, the notes that I do have indicate that this new special allowance will be paid monthly and the institution must use it for the benefit of the child. Also, the net benefit in dollar terms will increase from the current $624 per year to $1,020 per year.

There may be a provision that he is addressing that I have not properly understood or for which I do not have the information. I certainly will endeavour to seek him out following this debate and provide him with the information he has requested in full.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member would want the record to stand when he mentioned that this government inherited a debt of a quarter of a trillion dollars when it was actually $180 billion. I know that a 30 per cent exaggeration is not his custom.

My specific question concerns those people at the lower end of the spectrum. We are not dealing with the credits for those who are advantaged and who have a higher income. I would like to focus on this $500 credit.

I am hearing from many single mothers that the $10 a week credit on the lower income spectrum is really not going to change their lifestyle. It is not a great incentive when they have a choice between either a welfare cheque or a work cheque for approximately the same amount. In other words, $500 is not that great an incentive. I know that in the hon. member's province there is a special pilot project going which will perhaps give some added training to those single parents at the lower end of the spectrum.

Is the member satisfied with that $10 a week? Does he not think that for that sector we should have been a lot more generous to move them from the welfare side of the equation?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member previously in his questioning demean this $500 earned income supplement. What he fails to recognize is that this is a new and additional benefit for people who are working, for people who insist on maintaining the dignity of employment rather than receiving and accepting welfare. This $500 is important. It represents 5 per cent of income for a person making only $10,000 a year.

No, it is never enough. If you boil it down to a dollar and some cents a day or $10 a week or whatever, it is not enough. It is not a significantly large amount of money, but it is more than has been paid up to the present time. It is more than his government has ever done. It is moving in the direction of doing away with the welfare trap, of giving some recognition, however small, to those who prefer to work rather than living on welfare.

I think it is important as a symbol, if nothing else, even though I admit it is modest.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I see we have only a few minutes but I would like to really—

An hon. member: Call it one o'clock.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could call it one o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the Chair to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 12.58 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

CJSS–CFLG

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the CJSS–CFLG radio station strike in Cornwall, Ontario has been in progress for nearly seven months. The strike has caused considerable hardship for the station and its employees, and it is in no one's interest for it to continue any longer.

In any strike, conciliation and compromise are required from both sides if a resolution is to be obtained. I call upon the Minister of Labour and officials in his department to use every means at their disposal in order to bring management and labour together to begin constructive negotiations aimed at obtaining an acceptable and equitable conclusion to this labour dispute.

It is clear that the employer and employees of radio station CJSS–CFLG need outside assistance if they are to end this debilitating strike.

It is my hope that Labour Canada can bring the two parties together and help them reach a mutual acceptable agreement that will put an end to this damaging strike which has gone on far too long.

TRIBUTE TO FÉDORA AND FLORENT FORTIN

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to my constituents Fédora and Florent Fortin and their 13 children, who were just honoured at the 93rd provincial convention of the Knights of Columbus as family of the year in Quebec.

The reputation of Florent Fortin and his wife Fédora goes far beyond their native village of Launay. In Taschereau, Amos or Val d'Or, from Témiscamingue to the northern tip of Abitibi, many remember spending a happy evening at the home of Florent and Fédora, this couple whose hospitality is legendary.

In my region of Abitibi, no association, initiative, community undertaking or celebration has not benefited from the enthusiastic contribution of the Fortin family.

Mr. Speaker, congratulations to Fédora and Florent Fortin for their dedication to community service and their exemplary success in family life.

HOUSING

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the federal cabinet is to spend $4.3 billion on helicopters to combat a Soviet threat that no longer exists. The government also plans to spend $100 million for a referendum whose answer will not be binding. The same government is spending millions on a PR campaign that says Canadians can do it.

One thing the government has not been able to do is to deal with the disgraceful shortfall in housing aboriginal people.

A 20,000 unit backlog is responsible for social problems which take an enormous toll on aboriginal families who often live 20 at a time in houses without indoor plumbing or clean water.

For example, $1 million was recently spent in Arviat on Hudson Bay to treat the health effects of an epidemic related to poor sanitation. One million dollars spent on housing in that community could have eliminated that problem.

Canadians are asking: "If Canada can do it, why can this government not get its priorities straight?"

SAFE BOATING WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, this is Safe Boating Week in Canada.

This campaign by the Coast Guard and the Safe Boating Council is an attempt to emphasize the importance of boating education, the prevention of drinking and boating, and over–all safety on the water. I commend this effort.

However more needs to be done. Boats on the market today travel at ever increasing speeds. All one has to do is head down to the local waterfront and witness the tremendous danger that can be involved in pleasure boating.

Over 50 per cent of search and rescue efforts by the Coast Guard are in response to pleasure craft accidents. Yet, unlike automobiles, a person does not have to be licensed in any way to operate one of these craft. Anyone from the age of one to 100 is permitted to drive a pleasure boat regardless of experience or ability.

I call on the Coast Guard during Safe Boating Week to establish new regulations governing pleasure boating that include mandatory licensing for all operators.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women has called for a complete restructuring of the blue ribbon panel on violence against women. This is neither practicable nor possible at this late date.

It may well be that the membership of the panel was not as representative of the diversity of Canadian women as it should have been. However the members of the panel themselves are tried and true workers in the battle against violence. To blame them for the shortfalls in the terms of reference goes against principles of fairness and seriously jeopardizes the good work that has been done.

NAC makes the mistake, as does the government, of thinking that the panel is the only vehicle in the fight against violence. We in the Liberal Party want to see its reports before we make a judgment. We also want to remind all of those engaged in the battle against violence that we must stand together and that we must continue to press for mandatory training of judges, appropriate police protocols and emergency courts for women in crisis. We do not serve ourselves or Canadian women in general by fractionalizing our own movement.

The panel has made some mistakes. Surely we are all human. I call on national women's groups and all women to stand together in this battle. Let us not throw out the baby with the bath water.

JOBSTART PROGRAM

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, among the many valuable job training initiatives which the Government of Canada has been taking in recent years, few would appear to be more uniquely successful than the Jobstart Program which has been conducted by a volunteer community organization in Oromocto, New Brunswick.

Over the past several years the continuing track record has been maintained of all young citizens who have completed Jobstart training. The results indicate that employment stability of more than 70 per cent has been maintained by Jobstart graduates during that time.

The special features of the Jobstart concept are those that teach the work ethic in a full-fledged employment scenario. The participants are not called students but rather employees and they learn the disciplines of holding a job on a first-hand basis. In addition, of course, they receive general training in the fundamental skills and habits necessary to survive in the work force.

The innovative training program is also very cost effective for society because it has a high record of helping people break out of the welfare trap.

The Jobstart Program deserves a continuing place in the training structure of the Canada employment system.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, on June 4 of this year the right hon. Prime Minister received a letter from the premier of the province of British Columbia, the hon. Michael Harcourt. I will quote three paragraphs from this letter. It starts by saying:

> After much consideration, the Government of British Columbia has determined that Canadian interests would be best served by Canada withdrawing from the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) negotiations and not signing a NAFTA.
> It is clear from the actions of the Government of the United States over the past few weeks that it is not willing to live by the spirit of the commitments made in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement (FTA). These actions include the recent softwood lumber dispute and the Honda case, both of which are clearly politically motivated trade disputes that violate the commitment to fair trade between the two countries.
> Therefore, I believe strongly that it is premature to consider entering another preferential trade agreement with the United States given the problems associated with the FTA.

I want to congratulate the premier of the province of British Columbia for taking this position. I want to say to the federal government that it should either pay attention to this letter or suffer the peril in the province of British Columbia.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post first tested supermailboxes in my riding of Fraser Valley East. Through a good communications campaign and a willingness to consult, supermailboxes were a success.

Now, to the surprise of many, in the municipality of Matsqui in my riding Canada Post seems to have forgotten its own secret to success. In a very high-handed way Canada Post has decided to locate supermailboxes in the middle of people's lawns. I am not kidding.

A simple notice to say it is coming was issued. No consultation took place; no recourse was available. The next thing we know, trees were ripped out, holes were dug, a water main broken, Canada Post's reputation was shot, and 300 people were signing a petition.

Things are moving fast here, but what we really need is some common sense and some understanding. Residents and Canada Post alike want to get rid of the old green boxes and want some improved service.

I encourage Canada Post to stop its high-handed and arbitrary actions in the McMillan Heights area of Matsqui and meet with the residents affected to reach an amiable agreement suitable to all parties involved.

I have now been assured by Canada Post that it will meet with the people affected.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, for quite some time the government has been telling Canadians they have to be well trained to compete globally. However it seems the Tories are unwilling to take their own advice.

Thousands of Canadians across the country are looking for training assistance. The government says it has poured millions of dollars into the UI fund to help provide training. Sadly for those many Canadians whose UI has run out they are ineligible for help.

For our young people in universities learning the skills of tomorrow, the Conservatives have cut funding for post-secondary education. The resulting higher tuition has forced many youth to give up on a university education.

The government should listen to its own advice and help Canadians get the job training they need to enter the 21st century.

PENSIONS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on a subject that is very dear to us in this Chamber, perhaps too dear. I am referring to the pensions that you and I will receive as members of Parliament. I believe there must be some changes to the pension rules.

First, no one should be eligible to receive a pension until they are at least 55 or 60 years of age. Second, no one should be permitted to draw an MPs pension and also receive a salary from a government job. Third, I believe MPs should be eligible after four years of service but should not start drawing the pension until they reach retirement age.

My constituents want to know where we stand on this issue. This is where I stand and have stood there since I was elected. I ask all members to consider what I have said very carefully.

ELLIOT LAKE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Elliot Lake Retirement Living Caravan is stationed on Parliament Hill. It is located near the west members' entrance.

The caravan is a travelling information display which tells all about Elliot Lake retirement living, a non-profit housing program offering rent to seniors from just $285 per month. Since its inception in 1987 the program has attracted over 2,000 seniors to this beautiful city on the north shore of Lake Huron.

More than 1,100 housing units in Elliot Lake are now occupied by seniors in the retirement living program and there are some 400 more units available for rent this year.

Over 2,000 senior citizens from many parts of Canada have discovered the enjoyment and economic freedom of living in this friendly city of 13,000 with excellent community facilities and low housing costs.

The caravan is funded through a grant from the FEDNOR program. I invite all, including all MPs and senators, to visit the Elliot Lake Retirement Living Caravan today on Parliament Hill to learn what an excellent opportunity this is for affordable housing for our senior citizens.

VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe that our government should Canadianize and restore the Victoria Cross medal as the highest accolade for an act of valour in the face of the enemy.

In 1972 when the previous government brought in the new Canadian orders of bravery the Victoria Cross was omitted. I believe it is time this policy was reversed. The Victoria Cross should be reinstated and awarded by the Governor General on the advice of the government of the day.

After listening to the many views of many veterans on this issue, I strongly believe the Victoria Cross should once again resume its position as a distinguished part of Canada's awards for gallantry.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in response to my leader, the Minister of National Health and Welfare implied that provincial New Democrat governments were no better than his when it comes to child care. This is unfair, insulting, and shows the minister's inadequate knowledge of child care in Canada.

In my home province of British Columbia the New Democrat government chose to add $17 million for child care support programs including additional funds for infant and toddler care.

In Saskatchewan, a province reeling from debt left by the previous Tory government, the New Democrats chose to create a child care advisory board and chose to allocate over $14 million for child care.

In Ontario the New Democrat government chose to create a child care task force and $75 million has been targeted over five years. Knowing it is essential for individuals seeking training to have access to child care, Jobs Ontario includes the creation of 20,000 new spaces.

The New Democrat government in Yukon also chose to bring in child care reform.

What have the Tories done? They chose to cap the Canada Assistance Plan for B.C., Ontario, and Alberta, and have limited the funds to child care.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked my constituents for their advice and suggestions. I would like to share some of the responses with the House.

Dave Cannon of Caledon East has this advice: Keep interest rates below 10 per cent; keep inflation low; reduce taxes, especially the GST; fund public works projects; reduce unemployment; and increase funding for education and retraining.

O. Schewchun of Campbellville writes: The Canadian future I believe will improve when we elect people who truly represent the majority view of constituents and do not blindly follow and support their political party line. Politicians must remember they are elected to represent, not elected to lead.

Elaine Lawlor of Palgrave writes: We want to stay proud Canadians. We want the tops in education and medical research. We want to work for our future. We want our children to know how to work rather than to be handed too much. We want safety in our cities. We want our children to be able to play in the parks again. We want alcohol advertising prohibited and we want French in Quebec and English in the rest of Canada.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing the voices of my constituents to be heard in Parliament.

ASSISTANCE TO NEEDY FAMILIES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the government wants to keep the Canadian family as the basis of this country, but is demolishing everything that could help it get out of hard times. This Conservative government denies that many families are headed and financially supported by single women. One parent families are a reality in 1992.

[English]

Eliminating tax breaks for common law couples, killing a national day care program, introducing a targeted system of child benefits are not what is needed to help those who care but struggle to keep their families as an entity.

[Translation]

This government is doing nothing to help create a future for the thousands of children who survive thanks to food banks. It believes only in the traditional type of family and forgets about the others.

If we want a strong nation, it is high time to stop living in the past and to face today's reality of the very large number of broken families that are asking for the help promised by this government. This situation must change.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Speaking to mayors from all over Canada on Sunday in Montreal, the Minister of Transport told them that the government could not participate in a program to rebuild the cities' infrastructure and create jobs immediately, because it did not have money. Today, we learn that the government is preparing to spend $4.3 billion to buy 50 helicopters for the Canadian forces. These helicopters will not even be made in Canada; they will be made in Europe.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister why the government is considering spending $4.3 billion to buy military equipment when the government does not have a single dollar to help unemployed Canadians.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Leader of the Opposition is mistaken. The government must make decisions on Canada's national security and national defence on the basis of recommendations from the military authorities. We shall see if it is necessary to buy this particular equipment. If so, the Minister of National Defence will report to the House of Commons in due course.

As for the statement made by the Minister of Transport in Montreal, he stated the obvious fact that we do not have $14 or $15 billion to spend on municipal infrastructure. As the hon. member for Halifax said yesterday, you in the Liberal Party do not have the money to finance a national child care program. That is realistic. Our position is rather like that. We cannot spend money we do not have. But in his budget, the Minister of Finance spoke of government involvement in road infrastructure, and we are looking into it with the provinces. I have the impression that within a few days or weeks, there will be an important statement about it.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not want to create a bad impression.

[English]

But it is not a program of $15 billion by the federal government. It is a program of $1 billion per year for five years. The provincial government will pay one-third, the municipalities will pay one-third and there will be jobs created right away.

• (1420)

Coming back to this question of buying 50 helicopters for $4.3 billion at this time, this program has been under discussion for 10 years. The government should know that the world has changed a lot in the last 10 years. I would like to know if the Prime Minister would reconsider this decision and make sure that other priorities come first, like the creation of jobs and having money for programs and the training of the unemployed so they will be ready when prosperity returns to Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Leader of the Opposition that the only decision which has been made in this regard was made by his government about fifteen years ago, and that was to replace our frigates.

Now, those frigates will require helicopters, since those in use at present are nearly 30 years old and need to be replaced. The government has the matter under advisement. A decision will be made and the House will be apprised of it in due course, as the Prime Minister has said.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance.

As I said earlier, that decision may indeed have been under consideration for 10 years, but it is the normal result of a situation which, at the time, made new frigates necessary. But the world has changed completely during that time.

That is why I would like the Minister of National Defence to tell me whether those billions of dollars might not be better spent meeting urgent societal needs now that the cold war is over.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I am to take the Leader of the Opposition literally, we should cancel the frigate building program now, including those under construction in New Brunswick and Quebec. I do not think that the government, in its wisdom, will make such a decision.

Second, as far as on-board helicopters are concerned, we are aware, just like the Leader of the Opposition, that the world has changed. That matter will be among those raised by my cabinet colleagues, as the minister does himself in his department, and in due course a decision will be made and the population will be informed.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there is a big difference between the frigate program approved by the Liberals and this program. The frigates are made in Canada and these helicopters will not be.

I understand that in fact the jobs created by the Sea King replacement program will be 3,000. I understand that the same amount of money spent on public transportation would create 40 times as many jobs and if spent on education, would probably create 75 times as many jobs.

Can the minister stand on his feet and tell this House and the Canadian public that, given the state of the world, the Canadian economy, the state of our infrastructure, education and public transportation, that the government's priority is right at this time?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the honourable member that it was decided 125 years ago that one of the reasons there should be a Canadian confederation was to defend our territory together.

That in my view is one of our basic responsibilities under confederation. The government equips our Armed Forces in accordance with recommendations made by professionals in that field, and this is what the government is going to do.

The honourable member may rest assured that the government will not make any decisions without consulting the experts nor without having asked all the essential questions, including details regarding this important project.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the minister had to say. It did not really address the question that I asked though. If I could ask a supplementary. This works out to $1.4 million a job. That is a pretty expensive job creation program, if you look at it that way.

I want to remind the House and this government that there is a likelihood of tens of thousands of Atlantic Canadians being out of work if the northern cod catch program is going to be shut down, as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans suggested it might have to be.

The government is looking at $45 million for those who may be unemployed because of this, $45 million for over 30,000 Canadians. That is going to be very hard to explain in Atlantic Canada. Can the minister tell this House that the government can truly afford the Sea King replacement program and at the same time afford adequate compensation for those Canadians who will be unemployed in the not too distant future in the fishing industry?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the honourable member that Canada allocates 1.8 or 1.9 per cent of its gross domestic product to defence, whereas other western countries earmark 4 per cent for this purpose, or even 6 per cent in the case of the United States. To what extent can we avoid providing for the defence of our territory and still remain an independent country?

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on the question of the submarines, the threats these helicopters are designed to meet according to all reports is a threat that has collapsed, in case the government has not noticed. It has collapsed along with the Berlin wall. It has collapsed along with the Soviet Union. It has collapsed along with the Warsaw Pact. In fact, the government is inviting Boris Yeltsin to lunch over at the Museum of Civilization next week.

Will not the government concede that the Hunt for Red October was last year's movie?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was impressed with the enumeration of various threats that had disappeared by the NDP. They ticked off a threat that had gone here and a threat that had gone there and a threat that had gone somewhere else. It was very impressive. Yet, when a real threat emerged in Iraq, the NDP did not see it.

When it came time to take a position on a real and genuine threat that existed, the NDP did not see that threat. As the minister of defence is pointing out, Canada cannot afford the kind of imprudence suggested by the NDP. We must be ready to meet legitimate threats when they occur, threats that affect the national interest of Canada or alternatively threats that affect our obligations as members of the United Nations.

When the United Nations called and asked for democracies to respond to the challenge, the NDP said no. The Liberals said: "At the first sign of gun-fire, we are calling the troops home". Well, that is not what Canada wants.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is an expert, not only on Red October but red herrings, because on the whole issue of Iraq, of course, he has missed the point.

The issue here is, first of all, the Prime Minister is saying this is a necessary purchase and then minutes later the Minister of National Defence is saying they are going to consult experts and make a decision. I think it is important for the government to be absolutely frank with the Canadian people here. Has a decision been made to proceed with this atrocious and ludicrous expenditure of public funds or has it not?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet arrived at a decision in this regard. The Minister of National Defence has not reported to his colleagues, nor has he submitted any proposal concerning the acquisition of helicopters. A proposal will be made by the minister in due time and cabinet will take it under advisement and make a decision. This is not the exact opposite of what the Prime Minister has said. The government has a national defence policy and we implement it.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that before the government makes a decision it can agree that there should be a full public discussion with the experts involved coming before a committee of this House. It finally boils down to a question of priorities.

[Translation]

How can the minister explain to hungry children in Montreal why he has decided to spend $91 million for a single helicopter and $4 billion dollars for the entire project?

[English]

How can he explain it to a battered woman seeking help in Victoria or families out of work all across Canada? Is it not the time for all parties in this House to come together to achieve a real peace dividend for Canadians as other countries are doing all around the world?

• (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if we consider the professionalism of our troops and their dedication, Canada's peace dividend for the past 20 years has been the highest of any country in the world.

The percentage of Gross National Product spent on national defence in this country was the lowest of any country in the world.

In any event, the peace dividend has been paid for the past 20 years, and you are already cashing in on the interest.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Twenty-six men have lost their lives at the bottom of the Westray coal mine. Taxpayers are going to lose millions of dollars and certain other persons will benefit handsomely as a result. Now the Government of Nova Scotia is about to flaunt the Westray coal mine.

Will the Prime Minister indicate to the House as to whether or not he is prepared to have a parliamentary inquiry into this particular matter and if not, why not?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of the letter from the House leader of the Liberal Party in respect of that. I am sure he is aware that the main issue of safety is the provincial responsibility of Nova Scotia and there is a judicial inquiry going on. I am sure he would not want us to prejudice that inquiry.

The member recognizes, as he acknowledged in his letter, that the government has been forthcoming with all of the background documents necessary for people to examine what has occurred and reach their own conclusions. I am also sure he would recognize that having another separate so-called study would not really serve any useful purpose at this time.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister who responded.

The minister knows and I know that what I am suggesting will not interfere one iota with the judicial inquiry in the province of Nova Scotia. In fact it would buttress and facilitate that process.

Week after week we have heard from the minister of state for small business who sounds like a broken record: "Don't ask me. Ask the people of Nova Scotia." He is right. There are certain answers the provincial government can give, but there are also certain answers that ministers of the federal Crown ought to give.

I ask the Prime Minister again. Is the Prime Minister not prepared now to proceed with a parliamentary inquiry to get to the bottom of a national disaster which has caused the loss of 26 lives in this country?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this House was very concerned and hurt when news of this disaster occurred.

There was an accident. We do not know at this point in time whether there was laxity in terms of safety precautions or whether in fact the regulations were appropriate or inappropriate. These are the fundamental questions that are being examined by the judicial inquiry in Nova Scotia which will ascertain and undoubtedly produce recommendations that will reduce the possibility of that kind of thing happening again.

If the member has concern about establishing the facts behind how this accident occurred, I think he would agree that the judicial inquiry going on in Nova Scotia is the proper vehicle for making that determination. We ought to await that rather than try to interfere with it.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

One month ago today, 26 miners lost their lives in the Westray disaster. One month later, we still have not received a straight answer from this government as to how it could have financed this unsafe project. What this government has done instead is to throw up road-blocks in the path of the truth. Enough is enough.

Will the Prime Minister not now agree to our call for a special parliamentary inquiry to look into its role in this tragedy?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we really do need some perspective on this. Over the last 30 years, most of it under federal Liberal governments, over a billion dollars have been poured into coal mining in Cape Breton. Tragedies have occurred there.

The hon. member is a member of Parliament from Cape Breton. He thinks that the only place where coal mining is dangerous is in fact outside of Cape Breton. The fact is that it is a dangerous occupation generally. The federal government has supported it in Cape Breton as well as elsewhere.

In answer to his question of yesterday, I hasten to tell him that last week we tabled 2,000 pages of evidence. The answer to every question he asked yesterday is in that evidence.

I ask him not to call for a parliamentary inquiry but to read what we have tabled.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Westray mine would not have opened and the lives of 26 miners would not have been lost if Clifford Frame and Curragh Resources had not received a generous deal from this government. That is the deal we want an inquiry to look into.

Canadian taxpayers now stand to lose up to $80 million as a consequence of that transaction. They want answers. Why is this government refusing to call this inquiry? What has this government got to hide?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member and his colleague from Cape Breton made these allegations about a so-called deal for Curragh Resources and perpetrated very serious misunderstandings first of all about the consulting contract.

It was true that Curragh Resources received a consulting contract of over $6.1 million. That was to be spent over a series of years and it was. It was used by a group of engineers, accountants and managers to plan the mine, to operate the mine and to put it in place.

The hon. member wanted to make this contribution look like it was just money in somebody's pocket. In fact, those were the funds used by the consulting firm to plan and operate the mine. Dozens of people were hired and worked under that contract so he is perpetrating a very serious misunderstanding when he says that it was anything other than an ordinary transaction.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it is in regard to the priorities of his government.

While attention is recently being focused on child sexual abuse in Martensville, Saskatchewan, the government's special advisor on child sexual abuse estimated that across the country some one-third of males and over one-half of females have been sexually abused at some time in their lives. He recommended new cost-sharing programs with the provinces to deal with this problem.

The government has ignored this advice and the plight of thousands of Canadian children. Instead, it has off-loaded billions of dollars in social programs and transfers to the provinces.

I ask the Prime Minister how much more evidence does his government need before it takes adequate and effective action to protect Canadian children from the horrors of sexual abuse?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the allegations regarding the sexual abuse of children in the Martensville, Saskatchewan area are absolutely reprehensible, unacceptable and devastating.

There is not one person sitting here in this House nor indeed anybody in Canada who is not absolutely taken aback and disgusted with the situation.

Children are a natural asset and one of our best resources. The interesting thing has to do with regulation and child care centres across the country are under the strict jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

We have worked toward solutions for the problems with sexual abuse. The Minister Responsible for the Status of Women with her new task force on violence against women takes in problems with senior citizens as well as children. The $136 million that we brought forth in January 1991 will go toward this area.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary deals with the need for a national child care strategy. Most experts have agreed that this is what is necessary to best protect children at risk.

The Minister of National Defence when he was talking about defence policy and the purchase of helicopters said that he was listening to his advisors and experts when it came to the purchase of helicopters.

I wonder why this government does not listen to its advisors and experts when it comes to child care. The National Council on Welfare, the government's own advisory agency, said: "Child care is an essential service for the majority of Canadian families with children. No strategy to combat child poverty can succeed without an adequate and affordable child care system." Why does the government not listen to its experts on child care?

• (1440)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the regulatory responsibility for child care is a provincial jurisdiction. It is a provincial responsibility.

I must say that the government has acted over the last few months. It ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child on December 11. Also there was the announcement by the Minister of Finance of the child benefit package on February 25, which we are taking through the House today. It will put $2.1 billion into the hands of families. It will put new money into the hands of families over the next five years. The Brighter Futures program is another $500 million.

We care about children and we are putting the money where it counts.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who is about to leave to attend the UN Conference on Environment and Development.

Yesterday in Rio the environment minister of Germany publicly committed his country to reducing carbon dioxide emissions, which are responsible for the greenhouse effect, by 25 per cent to 30 per cent by the year 2005. Yet our own government's only stated commitment is to stabilize CO2 emissions even though this country emits more carbon dioxide per capita than virtually any other country.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Will the government follow the initiative of Germany and commit to a significant reduction program of carbon dioxide emissions beyond the year 2000?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may have missed an editorial in The Financial Post this morning. The headline is "Canada is a Leader on Greenhouse Gas Issue". It indicates that Canada's commitment to sign the climate change convention at the Rio summit puts reduction in gas emissions firmly on the political agenda.

It is generally recognized that for the last number of years beginning with the Montreal protocol, Canada has played a pretty progressive role in this area. Minister Charest has indicated in Rio our intention to maintain quite an impressive record for Canada.

There are things that we can do more quickly than others. This is a very important point. We are going to try to make sure that we are in the forefront of resolving the problem.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister would know that the convention on climate change that Canada said it will sign is devoid of any timetable. It does not require the obligation of signing any firm measures. In other words, it is just generalized, vague statements with no strategy and no program attached. It is now up to individual nations to take the initiative.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again: Under his leadership, will the government initiate immediately consultations with industry, with NGOs, with other interested parties and with the provinces so that a concrete national strategy and timetable on carbon dioxide reductions can be put in place at the earliest opportunity?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would like for the convention on climate change to be viewed in the way that the green plan is for the following reasons.

I quote Mr. Tolba, the executive director of the United Nations Environmental Program who said: "Canada's green plan is a model for the whole world to study. What I really like are the goals and targets that are costed over specific periods of time. I thought the green plan was a most courageous move".

We want the same kind of thinking to go into the convention on climate change. Indeed, the Government of Canada was prepared to sign a much stronger convention on climate change. In the course of negotiations among some 175 countries, some of the provisions were diluted.

We are in the process of putting in train a program immediately post-Rio that would have the effect of building on what we will have achieved, imperfect though it is, so that some of the ideas to which the United Nations director made reference can be incorporated into the convention on climate change to give it more teeth.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

While he was perusing the editorial in The Financial Post he may have noticed the front page headline which states that Dofasco in Hamilton is about to shed another 2,250 potential jobs, added to the 937 people who last year took voluntary retirement in an industry that was supposed to be a big winner under the trade agreement.

The Prime Minister is no doubt aware that in six days the Americans are about to declare war on the Canadian steel industry. Yet yesterday his Minister for International Trade said that the Canadian government does not plan to launch its own investigation into U.S. steel even if Canadians are named in the anti-dumping investigation.

Will the Prime Minister overrule the ridiculous statement made by his Minister for International Trade yesterday and will he at least be willing to put the muscle of the government behind the fight to save the Canadian steel industry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of answering the question simply because my hon. friend asked me if, as Prime Minister, I would overrule the minister. It is not needed.

If my hon. friend will consult The Toronto Star article, she will see a faithful restatement of what the minister said in regard to this very important issue.

It is the intention of the Government of Canada, with the stakeholders and with the industry, to fight what we consider to be a pernicious side-swipe action against the interests of Canada and the Canadian steel industry. We hope to carry that fight on to victory as we have under the free trade agreement in a growing number of cases.

The free trade agreement is beginning to throw off an important number of victories for Canada. We believe that this will be another one.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, what are being thrown off are the victims of free trade who are on the scrap heap of the Canadian steel industry.

The Prime Minister met with the President of the United States weeks ago and he said that he had a direct line to Washington.

If the Prime Minister has a direct line to Washington, and if he raised the steel issue with the President of the United States, why is it that as of last week according to the chairman of the Canadian Steel Producers Association, not a single American steel firm had even been contacted by the U.S. government on this issue? Who is actually telling the truth on this one?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, there is not much I can add to the Prime Minister's very pertinent response but I would like to tell the hon. member that in this particular field, counteraction against U.S. steel companies has always been a decision for the industry to take. The Minister for International Trade has made it clear that he will support the industry and the decision it takes.

More important, when the hon. member speaks about knuckling under to the Americans, we have just been informed that we have won a chapter 18 binational panel unanimous decision just rendered an hour ago on the CAMI mortgage interest question.

This was a unanimous decision in our favour, proof once again we have equality with the United States when we have a dispute and we are winning in the free trade agreement.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As I mentioned earlier this afternoon and as the minister knows, there is a very successful training program conducted by a volunteer community organization in the town of Oromocto called the Jobstart Program.

It has been designed primarily in an employment scenario to teach the work ethic on a broad basis and to provide a basic level of general employment skills to young Canadians.

The Jobstart concept has been uniquely successful with the continuing employment record of more than 70 per cent since its inception. Although the Canada Employment Centre has continued to support Jobstart, unfortunately the nature of this unique program apparently does not meet the present criteria of a national program curriculum.

Does the minister and the department support the Jobstart concept of general skills training in an employment scenario and, if so, will he initiate measures to have the Jobstart criteria included as an eligible and continuing program in the general Canada employment training structure nationally?

• (1450)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member points to a very important aspect of the training requirements in Canada. That is why under the prosperity initiative we have included this topic for discussion by Canadians and by stakeholders in the whole economy.

As soon as these discussions are completed and we get the action plan of the steering group I hope that my department can make these programs intended for Canadian youth even more relevant.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, unemployment has nearly doubled since 1989 among youth in this country. The rate of poverty among those living alone is over 55 per cent. Drug convictions have risen by 96 per cent since 1984. Since 1984 property crime among youth has gone up 158 per cent, violent crime committed by youth by 239 per cent.

My question for the Prime Minister is this. Is it not a pretty stupid policy to be even thinking about buying more helicopters to hunt Soviet submarines in view of the real crisis in the cities of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member, if he is not familiar with national defence policy, that there are plans to purchase submarines as well as helicopters, as part of our national policy. The government has various responsibilities and one of them is national defence. Another responsibility is social policy. Yet another is economic policy. The government is responsible for allocating taxpayers' money to these various priorities. I believe Canada's defence policy is a fair response to our allies and to Canadian taxpayers.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is simply this. In view of the serious crisis among young people in this country, is it not about time that this government gave up its $5 billion helicopter fetish in favour of the kids in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the program also contains a search and rescue component, since some of these helicopters will be used for that purpose. I suppose a few years from now, the same member will accuse the government of shirking its responsibility to Canadians if it fails to acquire the necessary equipment to provide for research and rescue operations in this country.

The government cannot afford to bow to the pressures of the media. It must have a sound policy, and it does.

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Many Albertans are deeply concerned with the application of the Young Offenders Act.

Is the minister, perhaps with the Solicitor General of Canada, prepared to undertake consultations with provincial governments on the application of this act? Briefly the objective would be to have provincial governments issue clear instructions to Crown prosecutors and judges to deal with these serious crimes in a firmer manner. Would the minister be prepared to consider that kind of initiative?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right in recognizing that the implementation of the Young Offenders Act regime requires the co-operation of three levels of government. We have ongoing consultations with the provinces now with respect to further amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

As the hon. member will know, the Government of Canada prosecutes young offenders only in the territories. I have developed a prosecutor's desk book which I will be discussing with my federal prosecutors in a couple of weeks precisely to put into place the kind of guidelines that the hon. member would seek in applying the law in this area and others.

I will be pleased to review the nature of the consultations we are having with the provinces. The deputy ministers will be meeting in a couple of weeks to prepare for the federal-provincial-territorial meeting of ministers this fall and I will ensure that that subject is dealt with at those federal-provincial meetings.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the steel issue raised in the United States, the minister has said that there is a dispute settlement mechanism in place which will ultimately resolve the issue.

He knows that in the meantime Canadian steel producers will be seriously harmed by U.S. trade actions while the panel decision is awaited and the prospect is that Canadian producers will lose further market share during that time.

He knows also that under the existing agreement it pays U.S. steel producers to launch trade remedy actions even if it is likely they will lose under the dispute settlement mechanism.

Is the government taking the occasion of the negotiations of a North American free trade agreement to correct the anomalies in the free trade agreement with the United States? Is it taking the occasion of the NAFTA talks to renegotiate those anomalies in the free trade agreement?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do find it very disturbing. The hon. member admits he thinks this country could not win a dispute with the United States on the steel matter. I do not know why he is so defeatist.

Essentially what I was saying in response to the steel matter was that the Minister for International Trade will support our steel industry with regard to that dispute.

I did not say, and he has not said, that we are going to go into a chapter 18 or chapter 19 mechanism. However, he has not ruled out "initiating an anti-dumping or countervail claim".

What I was speaking about was another chapter 18 decision which was just tabled about an hour ago. It indicates that non-mortage interest is now to be included in the CAMI instance and it will have a very good influence on the upcoming Honda decision. All of this is positive proof that the free trade dispute settlement mechanism is working and the over-all agreement is working.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, that was not what I was asking. I was not asking about an automobile dispute resolution; I was asking about the steel issue. Let me try it once more.

Back in 1988 the Prime Minister said that his highest priority in the trade agreement was to end "the threat from U.S. protectionists who harass and restrict our imports through the misuse of trade remedy law".

Point of Order

If anything exemplifies the misuse of trade remedy law it is the threatened U.S. action against steel exports. We are not talking about CAMI. We are not talking about Suzuki. We are talking about steel exports. Yet there is nothing in the existing free trade agreement which prevents this kind of protectionist harassment.

I take it from the minister's answer that that is the reason he does not foresee the government will go to the binational panel. What then is the government proposing to do in the case of the steel issue? It says it is not going to the binational. It has no policy on how to support the Canadian industry and does it not acknowledge there are serious—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this is the strangest line of questioning. The hon. member stood up and said in a defeatist tone that we could never win a chapter 18 or chapter 19 dispute with the U.S. on steel. That is what he begins with, and then he asks us to do it anyway, or asks us not to do it anyway. What is the hon. member asking for anyway?

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his budget last February the minister bragged that the communications budget was to be reduced by some $75 million this year. Canadians now find out that the TV ad budget alone for the first six months of this year will be $24 million.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why is it there is no money for training, no money for youth, no money for Court Challenges, but all kinds of dough when it comes to rewarding Tory advertising companies?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely shocked to hear that the advertising budget for the first six months is only $24 million. That is one-third of what was spent in a full year when the Liberals were in power. That is one of the lowest ones we have had in the last eight or ten years.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, too bad the minister was not listening. That was the cost of the TV ads alone, not the advertising budget. The TV ads were referred to as "an electronic monument" by a government official. It is a monument all right, a monument to Tory waste and patronage.

• (1500)

[Translation]

I wish the minister would tell us when the government will stop its futile exercise in patronage and propaganda and finally put its money where it is needed, by helping young unemployed Canadians and training the Canadian labour force, not by rewarding Conservatives.

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Once again, Mr. Speaker, we are struck with a gale of wind on this side of the House from across the way. Advertising has been a part of government activities for a long time. I even remember when the government used to fly geese across the screen and put out millions and millions of dollars. Remember? That was the Liberal Party that was doing it then.

If you have any accusations, make them; other than that, it is good government.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some two weeks ago the Minister of Supply and Services promised in this House—actually it was on May 11—to table documents in relation to another answer. On page 10516 of Hansard he promised to give details about government contracts. He said, and I quote:

> I will put it together and have it tabled.

He gave that commitment to the House. I want to know if the documents have been tabled and, if so, when.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was prepared to do his homework he would have found out that that will be tabled on Monday.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret that I did not bring this matter to the attention of the House sooner, but in our gallery today is Miss Chu Chen, celebrated human rights activist and member of the National Assembly of Taiwan.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

This government's record in support of Canada's children and Canadian families is abominable. While extolling family values, the Conservatives have dramatically and repeatedly cut family benefits since they were first elected in 1984.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It is agreed on both sides of the House that people who watch our debate should also be able to listen.

Ms. Mitchell: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is difficult to be heard.

I would like to review the various steps that this government has taken in eroding family programs, particularly programs for children.

First of all, when first elected, you will recall, it killed the child tax exemption, an exemption which was an income tax deduction of $710 for those taxpayers who had children under the age of 18.

This change in the tax policy penalized middle–class families particularly. It was unfair to those families because those are the families who did not get the child tax credit. It also meant that taxpayers who did not have children were in effect paying the same amount of tax that those families paid who had very high child rearing costs. I ask, was this fair? I do not think it was.

The second step was that the government introduced the child tax credit. Of course, as it is wont to do, it said this was a way to transfer benefits to those most in need. We heard that theme again today. It is a theme we have to watch out for because if you look underneath that rationale, what it is saying is: "We are going to take money out of general funds and give just a little bit of token money back to the very poorest people so we can say we are do–gooders".

Only a part of the savings from the child tax exemption, which as I said really penalized middle–class families, went to the new child tax credit which was directed to poorer families, and it was not all that much money either.

During its first term the government also began its policy of partial deindexation. This has proven to be a very insidious, secret way of reducing the value of family benefits and also, I might say, of old age pensions. It applied this vote to the family allowance and the child tax credit. Over the years this means that the child tax credit will go down in value each year. By the year 2000 these credits will be quite insignificant in terms of that they can buy for a child or a family.

The third Conservative government anti–family policy was to destroy Canada's basic universal social program for families. Of course, I am referring to its action which in this bill will take away the universal family allowance program. First it did it by stealth and now in Bill C–80 it is having the final execution of family allowances, the final termination.

Canada's family allowance program has been a progressive social program that made us proud to be Canadians. It was recognized the world over as a very progressive kind of family program. It treated all children equally and it really recognized the importance of children to all Canadians, whether we had children or not. It recognized that as a society we had a social responsibility to help care for the next generation.

My party I am proud to say pioneered this family allowance program. We felt very strongly that the family allowance originally should have been higher and would have been a very good way to compensate families who had children.

The family allowance went to all children. We know also that this is the only program where the cheque when it existed went to the mother. It was often the only cheque that many women received in their own name. In 1986, when the government tried to deindex and tax back the family allowance, we put up a big fight in this House. It was very, very difficult. I will be frank about that. Children, unfortunately, do not vote. Therefore, children do not count in the political scheme of things with this government.

When the old age pensioners came to Parliament Hill and objected to deindexing and were worried that there was a threat of universal programs being removed, in particular the old age pension, they fought very hard and won their point of view. It will be recalled that at that time the Prime Minister said, and he repeated it later, that universal programs are a sacred trust and his government would never affect universal programs. Unfortunately, as I said, children were the victims and he betrayed our families once again.

The government introduced the budget this year and Bill C-80 which we are debating today. It will terminate altogether Canada's wonderful family allowance program. It was not quite so wonderful this past few years because the government was taxing it back. We felt that also was an unfair measure because again families with children were being penalized, whereas those families without children were not treated in the same way.

Once again the government used the same rationale and would not admit it was doing this partly because of the deficit and partly because of its philosophy which is definitely against universality. It said once again: "Oh, never mind. We are just doing this so that we can put the money in for the poor, for those who need the most benefits".

• (1510)

I want to say that we certainly do not object to special child benefits that are targeted to low income families. They are always welcome and always needed. But I want to say that we object very strenuously to the termination of the universal family allowance program which was there for all of Canada's children and was a basic, solid social benefit as part of our social security system in Canada.

The new child tax benefit which is also proposed in this bill provides $1,020 per child for families earning under $25,921. It offers an extra incentive for parents who are working. This supposedly is to encourage people to go off welfare and seek work. It is rather a patronizing point, but it is also extremely impractical.

The government, for example, fails to say how these parents who have been unemployed, not through choice but because they could not find work or could not find work that would bring in enough money to feed their families, are going to find jobs. Also, how can these people even begin looking for work when no child care is available? This is the very government that has, over and over again, promised a national child care program and now refuses to do anything about it. It completely abrogates its responsibility.

Doing away with the family allowance means that all children of Canada, both now and in the future if we think to the years ahead, have lost a precious family allowance program, a universal program that the Prime Minister himself said was a sacred trust. So much for the word of our Prime Minister.

Conservatives also refuse to recognize that today the situation in most families, if it is a two-parent family, requires that both parents work. The number of single-parent families in Canada has greatly increased. This government refuses to acknowledge that there is a tragic lack of licensed day care homes or day care programs for young children. This means that many children are at risk. Many are in inadequate babysitting arrangements and many have no care at all. We know that latch-key children are still coming home from school to empty homes.

In both 1984 and 1988 the Prime Minister in his election campaigns promised faithfully—I can just see that solemn expression on his face—that he would bring in a national child care program for Canadian families.

He acknowledged to the women of Canada in particular that this was a priority need and a priority of his government. However, once elected of course each time the promise was broken and this was the lowest priority.

We now hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the government will do nothing, it is not important, it is not needed and we are not going to ever have a child care program under this government. That is why of course we must change this government and change it to a party that has a long record of supporting universal, non-profit quality child care.

Mr. Milliken: The Liberal Party.

Ms. Mitchell: The Liberal Party unfortunately, my friend, does not propose that.

Most working families will have to continue to use unreliable babysitting arrangements. Let us look at those who have higher incomes and who are paying taxes. What happens to them? Of course they are the ones that government recognizes and will give special advantages to so that they can hire nannies. The wealthier families now have had the child care expense deduction doubled twice. It is now up to $4,000 to $5,000 that can be deducted from their taxes for any of their child care expenses for children under seven and between $2,000 and $3,000 for children a little bit older, under 14 years of age.

In contrast of course many single parent men and women have little choice when they have young children but to go on welfare because there simply are not the adequate reliable child care services available. If they are available, they are not affordable. The fees are far too high.

What does this government provide to parents that stay at home? We understand there is a new—maybe it is not so new—family caucus now that is reinventing the traditional old family values. They are fine and were fine in our parents' time but do not really recognize the real situation of families in this country today and the great diversity of family groupings as well.

The government did make a token gesture for a parent that stays home to care for children. This is extremely important work that should be highly valued. What do they get? They get a token $213 a year for children under seven. I say it is a gross insult.

Millions were spent on two child care reports, first the K. D. Cooke report and then the all-party child care task force under the Minister of State for Transport. Both of these reports documented the very urgent need for adequate quality care for children.

We travelled this country many times and heard from so many groups the stories of what was happening to kids and the tremendous stress on families, particularly in the poorest provinces of Canada.

We recommended specific suggestions for a comprehensive national child care program. It was not as rich as I would have liked, but it was a lot better than what we have now. I see the former minister is in the House today. He took a long time to look at these suggestions and eventually he came up with some very modified proposals. Even those have been refused by this government.

Community groups across this country which are experts on child care have continued to advocate that we simply must get on with a program for Canada's children. This week the National Action Committee on the Status of Women made this one of its priorities.

I would like to go back to one of the main points of focus of Bill C-80 which is to establish the new child tax benefit. When it was proposed in the 1992 budget, it was said that this tax would be simpler, fairer and more generous. It is none of these. The child benefit is supposed to help low income families escape from poverty by providing a child benefit which will supplement the minimum wages if they should go off welfare and find a job that pays minimum wages.

How can this goal be achieved when there are no child care services available so a parent can start looking for work or perhaps get into training programs? We know the Canadian Jobs Strategy program has been cut by $100 million. How can this goal be achieved when parents on welfare really cannot find a job?

There are very few jobs around and most of those only pay minimum wages which gives the parents practically no advantage over their present situation. I do not have to say how much it costs to raise children today.

The child benefit is based on what I would call an 18th century philosophy of welfare, which is of course the typical Tory philosophy on social welfare programs generally. It establishes two classes of the poor.

First of all, we have the working poor. They are the deserving poor. They are the poor who will get an extra $500 for their children if they go out to work. Then there are those who are on welfare. They are the second class poor. They are the poorest of the poor. There is no recognition at all of what their real needs are or why they may have no alternative but to be on welfare or why they are caught in the welfare trap which will go on from generation to generation because of inadequate social programs and few alternatives.

At the same time that this government is taking the family allowance away in this bill, we have to remember it is also taking away from low income families co-op housing programs which are desperately needed to have an affordable quality shelter for Canadians. It has terminated federal transfer payments to provinces for health care, for post-secondary education and for social services under the Canada Assistance Plan, which has been cut for three provinces. One million dollars was cut from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. All these moves will contribute to the poverty, the hardship and stress on children and youth in this country.

The Conservative philosophy of partially deindexing social programs, which incidentally has already reduced increases in old age pensions, also applies to these child benefits. It means the value of benefits will go down each succeeding year. Deindexing is a secretive Tory plot to gradually reduce the value of benefits. By the year 2000 many of these benefits will be practically out of existence or they will have very little value.

As New Democrats, we would have a very different approach. My time is almost up so I do not have time to outline this in detail. We believe that the first thing we must do to counteract poverty is to make every effort to create jobs. Full employment should be a major priority of government.

This means we must have government intervention. We must have government leadership. We cannot tie unemployment to the rate of inflation and interest rates and allow the unemployed to be the victims of a reverse economic situation. It means that we must have not only jobs but we must have jobs with decent rates of pay and pay equity. Along with that must be quality, affordable child care, non-profit child care. This is the best antidote to poverty and to chronic welfare dependency.

We must maintain our universal social programs. We must reinstate family allowances so that children of all families will be recognized and so all of us who pay taxes will be contributing to the next generation. After all, these are the children who will be paying the old age pensions for their parents as they get older.

Children must have the care, love and opportunities to grow and develop in health. Children may not vote, I tell the Conservatives, but they must not be ignored. Canada must eradicate child poverty by the year 2000. This is not going to be done with platitudes and words. Jobs, decent family incomes and quality child care are the pillars to a better future for this and future generations of Canadian children.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some care to the hon. member for Vancouver East and in particular when she mentioned that her party was in favour of increasing family allowances. I wonder if by that she means they would increase them right across the board, for people earning above $70,000 a year as well as for those earning less. If so, I wonder how much she would increase them.

There is only so much money available in any pot and particularly the present pot. If she was not thinking of increasing them across the board, would she have increased them more for lower income people than for higher income people? If she did that, her party would have arranged a system of graduated benefits, not that much unlike what we have.

I was also a little confused by the comment that one of the reasons she deplores the family allowance having been eliminated and replaced with this very progressive system was that under the family allowance the money was paid to the mother. Does she not recognize that under this new system there is a much more significant transfer of money within families to usually the mother, the responsible adult under the family allowance system, because the new proposed payment will also be paid through the existing family allowance system.

Would she not celebrate that move because it is a very significant transfer of the refundable child tax credit to mothers usually from the father in the family?

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for allowing me to elaborate on those two points. If he looks back at the "blues" he will see that when I mentioned it we had been—it was in the past tense—in favour, or would have liked to have seen family allowances raised. I was talking actually in past history terms.

It was Stanley Knowles who was one of the earliest activists and advocates for family allowances. Initially we saw this in those times and that is what I was referring to as being one way that you could share the burden, if you like, or the cost of raising Canada's children.

I do not happen to have children but I feel very strongly that I would like to contribute through the tax system to the raising of all—I cannot afford all—of Canada's children but certainly we should be contributing just as much as parents who are paying for their own children. That, I think, is a social responsibility. I was referring to that really in conceptual terms.

Over the last two platforms that we have had, we realized it was not possible at this time to raise family allowances. We have always said that any universal program is balanced out a bit through our tax system because those who pay more taxes, and the same goes for the old age pension, get the universal payment but they are taxed more for it.

I think the other point had to do with the cheques going to the mother. I know there were many women who spoke to this point a few years ago when we had hearings on child and family benefits. In a way I thought it was a bit sexist because there are many fathers who are also the main parenting person in families.

Perhaps we should not necessarily hold to that virtue. There is one thing I do agree with in the proposal for the present family benefit proposed under this bill and it is that it is monthly payments. I think that is a sound way because people have to pay the rent every month and they have to feed their kids. Waiting until the end of the year does not solve that problem.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-80 which proposes to merge the family allowance program, the refundable child tax credit, and non-refundable dependant child credit into the new child tax benefit program and the children's special allowances program.

As members will recall, the proposed child tax benefit program was announced by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, in his February 25 budget speech.

There is no doubt that benefit programs for children and their families touch all of us in one way or another. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare said when introducing Brighter Futures a call to action on behalf of Canada's children: "We can only build a brighter future for Canada by cherishing all our children".

I am very pleased that these two ministers and colleagues of mine have recently taken the type of actions they have, not only in developing this program but in developing other programs that support and benefit children.

These two ministers have been especially cognizant of the needs of families and they have listened very carefully to their colleagues in caucus. All of us appreciate very much the way they work with us to bring these changes about, particularly the ones we are talking about today.

In assessing the importance of this legislation I believe it would be useful to take a few minutes to look at what has gone before, to reflect on the evolution of federal child benefit programs, which began modestly after the First World War and took a considerable step forward with the family allowances program in the 1940s.

We will see a logical progression which brings us to the new child tax benefit program.

The concept of a family benefit related to children goes back as far as 1918 when an amendment to the Income War Tax Act introduced the child tax exemption of $200 for each child under the age of 16.

The importance of this step lies in the fact that it recognized in principle the income needs of families with children.

• (1530)

In 1927 the child tax exemption was increased to $500 and extended to all children under 21. It was also at this time that the equivalent to married exemption was introduced.

These tax measures related to children continued to evolve in the twenties and thirties and were converted to tax credits in the early forties. At the same time the idea of family allowance began to surface. It was first raised in this House in February 1929 when a member made a motion to the effect that: "The question of granting family allowances should be studied".

The House of Commons select standing committee did consider the question of family allowances in 1929. Unfortunately the Depression of the 1930s, followed by World War II, postponed further consideration of such a scheme until the early 1940s when it was studied by the House of Commons reconstruction committee.

The work of the committee was guided by a policy which fell into three broad divisions: demobilisation and re-establishment, economic and employment aspects, and human well-being and health. The notion of a family allowance was seen to relate to all three of these areas. It would provide cash regularly to families who needed it most, creating a continuous demand for basic necessities which would encourage production and steady employment.

The federal government also began to think about a long-term social security plan for the country. This had been spurred on to some extent by the release in November 1942 of a report to the British Parliament by Sir William Beveridge titled Social Insurance and Allied Services. The Beveridge report proposed, among other things, a children's allowance to counter what its author saw as the failure of the wage system to take account of family size.

In December 1942 the Canadian ministers of pensions and health asked Dr. Leonard Marsh to develop a plan on social security. Dr. Marsh's Report on Social Security for Canada, popularly known as the Marsh report, was presented to this House in March 1943. Dr. Marsh believed that one of the major causes of poverty was the fact that wage earners with large families had insufficient earnings and that since wages took no account of family size the state had a legitimate role to play in adjusting disposable income to reflect family size.

We must remember that there were few social welfare programs in Canada in 1943. Assistance for needy families most often came from churches and private organizations. Although all provinces had introduced mother's allowances programs for women and children who were alone and in need these programs were so restrictive that they often excluded the very people that they were supposed to help.

Over all, the payment of a benefit on behalf of children was seen as an investment in the future of the country and particularly in the country's most valuable asset, its children.

The government announced its intention to introduce a family allowance in the Speech from the Throne in January 1944:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

Although the family allowance program was payable to all families with children regardless of income its main focus was to improve equity by assisting children in lower income families. This is clear in the statement made by the Prime Minister of the day in introducing the bill to Parliament. He said:

> The adoption of family allowances means the recognition of the right of children of poor parents to what is already recognized as the right of children whose parents are in more fortunate circumstances—
> Already this Parliament has recognized that, with respect to families, there is an obligation upon the state to assist in the upbringing of children. This has been done in the interests of the parents and the family itself, but more particularly in the interests of the children. But, up to the present time, that obligation has been recognized only with respect to the more fortunate in our country, those who already have an income large enough to be taxable to entitle them to exemptions according to the number of children in the family. In other words, where the need has been least it has already been recognized. The purpose of this bill is to recognize a similar obligation where the need is obviously greater than it is in the other cases.

It is interesting to note that although the debate was lengthy, and a look through the Hansards of the day indicates that it was also rather spirited, when the vote was finally taken there was not a single dissenting voice. Thus, in 1945 Canada had established a program by which the federal government could provide a supplement to family income. This was seen as a necessary and positive step forward in spreading the cost of raising children more equitably over the whole population.

Furthermore, this new benefit was intended to help equalize opportunity for all children insofar as the state was justified and obligated to do so.

The family allowance was established as a universal program. It was believed that providing the allowance to all children was the simplest and cheapest way of providing a supplementary family income. However, there was to be no duplication with the child tax credit. Therefore, higher income families who were eligible for the child tax credit would return some or all of the allowance at tax time.

At the same time, the family allowance provided a measure of equity to families whose incomes were below the tax paying level and therefore did not benefit from the tax exemption for children. In essence, we had a system of tax credits for dependants that gave equivalent benefits to all income classes, supplemented by family allowances which were income tested through the tax system.

However, the system that was required to adjust the family allowances to the income tax allowances for children proved to be unreasonably cumbersome for everyone—taxpayers, employers and tax administrators alike—in an era when computers were still the stuff of science fiction. Therefore, the tax on family allowances was repealed in 1947, tax credits were abandoned, and tax exemptions were reinstituted.

Over the years, further changes were made to the tax system with respect to families with children. In 1972 the child care expense deduction was introduced, recognizing the child care costs incurred by working parents. However, the Family Allowances Act was not changed significantly until 1973.

Interest in a new direction and emphasis for the income security system in the late 1960s and early 1970s resulted from a growing dissatisfaction with what was seen as a large and costly social security system co-existing with a disturbing incidence of poverty. A number of studies revealed a high degree of inequality in the distribution of income.

For example, the Senate committee's 1971 report, Poverty in Canada, emphasized the plight of the working poor who it said numbered close to two million in 1967. The report denounced the existing social security system for not providing more assistance to, and I quote, "that vast army in the labour force whose income is grossly insufficient".

Thus, on second reading of the 1973 bill on family allowances, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare said:

> The original family allowances program was introduced for the purpose of giving a maximum measure of income support to families to help ease the financial burden of bringing up children and to provide a measure of equal opportunity for children regardless of a family's economic situation. The objective of the new family allowance program is to provide a supplement to the income of Canadian families in such a way that those with the greatest need will receive the greatest benefit.

This approach provided the direction for subsequent child benefit measures adopted during the 1970s and 1980s and the greater focusing of efforts and benefits on low income families. I believe it is important to take note of the fact that while the new Family Allowances Act of 1973 maintained the broad concept of universality the selectivity of taxing the benefit was fully supported by this House.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare of the day acknowledged that the new program was designed to provide greater benefits to families with the lowest income. He said:

> By taxing family allowances we will bring about a substantial degree of selectivity in the amount of the benefit because a large part of the allowance will remain in the hands of those who need it most—the lower income families who do not earn sufficient income to pay taxes or who earn just enough to be taxed at the lowest marginal tax rate. On the other hand, families in the higher income tax brackets will receive a benefit that progressively reduces as income rises.

Child benefits were again restructured in 1978 in response to the concern that there continued to be a disproportionate benefit to higher income families. For example, tax exemptions and deductions were of little or no value to low income families, many of whom had no taxable income.

• (1540)

To address this concern a new child tax benefit, the refundable child tax credit, was introduced and the level of family allowance benefits was reduced. The child tax credit program was designed primarily to provide assistance to low and modest income families. It provided a maximum benefit of $200 per child per year and the benefit was reduced for families with income above $18,000.

During the 1980s a number of measures were taken to better target benefits to lower income families who needed them most. For example, the child tax credit was increased in 1982, 1987, 1989 and again in 1990, bringing it to a total of $559.

In November 1986 the government began prepaying two-thirds of the child tax credit to lower income families. In 1990 an additional $200 supplement was provided for children under seven years whose parents were not claiming the child care expense deduction. The limit on this deduction was raised by $4,000 for children six years and under and for children with special needs.

I think my hon. colleagues will agree that we can see a certain progression in the development of children's benefits in this country. When the family allowance program was introduced in 1945 it was done in recognition of the need to provide equality of opportunity to all Canadian children. It was introduced at a time when families were expected to deal personally with almost every contingency, no matter how serious.

If assistance was required in desperate circumstances it was expected that relatives, friends, neighbours, the community and the church would provide it. It was only after all these avenues had been explored and exhausted that a family received carefully rationed public charity, which incidentally was rarely in the form of cash.

The introduction in 1945 of family allowances, together with the unemployment insurance program, marked the beginning of the planning of a comprehensive social security system in Canada. With the creation of this new family benefit the state recognized and accepted its role and responsibility in sharing more equitably across the whole Canadian community the cost of raising our children.

We must continue today not only to share this responsibility but to ensure that those most in need receive the most assistance. This is the direction in which child benefit programs have been moving in Canada, and the proposed child tax benefit is a major step along this path.

The new child benefit addresses the changing circumstances of Canadian families in several ways. It simplifies the present patchwork of programs and benefits. Mr. Speaker, if you were following the long list of complicated plans we have in the present tax system you would agree that simplification should be a major goal of this government in every part of its endeavours.

The new benefit provides a supplement to the earnings of low income working families and it provides a greater responsiveness to individual family situations.

The key element of this program that makes it so different from all other programs we have had is that it is the first time in Canada that a social support program is delivered through the tax system according to income and is universally available to everyone. I admit that not everyone gets it every year, but it is available without application simply by filing an income tax form.

I would also like to add that a number of speakers on this bill have suggested that families with incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 will receive an increase of only $4 a month or $50 a year. These comments are misleading. Under the proposed child tax benefit families with incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 will receive an average increase of $250 a year in child benefits. This is five times more than the increase suggested by some members.

Under the child tax benefit a typical two-parent family with one child and a total income of $40,000 will receive an additional $300 a year in benefits. A single parent in the same situation will receive an additional $400 a year.

The child tax benefit will increase assistance to children by $2.1 billion over the next five years and about 80 per cent of this increase will go to families with incomes below $40,000. The proposed child tax benefit builds on Canada's social policy tradition. As a matter of fact, I believe that it is founded on values and principles very similar to those articulated when family allowances were first introduced in the forties. Such fundamental values and principles are the recognition of the interdependence of Canadians, commitment by the state to help families in the care and nurturing of their children, recognition of children as the future of Canada, the need to assure Canadian children of greater equality of opportunity.

I have no doubt that all members of this House will, upon reflection, agree that this is the only reasonable and just direction to take.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague for a rather comprehensive and in-depth address with respect to this bill and its background.

My concern is as follows. Yesterday I addressed Bill C-78, the omnibus bill that dealt with disabilities. While I was pleased to say publicly that there were pluses with respect to that bill, for example in the area of elections it will now be easier for people with disabilities to participate, there were also minuses, for example the direction to the CRTC with respect to closed captions was not clear and was not precise and had no timetables. I raised a more fundamental question. If you look at that bill again, I want to draw a comparison of Bill C-78, and the pluses that it brought forward in relation to what has occurred in that whole area. If we look at housing, for example, it has been seriously affected by the government's last budget, as well as a number of other areas. Are there really over-all pluses?

My question would be very similar with respect to Bill C-80. If we look at the pluses, there are some obviously. We had a family allowances program, we had a non-refundable tax credit as well and we had income tax deductions for certain child care. While we have retained the latter in this new legislation, my understanding is that we now have collapsed it. We have made it a bit simpler, if you wish, in that there is a program that replaces the other.

I applaud that because it is complex out there, not knowing exactly what you are going to be getting. I know that it will be paid monthly and that is going to be helpful. If we look at the last five, six, seven or eight years and the reductions in transfers to programs that affect children, and I am not even talking about the reductions in transfers for health and education or the caps on social assistance to provinces such as Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, if we look at it over all, if we control for inflation as well, my understanding is that there is not an over-all gain for the children of Canada.

If I am wrong, I would very much like to be corrected. I wonder if my colleague could answer that question.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the hon. member's question. I have a considerable difficulty with it, considering the role that his party when it was in government played in bankrupting this country. When we were as a caucus committee working to develop this program to find ways of making the government's contribution to families more effective and so on, we were extremely limited.

The first instruction we had from our hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, was that we should do this without any additional money. Later on, when he brought the program forward, he was able to sweeten it with some $400 million, not by any means as much as we would have liked to have seen in terms of redirecting funds to families in need.

My hon. friend talks about our having to hold the line. Our government has for over seven years now held its expenditures below the rate of inflation, year after year after year. When his party was in government, over a 10-year period I believe the rate of spending went up an average of 14 per cent a year to the point where we were $200 billion in debt.

• (1550)

Now he is trying to suggest that when we are trying in a very constructive and careful way to make things a little better for families, because throughout the system we have had to tighten up in so many different places that somehow there is not a positive benefit. Certainly since our party formed the government in 1984 there has been no benefit to Canada of having been saddled with what was a $200 billion debt and from interest, additional loan has increased to well over $400 million now, despite the fact that our government has managed to improve the operating accounts so that there is now a surplus of some $12 billion a year as opposed to the $16 billion of operating deficit they were running under when they formed the government.

For him to be trying now to discredit this very positive action by relating to the stress that our country has been in in trying to cope with the debt and the size of the deficit that his party left us with I think is inappropriate in the extreme.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to be supportive. I am sorry that my colleague may have misunderstood my remarks. In fact I was trying to be sensible and sensitive and as supportive as I could be under the circumstances.

My colleague did not answer the question as to whether or not if one looks at the advances that have been made here, and I noted some of them, there is over all more money if one controls inflation and other factors if one goes back seven years. He simply did not answer the question.

I am rather disillusioned that my colleague should use facts that are inaccurate. I would have thought that coming from government, he would have access to the information.

I have a letter from the then Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, indicating that the deficit at the end of fiscal 1984, and they came into power on September 4, 1984, was less than $168 billion. Now either the member knew what in the world he was talking about or he did not. I have that written document. I would like to point out that $168 billion is less than $200 billion.

If they are trying to suggest that they would have been more generous if the Liberals had done a better job is just not good enough. That was not what the issue was. He is trying to make political hay out of this. If he wants a political debate, I would be delighted to have a political debate on this or any other issue.

Is there more money now over all if one looks at the last seven years as a result of these changes? Yes or no?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty straightforward question, and I would like an answer. I do not want to know the total deficit or debt before 1984. If he wants to use those figures, then he should at least make sure they are accurate.

[English]

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I would not argue with the member as to what the debt was when his party left power or what it was not. When expenditures are increasing at the rampant rate of 14 per cent a year, it takes some energy and will on the part of any government to turn it around and bring it under control and certainly to drop it below the rate of inflation, which is what we did.

He asked the question as to whether or not there is more money or less money. In my own personal circumstances I would say that considering the increases in taxes that we have had to bring in and the cuts in expenditures, I have the gut feeling that I am less well off today than I was in 1984. I do not think there are many people in Canada who would disagree with that. How that is distributed certainly has a very severe effect on the family. That is why we brought this program in to try and make things better for families, particularly families with children.

I think that the real issue here is that we are focusing our efforts on improving the lot of children. I think that he and other members should applaud that in what are in fact very difficult circumstances due, in my view, entirely to the legacy of debt which his party left us.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

Yes, it is, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act and at the same time to repeal the Family Allowances Act as though the child is not part of the family, as though child poverty is not the consequence of family poverty.

Indeed Bill C–80 is an incredible act of sleight of hand. It is dishonest and mocks Canadians, especially the neediest Canadians.

The government is spending $500,000 to say this government package is simpler, fairer, more generous and more responsive. In fact many needy Canadian families will not see any increase in benefits at all.

This bill sells us something that was ours to begin with. It sells us child benefits and convinces Canadians they are getting a bargain. It pits the working poor against the poor who cannot find jobs. It pits child care against child poverty, oblivious to the fact that lack of adequate child care breeds child poverty. The government, through this bill, has turned its back on universality, a principle woven throughout our social assistance system to ensure there is no stigma attached to it, to ensure there is continuing universal support for it.

Since 1986 the Mulroney government has stealthily eroded the value of the family allowance by refusing to index it to inflation. The allowance lost ground and will continue to lose ground through the new child benefit package. These benefits will only be indexed for inflation over 3 per cent.

When the increase in the cost of living is lower then 3 per cent they lose benefits, getting no increase in family allowance. When inflation is higher than 3 per cent they will only receive the amount over 3 per cent. In times of inflation, high or low, they are clearly the least able to cope. Canadian poor are at the mercy of inflation.

The government adds another insult. It claims the benefit package is worth $400 million a year or $2.5 billion in five years to Canadian poor. Yet in the past seven years—and the figures speak very clearly—over $3.5 billion have been stripped from social programs by this federal government.

One of the best analyses of the dishonesty of the federal government's package comes from The Catalyst, a publication of citizens for public justice. It states in its April 1992 issue:

> Under the current system the poorest Canadian families, those families receiving social assistance or unemployment insurance payments will not receive an increase in their benefits. Under the current system, these families receive annual family allowance payments of $419 per child, and a refundable tax credit of $601, for a total of $1,020 per child.
>
> The new child tax credit will give them $1,020 per child, exactly the same benefit as the current system. The only additional funds are in the form of an earned income supplement for families who are employed and earn more than $3,750 annually. For every $100 earned over $3,750, these families will receive an additional $8, up to a yearly maximum of $500. Once annual earnings reach more than $20,921, the earnings supplement will be decreased and will disappear completely at the point where annual income is $25,921 or more.

• (1600)

Obviously this scheme does not give benefits to those families receiving social assistance or dependent only on unemployment insurance payments. What a sleight of hand.

The new package gives $1,300 less per year for the average family than if this federal government had not whittled away the existing programs over the last seven years.

I submit the proposed child benefit package is not a bargain. The money it gives back to Canadians is essentially the same money the government has hoarded by hidden cuts since coming to power.

Through this package the government only provides a conveniently timed, camouflaged surge of benefits, no doubt to be eroded again immediately after it has served its electoral purpose.

The Mulroney government has proposed a new plan that looks good on the surface, just in time the government hopes, to dupe many families into re-electing the very people who have cut back their family support consistently over the last seven years.

The government has spent thousands, up to half a million, to advertise the child benefit package, making a key claim that the new plan is responsive. It will include immediate changes of benefits for the birth of a new child or other changes in family status. While this is commendable, it will not respond however to reflect the rising cost of living when under 3 per cent.

And not only is the amount of the benefit not fully indexed to inflation, the threshold income above which no benefits will apply is equally as unresponsive. Not only will the amount of support available to families decline constantly from the time the plan is instituted, but the number of families eligible for it will too. The new plan also does not take into account tragedies like job loss in the middle of a year.

The lack of indexation of the new benefit package shows that the government has ignored one of the key recommendations of the December 1991 report of the House of Commons subcommittee on child poverty.

The majority of membership in this subcommittee, I should remind the government, came from its own side. Thus the government ignored even its own members. I wonder how these government members of the subcommittee, including its Chair, will finally vote on this bill.

The government also flouted a second key concern of the subcommittee, that the regressive child care expenses deduction be replaced by a more responsive credit which would actually benefit all needy families working or unable to find work.

The subcommittee proposed that the child care expense deduction be replaced by a refundable tax credit of 50 per cent of child care expenses, which should be payable in advance. But for those unable to put out that money in the hopes of a tax deduction a year later, there is no improvement. The approach recommended by the subcommittee would help the needy, the needier and the neediest.

The proposed new system is commendable—and I give credit where credit is due—in its component that provides income supplements for work related expenses. However, let us not forget that there are over two million Canadians who cannot find jobs. Many of them live below the poverty line.

The government has given more to those who have something but neglects to pull out of poverty those who are most deeply embedded in it.

This raises the question, naturally, of the government's aims in this new child benefit package. Is the government's concern the welfare of children, the support of parents, or the redressing of poverty problems resulting from failures of its social programs, or the ideological elimination of universality of the family allowance program?

Shall I remind the government that the family allowance program stemmed from a shared Canadian conviction "that parents with children should pay less tax and should receive greater benefits than taxpayers without children, precisely because of the service they in the future render to society as responsible citizens and workers"?

The universal family allowance program already assures the most benefit will go to those most in need of it because it is taxable. In addition, it allows mothers a regular cheque which, for some women, is the only cheque they will receive during their lifetime.

If poor children are the true focus of this proposed program then why has this government failed to adopt a comprehensive plan of action to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000 as earlier resolved in this Chamber, in this House of Commons?

To sum up, Bill C-80 admittedly is simpler. But is it more fair? No. More generous? No. More responsive? Again, no. This bill fails the test of fairness, generosity and responsiveness. It is at best a half measure.

May I give this government a prescription. If it truly aims to be fair, generous and responsive, the government should amend this legislation to index benefits fully to the cost of living, to include an increase in benefits for families on social assistance and unemployment insurance, to convert the child care expense deduction into a tax credit and at the same time retain the universality of the family allowance program.

Our nation's children deserve more than half measures. They do not deserve this sleight of hand. They are innocent and honest, wanting only to grow up safe and secure. Canada's children, the future of our nation, deserve our full commitment.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his very strong and comprehensive address on this particular question. He is obviously very knowledgeable.

I want to raise three questions if I might. I have some notes here and I want to make sure they are accurate. I am sure that my assistant who prepared them for me would like to have that assurance as well.

The notes read as follows: "The government claims that child benefits will increase by $2.1 billion over the next five years". Then there is an addendum: "It is estimated that the government slashed child benefits by $3.5 billion between 1986 and 1991".

My first question is: Are those the correct ballpark figures? If they are, they answer the question that my hon. colleague just a few minutes ago refused to answer by attempting to become rather political.

The other question I want to be absolutely certain about, because it seems rather contradictory to me, is it would appear that the program totally ignores the poorest children, those whose families earn less than $3,750 a year. I just cannot understand what the rationale for that would be.

The third point is that the government always—and lately more frequently—talks about controlling expenditures. My own thesis is that that those expenditures are controlled as a result of serious off-loading to the provinces. It simply transfers fewer funds for health, education and social assistance. Therefore, yes, the government controls its expenditures but it turns them over to someone else. It is as if I were to give my debt away this afternoon and all of a sudden stand up and say: "I am debt-free" or "I have less debt than you have".

I wonder if my colleague would make a comment on that as well.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his kind words and his usual perceptive analysis of the issue, as well as for noting to this Chamber that the member who spoke before me had failed to answer the question that was raised.

• (1610)

It is understandable the previous member did not address the issue of the difference between the $2.5 billion in five years that this new program will provide to the Canadian poor and the $3.5 billion that this government has—I use the word advisedly—stolen from the Canadian poor. When Canadians are told of this basic analysis they will realize there is nothing new in this program. In fact, there is less.

On the question of whether, in fact, when one receives $3,750 annually, yes, when that income is reached by those receiving benefits from this program, there will be a decrease in benefits for every $100 more earned. In other words, the benefit will disappear from the benefit package program when the ceiling of $25,921 or more is reached.

That component is acceptable providing there is incentive to work. I must add and keep emphasizing there are many Canadians who cannot find jobs. They want to work and they will not benefit from this benefit package. That is a very fundamental question this government must address if the government truly cares for the children of our country.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, occasionally in this House we debate legislation that touches the very fabric of Canadian society. Bill C-80, an act to implement the proposed child tax benefit is just such an act. It reflects the fundamental Canadian tradition of redistributing scarce resources for the general benefit of Canadians, particularly our children.

In the white paper on the child benefit, the Minister of National Health and Welfare noted that Canada's future well-being and prosperity depend on our children. They are our greatest asset. It follows then that we must attend to their current well-being to ensure they lead happy and fulfilling productive lives. We must strengthen our efforts now.

Assistance to children is a continuing priority of the Government of Canada. This past December, the Prime Minister announced that Canada had formally ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. The convention is aimed at protecting the rights of children around the world.

The Brighter Futures initiative announced recently by the Minister of National Health and Welfare further confirms this government's commitment to children, their parents, and care givers. The initiative is a series of steps we can take now in order to achieve a brighter tomorrow for Canada and our children.

The child tax benefit is one of those steps. When implemented, it will simplify the tax system and streamline and substantially enrich the government's support for families with children. Over the next five years the child tax benefit will provide $2.5 billion in increased child assistance.

This is a substantial amount especially given the pressures on the government's fiscal position. As a result, Canadian families of low and modest means will be better able to meet the challenges of their daily lives.

Let me emphasize that Canada's assistance to families with children is already among the best in the world. Indeed, assistance to children has long been a cornerstone of Canada's social commitment to its people.

Currently, the federal government spends $4.5 billion a year on the three largest and most direct forms of support to families with children. Those include the family allowances, the child credit and the refundable child tax credit.

Moreover, additional federal support to Canadian families is provided through the goods and services tax credit, the child care expense deduction and maternity and parental benefits under the unemployment insurance program. Under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government also cost shares expenditures by the provinces and territories on social assistance and services, including subsidized child care.

To provide the context for the child tax benefit, I want to explain briefly the three major federal programs of support for Canadian families.

The family allowance, introduced almost 50 years ago in 1945, is familiar to most Canadians. Often referred to as the baby bonus, it provides $1.9 billion a year of net federal benefits to about 3.7 million Canadian families with children under the age of 18. Payments are about $35 per child a month for a total of $419 per year and are generally paid to mothers. To assist the government to control expenditures and better target resources, the payments are taxable and are partially or fully recovered from high income Canadians.

The child credit is an annual deduction from the federal tax owing of $71 for each dependent child 18 years or under at the end of the tax year. For third and subsequent children the credit is increased to $142. The accumulated net benefit of the child credit to Canadian families is $400 million. The credit has existed in one form or another since 1947.

Finally, to increase assistance to families with low and modest incomes, the refundable child tax credit was introduced in 1979. The credit has a maximum value of $601 and is provided for each dependent child age 18 or under at the end of the tax year. As well, a supplement of up to $213 per child under age seven is provided to families not claiming child care expenses. These benefits are reduced for families with incomes exceeding $25,921 per year. Total federal payments under the refundable child tax credit amount to $2.2 billion per year.

The 1992 report of the United Nations Development Program ranked Canada first in the world on a range of factors assessing a country's human development and quality of life. The federal programs I have outlined have contributed significantly in this regard.

Nevertheless, difficult living conditions remain a fact of life for many low income Canadian families. For these children we must do more to ensure that their parents have adequate resources to meet their basic needs. We must enhance our support to ensure that these children are raised in conditions that promote healthy development.

The child tax benefit will assist us to provide that enhanced support. In a moment I will explain how. However, I first want to focus briefly on the problems that necessitate its implementation.

As Canada's major programs of assistance for Canadian families have grown over the years, shortcomings have appeared. Accordingly, the government has been urged to improve this patchwork system of child benefits. In particular, two parliamentary committees, social policy groups outside the government and many individual Canadians have identified the following faults with our current system.

• (1620)

First, benefits are delivered piecemeal in three different ways and at different times of the year. This delivery patchwork is confusing for many Canadians because each program has different eligibility criteria. As well, for 600,000 higher income Canadians, family allowances must be partially or fully repaid to the government when they file their income tax returns.

Second, benefits are not targeted adequately. In particular, because family allowances are recovered on the basis of individual incomes, families with similar total incomes may receive different levels of benefits. Family income is a better basis to direct assistance to children most in need.

Third, independent support creates barriers to work for low income families. These families are faced with employment related expenses and a possible reduction in social assistance when they choose to work.

Finally, the delay in the delivery of the refundable tax credit is difficult in many modest income families. While it represents more than half of the federal child benefit, for many families it fails to meet their immediate needs. For example, although they must pay for the child's needs every month, parents may have to wait a full year to receive the full credit. As a result, many families sacrifice part of their benefits by resorting to tax discounters to obtain badly needed cash.

The proposed child tax benefit is designed to address these structural faults and strengthen the federal support for Canadian families. It responds to the recommendations for change that have been urged upon the government.

The benefit is streamlined, responsible and better targeted. It provides enriched benefits that will be delivered on a more timely and less complicated basis. The increased benefit is a social dividend financed by the spending cuts the government announced in the 1992 budget.

Canadians believe that fiscal progress should result in increased assistance to Canadian families. Our government agrees. Over the next five years, the proposed child tax benefit will increase assistance to Canadian families by an average of $400 million a year from $4.5 billion to $4.9 billion.

Under the new system, the basic amount of the benefit will be $1,020 per year for each child. The current annual supplement of $213 will be continued for each child under the age of seven. Where no child care expenses are deducted, a $75 supplement will be provided for the third and additional children.

Low income families will also be eligible to receive an earned income supplement of up to $500. This means that low income families will receive up to $1,733 for their first child and up to $1,233 for each subsequent child. The child tax benefit will be provided to all families with annual incomes up to $67,000 per year.

For families with three or more children, the benefit cut-off will be higher than $67,000. The basic benefit will be reduced at a rate of 5 per cent of family net income over $25,921 for families with two or more children, and at a lower rate of 2.5 per cent for families with one child. The average annual benefits for families with incomes below $50,000 will be $250 higher.

As with other elements of the tax system, the child tax benefit will be automatically indexed to changes in prices in excess of 3 per cent. However, as in the case with the child tax credit which has been enriched five times since 1984, the benefits will be reviewed over time and adjusted as fiscal conditions permit. These previous enrichments have ensured that the level of federal child benefits paid to low income families have more than kept pace with inflation.

Clearly under the new system these benefits will be more fairly and effectively targeted than under the current system.

The greatest benefits will go to low and modest income families. About 80 per cent of the total increase in benefits will be directed to families with incomes below $40,000 per year.

Single parent families face particular difficulties due to their combined responsibilities of earning a living and caring for their children. To further assist single parents the equivalent to married credit will be continued for their first child. This is worth an average of $1,445 in reduced federal and provincial taxes for many single parents.

The government designed the child tax benefit to reinforce the incentives for low income parents to participate in the work force. Often they face financial barriers, such as employment related expenses and possible reductions in social benefits, which preclude them from seeking employment. Accordingly, a new earned income supplement of up to $500 will be available to working families who receive little or no social assistance.

I want to emphasize that the new child tax benefit will be progressive. Benefit limits will be determined according to family income not individual income. This means that families at a given income level will be treated the same regardless of the number of income earners. This will better ensure that the assistance be directed according to family needs. The new approach will also be simpler.

The three major programs of assistance to families will be consolidated into one benefit. This means that the three sets of delivery systems and eligibility criteria will be reduced to one. This will be much less confusing and time consuming for Canadian families.

To further simplify the system the payment levels will be calculated automatically. Parents will no longer be faced with completing separate schedules on their tax forms for child benefits, nor will they have to calculate the recovery of child benefits when they complete their tax return.

In addition, the new system will eliminate the waste and inefficiency of the current system. High income families will no longer receive payments that currently have to be recovered by the federal government at tax time. I am sure that all Canadians will be happy to know that this will simplify the basic income tax form.

The new child tax benefit will also be more responsive to family needs. Changes in family status, such as the birth of a child or the breakup of a marriage, will be reflected in adjustments to the monthly payments. This will be particularly beneficial for low income families who now resort to tax discounters to get an early payment of their year-end benefits to meet their immediate needs.

For example, the up to 16 month wait they currently endure to receive their child tax credit after the birth of the child will be reduced to one month. Benefits will also be quickly extended to newly arrived immigrant families with children.

The child tax benefit is a major advance in federal assistance for children. Members will be interested to learn that over 175,000 Canadians have responded to the government's public information campaign on the child benefit white paper.

• (1630)

Most comments have been quite favourable, especially concerning the targeting of money to children who need it the most. The government proposes to implement the child tax benefit on January 1, 1993, at which time the monthly cheque will be made to eligible Canadian families.

Monthly payments for the first six months will be based on family income reported for the 1991 taxation year. In July 1993 and each July thereafter payments will be updated to reflect information from the previous tax year.

To summarize, the monthly payments will provide assistance as it is needed to help with the expenses of caring for children. Approximately two million Canadian families with annual incomes under $50,000 will receive larger monthly payments.

Unlike the family allowance the new benefit will not be taxed or recovered at tax time. The single monthly payment will mean a system that is simpler, more efficient, and more responsive to the family's immediate needs than the current system.

To help ensure a more adequate standard of living for Canadian families of low and modest means I fully support this legislation and encourage all hon. members to do the same.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am here today to speak on the proposed Bill C-80 dealing with the child tax credit.

The proposed bill is intended to replace the current social welfare benefit system—including family allowances, the child tax credit and the non-refundable dependant child credit—by providing a single monthly payment to the recipients of family allowance.

In eligible cases the amount of the benefit will depend on the earnings and income as well as the number and age of children within the family. The benefit is to consist of two elements. They are a base amount of $85 per month and an earned income supplement which is not to exceed $40 a month per family up to a maximum of $500 a year per family, both of which are non-taxable.

The intention in creating the benefit was to target more generous financial assistance to low and moderate income families by allotting an additional $2.1 billion toward assistance programs over the next five years.

This proposal sounds too good to be true, because it is. I would like to know, where has the $3.5 billion that was snatched from the child benefits over the past five years gone? The government benevolently claims that: "The poor people on social assistance will continue to get family allowance". What has it done with the other benefits it was receiving? Are they all to be slashed?

In Canada today over 2.5 million people have been forced onto social assistance. This is a matter of crisis proportions. What will happen to them? What will happen to the assistance which provides the most basic necessities for the nearly 60,000 students who are parents?

Where do the refugees, new immigrants, and aboriginals on reserves fit into this bill? How will they be affected?

Moreover, the economic model proposed as a basis for Bill C-80 completely omits single parent households which rely on some form of social assistance. I would like to know why. I ask this question: why?

I draw the House's attention to page 4 of the research report, the Financial Implications of Child Support Guidelines. One of the methods used to estimate the costs associated with children was to ask: "How much do parents spend on their children?" How can anyone put a price on a child? All children are different. There is no norm by which to classify them.

The report indicates on the same page that the Department of Justice participated in the contribution to a group of specialists tasked with producing an independent review of the proposal. However, the results of their work have not been included in the report due to time constraints and fundamentally disparate views on the subject.

Forgive me, but I thought that the reason these specialists were chosen was to express their different views. Why then have their views not been published in the report? Why have the expert views of the department's legal specialists been stifled on the basis of time constraints? This proposed bill should not be a quick fix when dealing with such vital matters, when dealing with the future of our children.

Why does it hold back? Did the specialists produce a review so unflattering of government policy that the family law committee chose not to allow it the light of day? It is curious that while the views of the three economists chosen by the committee were included those of the legal specialists were not.

The government stresses that its social programs and priorities are committed to families and children, but the only priorities I can see are the ones set on the spending of another $500,000 on public relations to promote its image and longevity in government. The government places a high priority on creating a legal loophole for the wealthy. Yet on the other end of the scale it would have us believe that through its gracious benevolence it is providing more income for low income workers, claiming that families will have an additional $2 billion to spend in the next two years.

However, the grateful $3.67 extra a month will certainly vanish within the next 12 months due to inflation. The supposed long-term miracle the government is trying desperately to peddle is, if anything, a short-term fix only as far-sighted as the next election.

I draw the House's attention to page 4 of the white paper report, to an article that states, and I quote:

> In choosing to work, low income families with children are faced with employment related expenses and possibly a reduction in social assistance benefits.

Why then does the government insist on burdening ordinary Canadians who struggle to build a better life for the family, to add insult to injury, with a lower standard of living for choosing to work? With all the money the government is reaping from here and giving there why does it not have the wherewithal to contribute at least some of it to the food banks? That is where more and more Canadian children are finding themselves.

It is due to this government that Canadians find themselves in want of the basic necessities of existence. When this government took office there was one, and I stress one, food bank in Canada. Today there are 292. It is time for this government to bear the responsibility for the impact of its destructive economic policies and put its support behind Canadians.

I see this bill as another quick-fix scheme that serves no useful purpose in resolving the growing incidence of Canadian poverty.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into this debate. I believe there is just a brief amount of time left before this House has the opportunity to pass judgment on this legislation.

We are debating a very important measure here today that was introduced by way of Bill C-80, which the government introduced as part of its budget procedures. It has been sold by this government to a large degree as an attempt to ease and simplify a very important component of many of our social programs in the country, namely the child benefit program.

It has been clear from many of the questions and comments raised in this House, as early as Question Period today, and from the comments from members on this side of the House, that this debate is about more than just a piece of legislation to arrange the regulatory and financial measures to provide the kind of benefits to families in this country that people have rightfully come to expect from the Government of Canada. It was brought on by the approach this government has taken in this legislation and in terms of many of the comments members of the government have made over the past little while.

If we examine some of the background of this particular legislation we can see that since the Conservative government came into office in 1984 it has cut family benefits dramatically. It killed the old income tax deduction of around $710 per child under age 18 and brought in a tax credit worth far less. It is now worth around $71 per child.

In the 1992 federal budget, the most recent one, the government announced an end to the existing family benefits, to be replaced with an extremely targeted so-called child benefit. The new benefit consists of a basic benefit of $1,020 per child with benefits being reduced at a threshold of net income of around $25,000. The bill and the measures that the government introduced went on to deal with a number of other issues in that regard.

What is wrong with the Conservative approach on this? We heard recently of what they call the family caucus or the family compact as it is more likely called. The vision of Canada that we see coming from some members on the government side is very right wing. What we are starting to see is that some members on the government side do not like the direction their own government is going. This is causing some dissent and members are obviously lobbying to try and have their agenda met.

While the Conservatives argue and want us to believe that this new child benefit is simpler, fairer and more generous, it is none of the above. The system means an end to universal family allowances and thus the end to the principle that the task of raising children is recognized in all families regardless of income level. The family allowance recognizes that all children, rich and poor—an important point—are of equal value to our society and its universality ensures that it is non-stigmatizing.

In the whole debate we have had from time to time in this country, this government has very surreptitiously, most people would argue, eroded the concept of universality in Canada. It would rather have us line up at the welfare offices and go down to the United Way to try and get help for our families. That is not the approach that we want to take in this country. It is a vindictive, nasty approach in a particularly sensitive and important field: the whole question of the family support and support for children across this country.

For many women the family allowance was the only money they received in recognition of their unpaid work and valuable contribution to society. For many women the family allowance was their only independent source of income.

As well, the government is suggesting that the new system of child benefits is a simplified system that would make low income families better off. It always sounds good, does it not? The new system is comprised, it says, of four sets of benefits as opposed to the five in the old system.

The new system is so complicated that the government, not the individual families, will have to calculate the benefits. What is created, I suppose, is an additional bureaucracy for administering many of these programs. The government has gone about developing this, as I have said, in a vindictive and backward way in the delivery of these programs.

Let me quote from a document prepared by some of my colleagues. It is a very revealing document in terms of just what is behind this question. It raises the point of fairness. It states:

> The new system is the first government benefit which distinguishes between the "deserving" and "undeserving" poor. The $500 earned income supplement will add $500 to working poor families earning between about $10,000 and $20,921. This was described as an added incentive for social assistance recipients to "get out of the welfare trap". However, with child care costing between $6,000 and $12,000 per year, an extra $500 will not go very far.

That is an important point which was made by a previous speaker. All of us see it in our ridings, single parents, in particular women, attempting to get jobs. Who is going to take care of the child at home? We need day care programs as well as other programs. This government made a commitment at one time for a national day care system which it is now backing down from. We have seen many single parents attempt to get jobs, but how can we blame them if they do not when we add up the whole cost of day care and transportation. They cannot afford it.

In conclusion, this is legislation we do not need to see in this House. I am proud that our party did so much work on this issue. Let us make sure that the government members on the other side get the message tonight during this vote.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised this evening at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration; the hon. member for Willowdale—Publishing; the hon. member for Malpeque—Employment; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Small Business.

[English]

It being 4.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, in accordance with the provision of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 183)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order.

[English]

On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was a couple of minutes late. I was unavoidably detained. Had I been here I would have voted with my party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, you may find unanimous consent to apply the result of the previous vote to this motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like my vote to be applied against the concurrence motion.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think the vote taken on Motion No. 39 applied in reverse would be appropriate. We would certainly concur with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

EMPLOYEE SHARE PURCHASE PLAN ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Unfortunately I have not had an opportunity to confer with my colleagues in the other parties, but since this is Private Members' Hour and we have now used up half of that one hour, could I seek the unanimous consent of the House, and again I make the point without consultation, to extend the time for Private Members' Business to allow at least one full hour for debate? In other words, I am asking to extend the time until 6.30 today.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think in the spirit of co-operation and in view of the fact that it is Private Members' Hour and a half hour has been used with regard to votes that have been taken, our party would have no difficulty in giving unanimous consent to extending the time for an additional half hour and go until 6.30 this evening for the purposes of Private Members' Hour.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, it appears we are on a roll here. I would not want to obstruct it. I would agree with the suggestion of the hon. New Democratic House leader.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, in order to show our good faith and cooperation, the Bloc Québécois will also accede to the hon. member's request.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie) moved that Bill C-327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concurrence of the House to proceed with the full hour. It was much anticipated, therefore, I would prefer the full hour to just a half hour of debate.

The bill is C-327 and if I could read it into the record:

An act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

It takes a long time for a bill to get to this point. It is particularly gratifying and I feel very happy and privileged to be able to speak to the bill at long last at second reading.

I believe the ability of employees to not only work in an environment but to perhaps own the working environment would be a step forward for the country. It is a much delayed step forward for the country since many other countries in the world already have legislation in place that allows employees to become majority shareholders in the company for which they work. We believe it is a democracy that can stretch from the shop floor to the boardrooms of the company.

In order for the bill to get to this point, it is indeed a trying circumstance. Certainly there have been several members who have written me personally and suggested that the bill would be out of order since only a government can propose a tax bill. Fortunately the legal counsel has indicated to me and to all those who might care that the bill does not in fact increase income tax. It may in fact decrease income tax and therefore it is perfectly legitimate for a private member's bill to come forward as it has done.

May I suggest that this bill was supposed to be a forerunner rather than an after-runner to the Algoma Steel Corporation employee buy-out that has now been consummated and hopefully will lead to a positive future for Algoma Steel.

Given that fact it is unfortunate but nevertheless it points out that a corporation the size of Algoma can be purchased by the employees not without the consideration of, in this case, a parent company without the consideration and the spearheading by the United Steel Workers of America, not without the involvement of the Ontario government, not without the involvement of the banks of this country, and I must say not without the involvement of the federal government.

I will say in their participation in this restructuring and reprofiling of Algoma Steel, the federal government was reticent and hesitant and came in yelling and screaming, but in the end it did participate and I salute it for that. We do appreciate the fact that the federal government was an integral part in the final restructuring of the plan and I think the community of Sault Ste. Marie would also send out that thank-you.

Nevertheless, I want to say that this type of legislation has come its time. Rather than dealing with the issue on a crisis by crisis situation, or putting out a fire here in Ontario, or one in Manitoba, or one in British Columbia as there is every possibility that the governments of this country will have to face, rather than doing it in a piecemeal way, let us have a strategy in place so that we can deal with companies on the verge of closure, on the verge of bankruptcy, or in other cases where sometimes the parent company says: "This company that we own is not making enough profits and we wish to cut the ties with the company". In all of those cases and all of those scenarios it would be much better if we had legislation in place so that we can deal with it in an orderly fashion, rather than dealing with them on a one by one situation as in Algoma.

I want to point out, that this bill will give tax credits to the employers, to the employees, and to the lending institutions so that all the participants can become involved and form a partnership in the new company. It does not pit one individual versus another. I think that is a key instrument of this bill.

In speaking to the cost of the bill, I want to say that if you deal with a situation like Algoma, it has cost the Ontario government millions of dollars. It will cost the federal government millions of dollars. It will cost the employees, collectively, millions of dollars: $2.89 per hour for every employee in the corporation.

There are sacrifices to be made by individuals and governments, and in this case so too for the banks. If the government were to say that this bill would be too costly, I suggest that the alternative is not acceptable to anyone. The alternative, if Algoma were to close there would be 5,500 to 6,500 affected, depending on the employment level at any one time. The cost to all levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—would be astronomical. First of all, everyone would go on UI, and afterward, unfortunately, many would be on the social assistance program, which would be very difficult for the municipality, under terrible duress already. They just could not handle it, the impact upon a community like Sault Ste. Marie with that number of people being laid off in one fell swoop.

It was pointed out that a city of 80,000 population would decrease by 20,000. I think you can apply this scenario to any community, any constituency, any industry, small, medium or large across this country. May I suggest that from day to day to day we read in the newspapers that "another company is on the verge of", "another company has already closed".

This legislation would allow the people who work within that company—the owners, the employers, the employees and everyone—to get involved together, to take one last crack at making a company viable yet again. It is proven in the United States, Italy, Israel, Germany, and many countries across the world that employee ownership can make an unsuccessful company viable, successful and profitable.

All of us may be faced with that scenario in our constituencies. That is why I hope that all parties will set aside whatever differences they may have and see fit to support this bill that again speaks of new partnerships, really unknown to this point. In our community the unions, the two levels of government, the banks, the employer, and the employees, got together and made it work. We are hopeful for the future. May I suggest once again that it was an ad hoc dealing with the situation rather than a strategic plan that can deal with the situation right across the country.

We suggest that government has to have a role. If it is to have a role, why not in the best form that we know, and that is the form of legislation? Put it in a legislative form.

The provincial governments in Manitoba and Ontario have what I believe is legislation in place or about to come into place whereby rather than acting against what I am proposing would be complementary to what I am proposing. This federal legislation could be put into place and not seriously take away or detract from provincial legislation. I think that should be pointed out here.

The corporations in the province can opt in or can opt out of the regulations in Bill C-327. I think that is important to point out as well. We are not stepping on jurisdictional toes by putting this forward.

If the company is allowed to proceed with this, it gives not only the community new life, but it also gives the company new life. It gives the community new life as it did in our community. It brought people together. It gives time for the community to, hopefully, diversify. It is a lesson for Sault Ste. Marie and it would be a lesson for many other communities. Kapuskasing is another recent example that was dealt with by the Ontario government, the employer and the employees. It was a totally different set of circumstances, handled totally differently by the governments. Why not standardize it? Getting back to my point, it gives an opportunity for the communities to realize that you cannot depend on one industry for your future. You must diversify. I do not want to paint this as a time-buyer, but it does serve that purpose.

I want to say that six or eight months ago when I was pursuing this without any bill in place, I asked the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology in Question Period if they supported the concept of employee ownership. They both replied that they did but "it was up to him as to whether or not this government would support that. We do not know what you want us to support. We like the idea, but we do not know what you are asking specifically".

The specifics are now there. We are asking for changes in the Income Tax Act. I think everyone puts their arms up in a bit of trepidation about taking on the Income Tax Act. I want to say that in the United States the handling of this legislation is much more convoluted than I am suggesting in this bill. It impacts on a whole series of statutes, regulations and income tax acts which I will not bore anyone with by reading, but I want to assure you that this is a much more simplistic way of dealing with the problem rather than the American style. I want to say that what the American Income Tax Act does is it facilitates and motivates people to participate.

I am sure the government will suggest that we have some legislation in place that will assist, but there is no facilitator and no motivator. It really gives no one the impetus to go forward and really pursue it.

With regard to Bill C-327, it would not be my first wish to have ministerial override, but I do not want to be politically naive. Perhaps it is a good idea in a private members' bill to say: "The minister has to be convinced that this is a viable option for this small, medium or large company". I think it is important that the government has that option. As I said, it would not be my choice but, under the circumstances, I think it is appropriate that I put that in.

I should also suggest, and I have mentioned it once before, that it should not be only for companies that are in dire circumstances like Algoma with $800 million in debt. Those are the most dire of circumstances. Perhaps we can address small, medium and large corporations, industries or businesses that have not reached that stage yet, where there is potential for addressing situations before they reach that degree of severity of economic hardship. The bill suggests a way of getting that under way is that at least 50 per cent of the employees have to sign a petition saying: "Let us take a look at this possibility". That is the way of getting it started. It starts on the shop floor with the employees and it ends with the minister. It runs the whole gamut, I suppose, of the political or non-political spectrum from grassroots to the people who make the decisions in this country.

I hope that it can appeal to employees and I hope it can appeal to the government.

• (1750)

How common is employee ownership in the United States? As of 1987 it was estimated about 7,000 to 8,000 U.S. companies had employee stock ownership plans with approximately eight million worker participants. About 1,000 to 1,500 of these companies are 51 per cent to 100 per cent owned by their workers, who probably number around one million. Perhaps as many as another million workers are in firms that are 20 per cent to 50 per cent employee owned. About 100 to 250 employee stock ownership plan firms are the result of worker buy-outs of failing companies or successful subsidiaries of large concerns.

As far as political endorsation and non-political endorsation, I am glad to say that our local chamber supports it. I am glad to say the Canadian Chamber of Commerce is actively looking at the bill now and I hope to get the financial institutions to take a look at it because, as members know, this bill will come before us again in the fall. I hope in the summer months to build up some national support because I think it is a cause that can be readily supported by all areas and sometimes provide a new direction. I think everyone knows a new direction is required because perhaps what we are doing right at this present moment is not that successful.

Far be it from me to read endorsations from the United States, but I want to say in the United States as unlikely an endorser of this motive was ex-President Ronald Reagan. I am not so sure I should say this but I can use it to my own advantage. I quote:

> Could there be anything but widespread misery where a privileged few control the nation's wealth, while millions laboured for a pittance, and millions more were desperate for want of employment? It should be clear to everyone that the nation's steadfast policy should afford every American of working age a realistic opportunity to acquire the ownership and control of some meaningful form of property in a growing national economy.

I think the ex-President is saying: "Yes, I endorse employee ownership".

A more likely endorser was a gentleman now deceased on the opposite end of the spectrum, Hubert Humphrey.

> Capital, and the question of who owns it and therefore reaps the benefits of its productiveness, is an extremely important issue that is complementary to the issue of full employment. . . .I see these as the twin pillars of our economy: full employment of our labour resources and widespread ownership of our capital resources. Such twin pillars would go a long way in providing a firm underlying support for future economic growth that would be equitably shared.

In closing, this bill is social democracy in action. It does empower the workers. It empowers the workers though not at the expense of anyone else. It is a shared ownership of a small, medium and large corporation business industry and I would encourage that the government side and the Official Opposition support this.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the member on his decision to introduce a bill to promote employee shareholding in the corporation that employs them.

I agree that in some cases such participation may lead to increased productivity and as a result help strengthen our global economy. However, although enhancing co-operation between company management and its employees is praiseworthy in itself, I do not think it would necessarily be wise to adopt Bill C-327.

I would like to take this opportunity to give hon. members my views on the bill and help them decide whether the bill is acceptable in its present form.

Perhaps I may clarify the contents of Bill C-327. The purpose of this legislation is to help employees purchase shares in the company that employs them.

To that end, the bill proposes to amend the Income Tax Act to provide that employees and the employer may include in deductions from taxable income 50 per cent of their investment in an employee share purchase plan and 50 per cent of the interest paid to a financial institution for the purposes of such plans. To take advantage of these tax incentives, employees must purchase a controlling shareholding in a given corporation.

Hon. members may recall that in 1984 the previous government, in a document entitled Gain Sharing for a Stronger Economy, proposed a program that would provide a tax credit, shared between employees and employers, for the percentage of the profits allocated to employee compensation.

The purpose of this program, like most employee ownership plans, was to improve labour management relations and increase employee productivity. Further analysis of the proposal raised some doubts as to whether those objectives were realistic. The proposal, which was not well received by labour and management circles, was dropped by the government and replaced by other policies.

At this point I may add that the Income Tax Act now includes provisions that provide incentives for employee investment. More specifically, the government encourages employee investment by giving preferential tax treatment to employee share purchase options and the labour-sponsored venture capital corporation plan, which was enhanced in the last budget.

Combined with the lifetime capital gains exemption, these programs offer employees a strong incentive for investing in Canadian corporations, without introducing a bias in investment decisions.

I may add that the provisions relating to national labour-sponsored venture capital corporations restrict the percentage of the assets of such corporations that may be invested in a single business, thus reflecting the old adage that warns against putting all one's eggs in the same basket.

In the case of Bill C-327, the eggs include not only the employee's investment but also his job. I think hon. members will agree it would be inappropriate for the government to urge individuals to take such risks.

I would also like to point out that a number of provinces already have programs under which employees may purchase shares in the corporation that employs them. The federal government provides passive support for these programs by administering them under the tax collection agreements and by not counting the province's contribution as taxable income. In some cases, investments under these programs may be eligible for RRSP treatment.

Eliminating initial tax incentives like the ones proposed in Bill C-327 was one of the main thrusts of the 1988 income tax reform. One of the primary objectives of the reform was to encourage decision making in terms of economic merits as opposed to specific tax benefits. Achieving this objective involved eliminating a number of special tax benefits that were only available to a small group of individuals.

The resulting broadening of the tax base made it possible to reduce income tax across the board. In addition to introducing greater fairness, this approach, with its broader tax base and lower tax rates, has the advantage of not influencing investment decisions and thus encouraging long-term economic growth.

Bill C-327 does the opposite, in that it would encourage the use of public funds for the benefit of a small group of individuals who wish to acquire a controlling interest in the corporation that employs them.

There was another reason for restricting the use of initial tax incentives like those proposed in Bill C-327. Experience, both in this country and abroad, has shown that a considerable share of the tax credits used in this way is applied to activities that would have taken place even if the tax credits had not been available. The activity directly due to these incentives is often insignificant. Furthermore, such tax incentives often tend to have a poor cost-benefit ratio, in terms of achieving the desired objectives.

This brings me to my other point. The adoption of Bill C-327 could have a major impact on the deficit, since this generous tax treatment might encourage many businesses to restructure their employee compensation plan so as to take advantage of this incentive. Given the importance of controlling the deficit, it would be necessary to raise the taxes of all other Canadians to support the stock acquisition plans.

• (1800)

In this regard, it is important for my colleagues in the House to realize that Bill C-327 proposes income redistribution, to some extent. I wonder whether such redistribution is appropriate, in view of the lack of evidence to support the alleged benefits that would flow from the bill, if adopted.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate my colleague on taking the initiative to present this bill in the House. I believe that I speak for all Canadians when I say that increasing the productivity of our workers and improving labour-management relations are important factors in helping this great country to succeed.

Nevertheless, I really fear that Bill C-327 would not necessarily do much to achieve that. Not only would it be costly and unfair but it would not reach the objectives for which it was designed.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to discuss this issue in the House and I hope that my colleagues can use this information to make a justified, fair and equitable decision when the time comes to vote on this bill.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-327 which is sponsored by my colleague and friend from Sault Ste. Marie. The bill deals with the whole question of employee ownership, which in Sault Ste. Marie and in the Algoma district we see as the only solution really to the Algoma Steel problem which faced us one year ago last February.

On that cold winter morning we were notified that Dofasco had a debt amounting to some $800 million at Algoma Steel. I must say there was great concern. We had just been through a long and costly strike in the summer and fall of 1990. We faced the prospect of the company going into receivership and the complete destruction of the economic viability, not only of the company, but of Sault Ste. Marie and the Algoma district.

As we look back at it now, in some ways it is miraculous that the working together of Dofasco and Algoma Steel personnel with United Steel Workers of America, the banking institutions and the two senior levels of government, a new Algoma has arisen out of that situation with everybody suffering, as the member has said, massive losses. The workers lost some $2.82 an hour in wages. The banks have had their equity or their investment chopped. Dofasco has lost most of its equity position.

It is hard to know whether this was inevitable or whether it was just a combination of circumstances. Clearly if there is any way for this company to survive, it is with worker ownership.

The steel industry is in a terrible situation. It went through great hardship in the United States during the 1980s when it went from about 500,000 employees to 180,000. We are going through that dramatic restructuring now. The only thing is that if the governments in this country get involved in the direct financial support of the steel industry, it means that those companies will be subjected to a countervail by the United States steel industry. They are probably going to be subjected in the next couple of weeks to an anti-dumping duty just because the United States companies want to protect themselves.

The kind of massive financial assistance by all levels of government in the United States has not been provided to Canadian companies. That is not to say that the Government of Canada will not lose hundreds of millions of dollars in the Algoma case because all the losses will be written off against the taxes of the main financial banking institutions that have massive profits against which to write them off.

It does seem to me that for many industries the idea of employee ownership is very desirable. I do not presume to suggest what that exact mechanism is. Clearly government incentives are one idea.

I look back at the budget that was delivered here in the House of Commons on February 15, 1984 by Marc Lalonde. In that budget he said: "I am therefore proposing today to encourage this process with tax assistance for a new employee profit participation plan. The government will provide a tax credit of 10 per cent of the profits shared under the plan; 60 per cent of the tax credit will go to the individual workers, 40 per cent to the employer. The employee profit participation plan is designed to complement the collective bargaining process, not replace it. Experience has shown that to succeed, profit sharing cannot be a substitute for competitive wages".

We are talking about profit sharing. Mr. Lalonde proposed a whole series of tax incentives to encourage profit sharing.

The ultimate objective is to lower the tension, lower the adversarial situation which exists in many industries between employers and employees. Surely there is no way to do this better than through employers and employees owning the company.

If you cannot make the company competitive when the employees own it, you probably cannot make it competitive anyway, assuming you have good management in each case, and it is an industry which is properly capitalized and modern enough in structure.

A few weeks ago we had a conference in Sault Ste. Marie on the future of Elliot Lake. One of the principal speakers at the conference was from Tembec which is a diversified forest products company in northern Quebec. I was very impressed with not only the employee ownership in that situation but the attitude toward training and retraining of the workers. Its average training amounts to some 84 hours a year where the Canadian average is only some two hours.

It was the company that stepped in in the Kapuskasing situation where there was an employee buy-out. I was very impressed.

I think profit sharing has a long way to go in Canada because we do tend to have very adversarial relationships between employers and employees, although I do think that the hard, tough economic times that we face right now perhaps reduced that to some extent.

Employee buy-out is one mechanism. Employee participation in profit sharing is another way. Assuming that the Tory government will allow this bill to go to committee, it would be a very worth-while experience to review exactly how the incentives would be provided, whether they would be adequate or perhaps how costly they would be. I think that is the kind of thing we would learn in a committee study of this bill.

I hope the government will support the bill going to committee. I think it is an area that must be further explored.

I do not expect this government to be very generous in encouraging employee ownership or employee participation but I think it is something that is going to happen. There are many industries in this country that are going to have great difficulty surviving in the kind of modern global economy in which they are competing with low-cost producers in other countries. We must have the very maximum of co-operation between employees and employers.

There is a great value in this bill going to committee to see the details of how it could work and how well it would work. I hope that enough government members will support it to see it studied in committee. Perhaps this is the final solution and it can become the law of the land. If that happens and it is judged by the committee and the House to be the solution, that is great. If it is not perhaps it can be amended, or perhaps the government will ultimately see that there needs to be a mechanism for employer ownership so that it is necessary to operate with the ad hoc arrangements which we had in Kapuskasing and Algoma.

The bill should get the support of the House to go to committee for a very thorough study. We are going through a change in industrial relations in this country and in the world. Employer-employee ownership is one mechanism to ensure that many of our companies, especially our resource companies, survive in this country.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today on this private member's bill, Bill C-327.

This bill proposes a 50 per cent tax deduction for investments made by employees, employers and financial institutions to finance employee takeovers of the businesses for which they work.

When assessing this bill we should examine it from various perspectives. Is the proposal good for the employees? Is it good for business? Is it good for taxpayers? I have asked myself these questions and have come to the conclusion that on the whole the proposal would not represent a clear step forward.

I shall now elaborate on why I have reached that conclusion. First, consider how this proposal would affect employees. Canadian employees work hard for their money. Out of their pay cheque they must provide for their current needs, such as food, shelter, clothing, transportation and, if they are lucky, perhaps some entertainment. The remainder of their hard-earned pay, when set aside in the form of savings, provides for the future. Employees must decide where the best place for that nest egg is.

Each individual is different in that respect. Some are prepared to take substantial risks in making investments, knowing that high rewards often accompany high risks. Others place a premium on security, sacrificing a little return in order to sleep soundly at night in the knowledge that their money will be there when they need it.

Neither the government nor I can tell these employees as a group where it is best to place their savings. That decision depends on the individual's own experience, character and perspective.

However, a 50 per cent deduction sends a strong message that the government views a particular investment, acquiring a controlling interest in the employer company, as the preferred alternative. The bill suggests that the program is intended for cases in which the financial viability of the employer is in some doubt. Such turn-around situations constitute high-risk investments, not necessarily bad investments but certainly not everyone's cup of tea.

The government should not lure employees into a risky investment with a 50 per cent tax deduction when the employees' instincts and analyses would lead them in a safer direction. Even in the absence of a tax inducement many employees may find investments in their employers to be a good home for their savings. Clearly, the government should do nothing to stand in the way of such decisions nor discourage them through punitive tax treatment.

Just as clearly the tax system should not favour a particular risky type of investment, as this bill proposes. The tax system should play a neutral role if it is to serve the employees of Canada well.

I would now like to turn to the question of whether this proposal would be good for business. The idea of employees acquiring control of their employer's business is in vogue at the moment. A recent Globe and Mail article dealt with what it described as the largest experiment in worker ownership in North American history, which is the employee acquisition of Algoma Steel Corporation Limited. Therefore, it is understandable that this bill is sponsored by the member who represents Sault Ste. Marie, the home of Algoma Steel.

When the results of this experiment are in it may turn out that employee ownership was the ideal business solution for Algoma Steel. Certainly the employees' union representative held out high hopes. Mr. Leo Gerard, the Canadian president of the United Steelworkers of America, is quoted as saying that the Algoma restructuring "shows what imagination and a willingness to take risk can accomplish. High value-added production and a well-trained labour force need not be unrealized dreams or academic exercises". Cuts in wages and benefits were necessary to make the package work and this may well have been facilitated by the involvement of Algoma's employees.

Employee ownership may turn out to be the ideal business solution for Algoma Steel. It will not be so in all cases in which businesses are faced with a decision as to change in control. Existing owners may be best placed to continue operating the business given their experience and the stake they already have in making the business work. Alternatively, an outside group constituted of neither employees nor existing owners may bring fresh ideas and new business connections and therefore offer the greatest opportunities for success.

The very complex question of who is best placed to control a business so that it works well for its employees, customers and shareholders is usually answered in a simple fashion. Existing owners when faced with an offer for acquisition of control will consider whether the terms of the offer are attractive. When considering multiple offers they will decide whether the most attractive one is sufficient to convince them to relinquish the control they have. Generally, the most attractive offer will come from the source that has the best plan for the business. If existing owners have the best plan they will accept no alternative offer.

If one group is provided with tax support for their offer while others are not the decision will be tilted in a direction that is not necessarily best for the business. For example, if employees are provided with a 50 per cent tax deduction available neither to existing owners nor to outside groups, employees' offers will be attractive even if they do not make the best business sense.

We all wish to ensure that the best business decisions are reached when questions of corporate control arise. When a business thrives Canadians benefit, as employees, customers, suppliers, shareholders or simply through participation in a prosperous economy. Therefore, we should all agree to avoid using our tax system in a manner that would lead to bad business decisions in the important field of acquisition of control.

A level tax playing field is essential if we are interested in business success. Unfortunately, this bill would tilt that field.

Finally, let us consider what is best for the taxpayers of Canada. Certainly, a 50 per cent tax deduction sounds very attractive but it would be available only to a select group, the employees of target companies and others who helped finance the take-over. There are millions of Canadians who are not in the labour force, who are unemployed, self-employed or employed in the non-corporate sector. There are millions more who lack the means or the desire to invest in their employers. None of these Canadians will benefit from the proposed tax deduction. Yet these same Canadians will be called upon to foot the bill when it comes to replacing the lost revenue from this new tax deduction.

Is it fair to ask the large majority of Canadians to pay higher taxes so that a select few can benefit from a 50 per cent tax deduction on investments that may pay off handsomely? I would say no.

In summary, whether this House considers the bill from the perspective of the employee, the business or the taxpayer it will find some problems. I am confident that the House will display its usual good sense in disposing of this measure.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House today to participate in this debate, which is limited in time, on an excellent initiative from one of my colleagues, the member for Sault Ste. Marie.

• (1820)

This is an example of initiative taken by a private member. As most people who follow the proceedings of Parliament will know, one way that private members, members not in government, have an opportunity to present proposed legislation and to develop some ideas is by way of a private member's bill.

This is one particular bill where there is reason enough, I would hope, from the government side and all members of this House to vote on favourably when it does come to a vote and to send the bill to committee. Given the nature of the subject of this bill, it would present an excellent opportunity to review a very exciting and interesting subject matter.

Of course I am referring to the bill presented by my colleague, Bill C-327, and I will read the title which will explain it further. It is an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

Basically, it is an opportunity for us to develop in Canada a formal and structured process for employee buy-outs or to provide incentives that would make it viable as an attractive option.

This bill presented by my colleague would be the first federal legislation to specifically encourage or facilitate employee ownership. That is an important concept for us to look at.

I could go on, as some members probably have, given the difficulty that our economy is facing in Canada, and particularly in the manufacturing sector, given the pressures of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, which many have labelled a failure, and of course the plans by the government to get our country into a trilateral free trade agreement.

But leaving those arguments aside for now and just talking about the whole nature of the development of industry and business in Canada, and indeed throughout North America, it is clear that those modern and progressive corporations are taking a look now at being successful. And how is it that they are successful?

One of the ways they are successful, and we all know this, is to ensure they have a valuable and trained work force and given the future outcome of this particular bill, an opportunity then for those employees to share in the ownership of a particular industry. It is those innovative and new ideas that are the kinds of proposals that really do make for a successful and progressive economy in North America.

We do have some examples across North America and here in Canada on employee ownership. One of the examples cited by my colleague is a company by the name of Weirton Steel in Ohio which was to be closed in 1982 by its parent company because of low profits. The employees decided to purchase the plant which accounted for one-third or 8,400 of the total employment of that local community. Since the buy-out the plant has performed relatively well, especially in view of the depressed market for steel. We all know, of course, about the debate between Canada and the United States now on that whole particular field.

In raising that specific example, the point is that it has been demonstrated that a decision to close a plant or a facility does not necessarily mean that the operation is economically non-viable.

Business decisions are made for a vast number of reasons, not always because the plant is not profitable. We have seen a number of such transfers given our branch plant economy in Canada. We have seen the closure of branch plants in Canada and movement to the United States. That is clearly an example where employee ownership might play a role in terms of the development of industry in Canada.

Mention is made in the notes about Kapuskasing. There is a very recent success in an employee buy-out and of course in my colleague's riding, there is Algoma Steel.

It is important for us to think about that because it gives workers the opportunity to share in the development of that particular plant or industry in that sector. One comes to mind. In Saskatchewan I believe there is a brewery owned by the workers which has had incredible success, if I recall from one of the business programs that was on. It is an example of the kind of ownership route I think we ought to try to take our industry in giving the employees an opportunity to have that share in the ownership and in the direction of a firm.

I might add that in my mind it is probably the subject of another bill, legislation or debate about Crown corporations. In many ways we might need to take a look at how to get our Crown corporations to be responsive to the needs of consumers. It has been a tool that really has been accepted by all parties in Canada. It has been a tool for economic development, much abused I would say by Liberal and Conservative governments. It is an abused model that can work.

We have to ensure that when we use the services of either CN or Petro-Canada we are getting something out of it or that there is a clear return to the public treasury. I do not know if at times we have been successful at showing that. In any case it is along the same lines, I suppose, of employees having some say in the development of those particular operations.

This bill will go some distance toward dealing with the issue. It deserves the support of the government, at the very least, to vote and pass the bill. Then we could get it to committee where there could be a fascinating look at the whole concept of employee ownership. This bill could spur that discussion. In committee there could be very reasonable discussion. There could be witnesses from a number of these plants and facilities where it has worked.

Let us hear from the opponents of the idea who do not think it will work. Let us hear from the chambers of commerce and the trade union movement as to their views. It would be a very interesting study. That is reason enough for the government to try to move this legislation through and into committee.

Let me just mention a few other points in the bill just for detail so that the people who read this debate later will have some background. Part of the bill's plan is for half of the employees' or corporation's contributions plan to be deducted. Borrowing by a plan's trustees to purchase shares would be made easier by allowing lending institutions a tax deduction of half the interest earned.

The bill requires—and I think this is important—that the plan be agreed to by all parties involved: the management and the shareholders. Of course the Minister of National Revenue must agree in terms of the implications on the Income Tax Act in this case. Most important, we are seeing some support of initiatives in this particular case.

This particular initiative brought forward by my colleague has been endorsed by many groups including the Sault Ste. Marie Chamber of Commerce and various labour groups. Obviously there is the work here. I hope members of the public after hearing, will write their letters of support to the member for Sault Ste. Marie urging government members and other members of the House to support this legislation.

It will be a real opportunity for employee ownership whose time has come and for Canadian employees to be given the opportunity to save their jobs and work together to keep Canada strong.

I would encourage the government to offer its support to this bill, to send it to committee where all these issues could be surveyed and to say yes to a good idea from the member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as has been noted, the subject of debate before us today is private member's Bill C–327, recommending that this government encourage the financial participation of workers in the firms in which they are employed.

I begin by thanking the hon. member for raising the issue of improving the relationship between management and labour. This government shares the hon. member's concerns that to remain competitive we need increased co–operation between labour and management. This will be critical in the long–term growth of the Canadian economy.

• (1830)

As members may be aware, Bill C–327 recommends that the Income Tax Act be amended to provide a 50 per cent deduction from taxable income for employee and employer investments in employee share purchase plans and on interest income earned on loans by financial institutions to such plans. It is important to note that the purchase of shares is not enough. Under this proposal employees must in fact acquire control of the target firm.

Mr. Speaker, as you will no doubt recall, a similar proposal was put forth by the previous government in 1984. That program would have provided a tax credit shared between employees and employers for employee remuneration paid in the form of a percentage of profits. Like the current proposal, the objective of that plan was to enhance worker productivity through improved relationship between labour and management. You may also recall that both labour and management groups expressed dissatisfaction with that proposal. After careful study by this government the plan was rejected.

This should not come as a surprise to anyone who is aware of the objectives that this government espoused in tax reform. As members are aware, one of the primary objectives of tax reform was to encourage decisions based on economic merit rather than special tax preferences. This was accomplished by the elimination of numerous preferences, preferences that in many cases were available to only a small group of people. At the same time many deductions were either eliminated or replaced by credits.

The combined effect of this base broadening permitted the reduction of tax rates. As a result many Canadians, particularly low income recipients and seniors, enjoyed a reduction in their tax liabilities.

Most important of all was the fact that tax reform was a major step in reducing the distortions in economic decision making through the income tax system. This broad based, low rate approach to income taxation left savings decisions undistorted thus encouraging the long–term growth of the economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the member but the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped from the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly today on Canada's printing industry. As we know it is Canada's fourth largest industrial employer with 78,000 employees working today in Canada.

This industry is comprised of 4,300 different establishments, which means that the average work force in each one of these establishments is under 20 employees. This industry is really a Canadian industry. It is 96 per cent Canadian owned. A lot of them are family owned and have been in business for many years.

What has happened recently is a disaster. Like many of our other industries the printing industry has been hit very hard by the recession, but even worse by free trade.

Last year my province of Ontario lost 5,500 printing jobs. There is 14 per cent unemployment among printers themselves. In the rest of the country we lost 4,700 jobs in just one year in this industry which is quintessentially Canadian. In just one year, last year, we lost 10,200 jobs. The people who work in this industry are proud and fine people.

What has this done to our trading relationship with the United States? We do about $750 million annual trade both ways with the United States, but our deficit in trade with the United States in 1988 was $106 million. Last year it was $332 million. This was an increase in our trading deficit of 213 per cent. This is not good for Canada. The loss of jobs is not good for Canada. There is the loss of foreign exchange.

Now why has this happened? The printing industry has analysed its plight. It cites the high Canadian dollar. It says that under free trade because the industry is small, under 20 employees per firm, the industry needs it more than the five year phase-out of tariffs under the free trade deal. The printing industry asked for the 10 years and did not get it. So consequently, it has been left at a competitive disadvantage. The higher taxes in Canada are cited, including lower capital cost allowances to invest in new machinery and equipment.

One of the interesting facts is the actual working of the free trade agreement itself under the country of origin markings. Since free trade, because of this factor alone $160,000 in sales and 1,700 jobs have been lost.

The U.S. laws are more stringent. They are enforced with greater zeal and there is a buy American program. Our printers simply want a level playing field. They are prepared to compete but they are not getting it from our laws or from our enforcement of the free trade.

We have to support our industry. It has come up with its own buy Canadian program, a printed in Canada logo, proudly Canadian. This is the industry's answer to the buy American program. Let us get behind our printers and give them the support that only government can and which they so richly deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly answer the hon. member for Willowdale by telling him that Revenue Canada Customs and Excise is in charge of enforcing the marking of imported goods order requiring that the country of origin be marked on some imports when they come into Canada.

As regards the marking of printed material, requirements are as stringent in Canada as in the United States. Generally, there should be a country of origin marking on all stationery items, lithographic prints and printed matter.

In response to the concerns of the Canadian Printing Industries Association, our officials have undertaken a review of how we enforce the marking of imported goods order.

We are working in particular on administrative directives regarding the size and location of the country of origin markings as well as on amendments to current exemptions for printed matter.

We expect these guidelines to strike a balance between the Canadian requirements and the American ones. We met with the Canadian Printing Industries Association in April to give a progress report on this.

Before any change is implemented, the importing community and the printing associations will of course have to be advised of the changes we plan in terms of the enforcement of the marking requirements.

As far as the enforcement of the program by Customs is concerned, I can assure you that our officials enforce the order most cleverly.

Moreover, complaints from the Canadian Printing Industries Association have been investigated and, when required, corrective measures have been taken.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, June 5, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration a question regarding the dismal unemployment statistics released that day.

I received a very unsatisfactory answer. It was unsatisfactory not only to myself, but also to many Canadians across this country and especially people who are unemployed.

The figures announced that day gave the unemployment rate at 11.2 per cent for the month of May. Now the prospect of finding a job in my province of Prince Edward Island is even worse because the unemployment figures there are 19.1 per cent. That is the highest monthly unemployment rate ever reported by Statistics Canada in my province. There is a personal face behind all these statistics.

• (1840)

People need jobs. They need jobs for their self-respect and for their dignity. Certainly these people are looking to the federal government to change some of its economic policies because these policies simply have not worked. Although inflation is important, job creation must also be a part of the federal government's economic strategy.

Perhaps more than anyone else in this country, Canadian youth is paying the price of this government's economic policies. The unemployment rate among youths in this country is 17.8 per cent. There are 114,000 fewer young people employed this year than in May of last year. Right now many students are looking for work and they have little or no hope of finding summer jobs.

In Atlantic Canada the youth unemployment rate is 30.3 per cent. That figure is unacceptable. I am astounded that this government does not recognize the need to act on this very serious situation.

Many of these students were planning to work this summer to pay for their expenses at college or at university next year. This government has simply let them down because it has not taken any action to provide the much needed jobs.

At the same time this government is hurting students in other ways. It has not recognized that the cost allowance for students under the student loan program has not been increased since 1984 even though tuition fees and other expenses continue to go up every year.

I want to end by saying there is no question that we need a change of leadership. We need new economic policies. We need policies that will create jobs.

For the sake of all Canadians, let us hope that this change comes sooner rather than later.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to provide the hon. member for Malpeque with some more information on the questions she herself raised here in this House on June 5.

The government cares about the difficult situation in which Atlantic Canadians find themselves. That is why the government commits $425 million on average every year for regional development projects in the Atlantic provinces.

Furthermore, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency continues to draw up and implement programs that promote economic development in the Atlantic region. By the end of March 1992, a net amount of $745 million had been committed in grants and contributions under ACOA's action program.

The government developed strategies to rebuild and diversify the fishing industry in the Atlantic region. Under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, the Government of Canada will commit a total of $584 million to the fishing sector; $120 million will be allocated to a program to help fish-processing plant workers adjust; $146 million will be spent to help diversify the region's economy; $150 million will be used to reconstitute the fish stocks; $130 million will be allocated under the Labour Force Development Strategy to community development programs and projects intended to help older and aging workers adjust.

Finally, under the Labour Force Development Strategy, unemployment insurance funds for labour market programs have increased 280 per cent, from $500 million in 1990 to $1.95 billion in 1992. These funds will be used to help the unemployed acquire new skills and to encourage the private sector to provide more training for its workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to be adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.45 p.m.

CANADIAN FORCES BASE CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the people in the Digby, Annapolis area who have seen the economic spin-offs from CFB Cornwallis slowly eroding.

Over the past year we have seen the continuous reduction of jobs, resulting in the closing of businesses, the threat of school closures, and the downsizing of a base to a station. All this activity is taking place without the government being honest in stating that the base is gradually closing.

Today we have a group of non-partisan politicians from Nova Scotia presenting to the government, parliamentarians of all stripes both in the Senate and the House of Commons, the need to find some activity for Cornwallis until the Department of National Defence starts recruiting English speaking new recruits again.

This is a cruel process to impose on the people of South West Nova. People already have been adversely affected by the bad economic policies of this government in this area.

I call on the government to stop this downsizing and to act on the proposals put forth in the past and today by this group of non-partisan politicians from Nova Scotia to keep Cornwallis working both for National Defence and the people of South West Nova.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, there are increasing signs that the Canadian economy is expanding. Production rose during the first quarter, and exports reached record levels last March. Operating profits also rose during the first quarter of this year.

In May employment went up by 0.3 per cent. The manufacturing sector showed the most significant improvement with an increase of 41,000 jobs over the past two months.

In 1991, despite economic problems, business productivity increased by 1.5 per cent, the biggest annual gain since 1985. As a result the cost of doing business went down, which in twin makes us more competitive.

What is particularly welcome, is the permanent aspect of Canada's economic recovery. Thanks to this government's economic policies, economic recovery will accelerate during the months to come and, more important, we have the assurance of durable and non-inflationary growth of the Canadian economy.

SIKHS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, Canada is home to the largest population of Sikhs living outside India. Canadian Sikhs have declared this week a week of mourning in commemoration of those who lost their lives during the vicious attack by the Indian army on the Golden Temple at Amritsar which took place on June 4, 1984.

The Indian government's two-day military assault resulted in the deaths of thousands of Sikh men, women and children. To this day the Indian government continues to engage in activities that violate the most fundamental of human rights.

Amnesty International reports that Sikh prisoners have been detained for months or years without trial, that incidents of torture during interrogation are common, and that the arrest and detention of some detainees remain unacknowledged for weeks or months.

This is a damning record for a country that billed itself as one of the world's largest democracies.

Canada has very good relations with India. I would ask the minister of external affairs to urge the Indian government to cease its persecution of Indian Sikhs. India's actions against its own population are deplorable and thought should be given that present or future bilateral aid to India be made conditional on the commitment of the Indian government to solve its internal problems peacefully.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, now that the last chance constitutional talks are getting started, the federal government and the provinces should agree to enshrine in the Constitution a provision that guarantees the growth, promotion and protection of Canada's linguistic minorities. It is essential to amend the Constitution to include a clause recognizing the equal status, rights and privileges of francophone and anglophone linguistic communities in New Brunswick. Equality must extend to the right to have separate educational institutions and the cultural institutions that are needed to protect and promote these communities.

I hope the Government of Quebec will agree, without reservation, that our new Constitution makes it possible for Francophone minorities across the country to take their rightful place in Canada's great bilingual multicultural family.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement again has proven itself to be a great asset to Canada in a trade dispute with the United States.

Yesterday the minister of trade announced that a dispute settlement panel voted unanimously in favour of Canada's position on yet another important trade issue. Canada has strongly opposed the U.S. position over how to deal with the interest costs in determining the North American content of Canadian built Japanese cars.

We have said from the beginning that these costs were indeed a part of the calculation and once again we have been proven right.

This victory will have very positive direct results on the GM Suzuki combined car assembly factory in Ingersoll, Ontario. The decision is also an important step down the road toward a positive resolution to the Honda dispute.

This panel decision again demonstrates the FTA dispute settlement mechanism works and works well.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS CANADA TRAINING CENTRE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, in September 1988 the government made an announcement which stated that it was going to construct a new residence building at the Emergency Preparedness Canada Training Centre in Arnprior.

It was to be completed by December 1990. Nothing has been done yet. From time to time rumours have been floating around to the effect that the government was going to move the training centre to another location. In recent months this rumour has been very strong and seems to be coming from very valid sources.

The community was upset. The employees were upset. People from across Canada who had taken courses there were upset. Over the weekend the mayor of Arnprior and I organized a meeting for Tuesday evening, June 9.

Mayors, county councillors, other elected people and a large segment of the population and media came to the meeting. Recent publicity on last night's meeting obviously brought the rumour mongering to a halt because the Minister of Supply and Services as the regional minister sent a letter to the mayor late yesterday afternoon stating that the Emergency Preparedness Canada Training Centre would remain in Arnprior.

• (1410)

I congratulate all concerned and I thank the minister for his help.

CANADA–FRANCE MARITIME BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, not only have we won an important dispute under the free trade agreement but we are winning in other international forums, as we said we would.

On behalf of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I am very pleased to inform this House that the International Court of Arbitration rendered a decision today in New York City on the Canada–France maritime boundary dispute. The decision has largely confirmed Canada's jurisdiction over the disputed waters located south of Newfoundland and St.Pierre and Miquelon. The court has awarded France very little of the area that it had claimed. France had claimed an area outside the 12 mile territorial sea of 13,703 square nautical miles. It was awarded 2,537 square nautical miles, part of it in the deep waters of the Laurentian Channel which contains virtually no fishery resources.

The elimination of the large disputed zone means that the management of the groundfish resources in subdivision 3PS is now under Canadian control.

DAKOTA OJIBWAY PROBATION SERVICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Canada's only native run probation service will die this Friday and its case files will be handed over to the province of Manitoba if the Solicitor General will not renew its funding.

The Dakota Ojibway Probation Service has served native communities in southern Manitoba for seven years, recording success levels 5 to 10 per cent higher than the provincial average, according to a University of Manitoba study.

Native parolees are counselled and supervised in their aboriginal languages, referred to drug and alcohol treatment programs in their own language, and receive guidance from their elders in a traditional way.

Manitoba is willing to continue funding on a 50/50 basis but the federal government refuses to renew funding because of a manufactured jurisdictional dispute with the province over probation services on reserves.

If the federal government could find just $180,000 out of its massive constitutional or PR budgets, it could fund this probation service for a whole year. If it had its priorities straight, it would fund the program permanently.

CANADA–FRANCE MARITIME BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, today in New York the arbitration panel adjudicating the boundary dispute between Canada and France rendered a very important and historic decision.

The decision reassures Canada and the world that the position the Government of Canada has taken has been accepted. About one-sixth of the St.Pierre bank will be under the control of St.Pierre and Miquelon and the French, and less than 20 per cent of the claim made by France outside the territorial sea has been accepted.

There will be no groundfish controlled by France off the south coast of Newfoundland. It is in 3PS, an area depended upon by the fishermen of the south coast of Newfoundland. Canada has achieved effective control over this area and its management system will be held intact and unchallenged.

JOB TRAINING

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to condemn this government for removing without notice funding for two important job training programs for mothers on social assistance in metro Toronto.

The government removed funding on April 1 for the YWCA's Focus on Change and the Dixon Hall Neighbourhood Centre's STEP program, and it did not give either program an opportunity to find alternate sources of funding.

By its decision to gear job training programs only to those who qualify for unemployment insurance payments—and I believe this program is the creation of the minister responsible for that area of the city—the government risks creating systemic barriers to job training and permanent welfare statistics out of these women.

If these two job training programs for sole support mothers are lost, choices for women will be seriously limited. The decision to cut funding defies reason and shows a lack of compassion.

TRIBUTE TO JULIE PAYETTE

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Ahuntsic, I am very pleased, on behalf of my constituents and myself, to congratulate Julie Payette who is originally from Ahuntsic, on being chosen from among 5,330 male and female candidates as Quebec's first and Canada's second woman astronaut—no doubt the youngest woman ever to participate in the space shuttle program.

Ms. Payette is an important symbol not only for women but for all young Canadians, whether they live in Quebec or any other province of Canada.

I want to point out the great scientific, intellectual, artistic and athletic abilities of my riding's new heroine. Good luck, Julie. We are very proud and honoured in my riding.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on April 1, I met with the Prime Minister regarding Mrs. Henriette Haddad, a Canadian citizen taken hostage in Lebanon in 1985 and not heard of since.

This meeting was held in the presence of Mrs. Haddad's son and friends of the family where the Prime Minister promised he would do everything possible to locate Mrs. Haddad and obtain her release.

To the Prime Minister's credit, he did write to the presidents of Syria, Lebanon and Iran requesting their co-operation and the government also sought UN assistance.

Consequently I was shocked yesterday to read a report that authorities were working to obtain the release of the last two western hostages in Lebanon, two German citizens, with no mention of Mrs. Haddad.

I plead with the government to follow this up immediately to make sure that Mrs. Haddad, the only Canadian hostage, is not forgotten and that a release is actively pursued.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, research and development lay the groundwork for industrial success and Canadian companies are proving that the policies of this government have provided an environment where innovative technology can flourish.

Since the implementation of increased patent protection for pharmaceuticals five years ago, Glaxo Canada Inc., based in Mississauga, has increased R and D funding to nearly $30 million annually.

Over the next five years, Glaxo expects to spend over $270 million on R and D in Canada. These investment levels far exceed the commitment undertaken by pharmaceutical manufacturers to spend 10 per cent of sales on R and D.

Increased investment has meant increased employment opportunities for Canadians as Glaxo's work force has increased from 400 to more than 1,000 in the past five years.

Glaxo's commitment to Canada continues. In April the company inaugurated new corporate headquarters in Mississauga and broke ground on the same site for a $70 million manufacturing facility slated for completion in 1995. I congratulate the people of Glaxo Canada Inc.—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister confirmed that the government was indeed considering spending $4.3 billion to acquire military helicopters designed for fighting Soviet submarines, a threat that no longer exists today. Furthermore, these helicopters would be made in Europe, contrary to what the Minister of National Defence suggested yesterday to reporters.

Does the Acting Prime Minister not find it strange that the government is preparing to spend billions of dollars to fight Soviet submarines, when next week he will dine with Boris Yeltsin, the President of Russia? At that time the Russian president will ask for money not to fuel his submarines but to feed his people.

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, the minister also indicated yesterday that no decisions have been made on this matter.

Obviously we take into consideration the change in the global situation as we look at our requirements. It is important to recognize that what we are looking at are replacement helicopters for our search and rescue missions over the oceans.

I am sure my hon. colleagues would agree that is a very important mission for our Canadian Armed Forces. I think there were over 200 lives saved as a result of those missions in the past two years. We must have capable equipment.

On looking at any decisions of this nature we will take into account not only the global situation and the capability but obviously the cost effectiveness of whatever equipment may be required.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when asked about whether we even need these helicopters the Prime Minister said: "I have not the foggiest idea".

That is the problem with members of this government. They do not have the foggiest idea what they are doing in this file and many other files. When we ask for money for infrastructure they have none, but when it comes to high-tech toys they spend money like drunken sailors. To be fair, drunken sailors spend their own money, not taxpayers' money.

• (1420)

How come there is money for helicopters like that and none for infrastructure when a lot of experts say that of course we will need some helicopters sooner or later but not these very expensive helicopters? They are not needed any more to fight Soviet submarines.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, first, with respect, I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition would want to reflect on the words he used to describe sailors. Men and women who serve in our navy are honourable and outstanding representatives of this country.

Second, I would also suggest to my hon. colleague: Is he saying, for example, that we should not have safe, capable equipment to provide search and rescue over the oceans? Should we not have safe helicopters that we can provide the fisheries patrol which I know is so important to members from the eastern provinces?

All of these are ongoing tasks of our naval requirements. We will be going through a process of review. The Minister of National Defence will be making recommendations in due course to cabinet about what the most appropriate equipment should be, taking into account all factors in order to meet those needs.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

When asked about infrastructure programs the government has the habit of saying—and I have heard the Minister of Finance saying it in this House—that the municipalities do not have money to pay their one-third.

At the conference in Montreal the Federation of Canadian Municipalities did a survey and 87 per cent of the people there said that they were in favour of this program of one-third, one-third, one-third, and 83 per cent of them said they would have no problem finding the money to do the job at the moment. By a margin of five to one they said that the problems they were having in the cities today with their infrastructure were hurting business opportunities.

What do we need more at this moment: to help our cities, to create jobs in Canada and not in Great Britain, or to buy expensive helicopters that are not needed, that type of helicopter, at this time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows very well the security of our nation is clearly the responsibility of the federal government. Our defence capability is clearly the responsibility of the federal government. Those are clear priorities the federal government has to observe and has to implement.

Obviously he knows very well that the kind of infrastructure program he is talking about is essentially the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities. I indicated to the hon. member on many occasions that he wants to go on a spending spree. He wants to go on a spending spree, suggesting that the provinces put up one-third, the municipalities put up one-third and the federal government puts up one-third.

There is only one taxpayer. The priorities of this government are to respond effectively in those areas of responsibility and jurisdiction that are clearly within the domain of the federal government.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It is not a matter of spending but a matter of priorities. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence said that those criticizing the government's priorities regarding the acquisition of the British helicopters were guilty of appeasement. What an outrageous analogy.

Are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians across Canada who want jobs guilty of appeasement? Is the mayor of Montreal who wants jobs for the unemployed in his city guilty of appeasement? Are one million children who line up at food banks guilty of appeasement? Are 8 million Canadians who do not have adequate sewer systems guilty of appeasement?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, if I could iterate once again, I am sure my hon. colleague is quite aware of the national defence policy which came out last fall and was updated. It clearly set out what are the roles and responsibilities of national defence.

We have a budget within which we have to operate. Part of that budget goes for capital equipment. One of our approaches is to increase the amount of our existing approved budgets for capital equipment in order that our men and women will have the appropriate equipment. One of the projects within that existing budget is replacement helicopters.

This is a question of how we are going to deal with the issue within the Department of National Defence, recognizing that our budget has been constrained over the last few years and will continue to be constrained.

Nevertheless, we do believe that the replacement helicopters for search and rescue, for fisheries patrol, for drug interdiction, for all the new roles that our navy will be taking on, are very important priorities.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in order of importance are the 1.5 million Canadians who are looking for work not important to this government?

What about the one million children right now who are lining up at food banks? Are those children important to this government? What about the eight million Canadians who do not have sanitary sewers?

We ask the government once again: Would it not be a better priority to put money into a public works program now to get Canadians working and help rebuild our cities? Is that not a question of real government priority?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member suggesting that the Government of Canada should put Armed Forces personnel into equipment that is unsafe?

The helicopters that are proposed to be replaced are 35 years old. Surely she should take that into consideration.

In order for our men and women to carry out their responsibilities, to carry out and preserve the security and integrity of the country, we need not only personnel but equipment to do the job.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, further on the helicopters, I give government members the benefit of the doubt and suggest that they do not know what they are talking about rather than suggest they are intentionally misleading the Canadian people.

The helicopters that are being proposed and publicly recommended by the chief of defence staff are EH–101 helicopters specifically designed for anti–submarine purposes. That is why they are so expensive: $91 million a crack.

Those helicopters are simply not justified now that the Soviet threat is over. I call on the Minister of National Defence or the associate minister to kill the program today.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make clear to my hon. colleague, who I know is a member of the national defence standing committee and is very knowledgeable in matters of national defence, that whatever choice of helicopter is made it has to meet certain requirements that we have. It has to be capable and it has to be cost effective.

The EH–101 has some of those capabilities. It may or may not be the helicopter that would come forward as a final proposal to cabinet. No decisions have been made. No recommendations have yet been made, and we are going to be looking at all these factors.

I think of the bottom line. I hope my hon. colleague would agree, because just recently in British Columbia there was an incident, a very sad incident, involving the use of one of our old Labrador helicopters. We have to move to replace them with modern, safe, effective equipment not only for our own men and women in the Armed Forces but to ensure we maintain the safety of Canadian lives that may be at risk from time to time on the oceans off both our coasts.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, if the government spent its defence dollars on maintaining equipment that was used for search and rescue instead of on cold war weaponry that is completely useless, then it would have the support of this side of the House.

Yesterday, in trying to defend the indefensible, the expenditure of $4.3 billion on these Soviet seeking helicopters, the Prime Minister said: "We must be ready to meet threats that affect the national interests of Canadians".

• (1430)

Will the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that with the end of the Soviet threat the national interest of Canadians is best served not by wasting $4.3 billion on these helicopters but on having Canadians fully employed, our young people properly educated, and our children properly fed?

An hon. member: And the NDP would wipe out the armed forces. An interesting policy.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I feel the hon. member is really giving the wrong impression. It is not a choice of one or the other.

The question is within the Department of National Defence, within our budget which is allocated and which the hon. member approved at committee, how we will spend those moneys most effectively to meet our missions.

In the National Defence policy statement which we put out we talked about the new roles for the Canadian navy, not the old role of fighting the Soviet Union. We know that is gone, we all know that. There are new important domestic roles: the protection of sovereignty, the protection of our coastal resources, drug interdiction, search and rescue. All are important missions that I am sure all hon. colleagues would support us on.

We need to ensure we have the capabilities to provide those missions and to provide the equipment for them in the best and most cost effective manner.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister must surely know that if the role is as she defines it, search and rescue, fishing patrols, then a totally different helicopter is required.

I come back to the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

How can the government justify this kind of expenditure when it was unable to find $40 million to finance summer employment programs or $2.7 million for the Court Challenges Program or $20 million for housing co-operatives?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member recalls the budget when it came out earlier this year. Within that budget the government set out expenditure priorities for a whole range of activities.

One of those activities that is clearly within the federal government's responsibility and a major priority, is the defence of our country. Within our budget, which has been allocated despite the reductions we have had to take over the past few years, one of the priorities in terms of capital equipment is the provision of new modern helicopters which will enable us to undertake the tasks we have been mandated to do.

I am sure my hon. colleague would agree with that and will be working toward providing that equipment in the most cost-effective manner possible.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Canadians living in our large urban centres are becoming increasingly fearful over the rising tide of crime which is undermining both public safety and quality of life. In fact, since 1984 violent crime in Canadian cities has risen some 40 per cent.

Given that our national government spends very little on crime prevention programs in comparison with per capita figures of many other countries around the globe, when will the minister finally reverse this trend? When will she begin to lend greater support to existing preventative organizations like Block Parents and other possible creative solutions so we can assist municipalities in winning back their communities?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada does participate in these kinds of programs. We funded a research project recently by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities to develop strategies for crime prevention.

As the hon. member will know, if he has been in the House over the last few months, I have been working actively with the caucus of big city mayors of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. I have been meeting with police chiefs across the country to develop a strategy to create a national strategic and co-ordinated approach toward the questions of urban crime, urban safety, broadly based urban justice issues.

I welcome the input of the hon. member on how he may be able to discharge that function more effectively. It does require the co-operation of all three levels of government, each exercising discretion in its own jurisdiction as effectively as possible.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

A major component of that rising urban crime is directly related to the chronic problem of drug abuse. Unless local municipalities, police forces and community groups, which are on the firing line of this battle on drugs, get immediate and urgent assistance this war will never be won.

When will the government finally amend its proceeds of crime legislation so as to ensure that moneys secured from drug seizures, which last year alone amounted to over $38 million, will be shared with local municipalities and organizations rather than going exclusively into the federal coffers? It has been promised many times by this government. When will it finally act?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is not simply a question of legislation under the level of the federal government. The provinces themselves are extremely resistant to direct payments by the federal government to the municipalities in this area.

As my colleague, the Solicitor General, has indicated in the House on a number of occasions, we are reviewing this to try to find a way to answer that question.

I also point out that I think my hon. colleague exaggerates the amount of money that is available through the proceeds of crime to distribute.

Recently we have established three task forces in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, the three major drug trafficking centres of the country, to make sure that we get the most benefit out of the proceeds of crime legislation. We are looking to maximize the receipts from the proceeds of crime. Then we can address the question that the member quite rightly raises of the fair and equitable distribution of those proceeds.

I would also point out that in fact the lion's share of the costs of implementing the drug legislation to fight drugs in Canada is borne by the federal government.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice.

Canadians are tired of endless studies on the relationship between visible minorities and the justice system. We need people on the bench who share or at least understand the experience of visible minority youth in our big cities. What will it take for the minister to recognize this and when will she do something about it?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 our government established for the first time in Canada a Canadian judicial centre to provide education to federally appointed judges across this country. Among the kinds of courses that are offered are courses in gender sensitivity and in cultural sensitivity.

In addition I have worked very pro-actively to try and expand the range of people who sit on the federal bench. If the hon. member were to go through the law schools in most Canadian universities she would see that until recent years there is a remarkable absence of visible minorities graduating from law school.

She will also know that one must have been called to the bar for 10 years before being eligible to be appointed to the federal bench. I expect that within the next 10 to 15 years the variety of candidates available for judicial appointment will be much greater and much more consistent with the proportions of people in society in general.

I welcome suggestions from anyone about competent and able people who would be capable to go to the bench and who could illustrate what has been one of my major priorities as Minister of Justice and that is inclusive justice to make the system reflective of all Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

For five years we have been asking the government to enforce the Employment Equity Act in the Public Service. Why does the minister not stop dragging his feet and take action now?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not agree with the hon. member's description of the work being done by Treasury Board.

I will give her some figures, I know opposition members are not very fond of statistics but it is the only way to evaluate the progress we have made. In each of the groups that were designated we have made significant progress. The recruitment rate for women, for instance, has gone up from 42.4 per cent in 1987 to 44.9 per cent in 1991. For native people, there was an increase from 1.8 per cent to 2 per cent; for the disabled, from 2.6 per cent to 3 per cent; and for visible minorities, from 2.7 per cent to 3.6 per cent, in 1991.

This kind of progress may not be satisfactory but it is significant.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Over half a year ago, the task force on professional training in the arts in Canada delivered its report. This task force, as I am sure the minister remembers, was established in April 1990 by his ministry and the Ministry of Communications. It was recognized that improvements had to be made in professional training for the arts in Canada. Yet the minister and his department have not responded to this important report and recommendations.

• (1440)

Can the minister tell us when and if he will respond to the report on professional training of the arts in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the evaluation of that report is ongoing in the department. I have had conversations and contacts with the Minister of Communications who is responsible for the arts sector in Canada. I cannot give a definite date when we can respond or when we will, but we are well advised of the recommendation and are looking at it.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker a supplementary question to the same minister.

Mr. Minister, your department through its labour force training programs play a vital—

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members know that in this Chamber we do ask hon. members to put the question through the Chair. I know the hon. member would want to do that.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, through you to the minister. I am sure the minister is aware that his department through labour force training programs plays a vital role in the professional training of the artist.

Yet people in his department whose expertise is with the cultural sector are not having their contracts renewed. Arts organizations have not been able to meet with the minister or his deputy. In fact, it is being stated that the job of the department is to shut doors to the arts community, not open them, and that the minister has no interest in the arts.

Can the minister tell us if he has any commitment to the arts and if he recognizes the special needs of the artists as well as the important economic role the arts play?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yes, I do.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In 1968 the northern cod stock catch was 815,000 tonnes. Last year it was 127,000 tonnes. This year it is likely to be zero. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans talked about the possibility of his having to close down the fishery for one year, two years or maybe five years.

This means that the plants are going to be closed, the doors locked, boats are going to be tied up and secured, and 30,000 fishermen and fisherpersons will have no jobs and no income.

I ask the minister what contingency funding does the government have to compensate for this lost income?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a hypothetical question. No decision has been made in that regard.

Fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland and Labrador can be reassured by the record of this government to help these persons when in need. Without conjecturing on what can happen in the future, the hon. member can be assured that if the circumstances call for measures to be taken to help these people, we will be true to our tradition as a Parliament and as a government and will do it.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the government was responsible for managing the fishery for the last eight years. It has failed and it is responsible for the fallout.

The minister talks about a hypothetical situation. The government is preparing, as has been discussed in the House, to commit $4.3 billion to something that may or may not happen. By its own admission the government expects and is not prepared to commit one cent to it. That is not only inconsistent, it is also incredible.

I would like to ask the minister one more time, would he consider telling this House what contingency funding, what action plan he has for these Atlantic Canadians who are going to face a situation, possibly, that they have not faced in 500 years?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my answer. This is exactly the same question he asked the first time. I told him and I repeat to members that there is no point in trying to answer a hypothetical question. If he wants to measure the degree of caring of this government for the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador and all of Atlantic Canada he has only to recall all the programs we put in place to help these people. If the need arises we will be there again.

WATER

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As the minister would know, the United States is currently draining about three times its regular flow from the Columbia River basin, causing major economic loss and very serious water shortages in southern British Columbia.

The premier of British Columbia stated that they are now engaged in short and long term negotiations on water exports to the United States but our own external affairs officials said we are not even involved.

On such a crucial issue as the export of Canadian water, why is the federal government not directly involved to ensure the protection of Canada's national interest.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know that this issue relates to the Columbia River Treaty. The treaty I believe is effective to about the year 2024.

I want to assure the hon. member that we take seriously our responsibilities concerning the treaty and want to assure him that while the chief parties are the Bonneville Power Administration and B.C. Hydro, the officials that I have named with responsibilities under the act and under the treaty, are closely involved in the discussions that are taking place.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, just a small correction. The minister should know that the Columbia River Treaty is up for renegotiation in a matter of a few years.

The British Columbia government will be taking off the moratorium on water exports in a matter of a couple of weeks. We have the New Democratic premier of British Columbia talking about water exports to the United States. Yet there is no study of the impact on jobs, recreation and wild life.

I want to ask the minister today if the federal government will initiate a major assessment of the impact on the water basin, particularly in the Columbia River, on jobs, recreation, hydro power as it affects Canada before serious and irreversible decisions are taken by the government of British Columbia.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member says is correct. We need to preserve water and also protect it for both farming and recreational purposes in the areas affected.

I point out to him that my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, also has been active in this regard. Officials of the federal government will address the issue at a meeting with their U.S. counterparts in Washington on June 12 and will outline a proposal for resolution at that time.

I thank the hon. member for bringing it forward and also giving us an opportunity to say what we are doing.

TRADING CARDS

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, for years in this country Canadians of all ages, but mainly young Canadians, have collected trading cards. There were hockey cards, baseball cards, cards on antique cars. It was a healthy hobby.

But a new card which is produced in the United States has started to make its way on to the market. These cards feature serial killers, mass murderers, and gangsters. To say that this is disturbing to me is putting it mildly. I find it disgusting and sick and I ask the Minister of National Revenue what he plans to do to stop the importation of these cards into Canada.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. This sort of material is obscene, disgusting, and has no place in a civilized world. In fact I believe this sort of thing breeds violence.

I can assure the hon. member that since this matter was brought to my attention by our colleague, the hon. member for Burlington, I have instructed all customs officers at all border points to be on the lookout for these cards and other similar material. I for one and others on this side of the House are going to make every effort and take every step necessary to make sure this sort of material is not allowed into Canada.

AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry.

McDonnell–Douglas near Toronto has cut over 1,500 jobs and plans 1,200 more lay–offs in the next year. These 2,700 job losses seem to be tied to the planned sale of 40 per cent of the commercial operations of the U.S. company to a corporation backed by the Taiwanese government.

Given this government involvement and the pressure that could exert on where supplies are purchased by McDonnell–Douglas, I want to ask if the federal government will intervene to fight these job losses as part of the strategy to maintain a high–tech aircraft industry in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, certainly my hon. friend is aware of the importance which this government attaches to the existence and the growth of a high–tech aircraft industry in Canada. That was exemplified by the support we provided for the acquisition by Bombardier of de Havilland.

We have been in touch on an ongoing basis with the representatives of McDonnell–Douglas Canada Ltd. and continue to be in touch with them to follow what steps might be being taken by their parent company in relation to the Taiwanese interest and what the implications might mean for Canada. At this point I am not in a position to be more precise than that but I appreciate the hon. member raising the question.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the local CAW union has today faxed a letter to the minister outlining how hard workers are being hit by this situation and requesting an urgent meeting.

I want to ask the minister if he will commit himself to meet with this union in order to try to save these thousands of jobs that are so important to the economy of Toronto and Ontario.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is curious that my hon. friend would have a copy of that letter before I would have it.

I will look out for this letter. Obviously the maintenance and increase in the number of jobs in that part of the country is very important to the government. I might say on a personal note that it is very important because it is very close to my own constituency. That is why I take an ongoing interest in it, as my colleagues from Bramalea—Gore—Malton and Brampton ridings do as well.

I look forward to receiving a copy of that letter and making some decisions accordingly.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The recession was supposed to be over in March 1991. However, for thousands of Montrealers, Quebecers and Canadians who are still unemployed, the situation has not improved. According to the latest issue of the magazine Commerce, large Canadian companies in the resource sector have been severely hit by the recession.

Does the minister hold out any hope for better days in this industry?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

There were a number of initiatives in the budget that are beginning to show positive results to complement the medium term macro economic policy that we have established of price stability and sustainable growth.

She will note that there has been positive growth in the first quarter of this year. There has been a tremendous upturn in merchandise trade, $12.8 billion in the month of March, which establishes an all-time record. There has been increasing activity in the manufacturing sector. Orders are up by 9 per cent. Shipments are up by .8 per cent and .9 per cent. There has been an increase in the number of jobs in the manufacturing sector of 41,000. There has been a total increase in employment by 31,000, as registered last month.

While the recovery is not as robust as we would like to see it, there are clear signs the positive measures in the budget that we have brought in are taking hold and producing positive results.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

He will know that the Canadian share of the U.S. steel market has remained at about 3 per cent from 1988 to 1991, whereas the American's share of our steel market has climbed from 7 per cent to 16 per cent in the same period.

Will he tell the House how he expects to defend Canada's steel jobs under the free trade agreement as it is now, when a binational dispute panel would be limited by the FTA to deciding only if the Americans had applied their own trade laws correctly?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my hon. friend puts down the successes of the dispute settlement panels.

We just had one announced yesterday in the acceptance of the Canadian position on non-mortgage interest, a very important feature for a matter that has been raised by members on his side in relation to the Honda Motor Car Company.

I raised the very same issues, the very same statistics, with Mrs. Hills yesterday. I sought her assistance and encouraged her to make sure that the industry there was aware of the integrated nature of the Canadian and the United States industry, and in that way, hopefully, head off some of the actions that could be taken by the U.S. industry.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate that the minister did not answer the question or even grapple with the question.

IPSCO Steel Company, which is based in the west, during the eighties transferred a good deal of its production and jobs to the United States because of a countervail of 30 per cent.

Unless the subsidy negotiations are completed, how will the minister defend Canadian steel jobs now when the U.S. Congress can, under FTA article 1902, amend its trade laws without the consent of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the point my hon. friend has just made is quite valid. It underscores the strengthened position that Canada has in comparison to any other country in the world.

The point that my hon. friend made about IPSCO is only part of the story. The other part of the story is that they have just recently announced they had very successful operations last year.

Regarding the negotiations on countervail and the definition of subsidy, my hon. friend is very well aware that these have been carried out in the Uruguay round. We are hopeful that we will see a successful Uruguay round and the features of the Uruguay round that apply to the definition of subsidy and countervail will be applied to the free trade agreement to our benefit.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister's own department, through CANMET, did a study on the Westray mine. That study revealed various concerns which related to the ventilation system and to the risk of spontaneous combustion.

I know the minister shared these concerns with his cabinet colleagues. Did he share these concerns with the Nova Scotia government? If so, did he get any assurances as to safety from the Nova Scotia government?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the CANMET review is not a study; in fact, the CANMET review is a review of all the other mining consulting studies that went before—the Dames and Moore study was prominent among them—but there were four or five studies, all of them well known to the Nova Scotia authorities.

It was on the basis of those studies that they made their determinations, and it was on the basis of those studies that we decided to give a loan guarantee to the bank for this mine because of the job creation potential that was there.

In fact, the CANMET study did not do what the hon. member refers to, it gave a very balanced review of all the previous reviews and said that this mine was technically feasible, economically feasible, and that the dangers to which the hon. member refers are not uncommon in all coal mining enterprises. They were to be looked at and accommodated when the mine was developed.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the concerns raised by CANMET were in the documents that the minister released to the House. Surely he cannot deny them.

• (1500)

Bearing these concerns in mind, all we want to know is: Why did he not go to the Nova Scotia government and ask for assurances that these safety concerns would be addressed and what the Nova Scotia government would do to address these concerns?

Will the minister tell us what the Nova Scotia government said and, if not, will he please agree to a parliamentary inquiry so that we can get to the bottom of this?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, let me help the hon. member with the chronology. The next step after the review would be to have the mine developed.

When the mine was developed it then became the responsibility of the province, not only to inspect the mine on a regular basis for safety and for health but also to make sure that what was being done there was in compliance with all provincial regulations.

The CANMET review was very helpful in pointing out various things that the inspectors and the Nova Scotia authorities would look to when they did their inspections of safety and health. But the CANMET review was only one brief document of many more important documents which of course were also available to the provincial government.

THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE CLIFFORD VAN ROGGEN

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak on behalf of all British Columbians and to express our sadness at the loss Monday night of a great British Columbian, Senator George van Roggen, who died in Vancouver at the age of 70.

Senator van Roggen and I did not share the same party, but I think all members in this House agree that there are people in public life in this country who transcend the definitions of partisanship and who win the respect, admiration and affection of all who come to know them and have had the opportunity to work with them.

George van Roggen was part of a long tradition of British Columbians who have excelled both in the law and in public life. He not only lived up to that tradition but he advanced it.

He was born of a Dutch family and attended the University of British Columbia for his undergraduate and law degrees. Despite a physical disability, he served his country in World War II with great distinction as a member of the Canadian Scottish Reserve.

As a young lawyer who practised law in Yukon, he often referred to his Yukon years as among the best of his years before the bar. Back in Vancouver he rose to a partnership in the very distinguished Vancouver firm of Douglas, Symes and Brissenden.

During his successful legal career, Senator van Roggen always held a passion for politics. For 30 years he nurtured the Liberal Party in British Columbia both provincially and federally. His many friends of all parties will remember his efforts and achievements to make politics more relevant to the concerns of all British Columbians and to ensure the quality of public debate and service.

Prime Minister Trudeau brought Senator van Roggen to Ottawa in 1971. Much is said these days about the Senate, but let me say that Senator van Roggen worked as hard as any person in Ottawa to bring B.C. concerns to the national stage.

His interest extended beyond just domestic issues. He thought deeply and wisely about Canada's role in the world. He served as chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs from 1974 to 1988 and served as co-chair and member for the Canadian Inter-parliamentary Committees for Europe and the United States. He was no less aware of Canada's potential role in Asia and travelled to Japan in 1976 as a member of a Canadian parliamentary delegation.

It was his devotion to the interests of British Columbia and his perspective on Canada's role in the world that made him an articulate spokesman for free trade. He may be best remembered recently for his support of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and his eloquent analysis of the threat to Canada of international protectionism.

We remember George van Roggen as a man of service, as a man of commitment and as a man of courage. I might just say that last evening when I talked to members of the British Columbia caucus about my plan to rise in the House today to pay tribute to George van Roggen, I was struck by the warmth and the spontaneity of their remarks about this remarkable man and how much they see him as really an outstanding figure on the national stage and how much they regret his loss.

That is a sentiment shared by all British Columbians and all members of this House who I know will join with me in extending personal condolences to his wife Jane and his two children Norman and Trish.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to associate fully the members of the Official Opposition with, to use their own words, the warm and spontaneous tribute which the minister has paid to our colleague, the late Senator George van Roggen.

Senator van Roggen was hailed yesterday in the Senate by one of our colleagues as a prince of a man. He was refined but with a common touch. He was wise but not pompous. He was thoughtful, articulate and a thorough gentleman. He was highly esteemed and greatly respected among all our contemporaries.

The reason why Senator van Roggen earned that tribute, which I am sure we all share, was out of his deep conviction and his deep commitment to the future of Canada. His participation in the political process was of long standing. It was productive, imaginative and it was rewarded in due course by the possibility of participating in the upper Chamber. There he made his reputation in a very short time as a most capable chairman of the foreign relations committee of the Senate.

He took a leading part in the review of our trade policies in a way that not only has been evident in his participation in the free trade discussions, but on a much broader scale as well with his interest in Asia and the Pacific in particular which arose in part from his deep love and commitment to British Columbia.

As a fellow Vancouverite, I share his commitment to the interests of his native province and his native city and I want to associate very much with the minister's tribute to George van Roggen today. We will miss him. We will miss his wisdom, his very real courage in bearing a personal handicap. We want very much to send our condolences and our sympathy to Mrs. van Roggen and their two children on their loss, which is not only a personal one but a loss to all of Canada.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament from the lower mainland of British Columbia, I had the privilege of knowing Senator George van Roggen and working with him as one of the senators from our province.

When you knew George van Roggen, you were struck by his tireless work for Canada. He was a man who was interested in Canada and Canadian affairs and was a tireless advocate of the positions he took.

I knew him and worked with him on the Canada—U.S. Parliamentary Group, one of the most important groups we have in this Parliament. We get a chance to work with American senators and other members of Parliament in dealing with the great issues between us and the Americans.

Senator van Roggen had strong views on issues, especially the trade issue, and he advocated those views very effectively, to some of us on the other side almost too effectively, but he advocated them and one admired that and saw it as the work of a very good senator.

He was a long-time member of the B.C. and Yukon bar associations. I am told that at one point he was the only lawyer in the town of Whitehorse. Of course, he did that job very well.

He had a long-time practice with a large Vancouver law firm and he practised there, I am told, from 1957 until 1981. Mr. Speaker, you and I practised law in Vancouver over the same period and we shared memories, times and work with Senator van Roggen.

When he went to the Senate in 1981, he was interested in areas of foreign relations, trade, Asia Pacific, matters that really concerned the people of British Columbia. He took on those issues and advocated his position very effectively. To his wife Jane, son Norman and his daughter Trish, I want to extend the sympathy of the members of my party, the New Democratic Party, especially those members from British Columbia, for their loss and a loss to all of us of a very dear distinguished Canadian.

• (1510)

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to add just a few comments about the loss of a very great British Columbian.

Senator van Roggen was a forthright, powerful person in political life in the province of British Columbia. Like all British Columbians, he did not hesitate to share his opinions, whether they were contrary or in favour of where you stood in public life.

During the brief period of time that I was premier of the province of British Columbia, Senator van Roggen and I disagreed on almost every single issue. In every instance he was a perfect gentleman. I hope people can say the same about me.

There is a spirit of British Columbia that perhaps separates us from other regions as their spirit separates them, but in our province bluntness, frankness and openness is a hallmark of some of the tremendous leaders in our province.

The one comment that I want to make on the area that we agreed on completely was in the expansioned Asia Pacific. Senator van Roggen was a forceful speaker throughout Canada for our position and its peculiar needs in Asia Pacific.

Senator van Roggen will be greatly missed, but he will be remembered lovingly as the kind of British Columbian who comes to the province, becomes totally absorbed in Canada and in British Columbia and gives full measure of his life to the area that he comes from and to all people in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, firt of all, I want to thank you for your kindness in giving me this opportunity to say a few words about Senator van Roggen, whom I have known since 1964.

He was a proud citizen of your majestic province. To know him was to know the other person's point of view. The previous speaker, Mr. Barrett, said that one could disagree with him, and I know he himself did. However, although one could profoundly disagree with some of Senator van Roggen's positions, in the process one came to understand the real meaning of democracy and friendship.

I had the good fortune to know him as far back as 1964, and in 1968, at the convention where we were both on the same side—not on the winning side, I admit—I started to understand what was meant by western pride. In all modesty, I hope that our friendship also helped acquaint him with the point of view of a French Canadian from Quebec, which I am, have always been and shall remain.

I think students would do well to read the lengthy reports of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs which the senator chaired so brilliantly. The reports on Canada's relations with the Middle East and on free trade are still very topical and also interesting for what they reveal about the personality of Senator van Roggen, whose passing we mourn today.

We wish to extend our sincere condolences to his wife Jane and his children, and we hope that many parliamentarians will be able to take the time to show their regard and appreciation for the true aristocrat we learned to know so well.

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I mourn as well personally for the late Senator George van Roggen and want to add a word about my own contact with him over the decades, not as a close friend but certainly as one who was a great admirer of his.

Senator van Roggen has been spoken of here today as a great Canadian and as a great British Columbia and, of course, he will be remembered in those regards.

I think of him also as a great Liberal, one who contributed to the stream of thought which characterizes the evolution of ideas within the Liberal Party.

George was a great contributor of ideas, a stalwart who stuck to his guns, had a very firm view of how this nation should evolve, and whether our party ended up agreeing or disagreeing with him he remained loyal to us. At a time when Liberals were strong in Toronto perhaps but not so strong in the west, he remained one who would always stand up and carry our banner forward. I think in that all members would agree, in keeping any political party strong and helping to strengthen the democracy of Canada.

I will miss also a man of great personal courage who was constantly in pain, yet constantly ready as someone in the other place said like a teenager, constantly ready to come forward with enthusiasm to put his ideas on the table, to debate them, to engage your own ideas, to try again and again to carry forward his own Liberal vision of our country.

He was a wonderful example and I was inspired by him when I first arrived. As I got older and older, I watched him remain as young, enthusiastic and committed to putting forward ideas and winning arguments as ever.

He was a pioneer in his part of the country. He is an inspiration to young Candians, he is an inspiration within our party, someone of whom we will always be very proud, and someone whom we shall miss.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 20 petitions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to report to the House today on the latest developments in the situation in Bosnia and Hercegovina and on my recent meetings in Europe.

I want to talk about peacekeeping in this context and in the context of the UN Secretary General's efforts to secure the Sarajevo airport. I will also talk about our continued participation in the peacekeeping operation in Cyprus.

The situation in Bosnia–Hercegovina has deteriorated to the point where even relief convoys are attacked with impunity. This is a direct challenge to the credibility of the UN's current peacekeeping operation. For this reason and after considerable thought, we have agreed to a request from the UN Secretary-General that in the event the ceasefire holds he reassign Canadian peacekeepers to keep the Sarajevo airport secure to allow humanitarian relief to reach the general population.

[Translation]

The mechanized infantry batallion of 850 Royal 22nd Regiment soldiers will be redeployed from Croatia once circumstances permit.

The first phase of the Secretary-General's plan for securing the Sarajevo airport is already underway with the deployment of 60 unarmed military observers today under the command of Canadian General Mackenzie.

On the basis of the mission's assessment, the security council will decide if conditions permit entering into the second phase of this operation. These conditions were established by the UN last Friday with Serbian, Bosnian moslem, and Croatian parties to the conflict: That artillery and anti-aircraft weapons capable of reaching the airport be withdrawn and placed under UN supervision.

[English]

We fervently hope the mission can achieve the conditions necessary for the deployment of UN forces.

• (1520)

This may continue to be a difficult situation to manage. As on numerous occasions since the beginning of the Yugoslav conflict, risks of the cease-fire collapsing are very high. It is also imperative that the UN protect the humanitarian operation once forces have been deployed.

Dangers will still exist in Sarajevo, but our Canadian forces leadership has determined that these difficult assignments are feasible provided initial conditions can be satisfied. I believe that Canada had to respond favourably and actively to the Secretary-General's request, after considerable thought about the implications.

His decision is consistent with our commitment to bring an end to the fighting in Bosnia and bring relief to the innocent. It is also consistent with the statements we have made and the calls to action that we have given to the United Nations throughout the tragic series of events over the past months.

It also confirms that our commitment to security in Europe remains undiminished. I was able to reinforce this commitment during a series of meetings in Europe last week.

NATO made an historic decision in Oslo. In the past, NATO's role was to provide security against attack on alliance members from the countries in the east.

Today, those same countries in the east look to NATO for security from attacks by each other or from ethnic and nationalist violence resulting from the breakup of the Soviet empire.

We trust that our common commitments to the principles of the CSCE—democracy, the peaceful settlement of disputes and, above all, the legal acceptance and tolerant treatment of minorities—will be a formula for peace. However, if there is a need to resolve conflicts through peacekeeping all of Europe welcomes the application of NATO's unique abilities to provide real resources and expertise.

In Oslo NATO agreed to consider just such CSCE requests. In my view this could well prevent Yugoslav-type tragedies from occurring in the future.

Canada was one of the originators of the concept of peacekeeping. Since the 1950s Canada has served in virtually all UN peacekeeping operations. At this moment Canadians serve around the world, in the Middle East, Cyprus, Central America, Europe and Cambodia.

[Translation]

The most important test of the effectiveness of peacekeeping is the length and strength of the peace once the peacekeepers have gone. Our troops have been with the UN peace-keeping force in cyprus for 28 years. Clearly this is not a model for peacekeeping.

The absence of peace must not be allowed to contaminate the relations between new generations of old rivals.

[English]

I have just visited Cyprus and discussed the situation there with its president and with my colleagues in Ankara and Athens. I said that unless there is progress toward a solution Canada would withdraw its forces.

I can report that in this case there is some progress. Over the next few weeks, and the next couple of months, a set of ideas will be discussed among leaders to establish the basis for peace without peacekeepers.

As a result of this positive development Canada will not completely withdraw its forces this year. However, we must take this opportunity to force the search for a definitive settlement of a long-standing grievance, which has gone on for far too long.

While in Cyprus I had the privilege of visiting the Canadian forces assigned to Nicosia in their role as peacekeepers. I also had a chance to visit the troops on duty and in their barracks right in the peacekeeping zone, in the buffer zone in Nicosia.

I was able to see firsthand the very high degree of professionalism that they display and the fact that it is recognized and appreciated by all of the parties to this dispute, by all sides. All Canadians should be very proud of their actions and the honour that they bring to our country.

However, the risk of conflict in the world in the coming years remains real. Our challenge will be to make the UN and regional organizations respond in timely and effective ways. We are very sensitive to the fact that some of these decisions will be difficult and that risks to the safety of soldiers and civilians will be high.

The financial burden will also be higher than in the past. Canada may not be in a position to participate in every mission as it has in the past.

How we contribute to peacekeeping missions in the future may also vary. However, we must encourage changes in the international institutions and in the international management of peacekeeping, and we must be flexible in our support of peacekeeping operations.

Canada has a long and distinguished tradition of leadership in peacekeeping and we intend to retain that position in the UN, in NATO and in the CSCE. However we must also build on those efforts in the newer area of peacebuilding and the negotiated settlement of potential conflicts before they erupt into violence. We look to the CSCE summit in Helsinki this summer to consolidate progress in peacebuilding for Europe.

[Translation]

In the months ahead, as our Canadian peacekeepers continue to provide a measure of stability in troubled areas of the world, we must work vigorously to identify and resolve the underlying motives and forces which generate conflict in the first place.

[English]

We must not squander the opportunity that history has afforded us. I can assure this House and all Canadians that Canada will continue to be in the forefront of the movement toward global peace. I will continue to report diligently on our progress toward that end.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that we welcome the discussion that the minister has introduced on the serious situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina and other parts of former Yugoslavia. We appreciate the minister reporting to the House on her visit. We share, as do many other Canadians, the incredible sense of tragedy and sadness at watching the unmitigated and unrestrained killing that goes on day after day, especially of helpless people.

We also want to join in complimenting the Canadian peacekeepers who are serving that region. We often debate the role of the Armed Forces, but there can be no more significant role that our Armed Forces are playing today than in the interventions they are making in several spots around the world, such as Cambodia, Cyprus, Yugoslavia, the Middle East and other areas. It is unquestionably one of the real contributions that Canada can make to peace.

At the same time there is also sadness because the breakdown and failure that is happening in Yugoslavia represents the world's inability to make an effective response. This conflict did not just occur this week. It has been happening for well over a year. There is no question that the response of the western community—the Europeans, Americans, Canadians and others—has been far too little and far too late.

We only have to compare the reaction to the way in which the western community responded to the invasion in Iraq, when there were immediate sanctions within days. Yet it took months upon months for us to get our act together in Yugoslavia. We knew that conflicts were emerging.

In this House only three weeks ago I posed a question to the minister asking for the withdrawal of diplomatic approval of the regime in Belgrade and the minister refused to do it.

The minister was overturned in three days by the Prime Minister, but the fact of the matter is that we have been reluctant and slow in our reactions. We have not understood the important precedents that this incredible conflict sets. All those brave words about the new world order that we heard after the Iraqi conflict have given real cause to the sceptics to ask what has gone wrong.

The international community has not responded to protect the basic human rights of people in Croatia or Bosnia. I suppose we are making the same mistake in the emerging conflict in Kosovo, another part of that tragic region. Again nothing is being done to prevent the conflict from emerging.

Even last week when we again raised specific questions in the House of Commons directly to the Prime Minister, asking whether the Government of Canada was prepared to support active intervention in Sarajevo by the United Nations to deal with humanitarian relief, he refused to answer.

• (1530)

We were not prepared to take a stand or to take leadership on that crucial issue. We were waiting, holding back. Therefore, while we must pay brave tribute to the peacekeepers I am afraid that the policy makers are not giving them the kind of support they deserve. We are not responding in the way that is required to build a new regime of security.

I noticed with interest that the minister said in her statement that the meetings at Oslo this past week confirmed a new role for NATO to take under the CSCE. Once again the government was confirming that the CSCE might be able to prevent future Yugoslavias from happening.

Why is it not being asked to step in on this conflict taking place now? If there is now an agreement that NATO troops could be used under CSCE direction why is Canada not asking for a CSCE meeting immediately to discuss the problem of whether there will have to be further actions taken to stop the fighting, not just in Sarajevo and not just to provide humanitarian relief but to stop the conflict throughout that whole area?

Once again we are laying back, holding back and reserving. We are not initiating, not taking leadership, and not moving into the vacuum that is clearly there when we know that more blood will be spilled and more innocent lives will be lost.

The minister says that we must prevent further conflicts. Yet the minister's own department withdrew its funding, under this year's estimates, from the centre for conflict prevention of the CSCE. How can we stand in the House and say that we are fully committed and we are going to do everything we can to stop the conflict while the Government of Canada has withdrawn funding from one of the major new initiatives that the CSCE has sponsored?

It is hard to reconcile the rhetoric with the action or the action with the rhetoric. The two simply do not mix.

Maybe it is not the minister's fault, it may be her colleagues who are the problem. However, we cannot have the Department of Finance making crucial foreign policy decisions and nickel and diming on the crucial issue of international security. That is what is taking place.

Even in today's debate the minister said in the final part of her statement that it may not be possible for Canada to be involved in future peacekeeping because we may not have the financial support to do so.

The minister said that there may not be sufficient support or funding for these actions, yet at the same time the government is talking about spending $4.5 billion on a piece of military equipment that is already obsolescent. We are no longer engaged in anti-submarine warfare because the submarines are not there any more.

It may be that we need good helicopters for peacekeeping missions because one of the problems that our own peacekeepers found in Croatia, and are certainly finding in Cambodia, is the lack of equipment and the lack of proper logistical support. The UN Secretary General and UN officials have said repeatedly that our inability to mount full peacekeeping ventures and provide the proper support is a result of the lack of funding.

We know the Americans are withdrawing. They are in arrears by close to $800 million. Even our own government in its defence review gave only one line in the entire review to peacekeeping. The end result is that we have a minister rushing off to buy helicopters that are no longer necessary while we are not tailoring the configuration of equipment or support that our own forces will need if they are going to engage in a number of peacekeeping ventures around the world.

That should be our priority. Our primary objective should be to support international efforts and international collective security, not to be engaging in ghost conflicts left over from the cold war.

I want to raise concerns with the minister about the statements or policies emanating in a variety of ways about Cyprus.

It is not good enough to say we have been there too long. We must ask ourselves whether the fighting will resume if the United Nations withdraws? What is the point of withdrawing if the conflict has not been resolved? What do we gain by creating another serious confrontation between two groups who have not resolved their differences?

If we are talking about withdrawing our troops, surely t.he obligation is to ensure that we are leading the initiative to try to resolve that conflict and, if need be, to stay there until it is resolved. We stood at NATO for close to 45 years to stop a conflict in Europe or a potential invasion. Surely, our patience on peacekeeping deserves the same end.

I do not deny and I do not in any way reject the minister's statement that we must be more diligent in trying to resolve the conflict but I do not think it is to be done by threatening to withdraw troops. That is not the way to build a peacekeeping venture.

I will conclude by saying that I think this whole situation and the lack of action, the lack of funding and the lack of support demonstrate that if we are not careful that great Canadian invention called peacekeeping which Lester Pearson put forward at the UN in 1956 could be in very serious trouble. It could really be in danger of losing its credibility and effectiveness to protect peace in this changing world.

I would like to recommend to the minister, because we were the authors of the original idea of peacekeeping, we should maybe author the reconstitution, the redefinition of peacekeeping.

We are going to have to get new mandates for the United Nations and for regional organizations so that troops going into dangerous situations know that there is a risk and are going to have to be prepared to accept it.

We are going to have to deal with the crucial question of funding. It may be that Canada should initiate calling a major international conference on peacekeeping so that the major countries involved can come together and discuss and decide on peacekeeping.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has 15 more seconds.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have the same amount of time as the minister, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has had a minute and a half more than the minister has had right now. Please wind up.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I will just simply say that we should have learned our lessons at this point and without any criticism say that Canada does have a a special responsibility and a particular role to play in helping the world come to grips with the importance of peacekeeping and peacemaking.

We could initiate and take responsibility for bringing concerned countries together and put to them their responsibilities to pay for the important role peacekeeping provides and to redefine the mandate the UN should have redefined. That way it is not simply a matter of sending troops overseas; it is also making sure that the governments of this world, through the United Nations, will make sure those troops have the best equipment and the best support possible.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I too want to express my appreciation to the minister for her statement today which gives the House an opportunity to comment on some of the very serious, very important and very tragic events which are taking place in Bosnia–Hercegovina today.

I want to take this opportunity on behalf of my New Democratic colleagues to respond to two or three of the points raised by the minister and to raise a couple of other issues as well in this context.

First of all, with respect to the situation in Bosnia–Hercegovina, many Canadians have been asking themselves why it is that the community of nations has been unable to respond to the tragedy, to the bloodshed, to the violence, to the death that has taken place there and why it is, in particular, that our government to which we look for leadership has been so slow in responding to this tragedy.

It was almost a month ago that the member for Winnipeg South Centre and I urged the minister to act and to show some leadership on behalf of Canadians.

I asked the minister specifically, in view of the desperate need of the people of Bosnia for food and medicine: "Will Canada support the very urgent request by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for UN troops to protect the humanitarian convoy which will be able to bring in food and medicine to the people of Bosnia?"

That was on May 12. It is now a month later and we are finally, at last, responding to the desperate plea of the United Nations and others for assistance to enable us to get humanitarian aid to Bosnia–Hercegovina. The reality is that too much blood has been shed and too many lives have been lost while the community of nations has failed to respond effectively through the United Nations to this crisis.

I would note as well that the minister refused to take even the minimal steps that we called for at that time in terms of the withdrawal of our ambassador after the European Community had taken that step. It was only after the Prime Minister returned from a visit to George Bush that he announced, not the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but he announced that we were taking this action.

I have to ask: Where is the leadership? What role is Canada playing in ensuring a significant supply of humanitarian aid, particularly food and medical aid, to assist the people who so desperately need that aid? There are over 1.3 million refugees, many of whom have moved into Bosnia from Croatia and are in desperate need. I have to ask our government to do far more in terms of humanitarian aid, particularly food and medical aid, in this time of need.

There are other issues as well. There is the whole question of the very difficult situation in Kosovo and the question of the delay of this government in establishing diplomatic relations with Croatia and Slovenia. The government announced some time ago that we recognized the independence of these countries and Canadians welcomed that. But why is it that this government has failed to establish formal diplomatic relations with Croatia and Slovenia? Why is that? There is no explanation in terms of diplomatic relations.

As well, I believe many Canadians are asking for our government to exercise great caution with respect to the recognition of the former Yugoslavian Republic of Macedonia, now Skopje. Canadians are also seeking assurances that there will be full constitutional and political guarantees that there are no territorial claims against Greece and that the name Macedonia, which implies territorial aspirations, is not used. We are looking for those guarantees as well in the context of this discussion.

The minister visited Cyprus. As the member for Winnipeg South Centre and the minister pointed out, I am sure we all want to pay tribute to our peacekeeping troops who have been there for at least 28 years and to our other peacekeeping troops in Croatia and around the world. However, it does not help at all to achieve a peaceful solution to this long conflict to threaten that we will simply unilaterally pull out our troops.

I know the minister is now saying that we are not going to pull out our troops before the end of this year, although she seems to imply we might pull out some. She said: "We are not pulling them all out before the end of this year". Does that mean the minister is going to pull out a number of Canadian troops? There is a real risk that this could simply aggravate the conflict.

Our role surely is to urge negotiations and again to provide leadership with respect to a negotiated and peaceful solution.

As I mentioned, our peacekeeping troops are doing fine work, whether it be in Croatia, Cyprus or elsewhere. But it has been pointed out by Canadian military officials, in fact Sergeant Mario Grenier who has helped to train Canadian peacekeepers in Yugoslavia said: "We are sending unqualified people to do qualified jobs. We do not have enough training when it is time to get jobs like this done". He has urged that Canada provide more training for our peacekeeping troops.

I want to take this opportunity to urge our government, in the context of this debate, to look very seriously at the establishment of a peacekeeping training centre at Canadian Forces Base Cornwallis in Nova Scotia. Canada has an outstanding international record in peacekeeping and this is the kind of role that we could play effectively in Cornwallis. Indeed, we committed ourselves to that kind of role in a recent resolution which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in October 1991.

Finally I would like to say a word about the minister's ringing affirmation of Canada's role in NATO. With the demise of the Warsaw pact, with the effective disappearance of the enemy, NATO strategists, the generals, are obviously searching desperately for a new raison d'être.

Surely the time has come for Canadians to show leadership with respect to the definition of security, to call for the dissolution of this archaic and outdated and ultimately irrelevant military alliance, and to recognize the Citizens' Inquiry into Peace and Security which held public hearings across Canada.

We should be redefining the concept of common security. Canadian security policy should be focused on strengthening regional security bodies, strengthening the CSCE, strengthening the United Nations, ensuring that the United Nations is properly funded and that peacekeeping forces are properly funded. In Cambodia right now, the United Nations peacekeeping operation is in danger of foundering because of the lack of proper funding.

At a time when NATO is clinging to a policy of the first use of nuclear weapons, at a time when NATO insists that we in fact not adopt a policy of nuclear weapons-free harbours in Canada, at a time when NATO continues to have low-level flight testing over Innu land, surely now more than ever, it is time for us to recognize that Canada's role should be within the United Nations, a strengthened United Nations and the CSCE and pushing for a comprehensive test ban treaty.

In closing, Canada does have an important leadership role to play in Bosnia-Hercegovina within the United Nations and ultimately in redefining the concept of security on this globe to ensure that when we talk about security we are talking about the right to food, to shelter, to health care, to education, to human rights, to a clean and sustainable environment and to a world at peace.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

TABLING OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table the report for the special joint committee on conflict of interest as its report has today been tabled in the Senate.

The members of this House taking part in the report are myself, the member for Mississauga South as co-chairman; Edna Anderson, Simcoe Centre; J. W. Bud Bird, Fredericton—York—Sunbury; David Bjornson, Selkirk—Red River; Don Boudria of the Liberal Party and the critic for the Liberal Party on this matter, from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell; Patrick Boyer, who was the former counsel of the report filed on this matter by the hon. Mitchell Sharp and the hon. Mike Starr some years ago, from Etobicoke—Lakeshore; Mike Breaugh, the New Democratic Party member, from Oshawa; Catherine Callbeck, from Malpeque; Michel Champagne, from Champlain, Quebec; Robert Layton, from Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louise; John Nunziata, from York South—Weston; and Marcel Prud'homme, from Saint-Denis, Quebec.

Mr. Prud'homme took a special trip to Australia to go over the conflict of interest rules there and contributed greatly to the report. He is here today, smiling and wanting to make sure that I said these things because these are important considerations in this report.

Also on the joint committee were Jean-Marc Robitaille, from Terrebonne, Quebec; and the inimitable John Rodriguez from Nickel Belt.

Mr. Speaker, I have the report in both official languages and I believe this report will do justice to this House.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate very much the kindness I rise of my colleague to have mentioned my name. Yes, indeed I was in Australia, but I wish to say that it was not at the expense of the House of Commons and I brought back all the documents free of charge.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-350, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the bill I am seeking leave to introduce today is to amend the Criminal Code in respect of hate literature. The present act provides that hate literature against an identifiable group is prohibited.

An identifiable group consists under the current act of persons or groups of persons who are distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin.

My proposed bill will add to the list of groups those persons who are distinguished by age, sex, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability.

I hope the bill will commend itself to all hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Milliken moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on electronic voting for the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

BILLS C-207 AND C-228

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have two bills on the Order Paper which have been superseded by events and I do not propose to proceed with the bills. They are private members' bills, but in both cases they have been dealt with by legislation in this House. I would seek leave of the House to withdraw the bills.

The first one is Bill C-207, an act to amend the Penitentiary Act (visits to penitentiaries). The matter was recently dealt with in proceedings on the new Corrections Act. Admittedly it was voted down but my bill is no longer appropriate to do the job it was intended to do. I seek leave of the House to withdraw that one.

The second is Bill C-228, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder). That particular matter was introduced by the government and dealt with in this House. The bill has become law and there is no need for my bill to proceed. Again I would ask for unanimous consent to withdraw that bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to withdraw Bills C-207 and C-228?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Orders discharged and bills withdrawn.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present today. One of them deals with the Court Challenges Program.

These petitioners would like to call upon Parliament to re-establish this very important program which, as we know, gave minority groups and individuals the financial assistance to be able to go to the courts and have their constitutional rights clarified.

These petitioners come from all over Canada and I am pleased to table this petition in their names.

HOUSING

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition dealing with housing problems.

The petitioners would like to draw the attention of the House to the following. Many Canadians are experiencing serious housing problems. The Government of Canada terminated the federal Co-operative Housing Program on February 25, 1992. The federal non-profit co-op housing program was highly successful in creating a healthy mix in communities. The action of this government has eliminated 2,000 co-op units for 1992 alone, along with 4,000 construction and manufacturing jobs in the same period.

Therefore the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to reinstate the federal Co-operative Housing Program immediately and to commit the $6.1 million to the program which had been planned for 1992 and permit approximately 2,000 co-op housing units to be sponsored this year.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present, both of which are involved with current and ongoing issues.

One deals not only with the specific murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991, but also with a move to reorient the justice system.

I know that her mother, Mrs. de Villiers, is going to be in Ottawa tomorrow meeting with the justice minister and the critics for the opposition. She has certainly been a crucial person in literally encouraging thousands of Canadians to sign the petition.

The murder of Nina de Villiers on August 19, 1991, has exposed serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk.

Crimes of violence against a person are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crimes society faces.

Current criminal law does not require bail hearings in crimes of violence to be presided over by judges.

Current criminal law may require only a simple signature on a document with no money posted as surety for the release of accused perpetrators of crimes of violence.

Current criminal law does not hold agents of the Crown directly accountable to the public for their actions or omissions in permitting known offenders and accused with violent backgrounds to be free, or in failing to seek orders prohibiting possession of weapons.

Sentencing in crimes of violence does not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence of violence in order to act as a true deterrent and to protect the public by removal of offenders from society. The risk to society proposed by early releases is of secondary consideration. Statutes governing the criminal justice system in Canada must be revised.

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly. I know this petition has the support of literally thousands of Canadians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my second petition in part has been transcended by events but in part is certainly very relevant to the discussion that we just underwent with respect to the desperate situation now being faced by people in Bosnia–Hercegovina.

The second petition deals with the recognition of the right to self–determination by republics like the republic of Croatia, the republic of Slovenia and indeed the republic of Bosnia–Hercegovina. It calls upon the government to condemn aggression by the Yugoslavian army and demand its withdrawal of all troops from Croatia immediately, and initiate the establishment of an international commission.

I think this petition certainly reflects the view of many people around the world that the international community must bond together to fight the slaughter that is going on now in Bosnia–Hercegovina, in Croatia and in other parts of the former republic of Yugoslavia. Certainly, the thousands of people who have signed this petition really hope that the Canadian government will act.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions.

One is signed by approximately 400 people in the riding of Durham who call on the government to establish legislation which would result in a binding referendum of the people on constitutional amendments.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the second is also from the riding of Durham, and is similar to the petition just read by the member for Hamilton East.

The petitioners call on Parliament to change the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act as they relate to crimes of violence.

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting the House with a petition collected by Mrs. Rita Hogg.

The petition deals with numerous signatures from the metropolitan city of Toronto petitioning and requesting the government to amend the Narcotics Control Act so that the profits from the seizures of drugs, which are proliferating unfortunately in the streets and communities of metro Toronto and elsewhere, will be shared with local municipalities, police forces and community organizations, which are the principals in the fight against drugs, so that the proceeds, rather than going completely and exclusively into federal coffers, will be shared with those entities so that in fact we may win the war. It was a pleasure as well to be able to raise it during Question Period earlier today. It is hoped by this party and by many Canadians that the many repeated promises of the Solicitor General to amend the Narcotics Control Act will see the light of day in the very near future.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my first petition is from my constituency and other sectors of Manitoba asking that the taxation system be made much more clear.

The petitioners point out that the tax act is complex, unfair, and somewhat unintentionally discriminatory. They point out, for example, the child care credit that some people get while others who choose to stay home to rear their children do not.

RADIO AND TELEVISION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my next petition deals with a request from petitioners, many of them from my constituency, who want the CRTC to monitor very closely the use of language on radio and television.

Many feel that there is foul and inappropriate language being used and it counteracts the efforts of the family to set a good example.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my final petition represents petitioners from Labrador. They point out that in today's society we need the best educational systems possible, particularly to meet challenges of globalization, increased competitiveness and enhanced productivity.

They indicate that there have been serious cutbacks that will affect the education of young people in Canada and asks that all policies that could prevent young people from attending college and university and other training programs be reviewed immediately.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the residents of Bella Coola and Hagensborg, B.C. asking by way of petition that the House restore a full northern tax allowance to the residents of northern and remote communities.

The petitioners point out that small, remote single-industry communities pay very high prices. They do not have access to basic medical services, health care, government services, and the cost of transportation is extremely high. They ask that the full northern tax benefit be restored to those communities.

SRI LANKA

Hon. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and as the member of Parliament for Scarborough Centre, I wish to submit this petition on behalf of my constituents this petition.

It outlines the petitioners' concerns relating to issues in Sri Lanka. They request that the parties in Sri Lanka negotiate and settle differences in order that all the people in that country may live in peace and freedom.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present to the House a petition that was gathered and prepared by my constituent, Mrs. Eileen MacDonald. All of the signatures on the petition are exclusively from the Don Mills area of my own constituency, and most of them from 18 The Donway East.

This particular petition relates to a matter that was before the House a short time ago, that being the referendum bill. It calls upon Parliament to enact a referendum bill that is binding upon Parliament in order to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government, the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

The government and the House has dealt with part of this. I trust that we will be receiving a positive response from the government and the House on the other part of it.

HOUSING

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege of presenting a petition on behalf of many residents of my riding. The petition cites the cancellation of the federal Co-operative Housing Program which was highly successful in creating healthy mixed income communities.

Its cancellation has eliminated 2,000 new co-op housing units for 1992 alone, along with 4,000 construction and manufacturing jobs for the same period. Moreover, approximately 164,000 renter households want to move into co-op housing.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to immediately reinstate the federal Co-operative Housing Program and commit the $6.1 million to the program which had been planned for 1992 and permit approximately 2,000 co-operative housing units to be sponsored this year.

RECOGNITION OF STATUS OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of Montreal, Quebec City and Rouyn-Noranda.

The petitioners declare: Whereas many Canadians object in conscience to any warlike or military activity, we in no way want to participate in it, given that many Canadians refuse to be obliged to kill or be killed in a conflict which they condemn or deplore;

Whereas some religious groups are already granted the right to conscientious objector status and given, article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the resolution accepted by the United Nations Human Rights Commission on March 8, 1989 on this subject. Whereas the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms recognizes that all Canadians have the right to freedom of opinion, the petitioners ask the Canadian government to pass legislation recognizing the status of conscientious objector for any Canadian who desires it.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present another petition that was collected by the Glad Day Book Store in Toronto. It notes that in February 1985 the House of Commons mandated the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to prepare a report on equality rights in Canada.

In October that committee did prepare that report and unanimously recommended that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

The petitioners note that in March 1986 the government promised to accept this report and enact the recommendations. Yet today, some six years later, the recommendations have still not been enacted. They note that other jurisdictions including Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon have such protection and that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has called for this protection.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to ensure that government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which has been signed by residents of Vancouver, Burnaby, Langley and a number of other communities in British Columbia.

The petitioners note that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison, have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole. The cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample ground for the Government of Canada to seek a remedy on their behalf. The only relief available from such severe punishment is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present the following petition to the House of Commons.

It is a petition that I would have been proud to affix my name to. It is a petition gathered by the Kinsmen and Kinnette Clubs in the community of Spiritwood, Saskatchewan.

The Kinsmen and Kinnette Clubs and community members who have signed this petition indicate how appropriate it is to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada. They indicate that the Kinsmen and Kinnette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992.

The petitioners are supporting the proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive, life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

I salute the Kinsmen and Kinnette Clubs of Canada for this initiative.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest requests unanimous consent to table a committee report. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FINANCE

15TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 15th report of the Standing Committee on Finance.

In accordance with its general mandate under Standing Order 108(2), your committee has considered the question of deductions in respect of employees' expenses.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 299, 306 and 321.

[Text]

Question No. 299—Mr. Parker:

For the period 1992 to 1996, in relation to the recovery of assets related to enterprise crime as a result of the creation of the joint police force anti-drug profiteering units (a) what is the estimated increase in recovery of assets (b) what are the total amounts expected to be recovered for each year (c) how much money was not seized as a result of the failure to have such units in place when the proceeds of crime were proclaimed?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): The joint force Anti Drug Profiteering (ADP) units are intended to provide additional resources and promote greater degrees of co-operation among RCMP, municipal and provincial police in proceeds of drug crime investigations. These units will augment the existing ADP program established by the RCMP in 1981, which has a current establishment of 85 investigators.

In addition to the identification of assets derived from drug trafficking, a primary objective of this enforcement program is to develop evidence to support prosecutions for drug proceeds and money laundering offenses.

(a) It is very difficult to provide a valid estimate of the increase in seizures of drug assets which would be attributable to the joint force ADP units. These units are expected to generate increased seizures and related prosecutions. Given that this function involves the enforcement of serious criminal offenses, the establishment of quotas of asset seizures will not be entertained.

(b) A projection of the total amounts of seizures of drug assets in Canada during the period 1992 to 1996 presents similar difficulties. Since the inception of the proceeds of crime legislation on January 1, 1989, the RCMP Anti-Drug Profiteering Program, until recently staffed with 58 investigators, seized approximately $60 million in assets, with a further $46 million in assets referred to other Canadian or foreign agencies for appropriate action. Seizures are expected to exceed this amount during 1992 to 1996; the amount of the increase cannot be predicted.

(c) It is not possible to provide an estimate of the amounts of assets that could have been seized in the past by a group of enforcement personnel that did not then exist. The establishment of these new units represents an evolutionary development in order to promote more effective use of relatively new legislation.

The joint force Anti-Drug Profiteering initiative will have a monitoring and evaluation component which will keep track of the actual amounts seized as a result of investigations by the units.

Question No. 306—Mrs. Gaffney:

What is the total amount of money spent by the Department of National Health and Welfare on the production and distribution of the video entitled "What's Wrong With This Picture?"

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): This video was funded in part by the AIDS Community Action Program (ACAP) of the Department of National Health and Welfare. A grant of $69,210 was provided under ACAP for the period of March 19, 1990 to April 30, 1991 toward production costs. Additional funding was provided by the City of Toronto Board of Health, the Canada Council, the Laidlaw Foundation, Theatre Ontario, the Ontario Ministry of Health and the Ontario Arts Council.

The promotion of the video is the responsibility of the Second Look Community Arts, sponsor of the project.

The purpose of this community initiative was to enable young people to make informed, positive choices about high risk behaviour, thus reducing the risk of HIV infection. The video's primary target audience is street youth. These young people are often school drop-outs who have limited formal education.

Question No. 321—Mr. Gardiner:

With respect to the government's newspaper ads relating to the Human Development Report of the United Nations, (a) what was the total cost (b) what were the costs of production and placement (c) what persons or companies received contracts for these ads and what were the dates and amounts of these contracts?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Insofar as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned, the answer is as follows:

(a) The total cost of the newspaper ads relating to the Human Development Report of the United Nations was $1.044 million.

(b) The cost of production was $67,000; the cost of media purchase (placement) was $977,000.

(c) The production was done by PNMD/Publitel at a cost of $67,000.

The placement was done by Media Canada, the media placement agency of record for Government of Canada, at a cost of $977,000.

The dates of the contracts were:

PNMD/Publitel—April 28, 1992

Media Canada—April 23, 1992

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 249 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 249 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Question No. 249—Mr. Boudria:

Since September 4, 1984 has the government ever utilized the services of Interpost Systems and, if so, why and which department has done so, on how many occasions, and what was the expenditure of each government department each time the service was used?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, your smile indicates that you can guess why I am on my feet today.

I filed a request for the production of documents in respect of the establishment of a military supply depot in Montreal, a decision made by the Minister of National Defence in either late March or early April of this year contrary to the earlier study that was done for the department, at some considerable cost I may say, which recommended another site that just happened to be in my own riding.

There has been a subsequent study, I assume, done to justify this decision. My motion for the production of papers merely requests that that be produced.

I am certain that under the Access to Information Act it is a producible document. This is a request for the document in this House. I would hope that if the parliamentary secretary can locate the Minister of National Defence—I know that he is not often in Ottawa—perhaps the document could be turned up and produced before we adjourn for the summer.

The second motion I have on the Order Paper has been there since May 6. I raised it with the parliamentary secretary a couple of weeks ago and he said he would look into it. It deals with the expense accounts of persons who travelled with the Prime Minister on a trip to Calgary in April 1991.

This is not new information. It has been requested under the Access to Information Act. Heavily censored versions were released. We are asking for the facts. Surely this House is entitled to them.

If the parliamentary secretary has any reluctance in this regard, perhaps we could instead of transferring it for debate, where he knows it will get buried and never get called, just bring it to a vote immediately and have the question decided in the House. I suspect a lot of his own members would like to see these expense accounts too.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall that the Minister of National Defence answered quite a number of questions yesterday in Question Period. I would be very happy to relay the hon. member's query to that minister.

With reference to the second question, my hon. friend is quite correct that it was posed on May 6. We are looking into that. I believe that our inquiries are meeting with some success and I will be able to report, I hope without undue delay, to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to rise under motions if I might. Am I too late for that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry. We did pass by it. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek leave of the House to adopt the following motion. I think Your Honour will find consent for it. I move:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill from the Royal Society of Canada, presented on Tuesday, March 31, 1992, and reported upon by the Clerk of Petitions on Wednesday, April 1, 1992, be deemed to have been filed within the required time limit and received by this House.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-84, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would seek and I believe you would find that there is unanimous consent in relation to Bill C-84, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, to proceed with all stages of that bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, we are happy to give our agreement to this. I just note the great co-operation shown by the opposition on this occasion. It is a shame that the government did not do that yesterday when it used closure.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use the occasion to score a point off the government. I want to use this occasion to join all sides of the House in saying that we are very pleased to agree to the procedure. It has been agreed to push this bill through today. We will have a full discussion of the various points. I am not overwhelmed by the fact that we are in this position, and I will describe the details of my views on that when we get to it. But we all agree that this is an important bill and we are happy to proceed with it today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 30 minutes to 10.30 p.m.

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Speaker, this is a day when Canada's merchant mariners will be very happy indeed. Those sceptics who believed this time would never come can now abandon ship.

The legislation we are considering today will put merchant navy veterans on a par with veterans who served in uniform during World War I, World War II and in Korea. Members will note that the bill also deals with the allied resistance members and their access to the War Veterans Allowance program. I will say just a few words on this aspect of the legislation before returning to the good news for our merchant navy veterans.

What we want to do here is to return the War Veterans Allowance program to its original purpose, that being to provide income support to qualified Canadian veterans and to allied veterans having formal military service. It was never the intent of Parliament to include those having resistance service, and indeed no other country in the world provides military benefits to allied resistance members.

[Translation]

Our forecasts show that if we did not make these changes, the War Veterans Allowance Program would soon benefit mainly persons who had fought in the resistance.

Obviously that is not acceptable and you will realize that the great majority of veterans agree with these changes.

[English]

As I said earlier, this is a day for our merchant mariners and a day to recall their magnificent contribution to the war effort. The commemoration of the battle of the Atlantic in May reminds us once again of the debt the free world owes to those who faced the perils of the sea.

One statistic from the battle of the Atlantic says so much about the courage of those who manned our merchant fleet. During July 1942 the allies lost one ship of 10,000 tonnes or more every 10 hours, day and night, for the 31 days during the month of July 1942.

The mental fortitude of those who climbed aboard cargo ships in the face of those statistics was remarkable. Their courage was not a production of an adrenalin rush. They had plenty of time to consider the risks, like the fine soldiers who went over the top in the First World War and the crews of bomber command in the Second World War, our merchant mariners put duty before self.

• (1620)

The stoker who faced almost certain death if his vessel was struck by a torpedo volunteered to risk his life. Time and again merchant mariners signed on for danger. Canada's merchant mariners earned our gratitude. That is why I would not like it thought that the Canadian people, through their governments, were ungrateful once victory was ours.

Our merchant mariners and their families have been beneficiaries of many of the finest programs in the world. Most of the veterans' programs and benefits have been available to merchant mariners for a number of years, but not all. Neither have they had the ease of access to some benefits enjoyed by those who served in the Armed Forces.

Such unequal treatment rankled them. Merchant mariners felt it diminished the importance of their role in the war. They want to be regarded and treated as veterans. Today, we are doing just that.

Bill C–84 is more than just another piece of legislation. It is an acknowledgement of the wartime contribution of some very brave veterans. This legislation introduces the designation of merchant navy veteran. It will give them full veteran status. The omissions and the obstacles are being removed.

Let me make it perfectly clear, Bill C–84 will entitle merchant navy veterans to the benefits available to their wartime comrades in the army, navy and air force, at a cost of about $100 million over the next five years.

Who becomes eligible for the designation of merchant navy veteran? The answer is basically anyone who served in a Canadian registered ship engaged in home or foreign trade on the high seas during either of the two world wars or Korea. Any Canadian with first world war or second world war high seas service in an allied ship is included. Wartime service would normally have entailed the signing of articles of agreement.

Allow me to tell hon. members about the benefits this bill will give to our merchant mariners, because that is the important thing. That is the reason we are asking for expeditious passing of this piece of legislation this afternoon.

I do not have to tell the House just how popular and effective our veterans' independence program is. There is no program like it in Canada, or as far as I know in the world. It is an economical and versatile way of helping veterans stay in their own homes with their families and out of institutions.

Naturally, many merchant mariners wanted to receive the veterans' independence program. However, as things stand now only merchant mariners who receive VIP because of their disability pensions are eligible. Regulatory amendments made in concert with this legislation will allow up to some 1,800 additional merchant mariners to join the veterans' independence program.

For the first time merchant navy veterans with a non–pensionable condition will be able to apply on an income tested basis, as are our uniformed veterans.

This brings them in step with the veterans of the Armed Forces. The average age of our veteran population is now over 71 years, and it is even higher for merchant mariners. Not surprisingly then, merchant mariners have long campaigned to have the same access as other veterans to care in a departmental medical facility or a contract bed in one of many institutions across the country.

Regulations being brought into force with Bill C–84 will allow merchant navy veterans the institutional access they have long sought. Other long–standing grievances will be removed with the passage of this bill this afternoon.

Take the six–month rule. In order to qualify for income support and some health care benefits merchant mariners have to show six months of wartime service at sea plus one voyage through dangerous waters. Merchant mariners have argued that the six–month qualifying period was unfair, and it will be removed for merchant navy veterans.

Another significant breakthrough contained in this legislation deals with disability pensions. Merchant mariners can now only qualify for disability pensions if they were injured as a direct result of enemy action. A sailor who suffered an injury while his vessel was at sea was out of luck as far as the present legislation is concerned. Any injury suffered away from enemy action was a matter for the merchant mariner and the shipping company he worked for.

Bill C–84 takes a different view of this. It recognizes that merchant mariners were covered for disability pension purposes from the moment they climbed aboard their vessel in port for a high seas voyage.

The removal of the enemy action provision will result in another estimated 230 merchant navy veterans, or their dependents, qualifying for disability pensions for the very first time. I am sure the House will agree that these are welcome changes. They certainly mirror the recommendations made by the House Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

I want to thank that committee under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Crowfoot, Arnold Malone, who is ill today, for the attention it has given to the concerns of merchant mariners. I might also add thanks here to all of the members who served on that committee. Some of them are present in the House today.

The committee made other recommendations that do not need legislation. I want to discuss these, however, because I want to put on the record the position of the government on these other recommendations made by the standing committee.

Merchant mariners want the names of their compatriots who were killed in wartime to be honoured in a special book of remembrance in the Peace Tower.

[Translation]

The government agrees that there should be a Book of Remembrance dedicated to the merchant marine and personally I would like it to be placed in the Peace Tower as soon as possible. We are now working to make this wish a reality.

[English]

Another recommendation made by the House committee is for the government to encourage the erection of a monument dedicated to those killed in the wartime merchant navy.

I certainly hope such a memorial will be built. The government cannot help financially, with the exception of the one monument we do own. That is the National War Memorial here in Ottawa. It has a long–standing policy not to get involved with war memorials.

The National War Memorial honours everyone who served in Canada in the World Wars I and II and Korea. Obviously, merchant mariners and merchant navy veterans are very much included with those we honour on the National War Memorial.

I might add here that this is the exact position that the major groups of veterans, like the Royal Canadian Legion and others, asked us to do.

There are many war memorials across the country. They were erected by provinces, municipalities, associations of veterans and through the subscriptions of grateful citizens. Even today war memorials are being built. I get letters from schools and other organizations proudly telling me about the memorials they recently erected with funds raised through fund raising activities and by public subscription.

Given the high esteem in which merchant mariners are held, I would think that the public would be prepared to support any campaign for a merchant navy memorial and I would certainly encourage such a campaign.

The government has given careful attention to the work of the House committee, just as we have to the recommendations of the Senate subcommittee on veterans affairs, the advice of Canada's associations of veterans and, indeed, the coalition of merchant navy organizations that worked so hard on this piece of legislation.

At my request, they got together to study the whole question. Together we gave the merchant mariner issue the most thorough policy review since the end of World War II. I am grateful for the input of all those who worked hard and intelligently to recommend solutions to the government. For the most part, the government has accepted their recommendations.

Let me say in conclusion, that it has taken 47 years for merchant mariners to get their total due. I do not intend to lay blame for that delay nor do I intend to take the blame for it. I am proud that Bill C–84 has been presented during my watch. I ask members of all parties to give this legislation speedy passage. Canadian merchant mariners have waited long enough for this day and as I said to them when we announced this in March in Halifax: "Welcome aboard".

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise today to take part in the debate on this very famous Bill C-84.

This bill was designed to create some very positive, but also some very dramatic changes in Canada's veterans legislation.

• (1630)

It has been my privilege to serve for some time as the Veterans Affairs critic for the Loyal Opposition. In that time I have managed to make myself very familiar with veterans legislation and with the workings of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

In addressing the merchant mariners it is important to give an overview of this group of people. It all started on November 16, 1939. Two weeks after Britain declared war on Germany the first merchant marine convoy steamed out of Halifax harbour. This convoy began tracing the wartime route to England and the Soviet Union by which merchant seaman shipped vital aid to overseas allied troops and where many lost their lives.

Before the beginning of World War II, the German navy had planned a campaign to strike allied merchant ships coming from North America. In a German naval war staff memorandum dated 1939, the German high command defined the target of its principal strategy as the merchant ship. It was not only the enemy's vessels but every merchantman which sails the sea in order to supply the enemy's war interests.

The memo goes on to say that the final aim of such attacks is to cut off all imports into and exports from Britain. In accordance with this war staff memo, the destruction of the poorly armed and armoured merchant ships became the principal aim of Nazi surface warships, aircraft and submarines. German U-boats roamed the Atlantic in packs of 10 to 12 submarines to damage and to sink supply boats. German aircraft would bomb delivery ships as they neared the European coast. German warships, disguised as cargo vessels, would use their concealed deck cannons to tear into allied merchant fleets at sea. Alone or in convoys, merchant ships were vulnerable to attack on any part of their sailing route.

As these orders of the German high command indicate, merchant seamen were the focal point in this battle of the Atlantic that the minister just spoke about.

While merchant ships were vigorously pursued by enemy attack craft, allied warships were not able to track or combat the U-boats. Until 1942 the sight of a submarine tower would set a convoy into flight. The slower supply vessels of the convoy were left behind to be sunk by torpedoes. The merchant ships and the sailors were not themselves prepared for serious combat. Though anti-aircraft gunnery, gas and fire-fighting were required courses, mariners during wartime rarely could defend themselves against the torpedoes, bombs and shells of the heavily-armed enemy craft. Such was the lot of the merchant mariners during the war.

The minister has finally brought forth this long-overdue legislation some 47 years after the end of World War II. There are many reasons why this was not done earlier. It would be rather counterproductive at this point to go into all the reasons and to rehash the old arguments. What we do know is that all parties are in agreement that this is something which is long overdue and we have made this fact known to the minister by way of the all-party standing committee report which he had in his hands last fall.

I am pleased to see this legislation and I thank the minister for his efforts, but I wonder why this could not have been done six months or a year ago. When you consider the age of the potential recipients of the benefits of this legislation, any delay means that more and more will never get to reap the benefits or the recognition that they so deserve.

On this point I cannot emphasize enough the important role and contribution of standing committees in bringing such priority issues to bear in the legislative process. In contrast with the partisan, all-consuming ritual of adversarial combat so often witnessed in the front benches of this House, standing committees foster a rare collegiality among members conducive to bringing practical solutions to practical problems. Notably, when there are no party positions for matters under study, our standing committees have demonstrated a remarkably impressive record of consensus making.

The system has also shown that where there is both the political will and the personal flexibility for give and take, constructive results responsive to the needs of Canadians can be achieved.

Structured to mirror the organization of Cabinet and empowered to initiate its own studies, the system of standing committees provides Canadians with an important mechanism to shadow the activities, the policies and the programs of each department and agency of government. It ensures that the fundamental principles of accountability and responsibility which are vital to democratic society are safeguarded. Its very ability to initiate studies, address specific questions and call witnesses also contributes greater confidence, specialized knowledge and expertise within the political system.

By enabling members to expose themselves to a wide spectrum of public opinion which would be otherwise a practical impossibility, as parliamentarians we are made more effective both in this House and in our constituencies.

Indeed the final measure of the standing committees' contribution to democratic institutions is the value of committee work in improving the relevance and the efficiency of Parliament. We have in this legislation before us today an important example of the result of this process.

Before continuing on, I would like to make one comment to recognize the invaluable professional expertise and support of the Library of Parliament research staff and those who work in the Department of Veterans Affairs for their expediency in bringing about this significant legislative action. I also want to thank the veteran's organizations for the many hours and weeks of work they have put into it.

Having said so much about institutions involved in the process, I should remind hon. members there were some benefits in place for merchant mariners over the past number of years under the terms of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

To briefly summarize some of the provisions of those acts, a merchant mariner was entitled to receive a disability pension if they were injured as a result of direct enemy action. Merchant mariners were also eligible for a civilian war allowance, the equivalent of the war veterans allowance, if they had served at sea for at least six months and made one trip through dangerous waters.

The new legislation extends what is known as the insurance principle to disability pensions, meaning that as long as a merchant mariner was signed on for a voyage he was, in fact, covered if he sustained any disease or injury, not just one as the result of enemy action.

The terms service at sea and dangerous waters have been removed from the legislation and we now have a high seas voyage as enabling criteria. For the most part, I see this as a positive step because over the years many people were denied benefits because they were a few days short of service. This lead to the situation where a member of the military could go beyond the territorial waters for only a day and qualify for the war veterans allowance, while a merchant mariner could have served in the same area for 179 days and still did not meet the requirements of the act.

I hope the minister will assure us the changes introduced will not have a negative impact on the applicants who served on the Newfoundland coastal trade. Many of these people provided a very necessary and important service by being the transportation lifeline to the outport communities in Newfoundland and I would find it most unsettling to see this legislation harm them in any way. What I seek from the minister is the assurance that those people will continue to enjoy the benefits and privileges they have now.

If I may digress for a moment, I think the recognition we are extending to the merchant mariners by designating them as veterans is a very important element of the proposed legislation. I know these merchant seamen who are still with us today, some of whom are in the gallery, will be thrilled with the new designation of merchant mariner veteran and will bear this recognition with the pride they demonstrated in service to their country. Grateful for their commitment in service we, on behalf of the people of Canada, hold them in highest regard and today formally say thank you.

I have long maintained we do not honour our heroes enough in this country. These men and women we are designating as merchant mariner veterans today were heroes whose courage and conviction made a difference in all our lives and today I salute them.

I also noted when the minister announced this legislation and when he appeared before the committee said he agreed in principle—again today he said this—with a book of remembrance. I would urge him to carry on with all possible speed in seeing that such a book is produced. So many people come to Ottawa and share in that very moving part of our history in the Peace Tower. Surely the minister will make a firm commitment to include the merchant navy veterans in this hall of honour.

The second part of this legislation is of a different nature. It terminates benefits for a group of people who were awarded those benefits by a quasi-judicial board of the department in accordance with the 1985 interpretation of the existing legislation handed down by the Federal Court of Canada.

The bill before us specifies that resistance fighters will no longer be able to apply for benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act as allied veterans. Those who are currently in receipt will be able to continue to receive the benefits, providing they reside in Canada after March of next year.

I understand this change in legislation came about because there was a perception by the Department of Veterans Affairs that the actual application of the provision was inconsistent with the original intention of Parliament. Moreover, since the war veterans allowance is an income tested program, it is very difficult to monitor the income of recipients who do not reside in the country. I can see justification for some of these matters but I do hope that we are not throwing out the baby with the bath water.

The minister has said on several occasions that this is part of a plan to return the war veterans allowance to its original purpose. This may be so, but I remind him that those words caused some concern when he announced them last March. The minister should also remember, and I know that he does, that the boards and the commissions within his portfolio can only interpret the words which are written in the act. They cannot decide what was or is the intent of Parliament at any given time. That is why I urge the minister to be careful in statements and very careful when he presumes to know what the people intended many years ago.

The fact remains that we have a bill before us which will in the future prevent resistance fighters from receiving benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act. That is spelled out very clearly in the legislation and as members of Parliament we have to bear the responsibility for passing this bill.

While I have this opportunity, I would like to say a few words about the Department of Veterans Affairs in general. As members know, the head office of the department is located in the riding of Hillsborough and is a major employer in that area of my province. The people of Prince Edward Island take a very keen interest in the affairs of this department and are perhaps better acquainted with the Department of Veterans Affairs and what it does and its programs than any other area of Canada.

I must say that I am very proud of the work done by the public servants at DVA. They treat this very important clientele with courtesy, generosity and speed. The employees will go the extra mile to help the veterans and this is the way, I am sure, we all want it to be.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the relocation of the department to Charlottetown was announced during the time that the Hon. Dan MacDonald, a great veteran and a great Canadian, was the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

There were sceptics at that time who said that the head office of a national department could not function outside of Ottawa and it especially could not function in Charlottetown. A later minister who served in 1984 made several comments about the appropriateness of the move. I assure all members of this House that the move of the department to Prince Edward Island was a wonderful thing, both for the economy of my province and for the veterans and the people who work there.

The Department of Veterans Affairs is changing as its clientele ages. Hopefully young Canadians will never again have to answer that call to battle and the role of this department will be phased out eventually. This will require orderly change. It will require innovation on the part of the employees and on the part of the minister and his staff. It is most important that the service to veterans does not suffer over the next few years.

I understand there is currently a pension process review going on in the department which is an attempt to streamline the operations and to make it operate more efficiently. My advice to the minister is to carry on with the reviews but always remember that a promise has been made to the men and women who served Canada. It was first made by Sir Robert Borden and it has been made by countless prime ministers and ministers and other legislators since. That promise was to care for the men and women who served Canada. While one of them survives it is our duty to serve them as well as they served us.

At times like these when we are discussing new legislation, part of which will extend further benefits, it is very easy for us to become very smug and feel that everything has been done now for the veterans of Canada. There are still many veterans across the country, people who have served Canada in wartime, who are having a very hard time. They still require our care and our compassion.

Let us make this a part of our vow to them, that we as legislators will not forget them. Let us make sure that the Department of Veterans Affairs is maintained while there are still those who require its services.

In these times of downsizing and cost cutting, it is very much in vogue to point at one particular government department or the other and say that it could be done away with. I know that all hon. members will join me in expressing to the minister our support for a strong, vibrant Department of Veterans Affairs.

We are moving today one step closer to fulfilling our national obligation of looking after our veterans. It is no less incumbent upon us today as we recognize Canada's merchant navy veterans to continue to work relentlessly to resolve the remaining issues touching upon the lives of those who served our country.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying to the minister that he was right in his remarks that this is not his fault, it is the fault of all of us and all Canadians for 45 or more years. But at long last merchant mariners will be getting what they should have had all that time.

I am assuming that in the bill and in the regulations which the minister will bring down subsequently, there will be no exclusions. The former member for Winnipeg North Centre who now graces the Clerk's table as an honorary officer of the House first raised this issue in 1946 and there were other members from all parties who raised it from time to time.

I want to also say at this time, in light of some remarks from my good friend from Hillsborough, if there is any one committee in the whole Parliament of Canada, if there is any one item of legislation which is totally non-partisan, it is veterans affairs. I cannot recall in my 24 years in this place ever any hon. member making a partisan political issue of veterans affairs. We kicked each other around as to whether or not we were doing enough or not, but it was never partisan, it was never made a political issue.

That is also the case in this current committee and every committee before this. I want to warn the minister there is another matter that I and others will be raising—and I am sure he has already heard about it—but some time over the next several months the whole issue of benefits received by aboriginal people within DVA is equally long overdue for a review and redress. I think in particular of the Veterans Land Act.

I talked to a native person last Remembrance Day who had medals all the way across his chest. He went through everything in Italy and the rest of Europe and when he tried to buy some land under the VLA, because the land was in the reserve he could not get it. When he wanted to buy some next to the reserve, and add it to the reserve, he still could not get it. He ended up farming anyway. He found other ways of going about it.

• (1650)

This is one matter and I know this minister is the only one in all these years to have brought this to a head and to fruition. I am confident he will want to help in that matter as well.

The only complaint I have about the general thrust and principle of the bill is one that I have raised before, both with the minister in committee, and in this House. He, the department and I am afraid some veterans organizations have a mental block about merchant mariners being covered under the veterans legislation.

Why? One of the reasons given is that they were not in uniform. Hell's bells, we are paying benefits to resistance fighters who did not fight in uniform. In fact some of them fought with pieces and parts of German uniforms. After they shot them they had to have something to wear. You know this does not stand up. It does not hold water.

If that is logical that they were not in uniform, then what about fire-fighters and nurses under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act? A lot of them went overseas and did a fantastic job and all were in uniform. They were in fire-fighter uniforms and nurse uniforms.

The merchant mariners, however, were in all their grubbies, whether they were working in the galley or down in the stokehold, or wherever. Most of these were coal fired ships. Some of them were oil fired but most of them were coal fired. It was not the class of job where you would be in a full-dress uniform, but what the hell has that got to do with the price of wheat in China? It is totally irrelevant.

I want to say to the minister now that I never understood why we have not amalgamated the legislation for veterans under the DVA and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act under one administration. They are all treated as veterans, period.

As my hon. friend, Mr. Darling, said in the standing committee: "Damn it, they are veterans. There are no ifs, ands, or buts".

I want to thank him and my other government colleagues who are on the standing committee who were towers of strength in giving a unanimous report to the minister and to the House.

It could be under one administration. I suspect the department could even save some money. Why the heck there are two administrations—one handling civilian war allowances and one handling veterans war allowances—when they are all veterans anyway, is totally beyond me.

I know the minister inherited this, but this is another first move he could make. I hope he will take it up with his deputies and a few others around his kingdom.

The minister paid tribute to the merchant mariners. Bless him for that. One of the problems they were having was that they were not accepted into the armed forces for physical reasons, as a rule. They might also have been underage or overage. You would be surprised as to how many teenagers as young as 13 ended up as mess boys on a merchant ship during the battle of the Atlantic or on convoys to Murmansk. There were also men as old as 45, 50 and 55 years old who were working as merchant seamen only because they could not qualify when they tried to volunteer to serve in the armed forces.

I want to thank my colleague at the outset for carrying the ball for me and my caucus on this issue and because of other matters which I will not mention here. I hope the minister, when we get to committee stage, will put something in the bill about VIP benefits for merchant mariners. We have been told that it will be in the regulations. However, I have seen too many times and on too many pieces of legislation that when it comes to drafting regulations the Department of Finance and Treasury Board hung over the minister's shoulder and the regulations got narrowed down and shortened up.

The minister can have only one sentence. Will he move an amendment or will he accept one from us? This would say that merchant mariners are entitled to all the benefits available to those who are covered by the Department of Veterans Affairs Act.

I must say something about retroactivity. The government could have put in a little bit of retroactivity even on one item that merchant mariners did not get, but guys like me did get. There was the $100 clothing allowance. By the way, in 1946, for $100 I bought a new hat, a two-piece suit, new shoes, socks and underwear. The whole outfit cost $100. They were not very stylish. I forget whether it was at Eaton's or The Bay in Calgary the day after I got discharged because they gave me $100 cash.

Why not give these guys a $500 clothing allowance? It would give a lot of them a half-decent outfit to be buried in because most of them are not going to be around long. This is one of the reasons why we have agreed to this bill going through quickly. If we wait any longer some of them will not be here to get the benefits.

I want to say that if there is any one thing—and it may well be the only thing—that no taxpayer or citizen of Canada will ever object to, it is what we do for our veterans. It should not matter what the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board say about any increases we bring about. The minister must fight harder and members on all sides of the House will support him for any extra money or any amount of money he needs to fulfil what we owe to all our veterans. This includes merchant mariners. It will damn well be there. There is no taxpayer anywhere in this country who is going to object to that. They may object to a lot of other things that taxes go for, but that is not one of them. It never has been and never will be.

• (1700)

On the matter of what we spend, the Department of Veterans Affairs for the past eight years has underspent its appropriated budget by an average of $47 million. It was not as though the minister of this department got to keep the money. They do not have it stashed away in Zurich.

It was just never used, therefore the Minister of Finance took it back. This occurred every year for the last eight years. I want to say, to be fair, that under previous governments the same thing happened every year. While members of this House from all sides were fighting to get benefits for veterans of all kinds from all parts of the country, poverty was pleaded, restraint was pleaded, other things took higher priority. That just cannot be allowed to go on.

I want to thank the minister for bringing this in as quickly as he has. I almost raised a question of privilege when he replied to our committee's report because that was totally out of order and the Speaker was too nice.

He got away with it, but at least he has brought in the legislation. All I can say is let us get this through by ten o'clock tonight. I encourage all hon. members to take part. We waited 47 years. It is like the guy who came from Mars and landed on earth. He was running around examining all these human beings. He finally found two of them who were making love. He watched this performance for a while and he said to the guy that was with him: "What are they doing?" The guy replied: "They are trying to make a baby". "When will they have that"? "It takes nine months". "Could you tell me what all the hurry was the last 90 seconds?"

After 47 years what is all the hurry that we cannot have a few hours on a matter such as this. I hope that the bill will pass and pass unanimously. I hope the minister is prepared to answer some questions at committee stage. He certainly will have the co-operation of my party and my colleagues in the official opposition in getting this passed.

Do not deny us our day in court to remind not just the minister but the whole country that we are finally paying some bills that are long past due. We might move amendments. We will try but will get ruled out of order because they cost money. Surely some of these benefits could be made retroactive, particularly for those who are in such terrible need for mental or physical reasons.

I do not think we should be chiselling on that. Let us go for broke. Let us make up as much as we can what we have denied several thousand Canadians for too many years.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, just briefly to put a few comments on second reading I did not understand that we had agreed to limit it, but I will not be very long.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You can put them in Committee of the Whole.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 100, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

House in committee on Bill C-84, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof—Mr. Paproski in the chair.

On Clause 2—Short title

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can just explain that we have all agreed to try to see if we can get this bill through today because of the crowded parliamentary schedule.

All members wish to see the bill and the regulation through by July 1 so that the benefits can begin on Canada's 125th birthday. As part of that procedure, some of us have agreed to make our general remarks on clause 1 of the bill. I have also a number of specific comments that I would like to make, but first let me just make a few general remarks.

This is of course a very important bill. It provides, as has already been described, for Canada's merchant mariners to finally get what is due them as veterans of Canada for their service during the two world wars and the Korean war.

This day has come to this Parliament as a result of the efforts of members on all sides of the House. Already my colleague from Regina—Lumsden has mentioned Stanley Knowles. I would like on behalf of our party, however, to put on the record of Parliament the particular efforts of the member for Regina—Lumsden who has served in this House for 24 years, who has been pressing this issue, who has introduced private members' bills and is here today to see this bill through.

I pay tribute to the minister for having pushed the bill through and for responding to the standing committee report and to the pleas of those who have felt that this injustice had to be corrected.

I would also like to pay particular attention to two other members of this House and I am going to refer to them by name. I know that is a breach of the usual rules: One is Arnold Malone who is chair of the standing committee and as has already been mentioned is sick at home. He is not here today to join in this debate. As well, there is the veteran member from Parry Sound—Muskoka, who has also contributed much to this. Further, a member in the other house, Senator Jack Marshall, is due recognition for a major contribution to having this bill introduced in the House.

• (1710)

Reference has been made to the standing committee report. The Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs studied this issue last year and produced a unanimous report recommending that Canadian merchant mariners with one or more high seas ocean-going assignments during war time be fully recognized as veterans and that veterans benefits be extended to them.

The committee also recommended that a book of remembrance be prepared and placed in the Peace Tower dedicated solely to the merchant mariners who died in Canada's wars. I am pleased to hear the words of the minister that that will be done. He said it will be done as soon as possible. I hope the emphasis will be on the soon because the issue is an important one to the merchant mariners. I hope arrangements can be made within months for that book to be opened and dedicated in our Peace Tower.

As well, the committee recommended that the Department of Veterans Affairs encourage the construction of a suitable monument to honour the memory of Canada's war-time merchant mariners. The committee also suggested a suitable site in the area of Halifax, and that has now been started.

I hope the minister is prepared to ask the government to match grants on this particular monument. I know the policy to which he referred, that the government does not usually get involved in monuments for veterans, but this is a special case. There have been years and years go by and this is one particular monument in a special location. I would ask the minister to agree to put it to the government that on this particular occasion the government would be prepared to match any contributions made toward the establishment of a suitable monument.

Finally, let me cast a slight cloud on the feeling of unanimity of this discussion. We have all said that we want this bill through today, but we have been put in a very difficult position by the government. It is our special responsibility on the opposition side to make sure that this bill achieves that which our constituents have sent us here to do.

Members of the government side also have that responsibility. They exercise that responsibility often in different ways. When a bill comes before the floor of this House we have a special responsibility to see that that happens. In fact, the procedures of this House normally provide that after second reading the bill goes to a legislative committee. At that legislative committee, experts on the bill and those who have a special interest in it have an opportunity to come before the committee and advise this House of Commons on the possible errors or omissions that there may be in the bill.

We are going to miss the benefit of that exercise in this bill. For most of us this bill surfaced just last week when the minister introduced it at first reading on June 2, 1992. It is a bill which contains 22 clauses. Some of those clauses have complicated inter-relationships with other legislation. It is very difficult to get a bill like this right the first time.

I realize that the minister has highly qualified advice at his disposal, but I practise law and I can understand that it is possible that others have seen something which one misses in the draft of an agreement or the draft of legislation. Therefore, by following the procedure we are prone to making some mistakes.

This bill could have been drafted months ago. The committee report was available last year. It took the department a very long time even to make a preliminary response.

If this bill had been introduced before the House of Commons months ago, even weeks ago, we could have had a legislative committee review the procedures and review the sections of the act to ensure that there are no mistakes.

In the course of this committee discussion we will look to the minister for the various interpretations that his officials have of this act and get him to put on the record responses to the concerns that have been placed before us as members of Parliament. All we can do in the time available is to ask the minister for those assurances.

If there are to be any complicated drafting changes it would not be possible under the procedure we have agreed to today. Therefore, we are all going to be, the minister included, in the position of putting this bill through without the benefit of third party advice, as in the process that this Parliament usually sets down for important and complicated pieces of legislation.

Therefore, I am going to ask the minister if he will undertake to keep track of the interpretations placed on the bill and the effect of it and if he will agree, on behalf of the government, to a review of this bill within two years to ensure that every intention expressed today by the government with respect to this bill meets the language of the bill and that the minister will open up the bill for revisions if necessary.

Finally, let me pay tribute to the Merchant Navy Coalition, a group including the Canadian Merchant Navy Association, the Canadian Merchant Navy Prisoner of War Association, and the Company of Master Mariners of Canada. I would particularly like to note the work of Mr. Olmstead, who is the chair. The Coalition has worked long and hard to have this day come to pass.

Winston Churchill once said, and it would apply not only to those who fought in the Battle of Britain over Britain but to the merchant mariners of Canada and other countries: "Never have so many owed so much to so few". We finally say to the merchant mariners today: "You are not forgotten".

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Chairman, I really had not planned to speak before the Committee of the Whole. I know we are anxious to get on with other business, but this is a great victory for merchant seamen, for the House of Commons, and for our process. It is one of the few victories I have seen. While some people may say it has taken a long time to achieve, I am personally delighted that the committee sat. The last committee report was signed about a year ago.

I do not think it is fair to let the proceedings continue without some kind of a poignant tribute to those merchant seamen who have achieved this victory today. I would like to take some time in the Committee of the Whole to record the reason we are about to take this decision.

At the outset of World War II the merchant navy was not very large. It had 37 ships and 1,400 people. By the end of World War II it had 180 ships and a total of 12,000 personnel. More than 70 Canadian ships were lost in World War II. To me it is very significant that the loss of life was about 10 per cent. In other words, a young merchant seaman who joined a ship and went on one of the voyages that we have discussed today had a 10 per cent chance of not coming back. That is very meaningful to me, and I am sure to all members of the House.

Most of the losses occurred from 1941 to 1943 during the period we know as the Battle of the Atlantic when the enemy forces were consolidated in the low countries, France and Norway. They were able to take their fleet out of the North Sea and the Baltic Sea and send it out to the Atlantic to attack merchant shipping during that very difficult period in time.

• (1720)

They went beyond the Atlantic. They went up to the gulf of St. Lawrence. They sank ships along Bell Isle. It was in this period that the war was brought home to North America.

I was not very old but I do remember the sinking of the Caribou, for example. It was a very tragic situation that will forever remain in the minds of certainly all Newfoundlanders, and I think it is safe to say most maritime Canadians.

The motto of the merchant navy was: "We deliver the goods" and deliver the goods it did. It was estimated by some that on average one ship carried enough foodstuffs to feed 225,000 people for one week. That is a fantastic statistic considering the rationing that was taking place and the fact that people in Europe were hungry. The cargoes also included strategic war materials.

These ships became a target for the enemy. When the wolf pack submarines were at sea during this period they were not out to hunt down destroyers, frigates and corvettes. They were there for one purpose, which was to kill the merchant ships and prevent the cargo from reaching Europe. This was a strategic effort that these brave men made during this very difficult period.

I would like to provide a feeling of what was involved in this. Essentially merchant navy veterans, as they are now called, found themselves in a combat role for which they were ill equipped. They did sail in convoys under the protection of naval vessels, but a convoy of 100 ships had an escort of three, four, or five escorts. I am not sure that is the kind of protection I would have felt safe under, but the statistics speak for themselves.

When they got closer to Europe long range German airplanes bombed and strafed them and they were also at the mercy of floating mines. Compounding all this was every mariner's traditional antagonist, the weather. There was the close proximity of ships in convoy formations, complex zigzag patterns governed by the clock, bad weather, and a darkened ship. The only way I can convey the feeling to the House and the audience this afternoon is to remind them of the movie The Cruel Sea, which depicts the convoys at sea and the torture, discomfort and even panic that they went through.

We can imagine being on one of those ships in the black of night and being torpedoed, our ship sinking in the North Atlantic, where we can only live for two minutes if we are not rescued, in certain parts of it. Some of them survived to go back to sea to be sunk again, and some were sunk a third time and still survived.

It gives me great pleasure and it is a great honour for me to be able to be part of the very historic action that we are about to take in the highest court of our country today.

There is one other thing I want to mention. I said these merchant ships were not armed but some of them were. Some of them had trained gunners who were trained by the navy in a very short course. They went to sea as boys. Not only did they serve as merchant men but they also served as gunners. They had additional duties in ships that were called DEMS, defensively equipped merchant ships.

From speaking to some merchant navy veterans I can tell the House that they were very pleased to have the DEMS in their midst. Sometimes there would perhaps be only one, two, or maybe three escorts.

The minister, the hon. member for Hillsborough, and my hon. colleague from Regina spoke very eloquently on the details of the bill and to whom it applied. That has been useful to all those who have been watching.
